Many of the problems we now face cannot be isolated because they are all interrelated, one being the cause of the other and one equally and potentially as dangerous and disruptive as the other. Up to a year ago the government was able to compare our situation with that of other free countries around the world. Economic difficulties were a global problem brought on by the energy crisis, shortages and over-supplies of essential commodities, and significant changes in the behavioural attitude of people in the free world.

However, no longer can we make an analogy with other nations. The problems to which this government must address itself immediately are now peculiar to our own situation only. It almost seems that the methods and procedures which have been developed under our constitution—or the constitution itself—are no longer sufficient and broad enough in scope to accommodate the necessary changes which need to be made in order to correct some of the most serious imbalances which have occurred in our system.

In one of the brighter phrases of his speech, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave us an indication that he, too, has considered constitutional reform and Senate reform, using other countries as models, to satisfy the needs and objectives of regions and provinces. The Prime Minister made comparisons with the constitutional model of West Germany, where the upper House is appointed by region, which gives the senators a real presence in the nation's capital, allows them to take a real part in the decision-making process and allows them the power an upper House should have with respect to matters which relate to regional concerns and regional differences. It is obvious to me that that kind of reform is essential for us in Canada if we hope to keep our country together. We must decentralize, not just the bureaucracy but the decision-making process as well.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Premiers' conferences are not enough, although the Prime Minister would likely prefer that. This would give the Prime Minister an opportunity to play the House of Commons off against the Premiers, and vice versa, an exercise in which he has already developed impressive skills. These skills are particularly evident when we assess the Prime Minister's behaviour in the establishment of bipartite negotiations with labour and business. The Prime Minister does not believe in tripartite negotiations in which three partners sit at one table in one room. He believes in talking to one partner at a time, exposing the other partner as the villain and never accepting any blame himself.

The reforms made in our system must be more fundamental than those we have seen. In spite of all the technological achievements over the past 50 years, we have not been able to bring our country closer together. We are, and likely always will be, dislocated by geography and economic and social realities. There is no amount of legislation which can bridge the gaps which will divide us into a number of regions with peculiar problems, but with unique opportunities as well. Our regions have developed their own priorities and objectives, and I consider it not to be of the gravest consequence that one of the priorities of the Quebec region, for instance, should not be to insist on linguistic duality at the moment but, rather, to assure that the great culture which has always been inherent in the French culture and linguistic group is preserved and that it be allowed to catch up in the economic area as well.

Our compatriots in the province of Quebec are not the ones who need to continue to chase after an illusive cultural identity, as we in the rest of the country need to do. Our compatriots in Quebec have other objectives, and they should have the right to pursue those objectives in a confederation.

As a matter of fact, having regard to the reality of Prince George, the Peace River country and all of British Columbia I fail to detect any enthusiasm toward the other official language. In fact, I could cite numerous examples of discontent which has been expressed to me in connection with the obsession of the Prime Minister to bring the French fact beyond an irreversible position in this country. It has been a divisive tool the Prime Minister has used to keep our country together, and his objectives have not been met.

All of us who have command of another language can appreciate the tremendous asset such skills can be, and our whole society would be enriched by the acquisition of such skills, but of so many other things which the individual likes to decide for himself this is probably the most critical one.

Parents who trace their ancestry back to cultures which do not find their roots in either the French and English cultures would likely aspire for their children to be able to acquire the language their forefathers spoke. Once upon a time, hon. members will recall, the government actively encouraged new Canadians to preserve language and cultural values they brought with them to their new homeland. Multiculturalism has become a rather seasonal thing—the seasons change and advance with the prospect of a new election.

Like their compatriots in the province of Quebec, my constituents are not so much concerned about the fact that they may have trouble communicating with their government in two languages as they are concerned about communicating with it at all. The concern for the biggest part of my constituency is not the lack of a French channel on television, but the absence of any kind of television at all. Come to think of it, there are major settlements along the Alaska Highway that have no radio reception, and the great proud public institution known as Canadian National Telecommunications has yet to figure out how to keep a telephone working along the 500 miles of the Alaska Highway, which is in my constituency. The telephone line, like the highway itself, was inherited from the United States in 1943 and little has been done to improve the service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am speaking about the same Alaska Highway which is about to become the main staging area for the construction of the Alcan pipeline. As I do every year, Mr. Speaker, I travelled the route this summer. Already, there is excitement and activity related to the pipeline. For one thing, the oil industry is busy drilling for and developing the reserves of natural gas located in northeastern British Columbia. I assume that the industry is gambling that the government will allow it to export some of its harvest to the United States under the exchange or swap arrangement everybody talks about so much. It would deliver the overage of natural gas in our country to the United States, and take it back once the Alaska pipeline is built. Nobody knows, of course, and the people who will eventually make a decision are not yet saying.

There are surveyors, prospectors, engineers and entrepreneurs, but none knows what they are doing. They are not even telling each other. Residents along the highway are convinced that they really do not know themselves. What residents do know is that those who are most affected by what is to take place will be the last to find out. We have become accustomed to that. The pipeline will be no different than any other of the massive projects which have been conceived, planned, and put in place by some faceless industrial and social engineer in one of the concrete jungles in the south.

The highway itself was built under a crisis situation as a defence project. To those who had to live and work on the highway it has been a crisis ever since. The Peace River dam, the B.C. Railway, the pipelines which are already in existence, all have been built without any consultation with local and regional governments and agencies, service organizations or the people.

All have caused unimaginable hardship to local residents who are faced with all the negative side effects such projects bring with them, particularly during construction. It is almost as if it were the responsibility of people living in the frontier areas of our country to assure for their contemporaries in the cities and concrete jungles all the comforts of modern life, without ever being eligible for some of them themselves.

The resources which are harvested in the north sell for one third less 900 miles to the south. A gallon of gasoline costs $1.50 in some places along the highway. This includes a 17 cents road tax the government of British Columbia adds for good measure to the 10 cents federal tax. The fact that the British Columbia government does not spend a nickel on the road which is entirely under federal jurisdiction does not need to be considered. But then the federal government disclaims any jurisdiction as well, so it is probably all right for the province to charge road tax.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, my assiduous attempts to get the former minister of Indian affairs and northern development to consider the broadening of the terms of reference of the Lysyk Commission to add northeastern British Columbia to the study of the Yukon. The minister announced that he has no jurisdiction for areas within the provinces. This confuses particularly the native people in the area who look only to the federal government as the guardian of their special rights. Special rights indeed!

How unfortunate, for with the least bit of foresight and co-ordination of planning, a project such as the Alcan pipeline could accommodate without additional cost the legitimate aspirations of the people in the area. Who else but they themselves know best how to approach such a project from the human standpoint at least—how to work in the harsh, often inhospitable climate—how to use nature's incredible might to aid, not hinder, man's progress—how to arrange things in a way by which the finished product will have some lasting benefit—how to transform the facilities which will be required to service the construction crews, to serve the communities in the north, and give them greater stability once the project is finished.

Let me give you an example of what will happen instead. Because there are no facilities it will be necessary for the pipeline planners and contractors to build their own. They will require a very sophisticated communications network. Every hour of down-time can mean millions of dollars. They will build airstrips, machine shops, roads, camps with elaborate recreational facilities, power stations, waterworks and other services, the likes of which have never been seen in the north. After all, it will be mostly workers from the south doing the job who are not prepared to forgo any part of their accustomed lifestyle.

Northerners will watch in awe. It will seem like a scene from a science fiction movie, but they will not be allowed to play. The toys will all be taken away or bulldozed over once the last scene is shot. Scientists and engineers will let their imagination run wild. The latest technology will put the dream in place; then it will all be gone. It will even all be paid for—added to the cost of the gas which will keep southerners comfortable. Then it will be gone—just as quick as it all came. It is too bad it could not all have been planned just a little differently.

The only thing we in the north have to be thankful for is that gone as well will be the gamblers, the pimps and the prostitutes, leaving behind only their ugly memory—the remnants of a bad dream—or would nightmare be a better description?

My constituents, residents along the Alaska highway, will go back to staring at a blank television screen and waiting for a week at a time to use the telephone to communicate with the outside world—driving through mud, potholes, and dust to go to the doctor or dentist—taking their lives into their hands to pick up the mail 30 miles away.

I also travelled to Alaska this past summer to look at another pipeline. This one is finished. The boom has come and gone but some things will never be the same again, of course, for the people who were touched by the intrustion of the Alyeska project. Even cities like Fairbanks, well established, having been born out of the first major discovery of northern resources, gold, will have serious difficulties overcoming the shock southern planners and social engineers have perpetrated on it. They built new cities as well. There is a place that looks like a moon landscape—large buildings, pump stations, power stations, at Prudhoe Bay. There was nothing there before—just ice and snow, and a sparse growth of moss that makes up the tundra and provides food for the caribou.

Here the planners really had a runaway. There are beautiful parks under glass, with even some live southern species of trees. But most of everything else is made from a byproduct of the oil harvest. There is even a new futuristic social order which not only discourages intimate social contact between male and female workers but actually prohibits husband and wife from living together in the new plastic society. Our guide told us that sex is a misdemeanor and any infraction results in immediate dismissal of both partners. One of the workers gave us his definition of the term misdemeanor. He said the more we miss it, the meaner we get.

About the only scene visible in the area which bore any semblance to reality was a small number of caribou who were going about their business seemingly undisturbed by all the nonsense going on around them.

Isn't it ironic, Mr. Speaker, that the part of nature about which we were most concerned will be the least affected when all is said and done. However, the incredible human sacrifices that have to be made to satisfy the modern time social engineers who build the projects are most significant.

Let me serve notice on those who are about to embark on phase two of the Prudhoe Bay energy development that my constituents will want to have something to say about the sacrifices they will have to make. I would, however, also like to make it clear that we in northern British Columbia welcome that type of development. Unlike most other observers who pass their judgment from York University, we have learned to appreciate the stabilizing effect such a project can have on small communities, struggling to afford some of the most basic amenities of modern life.

The tax base and influx of permanent jobs in connection with the operation and maintenance of the pipeline is a welcome feature. In most cases we found that pipelines even offer some positive features in terms of the environment. The rights of way provide better access to other resources. Moose and deer like the growth on the right of way and can therefore be seen in abundance, but most of the prosperity inherent in such a project will accrue to all Canadians.

[Mr. Oberle.]

We hear that $4 billion will be spent on Canadian material and supplies, and thousands of manhours will help to ease the unemployment situation. Is it therefore not reasonable to insist that the negative side-effects will, as well, be shared throughout our country?

Over the past few days I have demanded from various ministries the establishment of a technical planning committee to plan for the part of the country which I represent. I have demanded the ministry get involved and study what has happened in other projects and safeguard against negative side-effects in those areas so that my constituents will have a rightful place in Canadian society, like all Canadians, and be able to make their contribution to our country.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend briefly but sincerely personal congratulations to the television crew members in the House and the production staff. As a member of the special House committee which was given the mandate to implement television broadcasting of the House of Commons, I want to say that I am extremely satisfied with the tremendously good job of the CBC and the technical personnel whom they have hired to carry it out.

As with any throne speech, we are dealing with generalities. I am now well into my seventh year in this House. It is not exactly a track record. However, in the time that I have been here I have not listened to a throne speech so lacking in national direction. As well, the mini-budget repeated the same policies that the Liberal government has been attempting to implement since 1963.

Let us not forget that the Liberal party has been in power continuously since 1963. It is very easy for a member on this side to say it is time for a change. That is a worn out phrase. However, if you look at what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) had to say last Thursday, you will see that his department is still bankrupt of new ideas, policies, fiscal and monetary, and directions.

We are still talking in terms of solutions to problems which have not worked. We are still having legislation introduced that will give corporations large tax breaks, exemptions, and deferrals.

I was in this House two or three years ago when the former minister of finance, the Hon. John Turner, introduced a budget which was designed to create jobs and lessen unemployment. That budget was to stimulate the economy by putting more investment money in the hands of corporations. Several months after his budget, the then minister of finance sent a questionnaire to many of the large corporations directly affected by his budgetary measures. The reply that came back was very clear. The tax breaks, tax deferrals, rapid write-offs, depletion allowances and so on, had not in fact contributed to an increase in new jobs or a decrease in unemployment.

However, last Thursday evening we got another dose of the same old medicine.

I am beginning to wonder how much longer the Canadian people, whether they are aligned to my party, the Liberal party or the Progressive Conservative party, particularly the million plus out of work, the underemployed and the youth who have been educated at great cost but cannot find jobs suited to their education, will continue to accept the same old medicine that has not cured the economic ills of this country for the past ten years, particularly the last three or four.

I sincerely hope the majority of Canadians will think intelligently about the economic issues facing this country. I suggest, with great sincerity, that this is tied in with the national unity debate, crisis or issue.

I wish to make a few references to the national unity situation. I am convinced that if the economy were buoyant and unemployment were low in the province of Quebec, the young people in that province, as well as the middle aged and the older, would not consider separatism such a dynamic force. Let there be no mistake about it. Even though perhaps 30, 35 or 40 per cent of Quebecers would like to separate, and perhaps even fewer, there is the feeling in the province of Quebec that somehow they have developed despite Confederation. There is a feeling they have been able to preserve and develop their language and their culture in a sea of 220 million English-speaking North Americans. This has resulted in a tremendous sense of pride in the manner in which they have maintained their identity.

In fact—and I am speaking of Francophone Quebecers—they are a nation in the French meaning of that word. I am not quarrelling with that attitude nor am I quarrelling with this insularity, because they have had to promote themselves in order to survive. But I am convinced the average Francophone Quebecer would feel much more at home in Canada if the party presently in power federally, and in particular the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), a Francophone himself, had understood, not only in a cold and academic way but from the heart, the real feelings of the province of Quebec.

Some may say the hon. member who is presently on his feet represents a riding in southwestern Ontario. That is so. But, Mr. Speaker, on my mother's side I come from five generations of English-speaking Quebecers and I can tell you that I am not proud of the way in which some of my ancestors treated French-speaking Quebecers in rural Quebec, specifically in the Eastern Townships.

My grandfather refused to learn to speak French. My mother attempted to speak French but left the province for the prairies and, when she did, she forgot the French language. I can recall on the 11th range, not far from South Durham, little French children of my age—I am going back, now, to the 1940's—running around in the summertime without shoes, half-clad and poverty-stricken, in contrast to the children of English-speaking farmers who were not rich but who were certainly much better off. There has always been antagonism between such groups. Speaking in terms of Montreal, it was between those who sat in the front offices and the Francophone workers who were behind on the assembly lines or production lines. It was the same in the rural areas. Very often the poorest farms were owned by French-speaking Quebecers while the best land was owned by English-speaking Quebecers.

The question I am getting at is this: what has the present Prime Minister done in the past ten years to try to explain the growing bitterness in Quebec, first apparent in the quiet revolution of the early 'sixties in the "maîtres chez nous" period and reaching a dramatic conclusion on November 15 with the election of René Lévesque and the Parti Québécois, which was really a ceremonial seal being placed upon what had already occurred? If we are to understand the aspirations and determination of Quebecers we must bear these things in mind.

Let there be no mistake about it, Quebec is potentially a very rich geographic entity. It could trade with France and the French-speaking community overseas. It could "go it alone" although there might be years of trial and difficulty. Let us not forget that if they are determined enough to go, they will go. I think that it is finally incumbent upon us in English-speaking Canada to take a new look at the Quebec fact and at the French fact in that province.

I should like to draw an historical analogy with events in the United States. I realize that when one becomes involved in historical analogies there is always the problem that the facts do not fit together completely. But let us cast our minds back to the United States in the 1850's. When I was in high school I was taught that slavery was the major issue in the war between the states, but if one reads those American historians who give more weight to the economic situation at the time, one finds that slavery was not the cause, or the major cause, of the war of secession. It was the politicizing of slavery, the extension of slavery into the territories in the west, the states of Kansas, Nebraska and so on.

The American constitution lays it down that each state shall have two senators, regardless of the size of its population. When it became clear to the political leaders of the south, many of whom had begun to free their slaves, that it was no longer financially and materially profitable for them to remain within the union, when it became clear that they had lost their balance of power in the United States Senate, it was then and then only that they decided to secede. I believe there is an analogy there.

I believe French-speaking Quebecers feel today that it is no longer financially, materially and politically advantageous for them to remain within the present structure of Confederation. But have we heard from the Prime Minister on this question? When the travelling circus—pardon me, the travelling caucus—was in Brantford, was anything discussed there by any of the three cabinet ministers or any of the three Liberal MPs along these lines? Did they address themselves to this great national issue? No, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) got the headlines in the Brantford Expositor. They were to the effect that the government might tamper with the old age security program and cut back children's allowances.

I say to hon. members on the other side, as a matter of interest to them, that it would have been better had the Liberal travelling circus, or caucus, not gone to Brantford. No important national issue was discussed there. They came to listen, and all they did was talk. That is not the way to enter into a dialogue with constituents. I have not heard of them travelling to ridings represented by Liberal members, though I could be wrong.

The unity issue in this country is tied in directly with the economic prospect facing us. Unless and until we can come to grips with unemployment, with job insecurity which causes emotional instability, nervous breakdowns, disruption of families, and juvenile delinquency, it will be extremely difficult to resolve. All of these flow from economic problems plaguing the nation.

I am very happy to see the Minister of Finance enter the Chamber. He is a busy man these days and he personally is a very likable man. But unless he can come up with something a little more innovative, a little more creative and dynamic, something which comes more from the heart than just the mind, then what he said last Thursday night is not going to solve our basic economic problems. It is not going to solve the unemployment crisis. We already have on record the fact that it did not work with Mr. Turner's budget, and it did not work with the budget of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). Yet we are getting the same dose of medicine for the same disease.

I love my country, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to see it break up. I do not want to see divisiveness in the west or in Quebec or in the maritimes. But when you consider that in a riding such as Brant, in the so-called affluent part of Canada, southwestern Ontario, the real unemployment rate is around 11 per cent, the highest since the great depression, and when you consider the unemployment rate in parts of New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Cape Breton Island and the northern areas of our country, is it little wonder that people are asking why they should even bother to go out and vote on election day? They ask: "What is the point? Can they do anything? Will the government do anything?"

These are fundamental questions which we have to ask ourselves. We have to come to grips with our problems in this country in a spirit of unity. In summation, we in Ottawa have to create an environment in which Quebec City is just as important a provincial capital as Regina, Victoria, Toronto or any of the other provincial capitals. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to do it with the stroke of a pen on a legal or constitutional document; it has to come from the government—from us—directly to the Canadian people. Whether we are Francophone or Anglophone, we must work together.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the throne speech speaks of "the urgent need for important structural adjustments" in the Canadian economy. The prices and incomes controls program, which began some two years ago, was intended to provide a breathing space for the government to put in place, "structural policies to ensure a more efficient and competitive economy". These were the words of the white paper entitled "Attack on Inflation" which the government tabled when the controls program was first announced.

The date for a phased out ending of controls, April 14 of next year, has finally been announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), and this means that that breathing space provided by the controls will soon be ending. Yet there is a tremendous amount to be done to make Canada a more efficient economy, one which is more competitive both here and abroad. The government must use the time remaining while the controls continue to apply to deal with the structural problems in question, even though it is clear that much will remain to be done after the controls have gone.

In the white paper tabled just before the October, 1976, throne speech entitled "The Way Ahead", the government spoke of the need to improve and strengthen competition policy as a way of bringing about needed structural change in the market place. The government made it clear in that white paper that it would be relying primarily on the market system as a means of enabling Canadians to achieve their economic and social goals.

Another government policy paper, "Agenda for Co-operation", was published earlier this year, and it too stressed the importance for a post-controls society of a complete reform of competition policy. In addition, it stressed the importance of implementing the borrowers' and depositors' protection act to improve the operation of the market place for credit and to strike at the loan sharking operations that tarnish the market place and harm consumers generally.

The stage two competition bill was given first reading this year. Its subject matter was studied by the finance committee, which issued a detailed report of its findings and recommendations. The borrowers' and depositors' protection act received second reading and was in the final stages of committee consideration when the session adjourned.

In light of the importance that these measures have in terms of bringing about the needed structural changes in the market place, I think it is disturbing that they are not mentioned at all in the Speech from the Throne. It is true that earlier this week the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), in a speech outside the House, said that these bills would be reintroduced. However, one can wonder as to the implications of the failure to mention these two important measures in any way in the throne speech itself. Certainly a reference to them in the speech would have confirmed the commitment by the government as a whole to implement these two key measures, measures which are vital to the effective operation of the market place and to the well-being of business and consumers alike.

Government and business spokesmen have been saying that uncertainty has been hampering the development of business confidence necessary for the recovery of the economy. I think the lack of final parliamentary decisions on these two measures helps to add to the very uncertainty the government wishes to eliminate. Perhaps the government is holding back because of what appears to be the developing and seemingly well orchestrated campaign whereby certain elements express the views of the largely big business sector of the economy in opposition to these bills. They argue that these measures would hamper the proper operation of the market place; they argue that they are among the factors convincing some Canadian businessmen to invest in the United States and in other foreign countries rather than Canada.

These are strange arguments, Mr. Speaker. They are wrong arguments. They turn reality upside down. The two bills are not designed to be the instruments for improper government interference or over-regulation of an already properly operating market place. Instead, they are aimed at ensuring its effective operation in the interests of all Canadians, a market place which is free from domination by a few large firms. Surely enabling the proper operation of market forces is exactly what those opposing the adoption of the bill are supposed to favour.

In addition, those who say that the proposed competition policy is encouraging them to invest in the United States are talking about going to a country whose present anti-trust laws, their competition laws, are already tougher and more bureaucratically interventionist than anything proposed by the government in the stage two competition policy bill. In fact all of the western countries, even that bastion of free enterprise, West Germany, have been updating and tightening their competition laws.

But it is not correct that all business generally opposes the bills I have been talking about, especially the stage two bill. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the National Automotive Trades Association, for example, are the legitimate voices of broad segments of the business community. They support the stage two bill and are calling for its early implementation.

The government's resolve, its sincerity in getting on with completing the long delayed reform of competition policy and the equally much needed updating of the federal consumer credit law, will not be demonstrated just by the early reintroduction of these two bills. More important, this resolve and sincerity will be demonstrated by the government through its giving the necessary priority on the agenda of parliament to moving them along to the final stages of decision-making as soon as possible. I am not saying, in doing this, that valid points for the improvement of the two bills made by business and consumer groups during their original consideration in the last session should be ignored. These points can and should be dealt with; but this can be done and the bills be moved along without delay to their final adoption and implementation.

The passing of these two measures will serve the best interests of all those businessmen who really believe what so many of them have been preaching about the market system. It will serve the best interests of consumers and small business in particular but, more important, it will serve the best interests of Canadians generally.

Food was another structural problem area raised by the 1975 "Attack on Inflation" white paper. The Speech from the Throne has a section dealing with the implementation of the government's food strategy. This strategy appeared to have been set out in the policy paper entitled "A Food Strategy for Canada", tabled jointly by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the then minister of consumer and corporate affairs last June. It set out what the government considered to be "the basic principles of a food strategy for Canada to assure all Canadians that its policies and programs ensure adequate supplies of safe and nutritious foods at prices which are reasonable to both producers and consumers." In doing so, it admitted that "in the past principles and procedures have not been used to co-ordinate all relevant elements of Canada's food policy."

With few exceptions, little was said in the paper about specific operating programs to implement the strategy. One of the specific pledges in it was that the government will ensure "in any appointments to boards and agencies . . . the views of producers, processors and consumers are adequately represented." Another was that the government "will provide regular price information to consumers on a selected set of basic foods." But nothing whatsoever has been done since last June to put into place, or even to announce formally, these two programs or any of the others specifically set out or hinted at in the strategy document. However, they did resurface in identical form in the throne speech. It also promised that a national food conference would be held, although it is not clear to what extent the implementation of the two specific programs I mentioned are linked to that conference first having taken place.

The throne speech indicates that the conference " will bring together representatives of governments, producers, consumers and food industry to work together toward a national agreement on how Canada's food strategy should be further developed and implemented." The House should bear in mind that the objectives for food strategy I have quoted from the government document of last June appeared in rather similar terms in the February, 1974, throne speech over three years ago. That was the one that was presented not long before the 1974 general election. In that throne speech the objectives are described as being a "policy on food" which "the government is developing." At best, the process of development seems to have been and continues to be rather slow and laborious.

The February, 1974, throne speech indicated that "the government will wish to consult with provincial governments, consumer groups and producers" in developing its food policy. This was what was said in 1974. Yet the Minister of Agriculture recently announced that the national food conference finally promised in the current throne speech will not take place until next February. He has called for briefs from various organizations to be submitted to the government by December. He said that certain of the organizations presenting briefs will be allowed to discuss them with a panel of ministers in December. He said that this panel will be drawn from among a number of ministers including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. What is surprising about this announcement is that it would appear from it that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will not be allowed, as a matter of course, to be involved in each and every discussion. This means the cabinet representative of the voice of individual Canadians as consumers will be absent from some of these important discussions this coming December.

In 1973 the House of Commons set up, at the government's request, a special all-party committee on food price trends. It heard witnesses from all areas of the food system. Also in that year the government created the Food Prices Review Board. Its members represented not just consumers but manufacturers, producers, and business as well. Both of these bodies issued extensive reports proposing changes and improvements in food policy. So the government has already had before it for some time results of a consultative process involving these two organizations. These reports will likely cover much of the same ground as one could expect would be covered by the food conference. In any event, it would not be fully realistic to expect producers, consumers and manufacturers to agree on a single program which all sides would consider equally fair to them in every possible respect.

Consultation is a necessary and worth-while part of working out government policies in a country like Canada. But in areas where complete agreement by all parties to be affected by government policies is not possible, the government has a responsibility to show leadership and to take action in the over-all interest of the public. Therefore I hope, if the national agreement sought by the government does not prove to be possible, that the government will not use its absence as an excuse for delaying meaningful action to put in place necessary elements of a true, comprehensive food policy.

It is interesting to see the recent efforts by the Minister of Agriculture to promote his department as the new protector of the consumer in the food area; but even with the re-organization he has recently announced, it is likely going to be a long time before it has any real credibility for this purpose in the eyes of most consumers as being able, and in fact willing, to deal fairly with their interests.

Also nothing was said in his speech in the House yesterday specifically about providing foods "at prices which are reasonable to consumers" as a component of the agricultural development strategy he was outlining as an obviously necessary and desirable part of a total food strategy. Yet these words which were absent from his speech are an important part of what the government said last June were its objectives for food strategy. Instead, in his speech, the minister spoke of stable prices. This is not necessarily the same thing as reasonable prices. The best interests of both consumers and producers will be served if the government puts in place measures to provide prices for them which are at one and the same time stable and reasonable. That is not an easy task, to be sure, but one which should be among the overriding objectives of a national food strategy. I would hope the promises of consultation in a national food conference will not turn out to be excuses for government inaction.

Turning to the matter of the economy generally, regretfully I have doubts that the tax cuts announced by the Minister of Finance last week will do much to add to consumer demand and reduce our chronic and all too high level of unemployment in any substantive way. The Minister of Finance has in fact tightened up the guideline for allowable wage increases for the period of the controls program just begun. The government will not be allowing wages to increase sufficiently to keep in step with the actual degree to which inflation has exceeded 6 per cent, contrary to the promise it made to workers that it would do this kind of thing when the controls program was first announced. Therefore, the tax cut will not be likely to give consumers a sufficient degree of additional buying power. Instead it will be cancelled by the tighter wage guidelines.

The size of the deficit obviously provides constraints on what the government might be able to do, but surely government efforts to stimulate the economy would have the effect of reducing the deficit rather than increasing it. Government programs stimulating the economy, which got people back to productive work, would mean much less money being paid out by the government for unemployment insurance, welfare and the like than at present. Also the government would gain more tax revenues, not only from workers back in productive jobs, but also from business as it increases its activity.

I think the government before too long will have to do more than was announced last Thursday to stimulate the buying power of Canadians and generally to get the economy moving.

I will abbreviate my remarks somewhat because of the order adopted by the House earlier today to limit the time of speeches to 20 minutes, but it is my intention to release my notes as a statement of my views on those areas on which I will not comment in detail today. I hope they will prove to be of interest to members of the House and to the public generally. Also I should like to say that my comments, as always, are being made in a constructive sense. I am making them as a Liberal, someone who supports the government, believing it is certainly preferable to the alternatives, but also as someone who wants it to be a Liberal government not just in name but in policy orientation and action, in the belief that this is the desire of most Canadians as well.

I have been talking about structural problems. The ultimate challenge to the federal government and to all of us is to preserve and to improve the structure of Canada itself as a united country. The throne speech, as I and others have been pointing out since last November should be the case, recognizes that the economy and national unity are not separate issues, that they are closely intertwined. As I have been saying, the ability of the federal government, our national government, to show that it can deal effectively with problems such as the economy, that are real to people everywhere in Canada, helps to demonstrate the value of having one country for Quebecers and all Canadians. This means that the federal government must show leadership in dealing with economic and social problems which, if unsolved, can call into question in the minds of people in some parts of the country the value of being part of a united Canada. It means ensuring through federal government leadership and action that all can feel, and in fact will be, equally at home in this country whether they are French-speaking or English-speaking, and this must include both the French language minority groups outside of Quebec and the English language minority group in that province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: It means federal government leadership and action to bring about changes and adjustments where necessary to our federal structure aimed at improving its functioning in a way that recognizes regional and other differences, but which does not weaken that structure to the extent that we no longer have in fact one country. Finally, it means the strong efforts of all of us here in this House of Commons and all of us who believe in a united Canada, not just to preserve it but to improve it, to preserve and improve our country so as to bring about the development of its potential, both material and human, in the best interests of all its people.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate and to contribute my point of view both for the record and for the consideration of people in Canada.

I would like to extend traditional greetings of good will to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and to wish them and the new members who were elected in the by-elections success in their role as members of parliament.

As a westerner I am especially happy that the Queen was able to open this parliament. Also, as a westerner I have long been of the opinion that the monarchy has played an important role in this century in tying together the many ethnic groups which have come to the West, particularly in the first part of this century.

There are those who may have said cynically that perhaps if Louis Riel and his dream of a republic on the prairies had succeeded, we might now have been better off, but I must say that I believe in the monarchy and that the role of British insitutions has been important in binding western Canada to Confederation, at least in the early part of this century. I think the considerable divisiveness that has occurred in the country has been the result of the loss of symbols that monarchy has represented. The British empire has disappeared and the British nation no longer plays the role that it previously played in the world, but until a few decades ago it still represented a bulwark against the south. It may be said that some of our failures and the divisiveness which we are experiencing in Canada today might be the result of our failure to create new symbols to replace the old.

Now before I should like to turn to the issue of national unity and the economy and to express two concerns of a regional nature, one affecting my riding especially. The first one to which I will refer is with regard to the failure of the Department of the Environment to establish in the town of Swan River a meteorological office which has been promised for the last ten years. For some reason, while the government expends vast sums of money in many ways on such programs as language training, it fails to provide the basic structure on which communities exist.

The area of Swan River in my riding has no adequate weather forecasting service because the present stations are located too far away. Weather conditions there are variable. This area needs a weather forecasting station in particular because its geographic location places it on the borderline between the weather systems from the northwest Alaska and weather systems from the western United States. Small aircraft, in particular, need more adequate weather forecasting in this area than is being provided at present. The Department of the Environment has demonstrated a cavalier attitude for the last ten years in regularly including the establishment of such a station in the area in its estimates, only to change its mind at the last minute. This has made the citizens in the area feel that they are being discriminated against by the Ottawa bureaucracy.

There is one other subject of a somewhat parochial nature which I should like to talk about, that is, the matter of the grading of wheat under the new grading rules of the Canadian Grain Commission. It has become obvious now that the new grading system heavily favours those areas of the prairies that grow the so-called No. 1 Hard Red spring wheat to the detriment of areas such as the Parkland regions in the prairies where a lower protein quality of wheat is grown. The recent long wet spell has reduced the quality of much of the wheat grown in the Parkland region to No. 3 utility, and there is a large spread between No. 3 Red and No. 3 utility, amounting to 50 cents a bushel. This is causing great concern and unhappiness among the growers.

The new grading system which allows for only three grades in the Canada west red variety applies only to top quality wheat, and it seems that all other grades of wheat are to be consigned to No. 3 utility. Under the old grading system there were six grades of wheat and one grade of feed wheat, which allowed for a price spread differential between all grades. It is obvious that on occasion the Parkland area particularly will produce mostly No. 3 utility wheat. It seems that the Wheat Board finds it convenient not to have to deal with as many grades as it did formerly.

Certainly the new grading system makes it easier for the Wheat Board to sell grain because it does not need to deal with the number of grades which existed under the previous grading system. Furthermore, the introduction of the new grading system means that in effect the Wheat Board, which is a selling agency, does not need to deal with lower grades of millable wheat. It prefers to sell merely No. 3 utility at feed wheat prices, although, on occasion, much of this grain will enter the markets of the world as millable wheat. This means a considerable loss to growers, amounting to tens of millions of dollars, if not hundreds of million of dollars. The Board of Grain Commissioners should consider adding a fourth grade of grain between No. 3 red and No. 3 utility.

I believe that this grading system of wheat discourages farmers from growing wheat in the Parkland area in particular, and over a period of time it could seriously discourage the production of wheat in these areas. Therefore I think this matter should be resolved by the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Canadian Wheat Board.

Next I wish to speak on the economic situation of this country, but as it is nearly six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House agreed that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner hour I was about to discuss the economic condition of our country. After nine years of this government under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we have severe economic conditions; we have the problems of high inflation, high unemployment, and diminished economic activity. That we should be in this situation had been foreseen for a long time. We are not entirely alone in this situation, as witness the problems of the United Kingdom, France, Italy, and our neighbour to the south.

Essentially inflation will occur when governments overspend. Governments do little in the way of production, but they are always happy to promote spending and to see the production of workers in society expanded. The vast expansion of governments in particular fields where governments have declared an interest, such as health, education, and welfare, has really meant that a large number of people have been taking, and this problem has grown to the monster it is now so that it is threatening the economic base of the country.

Perhaps we could keep going on this course more easily if the energy crisis had not come along. It is obvious that much of the advance in affluence in countries around the world was based on cheap oil and energy prices. As the availability of cheap energy comes to an end—it is now essentially under the control of the Arab nations which are intent on making the best use of their good fortunes—we are witnessing an abrupt end to the continuing expansion of the good life we have had for the past 25 years.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

The Prime Minister has suggested that even though Canadians have developed a high standard of living over the past 25 years they are more unhappy and more disunited than ever before, and he wonders why. I agree that per capita it can be shown that Canadians are about twice as well off as they were 25 years ago. Perhaps it is a very human reaction that when there are good times, regardless of productivity, individuals in society do not relate their good fortunes to the productivity of their fellow workers but regard affluence as a happening to which they are entitled.

Twenty-five years ago the role of government was much simpler. When governments involved themselves in the fields of health, welfare, and education, it was at the local level, and citizens were very much more aware of the true cost of the services they received. The involvement of the government in our social programs has created uncontrolled expenditure, and the end is not yet in sight. The federal government has involved itself in hospitalization, medical care, drug care, social security and, to a lesser extent, education, to the point that reasonable prudence is not being observed. Furthermore, vast amounts of taxation come to Ottawa and are then redistributed to the regions, and this only heightens the divisiveness within Canada.

In today's Globe and Mail Mr. Ronald Anderson has this to say:

> Real incomes rose strongly and it became economically possible and politically necessary for politicians to improve the quality of social services and to work toward a fairer distribution of incomes.
> These social measures—in the fields, for example, of pensions, health care, education, unemployment insurance and other transfer payments—may well have created an inflationary bias. Probably public sector activity increased too rapidly. But this is an area in which there is considerable room for debate. The question is not whether improvement in social programs was needed, but whether the structure, scale and timing of the new measures were appropriate.

I think it can be said that the federal government must take the blame for many of these programs that were pushed too fast.

The malaise that affects our economy will not soon go away, because we have spent 30 years creating the situation we now face. During the past 30 years we have had a change of attitude and a change of circumstances within our society so far as the individual is concerned. An individual in the past had to be prudent; he saved money for his old age because he was expected to look after himself. But now things are changed. At the present time an individual can have a modest living from the old age pension and the supplement and Canada Pension, unless he is in peculiar circumstances. He finds that from the cradle to the grave there is no need to worry about paying physicians for health care or paying hospitals for hospital care. All of these are provided by the state out of general revenue. Is it any wonder that people are providing themselves with holidays in far-away places?

With the inflation the way it is, the value savings in mortgages, bonds and bank accounts is being halved every few years. Some would say this may well be a change in our society's structure and that we are in the post industrial state.

Then again, there is the media's view of what politicians should do as regards spending programs. A politician who votes against the major spending programs is regarded as negative or lacking in compassion, while the politician who votes for vast government social enterprises is regarded as positive or compassionate. What is positive about a government that runs a national deficit of over $9 billion and prints money to finance it? What is positive or compassionate about a constant inflation rate of 8 per cent to 10 per cent, a rate at which half of an individual's life savings is destroyed every eight years? What is positive about a government whose regulations cost consumers billions of dollars each year? And what is positive about a government that is printing money at a rate almost twice as fast as the rate that the nation's economy is growing? We need a rethinking of our economic and political structure in this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this leads into what I would like to say and what is beginning to emerge in discussions about the future of this country. There seems to be a general agreement that there needs to be a re-arranging to the federal-provincial powers for all the regions if this diverse country is to function. It has been pointed out by some that we are already a fairly decentralized country. Mr. Speaker, before the federal government assumed a high portion of the social costs in the last 25 years we had quite a decentralized country and we functioned reasonably effectively. The fall of the Canadian dollar, obscured and cushioned by the precipitous fall of the American dollar, points up the serious economic conditions in which this country finds itself. The mere fact that today the Canadian dollar was at its lowest in 45 years only indicates the gravity of the situation.

Speaking of regions, Mr. Speaker, an article in the Manitoba Co-operator of March 20, 1977, referring to The Financial Post 'Think West' Conference Edmonton recently had this to say about regions:

> There has to be a new deal for Confederation. Lougheed puts it this way when he says change is necessary "but it can't be legalistic, it can't be tied in with the constitution. It must be a matter of attitude and spirit and co-operation—not a legal document. It can't have special status for any one province, but it must recognize that provinces are different and that each should have the opportunity to find its way in the areas that are important to it".
> The strain on national unity makes the revival of Canada's industrial activity an urgent priority—and the location for new efforts should be dictated by economic imperatives, not traditional habit.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the economic situation is grave, the political situation can only be described as disastrous. The Prime Minister seems to be getting ready to run on the favourable Liberal wheelhorse that only the Liberal government can guarantee Canadian unity. Let us look at the history of this contention. Since 1896, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier assumed power in Canada, the Liberal party has governed for 60 years. Only on three short occasions was the Conservative party in power, while on two occasions during this time there were serious political problems facing the country. The first was the First World War that taxed the resources of Canada to the utmost, and the second was the great depression.

Furthermore, during that time the province of Quebec contributed three Prime Ministers whose tenure of office spread over some 35 years. It has been recognized by political adversaries that the province of Quebec, through solemnly supporting the Liberal party for a century, has had a major say in the direction that the government of this country has taken. So strong is the feeling of western Canadians that the government of this country has been dominated by the wishes of central Canada that they have become alienated and have less than absolute loyalties to the Canadian state.

The passage of the bilingual law which had the effect of closing to unilingual people in the civil service, the armed forces, the RCMP through language requirements, the normal advancement that they might expect, has created violent animosities in that part of Canada that might have been sympathetic and viewed favourably the Canadian experience. Yet it is that part of Canada that has had the most influence in shaping the government of our country that is now demanding that separation take place. Certainly there are problems with any nation with two languages and any nation that tries to give them equal status. It seems to me that Belgium is an example of a small country that has attempted to solve its language problem by separating the two language groups.

English-speaking Canada has largely been a bystander in this debate that is in progress and that is looming for the future. Why has French Canada a monopoly on this issue, whether it is federalist or separatist in nature? Part of it is a recognition by many English Canadians that, given the circumstances, it will be up to the Quebecers to decide the future of Quebec. Anyone who thinks differently might consider the reaction in the Quebec National Assembly to the suggestion of the Prime Minister that there be a referendum. All parties opposed to the Parti Quebecois in that legislature consider themselves federalists and oppose Quebec independence, but they seem to have rallied behind Quebec's right to decide its own future. Frustration and anger are growing in English Canada at the long debate, particularly within a province that seems to have gained greatly in its political and economic status by belonging to the Canadian federation. Furthermore, it is obvious that there is growing in the rest of Canada not more spirit of compromise but a greater spirit of antagonism.

The Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne said that we should press forward with greater language training in the second official language. Well, the second official language has been available for years, even in my maligned province of Manitoba and, as one who had studied that language, French, to gain an entrance to university, I can attest that there has always been second training available. Incidentally, it was the first Quebec Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who approved in fact the actions of the government of Manitoba in 1894, and it was the federal Conservative government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell which was readying legislation to remedy the situation and that was filibustered by the Liberals under Sir Wilfrid Laurier so that the legislation was never passed.

Those who think second language training will make a material difference to the Canadian unity problem, I think are sadly mistaken. Facility in the use of second languages in the majority of the population only comes about when there is a need to speak two languages. Therefore, in the sea of English in North America, to expect that by offering language training in schools in English-speaking provinces there will be a great espousing of the French language is unrealistic.

During the debate on the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister indicated that he would set up legislation to allow for referendums for various possible political decisions. Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher), seconded by me, introduced private member's Bill C-412, called "An Act Respecting the Holding of a National Plebiscite on the Separation of Quebec from Canada".

Referendums have serious disadvantages. Even in the province of Quebec it could be that a federal referendum might turn those who are not disposed to independence toward that goal if they felt that the national federalism were steamrolling their province. Furthermore, a federal referendum would have little effect on the outcome of a referendum in the province of Quebec alone. It has always been assumed that a national unity referendum would show an overwhelming majority of Canadians in other provinces are for the maintenance of the Canadian federation, as we learned in the referendum on conscription in 1942. This great outpouring of good will has been generated in English Canada from churches, Chambers of Commerce, and professional groups.

Everyone outside Quebec suggests that he loves Canada and wants Quebec to remain because they are cherished and needed. However, there is a substantial group in English Canada, perhaps still a minority, but in my estimation perhaps as large a group as 25 per cent, and in certain areas as large as 50 per cent—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I want first to compliment the mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson). He made an admirable speech, his maiden speech in the House of Commons. I also want to thank the seconder, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood), who made a very interesting speech about a province he dearly loves and showed his deep concern about the people and problems of that province.

Today I wish to talk about some of the issues raised during this debate. As the minister in charge of working for a strong domestic industry and a strong export trade, I am sure members on all sides will agree that we need a healthier economy at home than we now have, and a far healthier world economy than now exists. Some members suggest, but I do not agree, that you can separate the two, the domestic and world economies and come up with bandages applied to domestic ailments. Those bandages will not stick.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

What we can do is support and encourage Canadian industry to cope best with the competitive world forces that are in fact developing. One can question whether they are or are not developing. One can talk about the drop of the Canadian dollar. The fact is there has been a significant drop of the U.S. dollar in relation to the Japanese yen and the German mark. That is an indication that we in this country are confronted with a world economic force.

We are in more than a cyclical downturn of world and Canadian economic performance. Fundamental changes are occurring which require strong readjustment in manufacturing, processing, tourism, and other types of industry.

Mr. Rodriguez: Tell us about mining.

Mr. Horner: That readjustment, sometimes locally painful, requires a strong sense of urgency about developing more efficient industry competing in the world in the things we do best. Mining may be one of them. I will be glad to tell the hon. member something about mining. Apparently the letters I have exchanged with him he cannot read, so I will gladly explain to him.

Mr. Rodriguez: I don't think you can write.

Mr. Horner: I believe we have seen some forward thinking in this debate. I was especially interested in the speech of the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell). He is looking for more competitive industry and an expanded manufacturing sector. If the hon. member wants to try reading, I suggest he read the speech on pages 82 and 83 of Hansard.

Mr. Rodriguez: Read mine on page 115.

Mr. Horner: I will do that.

He is looking for more competitive industry and an expanded manufacturing sector, specializing in what we are best fitted to do by natural or other advantages, with companies encouraged to merge and specialize where that would lead to greater ability to serve the Canadian and export markets. With all that I fully agree, and indeed my department is working, with other parts of government, on action proposals.

Much consultation is necessary with business, labour, provincial governments, seeking some kind of strategic consensus—even a basic shaking up, first, of complacency, and resistance to change that still underlies all the talk about the terrible fix we are supposed to be in.

I will have more to say about the world trading scene that the hon. member addressed himself to, the need to accept greater competition in trading as an opportunity for Canada more than a treat, but I thank him for a real contribution.

Mr. Rodriguez: Tell us about mining.

Mr. Horner: As I pointed out already, I wish more members had paid attention to that speech.

Looking at some of the speeches that have been made, I note that the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) made a very interesting comment. At page 48 he was reported to have said:

> The only organization that can live beyond its means in this country is the federal government.

Surely the hon. member with his stature and recognition as an economist knows better than that. He went on to say:

> The myth that has been spread that inflation in this country has been caused by people wanting too much, by unions demanding too much, by corporations demanding too much, is wrong.

The hon. member who professes to be an economist says it is a myth that unions and management demanding too much contribute to inflation, that the only one responsible is the federal government. According to that, no responsibility is needed on the part of those making wage demands, demands which in fact were 22 per cent before the AIB took over. Would a resurgence of strikes which have fallen off by more than 63 per cent from this time last year be all right to the hon. member for Don Valley after the AIB controls come off April 14? Would he leave it solely up to the federal government to be responsible for some of the concessions made prior to AIB?

This government is restraining public service salaries, having them follow, not lead, salaries in the private sector. That, to me, puts on private sector management, and on unions, the onus for wage restraint, especially after the controls end. For too long, before controls came in, too much of management did not negotiate hard enough, because they would either pass on increases to consumers or they would look to government to step in. During controls, they could shelter under the control levels. They can do that for a little while, but not much longer. Then there will be a heavy onus on firms to negotiate hard and, at times, to hang tough. The hon. member for Don Valley does not accept this as a responsibility. He wishes that off on the federal government.

Mr. Crosbie: He does not have to take Trudeau's orders.

Mr. Horner: I hear the hon. member who is concerned about fluorspar in Newfoundland. Maybe if management had hung tough and the unions had not been so hard—

Mr. Rodriguez: Come off it.

Mr. Horner: There was a strike in that plant in 1971, 1972, 1973, 1975 and 1976.

Similarly with prices and profits, the hon. member suggests there is no responsibility on the part of business. They may demand all they can get and damn the torpedoes. The torpedoes could sink us, but that would be the fault of the federal government.

I cannot believe that only the federal government must exercise restraint and only it must impose restraint. There is too much federal, provincial and other government intervention, regulation, cushioning us, as it is. I believe in less government control and regulation, but the other side of that coin is individual responsibility.

If the federal government is the only organization that can live within its means and others are not responsible, you are talking about a Canada so centralized and rigidly planned that Canadians would not stand still for it. But that seems to be the rather odd direction one wing of today's Progressive Conservative party is going, always dependent upon and looking up to big brother, asking the federal government to control everything. Apparently that is what the hon. member for Don Valley seems to be suggesting. In his eyes it is wishful desire for strong leadership in his own party and finding an absence there.

Mr. Rodriguez: Be honest, Jack.

Mr. Crosbie: At least he didn't leave in a pique, he stayed with us.

Mr. Horner: In any event, to go on, we recognize we are in serious times, times of soft markets abroad and accelerated, even cut-throat competition internationally. Prices and costs are still too high here and productivity is too low. There are many problems, but I will mention four which are basic to the Canadian economy. Put simply, there are vastly more goods competing on the markets of the world than there were even four or five years ago. World industrial capacity, especially with respect to manufactured products, has grown enormously—from the EEC and especially from the Japanese and German economies, from developing countries pouring out goods produced by labour and under easier environmental rules. We have to be very sophisticated in our products as well as price-competitive in order to compete—and that means here in our home markets as well as abroad.

Increased foreign industrial capacity can be a strength for Canada. We are geared to supplying that capacity not only with primary and processed products but also with manufactured and capital goods for other industries. Thus, world economic slowdown hits hard at our trading economy. But we should be poised to capitalize on international recovery.

Another important factor is that Canada's population growth is levelling out and immigration is slowing down. This should reduce the underlying pressure for domestic growth. We can see the results of this in certain sectors already, such as education, some areas of health care, housing, and in connection with products for use by the young. I do not wish to make too much of this aspect. We still are going to need, and will sustain, a significant growth rate in the years ahead. But we may not, and we should not, expect to get back to the extremely high growth rate of the 1950's and 1960's. What I am saying is that when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) forecasts a growth rate for next year of 5 per cent, the knee-jerk reaction should not be that this is a sluggish rate. Such a rate will be good going, and I pray we can keep it up year after year.

The third basic problem facing Canada is the rapid increase in costs and the consequent drop, over the last three or four years, in our ability to compete. This government, to be frank, protected Canadians against world-wide price increases for energy, for some foods and for certain industrial commodities. Canadians tried to protect themselves by raising their incomes as fast as, or faster than, prices.

As a result, wage rates climbed as high as, or higher than those in the United States, with productivity 15 to 20 per cent lower. We sold less abroad and this resulted in giant deficits along with huge interest payments. Even worse, the situation led to increasing inroads into our own domestic markets by imports.

The fourth and most dramatic problem has been the well-recognized revolution in oil prices and its particular effect on energy-intensive western economies.

Just as I have not tried to gloss over our situation, Mr. Speaker, neither should it be painted hopelessly black. All those problem situations I referred to—the other industrialized nations face them as well. In a depressed and psychologically shell-shocked world we have performed remarkably well. We have a sound foundation on which to build.

Since 1973 Canadian manufacturing output has held up much better than in most western economies. It declined in the period 1973-1975 by 2.5 per cent. But in the United States the decline was 10 per cent; in Japan it was 14 per cent, and it was almost 9 per cent in West Germany. Manufacturing now accounts for about 20 per cent of total Canadian production as compared to between 22 and 24 per cent for the years 1951-73, a drop precisely the same as that which took place in the United States and other countries where the services sector is going ahead. Productivity over the 25 years to 1975 consistently narrowed the giant gap between ourselves and the United States. We slipped back in 1976, but are gaining again this year. Manufactured exports still pay for 80 per cent of the manufactured goods we import so heavily. In terms of over-all economic growth, only Japan and Germany, recovering from very low levels of post-war industrial activity, have better over-all records.

Improvements and opportunities exist to allow us to build on our good base. First, Canadian wages and costs are now growing no more rapidly than in the U.S. We have not recovered the ground lost in the last three years, but the gap is not getting any worse. Indeed it is narrowing. Second, the lower Canadian dollar helps our competitive position. It does raise the cost of our imports, but at least it helps our sales if we do not fritter away this helpful reprieve through a further round of wage and cost increase. That is why I was so shocked to hear the hon. member for Don Valley suggest that as far as those responsible for demands on wages are concerned it was all up to the government. I was shocked to hear him say this, because we cannot afford to fritter away the gains we have made in this regard. We must continue to make what I would call long term gains in productivity as compared with the United States. This will take a long time, perhaps, but we are on our way back and should do well.

[Mr. Horner.]

Third, the lifting of controls over the next year will remove an element of uncertainty from business by bringing the market system back into place in the determination of prices and wages. It is under these conditions that business can best be relied upon to generate the capital necessary for expansion and increased activities. I hope that when controls come off on April 14 they will be followed by a monitoring device which will encourage business and the unions to adopt a far more responsible attitude than the hon. member for Don Valley has suggested.

Fourth, governments in Canada have got their houses in better order. Federal government expenditures have been held to the growth rate of the GNP. Public service hiring is under one per cent. Even in the face of high unemployment, new money for job creation was found within the existing budget. Public sector wages are not any more leading private sector averages for similar skills.

In the midst of unemployment and continuing inflation, then, Canada is in a better position, presently and potentially, than one would imagine from the excess of gloom around. What is needed is business confidence in our basic advantages if we streamline, modernize, cut costs, specialize, and work hard. We need to restructure, adjust, merge, and tighten up. We need to upgrade our resources and negotiate better markets for them, whether they be petrochemicals, beef exported to the United States, grain exported almost everywhere. Fisheries and forest products can be sold abroad and within this country. On all of these things the federal government is now working.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I must inform him that his time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure and privilege for me to participate in today's debate. I want to join with all previous speakers in commending the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood).

This throne speech, delivered in a most excellent, capable and graceful manner by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, even in complimentary terms can only be described as a vague and feeble attempt to revive the government's sagging fortunes. The government has seized upon a moment of great public attention to make excuses for itself and to point the finger of blame at everybody and everything in sight. Indeed, the only impressive thing about the throne speech is the fact that it was given by Her Majesty and presented in truly a magnificent fashion.

Given the record of this government and the attention, or more accurately the lack of attention, given to the throne speech proclamations, one comes to the conclusion that its contents are really meaningless. The speech is a form of window dressing which only momentarily lifts the hopes and aspirations of Canadians. You cannot, under any circumstances, hope to maintain the trust of people by completely ignoring their problems or difficulties, or by continuously taking the attitude that governments are always right and that the people are always wrong. This government has been so wrong on so many occasions, on so many issues, during the years of its administration.

Last Wednesday my colleague and leader led off this debate in a manner in keeping with his traditional debating excellence. He spoke with knowledge, compassion, and understanding, and addressed his remarks squarely to the issues and problems perplexing Canada and bothering Canadians today. He spoke eloquently about the great gift and the great opportunity given this government and this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when taking office.

What has happened and what has developed since that time under this government's administration, Mr. Speaker, is really nothing short of a national disaster and, speaking in human terms, a national disgrace. Phrases like "separation is dead", "national unity will be achieved", "the land is strong", "the just society", "inflation will be wrestled to the ground"—and the list goes on—are simply clichés, hackneyed phrases, empty words which only hold out false hopes for Canadians.

I have with me, with the compliments of my colleague from the riding of Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), recorded excerpts from a well respected newspaper which are typical of many which appeared immediately after the 1968 general election. This particular one is dated the day after, June 26, 1968, and the headline reads "Canadian Unity Assured". The lead line of the editorial begins: "That above all is the meaning of yesterday's election". A typical paragraph reads:

> So we shall have a Liberal government for the next few years led by a tuned in, turned on intellectual who must demonstrate he can wield together a cabinet of diverse personalities, administer a government and resolve the country's problems of national unity and of economic stability and develop its human and regional resources.

The words of that editorial, written some nine and a half years ago, held out, I must admit, great expectations, and reflected to a very large extent the feeling of Canadians of that day. But if Canadians would simply judge the performance of this government by its record—and I am certain that they will, given the opportunity—then its members, and particularly those who are members of the cabinet, would go to the foot of the line, to the bottom of the class.

It is true that the government has, during its term of office, established many records—record inflation, the highest in the country's history and still rising; record unemployment, higher than in the great depression and still rising; record spending, with a total budget of somewhere in the vicinity of $48 billion and the government still spending; a record deficit which will be somewhere in the vicinity of $9 billion, an amount greater than the total budget at the time this government took office in 1968 under the same leadership it has today. In addition we have an 89 cent dollar, the lowest value since the 1930's and the product of a weak, high cost, underproductive economy.

It is not my intention or my wish to quarrel with some of the tax measures brought forth last Thursday evening by the newest Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). Indeed, many such measures had been requested for months by members on this side of the House. But I doubt, Mr. Speaker, given the present high degree of uncertainty, that they will provide a sufficient incentive for investors, business and industry to respond as they would wish.

I welcome the proposal to provide tax credits to the private sector for the purpose of job creation. Indeed I firmly believe that the job retraining and apprenticeship programs should even be expanded. One area that the government is neglecting to recognize, however, is the cost to the employer of training employees who are on these programs. This cost is extremely substantial and often discourages many employers from participating in such programs.

This is a very important area because, at a time when we have over one million people unemployed, we have in some areas—not in all, but in some—jobs going unfilled. These jobs more often than not are of a skilled or semi-skilled nature. If these programs met the cost of trainee and employer, many of these jobs could be filled and considerable savings would result from not financing Unemployment Insurance Commission benefits, welfare, and other costly social programs.

Further to this, Mr. Speaker, at a time when we have over one million unemployed we are again experiencing the sad and unbelievable situation in which there is a lack of adequate and suitable manpower to harvest many labour intensive farm commodities. Students from our secondary schools and universities, coupled with offshore workers, generally speaking make up the only reliable source of harvest labour. This tells me—and I hope it registers with the government—that there is a desperate need to rededicate many Canadians in certain regions to the work ethic and to the imperative need to encourage individual self-motivation. I am happy to see the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) in the House tonight, and I would just remind him that he must totally reject the advice that he will be getting from his officials. He must retain the offshore labour program for as long as this condition exists in Canada.

In the brief time allotted to me I want to bring to the attention of the government a few of the ongoing, or in many cases worsening, problems experienced by the agricultural industry. Let me begin by citing a report from Statistics Canada which indicates that a decline in farm cash receipts occurred in 1976. These were down some $140 million, which means a drop of over 20 per cent. In 1977 it is obvious that farm incomes will again decline. This year's reduction in net farm income could well register a further 10 per cent. For the first eight months farm income is down in British Columbia, it is down in Saskatchewan to the extent of 50 per cent, and it is down in Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. It is only up slightly in Alberta, and it is up slightly in Nova Scotia. In a brief conversation with the former premier of that province, he indicated that the situation in the province of Nova Scotia really had no way to go but up.

In addition to this, I should like to point out that increases in farm input costs far exceed those of farm incomes, and by an ever-increasing margin. Farm operating costs for 1976 jumped by approximately 11 per cent, and another inflationary jump of 10 per cent could be expected this year.

On the subject of farm machinery, a more recent and worrisome statistic is available. Purchases of farm machinery are down by 10 per cent over the past year. For example, in Saskatchewan farm machinery sales have dropped 24 per cent; in Manitoba they have dropped 19 per cent; and Alberta has suffered an 11 per cent reduction as well. These factors have devastating effects on the economies of rural towns and villages throughout the entire country. For example, a 100 horsepower tractor which could be purchased in 1972 for $9,800, now costs around $20,000. A combine priced at $15,000 in 1972 now carries a price tag in excess of $30,000. Diesel fuel has doubled in price during the last five years, and more increases are expected in the future. In the midst of these cost increases, grain prices have decreased sharply, many to the extent of 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Hundreds of other examples could be cited; but what is really happening under this government is that farm incomes are sinking and farm input prices are rising. The farm profit margin, if indeed any exists, continues to shrink. It should be obvious to all members that the agricultural producer has the right to a fair return for his investment, labour, management, and his risks.

In a recent speech given by Peter Hannam, the relatively newly elected president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, in the city of London, he indicated that a study had been completed by that organization, and the results were that if farmers charged absolutely nothing for their investment, labour, and management—in other words, if they simply donated all the products and commodities they produced—the saving to every consumer would be 23 cents a day. Mr. Speaker, that is less than the price of a cup of coffee or a chocolate bar.

Our fruit and vegetable industries continue to suffer under an antiquated tariff and duty policy. To date there is no indication of acceptance by the government of the Tariff Board report which recommends immediate adjustments and the conversion to an ad valorem system to remove inequities which have existed for over a quarter of a century. There is no indication that seasonal surcharges will be implemented, even when surplus production from outside sources floods Canadian markets and depresses local prices below costs of domestic production. There is no encouraging sign of a government commitment to create an environment for Canadian producers to supply a greater percentage of the domestic market, nor any evidence of aggressive sales programs to expand or seek out new export markets abroad.

We should consider ourselves fortunate as of today that there is no indication that the government intends further studies or inquiries into the beef industry. It has been papered to death. We have had the commission of inquiry and the Senate inquiry—both credible documents—although I question the necessity of public expenditure for the latter. Had the minister the good sense to listen to our recommendations made repeatedly over past months, particularly by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt), the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and others, he could have received his answers and saved Canadian taxpayers and farm organizations over a million dollars and improved the position of those in the agricultural industry, particularly those in the beef industry.

If I could make one point tonight, it would be that I want to remind the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that we have been consistent in our call and recommendations for a Canadian meat import law. In his speech yesterday the minister hinted, after several years of prodding, at the introduction of some similar type of legislation. I say to the minister: bring on your legislation, and if it qualifies in our opinion and measures up to our wishes, and has the teeth to do the job, then we on this side of the House will support it. What further commitment does he require than that? It appears that finally we might have some attention given to the matter of foodland preservation. Although we recognize and respect the fact that this matter is primarily a joint provincial and municipal legislative matter, because of its national importance we continue to urge federal assistance, support and co-operation.

Time does not permit me to deal tonight with such a problem as the explosive situation which exists in the dairy industry, or the ridiculous granting of precious and shamefully inadequate research funds to a former employee and consultant for the Interprovincial Pipeline Company to do a study on the "effects of pipeline construction on the productivity of soils in western Quebec and eastern Ontario." Although such a study is necessary and we would support it without question, this is a scandalous appointment at a cost of nearly $40,000. How can one possibly accept the credibility of the results when the engineer who was hired has testified in courts and supplied information to the courts which has been used against farmers? It is a clear conflict of interest and another prime example of bad judgment and poor judgment on behalf of the government. Peter Lewington, an Ilderton farmer and writer, sums it up accurately by saying, "It's like letting the fox mind the chicken coop".

The Minister of Agriculture in his usual display of buffoonery justified the move of Farm Credit Corporation's head office from Ottawa to Camrose, a move which was purely political. This represents another example of the government's use of power and politics despite the will of the people and the absence of good common sense.

We are concerned about the effects and the results of the recent reorganizational changes in the Department of Agriculture, particularly at a time when a greater flow of information is necessary between the producers, consumers and people in the food industry. The food systems branch created in 1972 to handle this much needed service has been dissolved. Concern has been raised over the possible erosion of authority from the Department of Agriculture to other government departments.

For example, there is a current rumour that quality standards and grading could be moved from the Department of Agriculture and shifted to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

We are concerned about the implications of any new competition bill introduced by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and its effect on the well regulated and adequately supervised orderly marketing systems we have in Canada. What kind of legislation does the minister have in mind when he speaks about consumer representation on all national and provincial marketing boards? Will such members be democratically elected, or will they be unilaterally appointed by the Minister of Agriculture, or perhaps even worse, by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand)?

We welcome the invitation given by the government for the submission of briefs by the provinces and producer groups leading up to national food strategy conferences in the month of February next year. But we have seen this approach used before, with the end result being that what happens in the formation of policy and the setting of programs is that the government simply imposes its own rights and its own ideas.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, as I see that my time has almost expired, I should like to say that the attention which the government pays to the problems of the agricultural industry in Canada cannot come in sporadic bursts, but rather those problems must be met by far-sighted policies shaped in consultation with those who are directly concerned and directly involved. Unfortunately I do not see any evidence of such a federal commitment, either now or in the foreseeable future, and certainly as long as this government holds office.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I want to congratulate the two members who moved the Address in Reply, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). They both acquitted themselves in this debate admirably well for two new young members, just as they did in the by-elections last spring. So I congratulate them, as many members of the House have done.

I think this will be a very special session of parliament because, for one thing, it is the first time in some 20 years that Her Majesty has officially opened parliament. She certainly did it with style, grace and elegance, which made it a very special and memorable occasion for all of us. Surely this will likely be the last session of this parliament, so that is another reason for saying it is a very special occasion. The third reason that makes this new session very special, of course, is the fact that for the first time it is being televised, and I would like to compliment the government for taking the initiative of bringing television to the House, thus bringing the House closer to the Canadian people and making this place more relevant for Canadians. Someone said recently that this might be called the "new suit" session of parliament, with everyone getting decked out in their new fancy duds to look great on the new media.

I think that the throne speech emphasized most properly three areas; the economy, inflation, unemployment and the energy situation in our country. It referred to energy conservation and the development of renewable resources which will be so important in the general energy picture, especially in the future. It mentioned as well the production of gas and oil in the west and in the Arctic. We have had some very encouraging signs this year in the increased production of gas in western Canada. There have been several developments in that regard which, I think, are very encouraging and positive. I hope to see the Quebec and maritime natural gas pipeline go ahead, as has been announced during the past few months. Likewise, there is increased interest in gas exploration in the high Arctic islands, and drilling is going forward in the Beaufort Sea. Perhaps the most important energy question that will be before this session of parliament will be legislation relating to the ALCAN pipeline. This is a historic issue which will be put before the House and the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works in this session.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) spoke about the government resorting to confrontation, bullying the provinces. It is interesting to note that throughout discussions leading to the ALCAN agreement which was negotiated last August and September not only with the government in Washington but also with the governments of the three western provinces, none of them of the same political stripe as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), during negotiations for the largest private enterprise project in the history of Canada which will cost some $10 billion, there were no signs of any confrontation with the western premiers, of any bullying. Obviously if there ever was an issue with a potential for many conflicts, it is this project. Yet when I was in Alberta a few weeks ago, some of the Tory provincial members of parliament complimented me on the consultation which took place between the Prime Minister and the premier of that province during the discussions which took place leading up to the agreement with the U.S. government. So I think we have to take with a grain of salt what the Leader of the Opposition said about confrontation and bullying as the tactics of this government and realize that it is mostly political talk on his part. I think it is very appropriate, especially this week, after having watched the confrontation in the past year during which the Leader of the Opposition settled who will be the candidate for the Bow River riding, resorting to bullying and perhaps even revenge. It seems to me that if we really want to take the Leader of the Opposition seriously we must wonder how he would ever be able to run the country if he were to be prime minister when he cannot even look after the fights and defections in his own caucus.

As we go into this session of parliament and come to grips with the tremendous problems of the economy, unemployment, inflation and setting up new energy systems for our country, we will be facing an additional problem, that is the achievement of national unity in this country. At no time in our history have we had to face the same kind of challenge that the federal government and this parliament will have to face in this session after the election of the separatist government in Quebec last fall.

It seems to me that the PQ government has moved rapidly in the course of the past year toward their primary aim of establishing a separate country. It seems to me that we will have to bring to bear every bit of wit and wisdom that we can muster in this place to meet this challenge in the next few months and in the next year or so. Certainly after reading the statements of the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), and of the Prime Minister in this debate, I think there is no question about who is the party leader with the greatest understanding of this problem, the greatests appreciation of it, and the most ability. That is the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: You certainly need a big drink of water after that one.

Mr. Foster: I want to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on his appointment in the last few months. He is a very courageous man to be taking such an important responsibility at a time when every world government faces such tremendous economic problems, problems of unemployment and of high inflation. Canada's problems in this regard are perhaps as great as are those of some of the other industrialized countries, but not as bad as those of many other countries. When one considers the growth that has taken place in the labour force in Canada as compared with other countries in the last eight or ten years, and our exposure to world inflation because of the high proportion of our gross national product being realized from trade, one realizes that this makes us more liable to encounter the very serious problems of unemployment and high inflation, but it does not lessen our responsibility to come to grips with them and to overcome them.

I believe the Minister of Finance in his speech faced these problems with candor, with courage and with honesty, speaking to the members of this House and to the Canadian people. He proposed important steps to overcome our problems and to improve our situation. He announced, for instance, a tax reduction of $100 for low income families, and geared it so that that reduction in taxes would come during January and February of this coming winter and so that it would provide a stimulus to the economy of some $700 million during that two month period, a period when consumer spending is often down. It should give a tremendous shot in the arm to consumer spending during that two month period.

The minister announced that the government will continue its program of restraint in spending. It has been indicated that the increase in government spending during the first half of 1977 was held at 5.2 per cent over 1976. That is even below the estimate of 7 per cent the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced in his spending estimates last February.

The rate of increase in the civil service is being held at less than one per cent over last year. The minister announced the discontinuation of the Anti-Inflation Board as of April 14, 1978, so that both business and labour will know the plans of the government. This will create a great deal of certainty in the business community.

The Minister of Finance announced that a $150 million additional direct job creation fund would be provided for this coming winter. This is on top of the $450 million already announced this year. The minister also indicated that this level of spending for Canada Works would continue into next year, providing over $1 billion for direct job creation during the two-year period. This is important to the Algoma riding where there is persistently high seasonal unemployment because our construction industry is seasonal. During this coming winter we will be spending $1.8 million in the Algoma riding on Canada Works projects. Some 60 projects have now been approved. These projects will create over 500 jobs throughout the Algoma-Manitoulin area.

I certainly hope that some of the additional $150 million which is to be provided for direct job creation through the federal Labour Intensive Program will be provided to the small craft harbours branch. This is the branch of the Department of the Environment which provides marine facilities throughout our country. Surely with a negative balance in our tourism account with the United States we need to create the best possible tourist facilities we can to encourage our American friends to come and visit in Canada during the holiday season.

I was pleased that the Minister of Finance announced a $100 million incentive program to provide employment to private business. It seems to me that there is a limit to the amount of spending which can be done for direct job creation. We should be providing incentives to the private sector. Surely $100 million will provide a substantial incentive, and of course these jobs tend to be long lasting and permanent, whereas direct job creation jobs are not.

We all get very interesting letters from our constituents suggesting all kinds of projects and programs in which the government should be involved. I received one last week which suggested that we create a registered educational savings program which would operate similar to the registered retirement savings program or the registered home ownership program. Under this proposed program an employed person could put funds into a tax shelter during his high income working years. These funds would then be available to be withdrawn when that person wants to take advanced training in his own field. The money could be used to fund refresher courses in the person's present area of unemployment, or it could be used by a person training for a second career part way through his working life.

I have heard it said that persons being trained today should be prepared to change jobs at least three or four times during their active career. Surely that is true of politicians if not of the general population, but it seems to me that this proposal of one of my constituents is a very good one. It would provide funds for this kind of retraining. The people themselves would be putting up the funds. It would not be put up by the government or by employers. People retraining for a year or so would not be in the labour force during that period. I certainly hope that the Minister of Finance will consider this suggestion in his next budget.

Yesterday I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) speak in the House. I thought he made a very good speech, with all deference to the hon. member from the opposition who spoke just a few moments ago. I heard the minister mention that high on the list of priorities at the federal-provincial meetings which will be taking place in the next few weeks will be farm stabilization. I was glad to hear that because many sectors of Canadian agriculture, especially cow-calf operators, have gone through perhaps one of the most difficult periods ever in Canadian agricultural history during the past three years. I was encouraged that prices in Algoma-Manitoulin this year moved up somewhat, but cow-calf operators are still not getting a decent return for the work, the investment, and the management they provide to their farm operations. I hope that the stabilization will not be necessary as prices move up in the future, but surely we need to have a stronger and better program in place because of the cyclical nature of this industry.

The Minister of Agriculture also mentioned that he was prepared to bring in control legislation for imports of beef to maintain them at a reasonable level so that we do not get dumping on the Canadian market. I hope the minister will go ahead with this legislation. He indicated that he wanted some indication from the opposition that it would be prepared to support such legislation, and I hope that can be worked out.

In northern Ontario we were shocked last week at the announcement by INCO that it was planning to lay off some 2,800 people in the Sudbury district. That announcement not only affects the city of Sudbury but the entire district of Sudbury, much of which is in the eastern part of the Algoma riding. Some young workers who live in my constituency will be laid off by INCO.

To me it is almost unbelievable that a company as large and as important as INCO is to the Canadian economy would unilaterally make this decision without any consultation or without any notice to the government or to the labour unions involved. Surely this kind of action belongs to the dark ages of industrial relations and not in a modern industrial society. No responsible employer should lay off 2,800 workers in the dead of winter without prior consultation. All too often, and in too many communities in northern Ontario we have had to face this kind of situation in the past.

In Elliott Lake we faced this problem in the early 1960's when the United States government failed to pick up its option to purchase additional supplies of Canadian uranium. We saw the population of that community drop from around 25,000 to about 6,000 during those years, and the price of uranium dropped from about $13 a pound to about $4 or $5 a pound. The number of mines operating in that community dropped from 13 to 2 during the 1960's. However, the federal government acted to save the town of Elliot Lake and the Township of Elliot Lake during those years. It decentralized the laboratories of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It established the Elliot Lake Centre for Continuing Education in co-operation with the Ontario Department of Education. It established a program of uranium stockpiling which, during the 1960's, cost $100 million, and in the early 1970's cost $29 million. In the early 1970's it worked with other uranium producing countries to establish a floor price for export sales to maintain the mines and industry in communities like Elliot Lake and Uranium City.

Our Tory friends across the floor have often been critical of this action by the government. But if those mines had shut down in the early 1970's—as most would have—and had filled up with water and had to be pumped out and were just now starting into production, rather than being in full production and expanding in the last couple of years, what would the price of uranium be? It would certainly be much higher than $40 or $42 per pound.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have certainly looked forward to participating in this debate. Unfortunately, I cannot offer congratulations to the two members who moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, as that would be hypocritical of me. I cannot congratulate anybody who is supporting and congratulating this government with its record. I look at these two members with disdain. It amazes me that they could get on their feet to support and praise this government.

I am very disappointed that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) left the Chamber because I have some very strong comments to make, both about his speech tonight and his past actions. I would have no hesitation about saying this to him if he were here. I will say it now, knowing that he reads Hansard every day and so will read my comments tomorrow. He is the Christine Jorgensen of the Canadian political scene. How anybody could do what he did, with his record of 19 years opposing the Liberals, is beyond comprehension. It is unbelievable the way he has spoiled himself.

The minister talked about a strong domestic climate. What a statement to come from him. I shall return to that in a moment. He gave some false information in this Chamber tonight about public hiring and said it is being restricted to 1 per cent. It is not 1 per cent at all, Mr. Speaker. Every cabinet minister is hiring through private employment agencies by the thousands and I have the figures to prove it. Also, every cabinet minister is hiring retired civil servants in the thousands on a contract basis. The amount for 1975-76 is $130 million. Yet they have the audacity to stand in this Chamber, and to wander around the country saying they are restricting the growth of the civil service. I will have the rest of the figures before much longer, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to comment now on the remarks made by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) regarding the Bow River confrontation and the nominating meeting there. He tried to intimate that the Conservative party is the only party where there is a contest for a nomination. That is utter nonsense. I can remember St. Boniface in 1968 when the present member for that riding contested a cabinet minister. There was a kafuffle and they had to have two nominating meetings. I can remember a cabinet minister in Quebec in the same year who was challenged. He was defeated so he went to another riding, but he was defeated again. I remember another recent provincial Liberal nomination in Ontario where the leader of the Liberals had to rule things out of order and everything had to be done over again. There have been recent nominations in Manitoba where NDP cabinet ministers were contested. Let us not have this nonsense that the Conservative party is the only one that has contested nomination meetings. It is a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Friesen: How did Lachance get in here?

Mr. McKenzie: That is another one. They did not want his father here.

The hon. member for Algoma spoke of the $100 million incentive to business. That does not mean anything at all. The tax incentives are not going to keep business in Canada, and I shall go into more detail later. He spoke of mines closing. The mining industry has been driven out of this country with the double taxation. Between the Liberal government's involvement in taxing the mining industry, the former NDP government in Manitoba and the former Barrett government, mining has been driven out of the country. They are not going to go back and forth—once those companies are driven out, that is the end.

I have another comment about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who has become an apologist for the Liberal party. It is unbelievable to see him stand in this Chamber reading a speech. I remember when he was a constructive member of parliament and did not need a prepared speech. He knew how to give emphasis without reading a document prepared by some parliamentary assistant or whoever drafted it. The minister knows how I feel about him and I will say these things to his face tomorrow. Indeed, I have already done it. I have expressed my opinion on how I feel about the minister.

I want to get on now to economic issues, Mr. Speaker, as I do not like to express personal opinions but like to deal with facts. I should like to read some press comments on Canada's economic health.

A report of the OECD and World Bank states that Canada's standard of living has dropped to seventh place in the world compared to other nations. My colleagues tell me it has just dropped to ten—probably it will be twelfth tomorrow. A report in the Financial Times tells us that Canada's economy lags still further behind the United States. Diane Cohn has reported that controls are now part of the inflation problem. The business section of the Winnipeg Free Press reports that Canadians are being ripped off by the GNP shortfall, and it is reported in the Globe and Mail that Canadians lead all foreigners in investing in the United States. This is something I want to comment upon tonight, Mr. Speaker.

This flow of capital to the United States will continue. In questions put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on July 19 in regard to this outflow of investment capital it was pointed out that Canadians are the number one investors in the United States. Mr. Speaker, this is an indication that they have absolutely no faith in Canada, and $100 million is not going to keep them here. In reply to a question put by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) on that occasion, the Prime Minister replied:

> As far as Canadian capital being invested elsewhere is concerned, there are no exchange controls on the Canadian dollar, and the Canadian investor is free to invest wherever he will get the maximum return for his dollar.

Who could argue with that, Mr. Speaker? What we want to know is what he is going to do to keep the investment dollar here. Apparently he is going to do absolutely nothing. I put a similar question to the great hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on October 19, and he replied:

> I should like to thank the hon. member for the question. We enjoy in Canada complete freedom of investment and a free country.

Imagine the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce making a statement like that. He, who is supposed to attract industry to this country, says we are a great bunch of free enterprisers and if all business wants to move to the states and all investment money as well, that is fine. It is ironic, Mr. Speaker, because an article in a recent issue of Macleans magazine asks if Jack Horner is still his own man. Well, after the answer he gave me, Mr. Speaker, we know he is not his own man but, the article also asks—or Pierre Trudeau's? He is Pierre Trudeau's man now. They are both mouthing the same things—let all business and investment capital leave the country. What it is going to cost us will be very interesting to the Canadian people. I will get to that in a moment.

There are close to one and a half million people unemployed in Canada today. With this trend of investment money and businesses leaving, my prediction is that within four years there will be two and a half million people unemployed.

Today there are some 400,000 students graduating from schools, colleges, and universities each year, but we are creating only 200,000 new jobs yearly. By doing a little simple arithmetic, you will come up with your own figure; two million, three million.

What is it costing the Canadian public today to pay for UIC? Since 1973 it has cost the Government of Canada $4.8 billion over and above employee-employer contributions to keep the UIC fund solvent. That is the equivalent of $208 per man, woman and child in Canada. Since March, 1968, UIC payments have amounted to $7.3 billion, or almost $800 per man, woman and child.

In the first six months of 1977 unemployment insurance benefits amounted to an average of $12.7 million per day, or $530,000 an hour, or $9,000 a minute, or $150 a second. That is something for the Canadian public to think about. They will not get any consolation from the comments of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. They are great free enterprisers who will allow investment capital to go south of the line and allow businesses to move. They are such free enterprises they will not interfere in that transaction.

It is great to read articles like this in the paper:

N.Y. Woos Canadians in Ottawa

Eastern Ontario industrialists are being invited to a one-day seminar in Ottawa September 28 to be sold on the benefits of establishing branch plants in northern New York.

The seminar, organized by St. Lawrence County, is part of a stepped up effort by industry-craving communities along the south shore of the St. Lawrence Seaway to woo Canadian businessmen.

Isn't it encouraging to the Canadian taxpayer to read an article like that? A group of New York bankers have established a $500 million fund to assist Canadian businesses to move from Canada to the United States. Along the border states they are building business complexes to accommodate Canadian businesses. Once a trend like that starts, you do not stop it.

What is the government's alternative? It is putting up $450 million for make work and job creation projects on a temporary basis. Why does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce not have a seminar to find out why these businesses are leaving? Why is he not doing something to keep them here? Never mind saying he is a great free enterpriser who will not do anything about it. He is one of the greatest trends the United States has ever had.

I wish to read some of the comments that have been made by Canadian businessmen. A spokesman for Jarry Electronics, which moved to Massena, New York, from Hawkesbury, Ontario, said:

Somewhere there's a point of no return and Canada is getting close to it.

A comment in the Ottawa Citizen on Canadian investment in the United States reads:

We didn't move just to get out of Canada—it was a matter of survival.

A Massey-Ferguson spokesman in the November 23, 1976, Toronto Globe and Mail stated:

The economic policy of the Trudeau government is frightening the business community into investing in the United States.

Here is another dandy from the July 23, 1977, Ottawa Citizen:

One hundred and forty Canadian manufacturing firms now have outlets in New York.

Don McGillivray of Southam News stated:

Canada is drifting along like a ship without a rudder.

An Ontario manufacturer commented:

Industries just can't survive in the current Canadian climate and many more will make the move to the U.S.

As I pointed out, this affects us. All we have to do is expand UIC and have these phony make-work projects. If the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and this government were on their toes, they would be consulting with investment counsellors across Canada. This is something I have done. I recently consulted one in Winnipeg. He has a full-time profitable occupation assisting Canadian businesses move to the United States. This was mostly in Manitoba, but the political climate has improved there 100 per cent in the past two weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: We hope that this mass exodus of investment money and businesses out of Manitoba will be stopped. However, the provinces cannot do it alone. The investment counsellor whom I consulted spent considerable time going into detailed information. Without going into all the details, what it amounted to was that the amount of money leaving Manitoba would mean a loss of 4,000 jobs.

Manitoba is not a big province. We have just one million population. We are one of the small ones. Multiply that across Canada. This is the sort of information the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce should be obtaining. Never mind telling us he is a great free enterpriser and will do nothing about keeping business in this country. I will get more detailed information on this in the very near future.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce commented the other day about the great inflow of investment money into Canada. That statement is not true. I have the Canadian direct investment abroad figures. It started in 1976. There has been a drop of investment money in Canada and an increase in investment money leaving the country. That is a very dangerous trend. My statement has been backed up by an editorial in the October 10 Financial Times which reads:

U.S. companies have cut their planned increase in investments in Canada in half . . . Obviously, Canada is not seen as a good place to invest money.

The comment of Japanese businessmen that high taxes, high wages and low productivity have priced Canada out of the market had the sting of truth.

There are 17 major complexes being developed in the United States with Canadian money. In this year alone, $2.5 billion in real estate money has left this country and gone to the United States. Thirty per cent of the high rise apartments in Seattle, Washington, have been developed with Canadian money. Obviously there is something wrong in this country. That is why I cannot support some freshman Liberal in this House praising this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: Every paper you pick up has some comment about money leaving the country. Another recent news article states:

Canadian investment money has been moving in increasing amounts to the United States. A part of the reason is that the United States is perceived, at present, as a better place to do business—lower taxes, lower labour costs, higher productivity, less government intervention: the list is long.

U.S. groups—government and business—have caught the searching eye of the Canadian investor and moved in quickly to concentrate it on their particular areas.

They are opening offices in Quebec, Ontario, and the north-eastern states to assist Canadian businesses to move. I did not hear any Liberals talk about this in their speeches. What is the government going to do to keep this money in Canada? What will it do to keep these businesses here? All I see across the way are blank faces. They are not going to do anything.

There is no way the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will crack the Liberal bureaucracy. He is an absolute myth. He left our party because he was going to do great things for Canada. He is going to do absolutely nothing.

Mr. Epp: He is going to lose his seat.

Mr. McKenzie: Yes, he will lose his seat. One of the mistakes the government has made is the way it governs by order in council, some 3,300 last year. This is disturbing the business community and investment community. They never know what little surprise will be dropped on them next.

In a recent article by an eminent Ottawa columnist, Peter Ward, it is stated:

Seldom has there been a legislative tussle in the House of Commons to match the ditch-by-ditch fight mounted by the Opposition against Bill C-51, the gun control bill that also loosens restrictions on police wiretapping. Now, that may not seem to bear very heavily on the interests of the Canadian business community. But the arguments raised by many opposition members involve basic criticisms of the way the federal government actually governs.

They do not govern. We have the next thing to a dictatorship. The article goes on to say that the changes on the government side affect all Canadians, perhaps businessmen more than most.

No country can survive without business or investment money, and it is no use kidding ourselves that there is any alternative; it is no use kidding ourselves that the $450 million put into this make-work project will make up for the mass exodus of money and businesses leaving this country. Even the president of the CBC, a Crown corporation, has stated that at the root of the problems of this country are inflation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for their splendid contributions to this traditional debate. I take exception to the remarks of the hon. member who spoke before me. I think he is ill-mannered. He is aware of the tradition in this House of showing at least respect for the opinions of two newly arrived members in this House. He should at least have the dignity of showing them the respect they earned well.

Mr. Speaker, this debate represents one of the rare occasions for a member to speak of various subjects of particular interest to him. It is usually not partisan. Mr. Speaker, on October 10 last I concluded a two-year period as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The experience has been rewarding. The many contacts made across the country, the speeches, the official visits, the work in committee and with the minister allowed me to better understand federal urban programs and to get closely involved in the housing policies and programs brought forth by this government to meet the expectations of Canadians in the area of urban planning and housing construction.

As I represent an entirely urban riding made up for a large part of neighbourhoods dating in many cases back over a hundred years, one of my major concerns has been working hard for the preservation of our architectural heritage and the rehabilitation of old neighbourhoods. That policy to restore and rehabilitate Ottawa-Vanier assured us of the preservation of our dear old neighbourhoods where a certain lifestyle has set in a long time ago and where tradition should play a part in shaping the face of the national capital so it may be reflected in Canada as a whole.

Housing in Ottawa-Vanier was substantially improved in the past four or five years. There is a great choice of alternatives. The programs under way, whether it be neighbourhood rehabilitation, construction or restoration, will continue to bring tangible benefits to my constituents.

The federal government has a substantial influence on urban Canada under the vast responsibilities that come under its jurisdiction. Every policy and every program initiated at the federal level in housing, transportation, immigration, economic assistance and others are felt in the final analysis at the local and surrounding community levels. That means that we, at the federal level, as well as our provincial counterparts, must always take into consideration the needs, the priorities and the cost problems, and continue to work closely with the municipal level and citizens committees to find the most practical solutions to the problems of urban planning and concentration.

There is also an important point that must be considered, at least at this time, and that is the fact that we do not have to accept trends unless we want to. All in all, trends largely reflect public behaviour patterns and the ways in which they are applied. Up to a point, those patterns can be reoriented and new patterns applied differently.

There are a number of federal levers that can serve in support of new objectives which reflect new values. For instance, the programs on housing, immigration, finance and the economy, transport and industry, regional development and many others. All those programs can give considerable support to provincial, regional and municipal development strategies in improving the quality of the urban environment.

One of the results of urban development and the concentration of populations has been the growth, at the periphery, of suburbs and dormitory towns. Around those concentration, commercial centres and job opportunities have developed. The riding of Ottawa-Vanier, downtown Ottawa, did not escape the effects of the migration of its inhabitants to the outskirts. It slowed down the economic growth of downtown Ottawa, exerted strong pressures for new road systems linking the outskirts where people sleep to the heart of the city where people work.

Doubtless, a number of reasons explain the slowing down now apparent in yesterday's trends. A new awareness that brings it changing values, is probably another factor. The increasing number of persons formerly living in the suburbs or elsewhere now want to come back to live in the city. The change may not be dramatic but it does have salutary results. Now, people are asking that the quality of life in the city-core be better balanced between working and residential areas. That is a complete change-about with the trend of a few years ago. It is therefore important that any planning or strategy in the field of housing and urban renewal be closely tied in with those new trends.

[English]

Federal housing policies have had to be both progressive and responsive to the diversity of special needs that have always existed. This is at the heart of federal policies on shelter—not just to help provide houses of brick, mortar and wood—but to help people, particularly people who are unable to fend for themselves properly.

I am referring to people who make up important minorities in our society—the poor, the elderly, the sick, native people and others who are at a disadvantage in a competitive world. These have always been the first concern of a national housing policy, and today we are continuing to meet their needs through a variety of programs that are especially tailored to provide assistance while helping to retain the essential human dignity all people must possess. We don't do it alone, of course. There is an inter-dependence of governments in housing, as in most other important fields, and we work together to ensure that we are responding properly to the needs of people who are most vulnerable.

Obviously, we could not follow this path without the approval of the Canadian people, for the strength of the majority must be employed to help the vulnerable minorities. It is a credit to the people of this country that they so willingly support the principle that those of us who are blessed with good fortune have a fundamental responsibility toward our fellow-Canadians who need our help, whether temporarily or permanently. Call it a spirit of brotherhood, if you like, but it's there, it can be felt, and it contributes to the greatness of this huge country that sprawls from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

We have collectively been very preoccupied, and justifiably so, with building and improving our neighborhoods. We have developed flexible programs that fit our national needs and meet our national goals. All levels of government will continue no doubt to elaborate plans for improving the quality of life of all our neighborhoods.

Yet, we are faced, in Canada today, with a challenge of great importance to us all—the challenge of keeping this country together. Call it national unity or national understanding, I, for one, prefer the term national understanding because I can better grasp its meaning.

To understand each other with all our regional and sectional loyalties, our varying customs and traditions; to understand what this country is all about with two official languages and a multitude of cultures; to understand that there are forces at work to build a better Canada while at the same time other forces that want to destroy it; therein lies the challenge! There is a threat or a crisis which menaces everything we have learned to love and cherish and that we so dearly want to keep. There is a far greater challenge ahead of us on the road to human brotherhood than we ever had to face before.

I was reminded recently of an old English proverb which says "do not trouble trouble till trouble troubles you." In my view, the only way to fight separatism is to make federalism a more attractive option.

History tells us that feelings of separatism were felt long ago in Canada. Lord Durham, one of our British governors, wrote in his report to England in the early 1800's: "I found two nations warring within the bosom of a single state".

History will tell you that Franco-Ontarians, and there are 500,000 of us in Ontario, had troubles in our fight to obtain the right to live in French in Ontario. We fought against regulations which forbade the use of French in Ontario schools. We fought to obtain primary and secondary French schools for our children, and finally obtained them in 1968.

We are still fighting for our right to use French in the courts of law of Ontario. We are asking for permission to draw up in French our wills, our contracts, our mortgages, and other ordinary legal documents. We are asking that essential services such as legal aid, health services, official government communications and documents be available in French, all things that most of you in this House take for granted in your provinces, be it in Quebec or elsewhere.

I could go on and give you a litany of services, such as permits, certificates, notices and requests for information, documents published by the Ontario ministries and government agencies, which are not available in French in Ontario. But those requests and concerns, as important as they are, all boil down to one basic principle called equality of opportunity.

I, and nearly a million other French speaking Canadians living outside Quebec, wish to be an active, respected, and wanted part of our country. We are Canadians. It so happens that we speak French in an English speaking milieu. Was not the idea of adopting two official languages, respectful of our individual heritages and traditional features, the purpose of creating a unified country in the first place? Surely the game plan is not for French to be balkanized to Quebec and for the rest of Canada to speak English? If it is, I will have no part of it. I want to feel at home in either language from coast to coast, everywhere in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Unity to me does not mean uniformity. Neither does it mean that this society will develop into a uniform, regionalized or whatever you want system applicable all across the country. It has to be sensible, it has to be sensitive and respectful of all minorities, be they linguistic, social, cultural or economic. We all want individual recognition. We all want collective recognition. Minority groups are asking for recognition. That phenomenon is not peculiar to them or to anybody else; it is a phenomenon which we see when the provinces negotiate with the federal government, or when the municipalities negotiate with the provincial governments. What are we looking for, Mr. Speaker? We are looking for recognition. We are looking for recognition when this government negotiates with other countries. We are asking for recognition of our potential, recognition of our trade, of our cultural diversity, of our respect for human rights and of this great progressive democracy.

One unique feature about federalism is that it can adapt to circumstances. French-speaking minorities fear assimilation. If they do disappear through wilful neglect or indifference by the majority, these same majorities will in effect have contributed to separatism by attrition.

Separation of this country by attrition will come when no French is spoken outside Quebec and no English is spoken inside Quebec. Minorities, you see, can be disposed of in two ways. You attack them continuously or you ignore them completely. Both ways will surely kill them.

René Lévesque, the premier of Quebec, is a well-known separatist. Lord Durham, in his way, was a separatist with a twist. Durham, in his now famous report to England, said about the French Canadians that the only solution to the problem was assimilation, and to that effect he proposed a plan. Are Francophone minorities outside Quebec the heirs of Lord Durham?

We have grown as a country as Canadians of both official languages moved about and established their neighbourhoods. If they had worked as hard on improving brotherhood as they have on building their neighbourhoods, we certainly would not be faced with the same problems facing us today. Some will tell us that national unity is threatened by the national economic problems or the social unrest caused by disturbing unemployment. I for one do not believe that you can separate economic, cultural or social problems when you talk of national understanding. You cannot speak of religion to a man who is hungry. You cannot speak of unity to the poor or the wanting. Let us not compartmentalize our society and its problems into parts that need to be fed, parts that need to be housed, parts that need to be transported, and so on. Let us look to the entire society, to the global problems we are presented with, so that the entire human being counts and prevails. Do not speak of social justice and equal opportunity equal to French-speaking minorities who in fact have had their rights trampled on for 110 years.

I want to talk now about another grave problem facing my minority, the French-speaking minority outside Quebec, the problem of assimilation. The latest statistics, which are 1971, indicate that 27 per cent of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec are being assimilated, and that is a very distressing rate. French outside Quebec, as a national language, is in the process of being relegated to the level of folklore in at least seven of our 10 provinces. Provincial bilingualism exists only in two provinces, Quebec and New Brunswick, although I must admit that Ontario is making some effort to adapt its policies to this challenge.

Where are we as a federation? Can we adapt to change? Right now, it seems to me, as a member of a linguistic minority, that the majority, be they French in Quebec or English outside Quebec, are reacting to their conscience while the minorities are gathering their punches to wake them up to reality. Those of us who are threatened are not at this time absent from this national debate. The minority linguistic groups will wage battle, for they have a country to lose and possibly a country to gain.

The fight will not take place between British Columbia and Quebec, or between Newfoundland and Quebec, or between any other provinces and Quebec; the fight for the minds, the hearts, and the allegiance of people will be at the national level. The results will most likely rest with the minority groups fighting prejudice, misunderstanding, and sometimes downright racism. The only way to fight the breakup of this country is to make federalism a more attractive option than separatism.

Canadians, regardless of their region, cultural roots, class or sex, only ask to be given the possibility of achieving relative equality. A sense of equity, freedom, and equality will have to be awakened in all Canadians. We can no longer continue to witness like helpless spectators the deterioration of the situation, the tearing to shreds of our national fabric.

English Canada will have to be perceived in its actions as being big enough to deal with Francophone groups on an equal footing, not based on the balance of numbers. It will have to be based on a definition of Canadian society tolerant and respectful of minorities, whether they are linguistic, cultural, social or economic minorities.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on the comments pertaining to the Prime Minister's proposal last week in the Address in Reply, when he said that during this session he wanted to introduce in the House a bill on the referendum. Pending further details on that particular popular consultation formula, I would like the House to understand that it is urgent for all Canadians to realize that the time we have left to do the things we must do is getting shorter and shorter. I am convinced indeed that the date of the Quebec referendum is an important and meaningful date. I think, Mr. Speaker, that regardless of the results, the situation, if it is to change, must change in the meantime.

I do not know the date of the referendum proposed by the Parti Québécois. I know that the results of that referendum could be highly disturbing. Should Quebecers vote negatively, shall we return to the status quo, to an attitude of the English-speaking majority saying that there is no problem, that there is no need to worry because they will not separate? Or if the answer is yes, will we have a backlash of English opinion towards French-speaking minorities, to put it mildly? So it is very important, in the time available before this popular vote in Quebec, to focus on a federative solution which will really meet our expectations. The outcome will be a stronger Confederation.

President John F. Kennedy said this in his inaugural address:

Let us start all over again, remembering on both sides that courtesy is not a sign of weakness and that the proof of sincerity should always be established. Let us never be led by fear in our negotiations. And let us never fear to negotiate.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

BILINGUALISM—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT TO ELIMINATE CERTAIN INJUSTICES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Last October 25, I asked a question of the Secretary of State to clear with him a very important matter. On September 30, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced the government's decision not to create bilingual districts. However, the Official Languages Act is mostly based on the creation of such bilingual districts. Is there then an alternative solution?

I asked the minister whether the government intends, in addition to the proposals which have been announced in the Speech from the Throne, to bring in amendments to the Official Languages Act during this session, thereby recognizing to that statute its supremacy in the field of linguistic equality over any other federal statute, thus correcting certain anomalies and inconsistencies that exist in some of the statutes.

In addition to the Official Languages Act, I could have mentioned, if I had had enough time, the Railway Act, the Winding-up Act and the Bank Act which contain all kind of vexatious measures from a linguistic standpoint. For instance, was it intended in the law and by the will of this Parliament to put restrictions on the issue of notices and announcements made by the railways to the public? I do not think so and I wish to explain further. Subsection (3) of section 243 of the Railway Act in particular now reads as follows:

Such notices shall, in the Province of Quebec, be written in the English and French languages, and, in the other provinces, in English.

This means that the right of the CN to make announcements in French in any province other than Quebec could be contested, which is contrary to the established practice and contrary, in my opinion, to the spirit of the law passed by this House.

There are a great number of other sections where such anomalies can be found. Last spring, I started reviewing the federal statutes dealing with the official languages and I noticed that amendments will have to be made to eliminate what I referred to, in my speech on national unity last July as "useless irritants".

After serious and in-depth examination of every statute, with the help of our legal counsel and a computer, as hon. members are aware, I prepared and today tabled a piece of legislation to bring some measure of fairness to our Canadian linguistic rights.

I noticed with very much pleasure, in the throne speech, that the government, after consulting with the provinces, will amend the Criminal Code to guarantee the right of the accused to be heard in the official language of his choice. But on the announcement that the government will not create bilingual districts, I felt we should have some alternative. Since the federal government have the Official Languages Act, since they are ready to meet with the provinces to amend the constitution by inserting a clause guaranteeing language equality across the country, it seems to me that the provinces should, as they may chose to do, follow in their own jurisdictions the federal lead.

I therefore have two goals. One, that the federal government recognize that the Official Languages Act has priority over every other statute of Canada, and second, that the provinces be encouraged to allow greater use of the official languages. Without discussing my bill any further, and to point out the degree of flexibility that is needed, it is essential that the provinces allow within their jurisdiction the use of both official languages. Briefly stated, my bill aims at asking permission. With a lot of good will, the provinces could allow this. I see no difficulty. There may be problems in some provinces where some may think that allowing means recognizing. For the time being I am not asking for official recognition, but for permission. If we here in Ontario were allowed legal documents in French, I would have them. I am not asking that the government officially declare themselves bilingual. I am simply asking this: Give me documents so that here, in Ontario, I may live in my mother tongue.

The time has come that we also allow a host of federal agencies to act within the spirit of the act, and in the case for instance of our railways that an end be put to the anomaly that prohibits announcements in French in provinces outside Quebec.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be advisable that the House move to international railway signs. Within a few months, if it is deemed advisable, a bill could be introduced for the adoption of international railway signs. That, Mr. Speaker, was basically my point. It is important that all these statutes be revised. I hope that the minister who will answer can give me a positive answer.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member the other day, and as I announced earlier today in the House, it is the government's intention to bring forward amendments to the Official Languages Act. Our purpose will be to strengthen the law and particularly to strengthen the role of the parliamentary commissioner to enable him, in the context of parliament, to apply more effectively the objectives of the act.

I wanted to say as well that I am grateful to the hon. member for having brought to my attention, and to the attention of members, the inconsistencies and the anomalies which exist in several pieces of federal legislation. In doing so, I think he has performed an extremely valuable service for me and, I think, for other members of the House.

I agree strongly with the concerns he has expressed about some of the archaic provisions, and as a result of his representations I have asked my officials to be in touch with the Department of Justice and the Privy Council Office so that we can examine these statutes which he has drawn to our attention with a view to bringing forward necessary changes.

I have not yet had a chance to examine the legislation which he placed before the House today but I will certainly do so at the earliest opportunity, and I think we will find the kind of suggestions which he has made to be very helpful. It seems to me that he has demonstrated how one can effectively, as a member of parliament, serve the interest of the people one represents. His suggestions are extremely valuable and I intend to see that action is taken upon them.

HOUSING—REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROTECT HOME BUYER

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 at the first opportunity in this session I brought to the attention of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) the plight of the residents of Bear Creek Park in Surrey, and I asked the following question of him:

> Because of the indecent haste of the former minister in that portfolio to push AHOP programs, people, such as those in the Bear Creek estates, have been ripped off by fly-by-night contractors, as I have discussed with the minister on numerous occasions, and by the government directive that housing inspectors inspect only for the security of the money lenders, while the home buyer is left out in the cold. I would like to know why there was nothing about housing in the Speech from the Throne and why there is no protection for the home buyer.

The minister's answer was to the effect that he is sorry for the mistakes, he hopes there will be no such mistakes in the future, and that is where it ended. This was an admission of failure by the minister and the officials of his department, and a refusal to accept any responsibility for what happened in the Bear Creek estates.

I want to assure the minister that I am not talking about the program itself because I know, now that the program has been in effect for two or three years, there are some fine AHOP projects that have been produced by very reputable contractors. I am not talking about the program itself. What I am talking about is at least one example, which can be multiplied across Canada, where people who had put their trust in a government program have been ripped off because of the sloppy administration by government administrators.

The problem is one of the minister, wanting to push the program to such a degree so as to have statistics to show that the program was a great success, and in his interest to have good statistics on housing starts he allowed his departmental officials, and perhaps even pushed them, to bring in all kinds of contractors on stream who could not be trusted as people with a good reputation so far as the quality of housing they would provide was concerned. I would like to outline briefly what has happened.

In this particular case 95 per cent of the homes were bought by the buyers from the contractor on the basis of plans presented. In the process of the building of those homes the contractor took it upon himself to change the plans, and when the buyers would view the houses as the plans were being changed, they would demur and object. The contractor would say that in the end things would turn out and that the buyers would be happy with the end product. But the end product was so shoddy that all the residents got together to object to what happened.

I showed the minister pictures of the substandard housing which was provided in the end for the full price of the AHOP project, and he himself was shocked. I know he was concerned about this.

The important fact is that the CMHC officials in Vancouver were pointedly asked by the residents and the buyers of Bear Creek estates not to make the final payment to the contractor, but they were totally ignored. The contractor got his money. He took off, and the buyers were left sitting high and dry. Actually, I should not say that because there were water problems, moisture, condensation, back-flow and water coming in the doors.

I should take a few minutes to read about some of the problems. The inspectors came back, looked, and admitted that their inspections had not been adequate. For example, there was deterioration because of moisture build-up in the windows. The doors were installed, but the weather stripping directed water into the houses instead of out of them. Not only was there shoddy workmanship; there were also violations of the code. The administrator from Vancouver signed a statement saying that a building did not meet section 35(B)(4) of the residential standards of CMHC. In another one the lighting fixtures did not meet section 35(B) of the residential standards. These are direct violations of the code. The inspectors let these violations go, and the people had to pay full price. Now they are stuck.

The minister did show interest and was genuinely concerned about what happened, but the coup de grâce is that in the end he said that it was too bad this happened but that perhaps these people should look for legal help for redress of their grievances. That contractor is long gone. He has closed down that company. He has no doubt vacuumed the company's bank account. There is not a thing these people can get, and they are stuck.

Departmental brochure NHA 5128-15 says:

The inspection routines are designed to make sure that the completed house will be adequate security for the NHA mortgage loan.

I wonder if Royal Trust and Montreal Trust have enough money somewhere to hire their own inspectors. Does CMHC have to carry out inspections to make sure the mortgage loans are protected? The government is protecting Montreal Trust and Royal Trust. Who is protecting the buyers? Surely the home buyer who buys from a government sanctioned program ought to be able to have some confidence that government officials are going to be protecting their interests and not those of money lenders. I think Royal Trust is big enough to look after itself.

The people involved have been more than patient. They have worked on their homes. They have tried to beautify them. They have spent up to $1,000 or $1,500 to improve their homes, to make sure they are livable and to make sure they get rid of some of the moisture. They have put their money into this—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Friesen: I want to know what is going to happen to these people.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in assuming my responsibilities as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs I am pleased to provide the House with additional comments on the role of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in the construction of houses in the Bear Creek Park Subdivision. As the hon. member is aware, my minister has maintained a keen personal interest in this matter; to wit, the meetings he has had to which the hon. member referred.

The hon. member made reference to the Speech from the Throne and, as mentioned by my minister a few days ago, if all the items with respect to AHOP, housing, and all the other aspects of the ministries of this government were included in the Speech from the Throne, the Queen would still be here in Ottawa.

Mr. Friesen: We don't mind.

Mr. Harquail: With all due respect I believe that there may be some misundertanding on the part of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) about the type of protection that CMHC provides for AHOP purchasers. All AHOP homes are inspected regularly by CMHC during construction. They must be in reasonable conformity with approved plans, and they must meet minimum standards of construction.

When owners of the Bear Creek Park houses indicated that they were not satisfied with the construction of their homes, CMHC met repeatedly with them and the builder to help resolve the problems. It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that CMHC was successful in having the builder return to correct certain items necessary to bring the units up to the standards. The corporation was also able to encourage the builder to correct a number of other items that met standards, but the corporation went beyond that in meeting the standards to encourage the builder to maintain his workmanship to the owners' satisfaction.

The units now meet construction standards. However, the workmanship itself may not be up to the expectations of some purchasers, and this appears to be the major source of their continuing dissatisfaction. Moreover, strained relations between the builder and some of the home owners contributed to a hardening of attitudes on both sides, and CMHC spent a great deal of time trying to mediate these disputes.

One of the main difficulties here, Mr. Speaker, is the disparity between the purchasers' expectations regarding modest housing and the final product. Unfortunately this situation tends to arise when purchasers select their homes from plans or models. Differences between these and the actual home they buy are a source of disappointment and frustration, even though their house is in reasonable conformity with the plans from which the units were chosen.

The builder has advised CMHC that he is not prepared to do any more work on the houses—which now meet standards—and he is no longer active in the construction industry. I sympathize with the home owners, Mr. Speaker, but there is no question that CMHC did everything it possibly could within its mandate to help the home owners, as it does in every case. It was to help purchasers such as these that previous ministers of state for urban affairs, as well as the present minister in his former capacity as minister of consumer and corporate affairs, sought the creation of a national consumer warranty plan for new home buyers. Warranty programs are now being implemented by most provincial governments, and consumers can look forward to an improved level of protection. The minister attaches a great deal of importance to working with HUDAC and the provinces to ensure that all Canadians receive equal protection.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS RECEIVING LESS THAN 48 PER CENT DISABILITY PENSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering who was going to reply for the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) but I see we have one Liberal left. Mr. Speaker, if one were to count the times the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I have brought up the topic I will raise tonight, I am sure we would lead the parade in bringing to light examples of inequities against Canadians. I brought up two questions yesterday. One concerned widows' pensions, and one was to the effect that veterans are falling behind in disability pensions as compared to their counterparts in the public service.

I do not understand how anybody can fail to see the discrimination that exists in veterans legislation. A veteran receiving a 48 per cent disability pension will leave a pension to his widow when he dies. If he receives 1 per cent less, however, which amounts to about $203 per year, she will not receive anything when he dies. Unless his death is attributable to his war days, she is left high and dry. She must resort to welfare. Canadians are saying to that woman, who probably spent many hours caring for her husband before he died, "You look after yourself, dear". The funny thing is there is now a way to correct that in the legislation. It has been brought to the attention of the minister on a number of occasions. It has to do with War Veterans Allowance recipients.

A War Veterans Allowance recipient receives somewhere in the vicinity of $487. He is probably equal to a disability pensioner at 65 or 70. If he dies, his wife is protected for one year at the married rate. After the year, she reverts to the single rate. However, she does have that built-in protection. The disability pensioner suffering from war wounds does not have that same advantage.

The other anomaly is the fact that the disability pensioner at only 5 per cent can qualify for War Veterans Allowance and probably get $400. His wife is protected. Someone receiving a disability pension of less than 47 per cent is better off to apply for War Veterans Allowance. This anomaly in the legislation has to be corrected. However, the government will not listen.

The other question I brought to the attention of the minister was with regard to the basic rate of pension and the indexing of that. After many years of fighting and hollering, we were able to establish a category on which to base the basic rate of pension for the disability pensioner. It was finally based by a tripartite committee on the average salary of the five lowest categories in the public service.

As a result, the one on disability indexed according to the cost of living increase is falling behind the rate of the public servant at $536 each year. The minister agrees that is wrong and has to be corrected. However, yesterday he made the ridiculous statement that they are only going to give them half the cost of living index and that veterans, as good Canadians, will accept that. They are good citizens all right. They were good Canadians 60 years ago when they went overseas as youngsters on behalf of Canada. Some sacrificed their lives. Some who came back were maimed and disabled.

Finally, after 50 years we had this basic rate established. They have now fallen behind and nobody will listen. I ask the parliamentary secretary, how long do they have to wait? There are only 12,404 World War I disability pensioners left. They will all be gone, God forbid, in two or three years. To deny them the benefit of a commitment made by Canadian governments over 60 years is, to my mind, a blot on our society.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as Armistice Day draws near it is certainly a privilege for me to answer in place of the Parliamentary Secretary for Veterans Affairs (Mr. Parent).

When the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) answered the question asked by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) yesterday it was with regret that he had to say that the government has looked seriously at the question of a possible increase to the basic rate of pension payable for death or disability related to military service, but had decided not to increase the pension at this time. Hon. members will appreciate that at this time of financial restraint additional funds over and above the normal increases which will be made in January, 1978, are not currently available.

Even though it cannot provide an additional increase, I should at the same time point out that this government has had the veterans very much in mind over the years. As an example, in January, 1971, the rate of pension for a veterans whose pensioned disabilities were assessed at 100 per cent, and who was unmarried with no dependants, was $265. A 10 per cent increase was granted on 1 April, 1971, to bring the rate to $292 a month. Indexing of pensions was instituted so that effective 1 January, 1972, the rate has been changed annually in accordance with the consumer price index. In addition there was a substantial 24 per cent increase in mid-1972, following on the study and recommendations of the joint study group.

As a result I am able to announce that the basic rate of pension will increase by 7.2 per cent effective 1 January, 1978, so that as of that date the unmarried 100 per cent pensioner will receive $596.70 a month. A married 100 per cent pensioner with one child will get $823.52. A widow without children will receive $447.53, and if she has two dependent children she will receive $716.06.

Insofar as the pro rata pension to widows of pensioned veterans is concerned, I have very little to add since a statement was last made on this subject.

The suggestion has been made that a widow should receive a pro rata pension if her husband had been in receipt of a disability pension of 47 per cent or less. This is because she would be fully pensionable as a widow if his pension had been 48 per cent or more at the time of death. What is sometimes missed is that the widow will be pensioned if her husband's death occurred during wartime or was attributable to his service, regardless of the degree of the assessment of his disability. The question which arises is whether, if death was not in any way attributable to military service, a widow's pension should be paid because of the service connection.

We know that the benefits provided to the disabled serviceman or woman, or to their surviving dependants, are far greater than those provided by most other countries. I am not aware of any of our major western wartime allies who pay automatic survivor benefits to widows approaching the 48 per cent basis which we in Canada use.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The time available to the hon. parliamentary secretary has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

REQUEST FOR APPROVAL OF WORKS PROJECT RELATED TO GULL ISLAND RESERVOIR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that some 1,500 persons employed at Labrador Linerboard Limited in Newfoundland and by Woods Contractors have lost their employment in Newfoundland and in the Goose Bay area of Labrador, and in view of the fact that some three months ago the government of Newfoundland submitted to the government of Canada a proposal for a work project that would employ some 400 loggers for a period of four years in clear cutting the proposed reservoir along the lower Churchill River to be part of the Gull Island power project at a cost of $5 million to $8 million per year, and which clear cutting is insisted upon by environmental studies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) respond to the request of the government of Newfoundland immediately and advise them that the proposal is accepted and that the necessary funds will be provided from additional funding for works projects announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the House of Commons last Thursday, and that there will be no further attempts by the government of Canada to delay an answer with respect to this work project which will result in a lasting benefit as well as employment where it is most needed.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of any such motion for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous agreement of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO DELAY LAY-OFFS AT INCO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of serious and pressing necessity to seek the unanimous consent of the House to the following motion. In view of the fact that INCO and Falconbridge have acted neither in an accountable nor responsible manner in laying off some 3,400 workers in Thompson, Port Colborne and Sudbury, and in view of the fact that time is required for both the companies and the unions representing their workers to negotiate mutually agreeable solutions to avoid the layoffs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

• (1112)

That this House instructs the government to immediately introduce legislation that would instruct INCO and Falconbridge to rescind the layoff orders to permit the search for solutions between the workers and their employers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: The Liberals said, "no".

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH PROVINCES, COMPANIES AND UNIONS TO AVOID DETERIORATION OF MINING SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, as there seems to be a conference between the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), I am under the impression that I will obtain unanimous consent to present my motion.

Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a very important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of eventual lay-offs expected in the Quebec mining industry, especially in the case of Noranda Mines which is contemplating the reduction of its activities in Murdochville; considering the state of panic existing in the mining sector as a result of massive dismissals announced by the International Nickel Company of Canada in Ontario; considering also the wish often expressed to the government by Canadian mining producers to establish long-term planning for the mining industry, especially as far as nickel, copper, zinc and iron ore is concerned, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That the government immediately convene a summit meeting on the condition of the mining industry, to anticipate with the provinces, companies and unions the steps to be taken during the next few months to avoid a deterioration of the mining sector and make it more competitive on international markets.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of any such motion for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

LEVEL AT WHICH CANADIAN DOLLAR WILL BE STABILIZED—REASON BANK OF CANADA SOUGHT LINE OF CREDIT

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the fact that the central Bank of Canada has gone to the commercial banks to borrow a new line of credit of $1.5 billion to help support the Canadian dollar. Probably this is the first time in history that the bank of last resort has gone to commercial banks for support. At what price does the government intend to stabilize the Canadian dollar?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before, the Canadian dollar is a floating dollar and we intend to carry on that policy.

Some hon. Members: A sinking dollar.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the House why, if the dollar is going to float, it was essential for the central Bank of Canada to get a $1.5 billion line of credit from commercial banks? Is it the position of the government that our exchange reserves have sunk to such a level that they have to go to other sources for lines of credit in order to maintain the policies they are now following?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as everybody knows, our exchange reserves have substantially decreased since the beginning of this year. That is why the government thought advisable to show that the Canadian dollar was backed by considerable resources. We did not have trouble getting this line of credit of $1.5 billion from the Canadian banking community, which proves that the Canadian dollar is in good position and that we have sufficient reserves to avoid unwarranted speculation on the Canadian dollar.

[English]

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question. The Minister of Finance has a most inexplicable change of logic to try to suggest that the Canadian dollar is in good condition, when it is necessary to have a line of credit of $1.5 billion from the private banking community to support it.

Are other negotiations going on with central banks in other countries, as allowable under International Monetary Fund agreements, for a line of credit for the Canadian dollar? Associated with that, what did the Canadian government have to pay the commercial banks for the line of credit?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, these conditions will be specified as soon as the contract will be determined. I will give more information to the House at that time. Meanwhile, I think that the rates which have been negotiated are very satisfactory.

DIRECT CANADIAN INVESTMENT IN UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REVERSE TREND

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. The president of the Toronto-Dominion Bank pointed out yesterday that the Canadian dollar has had the effect of a 25 per cent devaluation as against the West German mark and Japanese yen. The figures indicate that in 1976, for the first year since 1939, there was a net outflow of direct investment funds from Canada and that last year the direct Canadian investment in the United States increased by $510 million. What steps is the minister taking to try to reverse this trend?

• (1117)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I do not have anything to add to what I said in the House of Commons in my statement Thursday night.

Mr. Crosbie: Canada is now joining Italy, the United Kingdom and even Zambia as a weak currency nation. Would the minister indicate to the House whether he is seeking advice from the United Kingdom or from the government of Zambia on how to act in this situation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: One thing is sure, I am not about to ask advice from the former minister of finance for the province of Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: There go three of your Newfoundland seats.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT REQUEST INCO TO RESCIND ORDER FOR LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that International Nickel of Canada announced the layoff of some 3,000 workers at Sudbury, Thompson and Port Colborne and that since that time the workers have made specific proposals to the company which the company is studying—the proposals are to alleviate the hardship of a 3,000 man layoff in 16 weeks—and in view of the fact that time is needed for the company and for the workers to sit down and negotiate these points without the gun of 16 weeks being held to their temples, will the Prime Minister get in touch with the president of the International Nickel Company and the chairman of the board and ask them to rescind the layoff order to allow time for these negotiations to come to fruition?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I understand that the union is meeting with management on Tuesday to make these proposals about which we do not have any detailed knowledge. I suggest that the two parties should attempt to reach an agreement on the basis of those proposals or others, and I see no need at this time to ask the company to rescind an order which will only take effect in 16 weeks.

TRADE

REASON FOR IMPORTATION OF NICKEL CARBONATE IN VIEW OF CANADIAN SUPPLY SITUATION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): It is fairly obvious that the Prime Minister does not understand the effect of a layoff in an area such as Sudbury which is dependent on one industry, so I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance because he has had 48 hours to report to me and to the House with respect to the importation of nickel carbonate. Can the minister tell the House why it is that Canada imports nickel carbonate from the Philippines destined for a Canadian refinery when we have the stuff coming right out of our ears?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I would like to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I have made inquiries to find out what the situation is. This nickel carbonate is related to a special kind of process associated with the Sherritt Gordon Mines. The kind of feed stock which is produced by other nickel mines in Canada is unlikely to be suitable for this. The other point which needs to be made is that the other nickel mines have their own refineries in any event. I think the most important part of the answer is that the briquettes which are made from both foreign and Canadian sources are exported so that the added value of the reprocessing in 94 per cent of the output of the Sherritt Gordon mine is exported.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that a couple of weeks ago the Prime Minister told people in London that Canadians must work harder, must tighten their belts, must spend less and must live within their means, is he prepared to come to the Sudbury Basin and tell the people there that they do not work hard enough, that they need to live within their means and that they need to spend the money they do not have?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTING CONCILIATOR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct my question to the Postmaster General and to remind him that there have only been six days of negotiations since October 5 and that negotiations have broken off and, according to the latest reports, the talks are "going badly". Does the Postmaster General agree with that position which was taken by a member of the union and, if so, why?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first of all, there has not been a breakdown in negotiations. The hon. gentleman has indicated that the negotiations are going badly. That might be a more accurate statement. An impasse has been reached. It is an impasse which we will undoubtedly resolve. I point out to the hon. gentleman that we have been negotiating since October 5, and although he indicates that there have been only five days, those five days have been very productive. I have indicated in the past that there has been a change of attitude in the union, and the meetings have been congenial. However, undoubtedly when we are dealing with unions such as CUPW, which has always been very militant, there are bound to be impasses. I only regret that the union saw fit, instead of waiting until Monday to hear what position we are going to take in terms of their demands, to call a press conference and create this disquietude in terms of continued mail service within the country.

Mr. Alexander: I do not think the minister's rhetoric will help the collective bargaining process. There is no doubt about that when the minister continually talks about the union being militant. Has the union or has the minister decided whether there is a need for a conciliator to be brought into this picture?

Mr. Blais: Far from my being inflammatory by calling the union militant, I am sure the union appreciates my calling it militant because it prides itself in being one of the most militant in Canada. I am sure there is nothing wrong with my saying that.

With reference to the question of a conciliation officer or a conciliation board, again the hon. member refers to the fact that the negotiations are ongoing, and there is no consideration at this time of appointing a conciliator.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, obviously negotiations will be hard. When I indicated on October 5 that we were resuming negotiations, I said they would be long and difficult, but that I am not losing spirit. I see that necessarily we will have a collective agreement in the near future because this confrontation has to come to an end, since it has disturbed the postal services and basically reduced our volume levels in the past.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: As I understand it, the policy of the minister is assured mail delivery. Would the minister advise whether it is the position of the government that the delivery of mail is an essential service?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman came to the Finkelman committee on a number of occasions, and he is familiar with the Public Service Staff Relations Act. I ask him to check the definition within that act.

Mr. Alexander: You have evaded my question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will realize that the Chair would have some grave reservations as to whether such a general policy statement would be proper in the question period in any case.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH PROVINCES, COMPANIES AND UNIONS TO AVOID DETERIORATION OF MINING SECTOR

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The managing director of Quebec Metal Mining Association Inc., Mr. Langlois, made a statement in Quebec City yesterday to the effect that the mining industry is trapped and helpless without government assistance. A moment ago I moved a motion that my friends opposite rejected. Now, I would like to direct my question to the minister. Could he give the House the assurance that this government is prepared to call a summit meeting inviting of course all his provincial counterparts, industry leaders and union representatives, to set up a long term policy to provide security for these people who, as the minister is certainly aware, are very much concerned about the future of the mining sector throughout Canada?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been giving consideration to a federal-provincial conference of energy ministers. Perhaps such a conference should include the finance ministers of the various provinces. There have been some soundings, but it would be too early at this time for me to say that a conference will take place. There might well be merit in such a conference but I would want to make sure that the provincial ministers would support it.

One point that has been made from time to time is that the tax rates across the country vary considerably from province to province. The point has also been made that some provinces have higher tax rates than the federal government whose tax rate is the same all across the country. There might well be an opportunity to meet and discuss an over-all view with respect to the future of the mining industry and the relative positions of the two governments, the contributions that the provinces on the one hand and federal government policies on the other, might be able to make to stabilize this very important industry in the country.

Mr. La Salle: I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker, I find the minister's answer more encouraging than the one he gave us last week. The minister mentioned a possible meeting with his provincial counterparts, but I think he will not underrate the importance of gathering around the same table representatives of companies and unions which are primarily concerned. Since these company leaders might contribute their advice for a future policy, could the minister give us assurance that there will be participation of employer and union representatives so that this policy be made with the cooperation of the interested sectors?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the whole question of a conference of this kind is, of course, a highly complicated one and requires a good deal of discussion with provincial ministers. It would seem to me that as preparation for such a federal-provincial conference, the provincial ministers should invite management representatives of the industry and representatives of the labour segment of that industry for discussions with respect to their particular provincial points of view. I can assure the hon. member that I would be very pleased to do the same thing, but I think when talking about a federal-provincial conference one would have to limit that to a conference of ministers after ministers had prepared the groundwork through consultation with members of the industry, that is to say labour representatives and management representatives.

SOCIAL SECURITY

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS CONCERNING CUTS IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. Before he made his most important speech some weeks ago relating to the possible cutbacks in welfare payments to Canadians, notably family allowances and pensions, had he consulted in general with his counterparts in the Cabinet? More particularly, had he consulted with the Minister of National Health and Welfare before he announced the possibility of cutbacks in pensions and family allowance payments?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I did not announce that this would be done. I was discussing this in the context of the budgetary deficit that this government faces and the problems we have.

Mr. Alexander: Scaring our senior citizens.

Mr. Buchanan: Basically the point that was made was that the federal government will have to look at all its programs and those were simply programs that were mentioned in the broader picture.

Mr. Alexander: You made a mistake. Admit it.

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the unfortunate statement made by the President of the Treasury Board some weeks ago which has created a great deal of uncertainty especially amongst low income Canadians, pensioners and family allowance recipients, can the minister assure the Canadian people that this government in no way, at any time, will cut back pension and family allowance payments?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention to cut back those programs.

ENERGY

GULL ISLAND HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDY

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment or his parliamentary secretary? In view of the high unemployment rate in the province of Newfoundland, in view of the need to develop alternative sources of energy, in view of the high hydroelectric potential in Labrador and the proposal of the government of Newfoundland to cut timber in the proposed reservoir area, can the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether his department is studying an environmental impact assessment at this time and when we might have some news on that assessment so that we can proceed with a positive response to the government of Newfoundland with regard to the cutting in that project?

• (1130)

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Yes, Mr. Speaker. An assessment panel has been established. Guidelines have been prepared. These guidelines will be submitted to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and to the province of Newfoundland. An environmental impact statement will be presented very shortly.

POST OFFICE

CLOSING OF OFFICE ON VALE ISLAND—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General concerning the post office on Vale Island in Hay River. Is the Postmaster General aware that this department seems determined to close the post office there? They seem to be taking the attitude that instead of trying to solve the problem, closing the post office will end the problem. That is not a very satisfactory answer. Is the Postmaster General willing to reconsider the decision to close the Vale Island post office or is he considering any alternative arrangements?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, on October 20, I wrote to him and I indicated that I would be looking into the matter. I am advised that notwithstanding my statement there may have been a decision that is imminent. I directed my officials to hold off on that decision until such time as I have had a full opportunity to review the situation.

Mr. Firth: Mr. Speaker, I have been led to understand that the decision to close the Vale Island post office is to be made today. The people of Hay River, Vale Island in particular, would like to know about this. Will the Postmaster General indicate what alternatives are being considered and when he will be able to give an answer in the House?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the decision was made to close it today. As I indicated to the hon. member, I am looking into the situation. I directed my officials to hold off on that decision until I have had an opportunity to make a complete analysis of the situation and to consider if there is a necessity to close down the post office or what alternative mode there might be.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

DATE OF RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—REASON FOR CONSTRUCTION OF EASTERN DRIVEWAY RECREATIONAL ROAD

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister inform the House on what date the Special Joint Parliamentary Committee on the National Capital will be reconvened as a standing committee to provide a coordinated approach to development of the national capital region?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member on her appointment as opposition critic of relevant matters in my department. I wish her luck in her new duties.

I also want to assure her that, like her, several hon. members on this side of the House are eager for that committee to be reconstituted without delay; I hope it can be convened next week.

[English]

Mrs. Pigott: In light of the announced austerity in government spending, can the minister explain why tenders are being called on October 31 by the National Capital Commission for construction of the eastern driveway recreational road, changing the historic pattern that recreational land is for people, not cars? What measures are being initiated to improve accountability and consultative planning in the NCC?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to check on the matter with the National Capital Commission after which I shall give an answer to the hon. member as soon as possible.

FINANCE

MEASURES GOVERNMENT WILL TAKE TO STOP EXODUS OF INDUSTRIES TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Finance. As New York bankers have already amassed an industrial fund of over $500 million to attract Canadian industries interested in moving to the United States, and more specifically to the New England states, can the Minister of Finance tell the House what measures his department intends to take to counteract that initiative on the part of American banks which are now courting Canadian industries, in particular in our area which Canadian industries have been leaving recently to move to the New England states? Does his department intend to do something to prevent an exodus of Canadian industries?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how the government could intervene when people decide to invest money in Canada as well as in the United States. Every day we try to talk American entrepreneurs into making investments in Canada. It is also very normal for the Americans to do the same with Canadians occasionally. I therefore do not see how we could intervene. However, if the hon. member has suggestions to make, I am willing to consider them.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that in the United States Canadian industrialists are being offered some of our money to finance the manufacturing of machinery, does his department intend to use the same methods or to propose equally attractive solutions for the Canadian industry?

Mr. Chrétien: Well, at the present time many Quebec businessmen are worried by the situation in Quebec and unfortunately there is nothing I can do about it. I think that many times their projects of diversifying their investments and maybe transferring some of their assets to the U.S. can be explained by the fact that there is political instability in Quebec. The best way to solve that problem would probably be for the hon. member to give his unqualified support to the Quebec federalists who want to get rid of the separatists.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH FRENCH COMMONWEALTH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Supply and Services who has reportedly just returned from Africa with a recommendation to form a French Commonwealth. With the Prime Minister not particularly supportive of the existing Commonwealth, does the government intend to seriously consider a permanent Commonwealth of this nature?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I believe on the contrary that the right hon. Prime Minister has become the senior politician of the Commonwealth and that he is highly respected by heads of governments. It is precisely because Canada is fortunate to have a politician of such high caliber as its leader that we would like to profit from his experience and his competence so that this country may project abroad the image of what it actually is, namely a bilingual and multicultural country.

[English]

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, obviously age does not really predicate involvement or interest. However, in this question, obviously the cooperation of France will be required, a country that has welcomed Mr. René Lévesque. Has the government made any overtures in this regard?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think that Canada must assume its own responsibilities and first protect its own best interests. France is certainly a very important partner in the French-speaking world and we will obviously have to hold negotiations with the French government.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—MEASURES TO AID AUTO PARTS INDUSTRY

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I will direct my question to the acting minister. In view of the fact that Canada is not participating to the extent it should in the automotive industry and in particular is not getting its fair share of auto parts production, will the minister, in addition to his talks with the auto makers, seriously consider accepting the proposal of the Auto Parts Association of Canada for a $250 million fund of fully repayable loans to help modernize and expand auto parts capacity in Canada and to begin creating the 25,000 jobs that represent the unemployment impact of the unfair share of auto parts production in Canada? Also, will he consider a special automotive parts industry program within the Enterprise Development Program in his department?

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone could say so categorically that Canada does not get its fair share in the auto pact, but I can assure the hon. member that our whole participation and all our agreements on the subject are currently under review and that the minister will make a specific statement on the subject in the near future.

PROPOSED MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): I thank members of the House. I should like to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources how he is getting along in connection with the proposed maritime energy corporation as time passes. I notice that the maritime premiers intend to ask the minister what part the federal government will play in this concept. Will the minister bring us up to date?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I discussed this matter as recently as last evening with two very important members of the Nova Scotia government. I have taken part in other discussions with the premier of New Brunswick and I can say with some confidence that we are making substantial progress toward the formation of a maritime energy corporation. There are still some items which need to be settled and which are being discussed among the premiers themselves and between the government of Canada and the provincial premiers, but I am encouraged by the progress we are making and hope it will be possible to make a substantive announcement before the end of this year with respect to the creation of this corporation and its funding.

LOWER CHURCHILL POWER PROJECT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): I would hope so too, Mr. Speaker, because I am sure the minister will agree with me that there have been long discussions but little in the way of concrete development.

May I ask the minister how he is getting along with respect to developments on the Lower Churchill? I understand he was seeking certain information from the government of Newfoundland, information which I believe has now been made available. Can the minister tell us when some announcement in this regard might be forthcoming?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Again, I hope it will be possible to make an announcement with respect to this very substantial project in the near future. Discussions with the Newfoundland government are not yet completed. Additional discussions will take place very shortly with respect to a number of matters, including one of the items which was raised by a member during the question period today with respect to the Gull Island site. I should point out, though, that such an announcement might be hindered by the fact that the Province of Newfoundland and the Province of Quebec are themselves engaged in discussions in connection with the development of certain hydro resources in Labrador. Those discussions could complicate a federal-provincial understanding with respect to the Gull Island project or its priority as far as Newfoundland is concerned.

NATIONAL REVENUE

EXEMPTION OF INDIAN BANDS FROM FEDERAL TAXES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Fraser (Vancouver South): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Some time ago the hon. gentleman's predecessor announced that no changes would be made in the application of tax laws to Indian bands in the sense that at the present time the bands are exempted on the same basis as Canadian municipalities. The hon. lady went on to say, however, that the department felt that this exemption should not continue but that no change would be made in the absence of consultation with the Indian bands affected. May I ask the minister whether any such consultation has been taking place and if not, why not?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): I would be very pleased to consult with the bands. I believe representations have been made to that end and I will gladly accept them, if and when they would like to meet with me.

Mr. Fraser: I thank the minister for that undertaking and I can assure him that a meeting can be arranged very shortly. Since this is a vital matter which affects the planning of industrial and commercial developments on the part of these Indian bands, may I ask the minister what arrangements for liaison exist between his department and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Ministers have always cooperated in the past and they will do so in the future.

REQUEST FOR COMMISSION TO STUDY IMPLICATIONS OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PROGRAMS

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since she is absent and my question dates back to October 19, I shall direct it to the Prime Minister. Since the Speech from the Throne clearly indicates that the government wants to look into the economic problems of families and individuals and in view of the hardships faced by disadvantaged people who receive meagre welfare allowances and older citizens who live in slums where maintenance costs for their homes are eroding their pensions, can the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Some hon. Members: Question, question!

Mr. Lavoie: Couldn't you let me speak?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a question, he should put it immediately.

Mr. Lavoie: Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare has informed him that she intends eventually to appoint a parliamentary committee to study the implications of guaranteed annual minimum income programs? If so, when will she do so, and if not, for what reasons will she not?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is expressing a major concern shared by the government. As for the parliamentary committee he is enquiring about, I do not recall the minister informing me of that project, but I will make sure to ask her and give an answer to the hon. member.

CUSTOMS

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN STAFF AT UNITED STATES-BRITISH COLUMBIA BORDER POINTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue. It has to do with the recurring problem of long line-ups at the Douglas border crossing point due to erratic and inadequate staffing there. Line-ups are sometimes two or three miles long and the problem is so acute that some Canadians find themselves obliged to stay in the United States overnight, which is a whale of a way to help the balance of payments situation. When does the minister intend to take this question seriously and provide adequate staffing at the Douglas border crossing point?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): I shall be pleased to consider the hon. member's representation, Mr. Speaker. I should like also to tell him that he does not need to come into the House to make representations because he can be in full communication with me on a daily basis. But I shall be glad to look into this matter and I shall be in contact with him further.

Mr. Friesen: The same problem exists for small businessmen who want to do business with entrepreneurs in the United States. They have to wait in the long room beside the Pacific Highway for two or three hours before they can get their business done. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce say there is nothing wrong with doing business across the border. Will he look into that aspect of the matter to make sure that the small businessman can transact his business at the border within a reasonable amount of time?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): This is an important matter and one which I am looking into at present. But people have to realize that there can be delays from time to time when they are crossing international boundaries.

SPORTS

DATE OF TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF DEPARTMENT—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. In view of the apparent enthusiasm which the minister brings to her portfolio—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Halliday: —and the fact that she indicated outside the House last night that she was disappointed that no questions had been directed to her so far this session—

An hon. Member: Does she have any answers?

Mr. Halliday: —may I refer the minister to section 13 of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act which requires the minister, within three months of the end of the fiscal year, to bring an annual report before parliament indicating the work which has been done and the moneys which have been spent as well as the commitments which have been made during the year. May I ask the minister whether she has complied with the requirements of the act and if not, why not, and when we can expect to receive the report?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I should like to congratulate my new critic on his position. I regret that there are only some 16 or 17 of his colleagues in the House to hear his first question to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Naturally, Mr. Speaker, the branch of government which I have the honour to administer fulfils all the requirements of the act. It has, furthermore, made known all the facts the hon. member has requested.

● (1152)

Mr. Halliday: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would not want to accuse the minister of being at all pretentious, but in view of the fact that this week she has submitted to the House a green paper on amateur sport before submitting her annual report, and in view of the fact that in this green paper there is reference to her earnest desire to seek opinions and consultations from other governments, individuals and sporting associations across the country regarding amateur sport, but there is only passing reference to the fact that she would like to have comments from members of parliament, may I ask the minister whether she would consider establishing a parliamentary committee which could then look into the problem of amateur sport and fitness across this country?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, I think the green paper itself is an excellent way for members of parliament to have their say. In fact, at this time I am preparing a letter to all members of parliament, as I did with the hockey inquiry just recently, as well as to Senators in the other place. All hon. members will be aware of the hearings when they go to their own part of the country and will be able to participate in that manner. Following the input from the country at large, it may then be necessary to have further discussions in the regular committee process of the green paper results.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

TIME PERIOD REQUIRED FOR REVIEW OF SALARY CONTRACTS—NUMBER OF REVIEWS PENDING

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that applications to the AIB for review of negotiated salary contracts have been made as early as January of this year but have still not been taken care of to date, and in view of the insecurity that this delay causes Canadians, what is the time frame for people expecting a reply from the AIB, and how many applications are in fact pending at this time?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give exact data in reply to this question. I agree with the hon. member that there is no special reason why it should take more than six or seven months for a reply and that that is not satisfactory. I will look into the matter and try to give a specific answer to the point he has raised.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN STAFF TO PREVENT POACHING

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for fisheries. It has been the policy of the department during the past two or three years to try to enhance the Atlantic salmon population on the Atlantic coast of Canada and in its rivers. During this time there has been an inadequate surveillance crew along these streams and poaching has been prevalent. In his recommendation for the budget for the coming year, would the minister responsible for fisheries be able to submit a budget which will contain adequate money and provision of man years for the proper enforcement of the laws as they relate to salmon fishing?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the record he will find that the number of fisheries officers assigned to protecting our salmon rivers, especially since the ban has been in effect, has been very, considerably increased. In fact, this is one area of the department which has increased the most in the last six years.

I recognize that the ban means added pressures. Many people who have fished traditionally for Atlantic salmon—and I do not blame them for wanting to eat more—find they do not have access to it. The hon. member knows very well that we will never be able to eliminate all acts of vandalism—because that is what poaching is, an act of vandalism against society.

Because of the new legislation which he and many others, both on this side of the House and on the other side, helped to put through last June, very severe penalties will now be imposed. In fact, I am now looking at some recommendations regarding seizure and forfeiture of vehicles used in acts of poaching or for the transporting of illegally caught fish. I will be making a decision having given consideration to all of the problems that they represent.

I might say to the hon. member that citizens who want to protect their resource—because it does belong to citizens of this country—should also co-operate with us. We will never be able to solve all the problems, but we certainly have no intention of giving up against poachers.

Mr. McCain: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the various fish and game associations, and particularly the Atlantic salmon association in the province of New Brunswick, have been making strong recommendations to the minister, would he please reconsider his statement and reinforce those people who are responsible for surveillance? I ask this in view of the fact that the poaching situation has really reached commercial proportions in very many parts of the province of New Brunswick and quantities of fish up to 1,000 pounds have been taken by poachers or merchants who had no business having salmon in their possession at all. Would the minister provide additional surveillance to prevent netting, poaching and merchandising of fish in an illegal way?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, if I were to listen to the representations of some of the interests in the area of the sports fishery, I would only concentrate on their particular problems. I am not at all associating the hon. member with this sort of claim because I know he has many commercial fishermen in his riding and he defends their interests too, but the reality is that we will never be able to meet the expectation of the sports fishery lobby. I use that word advisedly because in many cases, by being such a vociferous lobby, they have turned a lot of people against the very aims that they are trying to attain.

SUGGESTION RESULTS OF AID PROGRAMS SHOULD BE LESS COMPETITION FOR CANADA

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance but first may I thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt for looking after Port Colborne so assiduously.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you.

Mr. Railton: I am quite certain that the cabinet is looking after the INCO situation quite well. My question concerns Atlas Steels in Welland, which objects to Canadian government funds providing a stainless steel mill in Cuba with a capacity of 50,000 tons when the domestic demand there is only 4,000 tons annually and a new Cuban mill would add to the already serious selling difficulties of stainless steel in Canada. They would like to know whether such assistance programs could be made less immediately competitive to Canadian industry.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question was raised on several occasions this week. Are we really working against the interests of Canadian industry when we are helping other countries? I do not think so, Mr. Speaker, because without the use of Canadian technology we would not be selling our products to build these facilities which otherwise would be built by German, French or British technicians and the profits would go to other countries. That is why I think it is a good thing for us to export our technology. This may sometimes bring competition, but international growth should normally serve Canadian national growth.

POSSIBLE RELEASE OF FOOTHILLS FROM COMMITMENT TO BUY ALL PIPE IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it arises out of the answer which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce gave yesterday to the hon. member for Hamilton West regarding the purchase of steel for the proposed Alcan pipeline. At that time the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated that the policy of the National Energy Board would be to permit Canadians to have the opportunity of competing for this steel pipe and that they would be given every preference.

In view of the fact that Foothills (Yukon), in their background paper issued in July after the National Energy Board report had been published stated, and I quote, "Line pipe represents the greatest single expenditure by any of the applicants. Foothills (Yukon) proposes to purchase all its pipe in Canada", and in view of the fact that this was one of the factors that favoured Alcan as against Arctic Gas, which proposed to buy 30 per cent of its requirements from foreign suppliers, I want to ask the minister whether or not the government proposes to release Foothills (Yukon) from its commitment to buy all its pipe in Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce put it very well yesterday when he said that preference would be given to Canadian suppliers. Indeed, we have every reason to expect that the bulk, if not 100 per cent, of the pipe will be supplied by Canadian companies.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is nonsense.

Mr. Gillespie: Also I should like to point out that it might not be in the interests of Canadians if we were to create the impression that Canadian suppliers can supply that pipe regardless of the price.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not what he said. You are misleading the House.

An hon. Member: Read it again, Walter.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have no intention of doing that.

Mr. Gillespie: It is important for Canadian suppliers to keep themselves competitive. They should sharpen their pencils when they are bidding on this great project.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the National Energy Board and Foothills (Yukon) have stressed the fact that the Alcan pipeline was advantageous to the people of Canada, because all of the pipe will be purchased in this country, can the minister assure the House that there has been no pressure in the process of negotiations with the United States to allow American companies to bid with the assistance of the American government by various forms of subsidy, so as to push the Canadian suppliers out of the market?

Mr. Alexander: That is the point.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is this part of the quid pro quo by which we got an agreement with the United States?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, no, it is a lot of speculative nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVILEGE

MR. GILLIES—ANSWERS OF MINISTER OF FINANCE RESPECTING DROP IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege with respect to the Minister of Finance. I am aware of the fact that Your Honour has ruled over and over again that one cannot comment on the quality of answers given by ministers; I realize that is a well understood principle. But I should like to raise a question with Your Honour which I think is pertinent. It flows from the fact that information put forth in parliament is instantaneously transmitted across the nation and has an enormous effect on people throughout the country and, indeed, on our capital markets.

For a long time we have had the tradition in parliament that before a budget there is no disclosure which could affect any financial transactions or operations. We now find that statements made during the question period can have the same impact. All during last week the Minister of Finance implied that the Bank of Canada was not involved in any actions whatsoever which might be construed as moving toward support of the Canadian dollar. Because of those implications, there were transactions made on the Canadian dollar which probably influenced the downward movement of our dollar.

I am not suggesting the Minister of Finance misled the House purposely, or even if he knew what he was doing. I doubt if he knew what he was doing. The fact is that it happened. Regardless of the rule, which is well established, regarding commenting upon the answers of ministers, I think we need to examine once again the question of answers given in the House which relate directly to trading, speculation or other action on capital markets. There must be some way for ministers to realize that they must be accountable in this respect and must give answers which relay what is going on in an accurate fashion.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the question of accountability of ministers' questions which may affect direct action and exchanges in the capital markets of this country be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege. If the hon. member wants to deal with that question in a very rational way, he will have to realize that sometimes the crazy statements of members of the opposition are listened to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: The opposition party has two or three critics on financial matters, and I have heard them make wild statements which create an impression that they know everything about the Canadian dollar, when it is not true. The other day a critic from the other side was referring to figures based on speculation and was trying to create the impression that he knew what he was talking about. If hon. members opposite do not want us to reply to such questions, the first thing they should do, if they know what they are talking about, is not to ask questions which disturb the market.

I indicated last week that we were not in discussion with anyone. The negotiations started on Monday of this week. When the question was asked last week, I was stating the truth, because I gave authority to people to start those negotiations on Monday of this week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Don Valley raises, by way of a question of privilege, that which he acknowledged at the start has not traditionally been recognized as a question of privilege. If it relates to the quality of answers given in some general way, it would not constitute a question of privilege. Even if it relates in a specific way to the quality of answers, it would not be a question of privilege.

Unless and until I am persuaded that it falls within the classic lines of definition of questions of privilege, and in addition has a specificity to it which would attach it to one particular incident that could be examined by a committee, it would be very difficult to turn around the traditional definition of questions of privilege. Therefore, I regret I cannot accept the hon. member's suggestion as a question of privilege.

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED INACCURACIES IN PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT CONCERNING INCO

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a question of privilege was raised by the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party, in my absence. I believe the Minister of Finance reserved my right to answer it when I returned. I wonder if I might have that permission.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is not a very lengthy matter. The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party said that I misinformed, deliberately or inadvertently, the House. He referred to three items, the first of which is a statement by me. I should like to refer to page 322 of Hansard dated October 27, 1977, where the Leader of the New Democratic Party is reported as quoting me. It reads as follows:

I have clear information to the effect that Guatemalan production will not reach the market until 1979.

I stand by that. Our officials and our ministers have clear information to that effect. The Leader of the New Democratic Party attempts to contradict that by quoting from INCO, as reported at page 322 of Hansard, the following:

Commercial level production is expected to be achieved in the second quarter of 1978.

There are two operative words here. This is an expectation of production. On the expectation, we know there is a difficult start-up position in these overseas operations. There are bugs to be ironed out in Guatemala, as there have been in Indonesia. Our information is that the expectation of even production will not be fulfilled. One must note that I did not talk about production; I talked about reaching the market. It is important to know that in the case of Guatemala the production does not reach the market even as it is produced, because it still has to be processed. It is produced in a semi-processed form, and then it requires further treatment in the refineries of the company abroad before it can be marketed.

That is all I have to say in regard to the first point about not reaching the market. I stand by my statement. Obviously, either deliberately or inadvertently, the Leader of the New Democratic Party was misleading the House by playing on the word "production" as opposed to "reach the market".

My second point is with respect to the comments of the Leader of the New Democratic Party who was quoting me as reported at page 322 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

—INCO plans a reduction in Canada of 15 per cent of its operations, whereas it plans reductions abroad of some 30 per cent.

In order to contradict that, the Leader of the New Democratic Party said the following:

—no jobs are being lost in INCO's overseas developments.

I never said that. I never said that they are not continuing to develop the mines or to develop the operation in order to come into production and export at some point. Therefore, once again, the Leader of the New Democratic Party is either playing on words or trying to mislead the House—hopefully, inadvertently—by talking about development, whereas I talked about its operations. Referring to that same point, I should like to quote from the INCO press release dated October 20, 1977—that is, the very press release the Leader of the New Democratic Party quoted from—which reads as follows:

Production rates at the company's overseas nickel operations will be at levels substantially below those previously planned for 1978; consequently, employment levels will also be lower.

So, that is INCO saying the very thing I said, that the employment levels abroad will be lower. On the basis of discussions with INCO, our officials feel a reasonable estimate of 30 per cent would be the amount by which the production of the mines abroad will fail to reach their original target.

The third point was interrupted by Your Honour's ruling on the order of it, but it was put on the record that in terms of inventory I had misled the House. Here, again, the record speaks for itself. I said quite clearly, and I am quoting from page 217 of Hansard:

• (1212)

INCO has stockpiled for a period of 12 to 14 months.

I have here an article from the first page of the Globe and Mail—I hope that I will make the first page—quoting the leader of the NDP as follows:

Mr. Broadbent said . . . it has been stockpiling nickel for "about a year".

The two statements say practically the same thing. So, really, I think the leader of the NDP is just trying to get attention with a spurious question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby was recognized on a question of privilege. As is customary when any member begins with an allegation that the House may have been misled either advertently or inadvertently by any comment, I heard him out. He put his comments on the record, and the Prime Minister refuted those points. It is obviously a matter of disagreement, not a question of privilege.

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

EFFECT OF AIB GUIDELINES ON INDEMNITIES AND ALLOWANCES OF PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to a matter concerning which Your Honour made a ruling in the early part of 1977 after it had been raised in the House. It is my view that the same issue is arising again, and that it should be drawn to your attention so that you can make a ruling which, I assume, will be similar to the one you made for the year 1977.

I refer to the fact that in the Senate and the House of Commons Act there is provision for a 7 per cent automatic increase in the indemnities and allowances of members of parliament and senators. But a year ago Your Honour reached the decision, after the matter had been raised in the House, that the Anti-Inflation Board's guidelines had to apply, and therefore the amount that was granted in the statute was reduced to stay within those guidelines. The Minister of Finance has announced that the limit for 1978 will be 6 per cent on any salary or income increase. Because the Senate and House of Commons Act provides for a 7 per cent increase, it seems to me that the issue arises again.

I think most of us felt that the matter was handled properly last year by Your Honour making a decision on it after consulting the representatives of the various parties. I raise it now so that Your Honour can deal with it again. I think hon.

members are aware of the fact that I would be happier if the whole increase were cancelled, as it ought to be, but of course that is up to the government. In any case, I trust that the issue of increases for members of parliament having to be kept within the law will be dealt with by Your Honour.

I would remind Your Honour, of course, that last year you felt that consideration had to be given not only to the actual dollar increases but to certain other benefits as well, to make sure that the figure that was arrived at was within last year's guidelines. Surely the same would apply for 1978, and that is why I present this as a point of order for Your Honour's consideration.

Mr. Speaker: The point is well taken. The hon. member has recited accurately the events of last year. Fortunately, the matter has been raised in sufficient time to give us an opportunity to examine whether there is, first, a consensus to proceed in the same way and, second, if there is such a consensus, to consider the best mechanics of doing it. I undertake, as a result of the point of order raised by the hon. member, to consult with his counterparts in the other parties in the House to see whether there is a desire to proceed in the same way as last year, and to have those consultations as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I see the Solicitor General has just come into the House, and I understand, after consulting the deputy whip of the opposition, that he is going to make a speech in the course of the debate on the Speech from the Throne. I wonder if he would be prepared to tell us whether there is anything in his speech in the way of an announcement with respect to the activities of the RCMP that were not heretofore known, and which ought to be made by way of a statement on motions so we can question him with respect to such an announcement.

If he could tell us that, I would withdraw my point of order; but I think it is extremely important that the House should know that, because of the importance of preserving the efficacy of our rules with respect to announcements that should be made by way of statements on motions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The putting of such a question at this time is rather extraordinary. There is nothing that can be done to prevent a minister participating in the throne speech debate and saying what he wants to say. However, if the minister wishes to give that indication, I take it it is the sense of the House to receive it. But there is nothing obligatory about it in respect of the minister's actions. He is not required to do so, nor is it within the practices of the House for him to do so.

An hon. Member: Are you afraid to be questioned?

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to the speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to take part in the last day of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It was a pleasure for me to hear Her Majesty the Queen, that gracious lady, read the Speech from the Throne, and, it was certainly a pleasure to meet her afterwards. However, the Speech from the Throne, which was written in the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) office, was very dull and did not contain much for the people of Canada. It is probably more famous for what it did not say than for what it said. Many areas of concern, such as our economy, were not mentioned in that speech, nor was much said about such issues as the environment, transportation, and agriculture.

The environment is an area of concern in Canada to which we must pay more attention. Canada is on the northern fringes of the world, and its environment is very delicate. There is the danger of pollution in our lakes and rivers. Some of that pollution can never be stopped or reversed. We must learn from the experience of other countries and we must treat our environment with more respect than we have. Over the past few years the Prime Minister has not seen to it that there has been continuity in the Department of the Environment. In the five years I have been here, there have been many ministers in charge of that department. It is important that the department becomes better orientated to what is going on, and that it uses more force than it has been using. Instead of playing musical chairs, the department should become a priority department in Canada.

The question of energy is now very closely related to the environment. As our fossil fuels become depleted, we are spending more and more money on the exploration of fossil fuels and on distribution systems such as pipelines, tankers or whatever is used to transport fossil fuels. More and more exploration is taking place in remote and delicate parts of Canada, such as the north, the Beaufort Sea and Baffin Island. What we are really doing is buying time. Much energy is being used in the world, especially in the United States and in highly industrialized parts of this country. Petroleum is a depleting form of energy and it is running out. We are spending more and more money in the delicate areas of our country in order to find an energy resource which will be depleted in any event, and the more we do this, the more there is need to worry about the environment.

I do not think enough emphasis is being put on the importance of alternative forms of energy. There is not enough research carried out; not nearly as much money is being spent on research as there is on the search for more fossil fuels. Other sources of energy are solar, nuclear and electricity. It is becoming more and more evident that, especially in Canada and the United States, we will have to rely on these other sources of energy. We must put more and more of our money and resources into research, so that we will be ready when fossil fuels are depleted, and so we can use fossil fuels for a longer period than is now predicted. Granted, a person of my age may never see the end of fossil fuels, but we must start planning for our children, our grandchildren and their children. Much more emphasis will have to be placed on this area.

In the Speech from the Throne very little was said about agriculture. There was a passing reference to the effect that something is going to be done about a food strategy. I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has said he is going to reorganize and restructure his department, but in my opinion that is just window-dressing. That is the type of thing that is done when the government is in trouble and really has no answers or solutions. It has been done many times, not only in government but also in industry. It does not really solve anything.

Just before I came to Ottawa as a member of parliament, there was a period when the federal government had a task force on agriculture, called the agricultural congress. It was reputed to be the answer to the problems of Canadian agriculture in the 1970s. The federal government spent a lot of money on it. It employed all the best agricultural people and people from consumer groups to discuss the great task of doing something for agriculture in the 1970s. The government set up a trends in food prices committee. That was replaced by the Food Prices Review Board.

These initiatives really have not accomplished anything different from what was accomplished after the first congress. The solutions which were put forward by the agricultural congress have never really been used. If this government wants to save money, I suggest it should dust off the old books, read them and start following some of their recommendations, instead of just starting other programs with different names and trying to convince farmers and consumers that the government is really doing something about agriculture. The problem with agriculture in Canada is that there is no agricultural policy; the federal government has never really spelled out guidelines for an agriculture policy.

Farmers in the United States have many difficulties. They are getting to the point where they are ready to become militant. One of the reasons for this is that the reduction of inflation in the last year or two has really been brought about on the backs of farmers. This has been because of cheaper food. However, that will not keep the farmer of Canada or the United States in business. If and when they go out of business, the chickens will come home to roost and the trouble will really begin. It has already started in the United States.

We do not need a lot of studies and bringing of people together in order to have a food strategy in Canada. We need to dust off some of the old studies and put them into use. We need policies which will do something as far as farm communities and food production in Canada are concerned. We always hear from this government that we need to become self-sufficient in food production. That will never happen with the type of policies the government has. It is time they brought in a policy that will accomplish that.

I wish to speak for a few moments on problems in my constituency with regard to CBC television. I refer in particular to that portion of my riding which extends 250 miles along the United States border. It receives very little, if any, help from CBC television. An accelerated program has been announced. As far as I am concerned, it means the CBC should be going into that area to ensure that the 15,000 people living there receive CBC television without having to pay for it.

There was an application for a French television station in another part of my constituency. It was approved on the basis that there were 500 people who should get this type of reception. This was done under the accelerated program, totally ignoring the obligation to ensure that people in the other areas to which I have referred receive television reception free of charge, like everyone else in Canada. I agree that the people in the area do get television reception; however, it has been necessary to form co-ops—private individuals who put repeater stations in the mountains. It is a costly process and it does not always work. It is not the government who pays for that; it is the people of that area. It is not like in my home town of Kelowna, Toronto or Montreal, where it does not cost anything to see CBC television.

I made an intervention in the CRTC hearing in Vancouver against having a French television station in the Okanagan before providing service to those in the Boundary country. I was not too popular as a result of that intervention. However, I felt the CRTC should know about it and understand what has to be done. In committee hearings here in Ottawa I talked with the president of the CBC about this matter. I told him they had an obligation to the people of that area, and not just on a piecemeal basis in order to soothe somebody's complaint.

While being questioned by the chairman of the CRTC, he read the Broadcasting Act to me. At that time he seemed to begin to understand what it really meant. When he had finished he asked what I thought it meant. I said that as far as I was concerned, it meant providing service to these people. The decision they handed down was to put in French television. I fully expected that would happen. However, they also said:

> In this regard, the commission notes that the corporation's discussions with the government with a view to taking positive action to deal with this matter are now well under way.

However, very little has been done. Every once in a while they send in technicians to talk to people there. They really are not doing the job that should be done under the accelerated program. I have a letter here from the people of Rock Creek, British Columbia. Nothing is being done for them. The letter lists the names of 571 people living within a five-mile radius of that community. Instead of looking after these people, the government rushes in to supply costly French television service for a far smaller group of people in another part of my constituency.

Another area about which very little has been said is transportation. Very little has been done by this government in that area. I am very concerned about railway line abandonment. The CPR has abandoned the old Kettle Valley rail line. They have applied to the CTC to have it abandoned in its entirety. I went through the motions of finding out what happens to rights of way when rail lines are abandoned. I found that they revert back to the railway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne, as we all know, included a commitment to principles which I, as Solicitor General, strongly share. Of more interest to me is the goal of enhancing the rights and freedoms of Canadians through adherence to the principle of open government. This objective has, of course, very direct relevance to all of the agencies for which I report to parliament, but in particular to the RCMP security service.

Since the establishment of the royal commission of inquiry under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice McDonald, a high degree of public interest has been evidenced concerning the role of the security service. I want to avail myself of the opportunity provided by the debate in response to the Speech from the Throne to review some developments that have occurred since the establishment of the royal commission earlier this year. But first I would like to review the mandate of the security service and its role in Canada today.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the Great War, the RCMP, in its capacity as federal police corps, has been the main body responsible for security investigations and operations. Under section 18 of the act enacted in 1959, it is the duty of RCMP officers to carry out all responsibilities entrusted to crime prevention officers as far as violations of the Canadian law and of the law of any province where they may be employed are concerned. Indeed, in addition to the functions and responsibilities defined in the RCMP Act, the force has a duty under its governing regulations to create and operate the intelligence and security services that may be required by the minister.

So the mandate of the RCMP's security service must be put back in the context not only of the duties of every police officer, but and mainly of those described in the various instructions and directives issued from time to time by the minister or the government concerning the investigations to be held in matters of national security. So the security service deals with security as a whole, as well as intelligence matters and relevant police operations. Furthermore, it maintains and scrutinizes files, performs personnel investigations, advises the various departments on security matters, stores files and performs certain other functions related to the management and planning of national security operations.

This has been clearly and publicly stated in the report published in 1969 by the MacKenzie, Coldwell and Pratte Commission. It should be remembered that the first and almost sole threat to international and national security, after World War II, during the cold war through the following period has been perceived and described in ideological terms. At that time the opponent was easy to identify. For that reason, there has been a consensus among government circles and the majority of Canadians on the desirability of and need for internal security operations. The Gouzenko case also brought forward in the public's minds the requirements of security with our own country. My predecessor and myself have reviewed from time to time the operations of the security service.

These revisions were suggested by a changing Canadian and world environment that lead government authorities to bring security operations into line with current realities, with inside and outside influences that had an impact on Canada's security and national integrity.

To illustrate the process we have gone through, Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that only 20 years ago terrorism, sabotage, kidnappings and political murders were not a current occurrence in the world. In 1963 we went through our first wave of terrorist activities in contemporary Canadian history, marked with bombing incidents, hold-ups, thefts, property damage, bodily injuries and murders that culminated in the sombre hours of the October 1970 crisis.

[English]

Terrorism, be it national or international, as hon. members are well aware, has become one of the most critical problems of this decade. The toll it has exacted, both in human suffering and destruction of public and private property, has been enormous. These, however, are not the only costs. This phenomenon of politically motivated violence has forced almost all governments to adopt measures, be they security measures at airports or domestic security surveillance programs, which lessen the over-all freedom of us all. It would be both irresponsible and unrealistic to assume that Canada is immune from such threats.

As early as 1966 it was recognized by the government that greater attention would have to be given by the security service to ascertaining and assessing the nature and the extent of the separatist threat in Canada, with a view to identifying those individuals, groups and organizations whose real or apparent purpose and objective was to subvert or destroy, by force, by violence or by threats of force or violence, Canada as a united country under confederation.

Nonetheless, when the October crisis of 1970 struck, there was an immediate realization that information on groups responsible for the crisis had been wholly inadequate. It was not clear which specific groups involved in the separatist movement were advocating or resorting to the use of violence or the commission of criminal acts, including murder, to accomplish the changes they sought. It was difficult to determine at that time precisely which groups were conducting themselves in accordance with the law and the principles of democratic action. In response to the gaps that were recognized as existing in October, 1970, the security service realigned its operational activity to obtain intelligence on groups and organizations that had been identified as supporting the separatist cause.

Set against this change in focus was a recognition that very careful consideration would have to be given to the mandate of the security service. The protection of political and legal rights of individuals and groups was of prime concern to the government and to the security service itself, especially when its attention started to focus on a national problem.

One of the first steps in the formulation of new guidelines for the security service of the RCMP has been the adoption by Parliament in 1974 of a new definition of the expression "subversive activities" that is to be found today in the Protection of Privacy Act which amended certain aspects of the Official Secrets Act. It was then decided that this definition constituted a solid starting ground from which the role of a good security service could be defined more precisely.

On March 27, 1975, the cabinet defined the mandate of the security service of the RCMP and authorized it to maintain internal security, namely to discover, monitor, discourage, prevent and thwart the activities of certain individuals or certain groups in Canada and carry out investigations about them when there are reasonable or likely grounds to believe that they are carrying out or do intend to carry out spying or sabotage action, activities aiming at gathering information on Canada for the benefit of a foreign power, activities aiming at a change of government in Canada or elsewhere through the use of force, violence or any other criminal action, activities undertaken by a foreign power and related to a real or possible attack against Canada or other hostile actions against our country, activities of a foreign or national group trying to perpetrate acts of terrorism in Canada or directed against this country, the use and encouragement of the use of force or violence or any other criminal means, the provocation or the exploitation of civil disturbances in order to take part in any of the above-mentioned activities. This mandate still continues to exist.

The government is constantly preoccupied by the issue of individual rights and liberties and by the balance that must be preserved between these imperatives and the interests of the state. As far as political adherence is concerned, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated the position of the government in the Commons in 1976 when he indicated clearly that a legally constituted political party should not be systematically monitored by the RCMP. On May 27, 1976, the cabinet studied which procedures should be followed to come to a decision regarding the employment of individuals likely to occupy vital positions in the civil service. The cabinet concluded that if information on the occupant of a strategic position or a candidate for that position in the civil service was available and that they gave reason to believe that the said individual was a separatist or a sympathizer of the Parti Québécois, this information was deemed to be pertinent as far as national security was concerned and it should be brought up to the attention of the authorities concerned. The cabinet also concluded that those authorities would determine the significance of such information, taking into consideration all the relevant data such as the source, the prima facie authenticity of the information and the strategic nature of the position involved. That decision is also still being applied.

Also in the spring of 1976, the government was informed for the first time of the facts surrounding the illegal break-in and theft of documents on the premises of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec in Montreal. Since it was believed then that it was an isolated incident, no inquiry commission was appointed. In the summer of 1977, however, new allegations of illegal acts were made.

[English]

After having made inquiries into these allegations at the insistence of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Friesen: Blush, Francis, blush.

Mr. Fox: —the commissioner of the RCMP advised that he believed that, in the circumstances, it would be in the best interests of the RCMP that a commission of inquiry be set up to look into the operations and policies of the security service on a national basis. The government agreed that public support of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada is dependent on trust in the policies and procedures governing its activities, and that the maintenance of that trust required that a full investigation be made into the extent and prevalence of investigative practices that are not authorized or provided for by law. Commissioners, under part I of the Inquiries Act, were appointed with very wide terms of reference and very extensive powers of inquiry.

In spite of the initiative taken by the government, we are committed, as we have repeatedly stated in this House, to inform the commissioners, as well as any person entrusted with the administration of justice in Canada, of any facts or evidence related to the alleged breach of Canadian laws. Under that commitment, I have already referred two incidents to the federal inquiry commission and to the attorney general of the province of Quebec.

Today also I have reported to the authorities the alleged offences committed in 1973 and involving property belonging to the Parti Québécois. It appears that those allegations deal with the break-in into premises in Montreal, on January 9, 1973, where computer tapes listing members of the Parti Québécois as well as financial information were being kept. That operation was apparently authorized by senior officers of the security service. The information obtained in the course of that break-in were destroyed in the spring of 1975, after a new policy was implemented following the cabinet decision to which I referred.

The action taken in 1973 actually raises the very serious problem into which Parliament should be called to look. It is the dilemma, Mr. Speaker, facing any government or security service in the performance of their respective duties related to the security of our country under the present circumstances. The Royal Commission on Security identified that dilemma in its report published in 1969. The commissioners then stated: A security service is unavoidably involved in activities which run counter to the spirit, if not to the letter of the law, and in illegal or other activities which may seem to infringe upon individual rights.

[English]

It will be noted that the royal commission did not say that a security service must never be involved in any actions "that may contravene the spirit if not the letter of the law". It would have been easy for the royal commission to say that. The commissioners did not say it because they recognized the reality of the dilemma. We want effective protection of our national security. We also want respect for the law and respect for individual rights. But these desires—both legitimate—may be in conflict at times. At precisely what point should a security service refrain from taking action that it thinks important to meet its responsibility for national security in order to avoid any possibility of contravention of even the letter of the law? It is of very little help to transpose the dilemma to the level of ministers or government; the basic question remains the same.

It is because of this dilemma that I ask the House and the people of Canada not to be overly hasty in judgment of this case. The action was taken on the authority of officers whose motives were of the highest order and beyond any doubt. It was authorized and carried out in the absolute conviction that its sole object was to promote the security of Canada given the political and social climate prevailing in 1973.

None the less, it is a matter that I felt I must bring to the attention of parliament and of the appropriate authorities as soon as information was received concerning it. But I do so in the hope that it will be considered in the context of the circumstances of five years ago and in the light of the dilemma to which I have referred. It is my profound hope, Mr. Speaker, that the royal commission of inquiry under Mr. Justice McDonald will, in its report, be able to assist the government and parliament in deciding, as precisely as possible, the type of legislative framework that must be given in future to those who are charged with maintaining our national security.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I asked the minister, prior to his rising to his feet, whether there was anything in what he was about to say, knowing that he was on the speakers' list, that ought to have been included in a statement on motions, so that members of this House would today have the opportunity to question him in accordance with our Standing Orders. But he said nothing. He sat there and said nothing. This, sir, is the second violation of the spirit and intent of the Standing Orders of this House. We laboured long and hard in the procedure and organization committee to bring to fruition some procedure for dealing with statements on motions, so that matters such as this, matters which the government says have just come to its attention but which occurred in—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I should like to ask the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), whether this is a point of order or a speech.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was recognized by the Chair to make a speech and I am now entering into the debate. I was saying, matters which had just come to its attention—

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to know if the hon. member has had the opportunity to take part in this debate and if he spoke for 30 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is a legitimate question. I did take part in the debate on the amendment. We are now on the main motion, so I do have the right to speak.

Mr. Friesen: I hope you are as careful about the rules with the RCMP.

Mr. Lefebvre: He is using his position to speak twice.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Lefebvre: Then why didn't you say so?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why didn't you ask? You have been here long enough.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order.

Under Standing Order 32(7), no member, except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, shall speak for more than 30 minutes at a time in the said debate; provided that 40 minutes shall be allowed to the mover of either an amendment or of a subamendment. My understanding of this provision of the Standing Orders is that, be it an amendment, a subamendment or a motion, a member is not entitled to speak for more than 30 minutes in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Since the hon. member admitted, as a reply to my question, that he had actually spoken for 30 minutes, I respectfully submit that his time has expired, that what he actually intends to do today is only to raise a question of procedure, that he can do so on a point of order and that we will have the opportunity to discuss and possibly to disprove his arguments; and, finally, he is not entitled to take part twice in this debate, to the prejudice of others members' rights.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. According to our records, all the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton did was to second the motion of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) on Monday. So according to our records he has not spoken. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has the floor.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the minute remaining to me, the very important point to make, aside from hon. members opposite making a travesty of the rules, is the concerted attempt by this government, as it has before, to pass off on to the RCMP what is basically its responsibility to know. I am in no way defending any illegal act, neither am I defending the impropriety of this minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair till two o'clock p.m. later this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

• (1402)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just before the luncheon adjournment, when your colleague was in the chair, I was indicating my displeasure about the method the government chose to make the startling and astounding announcement that we have yet another break-in, apparently illegal, by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The announcement he would make was well known to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). In fact, it was so well known that he was not present today during the question period so that no questions could be asked of him, and he chose not to rise at the first opportunity he had, namely, during motions, before orders of the day were called. Instead, he made the announcement in the course of his speech in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is quite legal, of course—slick politics, but quite legal—to smuggle in such an announcement during a speech in a debate, and thus deny members of parliament the right to deal with economic matters or other matters, rather than on motions when we would have the right and the power to question the minister.

• (1412)

What really concerns me, aside from what the minister said in the House today, is what he said when he went downstairs to the television room. What he asked us to believe is that certain high officials somewhere—there is some question as to where they were—took the view that it was the law of this country, that it was quite appropriate and legal, for a police force or a group of policemen to break into premises, remove the incriminating evidence or whatever they were looking for, make photocopies of it, and then put the original material back in place. This is supposed to be the law of the country.

Mr. Gillies: Watergate!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Richard Nixon believed the same thing and defended it until it caught up with him. I suspect that if this is the kind of conduct that is being defended by the Solicitor General, then he is not fit to occupy that post.

The other side of the question that is beginning to worry me even more is how much this government really knows, how true it is that they can honestly slough off this responsibility completely on to the RCMP. Is there a responsibility somewhere in the parliamentary law in this country, and indeed in any parliamentary jurisdiction, for a minister to have some responsibility for those who come under his jurisdiction? Can he honestly say that so-and-so acted illegally, but that the minister is not responsible? In that sense he has forfeited, I think, the credibility that he has as the Solicitor General, but, more important, as a minister of the Crown. Is there any Canadian anywhere, except perhaps in the House where we are bound to accept the statements by ministers, who believes that in a city like Ottawa, where the public service, national agencies such as the RCMP, cabinet ministers and the business community are always intercommunicating, there was no knowledge in the upper levels of government? I do not believe that there was no knowledge, although I must accept the minister's statement because that is our parliamentary practice.

There is a suspicion abroad that the government of Canada, by limiting the jurisdiction of the McDonald inquiry into the RCMP in such a way that it can only be directed to the RCMP and not into the question of the responsibility and the knowledge that government ministers had, was effecting the first steps of the cover-up of what is now coming out in dribs and drabs before the Canadian people, because this is the third instance. When will we hear about the fourth, the fifth and the sixth instance, and what kind of mentality is there in this government that they should believe the people of Canada would call that kind of conduct defensible? I suggest that they misread the people of this country in terms of civil rights and the operation of law.

Who else is being investigated and has been investigated by the RCMP under the responsibility of the Solicitor General of Canada? Is it the NDP that they have investigated; is it the Progressive Conservative Party that they have investigated; is it some other agency that their paranoia has caused them to investigate?

The other question I have is how much knowledge, in this case, did the security and analysis group, which is right in the Solicitor General's office, have with respect to the matter that the RCMP was involved in; and if they did not have any knowledge, they had better come forward and say so, because there is no one here who will accept that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There is no one anywhere who will believe the tripe that we have heard coming from the mouth of the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), the solicitor general previous to him, now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), and the present Solicitor General who had to stand up and make that abject speech in the House today. There is no one who would believe that they could be so incompetent as not to know; and even if they were so incompetent, then they should not hold that office. We have just removed the lid on Pandora's box of security, snooping, bugging and illegality in this country, and we serve notice on the government right now that we do not intend to let this matter rest until it is all hung out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a brief question? In view of what he is now saying, would he not agree that the McDonald inquiry should now be out in the open?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thank the hon. member, because he has anticipated what I was going to say with respect to the McDonald inquiry. I have just had put in my hands a copy of Hansard of June 22, 1977, when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked that the Chief Justice of Canada be empowered to appoint a judicial inquiry, and that the judicial inquiry be empowered not only to act within the terms of reference of the present McDonald inquiry, but to investigate the question of the legal and moral responsibility and the liability of this government in terms of the operations of the Department of the Solicitor General and the RCMP. What was asked? We asked the simple question. It is not known. The preamble to that question was the same preamble that was used for the Dorion inquiry which the force of public opinion finally drove into a public, open inquiry although the supporters of the government that day said no.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, that inquiry should be public. There is no way it can be kept secret now, and no justification for it. When it comes about that a federal government agency investigates a political party, then surely if we are a democracy and if we preach and practise openness in government, then openness in investigation in those circumstances is the only proper, honourable and moral course to take. The self-serving statement of the Solicitor General, on page 8 of the text, says:

After having made inquiries into these allegations at the insistence of the government the commissioner of the RCMP advised—

Does the Solicitor General not recall the questions which were put to him in the House of Commons day after day by the opposition parties? Does he not recall being asked and pushed by the opposition in this House for the kind of inquiry we wanted and called for on June 22—a full, open, public and broad inquiry—not only into the RCMP but also into the responsibility of the minister and his colleagues? Does he not recall that?

I am sure the Canadian public recalls it. I am sure it occupied enough of the front pages of the metropolitan newspapers in this country that the Canadian public is not so selectively amnesiatic as the Solicitor General. Nobody believes the Solicitor General when he says it was at the insistence of the government. It was at the insistence of the members of this House who occupy the opposition benches.

Mr. Fox: It refers to the allegations that came in after the first statement.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister had his chance to make a speech. He made his speech and he is now hung with it. When the history of this time is written—

Mr. Fox: You don't know what you are talking about, again.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and the minister reads Hansard, he will find that the only reason we got this paltry investigation was that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and other parties in the House of Commons insisted that it come about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Once again the hon. member is distorting the facts because he has no knowledge of the facts. Perhaps that is not his fault, but if he is really interested in the truth and in what happened after my initial statement in the House in the month of June, a number of allegations were brought to my attention, and I asked—and the government asked—the Commissioner of the RCMP to investigate those allegations. That is what the statement the hon. member just quoted refers to. Once again the hon. member is trying to distort the facts, which he cannot do because he does not know the facts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say that this is a point of disagreement and the Chair cannot intervene.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is hardly a point of order, Mr. Speaker; there is no way in which it could be construed as a point of order. The class of 1972 will have been here five years on October 30, 1977, and one thing I have learned since coming to this House is that when you are getting very close to the mark, some minister or some hon. member opposite always rises on a point of order. That is what we have just seen. They try to interrupt the proceedings.

The facts of this case are becoming horribly open now. The questions are now becoming open because this minister—

Mr. Fox: Has told the truth.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —for the third time has been forced to tell the truth. I would wager that if the first two incidents were not about to be uncovered next week at the McDonald inquiry, the minister would not have come forward on this occasion, because he did not come forward on other occasions until he was pressed by members of this House to do so.

Mr. Fox: You know that is not true.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are very few Canadians, except the most abject apologists for this government, who will not say that the hallmark of the Trudeau government is secrecy; the hallmark of the Trudeau government is to obscure the facts.

An hon. Member: That is one of their proudest achievements.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If anyone wants proof of that, he should take a look at the green paper on freedom of information. I thought the government had opened a new door, and I was about to put my foot in it just before it was slammed shut in terms of information. How many orders in council do we have now? That is the hallmark of this government. The practice has now come into effect, as far as legislation is concerned, to do things which used to be done legislatively by order in council behind closed doors.

The practice has been to deal with cartels. The uranium cartel is an excellent example. The practice of the government is not to tell anybody what it is doing. The government knows it can do things publicly if it wants to be honest with parliament and come to parliament and tell us what is happening, but it does not do that. As far as the government is concerned, parliament and the people of this country do not matter any more. The government feels it need come clean only when pushed, and on every occasion when this Solicitor General came clean he had to be pushed day after day in the question period. Those are the facts. The record will prove that, and the Solicitor General knows it.

There is some action this government can take, and I challenge it to take it. I challenge the government to broaden the terms of reference of the inquiry to the extent suggested in the motion under Standing Order 43 proposed by the Leader of the Opposition on June 22, 1977. That will get at the question of ministerial responsibility. That will get at the truth of who in Ottawa knew. We will find out then what part the security analysis group played. We will get beyond the investigation of the security service of the RCMP and into the criminal investigation branch and the part that the Solicitor General and his colleagues played.

Mr. Fox: Read the terms of reference.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister says I should look at the terms of reference. I have looked at them, and that is precisely why I raise the question I do. We will also find out who among the minister's cabinet colleagues knew. We have to accept what they say here on the floor of the House of Commons—

Mr. Gillies: We don't have to believe it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —but the Canadian people are not bound by our archaic rules; they can make up their own minds.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): They will.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The acting government whip says they will make up their own minds. He is absolutely right; they will. They are going to say, just as I have said, that never in the history of this country has there been a government more prone to cover up. Never in the history of this country has there been a government more ridden with scandal than this government. Never in the history of this country has there been a greater attempt to do indirectly what the government could not do directly under the law of this country. Never has there been a government in Canada which has tried to make more paltry excuses for the improper acts of its officials than has this government. And never has a government been more prone, when finally caught with its hand in the cookie jar, to blame its public servants.

That is what the people of this country are going to say. They are going to think of Larry Stopforth, Walter Rudnicki, and many other public servants who have been bound, gagged and forced to bear the burden of the ineptitude of this government by being fired from their jobs when they were just trying to do their jobs. This government has always tried to place the blame somewhere else. Well, it is not going to succeed. The RCMP, any police force, any member of parliament, public servant or member of the bench in this country is no different before the law than anyone else. No one can condone illegal behaviour, but neither is a government allowed to hide behind ministerial responsibility to cover its tracks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I just want to tell the hon. member that his time has expired, although I did allow him three minutes extra on account of the interventions.

Mr. Oberle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) allowed himself to participate in the speech of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) to a large extent, I wonder if he would accept a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This can only be allowed with the unanimous consent of the House. Besides, the minister does not have the floor so there is no way he can answer a question. The question should have been put when he was speaking. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, the minister was intervening throughout the speech of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, so perhaps he would not mind answering a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can speak to the minister outside the House. The minister is not entitled to speak twice in the debate, and he has used up his time. The hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue the matter under discussion, because I think it will be with us for many days and it is not going to bring any great repute to the people involved. I have been interested in the subject for a long time, because I think our police force has been used in ways it should not be used. I remember the RCMP sitting in front of my house for days, so I am interested in the problem.

There is a more practical and much broader problem that affects the people in my part of the country today, however, than whether they are under surveillance by the RCMP. Most people would let them in the house if they asked, but that would take all the fun out of snooping so they probably would not accept the invitation. In Canada today we are faced with unemployment and an economic situation very similar to that of the depression in the 1930s. I hope that we of this generation have more guts than our fathers had.

An hon. Member: I doubt it.

Mr. Peters: Maybe we do not, but I hope we have and I hope the young people of today will have more guts than their fathers. It seems to me we have a very intelligent, highly educated, highly sophisticated society. If we can allow 1½ million people, out of a labour force of 6½ million, to be unemployed and not do something about it, I think we have failed that society and it will drift into the Ten Lost Years as our parents drifted into the decade of the thirties. Surely that will not happen; surely something will be done about it.

The government talks about buying armaments and sophisticated weapons. The minister mentioned a weapon commonly known as the neutron bomb that apparently does not destroy property but only kills people. It seems to me we are more barbaric than our ancestors away back in the time of the cavemen. We have to do something about it, rather than wait for the obvious solution that is already on the horizon: I mean war. There will be another Hitler or the equivalent, whether in Israel, Rhodesia or South Africa, and that will bring an end to unemployment for Canadians and most of the people of the world. Of course, most people will be dead anyway and civilization will be set right back.

Unless governments, industry and all people co-operate to see that employment is provided, there will be a serious rending of the fabric of the nation, and very rapidly too. INCO has indicated that 3,000 people will be laid off in Sudbury, 700 at Thompson and 1,200 at Port Colborne. One of the mines in my area, the Langmuir joint venture—a joint venture of INCO and Noranda—has announced that operations will cease early next spring and 115 to 120 employees will be laid off. Mr. Speaker, it may be all very well to lay off 2,000 or 5,000 people in Montreal, and it may be all right to lay off 5,000 or 10,000 in Toronto or some other city, but any lay-off is a disaster in a small community that is based on one industry.

While I was home during the recess I received four telephone calls. One was from Timmins, inquiring if I could provide any assistance in bringing a nanny out from England. Apparently the wife had left home and the husband was finding it very difficult to cope with two small children. The same day I had three calls from my own area, and in each case the husband had walked out on the wife. These were all young couples with two or three children. I made the facetious remark to the people who handle social and family services that we should look over the files and try to match the deserted husband with one of the deserted wives and somehow put them all together and thus solve the problem for both parties. I was told that could not be done as they were all young people and the neighbours might talk. Maybe that is true, and I certainly do not want to act as an Ann Landers in matching them up. Mr. Speaker, this just indicates the disasters that take place immediately upon unemployment.

It has been suggested that some of the people being laid off might find work in Timmins. The Texasgulf operation there has already dispensed with most of its contract workers, however, and has announced on a number of occasions that it will not lay off workers. That is true so far, but recently statements from the company are to the effect that they hope they will not have to lay off people in Timmins. Mr. Speaker, there will obviously be lay-offs because the price of zinc is down. There will be lay-offs, too, in the Noranda area where there is a branch of the McIntyre mine whose main production is copper. The price of gold fell, so there is little exploration in that field, and until that happens they will have to depend on the copper operation alone. That will mean lay-offs.

Being laid off today is not like it was years ago when you may have had a father or grandfather, or even an uncle who lived on the farm. If you were laid off, you could go home and stay on the farm. That is no longer possible. In this country we are very proud that people own their dwellings—they and the finance company, and mostly the finance company. They have an interest in the house they live in and bought from their savings. Even if 10 per cent of their pay cheque were put into savings, clear of the mortgage payment on the car, on the house, furniture and everything else, it would only last one or two months. They may be fairly highly paid—they are certainly highly paid in Sudbury—but that is a very high cost area in which to live. If these people are laid off there will be a disaster within two or three months.

A husband looks for jobs that do not exist. He takes a trip to the city, but finds that because of a disability or lack of education he is not entitled to a job in the secondary industry. He finds he does not have a saleable commodity in the other mining communities because there are no job openings there. When this man returns home, obviously there is great difficulty. It often results in someone walking out, and a broken home. In the end, the municipality and the country have to make the contribution that should be made by the company or the industry in which he was employed. Instead, he is supported mainly by those who are still employed.

Northern communities such as Sudbury, Timmins, Noranda and Kirkland Lake are one-industry communities, whether the mining industry or the forest industry. They have been built by the workers in the industry, not the companies. It is interesting to note than when McIntyre mines left the mining field in Timmins, they gave to the city, for $1 or a small amount, the McIntyre arena. That was all they gave to the community after having taken out millions and millions of dollars. Hollinger left a ballpark that is now mostly a private golf course. They left Timmins with 800 or 900 houses which soon had to be replaced. The workers built the towns. They carried the tax load and were responsible for the community. A worker spends his lifetime developing a community for an industry. These are the kinds of industries we are allowing to go by the board.

The government can do something about this. Gold, for example, is a useless commodity. We have been told this over the years. For 25 years we subsidized the gold mines because the communities were totally dependent on them. They were maintained in the poorest possible condition. As little as possible was paid for the gold. The government subsidized the difference between the cost of production and the value of the gold. If the government had had enough sense to put it into our treasury instead of the United States treasury, we would have got our investment back tenfold. Gold went from $35 an ounce to close to $200. If we stockpile it today, it will probably go to $200 or more.

With regard to uranium, there was a cartel and the price was raised. However, that is not the answer. There is a world shortage of uranium. Only four countries have any sizeable amounts of uranium. We only stockpiled it against the day when there would be a need for it in the energy field. The same is true of nickel. Everyone says you can get all the nickel you want from the ocean. That has not been proven. The price will have to go considerably higher before it will be mined efficiently from the sea-bed, from salt water. If we stockpile nickel, it will only be against the day we sell it. That is also true of silver, zinc and other commodities. Everyone knows there is a world shortage of natural resources. We have used as much in the past ten years as in the history of the world. It will be the same story in the next ten years. Use of these raw materials is rapidly escalating.

We have not paid enough attention to what will be the result of unemployment. Possibly we will have a war. By killing off all the young people and throwing away our inventory of resources, the problem will be solved. However, a certain number of people in Canada, and I hope it is a larger number than the government seems to think, believe we can solve this problem without much difficulty. In trying to solve our problems we should look to other countries, such as Japan. On many occasions I listened to the former minister of industry, trade and commerce, Hon. Jean-Luc Pépin. For a long time he tried to interest the government in setting up a government trading agency to gather together Canadian production and sell it in an organized fashion. Rather than being sold for money, it could have been sold for goods and services from other countries under a similar type of arrangement.

I do not know what type of blackmail the government used on Mr. Pepin. He left this place by the same process by which most of us leave. In my opinion, he was well on his way to becoming a multimillionaire. He was starting to put into effect ideas which he had been recommending to the government. I am not sure how they ever got him into the two silly positions he has since occupied. He may have done more for Canada if he had established a trading industry which could have been extended nationally because we are not able to trade with other countries. This country is bankrupt. We are borrowing from banks to which we had always loaned money, so that our currency does not collapse. This is true throughout the world. We will not be able to sell for cash; we will have to sell on the basis of getting the most we can in return for what we sell.

There are other solutions. I was interested in one of them. Today, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) cried about being misquoted and somebody picking on him. He has very highly paid civil servants who advise him. I suggest that hon. members read Doug Fisher's column "Mandarins prosper under Trudeau". Ten years ago there were three people earning over $30,000 a year, and he named the three. In the last return, which was made over two years ago, there were 4,522 people earning in excess of $30,000. I am sure there are now well over 5,000 in that category. The original three jobs are now paying $50,000, $60,000 and $70,000 a year.

There is no hardship here. The only hardship here in Ottawa is whether you speak French or English. If you are bilingual, you are fortunate and can be hired. If you are unilingual, you will not be hired. This is a wealthy community because of the wages that are paid. According to advice we receive, the program is not working.

I mentioned the Solicitor General. Whoever gave him information previously, lied. He had to come to the House and correct that information two or three times. He should fire the head of the RCMP. In my opinion, if we fired the top three echelons in the civil service, everyone would get out and scratch. It seems to me there is not enough scratching. In Sudbury, people realize the difficulties we are in. They know the difficulties because they are part of them. The mandarins in Ottawa are not part of anything except of rug-ranking arrangements—who has the biggest rug, the largest number of secretaries, and so on.

I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) telling us we have to quit living so high off the hog. If he believes that, I will expect to see the automatic retirement of the three top levels of the civil service. It does not mean that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) must have the social equivalent of any other minister when he goes to a cocktail party. That is not important. He got on very well before with one deputy minister, Mr. Williams. You could ask that deputy minister anything and there was nothing he did not know. Now he is to be replaced by—how many people? Is it 25? I its 30? They are all getting roughly in the range of what Mr. Williams was getting.

Unemployment is a disaster for the government, for the individual and for the community. It is particularly disastrous for the mining industry and the forest-oriented industries where every decline in the market is immediately reflected at every level in the community concerned. The community lives or dies on the strength of the market for the products produced in the area. It is absolutely essential that if it is really interested in the future of these communities, the government diversify their economy.

I was shocked to hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) say today that the commodity which was being used in the Sherritt Gordon Mines could not be produced in Canada and that it was, therefore, all right to bring it in. In the end, what are we interested in? We are interested in ingots of nickel, and it seems to me that these can be produced here, with any additive which is necessary. The government will not be able to collect taxes from unemployed people. It does not seem to me that the government is much interested in taking an initiative by way of innovative steps designed to get people back to work, particularly in the resource-based industries.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and say a few words in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, given the fact that the opening of the session this year was most interesting and followed by all Canadians as it was done by Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth.

Like many of my colleagues, I would like to congratulate the movers of the Address in reply and emphasize again the excellency of the speeches made by these two members, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). It is hard to believe that the hon. member for Malpeque, a young member who has joined us following a by-election, has been elected as a member of the Liberal party which I also represent. The constituents of the riding of Malpeque, as you know, traditionally used to choose Conservative members as their representatives in Ottawa but when you see what ability the new member for Malpeque has shown in delivering his speech to this House, it is easy to understand why his constituents have made such a choice.

I want to take this opportunity to say a few words about the television and broadcasting of our debates. I am very pleased to see that we have finally begun recording our proceedings on tape, which will provide a kind of electronic Hansard which can be used by generations to come. Since we are able to produce those programs, I really wish we would take as soon as possible some steps to broadcast in a more comprehensive way those programs which are recorded here in this House and make them available to all Canadians.

In Canada, we are lucky enough to have a very extensive communication network, high quality facilities such as our communication satellite which is flying over us and which would enable us to broadcast our proceedings in every Canadian household. Several methods including the use of cablevision are available to us.

We know that more than half of Canadians now have cablevision which would provide an easy and cheap way of bringing the debates of the House of the Commons into the homes of the taxpayers. I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the rather sharp attacks that were made on the government by the opposition during the debate on the address in reply and more particularly on two points. The opposition savagely attacked the government on the economic situation and also blamed it for its way of dealing with the problems of national unity.

First of all on the economic aspect, I find that a bit too often the opposition tries to build political capital on the economic situation. We all know it and the opposition is fully aware of the world economic situation. Opposition parties made up of members with an intelligence that is at least average, I hope, are in a position to understand fully and know that Canada is still one of the countries doing the best among all industrialized countries of the world in face of the international economic difficulties.

A recent report released by the OECD indicated that Canada still ranks second or third, depending on the sector that was being considered, with the best economic performance.

Obviously, the rate of unemployment has gone up in Canada. However it is certainly not by taking refuge behind irresponsibility and blaming the government for everything that opposition parties in this House will help us solve the problems we face. I, for one, say that the government has always refused to take the easy way out. On the contrary, for years we have been telling people that what we need in this country is more efficient work by everyone, that every citizen must do his share and increase his productivity.

We say and repeat that Canadians, and a great number of them, are living beyond their means and this is causing difficulties in the economy. It is not easy for a government to tell the people such naked truths, and yet we have done just that on several occasions. Not only do we talk, we also act.

We know—and the Minister of Finance said so during the debate on the Speech from the Throne—that over one billion dollars will be spent this year on projects aimed at reducing unemployment in Canada. In particular $450 million will be allocated to direct job creation programs, and almost $590 million on manpower retraining and mobility programs to help jobless workers solve their personal unemployment problems.

Moreover, the Minister of Finance has announced that an additional $150 million will be spent on labour intensive projects in those areas in Canada where the unemployment rate is the highest. As I said earlier, we are acting and we are not afraid to face any problem no matter what.

I would like to raise another point which I think is worthy of mention. During this debate, we have been blamed for our attitude to national unity. Several hon. members stated over and over again that this federal government would become the champion of centralization and near dictatorship. I think this is a lot of hogwash. On the contrary, we are now in a situation where government expenses are more decentralized than ever before.

As we all know, the constitution has never been amended in great depth So that the areas of provincial and federal jurisdictions have not been clearly set out over the years. But in one respect those areas of jurisdiction have been changed insofar as there has been a decentralization of the power to spend money. I would just like to read from the speech Senator Lamontagne delivered at a meeting held at the University of Montreal on April 6 last, and I quote:

> In 1870, direct federal expenditures for goods and services amounted to 52 per cent of total government expenditures—

—in Canada. That is of federal, provincial and municipal governments.

> —in 1926, this figure was only 26 per cent. In 1950, it went back to 48 per cent and went down again to 25 per cent in 1975. We have therefore returned to practically the same situation as in 1926, which was the period of highest decentralization in Canada.

I am still quoting Senator Lamontagne:

> However, in 1926, federal government subsidies to provinces and municipalities represented only around 3 per cent of their total expenditures. This proportion rose to 5 per cent in 1950 and to near 30 per cent in 1975. This trend has strengthened the movement of decentralization.

It can easily be understood from those figures that the federal government, we know, is increasingly yielding funds and spending powers to the provinces. I repeat, today's federal government spends only 25 per cent of all expenditures in Canada by the various governments put together. This tendency is becoming more marked.

Regarding the national unity issue, I would particularly like to answer a bitter attack made by the member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) against the government in which she tried to ridicule, in an untimely manner in my opinion, the suggestion of a national referendum made by the head of this government. Hansard for October 25, page 245, reports the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands as saying, and I quote:

> It would appear that the government may hold a referendun on national unity, and I stress the word "may" because, true to form, the Prime Minister declines to give any details of his proposed referendum. He equivocates. The referendum may or may not be held; it may or may not be held nationally; it may or may not be held only in Quebec.

And I now skip some parts of her address to arrive at a point when she mentioned:

> One has to ask oneself if this referendum-cum-plebiscite, or plebiscite-cum-referendum, is no more than a diversionary tactic designed to take the attention of the people of this country away from the government's inept handling of economic problems.

What I would like to have heard from the opposition regarding this projet of a referendum is what they really think about it. No, sir, once again they will be very careful not to tell us where they stand. However, it seems to me that it is by now clear that the government of Canada and Parliament should have at their disposal an instrument which would enable us to consult Canadians on an issue as important as national unity if the need arose. Otherwise, we leave it to the Parti Québécois to decide on everything, and to hold its own referendum, which means we are waiving our right to do the same and ask Canadians for their opinions on this matter. Certainly Canadians, especially in English speaking provinces would be quite anxious to express their views when the Parti Québécois offers them not only sovereignty out also economic association. I think hon. members will all agree that if they want an economic association with the rest of Canada, they had better consult them beforehand. So I sincerely hope that instead of sneering at such a serious proposal as this members of the opposition parties will support this measure when it comes up for discussion in this House, as it may give this Parliament an essential bargaining power.

What basically irks the opposition parties most is that they cannot make up a responsible team behind a responsible leader. There are frequent feuds in that party. Our cabinet is proud to have within its ranks the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), a highly competent member who left his party and joined us as he felt he would have a better opportunity to serve the Canadian people more efficiently.

Reference should also be made to the arrival of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) who left the other side for obvious reasons and joined the Liberals. It is also interesting, as an example of the disagreements among hon. members on the other side, to mention the trouble the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher) has been experiencing after being defeated in what appears to be a manipulated convention of his party. We should soon know more about this, because I am told the hon. member wants to expound his views and present his case at the forthcoming Progressive Conservative convention in the province of Quebec. It will be interesting to see the development of that matter which is nothing short of mysterious.

On the other hand, I submit that Canada is lucky to have a vigorous leader and strong leadership. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is one of our most respected leaders by the international community. The unfortunate thing is that no man is a prophet in his own country and when he returns here all kinds of charges are made against him.

Allow me now to deal with a more interesting matter, the development of the central area of Montreal. I would like to say first that the federal government should increasingly intervene in development and rationalization, especially in the development of the Montreal central area. Why do I say that the federal government should intervene when we know quite well that the development of a city comes under the jurisdiction of the city council and the provincial government which created the municipality? Because when we consider the situation, we easily realize that between 15 and 20 per cent of the urban land in the central area of Montreal belongs to or is under the control of the federal government.

It is therefore impossible to consider the restoration of the urban fabric of Montreal without recognizing the part the federal government must inevitably play in the process. In addition, it is as striking as it is regrettable, when one looks at a map of the downtown area of Montreal, to notice that about 40 per cent of the area is now vacant because the buildings which were there have been demolished or that space is being used as parking lots. I hope that there will be as soon as possible greater intervention by the federal government through its Urban Affairs department, in an effort to remedy that absolutely inconceivable situation where almost half the space in downtown Montreal is standing bare in an area where there is such an urgent and increasing need for housing.

To my mind, one of the things the federal government should watch closely is to limit the commercial zone to the core of Montreal. I feel that highrise buildings, in that part of Montreal, should not extend beyond the quadrilateral bound on the east side by St. Laurent and on the west side by Peel. That district is already studded with skyscrapers surrounded by numerous vacant lots. I am pleased to see more skyscrapers go up in that area, but I would regret it if the business district in the financial centre of Montreal were to extend way beyond that area and if apartment buildings which though old, could be restored, continued to be demolished. In short, why demolish when funds are available, to both promoters and owners in downtown Montreal, for the renovation of those units?

If I were asked what are my priorities, my main objectives for the development of the core of Montreal, I would summarize them in indicating the three following objectives which to my mind are pressing: First the Ville-Marie expressway which extends for almost one quarter of a mile, going downhill, in the vicinity of Vitre street has created a gap which must be filled and that incredible wound must be healed. That gaping void constitutes an almost impassable barrier between the residential part of Montreal and historic Old Montreal; that should be patched up without delay.

On the other hand, it seems essential to me that we continue to reinforce the cultural, economic and historical axis which is being developed, starting at Place des Arts, descending toward Place d'Armes. Those who know downtown Montreal are aware that south of Place des Arts is Place du Complexe Desjardins; further south, the federal government has undertaken to erect a number of buildings—Place Guy Favreau—scheduled to begin this fall and further south again is our famous sear, the Ville-Marie highway; right next to it is Old Montreal. Therefore it is essential that this axis be reinforced. In a minute I shall outline the various projects that would enable us to complete this axis which is extremely important for the development of downtown Montreal.

The other important and urgent objective is the vista on the river. We all know that the federal government owns the harbour facilities. As such, it can easily decide to move some harbour activities to Montreal's east end and tear down some grain elevators and thus open a vista on the river which would give Montrealers a very nice view. Those are projects, Mr. Speaker, which I will make every effort to "plug" in the coming months.

I would like to go back to the Place des Arts-Place d'Armes axis I mentioned earlier and it seems to me that in addition to the Guy Favreau Complex which will soon be built there and which will contribute to give back to downtown Montreal its residential look, the key to the development of that Montreal district will be the construction of the Convention Centre. And that Centre could not in my view be in a better location than just above the Ville-Marie expressway, in the very Place des Arts-Place d'Armes axis I referred to earlier. That would enable conventioners and tourists to have a ready access to Old Montreal and also to the federal government services nearby in the Guy Favreau Complex.

Since my time is almost up, I would simply like to add that the ideas I put forward can be translated into reality. The subject has been discussed for several years, but if I put these ideas to the House, even though they are of rather local interest, it is because I think it is urgent that we act now. And I urge my fellow Montrealers not to worry because even though I am suggesting to the federal government that they become more involved in the development of Montreal, I am not suggesting that they do so unilaterally without consulting the municipal authorities. On the contrary, the recently announced Place Guy Favreau is one of the finest examples of the consultation process which will result in a project satisfactory to all parties, and that is the light in which I see federal participation in downtown Montreal.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with my colleagues in congratulating the mover, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), and the seconder, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both hon. members did an admirable job in a difficult situation. Their situations were all the more difficult because they were attempting to speak following the presentation of the Speech from the Throne, such as it was, with virtually nothing but tripe in it.

At the same time I recognize the gracious manner in which Her Majesty read the Speech from the Throne, because it must have been equally difficult for her to read that kind of speech, and if the news media are correct, Her Majesty was inconvenienced for some reason beyond my knowledge and had to wear glasses, which she does not normally do. It is typical for this government to make matters awkward and difficult for people whenever it can.

Mr. Stanfield: It is difficult to believe.

Mr. Halliday: In reviewing and commenting upon the Speech from the Throne, there are a number of things one could discuss. There are items related to the economy, unemployment, inflation, national unity, and the language issue. Hon. members from both sides of the House have dealt very adequately with those subjects; therefore it is not my intention to do so. However, I should like to make one comment with respect to the Speech from the Throne.

I have read the Speech from the Throne a number of times and, as I did so, it became obvious to me that approximately 75 per cent of that speech dealt with the problems of our country with which we are familiar. As well, it dealt with methods the government tried, over the last year or two, in an attempt to correct those problems. For some strange reason, it could only find enough to talk about by way of a remedy for this situation to occupy approximately 25 per cent of the Speech from the Throne.

Traditionally the Speech from the Throne deals with the government's plans for bettering our economy and our national situation. In this instance the government completely failed to do that. The speech contained nothing innovative, and there was nothing new in order to confront our present national problems. Therefore the Speech from the Throne is more notable for what it did not contain, rather than for what it contained.

One particular item it did not contain was a reference to the matters of fitness and amateur sport. Why was there no reference to the matters of fitness and amateur sport in the Speech from the Throne? Is this an insignificant problem in Canada? If that was the case, there would be no minister in charge of that particular portfolio. Perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his advisers felt the affairs of that minister and that department were not significant and did not merit any reference in the Speech from the Throne. That could be one answer to the question. Another answer—I really doubt if this is the correct one—could be that the minister has no clout in the cabinet. When one observes her inside and outside the House, there is no doubt that she is enthusiastic about her portfolio. I am wondering if she has no clout in the cabinet, just as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has no clout. That is something of which the people of my constituency are aware.

As the debate on the Speech from the Throne progressed, I was surprised the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) rose to speak in it. Being a member of this House, she was entitled to speak on any topic at all in this type of debate. I wondered why she spoke as the minister and devoted approximately 60 per cent of her speech to her own portfolio and the problems associated with it. I should like to compliment her on her speech. She is a very good orator in her own right and presents her case very well, albeit there were some discrepancies, non sequiturs and flip-flops in her arguments. As a new minister, being only three years in this House, she is probably suffering from some of that contagion which she caught from the Liberals in this government. The contagion I am referring to predisposes them to develop and offer these non sequiturs, flip-flops and so on, which are so characteristic of the present government.

What did the minister have to say in her address? I should preface my remarks by saying that prior to her speaking in this debate she tabled in the House a green paper entitled: "Toward a National Policy on National Sport—A Working Document". To a great extent her speech was an elaboration of her comments contained in this working paper. I should like to refer to the first sentence of her speech, as reported at page 177 of Hansard dated October 24, 1977, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, it is not seven years since the last public statement on sport.

I hope the minister was not bragging when she said that. To begin her speech by saying no one in the government has seen fit to make a significant statement on amateur sport in the last three years is a rather reprehensible thing to say about your own government.

In her second sentence she indicated that the green discussion paper had been tabled. She said that it was presented "toward a new national policy on amateur sport". If I asked any Canadian what the present national policy is, I am sure he or she would draw a blank. Somehow she suggested that this was a new policy; but it may well lead to the first government policy of any significance.

One then has to look at some of the comments she made with reference to fitness and amateur sports. She began by saying that there were certain priorities that had to be considered. First she spoke about the spending of the government with regard to health care, and she made much of the fact that in Canada now we are spending roughly $7 billion a year on health care. Then she said that about 40 per cent of all that money being spent on those aspects of health care related to lifestyle diseases, and she went on to name them:

> . . . such as smoking, use of liquor, the licit and illicit use of drugs, nutritional imbalance and physical exercise that is abandoned, to name only a few.

First of all I want to look at it from different perspectives, the more broad perspective of the total government, and the perspective of the minister, how she perceives the components of her department, namely, fitness on one side and amateur sport on the other, relate to one another in terms of priority. First let us look at it from the perspective of the total government's view of sport and physical fitness. Obviously the throne speech gives a clue to the government's priorities in this field. The throne speech, not having mentioned the subject once, indicates how much interest the government truly has in fitness and amateur sport.

Then let us look at the budget which the government allows because, after all, the minister is not able to determine what our over-all budget will be for fitness and amateur sport. If we look at the current fiscal year 1977-78, we find that the budget for fitness and amateur sport comes very close to $27 million. That sounds like quite a bit to most of us, but when you put it in the context of a budget for health care of about $7 billion in the total budget of the country of over $40 billion, it looks to be rather small. Perhaps we might analyse how small it really is.

The concept of fitness and amateur sport first became a valid concept in Canada back in 1961 when the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act was passed. At that time embodied in the act was the statement that the government would be allowed to spend up to $5 million a year on anything to do with promotion and assistance of fitness and amateur sport. Let us look at what the gross national product was at the time. In 1961 the gross national product was $39 billion. Now in 1977 it is about $190 billion, almost $200 billion. So we see that the GNP has gone up five-fold. The expenditure on physical fitness and amateur sport this year was $27 million, just a little bit more than five times what was allowable in 1961.

The minister told us the other day in the House that we will be spending about $30 million or $31 million this coming year on fitness and amateur sport, and she may well be right. Let us assume that we spend, say, $31 million on fitness and amateur sport. If one works that out over a 17 year period from 1961 when the act was passed, to give you an idea of how much concern the government has for fitness and amateur sport, the real increase in dollar terms comes to about 1.5 cents to 2 cents per Canadian per year. So if the government chose to increase its contribution to fitness and amateur sport on a yearly basis, taking inflation into account, the actual increase in dollar value is 1.5 cents per person, per year, since 1961. That gives you an idea of the priority which the government gives to fitness and amateur sport.

If we assume the minister is spending this year $27 million on fitness and amateur sport and we assume that $10 million of that will go for fitness out of the $27 million—after all, fitness is pretty basic to sports and one has to look at that priority too—which priority comes first, fitness or amateur sport? Let us assume fitness is worth $10 million a year. This means that for every dollar the minister spends on fitness, the government spends $700 on health care. What does that tell us about the concern of the government for fitness? Or let us take the total expenditure on fitness and amateur sport of $27 million to $30 million. If you multiply it by three you find that they spend $3 on fitness and about $700 on total health care. That shows you the value which the government places on fitness and amateur sport.

What about the minister's priorities within her own department? I asked her a question this morning in the House, having looked at the act which sets up her department. Section 13 of the act states that the minister shall, within three months of the end of the current fiscal year, present to parliament an annual report on the expenditures, activities and commitments of her department. To the best of my knowledge there has been no such report as yet. It should have been received by parliament at the end of June this year. We are almost at the end of October and we have not yet seen that report.

The irony of the whole thing is: where are the priorities? It seems to me that here we have the minister presenting to us this green paper, which is great, because we like to know what the government's plans are for the future, but surely she has an obligation to present to us what has transpired in the last year, and this she has completely failed to do.

Let us go on now to the objectives of the minister's department. It is always interesting to take a look at the estimates in the great Blue Book we get each year. If you look up the estimates under the Department of National Health and Welfare for the program on fitness and amateur sport, we see written out in plain print the objective of her department, which is to raise the fitness level of Canadians and to improve their participation in physical recreation and amateur sport. That is subdivided into sub-objectives, which are, to increase appreciation for and understanding of fitness, physical recreation and amateur sport—note the order—to improve the Canadian delivery systems of fitness, physical recreation and amateur sport.

There is no doubt in my mind that if you read the official objectives of her department, the emphasis is laid on fitness. I submit that the priorities of the minister do not seem to show that. She has come before us with a working document, a green paper, on sport only, with a very passing reference to fitness. I do not think it takes somebody with much more than elementary education to realize that if you are going to be any good in a sports program, you have to have some fitness. The minister herself has admitted to us in her speech made earlier this week that the big problem with the health of Canadians is that we spend 40 per cent of our dollars on lifestyles that do not lead to fitness. Obviously, in order to get excellence in sport we will have to do something to improve the general fitness of the nation. What can we do?

Over the last two years the minister's first priority has been to produce a working document on sport. The minister told us in a passing reference earlier this week that we are going to get something on fitness later on. But what are the minister's priorities? They seem to be all mixed up.

The minister said in her speech the other day, "The commitment of this government to sport access is complete". I take that to mean that the minister wants all Canadians to have access to sport. Indeed, the minister says that somewhere in the green paper. We cannot fault her for that. It is an admirable desire on her part. However, it is interesting to see the stress laid on anything but availability of sport to the average Canadian in the green paper.

The Ottawa Journal of Tuesday, October 25, summarizes the green paper well. Some of the words in the Ottawa Journal article which I have in my hand were taken right from the minister's green paper, so I am not exaggerating or trying to misrepresent what the minister says in her green paper. Here are some of the proposals in the green paper, according to this article in the Ottawa Journal:

—A national coaching apprenticeship program to develop world class coaches in Canada.

—More assistance to increase the number of world-class officials and referees.

—A talent identification program to give the basis for identifying promising young athletes.

No reference is made to ordinary athletes or young athletes, just promising young athletes. Those are the athletes who are going to be helped.

—A club assistance program to help sports clubs "willing to and capable of producing top athletes for our national and international teams."

Look where the emphasis is.

The paper also says that if universities are willing "to commit themselves to excellence in their sports programs, co-ordinating them with those of the community, and expand training and competitive opportunities," the government will subsidize . . .

I wonder if the minister took the trouble to check with the universities of Canada to see whether in fact they really believe that the prime responsibility, or even a major responsibility, of a university is to develop excellence in sport. That traditionally is not the history of universities, and I predict that the minister is going to get a lot of flack if she tries to sell to the reputable and high class universities of this country the idea that they should become involved and commit themselves to excellence in their sport programs.

The minister goes on to say, and this is another quotation from the green paper:

"We want universities to take over the development of the high-performance athlete," . . .

We can see where the minister is putting the stress. The stress is on high performance athletes, national teams, international teams, world class coaches, world class referees and so on. This is deplorable.

I see that my time is running short. I want to refer to some of the minister's comments regarding sport policy. After an introduction by the hon. member for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I notice that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the House how pleased I am to take part in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I would like the people of Hochelaga, a constituency which I represent, to share this pleasure with me, all the more so since it will be remembered that on June 14 last I had the courage to take a difficult step in the interests of my fellow-citizens, my Quebec constituency and all Canadians. I crossed the floor of the House, because the people of Hochelaga elected me in the first place to represent them and to work, not to remain in a party where disorder comes before the interests of Canadians.

Since then, considering the needs of my riding and of all Canadians and through my sincere contribution to the Liberal party caucus, I proposed some ideas which are today part of the Speech from the Throne, of the government's objectives and the policy it intends to adopt during the present session.

Mr. Speaker, I must thank all my colleagues and the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada for accepting me in that great team of the Liberal Party of Canada. I am pleased to work at their side because I soon came to realize that their first preoccupation, like mine, is to serve all Canadians without exception. After two years here in this House as the representative of the Hochelaga riding, I wish to thank also all my colleagues who gave me the help and support that I needed, including some colleagues of my former party and I wish to mention the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) and particularly the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) who is presently convalescent, and I wish to take that opportunity, and I hope that my colleagues will join me, to wish him a fast recovery.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for their excellent job. And I wish to congratulate them especially as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) declared in his speech yesterday and I quote, and it is important, Mr. Speaker:

Unfortunately, I cannot offer congratulations to the two members who moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, as that would be hypocritical of me.

At least he is sincere about that.

I cannot congratulate anybody who is supporting and congratulating this government with its record. I look at these two members with disdain. It amazes me that they could get on their feet to support and praise this government.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate them and I know other members from all sides have congratulated the hon. member for Louis-Hébert and the hon. member for Malpeque. Are those two members contemptuous? Has any member of parliament the right to scorn or to hold another member in contempt? It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre should eventually withdraw at least his contemptuous remarks. I think it is unacceptable in our institution; it is democratic. Each of us has the right to give his views but to be contemptuous of one of his colleagues, Mr. Speaker, that is too much! If he holds one of his colleagues in contempt, he feels the same for himself and the public, which is pitiful.

Mr. Speaker, you will understand why I have crossed the floor of this House. I had said before that should the government take positive steps, should they introduce very positive measures for the benefit of all Canadians, I should do it, which I did, and rightly so. You will recall, for instance, that I asked the government, that if they wanted to remove price and income controls, they should do it gradually, but that they should be wise enough, however, to establish a monitoring body so that the situation does not get worse than before. This step had been proposed by the government well before the Speech from the Throne and unfortunately, some union representatives have rejected it because they wanted controls to be removed once and for all. Who will be the first to pay the cost? The Canadian taxpayers, as usual. I suggest the government's intent to remove those controls gradually in the next session and to establish a monitoring body is a very commendable one. And I hope that the opposition which also advocated decontrol will cooperate with the government to that effect. There are also other measures for which I am glad I have crossed the floor. I had also requested that the Montreal area become a designated area with the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in order to assist small businesses. This was done.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote an excerpt from the Speech from the Throne which will enable me to elaborate on my comments. I quote:

> The government has recently made new funding proposals to the provinces which will improve the efficiency and flexibility of social services such as the rehabilitation of disabled persons, day care and community development services. The delivery of these services will thereby better reflect varying conditions and priorities across the country. It is hoped that the response of provincial governments will lead to the introduction of a revised social services act during this session.

In the present situation, we should really try to solve our problems. Let us consider for instance, the case of older citizens. Certainly they do not receive a very high pension and if they had a little more money, it seems to me that they would have a better chance to make both ends meet. Welfare recipients do not have enough money either, even if the federal government pays 50 per cent of welfare payments.

The problem does not necessarily derive from the fact that the amounts are not adequate. It is rather a problem of housing, Mr. Speaker. Why? Because in their present home, everything is more expensive: hydro, gas, fuel oil. An old age pensioner lives in a slum and has to pay for some drugs which are not included in the free drugs program and if that person has to pay more for the energy he or she consumes because of the lack of insulation and because the cold air comes in through all the windows, he or she is very unhappy.

Mr. Speaker, these persons are in a difficult situation and this is why I am saying that the government expects to be able within a year or two to help them and I am one of those who will work hard for the establishment of a guaranteed minimum annual income, which will at the same time eliminate a good many of these problems. That is where we are, Mr. Speaker, and we have no other choice. This is why as members of this House we must keep on working to improve the living conditions of Canadians, be they young or old, rich or poor.

Another point which I would like to raise, Mr. Speaker, concerns young people. Today when young people graduate from CEGEPS or universities—and God knows how numerous they are, a fact that not I alone have noticed, for my colleagues must have too—they want to work, they are ready to take courses and eventually get themselves recycled, they do not want to be unemployed as some people seem to believe. People ask: what do young people want today? Perhaps to stay idle and draw social assistance or unemployment benefits?

Mr. Speaker, maybe there are some who think that way, but I believe they are a minority. We know that these young people are the future of our nation, that they will form tomorrow's citizenry and that we must give them the education they need. I will also take the opportunity of the presence in this House of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) to tell him that it will be necessary to create more training courses for the young who are unemployed in order to give them a fighting chance on the job market. We will also have to provide them with jobs.

There are several ways of creating jobs in this country, Mr. Speaker. If the provinces are willing to go along with the federal government, it may be possible to create more manufacturing or processing plants in Canada, which will result not only in new jobs being created but also in cost reductions. For example, we import steel from the United States and it costs us very dearly while we could have it processed in Canada. So why not do it at home? Mr. Speaker, these are questions which I am asking myself. I know from reading the Speech from the Throne that the government has indicated really good intentions in all these fields. I am convinced that if all hon. members were willing to work together hand in hand, and put before all else the interests of Canadians as a whole instead of spending their time playing politics, we would get somewhere.

I would like to make another point. For years, and long before being elected to this House and also when I was sitting in the opposition, frequently sending memoirs to the government on the subject, I was promoting the establishement of the office of ombudsman. I feel it is high time for this country to have its ombudsman. How many people have to face big government machinery? I am thinking about unemployment insurance and immigration. Too many small bureaucrats have too much discretionary power while ministerial staff have their hands tied. Let us imagine a situation where a junior civil servant takes it upon his lonesome self to send back home someone for some ridiculous motives. He simply does it. I realize there are procedures. There are appeals, but very often, Mr. Speaker, the civil servant's decision prevails. I am wondering how many people win their case in such appeals.

I am convinced that an ombudsman would not only be a useful tool, as the protector of ordinary citizens and taxpayers, but that he would also be of service, at least I hope so, to civil servants who are very often kept in the dark through no fault of theirs. This is why civil servants should also be entitled to the services of this ombudsman.

Mr. Speaker, I would have many other things to say about this, but since my time is limited, I shall go on to other issues. One thing that I wish is that Parliament can soon do more to prevent delinquency among young people. Having been a member of the sub-committee on penitentiaries and having seen all sorts of things, I believe that the time has come to do something else than building prisons. Of course, we have no choice in this matter at the present time, but, in the near future, we should also invest in our young people to prevent delinquency. On the long term, we could avoid having today's young people turn into the prisoners and the inmates of a strange type of university tomorrow and turn them instead into responsible adults, which would be cheaper for the people, more productive and more advantageous for the taxpayer.

In my riding, through the Canada Works Program, for which, by the way, I would like to thank the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) for the sum of $819,000 granted to my constituency which has been used to create 21 projects and I do not know how many jobs as I did not take the time to count them, we have succeeded in developing two projects for the prevention of delinquency among young people. I hope that following these two pilot projects developed under Canada Works, the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) will be able to do more to develop additional projects of this type which would benefit our young people.

Mr. Speaker, I want to raise another point. I will try to be brief because the other one that I want to mention is also very important. I am very pleased with the television broadcasting of the debates of the House of Commons. However, I deplore the fact that I cannot be recognized by the Chair more often. When I was sitting on the other side of the House, I was recognized at least once a week. Since the debates have started to be broadcast, and even before, there were always four or five members on this side of the House to be recognized.

Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that our proceedings are televised and that the people may watch what is going on in the House, but they should not see the opposition members only. In my opinion, any member, whether in opposition or in government, has the same rights and privileges, and I think that someone in the House will eventually have to correct that situation, because it is inconceivable, otherwise democracy will suffer in Parliament. Every member has been democratically elected by the people to Parliament, so everyone has the right to speak. Not all at the same time, of course.

I realize the Chair does not have an easy task, but at any rate it is important to reach an agreement at some time in order that my colleagues as well as I, who have questions of public interest to discuss, may raise them in the House. Before television came to the House, we used to put questions. Otherwise, opposition members will likely lie shamelessly to Quebecers and tell them: You know, in Ottawa, there are 60 Liberal members and they never rise or speak up. That is what they will say as they always have, but now that I am on this side, I understand the situation. And I understand it so well, Mr. Speaker, that I feel that this electronic medium is too powerful to be used improperly. It must be used to inform people and to give every member an opportunity to be heard.

• (1552)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is with reluctance that I intervene to ask the hon. member that if he has any remarks or propositions to make to the Speaker, with all due respect to the Speaker, perhaps he should do it privately with the Speaker.

Mr. Lavoie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Finally, I want to talk about national unity. I will be brief because I know my colleagues have already covered that subject. But there is one important thing concerning national unity that I want to talk about.

I want to blame the government of Quebec for depriving Quebecers of amounts of money that will be provided by the federal government, and let me explain. I will talk of the Canada Assistance Plan and old people. I have a file here. I am not telling you lies. An elderly person whose home burned down—which comes under provincial jurisdiction—is not entitled to assistance because there is a word in the act called "assistance". I want to give you another example: in the area of housing, section 44 (1)(b) of the National Housing Act allows the provinces to sign agreements with the profit corporations and cooperatives. The government of Quebec does not sign agreements. It is already independent now.

Mr. Speaker, it is unthinkable that a government should deprive Quebecers of amounts of money belonging and available to them. I find that unthinkable and that is why I blame the government of Quebec for that. I think I do not have much time left, Mr. Speaker, so I will conclude by saying quite simply that this country was built by our forefathers and we are here to replace them and hand it down to our children. I think that we do not have the right to let it be divided, and I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who will fight right to the end to keep this country united, as my father stood in the battlefield for our country, Canada. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude on the following note. The Prime Minister said, and I agree with him: The time to make a choice and decide has come, we cannot afford the luxury of another decade of indecision.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I enter the throne speech debate. At the outset, I congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I may not agree with the policies or principles about which they spoke, but I admire the way they approached the subject.

I congratulate both members on their first speeches in this House. I thought they were exceptionally well delivered. They deserve to be congratulated. I am not at all happy that a colleague of mine saw fit to do otherwise.

However, when the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lavoie) started to alibi his actions by blaming someone else, I found this very distasteful. As a matter of fact the hon.

member seemed to be alibiing his acceptance of the party opposite.

We had a revelation today by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) of more and more dishonest acts being condoned by the government. By alibiing himself, he accepts the fact that we have fantastically high unemployment in this country. We have an unemployment insurance program that is costing us ten times that of the United States.

I take a great deal of delight in speaking of the personal pleasure I had listening to Her Majesty deliver the Speech from the Throne. I, and I am sure a number of others, made a silent apology to Her Majesty for having to deliver the drivel that she did. As always, however, she was most gracious. It was a distinct pleasure for all in this House to have her here to lend her dignity to the opening of the House. We all enjoyed a few moments with her later.

There is a range of subjects covered in the Speech from the Throne. I will be either the last or second last speaker from this side in this debate. The range of subjects is very broad. One could spend a good deal of time on any one of them. My colleagues spent a good deal of time on these subjects.

For the first time we have had a budget speech thrown in with the throne speech. Whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is prepared to call it a budget speech or not, that is what it was, complete with ways and means motions to back it up.

From time to time we on this side have been accused of preaching gloom and doom. I know of no member of the opposition who is preaching gloom and doom. There is a problem, and we have to tell it like it is. We have to tell Canadians the facts because they certainly are not getting them from the propaganda of the ministers of the Crown.

Canadians support governments with their hard-earned taxes. Canadians fought, suffered, and died in the wars. As we come closer to November 11, we remember them more fully than we sometimes do. Those who sacrificed for their country deserve to know the truth. Should only a select group of Canadians, chosen arbitrarily, have the kind of knowledge necessary to protect their future and that of their families? Actions of some of these are some of the things I want to comment on last in my portion of this Speech.

I draw Your Honour's attention, and this has been mentioned before, to the words of the Auditor General in 1975 when he said, and I quote:

> The present state of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

In 1976 he said:

> I am deeply concerned that parliament—and indeed the government—has lost, or is close to losing, effective control of the public purse.

On the way by in one of his reports he said, and I quote:

> In the majority of the Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control is weak and ineffective. Moreover, co-ordination and guidance by central government agencies of financial management and control practices in these Crown corporations are virtually non-existent.

● (1602)

These two reports by the Auditor General contain page after page of evidence of this lack of management control. None of these decisions were made by members of this parliament. They were made, by and large, by a bureaucracy. My hon. friend from Battle River (Mr. Malone), my hon. friend from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and others have drawn attention to the fact that the total budget when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power amounted to something like $9 billion and that today the deficit alone is about $9 billion. My hon. friend from Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) made a particularly telling contribution on the subject of foreign affairs, and my hon. friend from Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) made an excellent speech on behalf of disabled people. All these things are important, but the point I want to make is that we face a financial problem. It is not preaching doom and gloom to say we shall inevitably reach a point in time at which the taxpayers' ability to sustain the load of unlimited government largesse finally gives way. We are moving toward that point in time at breakneck speed. There is a danger of democracy smothering to death under a mountain of government debt, regulation, and red tape.

Once in a while I hear a voice raised in the House of Commons, other than from the opposition side, agreeing that there is a problem. He may not appreciate my drawing attention to it, but a colleague on the other side, the hon. member for Ottawa-West (Mr. Francis), frequently draws attention to some of the government's deficiencies though I suspect he is not heeded. Columnists make these points, too. One of them in an article I read recently says:

> Relationships which were simple are made complex. Rules which everyone could understand are multiplied into abstractions and interpretations and footnotes to sub-sub-paragraphs until they are incomprehensible to everybody.

He goes on to say:

> When the growth of a bureaucracy passes beyond control, it becomes a law unto itself. The process is self-fulfilling. The failure of each new intrusion compels it to intrude again. More people are hired, more programs devised to occupy them.

This particular columnist writes for the Business Journal and is preaching to the converted.

My leader made the point recently that when elected—I do not use the word "if"—he will implement what he has termed a sunset law to make Crown corporations justify their existence. I agree with that approach and I hope he will do the same with respect to projects in all departments. As a sitting member of parliament I experience a feeling of impotence from time to time in the face of some of these tremendous problems, but I know that through our efforts as a party these things can be changed. And, as my hon. friend from St. John's West said the other day in his eloquent speech, when we take over, they will be changed.

A few words, now, on the subject of the need for an ombudsman. The hon. member for Hochelaga took pains to tell us how necessary an ombudsman is. I say, not at all. There should be no need for an ombudsman. It may be that under the present government one is needed, but he should not be needed. Many members of parliament, including myself, handle complaints which we receive from individuals in our constituencies who run into bureaucratic red tape. My staff and I handle multitudes of these cases. But we do not need an ombudsman. We need fewer programs, simpler programs. I go along with the venerable gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Venerable?

Mr. Ellis: —in saying there is a need to help those in our society who are in need of help. But, if we do not learn soon to get off the backs of the private businessman, we shall find ourselves in terrible trouble.

I have spent time as a private businessman. I recall sitting down with a partner of mine some years ago and finding out how serious it was that he and I, who had contributed tremendous amounts to a company, had a third partner who took more of the profits than either one of us. If there was a profit, I got 25 per cent, my partner got 25 per cent, and the government got 50 per cent. However, in years when there was a loss, I was responsible for 50 per cent of it, my partner was responsible for 50 per cent, and our silent partner did not contribute one confounded cent.

Our lives are almost totally ruled by bureaucratic decisions and opinions, all too often arbitrary, capricious, and uninformed. The bureaucracy which dominates the federal government today has actually become a measure of man's ability to govern himself in a time of tremendous technological change and population growth. It is so massive that it feeds on itself, so intricate that it lends itself to a wide range of abuses, some criminal and deliberate, others unwitting and inept. I mention, for example, the reactor deal with Argentina and the loss of many millions of dollars; we were never able to get to the bottom of that, despite the gallant efforts of my hon. friend from Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Then there is the affair of the uranium cartel. Eventually we may get to the bottom of that—we are being stonewalled constantly but we may eventually unravel what happened there.

Let me give the House one example of the kind of problem we encounter. It is not a very big thing, but there are many in this House who like to use private aircraft from time to time. A few years ago, as a private pilot—I am not one now—I was obliged to install an electronic locator transmitter on my aircraft. I recall arguing the matter with the transport minister of the day, asking him how safe these devices were and whether safeguards had been built into them. But they were forced upon us, and every private aircraft owner had to install an ELT in his plane at a cost of some $200. It was the Department of National Defence which put pressure on the Department of Transport to make them compulsory. It was the Department of Communications which tested the ELTs and gave them a stamp of approval. It was the Department of Transport which provided legislation making the carrying of ELTs mandatory.

Owners had no choice but to obey the law. But now we find out that the ELT has not been performing as expected. Some of them are potentially hazardous, and a bulletin has been put out telling owners they must be very careful of them. Incidentally, one of them exploded with tremendous force, damaging an aircraft.

I want to spend a few minutes now sharing with the minister and my colleagues some reading I came across recently, showing where some of our hard-earned tax dollars have been spent. From time to time we hear complaints that too much time and money are being spent on studies and that too many experts are being hired to take part in these exercises.

The book to which I have referred lists a number of the studies which are in progress. I quote, first, for $1,920, an analysis of mixed office waste paper from government establishments in the Toronto area. Further down the page I find that for $6,990 another analysis has been done of waste paper from government establishments in the Toronto area. Shortly after that I find yet another study on waste paper recycling opportunities for government action. This is to cost the taxpayers $139,455.

Another one which I find quite amusing is described as an analysis of price elasticity of transportation fuels. Someone is spending $29,800 to tell us that the price of transportation fuels is going to go up. Then for $4,975 you can have research conducted into the psychological and motivational factors affecting new car purchase. I guess for that amount of money you cannot buy a new car any more so you might as well study the matter. For $3,000 you can have design and analysis of data collection techniques for ascertaining social impacts related to variability of fishing seasons. Any fisherman will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot catch a pickerel with ice on the lakes which is too thick, and you should not catch them at other times of the year. For $3,000 our government is looking into that matter.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is going to spend $53,976 on a study to develop and assess the cost effectiveness of practical implementable counter measures for pedestrian and bicycle safety in a realistic urban environment. For $37,203 you can have a study and report on the inter-relationships between three elements of transit revenue collection, namely, fare policies, fare structure, and fare collection systems.

Here is one which is particularly delightful: for $57,396 there is to be a survey of preferred bus stop spacing. I suppose they would recommend that the bus stops should be 40 feet apart if the buses were 50 feet long.

There are pages of these projects, Mr. Speaker, and this shows the way some of our money is being spent.

The size of the federal bureaucracy keeps on increasing year after year despite the unfair and growing burden it places on the taxpayer. It compounds confusion for the average citizen. If it continues, not only will business choke to death on red tape, but individual wage earners and property owners will suffocate under this centralized power. We ride monopolized and government regulated city transit, commuter railroads, taxis, airlines and buses. Raw materials are delivered and products shipped by regulated trucks, trains, ships and pipelines. We drink government regulated water. Our food is inspected and regulated, by government agencies which cannot agree. Some would ban cyclamates and saccharin because they might be harmful; others would legalize marijuana because it might not be.

Business knows that government decrees where it may build and how, whom it may hire and promote, how much it must pay, what standards its products must meet, how it can advertise, its selling price, and so on and so on. The businesses regulated include just about everything which humans do for a living. The big ones do what they must; they hire accountants, lawyers and paper work experts to do the job. The little guy puts up a fight but eventually goes out of business. For failure to comply with federal regulations, both risk fines and jail. In both cases it is the consumer who finally pays the bill.

In these few moments, Mr. Speaker, I have outlined only one of the concerns of the people from whom I hear. There are many more. Time does not permit me to refer to them, but my colleagues have well and truly elaborated on many of the other areas covered in the throne speech. The government seems to be totally insensitive and unwilling to listen or to change. Its time will come, Mr. Speaker, for I have complete faith that Canadians will not accept for much longer the type of governing that we have had, the kind of bureaucracy which has made their lives unbearable. I think that before much longer we will see a change.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I add my congratulations to those of so many others to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). They have indeed done themselves, their constituencies, and their constituents great honour by the manner in which they conducted themselves at the outset of this debate.

May I add also a personal note in memory of the former member for the riding of Louis-Hébert who was elected at the same time as I in 1973. I think all who knew her or got to know her will always have a place in their hearts for Madam Morin, as one of the most distinguished and able people they ever met.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: I think her family is following along in the tradition that she so well established.

The Speech from the Throne delivered by Her Majesty just so very recently here in this building was delivered in a manner I will never forget. I was pleased to be here, as were the people in the community I have such an honour to represent. Most of the functions which Her Majesty attended were held in the core and heart of her capital here in Ottawa. Her Majesty was at a football game in addition to being here in parliament. First Avenue Public School is within my riding. She attended a regatta within my riding, where my wife Maureen and I were so pleased to be in attendance with her. Her graciousness, and her intelligence and interest in Canada, indicate to all of us that the Crown still forms a very important part indeed of the government process in Canada.

This debate on the Speech from the Throne gives me an opportunity to refer to my riding and to some of the problems we have. Ordinarily, of course, we are reluctant to stray from the issue which is before the House at any given time but are confined to dealing only with the items contained in a bill under discussion. In the past year we have had some serious and difficult problems within my community relating to the relocation of thousands of public servants from Ottawa across the river to Hull. There has also been the decentralization of other public servants from Ottawa to other places in Canada.

By way of introduction to these comments may I say that in the past year I have been the parliamentary secretary to the minister of industry, trade and commerce. In that capacity, and in my other capacity as a member of parliament, I have had an opportunity to visit seven or eight capitals of the world on parliamentary business fulfilling one or other of my functions. I have visited Tokyo, Paris, Stockholm, London, and Canberra during the course of my duties as a member of this parliament and as parliamentary secretary concerned with matters of trade. Not one of those capitals of the world has anything which we do not have here in the capital of Canada. We have in Ottawa a capital blessed by the confluence of three rivers, with a magnificent geographic pattern and with a great and wonderful future.

Being very bullish, therefore, with regard to our capital in the long run, may I now make some comments about my real concern about this community in the short run. If we who can all see the buildings on the skyline of Hull could put wheels under those buildings and roll them across the Portage bridge and put them in the centre of the city of Ottawa, I for one would not want them there. For there would be nobody living within the heart of the capital between Laurier Avenue and the Queensway. I believe our capital should be a vital place with people engaged in their daily activities, living and indeed working there.

Ottawa has had planning which took place in the late 1960's and early 1970's and I think it was valid planning. It was planning which saw that the centre of the city of Ottawa did not consist just of towers of glass, steel and concrete, for that is really not a place where people can live. Therefore the planning which has put buildings and public servants across the river and into Hull has been right and proper planning.

I emphasize that that planning was done in the late 1960's and early 1970's, at which time the economy of the nation was buoyant. It was also a time when the increase in the public service of this country amounted to 4, 5 or 6 per cent per annum. This was adding to the work force of the public service in the national capital area sufficient people to fill two of Mr. Campeau's Places de Ville every three years. Clearly that is not desirable, most especially in these times of economic restraint. The circumstances have fundamentally changed.

We are now in a period of a flat economy. We are now in a period where there is an additional economic factor, albeit an artificial economic factor. It seriously affects the viability of the heart of the nation's capital. The artificial factor I am referring to is the freeze placed by the government on the growth of the public service. If there were no artificial impediment to the growth of the public service, and if it were growing at a more normal rate of 1½ per cent, 2 per cent or 3 per cent annually, then we would not have any vacant space in the city of Ottawa. If that were the case, the growth rate would be equal to the gross national product. Also, we would not have the prediction of four million square feet of office space being vacated. In fact we would be constructing other buildings in Ottawa and Hull.

The planning of the government was based upon economic factors which existed at that time. Indeed the same type of planning was done by the private sector. I have implored ministers of the Crown to take these factors into consideration as they exist today. The moves to Hull and the decentralization across the rest of Canada should not be stopped. But they should be slowed down in order to give our economy and our public service a chance to grow in a more normal way, at which time we will spread the harm and the difficulty being occasioned to the people who live in the centre of my city. This is not an unreasonable request. The private sector should bear some of the burden. There should be some empty space in Ottawa owned by the private sector, as well as some empty space owned by the federal or public sector in Hull.

There are benefits to the economy of Ottawa because the public service is located here. Likewise, there should be benefits to the private sector in Hull because of the federal government being located there. We should share the benefits. In the short run we should share also the hardships which will be curtailed because of economic factors since the planning of the late sixties and early seventies.

A slowdown will not cost the Treasury a great amount of money. A slowdown such as that will show the good will of the government toward this community. Ottawa has benefited greatly by having the public service and a dedicated group of public servants who are highly trained specialists. This ought to be acknowledged. A slowdown in these moves must take place in order for the economy to catch up. In that event the harm will not be so great.

Another matter of great concern to the community at large, the chairmen of regional governments, the mayors of the region and the reeves of the region, is the grants which are being paid in lieu of taxes. The vacancies which will take place in the private sector in terms of office space are a very serious matter at this time. Notwithstanding the fact that the office space is empty, the municipal expenditures continue at the same rate. I am referring to expenditures for police service, garbage collection, and education. Those expenditures are present whether or not the government occupies these buildings.

There are some buildings in Ottawa owned by the federal government which are exempted properties. These properties are of a cultural nature or are monuments, such as the National War Memorial in the centre of Ottawa. It is recognized that those properties are properly exempt. They are there for the people of Canada, and indeed the people of Ottawa enjoy them as well. Two examples of exempt properties are the National Museum and the National Arts Centre. But there are other properties which are exempt from the payment of any or all taxes and I wonder whether they should continue to have that status in this day and age.

Generally the government pays a full commercial tax rate on realty owned or occupied by it. That must be understood in order to eliminate some of the confusion surrounding this area. In addition the government pays full police rates, water rates and taxes, except for the exempt properties. The few buildings which are exempt might be brought into the ambit of full taxation in order for this municipality to have more funds to meet its day to day commitments. I am referring to such buildings as the National Library, the National Archives, and the National Science Library. As I said before, the National Museum will be exempt because it is a cultural establishment. These other buildings are repositories of information and knowledge. They provide knowledge and information in the same manner as similar organizations in the private sector. Their operations are closely related, and therefore these buildings should no longer be exempt from the payment of municipal taxes. The government should make moves in that direction. It is capable of doing so.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in correspondence with the mayor of the city of Ottawa, has indicated that the Grants in Lieu of Taxes Act will be amended during the life of this parliament. I urge the government to move as quickly as it can in order for the benefits of those amendments to be felt by the city of Ottawa, of which I represent a part, and the surrounding municipalities.

Mrs. Pigott: Hear, hear!

Mr. Poulin: This cannot be over-emphasized because of the great exodus plan which will be implemented in the future. That involves the move of public servants from this community to other parts of Canada. This community will have to tighten its belt, but it should not have to do so because the federal government is not paying its fair share.

Mrs. Pigott: That is right—justice.

Mr. Poulin: The most serious part of the controversy regarding taxes is the area known as business tax. I am sure there is room for compromise in this area. There is room for members on all sides of this House to strive for equity and justice. Taxes should be paid where operations that are being conducted are akin to, similar, or like work which is carried on in the private sector. As I have mentioned, grants are being paid on realty by the federal government at the full commercial rate on all real estate which it owns and occupies. It does not pay grants in lieu of business tax.

In order to summarize the argument of this government, and in fact of all past governments, I should like to indicate that the operations of government are not a business. We are not engaged in making a profit, nor are we trying to make a profit. So far as most of the government's operations are concerned, such as, for example, the distribution of old age pensions and the family allowances, the government is not conducting a business and it is not endeavouring to make a profit. The problem here is in the legislation regarding a business tax which goes up as high as 140 per cent with regard to breweries, and down to 30 per cent, 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the tax paid on the realty.

Although government operations are not a business, equally government officials do not conduct themselves in these offices as if they were in a residence, in a home. It is obvious that they should be paying commercial rates, and somewhere along the line we should find some common ground. Although the government is not conducting its business in the same manner as companies are in the private sector, it must be recognized that the government should pay some tax or grants in order to assist the municipality in defraying the cost of its annual expenses.

I am very pleased that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is in the House this afternoon. He is becoming more and more influential with his cabinet colleagues. He has a very special interest in the Ottawa ridings and in the other ridings in eastern Ontario and so I ask him to take my message to his colleagues that there should be a slow-down in the movement of public servants to Hull, to permit our economy to catch up and to permit the public service to grow and fill these buildings. Also, through you, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the Minister of Employment and Immigration that an accommodation be made by the government with respect to grants in lieu of taxes. I know that all members of parliament representing the Ottawa area concur in my appeal to the minister.

I should like to make some comments now on the matters raised by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) in his speech earlier today. I make these comments because if there is anything important in this land it must be adherence to our laws. I had a very interesting year as parliamentary secretary to the Solicitor General and during that time I got to know the present Commissioner of the RCMP, as well as the former one. I also got to know very well the chief of security of the RCMP, and indeed many other officers of all ranks with whom I have worked as a lawyer and as a prosecutor. I have nothing but the highest regard for these men, and I have some understanding of the great difficulty of the work which they do. But the solicitor general indicated that on January 9, 1973, an entry was made into the offices of the Parti Québécois—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). I was really pleased to hear the speech made by the hon. member for Malpeque because I believe it was made by a very sincere new member of parliament, and it came from the heart.

The only highlight that I can find in the Speech from the Throne was the fact that Her Majesty the Queen delivered it, because I cannot see any other highlights in it that would bring Canadians out of the malaise in which they find themselves at the present.

I will have to cut my remarks short because I have only ten minutes in which to speak before the bells ring.

In any newspaper one might have picked up since October 20 one could find a headline or an article concerning the mining industry in Canada. Of course they concern the massive lay-offs of employees at Sudbury, Ontario, and Thompson, Manitoba.

Whether it be the lay-offs in Thompson, Manitoba, or the impending closing of the Alcan fluorspar mine in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, the mining industry is finding itself in a real crunch.

The government is known for pointing its finger at industry and saying to industry "It is time you cleaned up your act. Give us some forecasts of what the mining industry is going to do. Get your act together," as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would put it, and tell the government what action you are taking and what the long range forecast is. However, I would like to refer to an article which will be appearing in the Financial Post tomorrow, October 29. The heading reads: "Mining's Tax Crunch". It reads:

> Ever since Ottawa's white paper on tax reform in 1969, the mining industry has faced the prospect and the fact of substantially higher taxes.
> Mining companies have been caught in the middle of the heated disputes between the federal and provincial governments about which jurisdiction should receive the revenue. In some cases, the conflicting rules have meant a potential tax of more than 100 per cent.

I have a timetable before me pointing out the major tax changes that have taken place since 1969 after the Trudeau administration came into power. I would like to refer to a few of those in the short time I have. Here we have the government telling the mining industry to get its act in place, and here are federal and provincial governments coming in with 13 major tax amendments in less than ten years.

The timetable reads as follows:

> November, 1969. The white paper on tax reform proposes withdrawal of the three-year tax-exempt period for new mines, effective, January 1, 1974.
> August, 1970. Ottawa announces that, after 1976, provincial mining levies will no longer be deductible.
> January, 1972. New federal Income Tax Act comes into effect. It contains new measures relating to mining tax.
> February, 1974. British Columbia introduces mineral royalties act and amends the mineral land tax act. Both changes apply to two tiers of royalties—a basic royalty and a royalty on so-called super profits.

April, 1974. Ontario and Manitoba announce higher mining taxes on mining companies' operations, to begin in 1974.

April, 1974. Quebec says it will assess the mining tax situation. In December, 1975, it enacts new and higher rates effective retroactively to April 1, 1974.

May, 1974. Saskatchewan introduces a reserve tax on potash mines, in effect a royalty.

May, 1974. Federal budget announces end of deductibility of provincial mining taxes and introduction of the 15 per cent abatement, effective immediately.

November, 1974, Mining measures from May federal budget reintroduced intact except that exploration expenses can be written off at 100 per cent instead of 30 per cent.

January, 1975. Newfoundland's Mining and Mineral Rights Tax Act comes into effect, imposing tax on profits and royalties.

June, 1975. Federal budget scraps the 15% abatement (which reduces tax payable) and replaces it with a 25% resource allowance (which reduces taxable income). This is more favourable than the abatement for a company with substantial expenses for exploration, development or interest. At the same time, the federal rate is reduced to 46% from 50% to match rate applicable to other companies.

January, 1977. British Columbia's two-tier royalty system cancelled and replaced with a more normal mining tax on profits.

Mining companies now face a squeeze. There is a rush for tax dollars because the spending of the federal government is rampant. The federal government has to put the squeeze on to get more tax dollars to help offset its anticipated $9.5 billion deficit in this coming year.

To show how unwisely this government spends I would like to cite the example of the Otineka shopping mall in The Pas, Manitoba. This was an expenditure of $8.4 million. This is an example of the government spending money to help people in different parts of Canada! This shopping mall was supposed to create a massive number of new jobs in northern Manitoba. I understand that there is an order before the Treasury Board at this time to write off $4.2 million of the debt. This shopping centre was just opened a little over a year ago.

There was an expenditure of $11 million in the townsite of Churchill, Manitoba. The government closed Fort Churchill, which used to be operated at an annual cost of $7 million. The recreational complex in Churchill is beautiful. It cost $11 million. It was a gift to the people of the town of Churchill. The population of Churchill is only 1,500, and those people are faced with a 70 mill increase in their taxes. They refused to accept the keys for the complex. The keys were then turned over to the provincial government, and this albatross now hangs around the neck of the provincial government. It is saddled with operating costs in the neighbourhood of $700,000 a year. This was a great gift from the federal government. I know that the previous government in Manitoba was led down a snowshoe trail with little deals like this with the federal government, but I can assure hon. members that the new administration in Manitoba will not be led down that snowshoe trail quite so easily.

I would also like to mention the AHOP program under CMHC. There is not one single home under construction in the Churchill constituency under the AHOP program, for the simple reason that construction costs in the constituency are 20 per cent higher than they are in Winnipeg, and the CMHC allows only $38,500 per unit. It does not matter if it is in the north or in Winnipeg. Considering the lack of housing we have in certain areas of northern Manitoba, that is a program which should be looked at immediately so that we can get some housing there.

I see that my time is drawing close to an end. As I said before, here we are under the bell again. It gives me great pleasure to close off this debate.

I feel that there was a mini budget slipped in through the keyhole, and that is about the extent of the Speech from the Throne.

The only highlight of the Speech from the Throne was that it was delivered by Her Majesty the Queen, and I would like to close on that note.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being 4.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the main motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Motion (Mr. Dawson) agreed to.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

That the Address be engrossed and forwarded to Her Majesty the Queen.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

That an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit to Her Majesty the Queen an engrossed Address, which the Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, adopted in reply to Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of the Third Session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved:

That the Address to His Excellency the Governor General, adopted this day, be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I move in accordance with Standing Order 58:

That this House at its next sitting consider the business of supply.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being 4.48 p.m., this House stands adjourned until Monday next at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 4.48 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY INTO MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SECURITY OPERATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Given the latest disclosures of illegal activity by federal security services, and given the fact that the McDonald Commission lacks a clear mandate to inquire into the crucial matter of ministerial responsibility for those activities, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That a special committee of this House be established to inquire into the exercise of ministerial responsibility for federal security operations; that the committee be chaired by a member of the opposition; that the committee have the power to subpoena testimony from all Privy Councillors who have held the portfolio of solicitor general since 1968 and from such other senior officials as the committee deems necessary; that the committee be provided with independent counsel and research assistance; and that the committee submit at least an interim report to this House by November 30 next.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT FOR FAILURE TO ACT ON ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 as well.

In view of the revelations made in the House last Friday in connection with the RCMP's activities in Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House condemn the failure of the government to control effectively the activities of the RCMP. One of the results of such failure was the illegal search conducted in the offices of a democratically established political party in Quebec, that is the Parti Québécois, on January 9, 1973; that it also condemn the government and more specifically the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his implication in the cover-up, this following unavoidably from the fact that the Prime Minister failed to ask the RCMP how it had obtained the information on the Parti Québécois when he learned in 1974 that the RCMP was watching that party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PERMISSION FOR CERTAIN MINISTERS TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ABOUT SECURITY SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It is clearly essential that in order to maintain public confidence in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that the fullest information be available to the House and to the country concerning the relationship of the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand); the former minister of justice, now the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang); and the Prime Minister's office with the security and intelligence services of the government. I believe my motion will be acceptable to everyone in the House who is interested in bringing out the whole truth. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That notwithstanding any Standing Order or ruling of Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Transport be permitted to answer questions respecting the activities of the security and intelligence services of the government during the period when these ministers were responsible as solicitor general and minister of justice respectively.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As there is in this country a formal bill of rights; as Canada has always been recognized as a land of freedom; as facts and circumstances revealed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on illegal entries of the RCMP in the case of democratic individuals and organizations; and because those illegal, illegitimate and shameful acts were inspired by the government authorities in power, and also, because those same authorities, still in power, may well pursue such chauvinistic, rash and hateful acts; and also bearing in mind the fact that the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not deign to answer adequately the questions of hon. members of this House, of whom the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) wanted to get information on the files the RCMP have on some hon. members of this Parliament, and finally because every citizen in this country will now have that sword of Damocles hanging over his liberties, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That this House order the government to set up a royal commission of inquiry, both objective and impartial, into all the extraprofessional activities of the RCMP with a view to determining whether or not it has exceeded the bounds of its role, and also to denouncing who is really responsible for that trampling of citizens' rights and freedoms.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED RESTORATION OF IMPEACHMENT AND CENSURE PROCEEDINGS IN CERTAIN CASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a very short motion to move under the provisions of Standing Order 43, which will have immense appeal to the other side. If consent is given, I will move:

That a select parliamentary committee be established to consider proposals to restore the practice of impeachment and censure proceedings in cases of misdemeanor and offences against the public interest alleged against those in high places.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR STATEMENTS BY MINISTERS CONCERNING KNOWLEDGE OF ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the shocking ministerial ignorance or responsibility for illegal activities of the security and intelligence services involving break-ins, theft, arson, etc, and the inability or unwillingness of the present government to either know or state what happened, or in effect clarify what activities constitute effective and proper security procedures, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That the present and former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, make statements on motions immediately in order that their knowledge and/or authorization of illegal break-ins, theft, arson, etc. may be fully explained to this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSALS TO PROVINCES WHICH WOULD JUSTIFY ABSENCE OF PRIME MINISTER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the urgency of the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) regarding the illegal activities of the security and intelligence services of the government; and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister, as head of all security operations in the country, should be present in the House today to explain and clarify his remarks, unless matters of even greater urgency prevent him from being here; and in view of the fact the Prime Minister has described his current meetings with the provincial premiers as merely a sounding out of opinion, I moved, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House regrets the absence of the Prime Minister at this sitting and requests the Acting Prime Minister to divulge to the House immediately what, if any, concrete proposals are being made to the provincial premiers at this time to justify the Prime Minister's absence from the House for this crucial question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion relates to statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) condoning illegal activities by federal security forces in 1973 on the grounds of the prevailing and political atmosphere. Since the principal features of that period included a federal Liberal government trying desperately to hold on to power in a minority situation, a provincial Liberal government—

SUGGESTED DELAY IN SALE OF CANDU REACTOR TO ARGENTINA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government which took power in Argentina in March, 1976, imposes a regime that violates all basic human rights. Freedom of the press no longer exists there, as demonstrated by the abduction, torture and assassination of dozens of journalists and by the banning of newspapers and journals. Argentina has refused to sign the nuclear non-proliferation treaty restricting the use of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That Canada stop the shipment of all parts of the CANDU reactor to Argentina and refrain from selling any further nuclear reactors to Argentina until all basic human and trade union rights are restored and until Argentina signs the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED PROHIBITION AGAINST USE OF SECTION 41(2) OF FEDERAL COURT ACT TO LIMIT POWERS OF INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Having regard to serious allegations of a cover-up by the government, and especially the Solicitor General of Canada, respecting the illegal activities of certain security and intelligence agencies, in light of the fact that the abuse of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act has already seriously hampered the efforts of commissions of inquiry in both the provinces of Alberta and Quebec, and having regard to the gravity of the situation which is seriously undermining the confidence and the morale of our legitimate law enforcement agencies, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) in connection with these inquiries:

That the government be required not to exercise their privilege under 41(2) of the Federal Court Act and to permit the justices charged with the inquiry to examine any evidence and documents in the government's possession that may be pertinent to the inquiries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DELEGATES TO FOURTH ANNUAL CANADIAN REGIONAL PARLIAMENTARY SEMINAR

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning the oral question period I know that all hon. members will want to join me in welcoming some very distinguished visitors whom we have in the galleries this afternoon in the persons of Canadian delegates from provincial legislatures and our counterparts in the Caribbean region under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. They are all here in Canada for the Fourth Annual Canadian Regional Parliamentary Seminar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REFERENCE TO ABSENCE OF PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order. I sent you notice earlier of a question of privilege. I had hoped that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would change his plans, as has already been indicated by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), and be here this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Absence of Prime Minister

Mr. Broadbent: My point of order pertains directly to the absence of the Prime Minister this afternoon, and if hon. members opposite will do us at least the courtesy to listen to the argument, I will make the point.

Mr. Alexander: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Broadbent: The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), in the House on Friday, revealed for the first time to members, on this side certainly, the break-in by the RCMP into the offices of a democratically constituted political party in the province of Quebec. The questions surrounding this break-in touch at the very essence of parliamentary democracy. They pertain to the rule of law. They pertain to ministerial responsibility, and they pertain to the right of citizens to organize their lives and political activity in a free way.

My point of order is that when such questions of fundamental importance are raised by a certain illegal activity, the man who is centrally responsible for his government as it is involved in these activities ought to be here in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Therefore, I say at the outset on this point of order that the acting Prime Minister, presumably the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—who has shown a complete dereliction of his responsibilities—has to explain to the House why the Prime Minister is not here, whether he has changed his plans, whether he will be here later, and if so, when.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). However, I am sure all hon. members realize, regardless of the gravity of the situation, that the presence or absence of any minister during question period, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), constitutes neither order nor privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: However, the point of order raised by the hon. member, of which I was given notice by way of a question of privilege which would have come at the end of the question period, is one of those I thought I should hear with respect to whether we ought to proceed with the question period. We have been operating under a set of rules under which I defer until three o'clock the taking of any points of order; however, where one relates to the progress of the question period, as this does, I think I have to hear it. Notwithstanding the fact that I have now had to turn it aside, I think it is only appropriate that the question period be extended by the four minutes we have used today.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—DATE ON WHICH MINISTER WAS INFORMED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General, who made announcements in the House of Commons at a time when it was difficult to reply to him, under the pressure, I believe, of knowing that the matters revealed to the House on Friday would become public in any event through the course of provincial inquiries.

The minister referred in that statement to two illegal acts other than the illegal act relating to the Parti Québécois. I am assuming that those other illegal acts relate to the burning of a barn and the stealing of dynamite. In relation to each of these three instances I would like to know on what date the minister became aware of them, by whom he was advised and whether the information came as a result of an inquiry which was initiated by the minister, the Prime Minister or by any other minister.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the very funny position of being reproached by the Leader of the Opposition for being in the House on Friday afternoon or Friday morning.

An hon. Member: He wasn't here.

Mr. Fox: I always thought that the House of Commons sat five days a week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Tell that to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Fox: I would like to point out that this government set up a royal commission of inquiry last July. If we set up a royal commission of inquiry last July, it was because we had reasons for setting it up. It should therefore come as no surprise that other possible illegal acts should come to the surface over the next couple of weeks or months.

I indicated in my speech in the House on Friday that I had already brought to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Quebec two apparent illegal acts and that I was bringing to his attention a third act which concerned the acquisition of computer tapes containing a list of members of the PQ.

Contrary to what the leader of the New Democratic Party has been saying, this did not involve a break-in at the offices or the headquarters of the Parti Québécois.

The other illegal acts that I had already brought to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Quebec, as indicated by the Leader of the Opposition, involve a case of arson and a case of theft of dynamite.

As to the case I brought to the attention of the House on Friday, it was first brought to my attention on the previous Friday in a very preliminary manner, and over the weekend the director general of the security office and the Commissioner of the RCMP were able to ascertain additional facts. We discussed the matter again on Monday and on Tuesday we had the matter brought to the attention of the Attorney General of Canada. We brought it to the attention of the federal Commission of Inquiry into the Practices and Procedures of the RCMP on Thursday and to the attention of the attorney general of the province of Quebec on Friday.

• (1422)

NAME OF PERSON AUTHORIZING PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS BREAK-IN

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the minister on being able to smuggle a prepared statement into the proceedings as effectively as he did the other day. I think I should point out that the unusual position the minister was in the other day was that he was introducing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in the interests of the continuing coverup hon. members opposite are trying to shout down questions from this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister has indicated that he knew for a full week of these matters before he brought them to the attention of parliament and then he brought them in a way through which he would not be subject to questions. Since the minister has known of these matters for more than a week now, I can assume that being advised of these illegalities the minister undertook an inquiry into them. I should like him to tell the House now who authorized the break-in relating to the Parti Québécois files and information and what reasons were given to the minister by whoever authorized it as to the reasons for it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter was indeed brought to my attention as I indicated in a very preliminary way on the previous Friday. Of course, I think it was my duty to try to obtain more facts before making a speech. I did bring it to the attention of the House as soon as it was possible after having had an opportunity to speak to a number of people involved with the matter. I had the opportunity to review the matter with my predecessors, the two previous solicitors general, who have clearly indicated to me that they had no knowledge whatsoever of the facts in question. I also had the opportunity of reviewing the matter with the Commissioner of the RCMP and the director general of security services who had made a number of inquiries within the security service itself to determine that the matter had been discussed at the most senior echelons of the security service, that is at the echelon of the then director general of the security service.

Mr. Clark: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has said that the matter has been discussed at the most senior levels. When was it discussed? What I am interested in is, who authorized the action? Will the minister answer that simple question?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think I answered the question during the course of my previous reply. It is quite clear that the matter had been discussed at the highest echelons of the security service—

An hon. Member: Who authorized it?

Mr. Fox: —and before the operation had been carried out it was brought to the attention of the director general of the security service.

Mr. Hees: Who authorized the operation?

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are obviously going to have to look further into this question of the authority on which the director general then acted and the degree to which there was involvement or implicit or explicit direction by the government of Canada. To that end, and since there is a great deal of confusion about what is going on—the former minister said he might have been advised but he is not really sure and the minister is quoted as saying—I say only quoted as saying—that it would be fair to conclude that he was lied to by the RCMP—since we have opened this very important question of ministerial responsibility and since the minister himself has impugned the reputation of the RCM Police, I should like to ask whether he would now be prepared to recommend to his colleagues that a special committee of this House of Commons be established with the power and mandate to look into all aspects of this question of illegal activities by the security services, including the involvement or at least knowledge of responsible ministers or officers of the Privy Council?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the premises mentioned by the hon. Leader of the Opposition go by. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated to me quite clearly, in no uncertain terms this morning, that he in no way was advised or aware of the act in question concerning Parti Québécois files. The other point is this: at no point did I ever say I was lied to by the RCMP, nor did I impugn the reputation of the force.

• (1427)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: If you look at the debates which have taken place here over the past few months, you can easily see who has been throwing allegations around this House in an unfair manner.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Fox: The Leader of the Opposition will have to make up his mind. In June of this year he was asking for a royal commission of inquiry into the practices and procedures followed by the RCMP. We now have such a commission. It is public, and it has all the requisite powers to enable it to look into those activities.

Some hon. Members: Not true!

Mr. Fox: If members of the opposition would cease listening to each other's drivel and read the terms of reference they would see that the commission clearly has all the powers necessary to follow any illegal act from person to person up to the highest levels of government.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SECURITY SERVICES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Believing that it is the security and intelligence services of the government and not necessarily the RCMP with regard to which we should get more information, may I ask the minister this: the Prime Minister is quoted on Friday last as saying that in 1974 or 1975—he was unsure of the year—he realized there was police surveillance of a democratic political party in this country—surveillance of the party itself and of members of that party. May I ask the Solicitor General, who is responsible to this House for security and intelligence services as well as for police services, whether he or any of his predecessors have found out what was the purpose of that investigation, on whose orders it was conducted and, finally, what investigation the government undertook at that time, and what were the modes and procedures of that surveillance?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is not very clear in my mind. He is asking me why there was surveillance in 1974 or in 1973. He obviously refers to an answer given by the Prime Minister during a press conference and he might take advantage of the Prime Minister's return to ask him the same question. As far as I am concerned, the procedures at this time are that we are trying, within the framework of a general mandate given the RCMP security services in 1975, to keep a close watch only over those groups who may be suspected of being subversive. This mandate refers to acts of espionage, terrorism, whether on the national or international level, to subversive acts and activities of foreign groups in Canada. It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that we do not generally carry out any surveillance of political parties, as the Prime Minister has already indicated, it is also quite clear that being a member of a political party, whether Liberal or Progressive Conservative or the New Democratic party or the Parti Québécois, does not give immunity to anyone who would tend to promote changes brought on by violent and undemocratic ways.

[English]

ALLEGED ARSON AND THEFT OF DYNAMITE—NAME OF PERSON AUTHORIZING ACTIVITY

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Of course, my question to the minister was: on whose orders was this done and what investigation was initiated by the government on learning of that surveillance? As well, this morning, according to the national press, Mr. Claude Morin who is described as an executive assistant to the present Solicitor General, indicated last night that the federal government—this government—knew last September that the police in Quebec had been involved in an arson incident and the theft of dynamite. That was last September. On whose orders did that take place, and what investigation has the government made into the alleged circumstances and facts?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): On the question of the facts, once again the hon. member is confused. I presume that what the newspaper article referred to was that this government, far from trying to conceal any facts, brought those facts to the attention of the attorney general of Quebec during September. On September 19, the deputy attorney general of the Department of Justice wrote a letter to the deputy attorney general of Quebec bringing these facts to his attention. That letter was delivered on September 20. As for the general allegations concerning the theft and the arson, the truth of the matter is that these questions were brought to our attention after my initial statement in the House on June 17 last. Those were, in part, the reasons the government decided to go ahead and launch a federal commission of inquiry, in order that the truth would come out and we would be able to establish once and for all the extent of any illegal break-in activities, clear the air for the RCMP and permit the RCMP security service to get on with the job which is essential to the security of this country.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. I do not use the word lightly and I use it carefully. The Solicitor General may disagree, but I think we are clearly involved in a coverup in this matter involving the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I have a quotation by the Prime Minister which seems to indicate that in the most unequivocal terms. I want to ask the Solicitor General for his interpretation of it. The Prime Minister is quoted in last Saturday's Globe, October 29, as saying the following:

> When we found they—

That is with reference to the RCMP.

> —were doing something illegal we told them to stop it and we told them they might have to be subject to due process of law for it.

My question to the Solicitor General about this is, if the Prime Minister was referring, and it is not clear from the context, to the time of the break-in, that seems to imply that something ought to have been done in terms of public revelation of the fact that it was done. That is one interpretation. The only other interpretation is that he was referring to the time he got the information, which was late last week, in which case he was saying we found then they were doing something illegal and we told them to stop. What did he find out late last week that they were still doing that he told them to stop?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe one would have to ask the Prime Minister what he had in mind when he made the statement. What I gather is that the statement referred to two different things, first the question of general surveillance of political parties. The position of the government has always been clear. No democratic political party of any stripe can be, should be or ought to be the object of systematic surveillance by the RCMP. That has been made clear time and time again in this House by the Prime Minister. We stated that in this House in 1976.

As to the other part of the question, where I think some confusion arises, the Prime Minister is obviously referring to the fact that this question concerning the computer tapes on which the lists of members of the Parti Québécois were included was brought to his attention at the end of last week or at the beginning of last week. I think it is as simple as that and the confusion once again rests in the mind of the reader.

Mr. Broadbent: We will see about that when the Prime Minister comes back to the House.

An hon. Member: Ask him.

Mr. Broadbent: If he were around, I would ask him. With reference to something else, the Prime Minister said with what I can only regard as calculated ambiguity in this case, and he is quoted in the press on the week-end, that when he found out that the surveillance was taking place, whether in 1974 or 1975 and he was not sure which, with reference to the compilation of the lists of the PQ membership that "maybe they", with reference to the RCMP "did tell me" about it at that time. Is it credible to the Solicitor General that a normally intelligent man back in 1974 or 1975, when informed of surveillance, when presumably he is not sure, that he learned about a list being in the hands of the RCMP about future membership, that he would not have asked the RCMP if they had acted by peaceful and legal means or by illegal means.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear the Prime Minister answered these questions in detail during the course of his conference. He stated that he did receive information from time to time from the RCMP security service, information which is gathered in the normal course of his duties and that in most cases the question as to where the information came from was not asked in view of the fact the RCMP always assured him the information came from reliable sources.

SURVEILLANCE OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS—ACTION BY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The Prime Minister revealed a sort of disarming naïvety on Friday when he said that this matter was brought to his attention in 1974 and 1975 and he was scandalized that they were observing a democratically constituted party. Would the Solicitor General not consider it a responsibility of the Prime Minister or indeed any minister that if he were scandalized by surveillance of a democratically constituted party, that he would have had the common sense and/or moral responsibility to go beyond that, being scandalized to find out if they were actually doing it democratically?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): When the Prime Minister found out that that was the case, his attitude was the proper one. It is the same one I would have today, to tell the security that any such surveillance is not proper and must cease immediately.

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ON ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES CONNECTED WITH FLQ IN 1970

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General. The sensational revelations he made last week have of course spread consternation even among the staunchest supporters of this government. Mr. Speaker, since the revelations made seem to have been brought out by the Keable Commission as a result of the Quebec government's action regarding the search in the offices of the Agence de presse libre du Québec, could the minister tell the House whether he at last will fully disclose the illegal activities by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, beginning with its infiltration in the ranks of the FLQ in 1970?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, our decision to set up a royal commission of inquiry in July was precisely to clear up the operations of the RCMP in an open, accurate and unequivocal way.

It was our opinion, Mr. Speaker—and it might not be shared by our colleague—that the best way to do it was to proceed within a judicial framework with a judge and procedures, where people can be examined and cross-examined under oath and have every opportunity to make their case to explain their acts to the court and to the population of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this way of proceeding is much more preferable than the one suggested by the hon. member. Besides, since he is so impressed by the activities of the Parti Québécois government in Quebec, I would remind him that this same government which makes such a deep impression on him is proceeding in the same way.

Mr. Matte: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec government may impress me, but the minister and the government impress us indeed greatly when we are faced with such disclosures. The minister can therefore dispense with make-believe explanations. Could he tell the House whether there is in RCMP files evidence of RCMP infiltration of FLQ cells in 1970, and whether the current commission will make public the relevant facts?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that if we had successfully infiltrated FLQ cells in 1970, I for one would have nothing but praise for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS BREAK-IN—DATE ON WHICH FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL INFORMED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Solicitor General. It arises from the non-answers given to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and the Leader of the Opposition. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the former Solicitor General, stated over the weekend he did not know whether he had been told or not about the break-in of the offices of the Parti Québécois in January, 1973. By now the former minister must have reached a threshold of recall or recovered from selective amnesia. Has the minister had a discussion with the former Solicitor General? On what date did the former Solicitor General say he was informed of the illegal break-in? I ask the minister this so that he will have the details of this ministerial coverup.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had discussions with the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs last Thursday, I believe it was, and again this morning. He confirmed to me quite clearly that not only does he have no recollection of the events but he is quite convinced that he was never apprised of them. I have also had a report from the Commissioner of the RCMP and the Director General of the Security Service who have gone through the files in detail. I have seen parts of them up to now and they indicate to me that there is no indication whatsoever in the files, nor is there any indication from the former director general of the security service, whom they interviewed, that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was at any time either before or after the event apprised of the method used to obtain the computer tapes in question.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, that is certainly an unusual answer. First of all the Solicitor General says that he does not have any recollection, and then he says that he now knows that he was not apprised of the situation. Would the minister answer the question that was asked by the Leader of the Opposition as to who directed and authorized this illegal break-in, theft and arson, etc. The Solicitor General has given us evasive answers, so I ask him, was it authorized by General Dare or Colonel Bourne of the Security Planning and Analysis Branch? I ask this question in light of the fact that this government is attacking the RCMP of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Matte.]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member has not had the time to verify his facts before asking the question. He wants to go back and look at the facts, when he would see that the day that the tapes were obtained was January 9, 1973. General Dare was not head of the security service at that time. In answer to his specific question, the entry or possible offence was authorized neither by Mr. Dare, whom he mentioned, nor Mr. Bourne.

Mr. Woolliams: Now, we have had a negative answer, Mr. Speaker, let us have a positive answer. Who did authorize this break-in? Let us have the names of the people involved and the branch of the government, whether the ministerial branch or the Security Planning and Analysis Branch.

Mr. Fox: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, hon. members enjoy repeating the same question. I responded to the Leader of the Opposition, I believe, who asked me the same question. If hon. members would care to stop their catcalls for one minute and listen to the answer, perhaps they would stop asking me redundant questions. I indicated quite clearly that the matter was authorized by the most senior level of the security service of the RCMP, and that was by the person holding the rank of director general.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—POSSIBLE REPORT BY SECURITY PLANNING AND ANALYSIS BRANCH

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it relates to the Security Planning and Analysis Branch within his department. I do not want him to confuse the House by going off into the security intelligence branch of the RCMP. Since that branch was formed in the department in 1971 to monitor and disseminate security information, and since officers of that branch were apparently aware of these activities in 1973, is the Solicitor General telling the House, in his answers to previous questions, that that branch and its director, Colonel Bourne, did not make any report whatsoever of these activities to the minister's predecessor?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I, too, read the Globe and Mail in the morning and I saw the same story. I asked the question of the head of that group and he reports to me that they were not advised, nor did they know in advance or after the fact, of the events in question.

Mr. Jarvis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his conversation with the director of that branch within his department, did the Solicitor General examine the relevant files of the branch to determine whether or to confirm that the branch knew absolutely nothing about these activities, and that furthermore the branch did not communicate any suspicion or any knowledge whatsoever to the minister's predecessor? Is the minister absolutely convinced of that?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I should say in response to the question that any indication to this effect would be examined in detail by the royal commission of inquiry, as all those files would be made available to them. I have not, of course, gone through all the files from that branch from the period 1970 to the present, nor do I intend to do so, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member wishes to read stories in the Globe and Mail, perhaps there is some fact in them. If there is, I would expect the people involved who wish to leave things to a newspaper would also wish to bring those matters to the attention of the royal commission of inquiry which has a mandate to look into these matters in detail.

AUTHORITY TO WHOM SECURITY INFORMATION TRANSMITTED AND BY WHOM

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General of Canada.

In a speech he gave to the House on October 28, the Solicitor General stated that the cabinet concluded that if information on the occupant of strategic position or a candidate for that position in the civil service was available and that they gave reason to believe that the said individual was a separatist or a sympathizer of the Parti Québécois, this information was deemed to be pertinent as far as national security was concerned and it should be brought up to the attention of the authorities concerned. My question is: Can the Solicitor General tell the House who are these authorities, who is in charge of bringing this information relating to national security to their attention and whether the cabinet is aware of all that.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to indicate to the hon. member that this is a matter of security practice inside the government. Of course, if we think that certain people are openly in favour of separation or of destroying the Canada we know, we think that there are some strategic positions, I do say some strategic positions, inside the federal administration where those people should not work. We have never thought of excluding those people from the federal administration but of keeping some people outside certain strategic positions. Perhaps I can give you one example: If we are preparing a constitutional strategy, if we have positions in the ministry of state for Federal-Provincial relations or in other departments where there are negotiations with the provinces, key negotiations on the future of the country, I think that all hon. members agree that this guy should not be there because it is very difficult for him to be honest with himself and with his political beliefs which, in several cases, as the hon. member knows, are very strong.

So in such cases, Mr. Speaker, we think that these people should not be moved to strategic positions in the federal administration. Of course, Mr. Speaker, information is, like in all other cases, brought to the deputy minister concerned who is responsible for assessing the authenticity and the relevancy of the information and for ensuring whether this information should be retained considering the strategic position in question.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In his statement, the Solicitor General made a distinction between a separatist and a sympathizer. Could he explain the difference between the two and how he can tell a separatist from a sympathizer? Is it someone who voted for the PQ or intented to do so, and also—

An hon. Member: You are out of order.

Mr. La Salle: No, I am not—also, Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's remark or statement of last Friday to the effect that in connection with the 1970 crisis, he had found normal that the RCMP should lay their hands on files in PQ offices. Could the minister tell us whether he sees a difference between an FLQ member in 1970 and a PQ member in 1973? That is a crucial issue!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister has ever said that it was permissible to commit illegal acts. What he really meant in his answer is that it is quite possible that in pursuit of its mandate for national security certain actions may be taken which cannot be accepted, which are really unacceptable. And the raid made in the building where there were magnetic tapes and a list of the PQ members is indeed an operation which the government cannot condone. Incidentally, I would like to point to the hon. member that despite his television appearance on Friday night, he very well might have mentioned, had he wanted to be perfectly honest, that the matter had been brought to the attention of the Quebec authorities by the Solicitor General of Canada, and it is no mere coincidence that it was made public, Mr. Speaker. As to his specific question, Mr. Speaker, it is obviously the duty of the deputy minister concerned to assess information. The hon. member asked what is actually a rhetorical question, namely whether a distinction was made between a member of the FLQ and a member of the Parti Québécois. The hon. member is fully aware of the situation since he has been sitting in this House for a long time and has himself heard the right hon. Prime Minister clearly state that there was no reason for Canadian security services to make any surveillance of the Parti Québécois which it obviously recognizes as a democratic party.

Mr. La Salle: They still did it!

Mr. Fox: However, Mr. Speaker, if by any chance there are people in the Parti Québécois or any other political party with Maoist, Trotskyist or other political tendencies, it would obviously be advisable for the security services to keep an eye on such groups to serve the best interests of both the Canadian and Quebec governments.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—SUGGESTION RESPONSIBILITY EXTENDS TO HIGHEST LEVEL

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to address this question to the Minister of Justice; but since the Solicitor General is one of the chief law enforcement officers in the country responsible for law and order, and since the concept of due process of law has been mentioned today, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he or any of his colleagues have given attention to the legal and other responsibilities which arise from those persons at the very top, such as the director general, who are responsible for the activities of the security service? In view of the very questionable activities which have been revealed here, I should like to ask him whether he agrees that due process of law extends right to the top, and that he will assure us that there will be no arbitrary chopping off of responsibilities at lower levels?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is the position of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: When are you resigning, then?

POSSIBLE SURVEILLANCE OF PERSONS CONNECTED WITH LAYCRAFT COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. I should like to direct another question to him. As revealing as the Quebec incidents are, involving the security services of the RCMP, I want to ask the Solicitor General about activities in another area of the country. I want him to go on record, if he will, and answer as to whether any persons connected with the Laycraft Commission of inquiry in Alberta—and this is further to the questions asked by the hon. member for New Westminster—including the attorney general of that province and his officials, have been subjected to clandestine or illegal surveillance, including bugging, wiretapping and particularly mail interception by the security services of the RCMP, or anyone under its direction? Can he give us that unequivocal assurance?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been closely examined by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The deputy commissioner of criminal operations has had a look at that. To the best of our knowledge, there is no basis in fact to any of the allegations which have come out. As I have indicated in answer to the question of the hon. member for New Westminster, the commanding officer of the force has met with the Solicitor General in order to review this matter. Also, the commanding officer made a public press release in Alberta to indicate that there was no factual basis to the allegations that the RCMP have been involved in bugging operations concerning the attorney general of the province of Alberta.

[Mr. Fox.]

OPERATION OF "O" BRANCH—MINISTERIAL KNOWLEDGE AND ACCEPTANCE OF RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy with that answer as well. By way of my final supplementary I should like to ask whether the Solicitor General, in connection with the security services of the RCMP, has been fully briefed on the activities of what is sometimes called the special "O" branch which, as he may or may not know, have their own financial section and conduct activities on such an autonomous basis that even the commanding officers of divisions know little if anything about their methods, whereabouts and activities. Can he indicate whether this branch has been in fact conducting operations in various parts of the country, that he is fully aware of the circumstances and will accept his ministerial responsibility therefor?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is a special "O" branch within the RCMP. I should like to point out to the hon. member that the RCMP operates under a mandate given to it by the government. The Director General of Security Services is responsible to see that this mandate is carried out. The government has directed that all of its operations must be carried out within the framework of the law. Also I should like to point out to the hon. member that since early spring an operational review committee has been set up within the RCMP. It reviews all of the operational matters entered into by the RCMP in order to assure that their operations come within the mandate as given to it by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, also I should like to point out that the Director General of the Security Services has access to law officers of the Crown in cases where he has doubts as to legality of the operation. Also he has access to me, if he wishes to bring the matter to my attention, since I meet with him on a weekly basis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REASON FOR FAILURE TO OBTAIN SEARCH WARRANT

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Solicitor General. In his speech in the House on Friday he spoke of a dilemma and urged that the House and the people of Canada not be over hasty in passing judgment in this case. I should like to ask him for a legal opinion which I know he can answer very easily. Does the law not provide for obtaining a search warrrant if any illegal activities are suspected? What was the dilemma or the emergency which prevented the use of the ordinary legal methods of search in this case?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone on this side of the House, or anyone in the House, would try to excuse any illegal activity. I think the position of the government is very clear.

Miss MacDonald: Except your own.

Mr. Fox: The position of the government is that any illegal activity which is brought to our attention will be brought to the attention of the proper prosecutorial authority.

The basic dilemma was raised not only by the Prime Minister and myself, but also by the Royal Commission of Inquiry into the security services in 1969, of which an eminent member of that party was, of course, a member. At that point it was clearly pointed out by the royal commission itself that there would be times when the security service, in pursuit of its mandate for national security—

Mr. Broadbent: What about this situation?

Mr. Fox: —may have a problem either accomplishing its mandate and breaking the law or not accomplishing its mandate.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What a stupid remark!

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Fox: I should like to mention one clear example. At the moment if a member of the security services needs to put his hands on a cypher code of a foreign country, for instance, or something which might be of very great interest to us—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: —it is quite clear that under the present legal framework that member could be accused of having committed an illegal act. To my mind that is a nonsensical situation in which to put members of the security services.

Mr. Broadbent: You are kidding!

Mr. Fox: That is the basic dilemma I wish to draw to the attention of the House and to the attention of hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General if it is not, in his opinion, the duty of everyone, including the Solicitor General, not to condone a clear breach of the law by anyone, and above all by police officers, in breaking and entering into the offices of a legal political party? If that is so, why are so many of his statements—particularly the one he made on Friday—so defensive and so evasive in tone?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as to the first part of the hon. member's question, the answer of course is yes. That was stated very clearly in my statement to the House in June of this year. It was made very clear that if there were deficiencies in the law, the solution was not to break the law, but the solution was to change the law. One of the very basic tasks of the Royal Commission of Inquiry will be to direct itself to that problem, which was not addressed in its complete details or in an entirely satisfactory fashion by the Royal Commission of Inquiry of 1969, of which Mr. Coldwell was a member—

An hon. Member: Are you going to legalize arson?

Mr. Broadbent: What a red herring!

Mr. Fox: —to sign that report indicating that really this was, for any democratic country, a very basic problem which we all had to come to grips with, whether we like it or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POSSIBLE SURVEILLANCE OF MEMBERS OF MEDIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. It being quite clear that under the doubtful use of security and for probably illegal methods this government and its agencies have had no compunction about making improper inquiries into political parties and politicians, can the minister now indicate the extent to which the government and intelligence agencies have made surveillances, carried on investigations and made interceptions of the media?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have no indications whatsoever of any general surveillance of the media.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Will you ask?

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH SEPARATE AGENCY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, and it has to do with the Royal Commission on Security which he has mentioned several times.

An hon. Member: Set up.

Mr. MacGuigan: In light of the recent events, is the government having second thoughts about its decision not to proceed with the recommendation of that royal commission to establish a separate agency to handle national security?

Mr. Woolliams: That is what they are after.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, this was one of the recommendations made by the royal commission in 1969. At that point that recommendation was looked at and examined in detail by the government and by the RCMP. For a variety of reasons, it was decided that it was best to leave the security services within the RCMP. I have looked at the question a number of times, and I think there are very good reasons for keeping the security services within the RCMP. There are some good reasons that can be marshalled on the other side of the argument to indicate that it ought to be a civilian agency outside of the RCMP. This is a problem we will have to examine in great depth and detail. I trust this is one of the main tasks that the new Royal Commission on Security, which was set up in July of this year, will want to examine in detail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED ELIMINATION OF CIVILIAN SECURITY GROUP AND RETURNING AUTHORITY TO FORCE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that all of the erosion of the integrity—

● (1502)

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the erosion of the integrity and of the good image of the RCMP is related to instances involving security and intelligence activity and have arisen since the initial establishment of the security planning and research group under the present Minister of Supply and Services, will the government consider restoring the confidence of the public in the RCMP by dismantling the civilian security planning and analysis branch of his department and re-establishing the security and intelligence operations and responsibilities under the sole control and direction of the RCMP where they were prior to the establishment of Goyer's gumshoes which have now become Fox's flatfeet?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The group to which the hon. member refers is a group—as he knows because he questioned them at great length during the examination of the estimates of my department last spring—which performs a very worthwhile function within our country, and the people who are working in that group are dedicated public servants, as he well knows.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

NO JUSTIFICATION FOR ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES BY POLICE FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Justice, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would the minister advise the House whether he, with his special responsibilities for the administration of justice, agrees with the Prime Minister when the Prime Minister stated that there may be technical breaches of the law which are justified in the name of national security, or does the minister agree with me that the administration of the law in a liberal democratic state has to be equitable, fair and the same for all persons, so that there is no justification for break-in and entry, for theft or arson, no matter what the rationalization or who perpetrates the breach?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, this is a question to which I have replied at least on three or four occasions this afternoon.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REASON FOR FAILURE OF CABINET COMMITTEE ON SECURITY TO LEARN OF ACTIVITIES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Prime Minister cannot be here, but perhaps the Solicitor General, even though he is new to the cabinet committee on security and intelligence, could tell us why the cabinet committee on security and intelligence, which is chaired by the Prime Minister and is the top level group in the security field and includes the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, did not know about the illegal break-in, arson and thefts until a few days ago, and why this information was kept from this cabinet committee and how did this come about?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The information to which the hon. member refers concerning the case was the result of an operation which everyone within the security service at that time, including the director general of the security service, did not consider to be an illegal operation. That is why from their point of view, there was no reason to report it to the government at the time.

CABINET INSTRUCTION ON SURVEILLANCE OF VARIOUS SECTORS OF COMMUNITY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In light of this further revelation, I wonder whether the Solicitor General can tell us, either during the question period or as a statement on motions, what instructions were issued by the cabinet committee on security and intelligence on questions of surveillance of political parties, members of the mass media, trade unions, the National Farmers' Union, etc., what information they were asked to obtain, and to whom this information was made available?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): If the hon. member wishes to read the speech I made in the House on Friday, he will see that I have outlined in great detail and have made public for the first time the complete mandate of the security service of Canada. It is quite clear that there is no mandate given to the security services of the RCMP to inquire into the over-all activities of any democratic political party in our country. However, let me say once again that if within such a political party there is a group of people who are dedicated to making changes through undemocratic means, then of course that group would become the legitimate object of surveillance by the RCMP.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DIRECTOR GENERAL OF SECURITY AND CABINET COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in light of the basic importance of this matter and the comments by the Prime Minister last Friday about the possibility of operating above the law, can the Solicitor General, either today or tomorrow, make a statement on motions indicating the exact nature of the relationship which exists between this cabinet committee chaired by the Prime Minister and the Director General of Security Services on whom in this matter the Solicitor General has cast all the responsibility?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No, I do not intend to make a statement on motions tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members have any questions to ask, they are free to do so, as they have done for almost an hour at the moment.

An hon. Member: That is one way to end the question period.

Mr. Fox: This remains the current practice and members of the opposition have the opportunity to examine officials of the security service during the course of examination of estimates, an opportunity which they had last spring and which they have exercised on a number of occasions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You are stonewalling, Francis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-10, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: May I just take a moment to refer the House to the practice which has been followed in the past in respect of this particular moment which calls for the introduction of some 205 individual private members' bills. The practice that has been followed in the past is the one of balloting. This leads to an agreed number of bills being put on the order paper by way of first reading, in the hope that a certain number at least will reach second reading and discussion.

It is not possible for us to take the time of the House, nor is it practical for us to introduce each bill individually. So, in keeping with past practice, may I suggest that we now give first reading to all 205 private members' individual bills at this time. However, by unanimous consent, the private members' public bills that will be listed for introduction in this way will be dealt with under one general motion, and I should repeat the caveat of the Chair that I have not undertaken to examine these bills with regard to their procedural regularity. That argument can always be raised at the time that the bill comes forward for further consideration, which is an exception to the practice, but is the only feasible way to do it.

Therefore, with the caveat that this is not a certification in any way by the Chair of the procedural regularity of the bills, may I put to the House the motion that some 205 bills listed on the order paper today as private members' public bills be given first reading?

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACKAY—"BUGGING" OF OFFICE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is not very often that I rise in this chamber on a question of privilege, but in view of the revelations that have come today and previously, I think I have a matter which affects the privileges of all members of the House. As a matter of fact, I learned about it when I was called out to the lobby.

Because of some of the circumstances, I thought it prudent to retain the services of an electronics expert to check my office, and I have been told that there is a live recording device hidden in one of the chairs in my office, a device that is fully operative. I thought this might be of some interest to the House, particularly in view of the assurances—

An hon. Member: How about that?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member raises a matter which is of great moment and concern. The matter will be investigated forthwith by officials of the House. That is the least I can undertake at this time. Until such time as any further information may come to light with respect to this occurrence, I can only assure the House that I will personally undertake to investigate this matter with the fullest vigour at my command.

An hon. Member: Fox is not surprised.

WAYS AND MEANS

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY TO DEBATE WAYS AND MEANS MOTIONS

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 60, I request you to designate an order of the day for consideration tomorrow of the ways and means motions tabled by the Minister of Finance on October 20 last.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ILLEGAL ACTS COMMITTED BY FORCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 26, of which I gave you notice earlier. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), the adjournment of the House under the terms of Standing Order 26 because of an unusual emergency.

That emergency relates to the revelations on Friday by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) that the security services have, in the recent past, illegally entered premises to steal information concerning a legal political party. The statement by the Solicitor General raises major questions of policy and procedure in the vital area of national security services which are of urgent importance to the people of Canada and which cannot be dealt with under the business of the House, as proposed by the government, in the immediate future. I therefore believe that this matter requires the urgent attention of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should indicate to the House that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) did give me notice in accordance with Standing Order 26, and that shortly after I received notice from the Leader of the Opposition I received similar notice on the same subject, and under the same Standing Order, from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent).

I have referred to Standing Order 26 in the past, and have often referred to the difficulty the chair is placed in with respect to applications under it. Applications are often made about matters which are, in fact, very important and worthy of urgent consideration, but are continuing matters, as opposed to being matters of some critical focus. I regret whenever I have to make that kind of decision, because certainly applications pursuant to Standing Order 26 do bring with them one guarantee, and that is a guarantee that if a special debate is ordered, the matter will have a relevancy that this House ought to pursue in debates which do take place in this chamber; therefore, I am inclined to interpret, wherever I can, sympathetically the provisions of Standing Order 26.

Indeed, as I have said many times in the past, if Standing Order 26 is on our books in order to permit, from time to time, special debates on matters that require urgent consideration, and if the Chair is not going to give a favourable interpretation of that rule from time to time, then the rule might just as well be taken off the books.

There are conditions to which this Standing Order is subject. I have read them before, particularly Standing Order 26 (5) which says that regard ought to be had by the Chair for other opportunities which might reasonably present themselves for the House to deal with subject matters of this sort. The House has many times heard this Chair pronounce that reasonable opportunities did otherwise exist. In fact, just last week I did so, because I was of the opinion that a subject which I felt in a personal way was of very crucial importance would be before the House for several days.

I cannot say that that is the circumstance which faces us now. Subparagraph (16) of the Standing Order says the following:

> The right to move the adjournment of the House for the above purposes—

That is to say, the purposes of this order.

> —is subject to the following conditions:
> (a) The matter proposed for discussion must relate to a genuine emergency, calling for immediate and urgent consideration—

I think there is a temptation to look at the word "emergency" and apply a very strict definition to it, which would seem to imply only debates brought about by sudden and unexpected events. It seems to me in the past that the word "emergency" has been intelligently applied by the Chair in setting aside applications with regard to matters of continuing concern such as general economic conditions, matters of unemployment and even continuing strikes, to ascertain the extent which has been known and present for some time, although that poses a separate and rather more delicate problem.

In any case, it seems to me that both sudden occurrences and unexpected occurrences are "emergencies" within the meaning of the word. So, too, is the sudden and unexpected revelation of events which have taken place in the past, in that they might precipitate a course of conduct which, if allowed to continue unchecked, would certainly classify itself as an emergency and a matter of urgent consideration.

Therefore, it seems to me that, following all of the language of Standing Order 26 again, as I have said in the past, if the House is not prepared, pursuant to a reasonable interpretation of this Standing Order, to direct its attention to a matter so serious and urgent as this, then we might as well take the order off the books. I, therefore, find that the matter is an important one to be discussed within the terms of Standing Order 26.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There is one other matter about which I feel the House ought to know and to which I have addressed myself, and that is the matter of sub judice as it applies to our proceedings. There is, pursuant to the Standing Order, no opportunity for argument in these matters; therefore, neither is there any obligation on the presiding officer to give reasons. However, I think the House ought to know that since the House ordered an inquiry into the practices of the RCMP some time ago—that order is part of our proceedings and, in fact, the inquiry as a result of that order is now in progress—the House ought to be assured that the Chair has directed itself to the argument of sub judice.

To me, sub judice has no application here, for two reasons. In the first place, the body carrying out this work pursuant to the order is an investigatory body and not a judicial body coming to a decision. Second, in this case no decision of that body could in any way be prejudiced, surely, by a debate or discussion here. If that were the case, I would have set aside all questions during the question period, which would have been, to me, an affront to the members of this House in pursuing their proper obligations here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have said in the past many times—and I made it clear in the recent work of our Standing Committee on Rights and Immunities of Members in coming to a clear definition of the sub judice convention as it applies here—that any interference with discussion, questioning or debate in this chamber on the basis of matters being before the courts ought to be done only on the very strictest interpretation of that convention, and only upon the argument being carried before the Chair that some decision by a judicial body not only is about to be made but, in fact, is about to be made and might be prejudiced by the proceedings, debate or discussion in this House, which is certainly not the circumstance here.

Therefore, taking all the circumstances into consideration, again I say that the matter is proper to be discussed. The procedure which follows now is one which we have faced many times in the past. I repeat that this matter was put forward initially by the Leader of the Opposition, and shortly thereafter by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. With the consent of the House I would, therefore, want to consider that when the question is put, it ought to be shown as being put by the Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. In the circumstances, I think that would be fair.

Technically, the procedure is to ask the House whether consent exists to put the question. If consent is not forthcoming, it takes only 20 members to support the putting of the motion. In the circumstances, it seems to me that that would be forthcoming. Therefore, I might assume that consent will be forthcoming and that the motion ought to be put.

The only remaining consideration is for the Chair to decide when the debate will take place. I have two choices open to me. One is to defer a decision until tomorrow. The second is to order the debate to take place at eight o'clock tonight. I see no reason to entertain argument or discussion in using this rule. It is on the books for this purpose. The matter is urgent and worthy of immediate consideration, and I think the debate should take place at eight o'clock tonight.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to subparagraph (9) of the rule, which states as follows:

If it is determined that the member may proceed, the motion shall stand over until 8.00 o'clock p.m. on that day, provided that Mr. Speaker, at his discretion, may direct that the motion shall be set down for consideration on the following sitting day at an hour specified by him.

My question to you is this. Because it is within your discretion, and because a very key element in this whole debate is the participation of the individual, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is not here today but could possibly be back here tomorrow by this time, for debate in this House tomorrow, would it be possible, until we can ascertain if the Prime Minister can be back for the debate, for Your Honour to defer your ruling on when the debate should take place?

If it is possible for the Prime Minister to be back by eight o'clock tonight, perhaps we should have the debate tonight. But if it is possible that he will not be back until tomorrow afternoon, in your discretion could you rule that the debate could be held tomorrow afternoon, because it is essential that he be here?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I have heard the application and I have dealt with it. If I had been met with an application on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of his desire to participate, I might have looked at this application in a different light. I have been asked to set up a debate pursuant to Standing Order 26. I have acceded to that request, and in pursuance of the Standing Order I have ordered that it take place tonight. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro).

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to indicate that I have been endeavouring to catch your eye for some time, although I recognize why it was quite impossible in the circumstances. The government is quite prepared to go along with the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), seconded by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). That should be known when seeking the consent which you have just indicated, although I must say it is the view of the government that in the question period the Solicitor General acquitted himself superbly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The consent of the House having determined that the matter is proper to be discussed, subject to the application of the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, and consent of the House having been sought and obtained, the debate on the motion moved by the hon. Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby will take place at eight o'clock tonight.

Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)) (for Mr. MacEachen) moved that Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments contained in Bill C-5 which we are now considering can be dealt with under three main headings: First, amendments respecting the registration of political parties and other election expenses provisions of the Canada Elections Act; second, amendments to facilitate administrative procedures under the act as recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer; third, a group of amendments, also recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer, which will improve voting facilities and supplement the other administrative amendments.

Shortly after the passing, in January, 1974, of the Election Expenses Act which we all agree was a complicated piece of legislation, the Chief Electoral Officer convened a meeting of senior members from the national headquarters of the political parties represented in the House of Commons. Following that meeting, an ad hoc committee was set up, chaired by the director of election expenses of the office of the Chief Electoral Officer. This action was at the request of the parties involved, with the objective of reviewing the new election expenses provisions.

Over a period of a year or so of productive discussions by the ad hoc committee there was developed a substantial number of suggested amendments concerning the registration of political parties and the election expenses provisions of the Canada Elections Act. I understand that these proposed amendments received the unanimous support of the committee. I am pleased to add that in the main these proposals have been included in the bill. Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the members of the ad hoc committee for the open and congenial spirit in which they carried on the work of their committee.

On February 13, 1976, pursuant to subsection 59(1) of the Canada Elections Act, the Chief Electoral Officer transmitted to Mr. Speaker a substantial list of amendments, which, in the words of the act, he considered "are desirable for the better administration of this act". Those amendments were referred to and considered by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. Except in respect of one or two minor points, the suggested amendments were concurred in by the committee. The standing committee also recommended that consideration be given to some further amendments stemming from a number of private members' bills which it had at the same time considered. All amendments approved by the committee are included in the proposed legislation, with the exception of the committee's recommendation respecting a shortened election period.

With regard to the third category of proposed amendments to improve voting facilities and provide further opportunities for electors to vote, the proposed amendments were developed and recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer as a result of a number of representations he received from many sources. As an example of the extension of voting facilities, provision will be made for the casting of ballots in the office of the returning officer in the two weeks or so preceding polling day, where the elector will be absent and unable to vote at an advance poll or at an ordinary poll on polling day. The Chief Electoral Officer included some further amendments of a quasi-administrative nature to supplement the ones he proposed in his February, 1976, supplementary report to Mr. Speaker.

Taking into account the foregoing, it is evident that the bulk of the proposed amendments stem out of recommendations from the ad hoc, all-party committee chaired by the director of election expenses, and the House of Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. In respect of the other amendments as developed by the Chief Electoral Officer, as I have already indicated, they are of a nature to facilitate the opportunity for electors to vote. I feel confident that these amendments will be favourably received by all parties, and that the spirit of co-operation which has prevailed in the ad hoc committee will ensure the early enactment of these proposed amendments.

In light of the deliberations of the committee of the House of Commons in respect of this important matter, preceding the introduction of this bill, it is my hope and the hope of the government that the House will readily pass Bill C-5 on second reading and refer it to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that members of all parties may have an opportunity to review the amendments which have their basis in either the recommendations of that committee or of the Chief Electoral Officer.

In the event that there is any discussion of specific amendments, hon. members would have an opportunity to debate them in committee and bring forward their views if there are any modest disagreements about what I think is a widely supported bill to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say, on behalf of my colleagues in this party, that we are happy to have the amendments in relation to the Canada Elections Act and election law before the House. We are particularly pleased that so many of the proposals made in the all-party committee referred to by the minister have been accepted. At one time I had the privilege of serving as a member of the standing committee of this House which originally dealt with the election expenses legislation. I also had the opportunity to represent my party on the all-party committee that was designed to repair any matters which had been overlooked in the original legislation.

I think it would be entirely appropriate for me, on my own behalf and on behalf of all members of the committee, to extend our appreciation to the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. J. M. Hamel, for the way in which he presided over the discussions of the all-party committee, for the guidance he gave to all members, and for the very reasonable and effective suggestions he has made from time to time regarding the way in which we can improve the election law of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I should like to say, for those who are accustomed to occasional conflict between members of different parties, that a rather welcome spirit of co-operation was exhibited by members of all parties on the committee working on amendments to the Canada Elections Act. Some 40 amendments were proposed by that all-party committee. The majority of those amendments are in the bill now before the House, to be dealt with. Many of them are of particular importance. They will be of some help to incapacitated voters. There are references to special voters' lists, and there are changes in relation to advanced polling which will make it more possible to ensure that every individual who wants to vote, and has the right to vote, can vote. Those are all very important matters and we are delighted they have been brought forward by the minister.

I noticed that in the remarks of the minister he said the proposed amendments received the unanimous support of the committee. I think it should be clear that the proposed amendments of which he was speaking were those proposed by the all-party committee prior to the introduction of this legislation to the House. I think the minister will agree that was his intention. In other words, he was not suggesting that the amendments incorporated in Bill C-5 have the support of all members of the House of Commons. The fact is, they do not have the support of this party when it comes to one or two important particulars.

Mr. Cafik: I want to make it clear that I agree with the Leader of the Opposition. I did not at any time indicate directly, nor did I intend to imply indirectly, that there was unanimous support for every single point related to this bill.

Mr. Clark: I am pleased to have that point clarified. The fact is that in the movement from the all-party committee to the House of Commons, through the cabinet, or perhaps through the boardrooms where the campaign managers of the Liberal party sit, two profound changes were made in the law as against what was agreed to in the all-party committee. I make the point that they have adulterated, they have seriously changed and weakened those proposals, with grave consequences not simply for the electoral law of Canada but also for the principle of open, honest elections in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: They are departures which we in this party are not prepared to accept. The Minister of State should know that. He and his colleagues should understand that if this were a minor matter, we would be prepared to let it go. But the two changes smuggled into this bill not only profoundly change the electoral law of Canada, they betray the spirit in which the elections act was introduced.

I shall not detain the House for long on this matter, but I want to make our reservations and concern very clear. The first of these departures from the all-party agreement relates to the proposal by the government to increase the spending limits applicable to political parties by the rate of inflation since 1974. The second, which is the most ominous, the most dangerous and the most destructive to the principle of open government, is the provision which will explicitly allow anonymous contributions to be made to political parties. Someone behind me asks, "Why not go back to the old system?" Well, the all-party committee made a recommendation which I shall be commenting upon in a moment. This would have made it clear and certain that we would never in this country return to the old system.

That recommendation, which was supported in the committee by representatives of all parties, was struck down by the Liberal cabinet and does not find a place in the bill. What this bill does is take us back to the bad old days of election financing in this country when it was possible for contributions to be made under the table. We in this party want an end to that system, and in our approach to this bill we shall attempt to ensure the introduction of an amendment which would have that effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I turn, first, to the question of indexing the limits of possible expenditure so as to take account of inflation since 1974. There is some history involved here. This step was first proposed in the all-party committee by representatives of the Liberal party. It was extensively discussed and the proposal to increase the limits of expenditure was voted down. We thought the matter was dead, since it had been agreed by all parties that it would be put aside. Nevertheless, in July of this year we saw the earlier edition of the bill before us and we noticed that the proposition which had been voted down by the all-party committee had been brought back by the cabinet and that there was, indeed, a proposal to index—though only back to 1976.

That was bad enough, but apparently the political manipulators of the Liberal party got together during the summer and decided that the extra money made possible under that proposal would not be enough. What they did was introduce, in this bill, an indexing provision taking us back, not to 1976 but to 1974. I want to explain what this means to the House of Commons, to the political parties and to the public treasury. Under index ceilings, each party will have the opportunity, now, to spend in an election campaign—I am speaking of national parties here—in the neighbourhood of $5.3 million. In the absence of indexation, the limit would be in the neighbourhood of $4 million. So what we have here is a difference of $1.3 million imposed upon the electoral law by the Liberal party for their own narrow partisan reasons.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: This proposal will mean that each candidate would be able, on an average, to spend some $7,600 more than the amount set forth in the election expenses legislation. There is a further aspect. Officials in my own party headquarters inform me that on the basis of tax credits granted by the government in respect of $100 donations, and on the basis of advertising rebates from the treasury provided for in the act, government revenues would be decreased by fully $11 million. That will be the loss to the treasury if this indexing proposal is allowed to proceed. So this is not merely a change in the election law designed to benefit the sponsoring party; it will also mean a serious drain on the public treasury. That would be the cost if there were to be a general election in 1978. It might cost the public a great deal more if the election were delayed until 1979. To a government which spends money like water, $11 million might not seem much. But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that to Canadians who want to see the exercise of some restraint in federal spending, $11 million means a great deal.

I should like to make the point again that there is no mystery at all as to the reason for this measure being brought in. It is no secret at all that the party in office, simply through being in office, has a greater opportunity to raise national election funds than do parties on this side of the House. What the government party is doing here is trying to change the election law so that it can spend more money to influence the decisions of Canadian electors once an election is called. They are not prepared to rely simply on their record—we can understand that. What they are looking for now is an authorizing law that will allow them to spend more money to attempt to buy the support and the votes of the people of Canada. That, I must point out, comes from a government which took great pride two or three years ago in introducing the election expenses legislation. It argued then that it wanted to impose some sanity upon the excessive expenditures made in election campaigns in the past. Here we have the principle enunciated two or three years ago undermined and betrayed by the very government that took credit for it then.

The existing limits have been tested in by-elections in Canada and have been found satisfactory to all parties. The previous ceilings have never been tested in a general election. There is no evidence that they will be insufficient. There is every evidence that they will, in fact, have the effect of ensuring some fairness and sanity to election compaign expenditures. Despite that, the government of Canada, the Liberal Party of Canada, wants to use the law to raise the limit so that it can spend more money to attempt to buy the votes of the Canadian people.

That is the first matter. It is the first departure that we are not prepared to accept. We want it taken out of this bill before we are prepared to limit debate—I say that to the minister—and have the matter approved finally by the House of Commons.

The other matter is even more dangerous. That is the matter which relates to anonymous contributions. Again, some history from the all-party committee. The all-party committee wanted written into the law of Canada an amendment that would instruct that all anonymous contributions, whether to a party, candidate or organization representing a party, would be paid over to the Receiver General of Canada. In other words, anybody who came to the committee room of a political party with a little brown bag full of money would not be able to have that little brown bag go anonymously to that party. That money, in the view of the election law, would have to be properly contributed. It would go to the public revenue of Canada.

That was the recommendation of the all-party committee. It was the recommendation of Liberal members of parliament serving on that committee, as well as the officers of that party. It was the recommendation that went to cabinet and which cabinet struck down. The cabinet of Canada, for reasons we hope future speakers in this debate will elaborate on, wants to have a situation where it is possible for anonymous contributions to be made.

I want again to bring the House of Commons back to an understanding of the reasons we all supported so enthusiastically the reforms introduced some years ago to election expenses law. There were a number of aspects of that law. One was that it was going to make public party financing, which too often had been private before. Hand in hand with the principle of making party financing public and letting Canadians see what goes on in their political process. Provisions were brought in which would extend tax credits to Canadians who wanted to contribute to individual political parties, as well as provisions to provide for partial public financing of election campaigns.

What we have here is an indication that the Liberal party is quite prepared to accept public financing of election campaigns. It is quite prepared to have tax credits extended to people who contribute to political parties. However, it is not prepared to eliminate anonymous contributions, which have been the bane of our political system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I go back to some of the statements made by the then, and again, President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) who piloted the original legislation through the House. On July 10, 1973, the President of the Privy Council said:

> Among the major changes incorporated in the new bill are the requirement for full disclosure and the imposition of a ceiling on campaign spending by political parties.

That was one of the principles of the legislation spelled out by the man who guided it through the House of Commons. Now, that principle is being abandoned. There is not full disclosure when you have anonymous contributions. There is not full disclosure when the Liberal party brings into the Parliament of Canada a provision to allow shadowy figures carrying little brown bags of money to make those contributions to the Liberal party without their names being recorded. I want again to quote from the proposals of the then, and again, President of the Privy Council. He said:

> These reform proposals—

As I recall the proposals, I believe he emphasized the word "reform".

> —will remove much of the secrecy from the financial affairs of political parties—

That was one of the principles of the legislation that has now been betrayed by this government which has struck down an amendment which would end once and for all the possibility of secrecy of these party affairs. Instead of the principle of open government, this government prefers a situation of anonymous contributors who can bring their money for whatever reason and not be noted or identified. That is a blot on our political system. It is not one which this party is prepared to accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to make it very clear, particularly because the Minister of State (Mr. Cafik) made reference to it in his opening remarks, that the desire to have secrecy and to allow anonymity in contributions is not a desire of the all-party committee. It is not a desire of this party. I am sure it is not a desire of the New Democratic Party or the Social Credit party. It is simply a desire of the Liberal cabinet, who have changed the recommendation of the all-party committee for their own narrow political reasons.

We in this House of Commons decided, when the original legislation came before the House, that we wanted an open system. We want to let the sun shine in on the political process. We do not want shadowy figures and anonymous contributions. That was why we brought in the election expenses changes. We now see that the government of Canada, the Liberal party, is seizing the first opportunity to bring down the blinds, to introduce a little more secrecy into the system, to recreate a situation where contributions are made in the shadows and where suspicions arise regarding the political system. That is an unacceptable betrayal of the principles of the Election Expenses Act that were introduced and endorsed by members of all parties just a few years ago.

Clearly, that causes suspicion that there is only one reason why the government of Canada, the Liberal party, has introduced this amendment. The reason is that they are trying to find new ways to buy the next election in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to repeat three points. First, the fundamental one, is that the Progressive Conservative party believes that we must have an open political system. We want Canadians to know what their political figures and what their political parties are doing. We do not want secrecy. That is why we supported the Election Expenses Act in the first place. That is why we are so offended by this attempt to introduce secrecy, to bring back anonymous, shadowy contributors bringing their money in little brown bags in expectation of lord knows what kind of recognition by the party later. That is the first principle. We want an open system. The government party wants a system that is less open.

Second, flowing from that is the proposal of indexing which would cost the public treasury of Canada $11 million. That proposal is not acceptable to this party, just as it was not acceptable to the all-party committee. Finally, the principle of allowing anonymous contributions to the political process in Canada is also not acceptable to this party.

I make it very clear to ministers on the other side that this is a matter of very real principle to us. We take seriously the fact that over the past several years there has grown up in Canada a deep, destructive suspicion of the political process. Canadians are prepared to believe the worst about our political parties. The only way we can demonstrate that the system is open, that the system is honest, is to let the Canadian public see as much as possible of what is going on within the political system. That was the spirit in which the election expenses law was introduced. That is the spirit which the two cabinet additions to this bill today undermine and destroy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which is related to the point raised earlier today by the hon. member for Central Nova, who brought the rather alarming news to the attention of the members of this House of the existence of a bugging device in his office.

My point is as follows. This is not the first time that this issue has been raised. The hon. member for Yukon has in the past made a serious case about the possibility of wiretapping on his line. We now have confirmation by another respected member of the House that a bugging device has been found. My concern, Mr. Speaker, is as to what might transpire between now and, say, the next 24 hours.

If, indeed, the device which has been found by the hon. member for Central Nova is as he has described it—and none of us has any reason to doubt that at all—then those who are responsible for locating this device in the hon. member's office quite conceivably have put them in other members' offices, and during the next 24 hours it is quite conceivable that some attempt might be made to remove these devices from other members' offices.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I seriously suggest, on behalf of all hon. members, that through your office certain steps should be taken to—whatever word one uses—-supervise or secure the offices of all members pending the time a check can be made of all members' offices to see if bugging devices are located elsewhere. I do not think it can be dismissed lightly at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I wish to point out to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that Mr. Speaker noted this afternoon that he would take this matter under advisement and certainly look into it. Therefore, I will take the hon. member's suggestion right to the Speaker now.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to outline some concerns we have about the bill which is before the House, the amendments to the Canada Elections Act. The act under which we are now governed was passed during the minority parliament of 1972 to 1974. It is an act that was long overdue in terms of bringing about needed reforms in the financing of candidates and their parties, and the disclosure of where these funds came from. I think it was no accident that this electoral reform was carried out when the New Democratic Party held the balance of power in the twenty-ninth parliament. It has always been a very long-standing and firm commitment on the part of our party that election reform was desperately needed in Canada to restore confidence in the democratic and electoral process.

I should like to remind hon. members of the chief provisions of this act, because I think the amendments which we have before us today to a certain extent subvert the intention of the twenty-ninth parliament which passed a very important and forward-looking piece of legislation. The act has, in my opinion, three main provisions. First of all, it puts limits on the amount that political parties and candidates can spend during an election. The reasoning behind this was to prevent the electoral process from being dominated by the wealthy, by those who had funds at their disposal and, therefore, could buy media time and other kinds of advertising. An ordinary citizen would not be able to do this. So putting a limit on the amount spent during an election was an important advance; it put everybody on an equal of footing, at least in terms of the amount which could be spent.

The second major provision required public disclosure of amounts in excess of $100 contributed by a donor to a party or a candidate. This, also, is fundamental to the act because it provides for an open process. Surely, that is what democracy is all about—that we know where funds are coming from so we can make a judgment as to the vested interest of the donor of such funds. The third important provision had to do with reimbursing candidates for expenses in an election, up to the prescribed maximum. I hardly need tell the House that this is important since it prevents candidates from being discriminated against because they or their supporters do not have sufficient funds to run a worth-while and full election campaign.

Those were the chief advancements which were made in the last act. However, legislation has to meet the realities of the times. We have had some by-elections and representations have been made to the Chief Electoral Officer in regard to improvements. I should like at this time to pay tribute to the Chief Electoral Officer, his staff and those who sat on the parliamentary committee, as well as on the ad hoc committee, and proposed changes and clarifications to the act. I think we have before us a number of improvements, clarification of language and terms, and some improvements for which members on both sides of the House and members of the general public have asked.

There are, of course, a number of changes which cause us some concern. The first that I should like to mention is inflation indexing of election expenses. We in our party recognize that since the act was passed in 1974, expenses have risen. I do not think it was the intention of the twenty-ninth parliament to freeze for all time the expenses of a candidate in an election. We have to be realistic and must understand that as inflation continues from year to year, the original limitations which were set may not be realistic. It seems to me we have to look closely at the formula presently contained in the bill before us, so as to make sure that the inflation formula is reasonable and does not violate the spirit of the original act, that it does not impose a great burden on the taxpayers. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while we recognize the need for some kind of adjustment to the formula for determining what are to be the limits of election expenses, we are at the same time concerned that that formula not be more generous than is absolutely necessary.

The other very crucial point in the bill before us is an omission which is of real concern to me and my party. It is an omission which in reality strikes at one of the fundamental principles which I outlined in my earlier comments about what this bill is supposed to do. I refer to the principle of public disclosure. As the act now reads, there is a very important loophole which remains uncorrected by the bill before the House. I refer to the lack of any prohibition of anonymous contributions to a party or to a candidate. The all-party committee looked at this question very carefully. I have before me the minutes of that committee when this very issue was raised.

If we go to all the trouble to design an election reform act to limit the kinds of contributions which may be given to a candidate in a campaign, then surely we have to look at all the possible ways that intention could be subverted. One of the easiest ways in which that intention could be subverted is anonymous contributions: the idea of money coming to a candidate's headquarters anonymously, being used in the campaign, and no public disclosure of where that amount of over $100 came from.

The all-party committee minutes indicated that someone with an unmarked envelope addressed to the party or candidate would come, deliver or send by mail an amount of money. Someone making an anonymous donation will not be concerned about any rebate under the income tax system. Therefore, the rebate function under the Income Tax Act requiring that someone's name be disclosed cannot be used as an argument.

I thought the committee had made some very sensible recommendations. They wanted to make it illegal for any contributor not to supply the agent with his proper name and address. The committee indicated that an easy amendment could be incorporated in the bill before us under the beneficial ownership clause. Furthermore, to close any further loophole, the committee wanted to make it illegal for any candidate or party to use funds contributed anonymously. It suggested that any such anonymous contribution received could be deposited to the credit of the Receiver General of Canada for the purpose of the enforcement of this act.

It seems to me that those two suggestions are in line with the intent of the original act. They make sense, because they close a very important loophole which would subvert the intention of the act. This can be done by demanding that there be no anonymous contributions, that financial support given to a candidate would require a name attached to it and it would have to be public knowledge. If any such anonymous funds bypassed that system and got to the candidate, the candidate could not use such funds.

We do not see that very tight and precise prohibition in the bill before us. Surely, that has to be one of the fundamental weaknesses of the bill. It subverts, it weakens, and it destroys any credibility that the public can have in this government's intent to bring about electoral reform if it does not plug the obvious loophole of anonymous contributions. We in the New Democratic Party will not stand for that kind of subversion of a very good elections act. We will fight for amendments to the bill prohibiting any kind of anonymous contributions, or use thereof, in a campaign.

Another part of the entire bill and the elections act which concerns me is the weakness wich was manifested recently in a federal by-election in Ottawa-Carleton. Section 70.1 deals with incurring election expenses by individuals other than candidates or organizations which are recognized as a political party or part of a political party. I should like to read that provision into the record, because I think it is germane to the situation which occurred recently in the federal by-election to which I have referred. I should like to refer to the Statutes of Canada, 1973-74, at C.51 on page 26. Section 70.1(1) reads as follows:

> Every one, other than
> (a) a candidate, official agent or any other person acting on behalf of a candidate with the candidate's actual knowledge and consent, or
> (b) a registered agent of a registered party acting within the scope of his authority as such or other person acting on behalf of a registered party with the actual knowledge and consent of an officer thereof, > who, between the date of the issue of the writ for an election and the day immediately following polling day, incurs election expenses is guilty of an offence against this act.

The problem is this: in the by-election in Ottawa-Carleton, Mr. Donald Roach hired an aeroplane which towed a banner behind it with the following message, "OHC employees—767 CUPE Vote, but not Liberal."

Mr. Paproski: A good message; a great message.

Mr. Symes: This is an example of a third party involved in advertising in an election campaign. The third party was not a member of any of the parties campaigning in the campaign itself. It was an outside, non-political group. They advertised a political message. The Chief Electoral Officer launched a suit, after the by-election, against Mr. Roach for violation of the current elections act. Subsequent to a trial, we find that Judge Hugh Zimmerman ruled that Donald Roach did not violate the Canada Elections Act.

The court decision raises a very serious question about the intent of the act passed by the Parliament of Canada, because if that decision is allowed to stand, it subverts the limitation of expenses provision of the act. If that court ruling is upheld, it could be possible for any third party to advertise for or against a recognized candidate or party as defined by the elections act.

Conceivably, in the next federal election we could have advertising of any sort placed by such groups as Citizens Coalition, the Trotskyites, any police association or any concerned citizens' group which may arise during a campaign, arguing their points of view with a message to vote for or against a certain candidate. If non-political party is able to do that, then what effect will it have on the provisions of the act limiting the expenses a political party can incur?

Therefore, it would be quite easy for any of the recognized political parties to say to another group, "Well, if you get together and raise some funds and advertise in such a way that it is beneficial to my party, that is all to the good; it will never come under the limitations of the Election Expenses Act". We have to look at that weakness in order to determine whether it necessitates the bringing in of a further amendment to the bill before us in order to close the loophole of non-recognized parties, groups or individuals advertising during a campaign, or whether the Chief Electoral Officer must take the court decision to the Supreme Court of Canada and ask for a very definitive ruling on it. If we do not take into account that incident in the by-election and the subsequent court decision, it seems to me we will have thrown the limitation of expenses out the window. We will have provided a major loophole that subverts one of the fundamental intentions of this act to bring about electoral reform in this country.

Those are some of my concerns and those of my party. I should like to acknowledge, again, and pay tribute to the work of the committee. I am gratified to see that some of the representations I have made, and I know other members have made, have been accepted. I think, for example, of the provision in the bill before us that will allow advance voting for people who, because of their work, may be out of the constituency for quite a while prior to the advance polls.

I think that provision is long overdue. But what worries me are the omissions in the bill before us which are an indication of the attitude of the Liberal government once it gets back to a majority position.

In a minority parliament we had a real, meaningful and positive reform of our election procedures in this country, as contained in the act before us. For the first time, it brought a degree of openness to the democratic process, a degree of equality in terms of fund raising and expenditure. Because of the subsequent incidents and the loopholes that have been discovered, I fear that unless we have a tightening up, more so than this bill gives us, we will regress, rather than progress, in terms of reforming the democratic process in this country.

I want, as my party has always wanted, an open and above board system of election financing. To do that, we must have limitations on expenditures, we must have full public disclosure of where the money is coming from, and we must have a measure of reimbursement from the public treasury for campaign expenses. I fear that because of some of the loopholes which are not corrected, the government has ignored the recommendations of the all-party committee, and the great act which was passed in the twenty-ninth parliament, which I think restored some confidence to the people of Canada in our political system, will suffer and that confidence will be eroded, as indeed will the act and the whole political process unless we see some tightening up and prohibition of anonymous contributions and third party campaigning under the terms of the act.

We, in committee, will be pressing very hard for these reforms. We want to see the act strengthened, not weakened, as indicated by some of the loopholes that the Liberal government has failed to close in the bill before us.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about the introduction of Bill C-5 following the study in committee recommended by the House. It is said in the recommendation that this bill provides for three main types of amendments. The first concerns the registration of political parties and election expenses, the second aims at simplifying the implementation of the administrative provisions contained in the act following the recommendation of the Chief Electoral Officer, and finally, amendments aimed at improving the material organization of the polls and completing the other administrative changes whose implementation is also recommended by the Chief Electoral Officer.

Mr. Speaker, this is the third time we have amended the famous legislation entitled the Canada Elections Act, mainly as concerns expenditures, political contributions, election expenses, the control of election expenses, and so on.

The legislation we passed in 1974 was so complex that some parties, especially the Social Credit Party of Canada, found it very difficult, first to interpret and even more to implement. At first, we went to those responsible for the legislation, that is the returning officer and the Minister of Revenue, to obtain some information and explanations about the legislation, and surprisingly, they could not give us the explanations we wanted.

Indeed, this is what it says here: Soon after passage in January 1974 of the Canada Elections Act, which, as everyone agrees, is somewhat complex, the Chief Electoral Officer called a meeting of the principal members of the national office of the various political parties represented in the House of Commons to form the committee that now exists to study a new reform. But after 1974, in order to clarify it, amendments were introduced, so that in 1975, they prevailed; but we were already victims of that so complicated, so obscure 1974 legislation; people had the impression that the Social Credit Party had benefitted from it in 1974, while we did not get any donations that year, not a cent, and our expenses were greater on account of our struggle with Revenue Canada and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which was monitoring our offices. Our costs exceeded the $1,000 left to us. That was the impact of the 1974 legislation enacted by the parties in power and for them, and they greatly benefitted from it. Further; they benefit from it every year.

Even this year, the Liberal party collected nearly $6 million. Six million a year during four years make $24 million to start an election. Not bad!

While we, in 1974, hardly collected $200,000 and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was close on our heels right across Canada. If that is trying to do justice to all political parties, to have a bit of fairness there, I assure you, Mr. Speaker that we did not receive fair treatment. We have been continuously harassed to such an extent that some days, as I mentioned here in the House, I would call the federal National Revenue Department to obtain explanations about the record of some citizens from my riding and get the RCMP at the other end of the line. I made an intervention in the House to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if you had given orders or if someone had given orders to the RCMP to answer calls made by hon. members to the Revenue Canada office. I think this is a year we are going to remember. This is why I would like to make a few suggestions to amend that famous Elections Act which was supposed to give justice to citizens, a far cry from reality. Today the Elections Act tolerates every possible injustice and allows parties with money to buy electors, to buy elections. It is for this reason that again today, before sending this bill to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, it should be referred to the committee of the House. I urge the members of that committee to add some more amendments to that legislation in order to bring some more fairness into it.

The amount of election expenses has already been set but today it is proposed to increase again those expenses because of the rising costs of living. If you go in some homes you will see that the income of people should be increased, but it is not increased for many people who are living below the poverty level. And now they want to freeze election expenses to allow big parties and not small ones because everything is done to discourage us, Mr. Speaker, to allow the big parties to get more millions; they got $24 million, now they need $50 million or even more to make elections. Mr. Speaker, if we cannot call on the intelligence of people at election time, if it is only a matter of money we shall always have to support the same consequences as today.

Now we are back to anonymous contributions. The 1974 legislation suggested that contributions would be limited at last or at the very least disclosed and that political contributions over $100 would have to be disclosed and we approved of that as well as of setting a ceiling to contributions. What happens then? It is a well known fact that the Party in power, due to its close relationship with big corporations, banks and so forth, receives big donations. Let us take a look at the past year's record, namely the 1976 report. You will find contributions for the Liberal Party amount to $75,000 given by banks, $80,000 given by multinational corporations and so on. A total of 6 million dollars means a lot of contributions, but at least we know where they come from now, but at this stage of the game they do not want to name names any more. They ask for anonymous contributions. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am against such practices. If we are going to be fooled, let us know at least who is helping the Party in power fool us. It would be some kind of consolation, but if you have anonymous contributions, it will be impossible to know who is funding the major parties. This is precisely what we do not want, Mr. Speaker.

I also feel a financial amendment should be introduced if we want to get honest elections. We have pressed for it for a long time. They claim that limited amounts are set for the sake of justice to all voters. But if we really want honest elections, there is only one way, namely a mandatory identification card.

We have been advocating such a measure for the past ten years. It was argued some ten or fifteen years ago that this would be too costly. Everybody has cards today. It is the social insurance number that matters nowadays. Well, let us require identification with a photo and the social insurance number for voting purposes. I am sure fewer votes would be stolen if every voter were required to produce his identification card before casting his ballot. We have been pressing for that for a long time. Neither one of the old parties, Liberals or Conservatives, is willing to admit that. In my opinion, both of them are taking avantage of this situation, this is why they do not want it. The measure we propose, would bring justice to voters and prevent people from assuming somebody else's name and using it to vote. But when he has his identification card he will not be able to vote on behalf of someone else.

In my riding of Roberval, although I keep an eye open I still get robbed of 1,000 to 1,500 votes in every election. If we had that identification card that would not happen.

Second, I would like to propose an amendment in committee relating to the preparation of election lists. Those who are appointed to prepare the election lists realize that in urban ridings everything is fine because the incumbent party and the opposition are both represented—there are two people to prepare the lists. In rural ridings the returning officer appoints only one person who can prepare the list the way he wants, forget the names of those he wants to forget and add to the list the names of the people of his choice.

Since we are talking about the justice of the vote, to really give the voter justice I think we should use two people in rural ridings as we do in urban ridings to have a better supervision and thus fewer mistakes. You might tell me: In rural ridings, if a name is forgotten the person can be sworn in afterwards. But that is precisely the trick, Mr. Speaker. They even bring in people from the city to be sworn in in rural ridings in our areas because they have forgotten about the cities. That is the trick, that is where we, the little parties, do not have the money to buy people out and we get shafted.

That went even further. So much had been going on in certain polls that the returning officer even phoned me at a certain moment to tell me: There are a lot of errors going on in the poll, people voted who did not have the right to vote. Do you close the poll or do you keep it open? I said, to be fair to everybody: Keep it open, we will see later. And certain big parties were still continuing with their little trick. Some of those people are so used to it, they were brought up in it and they consider stealing votes a sport.

In my area I know elderly people almost past death-time, people 75 and over, who hit the road come every election day to have a go at that old trick, stealing votes.

When this bill is passed, I would be much pleased indeed if there was an amendment providing for compulsory identity cards for voters. We will start thinking there is some justice if we have what is needed to finance elections, and I really mean "what is needed"—of course I am not referring here to small amounts from $10 to $100, so that all sums of money over $100 are publicly disclosed. The public is entitled to know what is going on financially, and this will ensure some degree of supervision.

As far as voting is concerned, when we have the identity cards we will be laying some solid foundation for the supervision of voting in our areas, so that we may know who is entitled to vote and who is not.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude on the hope that the committee will take good note of my remarks, that finally an end will come to camouflage legislation, legislation favouring those who win elections by spending millions and hundreds of millions, that there is at least an attempt to protect evolving parties, the only ones capable of telling what is going on in government, of telling the truth to the people.

[English]

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that I welcome the introduction of this bill before the House. It culminates the work of many dedicated individuals who have worked with the Chief Electoral Officer over the past three years. Representatives of the four registered parties began meeting with Mr. Hamel and his staff in February of 1974, and discussions have been held by the ad hoc committee regularly since that time. I have had the privilege of serving on this committee over the past number of months, so I have a vital interest in the bill now before us.

I cannot speak too highly of the guidance and suggestions which Mr. Hamel provided, and I look forward to further discussions in the committee. I am sure Mr. Hamel's wise counsel will be helpful in explaining aspects of this bill to hon. members of the House. Well over 200 paragraphs of amendments were proposed by the ad hoc committee, and I am pleased to be able to report that the majority of these have been included as discussed and suggested by members of the committee.

I know that hon. members of this House, as well as Canadians at large, will welcome the progressive aspect of the bill. Amendments to assist incapacitated voters have been proposed and a number of measures have been put forward to make the act more intelligible to the average voter and to encourage more Canadians to participate in our political process. As in the case of any act which amends prior legislation, a good many of the amendments which have been proposed are primarily housekeeping in nature. We are pleased to accept the recommendations of the Chief Electoral Officer regarding items of this nature. It is gratifying to note that the act worked well in the last ten by-elections. Our party has been happy to comply with the spirit as well as the intent of the law. We will continue to work within the spirit of this act, as I believe that the openness which it provides in many areas is in keeping with the spirit pervading Canadian life.

As has been pointed out, however, the government does not seem to share our views regarding this progressive spirit of openness. I should initially point out that there are a few minor items in the act which we feel should be given reconsideration in order to maintain consistency throughout various sections of the bill. Of much greater concern, however, is the silence of the bill in respect to the question of anonymous contributions. Earlier in this debate the leader of this party spoke about the brown paper bags and envelopes passed around to different parties at election time. I think that question was explored very well by the committee. I certainly cannot see how it is going to give confidence to the electorate if political parties can receive donations from individuals who in the future will expect something in return. I think our political system must be above that.

While this matter will have to be discussed in depth in the committee, it troubles me that it has not been included as an amendment, despite the fact that such a proposal was put forth by the all-party committee. Having served on that committee, I must point out that it was the feeling of the committee that an amendment should have been introduced instructing that all anonymous contributions received by a candidate or organization be sent to the Receiver General. It is most difficult to understand why the act is completely silent on this issue and ignores the suggestions which were agreed to by members of all four registered parties. When the minister introduced the bill today, he mentioned unanimous consent. This was part of the unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think he meant to lead the House to believe that everyone was in agreement with the all-party committee.

Another matter which demands equal consideration involves an amendment which has been included in the act but which was not, in fact, agreed to by the all-party committee. This question centres around clause 9, dealing with election expenses and adjustments which more specifically apply a cost of living index to party and candidate expense limits for elections held after 1977. The pros and cons of such an arrangement certainly will have to be considered, but I feel that it should be pointed out that this amendment was not, in fact, given unanimous support by the all-party committee. The government is ignoring the recommendations of the all-party committee.

Without trying to suggest outright improper motives, one must question the government's treatment of these two points with respect to this bill. Surely, the day has long since passed when anonymous contributions are an accepted part of the political process. I refuse to believe or to accept that Canadians want to sanction underhanded or questionable dealings with respect to the finances of a political party. The spirit of openness is pervading all areas of our life today, and certainly the political process should be in the forefront of reform. Instead, the government seems to prefer to drag its feet or, worse yet, to ignore, by silence, a shoddy practice. It has been said that silence gives consent, and the application is quite clear in this situation.

There is much more I could say regarding the specifics of this bill, but I will deal with these matters at greater length in the pending committee meetings. I am sure it is the intention of my party that the fair-minded and co-operative spirit which was evident in the ad hoc committee will continue during further deliberations. We will, however, oppose those aspects of this bill which we feel are not in the public interest, and I look forward to pursuing these matters vigorously in committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the election expenses legislation in Canada was a completely new departure and, I suppose, a departure that is unheralded in the free world and certainly one that is being studied in other nations of the free world. For the first time, legislation required all parties to fully and fairly disclose the source of their funding, both from the point of view of the party and from the point of view of individual candidates. It allowed, for the first time, an unusual inducement for members of the public, from all walks of life, to become involved in the political process by making contributions. In fact, it brought out of the back rooms of politics the question of party financing and the financing of candidates.

It brought, I think, a level of understanding to the political process which had never been evident before. It gave the average Canadian a legitimate chance of participating in the political process in the full glare of public scrutiny. Disclosure was the hallmark of that bill, and consideration for the full disclosure was the allowance that could be given for tax purposes. It is a statute that has been used effectively in my riding and in others. It was one which politicians were quite proud and pleased to support in every way.

When the statute was first introduced a few years ago, it required a number of amendments. They were advanced by all parties, including the government, because it was so new and so untried that no draftsman could hope to encompass all the difficulties the first time. The interesting thing about the committee process with regard to this bill was that there was a great range of mutual understanding, a sense of togetherness, by men and women of all political parties, officials and elected representatives who were prepared to band together to ensure that we had within our grasp the best possible statute.

There was an atmosphere of good faith and of consultation. Because all of us—I suppose we, more than anyone else, in the political process—are aware of the cynicism which affects that process. This series of amendments which has resulted in this rather formidable Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act which was given first reading on October 24, 1977, came about as a result of a series of further consultations. The representatives of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and, I dare say, those of the New Democratic Party also, felt that the same spirit of co-operation, the same sense of non-partisanship, the same positive approach that characterized the earlier negotiations would continue. To a great measure, this has been the case. But it is a matter of regret—and I know it is a matter of regret for the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott) and his hon. friends on the committee—that the bill seems to go far beyond that which was agreed upon.

There can be no doubt that the recommendations of the all-party committee were sound and that those of them which are incorporated in the bill before us are sound. The leader of my party has made it very clear, however, that we are concerned about the anonymous donations provision. There is a sense of deceit about it. We have doubts about the good faith of the government, and even about the propriety of the indexing provision in a time of restraint. Until I saw the bill, I did not expect that those two clauses regarding anonymous donations and indexing would find any place in the measure. Our leader made this very clear.

I should like to state emphatically, now, that as long as those clauses are in this bill we in the Official Opposition are prepared to use whatever devices can reasonably be used, whether in the House or in the committee, to ensure that the measure is not passed until it has been changed along the lines I have indicated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I say this in the course of debate so that there can be no doubt about our intentions with respect to it. I regret very much that I must take this approach. It is unfortunate that somehow, from the understanding which was developed between all parties on the committee, we have come to this. Why should this have happened? How can the government's position be justified, in face of the principle of openness, the principle of disclosure? How can one justify the importation into this legislation of an element whose effect is to permit substantial donations to be made by national companies, wealthy individuals, international corporations and a whole host of other people?

In an area of disclosure such as the seventies, this has no place whatsoever in our democratic process and we stand against it as firmly as we possibly can. It offends parliament. It offends the political process, a process which I believe was in some way renewed by the passing of the election expenses legislation.

I find it inexcusable and improper. I am not suggesting that hon. members who support the Liberal party from the back benches are responsible for this offence against propriety. I do not believe they had anything to do with it. Discussions obviously took place during the summer. The campaign committees, the bagmen, the fund-raisers of the Liberal party, obviously influenced somebody, and I suspect it was the federal cabinet which was influenced. I suspect and, frankly, I hope it was done without the knowledge of the Liberal party caucus. I would be greatly shocked if I were to find otherwise—if, for example, I were to learn that the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) was in agreement with what is being done. He has been a man of principle all his political life and, as I say, I would be surprised if he or others of my colleagues over there would agree that it is proper to do indirectly what the statute, or the principle of the statute, says we cannot do directly.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

I turn to the question of indexing. My leader has indicated that as a result of indexing election expenses and allowing contributions to reflect a different cost of living base than had been originally discussed, a new burden of some $12 million would be imposed on hard-pressed Canadian taxpayers. The legislation was designed to give political parties equal opportunity; if one party is given an opportunity to spend, the other is expected to match it.

So far, the arrangements have not been tested during a general election. The figure which has been given is the figure for an election called in 1978. God knows what it would be for an election called in 1979, given the rate of inflation! I think it is inappropriate that an indexing proposal of this kind should be put forward at a time of restraint. The government has talked on many occasions about limiting the practice of indexing. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) says it may be necessary to reconsider the social welfare programs and think about putting a cap on old age security benefits. He was musing in public, Mr. Speaker—philosophizing, trying to imitate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I suppose, and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has since denied such intentions.

However, that was a view expressed by a member of the very government which is now prepared to index election expenses. Not too long ago the President of the Treasury Board, speaking of public servants, the RCMP and the armed forces, mused aloud that perhaps a cap should be placed on retirement pensions. In this case the hon. gentleman never rose to deny he ever said it.

This government which is prepared to penalize its public servants now suddenly finds itself in the position where it is going to lay upon itself a great benefit. It is going to extend indexing in a way that can only be considered inconsistent and, indeed, in terms of those who need some reflection of the cost of living in their income, reprehensible. This bill does two things that are in bad faith. This government has broken faith, not just with parliament or the opposition but with those among their number who supported a long time ago the provisions of the original Election Expenses Act.

I felt that the Election Expenses Act brought something new into our political life. It brought in the public. It brought in a new light, in the sense of the people who are involved in it. I am sure no member of this House of Commons, no matter where he sits, is happy to be a member of this public body, this body in particular. The Election Expenses Act has gone a long way to opening up the process to everyone, just as television in the House has opened up this chamber to the world. That sense of openness has been welcomed by all right-minded members of this House. However, the government is prepared to begin closing the doors, to begin allowing in the shadows of corruption with regard to election financing.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would answer a question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will try.

Mr. Abbott: I just want to be clear. Does the hon. member regard the two principal objections, the indexation and the question of anonymous gifts, as the totality of his objection? I wonder whether he raises a third one as well. I happen to share his view about the anonymous donation part. I wonder if he considers the indexation provisions in equal fashion, as a betrayal of the principles of the bill, or is he speaking mainly of the anonymous donation provision as being a betrayal of the principles that he feels the bill raises?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. gentleman's question. I regard the anonymous donation provision as a betrayal of the original intent and purpose of the legislation. As far as indexing is concerned, I regard that as a betrayal of the government's position with regard to restraint. The government has asked Canadians to tighten their belts and do a host of other things, yet in terms of political parties which are at the heart and centre of our political system and the system in this House of Commons, they are prepared to go outside the work of the committee and suddenly index to the cost of living the election expenses. The government betrays itself there.

To answer the minister's question fully, by adding those two provisions without consultation with the other parties, and after the considerations of the all-party committee, it has betrayed that committee and betrayed the spirit, intent and co-operation that was to have existed in the House. I know the minister's feelings. I am pleased with his interjection. I do not say that in any partisan way. I say that the government of which he is a member should withdraw the bill as it now stands. They should review the proceedings of the all-party committee and consult the Chief Electoral Officer to see whether this bill is in keeping with the intent of the committee. The minister and the government should satisfy themselves. They should realize there is disappointment in the community about this bill.

There is general support in the community for the Election Expenses Act which provides less opportunity for those who are not well-intentioned to misuse it. It is really in that sense that I entered the debate. I noticed the minister was listening very carefully to what I was saying, and I appreciate that very much. I appreciate the minister's expression of support at least for the deletion of anonymous donations provision. I do not presume to try to affect his thinking in terms of other matters. He, as a minister, has to examine the philosophy and approach of his government to spending by government, and see how that equates to the principle of indexing in this bill. I really do not think it does.

It would be absolutely unconscienable for any minister of the Crown to talk—and it seems to me it has been confirmed as loose talk—about freezing, changing or in any way affecting social benefits without at the same time, and almost in the same breath, certainly from the same treasury benches, talking about unfreezing political benefits. That is the essence of it. It was in that sense I raised the question of their using the President of the Treasury Board. I hope that the interest of the minister in this instance will cause him to speak to his colleagues, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Cafik), the deputy House leader, and consult with the Deputy Prime Minister, the leader of the government in the House, in whose name Bill C-5 stands and, indeed, with the Prime Minister, to see whether it is appropriate. Subject to a review of that kind by the standing committee, I would think passage of a bill containing those offending provisions would be very difficult to achieve. However, that is subject to a review by the committee, over which he and I have no control.

That is our general approach to the legislation. We regard it as a very significant bill, for the positive things which it does. However, we think it is a retrograde step in that it offends the original sense of openness with which we all approached this legislation, and it offends the policy of restraint which has been the preaching hallmark, certainly not the factual hallmark, of this government. May I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ADMINISTRATION SCHOOL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing in the National Capital Region, a national administration school for its public servants, which would be a first step toward the creation of an agency responsible for everything in the field of training and development of public servants.

● (1702)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We were served notice a little while ago, before orders of the day, that the motion we would be debating today was the one standing in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), motion No. 6, concerning the advisability of establishing an office of education. It was on that basis that preparations were made for today's private members' hour. That is the word which I had from the government.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, if I may explain, the motion standing in my name on the order paper is one which I presented in the last session of parliament. With the dying of the order paper in that session, my motion also died. It had been accepted unanimously by the House and referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee for study.

National Administration School

I ask members of all parties for their unanimous agreement to reinstate this motion in the position it was in last session, and to agree to a motion of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), similar to that which he moved on May 6 last, asking that the subject matter of motion No. 1 be referred to the standing committee. I cannot make that motion, but if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would consider making it, I think it would solve our problems and the motion need not be debated this evening.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Do I understand that it would be the disposition of the House to proceed with motion No. 6 following that? If that is the case, I think the situation in terms of the proposal for a public service institute is the same as it was then. We were prepared to agree at that time and I think we would be prepared to agree today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is satisfactory to us, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would move the motion that the subject matter of notice of motion No. 1 be referred to the appropriate committee, then I would be pleased to second it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Then if that is in order, Mr. Speaker, I will make the motion now, and I will make it in the terms expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That the subject matter of Notice of Motion No. 1, as follows:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing in the national capital region, a national administration school for its public servants, which would be a first step towards the creation of an agency responsible for everything in the field of training and development of public servants.

be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. As I understand it, the original motion moved by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has been withdrawn and a new motion—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I think we are a little mixed up in procedure here. The motion has in fact been withdrawn; the subject matter of the motion is to be referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not being here during the entire discussion, but is it my understanding that the original motion, having been withdrawn and now recast in its present form, is in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, (Mr. Gauthier) or is it in fact in the name of the House leader of the party opposite?

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. To my understanding, the original motion moved by the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier has been withdrawn and the new motion stands in the name of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and is seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered. The House will now proceed to motion No. 6.

EDUCATION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF OFFICE OF EDUCATION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing an office of education, to conduct research in the provinces with the co-operation of the provincial governments and also in other countries, to consider the provisions of federal financial assistance for second language training in elementary and high schools and to disseminate information with a view to improving the education of Canadian youth.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion which we are considering goes back several years. It has been proposed in somewhat similar terms on previous occasions, and it orginated in 1971 at the annual general meeting of the Canadian Teachers Federation. At that meeting, the Canadian Teachers Federation advocated the establishment of a Canadian office of education. The basic concept has had the support of members of all parties.

In January of this year, in a publication issued by the Canadian Teachers Federation on policies and viewpoints on matters within federal jurisdiction, the federation stated that such an office would be responsible for the collection, organization and dissemination of information on a Canada-wide basis, as well as for the promotion and support of an adequate program of research in education. It would oversee a continuous study of the fiscal problems affecting education, and consult with provincial governments as to how these problems might be solved. Regional disparities in educational opportunity are a severe and persistent problem. The federal government has the fiscal powers, the moral responsibility and the administrative capability to reduce these disparities.

Policies of the federal government can and do have a real impact upon the quality of education offered by the schools. Federal-provincial fiscal arrangements have a decisive influence on the ability of the provinces to meet the cost of maintaining and improving the services provided by schools in their jurisdictions. Education in a democracy must foster the freedom of the mind. The essence of learning is access to information. Agencies of the federal government have the capacity for the provision of information relevant to educational planning. The federal government has both the fiscal capacity and the authority to act in the interests of all Canadian children to alleviate interprovincial educational disparities. The federal government has a specific financial obligation to education, and to establish a system of equalization grants which will enable each province to provide an adequate and comparable standard of education for every child in this country.

A 1975 report of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development dealt at considerable length with educational policy in Canada, and the minister of education of the province of Ontario, the Hon. Tom Wells, was in general agreement with the need for national action. Section 93 of the British North America Act states that in and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education. Thus, Canada has developed a rather unplanned and until now problematical educational policy, though perhaps it could not be termed truly serious, something people are concerned about, in view of developments at the present time.

Nevertheless, it is a fact that school board expenditures per child in Ontario exceed comparable expenditures in the maritimes by almost 70 per cent. Surely, the federal government is already deeply involved. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is very much involved in education. The Department of the Secretary of State, as it applies to national libraries and museums, spends large sums on education. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion spends large sums supporting educational facilities. The Department of External Affairs is involved directly. The Department of National Defence is directly involved in education, as is the Department of National Health and Welfare and the department of manpower and immigation, now the Department of Employment and Immigration.

Presently, the federal government is spending well over $3 billion a year in support of education in various forms. Arguments concerning jurisdictional responsibility are too often politically motivated. Surely, education is too important to be treated in this fashion.

The motion makes no attempt to go beyond the present acknowledged jurisdictional responsibilities of the federal government. Federal financial assistance for second language training is already provided, although many of us are distinctly unhappy with the terms of the agreement under which this assistance is provided. Education is a national priority. The support of all parties has been given to similar previous motions. Therefore, I ask that everyone join me this afternoon in an expression of national unity by approving the motion calling upon the government to consider the establishment of an office of education.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my understanding that motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay), that motion No. 3 standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), that motion No. 4 standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), and notice of motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), will be stood. Is that agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I will not take too long dealing with this particular matter. I believe there are other members who may want to speak, and I look forward to their contributions to this suggestion brought forward by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert).

I was disappointed in the way this motion was presented and the defence or the explanation presented by the hon. member. His last expression of opinion with respect to taking this action on behalf of national unity shows how little he understands the problems of national unity which exist in this country today.

Mr. Herbert: I understand the situation very well.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I would appreciate it if the hon. member would extend to me the same courtesy which I extended to him. As one of the members of this House, I find this motion to be both contradictory and ill-considered. In its own way it represents, if I may say so, a further element of disunity with respect to something which has been basically a responsibility of the provinces since the beginning.

It is not really clear, from either the member's motion or his comments in the House this afternoon, whether he is trying to provide a resource to the provinces with respect to education, whether he is trying in a sense to take over some of the present powers or jurisdiction of the provincial governments—which seems to be implied in some way in his remarks—or whether he is trying to get at some of the present weaknesses with respect to federal funding for second language education in the provinces.

I would like to think there are some areas where the hon. member and I agree, and particularly I am thinking of his expression of dissatisfaction with respect to the effectiveness of provincial action in second language education. I am sure there are members on both sides of this House who are very much concerned about the manner in which hundreds of millions of dollars of federal money has been expended or made available to the provinces without any satisfactory development, in a number of instances and in a number of provinces, of an effective and helpful second language education program.

When the hon. member suggests that the federal government has the power to make a further intervention with respect to education in the provinces, that may well be the case, as has been exhibited by this government in other instances in terms of intervention. Whether it has the power is not really the question. The question is whether it has the right or whether it would be wise. When the hon. member talks about the need for national action, if I may say so, he confuses the real concern that all the provinces share with respect to their own educational resources, that is, the amount of cooperation which takes place among the provinces in order to effect standards and upgrade educational programs, and the heavy-handed action which might be taken by a central government.

When the hon. member indicated that education is too important to be concerned about jurisdictional responsibility, he identified very clearly his lack of understanding as to how a federal-provincial system can work effectively in this country. Perhaps he reflects inadvertently some of the attitudes of his own political masters which have made life increasingly difficult for there to be, in real terms, both a federal government and provincial governments that can work together. The suggestions put forward by the hon. member in his motion and in his comments this afternoon would even further exacerbate present relations among the federal government and the provinces.

While I might identify with his concerns about the quality and the standard of education in this country, the action he proposes would not be effective in the final analysis. The hon. member did not refer to the fact that there is no way to be assured that the results he hopes to achieve would, in effect, occur. We should be concerned about the process of education as it operates in this country, not just for young people but in general terms, because education is a large component of our society.

I do not think the answer is in the establishment of a federal office of education. It might be better if we were able to understand some of the real problems being confronted today by the provincial governments. When the hon. member suggests that we should think about this as a tool for alleviating regional disparity, I think of some of the situations which have existed in my part of the world where the federal government, for reasons best known to itself, has made plans and introduced programs which were not related to the existing needs.

I hope this process of discussion during private members' hour will provide the members of this House the opportunity to realize that it is a federal system we have in this country, and it will not function effectively as long as we have the kind of recourse to unwarranted intrusions and the kind of waiving aside of provincial jurisdictions that are part of the basic fabric of this country. This is the only way we can effectively understand the various viewpoints of the regions and the various ways in which the disparate views and disparate approaches which exist in Canada can possibly be reconciled together into a workable Canadian federation. We have to be grateful to the hon. member for the opportunity of discussing those questions once again, but I cannot support in any way, shape or form the motion as it is presented.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I participate in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I am quite sympathetic with the basic thrust of the motion, although I would prefer it to be worded in a somewhat different manner. I will in due course explain my reasons for saying that. As Your Honour will remember, I rose second in the debate and you recognized a Conservative speaker. But I am glad to have had the benefits of the arguments of the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), because he did not address himself to the substance of the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil as it appears before us. He gave us what is now a very traditional Conservative lecture on federal-provincial relations and told us how this terrible government is breaking up the country by virtue of the fact that it is stealing power from the provinces. Having served with the hon. member for Egmont on a number of delegations, and having worked with him in the House, I expected better from him this afternoon on what I consider to be a very significant motion.

One hundred years ago I believe that the Fathers of Confederation made a terrible mistake when they gave, in section 91 or 92 of the BNA Act, jurisdiction over education to the provinces. Of course, one should not second-guess the reasons of the Fathers of Confederation, and it is pretty easy to apply hindsight in such matters. But in those days they were probably justified, and I think they wrote a pretty good document anyway, so we can excuse them this one mistake. Nevertheless, it was a terrible mistake, for a couple of reasons. The first one has to do with the hon. member's motion, and it is that by virtue of the fact that each province was allowed to pursue its own path in education, we see variable approaches to second language teaching in the provinces.

Second, the fact that the provinces have power in matters of education has resulted in ten different sets of educational standards and has had, I believe, an adverse impact upon the labour needs of the twentieth century. I will go into that argument in a few moments. It is only with the election of the PQ last November that we have suddenly really concerned ourselves with minority language rights. I was a product of the Ontario school system. The second language training that I got in that system was very poor. In fact, the government of Ontario has perhaps one of the most abysmal records with respect to second language teaching, and it is abysmal for a significant reason.

The province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, Upper and Lower Canada—or Canada east and Canada west, as they were 100 years ago—were the two linchpins that formed this country. Yet successive governments in Ontario—the Liberal government was in power there for many years under Oliver Mowat, there was a farmers' government, and in the last 35 years since 1943 the PC party has been in government in that province, the same party as that of my friend, the hon. member for Egmont—have behaved like ostriches with respect to language rights in this country.

About ten years ago we had the national unity debate, we had the B and B commission and we had great discussions on the problems of Quebec and the feelings of Francophones that they were not being properly fulfilled within the Canadian confederation. In 1967, the Conservative premier of Ontario received a lot of publicity when he initiated the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference. In those ten years you would have thought the Conservative administration in Ontario would have recognized its weakness in second language education and would have done something about it. Not only did they do nothing, they actually changed the education system, so that the second language teaching offered in Ontario at present is of a much poorer quality than when I went to school in the early 1960s.

It used to be that most students going to university required a second language. I think you had to have two papers in English and two papers in French or Latin, or three in mathematics. This was changed with the so-called new educational policy brought in by the then minister of education who happens to be the current Premier of Ontario, Mr. Davis. As a result, we find that kids going to universities in Ontario have not bothered learning a second language, whether it is French, German or Latin. In my view, learning a second language is a good thing from the Canadian perspective of national unity. It is also a good intellectual discipline to learn to speak two languages. But the Conservative government in Ontario has allowed second language teaching to almost die out. So when we consider the remarks of the hon. member for Egmont, we must wonder if the provinces have done such a good job with respect to education.

I made a proposal to the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) with respect to second language education. I believe that we, as the federal government, should establish this kind of office, this kind of liaison, with the provinces. I believe that we should require the provinces—and perhaps use our financial levers to do so through the aids to post-secondary education—to set linguistic standards for people going to university, so that anyone who is admitted to university in any province has a certain standard of knowledge in two languages, one of them being the official language. This would in no way discriminate against third language groups, or the so-called ethnocultural groups in this country; in fact, it would give them a boost. In Toronto there have been immigrants, in the last 10 or 15 years, from Italy, Greece and a host of countries.

I do not think it unreasonable that we should encourage the teaching of those languages and make it possible for students who have a knowledge of the language to gain a university entrance credit; indeed, it is part of the multicultural policy of the government. But this kind of system will have another positive effect, that is, to encourage both French and English-speaking parents to help their children study, not German, Latin or Italian but the other official language.

It is quite evident from what has been going on in Toronto in the last few years that there are more students willing to study French than the province of Ontario has provided schools for. It is my contention that English-speaking parents in the Toronto area would love to see a second language entrance requirement made for universities, and I am sure that those parents would encourage their children to learn French because it is one of the two official languages of Canada and it is the language of the federal government. That is the proposal I have made to the Secretary of State. It is one that I think should be considered.

Office of Education

The other aspect of provincial control in education vis-à-vis national control, or the establishment of a national education office as envisaged in the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil, is the fact that 100 years ago we did not have to worry too much about the mobility of Canadians. At that time, if you grew up in one province, by and large you spent the rest of your life in that province. Of course, it was basically a rural society, an agrarian society and there was no need for governments to be concerned with the impact of their education policy on the labour market.

• (1732)

Here we are, in 1977, with a very mobile population and with multinational and all kinds of national corporations, and I believe Canadians are hampered severely because of the disparity of education standards in this country. If you are an official with a national company living in Toronto, and you are transferred to New Brunswick, British Columbia, or to any of the other provinces, under the present system there may be a significant difference in the type of education in each province; therefore, your children, who are being dislocated anyway—they are being uprooted from one community and put into another—are going to be even more disrupted by the fact that there is no continuity in the educational system.

I suppose I am one of the "baby boomers", one of those who came on to the labour market in the last few years. I am one of the fortunate ones; I have a job, at least for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): For another few months.

Mr. Collenette: However, it is very unusual for political science graduates such as I to be able to secure positions which are adapted to their education. We have created a whole generation of people who are not really suited to the labour needs of this country. I am going off the topic somewhat, but when we look at unemployment statistics and at the people who are unemployed or dissatisfied with their lot, we zero in on post-war children who are now adults, people born after 1945. We are the products of parents who went through two world wars and a depression. They worked hard and suffered the deprivations of the depression years. They have said to their children that they should not suffer the same kinds of hardship, that they should stay at school, get as much education as they can and not go in for blue collar work because it is grubby and not socially productive. Almost a class distinction between white collar work and blue collar work has been built up.

So a great many people have completed high school and university. I do not know why I went to university, except that my parents encouraged me. That was the thing to do in the sixties. It was only when I was in my second year that I realized what a university education was all about. But many of my contemporaries could not adjust. They could not come to terms with why they were in university. Some resorted to drugs, some to alcohol, and others dropped out. Some went back to the land. We have heard about a back to the land movement.

I go through all this because I think our generation is symptomatic of the problem the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil seeks to correct. We need a national perspective on education. The hon. member's motion refers principally to linguistic rights—and as I said earlier, I am in absolute agreement with him—but I think there is a second and equally important matter, and that is the impact of education upon the labour market. Only now the provinces are starting to talk about upgrading of apprenticeship training schemes and upgrading vocational schools.

In recent years, in Ontario, we seem to have developed a very successful system of community colleges which teach various trades besides straight academic subjects. More and more students are going into these fields, and they should be encouraged to do so. However, if we had a national office of education, we could encourage people to think of blue collar work as very socially productive and fulfilling.

Last week in this House we heard about the INCO lay-offs, but how many of the people who were laid off really wanted to do the job they were doing? How many were not channelled, in the first place, into a career of their choice? The same question can be asked about people in the public service. There is an old adage: those who can, do; those who can't teach. When the baby boom dropped off, there were fewer teachers, and many graduates who were friends of mine started to come into the public service. I am sure many public servants are unhappy with their jobs because they never wanted to go into the public service in the first place. They never wanted to push paper or make administrative decisions. Perhaps they would be happier welding or doing certain work in a factory.

There is no national system of standards. There is no national education policy which can direct the energies and aspirations of Canadians. I am not suggesting, as the hon. member for Egmont suggested, that the federal government take over education. Goodness knows, we are probably into more areas than we should be already. We should probably be phasing ourselves out of some areas. Education systems should still be run by the provincial governments, but the federal government could establish broad national policies for both the labour market and for second language education.

I have gone on at length and I apologize to hon. members for my rather hodge-podge speech. I had notice of this debate only a little while ago. However, this motion underlines the whole constitutional debate in this country. I see that the hon. member for Egmont agrees with me. I think it was a week ago Friday, when I was speaking during the throne speech debate, that I said within five years we in this chamber would have to come to terms with restructuring, not just the House of Commons or the Senate but our entire system. We need to rearrange our entire constitution.

I welcome this opportunity to put forward some of my views on what I consider to be a fundamental question. The hon. member for Vaudreuil evoked cries of national unity, and it is quite obvious from the way members of the opposition react every time we talk about national unity that they are scared. They try to castigate our very honourable motives in talking about national unity. But the hon. member for Vaudreuil was dead on; he was absolutely right, that national unity is not just second language education. It is also the strength of the economy and the satisfaction and fulfilment each individual within the Canadian society can get, at whatever vocation he chooses.

In conclusion, I fully support the substance of the motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I would like it to be expanded somewhat in order to put special emphasis on a national educational policy which would be adapted to the labour needs of the country. I urge the hon. member for Egmont and his colleagues opposite to reconsider this very sensible motion.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak but when I heard what the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) said earlier today, I felt I had to add a few comments on his speech. He said that the Fathers of Confederation made a mistake when they made the provinces responsible for education. I think he never did refer to 1887 when the Fathers of Confederation lived in Upper and in Lower Canada. I want to mention that during that time the English element represented the large majority and that Upper Canada led the struggle to ensure the right to education in order to avoid being integrated by French Canadians.

This is a little remark I want to make casually, and I think that the Fathers of Confederation have been very wise since these developments; as Canada grew larger we note that the English element was becoming stronger than the French element. Later the French element had a little advantage. The fact that education was exclusively under provincial jurisdiction was a kind of safety valve for the French element. And that is why sections 92 and 93 of the BNA Act have been well thought out for the two great peoples who live in Canada.

The hon. member was wondering whether the provinces had properly discharged their duties in the field of education. If one carefully studies Canadian history, one will find that one of the provinces which showed proper respect for minorities is still Quebec which has properly treated its minorities for the past 110 years and which will continue to do so. If the second language which is made official today by government action has not been respected, it was in the other provinces. If it has not and still is not treated as it should be, it was in the other provinces. So I invite the hon. member for York East to take a look at what is going on in his own riding and to refrain from trying to push the federal government in those sectors which were essentially entrusted to the provinces.

I believe all provinces are anxious to keep the areas they have decided to keep because back in 1887 the provinces themselves decided to keep such and such an area and to leave certain priorities to the federal government. They all decided to leave these sectors to the federal government so that it may rule on behalf of and with the consent of all provinces. I suggest to the hon. member that he reread the beginning of Canadian history, which will enable him to give a sounder interpretation of the BNA Act because today many young people believe that it was the federal government which created the provinces. That is not so. The provinces created the federal government and they unanimously decided to keep those sectors they claimed were under their jurisdiction. That is why today if we want national unity each and everyone of us should have the freedom to act freely within his own province. That, I suggest, is the first prerequisite to national unity. He must also be given the necessary means to administer his province. When you wonder whether the provincial governments have been able to fulfill their responsibilities, I think the main problem arose especially from the time when the federal government, sometime in the 40's began to take over direct taxation areas which they had left untouched since 1887.

That is when the provinces were faced with some hardship for the first time, were in need of money, and even today this lack of funds prevents them from providing the necessary services to their citizens in education as well as in all other areas under the provinces' jurisdiction. I feel that as long as we do not give the provinces the financial means to administer those areas which come under their jurisdiction like education, what they need is not the equalization formula but tax points. Let us give them tax points and you will see there will be no more regional disparities because I am sure provincial governments are as clever as the central government; they are just as clever and able to administer themselves but let us give them back the rights they enjoyed and the taxation fields they had before the 40's, and I think that as a result we shall no longer say that the provinces are unable to administer such or such an area. Let us give them back their taxation field and then we shall see that the provinces are as progressive as the central government and that they are able to live in Canada while keeping their own identity and being free to act within their own jurisdiction to build a united and free country, through the freedom of the provinces.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help reacting to the comments made by the previous speakers about educational resources. I think that we cannot apply to Canada the thesis according to which when you are rich you can deal with your problems. Among the richest provinces, Ontario in particular has not been more generous with its minorities than New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Quebec. So I think that we are off on the wrong track when we say: let us put tax points at the disposal of provinces to solve the education problem.

The motion of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) reads as follows: "—consider the advisability of establishing an office of education, to conduct research in the provinces with the cooperation of the provincial governments and also in other countries, to consider the provisions of federal financial assistance for second language training in elementary and high schools and to disseminate information with a view to improving the education of Canadian youth." We cannot reject a motion asking the federal government to coordinate action in the education field. As the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) said, that is done at the economic level as concerns manpower. It has been said this afternoon that $3 billion had been spent for manpower, for reeducation and for readaptation of manpower to modern needs. The federal government did it to spur the economy and all the hon. member for Vaudreuil is asking for today is a better co-ordination. There is no province that can do it alone. There is no province which feels strong enough to say to the other: listen, we should work together to improve the lot of all Canadians. I think this motion from the hon. member for Vaudreuil must be considered seriously to meet the objective which was aimed at in St. Andrews last August.

I believe the education ministers met to discuss minorities' rights. And they tried bargaining. "If you can—Mr. Lévesque is speaking—give us Quebecers the guarantee that in your English-speaking provinces you will accept our French-speaking Canadians in duly constituted French schools, we from the province of Quebec will accept your Canadian immigrants." This is the worst kind of bargaining! And I cannot accept that premiers, whether they are independent or not, begin to bargain about my rights as a Canadian. As concerns language rights we are all equal, Francophones and Anglophones. I have the right to be at home in the west like in the east and I shall be at home in Ontario. I shall speak French in Ontario and I should like to see what government will prevent me from doing so!

[English]

I think the motion calls for further research, co-ordination of research and distribution of that research in the field of education. It is no secret that in this country we have ten different systems of education in the ten provinces. All boards do not accept that all Canadians equally have access to that system of education, because in eight provinces, if you are Francophone you cannot have access to post-secondary or secondary education. There is need for a co-ordinating body.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) mentioned—and I think it is a strong point—that there should be better co-ordination to allow people in Alberta who speak French to go to school in Ontario for secondary or post-secondary education, so that they can continue in the language of their choice, just as is done in Quebec and in Ontario. It is only in the last ten years that Francophones in Ontario have been able to go to the secondary and post-secondary level. That is a great help. It was not done by money, however; it was done by political people who had the will to do it.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Justice.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): That is right, justice. The present system of education in Ontario, which has been in place for some years, provides that if you take 20 minutes of French for 8 years, say, or 13 years, you will become proficient in the language. That is nonsense, Mr. Speaker. They have been doing that for the last 15 or 20 years, but they cannot speak French at the end of 13 years. We may ask if we have wasted the money or have not motivated the children? I say, let us look elsewhere. In England, for instance a study done over ten years showed that children who were exposed to 20 minutes of language training each day did not do as well as children exposed to two-hour sessions from the age of 14. The theory was that if you give enough of it, it will get into their heads; but it does not work that way.

The primary obligation of any school is to teach the maternal language first and then the second language. A lot of research has been done in Ottawa, and two years ago a program was funded by the federal government, to the tune of $2 million, to help local boards of education to experiment. The research showed that total immersion was possibly a good measure.

In England, as I have said, they made a study which showed that for children of 14 years and over it was just as good if they received two hours a week of language training as if they received 20 minutes every day. That is what my hon. friend from Vaudreuil was talking about. That is why I think his proposition is good. There should be a federal co-ordinator. Call it a bureau, call it a co-ordinator, call it what you like—somebody must take the initiative to show that in this country there there is a will and a consensus to make a concerted effort to gather from each other's experience, be it in New Brunswick, where they have bilingual education, be it in Alberta, where they have some form of it, or be it in British Columbia, where it does not exist.

Let all of us get together, and when the ministers of education report to their governments following the St. Andrew's conference in six months' time about the status of the minority groups in their provinces, let them sit down and say; "Let's put our heads together. We have a problem. Let's try and solve it on the basis of understanding, justice and equity."

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to speak too long because I know this motion can be subject to a long debate. We have heard about official languages, about the federal government's power to intervene in official languages. During the last decade, I believe the federal government made payments to the provinces in support of their second language teaching programs. In Ontario, we received about $20 million a year. I believe the total for the whole country is about $100 million a year, supposedly to help provinces teach the second language. However we must admit that this assistance has not always been spent the way it should have been. It is being admitted today that often alleged bilingual parking lots and bilingual gyms were built instead of using that money in support of second language courses.

The federal government has often asked the provinces for a report of expenditures, how and where the money is spent, and according to what formula. There is a federal formula which says that for each school boy or girl taking a second language, the federal grant will be 5 per cent and 1½ per cent for administration purposes. For minorities, the grant is 9 per cent and 1½ per cent for administration purposes.

I would be surprised if such formula was applied by the provinces for the benefit of the people to which it could be useful. We have had to discuss how the provinces have used that money. I think that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) must negotiate or renegotiate those federal-provincial agreements on the second language. He will have to tell the House how the provinces spent those rather substantial sums. After that answer is provided, we will see if the funds were well spent or if they were adequate.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil dealt with a motion which I felt acceptable since it suggests coordinating provincial and interprovincial resources. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the motion should be passed, that we should proceed through existing organizations, either through the Minister of Education or the Council of the Ministers of Education in Toronto whose secretariat has performed excellent work. By introducing this motion today the member for Vaudreuil has shown a new aspect of the language issue, by asking that agency, either an office or a cooperating agent, to consider seriously the possibility of coordinating, studying more carefully and applying more thoroughly that experience.

[English]

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, in the short time remaining to me I would like to thank the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for bringing this matter once again before the House and affording to us the opportunity of putting forward the various points of view which exist among members.

I compliment the member for having done that. I agree with him to some extent in terms of the question as it relates to national unity, and I associate myself with the arguments which were put forward by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) when he pointed out that this was, in fact, a national unity question. I do not believe it is the only question, and perhaps it is only symptomatic of a larger question. I think it was unfortunate that the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) should take the position that this was an old party line and it was something which was not true. As speakers have indicated today, we started from a position where the federal government had little or no jurisdiction over education, and today we still work from documents which seem to show that the provinces have total jurisdiction in this matter. But when we look at the question historically, we find that the federal government has acted, not by way of interference, not by way of imposing itself upon the provinces but, rather, in terms of filling vacuums where the provincial jurisdictions have, for one reason or another, be it economic, as the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) said, or be it purely from lack of motivation, failed to take measurers within their jurisdiction.

A cry has been raised by the people of this country that they want something done. That cry has been heard by the federal jurisdiction and responded to. We need not go far to find that such a response was made when we started training war veterans, when we started providing training in military institutions, when we started providing funding for second language training.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil pointed out, quite correctly, that we have reached a stage where we are spending close to $3 billion in funding language training, co-ordination and assistance. I would add that initially and ultimately the initiative still remains with the provinces, and we should point out to the provinces that they are not doing enough. I think we can be satisfied, from arguments made by representatives of all the parties today, that the provinces have left something to be desired and that they should be co-ordinating themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has expired.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m., at which time the House will consider a motion to be moved by the Leader of the Opposition, pursuant to Standing Order 26.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

ILLEGAL ACTS COMMITTED BY FORCE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. By application earlier this day by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and later in the day by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), as a result of which leave having been granted to the hon. Leader of the Opposition to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the revelations on Friday, October 28, 1977, by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), that the RCMP has in the recent past illegally entered premises to steal information concerning a legal political party, which raises major questions of policy and procedure in the vital area of national security, accordingly the motion is as follows: It is moved by Mr. Clark, seconded by Mr. Broadbent:

That this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not a happy occasion for the House of Commons or for the country that it is necessary for us to meet in a special debate tonight to deal with the matters which have given rise to this debate.

RCMP

On at least four occasions we now know that the security service of the RCMP broke the law of Canada in the name of national security. Incidents that we know about involve the raid on L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, the burning of a barn near Montreal, the theft of dynamite, and an illegal activity resulting in information about the membership lists and the financial affairs of the Parti Québécois. There may be more.

This evening an Ottawa television station reported that in 1971 security officers infiltrated the so-called Common Front established during that period by the three labour unions in the province of Quebec and, among other things, stole from those organizations documents dealing with their bargaining position and their strategy vis-à-vis the Bourassa government.

I hope that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) will deal with this report when he speaks in the debate later tonight. I hope too that he will tell us whether he was correctly quoted as saying that the probability of more incidents coming is quite high and, if that is the case, he will advise us now, tonight, of the nature and the extent of other illegal acts of which he has knowledge.

Those are the illegal acts that we know about, acts in the name of national security. However, it is important for this House and the country to remember that this same phrase has been invoked to prevent the Laycraft inquiry in Alberta from learning more details of a bugging operation, and invoked also to prevent the Laycraft inquiry from investigating the use of an agreement between the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP, an agreement still in effect, which violates the confidentiality of income tax files. It was for related reasons that the government consistently refused to answer questions placed by my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), concerning the activities of various security committees of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Allmand: Nonsense.

Mr. Clark: The former Solicitor General says nonsense. There is no question at all that that kind of conduct by the government is nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Everyone accepts that, in the modern world, governments have to authorize and follow some secret activities. But we must be alarmed about the apparent pattern of breaking the law which has emerged in the last few months, and we must be alarmed about the use of "national security" as an excuse to hide a multitude of sins. Why not tell parliament about the activities of General Dare and Colonel Bourne? Why not let the Laycraft inquiry carry out the investigation it was established by the Attorney General of Alberta to carry out? Why not do those things?

We are also alarmed about the fundamental although separate question of who authorizes and controls the security apparatus of the Government of Canada.

Attention has focused recently, unfortunately, on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Naturally, if the RCMP breaks the law, it must bear the consequences. However, many of the activities that have come to light have not been performed by rank and file members of the RCMP, but rather by the special security service.

It is important to dwell a moment on the relationship of the security service to the RCMP. Theoretically, it exists under the Commissioner of the RCMP. In practice, it is directed by a director general who, whatever his relation to the Commissioner, also reports directly to the Solicitor General, and, on occasion, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). There is a very real question as to whether the activities of the security service are activities which the Commissioner of the RCMP is authorized to control.

That raises the basic question: who sets the policy of the security apparatus in Canada? Who polices that apparatus?

We know who should set the policy and police the activities. In our system, cabinet should set the policy, control the security service, and bear the responsibility for any excesses by the security service.

Mr. Clark: It appears that the cabinet is not carrying out that responsibility. I say "appears", Mr. Speaker, because there are at least two interpretations of those facts which have become public since the spring of this year. One interpretation is that ministers are not meeting their responsibility to oversee and control the security service. The other interpretation is that the cabinet is setting policy, whether through Colonel Bourne or General Dare or the cabinet committee on security and intelligence chaired by the Prime Minister, but will not accept responsibility when things go wrong.

There is a lot of evidence that we have to consider when looking at the question of who is in charge, in fact, of security policy in this country. We have to bear in mind that a former solicitor general, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), as debate in this House earlier this year indicated, deliberately chose not to ask questions it was his duty to ask.

We have to consider the behaviour of the next solicitor general, the current Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). He was solicitor general for almost four years from 1972 to 1976, the period in which virtually all of these activities took place. On the weekend, as reported by the news media, this minister said that he did not think that he has been told about the theft of the PQ computer list, but he was not sure.

Mr. Allmand: I did not.

Mr. Clark: He now says the news reports were wrong. This afternoon, through the mouth of the current Solicitor General, we are told that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is now absolutely certain that he knew nothing about any illegal activity. If we are to believe the government's story, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was told in March, 1976, while he was still Solicitor General, of the 1972 illegal break-in at the APLQ office. Yet there is no evidence whatsoever that even with this specific information before him he made any real effort to find out what other incidents of that kind might have occurred while he was the minister responsible to this parliament.

We have heard the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs heckling across the aisle tonight. I would hope that he would enter into the debate tonight—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and that he will tell the House of Commons of Canada in detail precisely how he exercised his responsibility in each of the cases which have already been made public here.

Mr. Allmand: This has already been told.

Mr. Clark: I want to turn now, Mr. Speaker, to the present Solicitor General who has held that position since September, 1976. He must have known shortly after he took office about the details of the APLQ break-in. Even the government admits that it knew those details in March, 1976. Yet it was not until January of this year, nine months after he became Solicitor General, that the present minister bothered to tell parliament and the people of Canada anything about that affair.

On June 17, you will remember, Sir, he told this House that the APLQ break-in was, and I quote his words, "exceptional and isolated". He was at some pains to assure us that he had no evidence whatsoever to suggest that other illegal acts had been committed by federal security services. Now, barely five months later, he has come back before parliament to admit more such incidents—we do not know how many more.

According to the minister, he found out about these latest incidents a week ago. This time it took him a full week to get around to notifying parliament and the people of Canada, and then he chose the last day of the throne speech debate, on the last day of the week, so that he could be free of immediate questioning.

I think it is also important, Mr. Speaker, for us to point out on the record that the Solicitor General of Canada made these announcements last week because he knew that if he did not "come clean" before the House of Commons, the evidence of break-ins would become known to the Parliament of Canada through provincial inquiries or other means. In other words, he did not tell parliament because he wanted to; he told parliament because he was forced to.

I was interested in the question period this afternoon to note that the Solicitor General, in answer to a question of mine, ascribed to the director general of the security services the authority for discussing, and I believe he said approving, the break-in at the Parti Québécois offices relating to—

Mr. Fox: You called it a break-in; I did not.

Mr. Gillies: What do you call it then, a cover-up?

Mr. Alexander: Now relax, take it easy.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General is worried about the word. He knows more about this incident than the House of Commons does.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He told us today that it was the director general who was involved in discussions and who authorized—he will interrupt me if I am incorrect—whatever action led the security services to be in possession of membership lists and financial information regarding the Parti Québécois. He said today that the authority rested with the director general. The question for the House of Commons and for the minister is: who gave the director general that authority? To whom does he report? With whom did he have the responsibility to clear that action? Where was the Solicitor General? Who is the responsible minister in this House?

Throughout all this, Mr. Speaker, the government has not been particularly forthcoming with information which the House of Commons and the country requires so that we can know exactly what went on in this case. Indeed, there have been attempts as recently as the question period this afternoon to try dramatically to put down questions from this side of the House so as little as possible would be known about these events.

There are a number of specific questions which I want to put on the record tonight in the hope that the Solicitor General and others who might speak will address their minds to them. But there is one other matter which relates to the possibility of having a full inquiry into the question of the responsibility of ministers of the Crown for the activities of the security apparatus of the Government of Canada and the authority on which security forces in this country are acting. We would prefer to have a special committee of this parliament struck with the full powers to carry out the investigation, to gather the evidence, to subpoena the witnesses, which would result in a clear picture being painted for all the people of Canada as to what exactly is going on here. That is what we would prefer.

The minister instead says that we have this already. We have it in the McDonald royal commission. If that is to be the minister's response he knows that we at least, and many others in this country, have very serious reservations as to whether or not the terms of reference of the McDonald inquiry are broad enough to allow that inquiry to look at the central question, which is: what was the role of the minister in all of these affairs? What is the responsibility of the cabinet in all this business?

I suggested in July of this year that if the minister wanted to continue to hide behind the royal commission the least he could do would be to write into the terms of reference of that royal commission a provision which would make it absolutely clear that it had the responsibility to report upon the role of ministers of the Crown. Once again I should like to suggest to the minister, if he intends to continue to hide behind the royal commission, that he add to the terms of reference of that commission another term of reference, which I would be pleased to read, namely:

To investigate and report on the manner in which Solicitors General and the Prime Minister have exercised their constitutional obligation to supervise fully the activities of the security service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and report thereon to the Parliament of Canada.

I would hope that this debate tonight will begin the procedure of spelling out the relation between the security officers of the Government of Canada and the ministers of the government, and will begin to ensure that we can have some accountability to the House of Commons, through ministers, for the activities of the security services.

● (2022)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I know my time is running out in this debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —but I should like to add for the record a number of questions which I hope the Solicitor General will answer tonight when he enters this debate.

First, we want to know whether there are other incidents of illegal activity by federal security forces of which the Solicitor General now has knowledge. If so, we want the minister to tell the House what they are, when they happened, and specifically, under whose authority they were carried out.

Second, we note that the Prime Minister said that in 1973 or 1974—he is not sure—he ordered the security forces to stop systematic surveillance of the Parti Québécois. We want to know what information the Prime Minister had at that time about the existing surveillance of the Parti Québécois, and in what form did he order it stopped. Was it done in writing? If so, to whom, and with what provisions for enforcement?

By its own version of events, the government—at least the then solicitor general and the Prime Minister—learned in March of 1976 of the illegal break-in at the APLQ office. We want to know what specific steps they initiated at that time to ensure that this was, in fact, as they claim, "an exceptional and isolated" incident. Why, again by the minister's version, did it take until September of 1977 for information on three further incidents of illegal activity to come to the attention of the government?

According to the minister, it has been standard practice for some time for the Solicitor General of Canada to meet on a weekly basis with the director general of security services. In all frankness, I have to ask the minister the following: is it the contention of the government that the question of illegal activities by security services was not raised during those meetings? Those meetings would have numbered well over 100 during this period. Is the Solicitor General trying to tell us that he did not raise questions with the director general about these matters? Is he telling us that he raised those questions and received false information? We want to know what went on in those meetings. We want to know the state of knowledge of the minister or his predecessors.

RCMP

Mr. Clark: In light of the most recent allegations made tonight, we want to know whether federal security officers infiltrated the so-called Common Front of Quebec labour unions in 1971 and stole documents on that organization's bargaining position and strategy, documents which were subsequently turned over to the government of Quebec. If that was the case, we want to know on whose authority, and if ministers claim they did not know, we want to know why they did not know.

We want to know if security officers stole dynamite from a Montreal contractor in the hope that blame for the theft would be placed on some separatist group and, if so, we want to know who authorized that theft, when and how was the Solicitor General informed of it.

We want to know whether any internal disciplinary action has been taken against the officials which the Solicitor General alleges were responsible for those illegal activities. We want to know whether those files have been referred under federal statute to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford).

We have heard about information contained on computer tapes relating to the Parti Quebecois. We want to know whether that information was turned over to the Solicitor General or any other member of the federal government. We want to know whether the government now has any of that information in its possession in any form.

It is important to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada to know what has been the role of the cabinet committee on security and intelligence, a committee chaired by the Prime Minister of Canada. Was information on any of these illegal activities brought to the attention of the committee or its secretary, Mr. Pitfield? We want to know what instructions or directives have been issued by that committee to federal security forces in regard to possible surveillance of political parties, in particular.

Finally, we want to know what assurances, if any, the Solicitor General has given to the McDonald commission in terms of its access to federal documents free of the use of section 42(2) of the Federal Court Act, and its right to inquire into the particular role and responsibility of ministers, including the Prime Minister, in federal security operations.

Those are some of the questions which exist in relation to the responsibility of this government for security activities which we now know have resulted in at least four illegal acts that have come to be known publicly in the last four months. There has been an attempt made at suggesting that the authority for these matters rests solely with the director general, a public servant. We want to know where the Government of Canada was throughout all of these matters, the government that is responsible to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We want to know why there has been an attempt to stonewall legitimate questioning by this side of the House.

An hon. Member: Even when we tell you, you do not listen.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Clark: We want to know this in order to determine all of the evidence and all of the information concerning these matters. We want to know these matters as soon as possible.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the basic facts relating to the debate tonight are as follows: as a result of information provided in the last 72 hours, we now know that there was a break-in at the Parti Québécois office on January 9, 1973.

Mr. Lalonde: No.

Mr. Broadbent: And, no doubt, it was an illegal break-in.

Mr. Lalonde: You are wrong on the place.

Mr. Broadbent: We also know that the Parti Québécois has alleged—and there is no doubt in anyone's mind—an illegal theft of dynamite and the illegal burning of a barn. These are the crude facts; but what is involved is something well beyond the crude facts. First, there is the principle of the rule of law, and that is, the principle that all citizens, including politicians and policemen, must act in accordance with the law established by the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Second is the very important notion of ministerial responsibility, including that of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). This notion, ancient in the history of parliament, entails the obligation of ministers to ensure that on matters of policy and in the implementation of law they obtain the compliance of all the people within their departments, all the people for whom they are responsible. It also entails the moral obligation to inform the people of Canada in the House of Commons if and when there has been a clear breach of the law within their departments, and the obligation to ensure that all such activity is stopped forthwith once it is discovered.

What is the recent record on these two important democratic principles as administered by the current government? I will not be concerned in my comments this evening with the illegal break-in in the fall of 1972. There has been much said about that, particularly during the closing days of the session last spring. I will not be concerned about the allegations of the RCMP burning private property and stealing dynamite. I want to concentrate on the break-in at the offices of the Parti Québécois on January 9, 1973, the implications of such actions, and most particularly, the government's responsibility in this sad affair.

There can be no serious doubt now about who authorized this break-in. It was the director general of the security services at the time, Mr. John Starnes. This has been asserted by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), although he refused to name the individual. He named the position, he did it on the telephone with me last Friday and he did it in his statement in the House in general terms the other day. He asserted it directly today, without naming the individual, in answers in the House today.

Mr. Woolliams: Right on.

Mr. Broadbent: What has to take place—and this is the unfortunate, serious aspect of that illegal activity, presumably by that individual—is the laying of criminal charges against all those involved. Historically—and I regret very much to have to say this—this means another sad chapter in the otherwise noble history of the RCMP in Canada.

The implications for Canada at this time are, of course, unfortunate in the extreme. The Parti Québécois is currently waging a battle, perhaps the most serious battle in the history of our country, for the hearts and minds of the people of the province of Quebec. The Parti Québécois is claiming that the only way that Quebecers can legitimately pursue their own best interests is in an independent state. In the context of this effort by the Parti Québécois we must keep in mind that that party is not only organized democratically but has obeyed fundamentally all the democratic norms of our country, and although we may fundamentally disagree with its objectives, as all of us in the House do, none of us has disagreed with the democratic procedures that it is using.

Among the arguments that they are making is that the federal Government of Canada has frequently and arbitrarily imposed its wishes and programs on the people of Quebec. My point in this circumstance is obvious. What could be more arbitrary, more wrong, and more unjust than a calculated, illegal break-in on their premises, not in the heat of crisis in 1973, as the minister and the Prime Minister would like to have us believe, but in the relatively calculated calm of 1973? What could be more injurious to the arguments put forward by federalists in the province of Quebec than to have a federal police force, the RCMP, doing such a calculated, evil act? What could give the Parti Québécois more legitimate concern that it was done under the federal political direction than the fact that at this time the RCMP acted alone, they were not accompanied, as they were in 1972 in another break-in, by the Montreal police or by the provincial police of Quebec?

In that particular instance it was a break-in into the Parti Québécois office, a legitimate party in that province. The RCMP, a federal force, acted completely alone, unaccompanied, I repeat, by police forces from the province of Quebec. What kind of a weapon has the federal government now given to the Parti Québécois? This is a truly sad episode in the history of our country. This is truly an act of potentially tragic consequences for our people, and as such, whatever illegal course of action was taken by the RCMP on their own authority, the Liberal cabinet cannot escape its responsibility in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It is central to the whole history of the notion of ministerial responsibility that the politicians who hold the ultimate power also assume the ultimate responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I say in this context that no spurious argument put up by the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General can obscure this important, democratic reality which, up to the present time, all of us in Canada have taken for granted. I want to say through, you Mr. Speaker, to the Solicitor General that this particular line of responsibility will be pursued in the House tomorrow, the next day, and the day after that, until we get some important matters clarified.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Now I want to turn directly to the Prime Minister's responsibility in this matter. I say that it is the Prime Minister and no one else who is responsible for the ultimate integrity of the cabinet. It is in him, whoever he may be at the time, that all the people of Canada must, in the crunch, have moral confidence. I regret to say that the grounds for that trust in the present Prime Minister have now been, in my view, completely shattered, and I will explain why.

First, during the judges' affair about two years ago, and then last spring during the first round of debates on the illegal activities of the RCMP, the Prime Minister indicated a willingness to condone moral slackness in his ministers, and to accept it even in his own behaviour. In both those situations there were unequivocally clear examples in which ministers of the Crown either committed a wrongdoing themselves, or, by simply refusing to ask the relevant question—known, I suggest, by any adolescent viewing the circumstances of the time—they ensured that they would not obtain personally implicating information.

Many Canadians were evidently prepared to accept this moral sloppiness last spring, and before that two years ago in the judges' affair. However, I ask you today, how many can accept the Prime Minister's performance in this sad affair? According to his own words, he learned of the 1973 break-in at least nine or ten days ago for the first time. Accepting this, at least for the moment for the argument, I want to ask the following question: did he then proceed to check out and verify what apparently was brought to his attention, and then immediately inform the House of Commons? Of course he did neither of these.

Quite deliberately, and there is no doubt at all about this in my mind, the information was withheld from all the members of parliament for all of last week. Then it was casually and cynically released on Friday in a routine speech by the Solicitor General in an otherwise routine debate. Carefully it was calculated that opposition members would not be able under the circumstances to assume their responsibilities in this system in which we live, by posing the relevant questions. The Prime Minister was not even present at the time, and I assume that he knew that he could convince at least his own colleagues, if no one else in the House of Commons or outside of it, that he had a splendid excuse for not being in the House today or tomorrow because he could claim that he had a previously arranged meeting with two premiers in western Canada. By the time he gets back to the House of Commons on Wednesday, the Prime Minister—and I mean this—no doubt calculated that the whole thing would be brushed aside with two days of skirmishing in the House of Commons, and he would escape scot-free.

Mr. Woolliams: Absolutely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I ask, is this a man concerned with parliamentary tradition, not the spurious traditions but the traditions connected with the rule of law and with ministerial responsibility? Is this a man who has accepted the onerous moral responsibilities of being Prime Minister in this country? To ask the question under these circumstances is to answer it. It is clearly the situation that he has failed to accept the most elementary of moral responsibilities in these circumstances.

● (2042)

Additionally, I cannot in any way accept at face value the ingenious and imaginative answers the Prime Minister gave to journalists who questioned him on this matter last Friday afternoon. The Prime Minister said, when he first learned of the RCMP surveillance of the Parti Quebecois, and I quote the following gem, "Gee, we've got to stop this. We can't go on exercising surveillance on a democratic party". Well, gee whiz—

Mrs. Holt: Read the whole quote.

Mr. Broadbent: You will get your chance in a minute.

Mr. Allmand: There is more dishonesty in this House tonight than there has been in a whole year.

Mr. Broadbent: This alleged shock of the Prime Minister should convince no one on either side of the House. Why do I say that? I say it because of related statements concerning the same issue, and I ask the former solicitor general to read the record carefully himself and see if in all candor he can accept this bundle of contradictions.

What else did the Prime Minister say as reported in the Globe and Mail last Saturday? He said he could not recall whether it was in 1974 or 1975 that he first learned of this surveillance of a democratically constituted and democratically functioning political party in Canada, yet he was amazed and shocked. He also said he could not recall whether he was told at the time whether the RCMP had obtained a list of PQ memberships. The specific words attributed to the Prime Minister are as follows: "Maybe they," the RCMP, "did tell me". Well, maybe indeed they did, Mr. Speaker.

I simply cannot accept the contradictions implied in this series of assertions by the Prime Minister last Friday. If the Prime Minister was shocked and said, "Gee whiz, what is going on, this must stop", then surely he must remember the year. Surely he can remember whether he was told if the RCMP had a list of PQ members. If the shock is there, how could his memory suddenly disappear from related facts that are inextricably connected to such an alleged expression of shock?

If anyone can accept these contradictions—and I have my doubts if any impartial person could—I have another question. If we accept the contradictions there have been so far, how can we at the same time accept the next claim made by the Prime Minister that he did not under the circumstances ask the RCMP if its surveillance was all done within the framework of law? I find that an impossible situation.

Does the Prime Minister think that the RCMP got the list of members by telephoning the PQ and having the PQ voluntarily send it out? Does he think that the list of financial contributors was voluntarily provided by the PQ? Speaking for myself, I do not accept an affirmative answer to those questions in any sense. I say that only a man who did not want to know the answers would not have asked the questions under those circumstances, and only a Prime Minister who has failed in his moral obligations to the people of Canada would have failed to ask them. The same man is the Prime Minister who failed in his obligation to be here today to answer questions and to take part in the debate.

This situation is a sad one. It is a sad day for parliament and for Canada, and I hope that the historical results which may occur from it will not be as negative in the long run in the history of our country as they could possibly be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when the opposition moved for an emergency debate this evening, we on this side did not object to having that debate.

Mr. Alexander: What do you mean object? You had no choice whatsoever.

Mr. Fox: We hoped we would have an opportunity this evening to have a constructive debate. However, it seems quite clear from the type of remarks which have been made on the other side of the House that we can expect neither constructive debate nor respect for the facts as they actually exist and as they have been given to the House of Commons over the past few days. I say "constructive debate" because the matters we are talking about are matters which really go beyond partisan politics. They are matters which affect the national security of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Not one word was mentioned this evening about the type of mandate which has been given to the security service of this country, and since hon. members seem to have overlooked it, I would like to mention it quite briefly. The security service of our country is involved with affairs regarding essentially matters of sabotage, espionage from outside the country—

An hon. Member: Burning barns.

Mr. Fox: —matters of subversion, and matters of terrorism. Hon. members opposite can say what they want, but the question of terrorism, either national or international, as recent events around the world have shown, is a real concern to all democratic countries. There is, of course, the whole matter of foreign intelligence operations in and against this country. There are the essential elements of the mandate the government has given to the security service of Canada. It is an extremely important mandate: the continued well-being of this Confederation and of our Canadian society depends on it.

However, since hon. members opposite wish to home in on some of the unfortunate events which have happened within the security service over the past years—incidents which cannot be condoned in any way whatsoever—I would like also to remind hon. members of the thousands of operations which have been carried on on a day-to-day basis by members of the security service of this country.

Why is it that we can only speak about the things which do not work out? Why is it that we can never speak of the magnificent job done by—

An hon. Member: Come off it, Fox.

Mr. Fox: The opposition does not like to hear me speak of the good work done by the security service. The opposition does not want me to talk about the magnificent job the security service, and the RCMP in general, did during the course of the Olympics in Montreal. The opposition does not want to hear what other security services around the world had to say about the magnificent security requirements which were fulfilled by the RCMP during the course of those Olympics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: We liked the musical ride, too. Get to the point.

Mr. Fox: Nor do they mention the work of the security service as far as foreign intelligence operations are concerned. We have not heard them mention the incident in which certain Cubans were sent out of this country as a result of the work of the security service.

• (2052)

Nor have we heard them mention the case of the Japanese Red Army agent deported from this country last year because of the excellent work of the security service.

Mr. Broadbent: That has nothing to do with the debate.

Mr. Fox: Let us get back to some of the basic facts in this matter. It is far too serious a matter for me to indulge in the kind of childish play in which the opposition is indulging.

RCMP

Last July the Government of Canada set up a royal commission of inquiry into the practices and procedures of the RCMP. Why, Mr. Speaker? The answer is quite clear.

Mr. Broadbent: You had no choice.

Mr. Fox: The reason the commission was appointed at that time was clearly because a number of complaints were made to me as Solicitor General following an initial statement made in the House on June 17 concerning the APLQ incident. At that time these complaints were examined. Some had the appearance of being founded in fact, and the government thought it absolutely essential, as the Commissioner of the RCMP also thought it essential, for the reputation of the RCMP, that these matters be brought to light and examined by an independent and impartial outside body.

Hon. members opposite suggest that every complaint that has come in since that time—and there have been many complaints come in since that time concerning the criminal investigations side of the RCMP, concerning the security services side of the RCMP—what the opposition is suggesting tonight is that I try these people on the floor of the House of Commons. They suggest I divulge names here and that I reveal to the House every complaint. That is exactly what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: We called for an inquiry.

Mr. Fox: He suggested I reveal tonight the totality of complaints made against the RCMP since the month of July. That would amount to trying people on the floor of the House of Commons, without the opportunity to defend themselves completely.

The opposition suggested during the course of debate that we should set up the commission of inquiry. It was eventually set up so that these matters could be looked into and examined by an outside, impartial body. If the RCMP had examined the complaints themselves we would have heard the cry from the other side of the room that it would not be an independent or impartial examination. Now we have established a royal commission, with a judge and two commissioners, to take evidence under oath and cross-examine.

It has escaped the attention of members opposite that the commission also can do something that is extremely important, and that is to give the individuals in question the right to a full defence, the right to explain their actions, and let it be known exactly why they acted in the manner they did.

It has also been made quite clear that in the event any evidence came forward to the commission of an illegal act, those matters would be brought to the attention of the relevant prosecutorial authorities. That matter is very clear.

The opposition says that the terms of reference of the commission of inquiry are not wide enough. If they would only read the terms of reference of the inquiry they would see that those terms are extremely wide.

An hon. Member: It is not the RCMP that is on trial, it is you people.

Mr. Fox: Term (b) of the terms of reference refers to the right and duty of the commission to report the facts relating to any investigative action or other activity involving persons who are members of the RCMP. That gives the commission of inquiry the right to examine any illegal activity, and follow it wherever it leads. If it should lead to a minister of the Crown, it is the right and the duty of the commission to do so.

Mr. Clark: That is not clear.

Mr. Fox: That is very clear in the terms of reference.

An hon. Member: Read them again.

Mr. Fox: I have read them time and time again, and I am satisfied that is the case. We have set up a commission of inquiry and we have referred to that commission all the complaints we have received to date. These complaints will be examined by that impartial, independent body.

Tonight the opposition asks us to tell whether there will be any other cases of illegal acts committed by the force. Mr. Speaker, it is quite possible that in the course of investigation by the commission, while it goes through the files of the force, or in the course of examining witnesses under oath, other cases of illegal activities may come forth. It is an indication of the fundamental position of the government, and of the fundamental position of the Commissioner of the force, that if there have been any illegal acts they ought to come out in the light of day and any individuals involved in those acts should face the due process of law, as would any other Canadian.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the ministers?

Mr. Gillies: Does it include ministers of the Crown?

Mr. Allmand: Yes.

Mr. Fox: It is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that there have been some illegal acts. It is also clear that the RCMP, in the overwhelming majority of cases, has always acted within the limits of its mandate and within the rule of law. That is part of the clear directives given to the director general of the security services by the government and also by the Commissioner of the RCMP.

Mr. Forrestall: Most of the time, but not all of the time.

Mr. Fox: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to go over some of the procedures adopted by the government and by the security service in order to ensure that there is indeed greater accountability procedures within the force. This has been a source of constant concern and preoccupation for the government. It dates back to the 1969 royal commission when the government asked a royal commission, made up of a number of eminent Canadians, to examine the problem. It produced a number of recommendations, some of which were accepted by the government and some of which were not. The government also went even further than some of the recommendations.

In 1971 the government set up the police and security planning group which has received a great deal of criticism in this House. That group was designed to help provide a more sophisticated analysis and to process information coming in. In 1974 we had the Official Secrets Act in which parliament defined for the first time the term "subversion." Within that act, an obligation was put on the RCMP security services to obtain the authorization of the Solicitor General of the day in any matters requiring wiretapping or electronic eavesdropping. While this was only adopted in 1974, previous solicitors general applied the rules of the 1974 legislation within the ministry of the solicitor general before the act was actually adopted by parliament.

In 1975 the government gave a new and clear mandate to the RCMP, which was followed by cabinet directives in 1976, as I mentioned in my speech in the House on Friday.

In 1976 the Marin commission was established and the report will be implemented in the course of the present session. In the spring of 1977 within the security service there was established an operations review committee with the function of examining the operations of the force on a current basis to ensure operations would come within the mandate given to the force by the government, and also to ensure that the operations are carried out within a legal framework. This operations review committee and the director general have access to senior justice officials.

In 1977 we have the new royal commission of inquiry which will be looking at some of the fundamental problems that face the security services. In that regard I would very much have appreciated receiving some constructive comments from the opposition this evening about the fundamental dilemma that faces any security service in any country. This is a dilemma that was identified by the royal commission in 1969. Obviously, however, members of the opposition have decided they would prefer to criticize and downgrade our institutions rather than make constructive comments on how we can improve the situation.

• (2102)

Mr. Fox: This fundamental dilemma is one which I intend to see is brought to the attention of the royal commission on security.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite a dilemma, because after all what we say and what the royal commission observed back in 1969 is that a security service is expected to carry out its operations strictly within the law. I totally agree that it is essential that a security service should carry out its operations within the law.

Mr. Speaker, it is also obvious that under the present provisions of the Criminal Code, some situations are completely nonsensical. For instance, as I said in the House this afternoon, a security officer who would try to secure a code from a foreign country might be accused of burglary. It seems to me that it is a totally preposterous situation which must be corrected at all costs. As for me, I intend to make representations in this connection to the McDonald Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I hoped that on such a fundamental matter, the opposition might also consider some responsible ways of amending our legislation so as to prevent such situations in the future.

[English]

It seems to me that all of us in this House have a responsibility to ensure that the security services of our country are effective. Everyone here says publicly that the security service is essential to the continued existence and survival of our democratic country but we do not seem ready, in all corners of the House, to give the service the necessary powers or the necessary mandate. Perhaps there are areas in which additional powers ought to be given to the security service as long as additional safeguards are also provided.

It seems to me that if we are talking about a security policy we would do well to progress a little more toward a non-partisan approach because this is a matter which goes beyond the realm of party politics, beyond being a member of the Liberal party, or of the Tory party or of the New Democratic Party. it affects the very survival of this country and one would expect that, when there is a debate on an issue of such fundamental importance, we might be able to count on the opposition making construcive rather than destructive speeches.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the reply of the Solicitor General to the Leader of the Official Opposition or the leader of the New Democratic Party, it was quite obvious that he felt a little lost and that he tried to deviate from the specific purpose of this debate, because we have not discussed this evening the extent to which the legislation should be amended to avoid a repetition of what has happened. We will have to clear up the matter so that Canadians will know what were the true reasons and the intentions of the authorities when they directly or indirectly authorized illegal acts, acts of vandalism or burglaries.

Mr. Speaker, it is about time that our citizens realize that even in this country there are shameless abuses of power. This is undoubtedly due to the fact that even in our western democracies, we have not yet learned to differentiate between power and authority, so that those who are entrusted with power think that they have the necessary authority and they put those two different things together to do as they like.

Mr. Speaker, I am a little ashamed today of being a Canadian. For years, we have been making fun of some South American countries because the authorities there rule the roost using their police for political purposes. We see that regularly in the news and we think that it is happening a thousand miles from here. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we have had for many years in our own country a dictatorship like those which exist in banana republics and which are using their law enforcing agencies to achieve their own ends.

That is a very serious abuse which we must denounce. People must know whom they are dealing with. People must realize that for the past few years we have witnessed a parody of democracy in this country. Mr. Speaker, when a government has reached the point where it makes use of law enforcing agencies to achieve its own political ends and, which makes things even worse, condones accordingly their illegal activities, the least we can do is wonder where we will end up this way. On the other hand, the government should stop pleading the security of the state over and over again, for the only real agents provocateurs are the very people who are in power now. Mr. Speaker, I cannot help comparing this situation with those I denounced in 1970, 1971 and 1972. I remember taking part in Montreal in a radio program during which the Minister of Supply and Services spent his time denying what I was saying.

As a member of the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, I was present at a meeting where the authorities of the City of Montreal appeared, and I heard the Montreal mayor, Mr. Lucien Saulnier, the then Director of the City of Montreal, and Mr. Côté, the head of the Legal Services Branch, explain how the FLQ operated, what went on within the various cells, and the Montreal mayor stated that on many occasions he had advised the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General of what was going on. This took place more than a year before the so-called October 1970 crisis.

Mr. Speaker, a police force that sets fire to a barn, breaks into a press agency, steals lists of members of a democratically elected party, a police force that allows itself to do things like that also allowed itself to infiltrate FLQ cells in 1969 and thereby bringing about the crisis we had in 1970. I know this is a very serious charge I am making, Mr. Speaker, but I maintain it because it is time that once and for all the Canadian population know that there are in this country people who have lost their reason, people who cannot accept the changes that are taking place in Quebec, people who only a few months or at most a year ago thought Quebec emancipation and free development were only velleities, people who spend days and nights trying to find a way of crushing people who only want to be free and happy.

When people have such an erroneous idea of the collective "vouloir être" of a whole nation, of a whole people, they try by all means to justify a radical and unreasonable action against these people and, as these people do not take such actions, they are the first ones to provoke them to justify before the whole country their efforts to crush down this emancipating movement which is originally a very sound one.

They will say yes to destroy the country. Let us stop those idiocies. How many Quebecers are there now in power in Quebec as here in this House? Since when did they suggest they wanted to destroy the country when all they want is to reorganize it, to restructure it so its fundamental entities could really be free and equal? Why call all those who want to free themselves and their minds, why call them terrorists, why accuse them of threatening state security? No, Mr. Speaker, that game has just been unveiled.

Mr. Speaker, those who have been using negativism for years to try and destroy the basic aspirations of a whole nation are getting back smack in the face today the result of that boomerang they dared throw. It is not surprising that today if we know certain very specific facts and very specific circumstances it is because the government objectively decided to reveal those facts and circumstances. Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker! The only reason that forced the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to make the statements he made Friday was that he knew quite well that in any case following the line of action taken by the government of Quebec the Keable Commission was there, and those things were going to come out. They decided in favour of a policy of lesser evil and to disclose themselves what they knew was going to come out in a couple of weeks or months. And even the minister says there could be more. Mr. Speaker, it is too bad, we have gone beyond that stage where we could be made to believe stories by individuals more concerned with partisan struggles than anything else. I talked today of the stupefaction that gripped a lot of Canadians when I pointed out that that revelation had astounded several people. Well, today I received by special delivery a letter from a citizen who is not happy with what is going on. This will become generalized and those who will have provoked Canadian citizens will have to suffer the consequences. I would like to quote from this letter dated October 28, 1977. I shall not mention the name of the man concerned to avoid the possibility that the RCMP will break into his premises, but this Friday, since this letter is dated October 28, 1977, from Ville LaSalle, when this man heard on television what was happening, he sat down at his desk and took his pen to write me a letter. Why? Because he was greatly indignant. Here are a few passages from this letter:

Sir, I maintain that it is inconceivable for such a thing to have happened. Is all this not a follow-up on the October 1970 crisis, for which, in passing, the war measures are still in force? Is this action aimed at suppressing the right of anyone to belong to the political party of his choice? There is every reason to believe that certain people want and look for provocation. There are indications that certain people try to hide the truth. If certain present and past members of Parliament and ministers of this government have acted and are still acting hypocritically, the public is entitled to know.

As a citizen of Quebec and a Canadian—

—and he says in brackets—

—(for the moment) and as a member of the Parti Québécois and a federal government employee, I demand that the actions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police come to light and that the present government, the Prime Minister, the ministers and the Solicitor General be asked to reply to certain questions. I have known for a long time, sir, that we are being watched, but I refuse to be used as a political tool and for the political purposes of the Liberal party.

As a French-speaking member of parliament from Quebec, you must urgently ask these questions in the House. If certain people wanted to bring together the present Quebec government and the federal government, theirs is definitely a lost cause in view of these developments. If we must now come back to a "Believe or die" attitude, I would prefer to die. It is only through a public inquiry and with impartial people (not Liberals)— —that we will be able to get to the truth as far back as October 1970.

—this is between brackets—

What has just come to light, Sir, is the straw that broke the camel's back. Small wonder then that we should have witnessed so much commotion on the part of this government since November 15, 1976 in an effort to do as much harm to the present Quebec government through all sorts of statements and commissions.

Mr. Speaker, I read the spontaneous reaction of a Canadian citizen who is a member of the Parti Québécois, which he chose freely and who, I hope, enjoys that freedom; and now this fellow learns that this list was in the hands of my friends across the way. If one stops to think of it even briefly, it is absolutely awful. The former speakers asked a lot of questions, which of course were not answered: but how did that ever happen? How come we learn in 1977 what was known to be illegal and irregular in 1975, as the right hon. Prime Minister said himself, and even in 1975? How did that happen? Does that mean that, had it not been for special circumstances, no one would have known those actions were taken? No, we cannot accept such things. How many other similar activities may have taken place, and what, if we go back further than 1973? As far as I know, in 1973 nothing special could justify such actions; so, if that is the case, if we let those who are in power also have the authority to decide whether or not they can do this or that, then democracy is done for.

Mr. Speaker, the worst has happened to democracy, it is done for. Anyone can be a suspect, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), or any member of this House. Under the pretext of the security of the state, electronic devices are put in offices, homes are being searched and documents are taken from files. It is frightening, Mr. Speaker, and I do not believe the leaders of a country should be allowed to behave in this way because of an unfortunate incident that happened in 1970. And as I said earlier, I believe it has been brought on by these same individuals. When a situation of this kind arises, serious questions are being asked and we must have answers. It is said, and the minister repeated it, the McDonald inquiry now in progress will reveal a number of things.

Mr. Speaker, once more I agree with the previous speakers who say that the terms of reference of this inquiry do not confer all the authority, all the power to bring out the whole truth. Such an inquiry should go back to the years 1970, 1969, 1963. Such an inquiry must go back to the time of the Maison du Pêcheur in Percé, when RCMP officers were members of FLQ cells. That inquiry must go back to every incident that happened through the years, the blame for which was put on Quebecers in order to tarnish their ideology.

Mr. Speaker, those times are over. We must have the truth so the people can judge the actions of their leaders. Mr. Speaker, there have been too many serious incidents, the ramifications of which could have been more disastrous still than has been experienced. There have been too many tragic incidents indeed for their causes and reasons to remain untold. I therefore ask that the light be made not only on the break-in that secured a list of members of a political party, but also that an inquiry be made into what extent the RCMP infiltrated the FLQ and are therefore responsible for certain acts that have been perpetrated during that difficult period we went through. It should need to be explained, for instance, how come RCMP officers were tenants in the apartment above that in which James Cross was held prisoner.

Mr. Speaker, all those questions will have to be answered. All these circumstances must be brought into light under which the government lost their heads. Because this is the kind of nonsense that happens when one loses one's head. And when on November 15 we heard the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and other ministers come one after the other to utter the most horrendous stupidities, they proved once more they were losing their heads. It is a dangerous thing to be governed by people who lose their heads. This is why the people must be informed. Hypocrisy must be exposed. We must know exactly who we are dealing with, what kind of people we have as a government, because in my view they are getting less and less worthy of it.

So, and I would conclude on this, let not the Solicitor General think that we do not want to be constructive. We do want to be constructive to the extent we want the government to get out of there. After abusing their powers, after tampering directly with individual freedoms, they have no right to be there any more. This is being constructive. When the people find that some government went contrary to the bill of rights itself it is in my view a very constructive step to get rid of individuals that are now trampling on liberty and democracy in this country.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of my hon. friend, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). I agree with the previous speaker, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), that the Solicitor General did not really come to grips with the substance of what we are discussing here tonight.

I must say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that the Solicitor General is wrong when he suggests that we are trying to try the RCMP in the House of Commons. What we are seeking to do is to get information about this incompetent government. The Solicitor General has said, in effect, that we have not dealt so far with matters of substance. Well, he is a fine one to say that under the circumstances, but I want to assure him that I and members of my party do in fact have matters of substance and policy which we have worked on, and which we are prepared to put forward at any time. But I think it is asking a bit much tonight, under the circumstances, for me personally to make the type of speech I intended to make, in which I intended to bring up, among other things, some of the background of the RCMP, as this force has evolved from a territorial force into our national police force, with constitutional complications in the process.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there are, as it is becoming more and more evident, complications between Section 92(14) of the BNA Act, which gives exclusive jurisdiction over the administration of justice to the provinces, and some other sections, such as perhaps Section 91(7), which do not, in my opinion, necessarily give the RCMP the kind of mandate which it has had to assume because of the neglect of this government in implementing some of the recommendations of the Mackenzie commission, which were made ten years ago.

I intended to deal, Mr. Speaker, with a lot of other matters of substance; to put forward my thoughts on why the Minister of Justice and Solicitor General of Quebec Marc-André Bédard, has found it necessary apparently to threaten to put the RCMP under the Quebec police commission; as to why the Solicitor General of Alberta, Mr. Foster, has had to complain publicly at the highest levels of the RCMP about the kind of intrusion into provincial jurisdiction which the force and federal authorities have found it necessary for their purposes to perpetrate. I had intended to do a lot of these things, Mr. Speaker, but under the circumstances, in view of some of the relations which have come forward, I want to say a few things tonight about my own experiences in the House, and about the lack of frankness and the lack of facts which I have encountered.

I want to say to the Solicitor General that when he deals with facts I will stake my record in this House against his.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The former solicitor general seems to have something to say about that; I hope he will say it later on. I think it would be useful to remind the House, as we are now considering a time frame extending back to the 1970's, that the solicitors general, some of whom are sitting opposite, have had ample opportunity in the House to respond truthfully to specific questions from this side of the House. In fact I want to cite now an example where I was given false information, but being a good natured type, as every member of this House knows, I did not want to make an issue out of it.

I refer to an incident which took place on February 2, 1976, where I questioned the basis on which the security services were dealing with a man named Mitchell Bronfman, and where indeed circumstances were such that Mr. Bronfman contemplated suing the force, the security services, for their activities. The parliamentary secretary to the solicitor general of that day said to me—I will not repeat all of his remarks because they are in Hansard. Some of them suggest that I should have my head examined for even bringing this up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. MacKay: I see some members opposite agree. If I should have my head examined, Mr. Speaker, then I leave it to the Canadian public to say what should be done with members opposite. The parliamentary secretary to the then solicitor general told me, as reported at page 10562 of Hansard:

> With respect to the earlier matter of whether Mr. Bronfman was persuaded to drop legal proceedings for defamation . . . against certain RCMP personnel, the Solicitor General has received no information on this.

He then went on to say I should not make such innuendoes and that I should be prepared to sustain innuendoes with facts.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as soon as the hon. member had finished this diatribe, I proceeded over to his seat and showed him a copy of a security services report labelled "Top Secret", in which Chief Superintendent J. L. Forest stated, among other things: "The only reason I met Mr. Bronfman was because of his threatened legal action against Inspector Robichaud and I think I have dissuaded him from taking such action or lodging a complaint with the minister".

I then said to the hon. member that it was regrettable that the minister did not know what he was talking about, or at least would not be honest with one of his peers in the House of Commons. In other words, Mr. Speaker, I have documentary proof that the solicitor general of that day and his parliamentary secretary, through whom he presumably spoke, were unable or unwilling to be honest with me as a member of the House on this matter.

It is also useful to point out that on June 5, 1976, I said quite directly to the Solicitor General that he had those responsible for the illegal break-in at the APLQ investigating their own break-in, and that at that time he had the opportunity to set the record straight but did not do so.

It is also fair to remind the House that on December 2, 1976, in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, I said to the minister of industry, trade and commerce, with respect to a matter involving Statistics Canada with which I was concerned, that I was happy that the RCMP were looking into the matter, but that I was rather amazed to find out that they were concerned not with the failings of anything which Statistics Canada were doing but were investigating myself in regard to where I was getting my information. Nothing was said later on about the Solicitor General's comment to this, either.

Tonight I am prepared to put forward another bit of startling information I have received. I must say I have some confidence in my source. I have learned that the government is no longer prepared, apparently, to trust the RCMP with the sweeping and other counter measures that are normal for government communications, but instead have turned this over to the military. This has been going on for some time. The military is now doing in this respect what the RCMP used to do. I will want to question the Solicitor General about this later.

An hon. Member: And others.

Mr. MacKay: Where are we going in this country? Where are we going in this country when there is no trust between our national police force and our national government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: As Your Honour is aware, there was a transmitting device planted by someone in the lining of a chair in my office. I do not have the slightest idea who is responsible for it being planted there. I hope the Solicitor General will do his best to find out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: I think this is only a symptom of what is going on in this country and in this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Personally, I do not get too excited if some thwarted mind puts a bug in my premises. I have very little to hide. It is interesting to consider that people like me, members of parliament and ordinary citizens, are being followed and spied upon and, more likely than not, the Solicitor General, who has a responsibility for overseeing the complete works of the RCMP. In fact the statutes indicate that it is under his direction. In my opinion, rightly or wrongly, he has a responsibility for what those under his guidance and direction are doing.

Mr. Alexander: Nor does he try to find out.

Mr. MacKay: Because a succession of solicitors general have been so incompetent or so lazy and have operated on the need not to know, this force has not been kept under the type of surveillance by government as to what it is doing that the people of Canada have the right to expect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Examples are rife in other countries which indicate that where ministers have unfortunately been caught in situations similar to the situations in which some of the ministers opposite have been caught, they resigned out of a matter of long standing tradition in parliament, a matter of parliamentary responsibility.

An hon. Member: Such as Nixon.

Mr. MacKay: For example, the justice minister in one of the German states resigned within 24 hours after the tragic events in the jail at Stuttgart. Surely that minister is a better example of parliamentary procedure than any conduct I have seen here so far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: This government will not be responsible for very much. It is not responsible for the events in Quebec. It blames that on Mr. Lévesque. It is not responsible for inflation. That is economic forces outside the country.

An hon. Member: It is the weather.

Mr. MacKay: The government is not responsible for unemployment. That is caused by the general economic slump in the west. Certainly it is becoming more and more evident that this government is not responsible for anything. In fact it is irresponsible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: Have we reached the stage where the police make their own decisions without telling their political masters? Have we reached the stage where the political masters do not care to find out or do not want to find out?

An hon. Member: Maybe they know already.

Mr. MacKay: Who is running this country? Is it the police? Is it the bureaucrats?

An hon. Member: Certainly we know it is not you.

Mr. MacKay: It is certainly not me, but I would suggest to the hon. member opposite that I have done more to shed light on what is happening in this country than he has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: It is pretty obvious that members opposite are rather discomfited and disconcerted by some of the revelations which are coming out tonight. I will be particularly anxious to find out more about the background of the withdrawal of responsibility from the RCMP and turning it over to the military. As well, I will be interested in finding out if the Solicitor General really has a handle on the operations of the special "O" branch which he mentioned today. I would be interested in finding out if the Solicitor General has a handle on what is going on, because it is becoming obvious that his predecessors certainly did not. If they did, they have managed to conceal it with the kind of cunning one would hardly expect on the basis of their ostensible performance.

An hon. Member: How about some facts?

Mr. MacKay: Members opposite want facts. I have given facts already. When I listened to the Solicitor General groping around and asking the opposition to supply policies and facts, as we have done on so many occasions with respect to taxation, economics, and other things, then I say to myself: if this government does not have the resources, the integrity or the ability to run this country, why do they not simply pack up and go home?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: They are just a bunch of phonies.

An hon. Member: There is no replacement at all.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. member opposite indicates that there is no replacement. Any replacement would be an improvement over what we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: This government is so incompetent that it is not confronted with insurmountable obstacles. They are confronted with insurmountable opportunities. That is how bad they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Did you get that one, Hughie?

Mr. MacKay: It is pretty obvious that we require some sort of an inquiry that is far more sweeping and far more—

Mr. Poulin: Like Hamilton Harbour?

Mr. MacKay: I am glad the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) has referred to the Hamilton Harbour matter.

An hon. Member: Try another one, Hughie.

Mr. Gillies: How many guys are in jail on that one?

Mr. MacKay: I remember when we had that famous meeting with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where the two solicitors general sat there like two owls, with the RCMP Commissioner in the middle. For two hours they proceeded to dance around and not give us any information. I remember quite well what the then commissioner, Mr. Nadon, admitted. He admitted that it was quite possible in the Hamilton situation that there were activities, in the files, by the SS of which he was not aware. I remember that very well.

Mr. Poulin: You did not answer the question.

Mr. MacKay: I hope the hon. member opposite will get up and say something constructive. We would all be very interested in hearing what the hon. member for Ottawa Centre has to say.

Mr. Muir: He sits on his brains.

Mr. MacKay: The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) says, "He sits on his brains". That may well be true. I never examined his anatomy that closely, because frankly it did not interest me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is where he is bugged.

Mr. MacKay: I wonder if he were bugged whether he would know it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Try again, Hughie.

Mr. MacKay: As the Solicitor General has said, we must address ourselves to ironing out a situation where two royal commissions in this country are being obstructed by the Solicitor General and other members of cabinet in getting information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: We have to find out why the Solicitor General was not able to give me an unequivocal answer today, that there was no problem with surveillance, bugging or mail interception, with any member of the Laycraft Commission of Inquiry. I put that question to him, and he never answered it. He could not give me that kind of unequivocal assurance.

I would like to know why it is necessary to have the provisions of Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act invoked under circumstances best described by Mr. Justice Deschêne of the Quebec Superior Court when he dealt at some length with a situation where this particular regressive statute was involved. It was the case of two young girls who were discharged from their employment at the Olympics. It would be interesting for all members to read the scathing remarks by Mr. Justice Deschêne regarding the appropriateness of the invocation of that regressive statute in a case which had been taken up by the Quebec Civil Rights Association. That is the kind of cover-up and the kind of abuse of statutory authority of which this government is guilty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: There are many other members who wish to speak tonight, but I should like to say in closing that I understand the reason why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could not be here. I make nothing of that, because I assume he will come as soon as he has the opportunity. Perhaps he will be able to shed some light on some of these things. But I wonder, the way things are going, if we will see the incredible situation here in the House of Commons when the Prime Minister will stand up and say, "I am no crook".

• (2142)

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, we witnessed today an incredible performance on the part of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) in answering a most serious charge. The charge is that the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country do not understand what is at issue in this debate. What is at issue is whether the rule of law will prevail for this government, for the police forces of Canada, and for all the people of Canada. Not once did the Solicitor General answer that particular proposition.

We are in real danger in this country. We sit in the House and we rant and rave about young people breaking the law. We are concerned with labour unions which do not abide by the law, but the law begins at home. It begins with this government, and it begins with the police forces of the country. They must honour the law of the country if we are to have respect for law at every level, and the government has failed to provide that kind of leadership.

Tonight we witnessed the Solicitor General wrapping himself in the flag and saying, "Oh you fellows over there are just carping about the RCMP. Why don't you talk about all the wonderful things the RCMP has been doing?" I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am proud of the RCMP. I have always supported the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: They are one of the finest police forces in the world. I want to say one other thing. It is the opposition that is protecting the reputation of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Leggatt: It is the opposition that is trying to protect the RCMP from being destroyed by an incompetent government and an incompetent minister. That is what is happening.

We cannot start this debate without trying to distinguish between political dissent and subversion, and this government has failed to understand the difference. The record shows it over and over again. In fact I will provide a memorandum to the Solicitor General. I hope he is paying attention because this is a further piece of evidence. I want the Solicitor General to read this memo, because I want him to establish its validity. It is one further reason why this government fails to understand that it is all right to attack a government but it is not all right to plant bombs. But, you see, they have been in power so long that they cannot understand the difference. "L'état c'est moi, l'état c'est nous." This is their philosophy. To be a Liberal is to have the divine right to run things in this country. That is what we have seen ever since I came to the House in 1972. They have never understood the difference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: The story was told earlier in the House about activities whereby the common bargaining position of the Common Front in the province of Quebec was illicitly obtained. That information subsequently found its way into the hands of the Liberal provincial government in Quebec. Those people have a right to have a common bargaining position, they have a right not to be wiretapped, spied on and broken into, and, yes, the PQ has the same right in the province of Quebec as does any other legal political party in Canada. But that distinction is not understood by the government. In fact the PQ has made a fetish of running around the province of Quebec and saying, "We are the legal government". They have done it consciously and deliberately so that they could gain support, and they have been successful in doing it. Surely this is one party that would bend over backwards not to engage in subversion if it could possibly avoid it because it would destroy its credibility in the province of Quebec.

Now I want to turn to the province of British Columbia where we had a recent ferry strike. In that province the chairman of the British Columbia Labour Relations Board is a man called Paul Weiler, the head of the B.C. Federation of Labour is a man called Len Guy, and the head of the B.C. Government Employees' Union is a man called John Fryer. I have never heard a scintilla of suspicion raised against any one of those three people in terms of subversion. However, we have been through a crisis in the province of British Columbia, we have been through an abrasive ferry strike which fortunately is over now. But I will give the Solicitor General this memo and I want him to check it out because I am worried that it might be a valid memo. It is a memo to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) from the Hon. Allan Williams, from his special adviser, Col. Robin Bourne of security planning and analysis. I will read it into the record. It reads as follows:

Our investigation of Mr. Paul Weiler, chairman of B.C. Labour Relations Board, has now been concluded. We will forward our report to you under separate cover in the next few days. Your requests pertaining to Messrs. L. Guy and J. Fryer are being processed at this moment and will also be forwarded to your office as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Political surveillance.

Mr. Leggatt: I hope that the Solicitor General will be able to tell me that the source of this memo is false or that the person who provided this memorandum to me and to several other people is operating under something that is wrong or false. But I have to rely on this memorandum and, when I look at it, it appears to be legitimate. We have tried to check it out and we find it looks legitimate.

What is happening in this country? These are legitimate trade union leaders acting in a legal and constitutional way.

The government should try to distinguish between subversion and political dissent. Please, I urge it to do that or we will not survive as a nation, and its members will be the authors of disunity as a result of this kind of attack on legal organizations, because the same is true of the break-in at the PQ.

What else is there in the background that we do not know about? It is the failure to distinguish between legal political dissent and subversion. The Solicitor General spoke about terrorism all over the world. God knows we are against terrorism wherever it occurs, but it is interesting that West Germany, which has faced more terrorism than we have, did not need a War Measures Act because they have a government that has some understanding of the rule of law and of civil liberties.

An hon. Member: What about the recent prison murders there?

Mr. Leggatt: I do not know where the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) gets her information. I was told they were suicides, and I rely on the information I received that they were suicides in that instance.

An hon. Member: She talks to Mackenzie King.

• (2152)

Mr. Leggatt: I do not want to reduce the level of this debate to the facetious. I think it is too important in terms of the liberties of the people of Canada. The most incredible statement of all was when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) referred to the climate of the times in 1973 in terms of the PQ. We were both in the House together at that time. We both sat in committees together. We knew what the climate of the times was in 1973. We knew that a Liberal government in the province of Quebec was in trouble. We knew that this federal government was anticipating a very important election. We knew about Watergate. That was the climate of the times in 1973.

What the people need is a new weather map because hon. members opposite do not understand the climate now. They do not understand the traditions upon which this country was built. I have sat with the Solicitor General in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs from time to time. From time to time we are given private briefings about subversive groups in Canada. I appreciate the briefings that are given, and we all keep them private, yet what do I find when I pick up a newspaper?

In Saturday's Globe and Mail we read that the Bourne Group passed on lists of groups of people deemed potentially subversive or violence prone. These groups were CUPE—the Canadian Union of Public Employees—the National Farmers Union, and the Indian Association of Alberta. Those are three of the groups that were named.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh, they are dangerous!

Mr. Leggatt: I have sat through those private briefings—and I know many other hon. members have—and never once were those "subversive" organizations named to ordinary members of parliament. Are they being named to the Solicitor General as subversive elements in this country? I have to say that I have a strong suspicion that they are and that the Solicitor General may be acting upon that kind of information. The whole question of determining what is subversion and what is political dissent is one to which the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister must direct their attention, and they have not done it.

According to the government, there may have been some technical violations of the law, but the information was returned to the PQ. I have been through almost every maximum security institution in Canada, and there are many people in them who would love to return the goods they have taken, and get out. That is not an excuse. By God, we have to show leadership, and the leadership begins here at this level, honouring and obeying the letter of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Did you read the guidelines of 1975?

Mr. Leggatt: Today we heard the opposition criticized. There has been the suggestion that this is a destructive debate and that all we do is carp and criticize. We do have a role to play.

Mr. Allmand: You said nothing was done.

Mr. Leggatt: I will review the 1975 guidelines, but the government should review the whole record of its administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: We are suffering the legacy of an unnecessary War Measures Act, and the destruction of the law since that event took place has continued to this day. This government provided the opening and the opportunity for the PQ to become the government of Quebec, and this government is the architect of Canadian disunity.

However, there are some things we can all do together. The question of severing the security and intelligence branch from the RCMP is one which must be seriously considered. The Solicitor General referred to this. The use of a Supreme Court judge should be considered so that warrants can be obtained in camera, if publicity would destroy particular investigations. A civilian commissioner for the RCMP must be given serious consideration, given what we have seen. These recommendations were made by our former leader, M. J. Coldwell, and his fellow royal commissioners. There has been ample information to indicate to the government the kinds of problems it has been getting into, and it has failed to act. It is either negligent, naive, stupid, or a combination of all three. Or perhaps it is remarkably venal.

Mr. Broadbent: Or a combination of all four.

Mr. Leggatt: Or a bit of all four, but the rule of law is for you, Mr. Speaker, for me, and for everyone.

Mr. Allmand: We all agree with that.

Mr. Leggatt: You may agree with it, but act on it. That is the message the government must get through its Liberal arrogance.

Mr. Allmand: The Solicitor General referred all the cases to the attorneys general of the provinces.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) has the floor.

Mr. Leggatt: In terms of sensitivity to the question of civil liberties even the Nixon administration in the United States finally knew it was doing wrong. It finally conceded that it was not the whole state and that an attack on the Nixon government was not an attack on the United States itself. I do not believe this government quite understands that yet.

This government does not quite understand that we can attack a Liberal government without being subversive. It is still living under the illusion that it has the devine right to run the affairs of Canada, but the Canadian people are fed up. The days of this government are numbered. It has had it!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this evening, despite the importance of the debate, one realizes with regret that discussions are inspired more by political considerations than the will to find a sound solution to the problem. When one hears hon. members of the opposition speak of the PQ, when one realizes to what extent they are outraged by the possibility that the offices of a legal political party may have been broken into illegally, well, first of all as a Quebecer I really feel embarrassed to see that the police force of the federal government, as well as some provincial police forces such as the Quebec Police, or that the police of the city of Montreal should be implicated in certain events which, to say the least, leave us perplexed. But when people talk of the climate in 1973, and members of the opposition speak of the climate in 1975, a few years are being overlooked, Mr. Speaker.

In Quebec and Canada but more particularly Quebec since this matter deals with a Quebec political party, we tend to forget that back in 1964 a few bombs exploded here and there and that acts of terrorism, alien to our way of life, took place in subsequent years. One can argue about violations of individual and collective liberties but it must be admitted that most unusual events happened including the murder of a provincial minister. These are things, Mr. Speaker, that we should remember. A peculiar phenomenon took place. This may be the kind of phenomenon that happens in a country in the midst of an evolution, Mr. Speaker, but a few months ago Premier René Lévesque himself, in a radio broadcast, on the CBC network stated that during a newsmen labour conflict he felt rather uncomfortable because some of the strikers who wanted to be associated, on this occasion at least, with members of the Parti Québécois in a protest march had asked him to join them in the street. But, in his capacity of leader of a responsible party he felt he could not have anything to do with fanatics. And he explained on the CBC how sorry he was to have to turn down the offer of people sympathetic to his cause but he felt that in this crowd several thousands strong there were a few fanatics that the PQ could not afford to identify itself with.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we should refine our thinking when entering this debate. I think that too much of an attempt has been made to single out the RCMP for what has been referred to as illegal break-ins. Our various police forces in Canada, at the three levels of government, had to face new situations. I do not think I am in any way blaming or criticizing them when I say that these police forces, within the North American context, may not have been trained to deal with an unexpected state of affairs. That is why those people had to adopt new strategies and new procedures. I think this debate tonight would be most positive if all hon. members would recognize that our police forces may have been excessive in some operations and should redefine their operation procedures, but if it is true that the office of the Parti Québécois was broken into the way some opposition members suggested, I think that the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox) was very clear on that point.

He is asking the Quebec attorney general to bring the facts to light and let him investigate and if the judiciary system of the province of Quebec concludes that there was indeed illegal action, I think that we should not be partisan and should help the police force for which we are responsible—the RCMP—to adopt a new rule to ensure individual and collective liberties.

Mr. Speaker, I will always be opposed at any time in this country to a police force restricting opinions, ideas and spoken words and restricting also the right of individual action if such actions are legal and non-violent. As my friend from New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) mentioned it earlier, it is possible, even desirable, that all Canadians be free to criticize, disagree completely with the government but, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a way to do it, a non-violent way, by democratic ways, and we have the responsibility to protect them.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only because of opposition pressures that the government instituted the McDonald Commission. When this commission was established, it was given a very comprehensive mandate and we would very much like to hear the opposition parties, for instance, my colleague from Joliette (Mr. La Salle), make recommendations to this commission so as to develop precise rules which will meet the new aspirations of Canadian citizens and which will ensure the basic freedoms that Canadians have always enjoyed and must be preserved for always.

I believe that such proposals should be made and that we should now be able to ask ourselves some questions. This should be the purpose of this evening's sitting, to ask ourselves some questions to know how our security services can, first of all truly ensure the security of the state and its citizens, and secondly, not become a politically controlled institution. It is difficult to strike a happy medium. Our colleagues opposite ask that the government see to it that the police does not exceed certain limits, but in some other debate or at another time, the same people tell us that the government controls the police and uses it for political purposes. They should tell us clearly and once and for all if they want us to leave the police to its own devices or if they want us to give instructions to the police and to the security council.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the debate concerns one of the most basic issues of the history of this country and I wish the members of the House would quickly pass over their pet subject and make truly positive recommendations. If they are not ready to make them tonight, I hope they will at least make them eventually and as soon as possible to the proper institution which is the McDonald Commission. It is a matter of proposing standards, procedures that will allow our security service to be efficient and serve Canadians without infringing on the rights and freedom of its citizens.

I think that having established the McDonald Commission and having agreed to be involved in the commission set up by the province of Quebec our government demonstrated its good faith and its leadership.

Second, we should not think that the political power or the government attempted to hide facts. Officers of the RCMP have been called as witnesses and told: if you have been involved in illegal action you shall answer for it, like any citizen, before the courts of justice of this country. However, I think it is most difficult, particularly in the present context, which is very different from that of 15 or 20 years ago, it is difficult for our police corps to know and establish, even in good faith, the exact limits of their action and to make the distinction between what is illegal and what is not.

I think it is up to this Parliament and not the government to define the will of Canadians as concerns security and to say to our police corps, our security service: this is what we expect from you. I also think that if the House could reflect and make serious and concrete proposals on that subject, Mr. Speaker, it would be better for the freedom of Canadian citizens and the well being of our people.

[English]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): The RCMP, Mr. Speaker, are suffering from probably the lowest morale they have ever suffered in their entire existence. The integrity of the force is eroded, the image of the force which has heretofore enjoyed an international reputation, the highest of any in the world, is eroded, and all because of the actions of this government and of successive incompetent solicitors general.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I want to discuss some facts tonight and I want to preface what I have to say by assuring the House that I am not disclosing any facts which were not in my possession prior to some of the in camera briefings we had in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I am glad to see that the two former solicitors general are in their places tonight, Mr. Speaker—Tweedledum and Tweedledee, the Bobsey Twins.

An hon. Member: Or fuddle and duddle.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps they would better be described as Messrs. Fuddle and Duddle, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Allmand: That is another original thought.

Mr. Nielsen: They certainly fuddled and duddled enough while they held the post of solicitor general.

Mr. Allmand: You must have been writing in the Yukon. We have not seen you for a while.

Mr. Nielsen: Instead of listening to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) interjecting from his seat, I would expect him and his seatmate, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), to do something this House has been waiting for, namely, get up and explain their actions while they held that office.

Mr. Allmand: We are waiting for you to say something.

Mr. Nielsen: If the minister would just listen I will get to the facts in a moment. One thing I very much remember is that a very good friend and champion of the force, a former member for Ottawa West, now in the other place, who held the post of solicitor general immediately prior to the Minister of Supply and Services, resisted the setting up of this civilian state police agency within the cabinet. But after his removal, the Minister of Supply and Services came to office and we got "Goyer's gumshoes."

I was concerned at the reaction on many of the faces opposite to the subject matter of this debate—

Mr. Goyer: Be accurate!

Mr. Nielsen: I will accept a question from the minister if he wishes to stand up and ask it.

Mr. Goyer: I said, "Be accurate."

Mr. Nielsen: I will try to be accurate but it is very difficult to be accurate having regard to the paucity of the information from the other side.

Mr. Goyer: Why don't you ask questions?

Mr. Nielsen: We ask questions here and we ask questions in the committee, but we come away with about as much information as we got today, namely, zilch—nothing. The obsession with secrecy shown by the government does nothing to enhance our confidence in it.

There were reasons for the setting up of the security, planning and research group, as it was then known—the sham of "research" soon disappeared. But the reasons were not those given by the present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). They go back to 1963 when the Spence inquiry was under way, when the Munsinger inquiry was under way, and when other questions of national security were being discussed in the House. That report was the reason for the creation of the Royal Commission on Security, a report which, incidentally, the Prime Minister promised would be debated in the House. But he reneged on that promise as he did on so many others.

That group of civilians was set up for four purposes. They were these: first, to infiltrate and instal agents for the purpose of gaining intelligence from the educational system. Without going into great detail I call the attention of the House to the surveillance conducted on university campuses.

Second was the infiltration and surveillance of the public service itself—the "extra-parliamentary opposition" with which operation the former solicitor general is familiar since the famous blacklist was prepared under the leadership of the Minister of Supply and Services.

The third reason was that of infiltrating and obtaining intelligence from the mass media, and the fourth was for the same purpose with respect to the labour movement. Those were the four objectives in setting up what is referred to as this non-operational group of civilians originally known as SPARG and subsequently as SPAG and SPA. The group had regional desks in all these areas with civilian representatives as well as RCMP.

It all stemmed from the preparation of a paper on "The Management of Crisis" by General Dare, who was subsequently smuggled into the RCMP, probably being the first non-member of the force to be appointed to the post of officer in the RCMP, with one exception, that of General Bourne. It is traditional in the force that the post of commissioner is filled from within its ranks. That tradition has been followed throughout the entire existence of the RCMP. Today there is some fear that the commissioner might be drawn from outside the force, a very sad development should it occur.

When the debate arose in this House on the setting up of that special agency in 1969 we resisted its formation on the basis that there was a real danger of it being subverted into being a political state police force. We predicted in that debate in 1969 that if such an agency were set up precisely what has happened now would happen. And it has come to pass. What has taken place is this: the RCMP, having previously enjoyed a standard of integrity unmatched in the world, has now been eroded to a point at which the public of Canada is justified in presuming—and I state this as my conviction—that there is an unwarranted interference with the operations of a previously independent police force in the performance of its functions. This has been done while assuring the country that there is a real need for this civilian agency in order to protect national security. That is only a guise.

The quickest way of restoring the confidence of the public in the integrity of the force is to abolish that agency and place the responsibility for security and intelligence back under the sole control of the force where it has rested for a hundred years.

With regard to the four objectives of this agency let me inform hon. members that there were 14 groups which the agency was charged with infiltrating and gathering intelligence from. The Globe and Mail apparently has made public the name of one of these groups. I want to put the whole 14 on the record. One was the FLQ, a natural group to warrant the investigation of any security-minded country. Another was the National Farmers' Union.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nielsen: The western branch was in opposition to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Another was the Native Alliance for Red Power in British Columbia. I have a paper in my file, among my mementos on this subject which I collected from 1969 to 1973, an internal memorandum written by an employee of SPAG to another employee of SPAG entitled "Social Attitudes and the Indians." This is a lengthy memorandum describing how a Saskatchewan native organization was to be infiltrated, spied upon, and neutralized by this civilian agency set up by the government.

The Saskatchewan Metis Association was one of the objectives of the group, and the memorandum to which I have referred was directed to that very group. It is dated August 25, 1972, and directed to W. J. Dabros, if the Solicitor General wants to check the memorandum and verify the facts I am putting on record.

The next is a most interesting group which the civilian agency was charged with infiltrating for the purpose of gathering intelligence, in 1969 I remind hon. members having regard for the events that transpired earlier this year. It was to get into the extra parliamentary opposition and alter the structure of the existing government. There are some very interesting names which I will not put on the record with regard to the activity of this civilian agency.

One of the names which came up as a result of conversation I had in order to glean this information was the name of Bernard Ostry, who, I am sure, is familiar to a good many members on the other side. It is very interesting that the information which came to me with these facts, and this really surprised me, was that the then minister, now the Ambassador to France, Mr. Pelletier, vigorously opposed any security clearance for Mr. Ostry on the basis of a security report prepared by the Security and Intelligence service of the RCMP at the time.

There is a very interesting name here in connection with the next organization that was to come under the surveillance of this agency, The New Left, a philosophical movement. Another one was The New Morning, a maritime group oriented toward guerilla warfare. On October 16, 1971, this group demonstrated against Canadian Forces Headquarters in the maritimes. Molotov cocktails were thrown.

Another group was the Black United Front, headquartered in Halifax. The Local Initiatives Program and National Health and Welfare came under the scrutiny of the early SPARG. The agency was charged with consulting Liberal cabinet aides with regard to any LIP grant that came under investigation to see whether the investigation should continue or be dropped.

The next group that came under the scrutiny of this civilian police agency was the Acadians, again based in the maritimes, Moncton. The next was The Red Morning, another new left organization based in Toronto. They commenced in 1970 with rifle and guerilla training and had links with the Black Panthers and Weathermen.

I might interject that another of the responsibilities of the group was to recruit agents wherever they could get them for the purpose not only of infiltrating these groups whose names I am putting on the record, but also for the purpose of infiltrating university campuses, the media, labour, and national political organizations as well as government. I might interject as well that on unimpeachable authority it came to me that this agency had two sources of information in the office of the then Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), who just stepped down from leadership of this party.

Next was the Communist Party of Canada, the Marxist-Leninist movement, very heavy in Vancouver. The smoke bombing of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation headquarters in Toronto was one of the matters which gave rise to the attention of this agency and this group.

Not unsurprisingly, Praxis was the name of another group which occupied the focused attention of SPARG, now SPAG. Not surprising too was the Edmund Burke Society.

Those people who come from the province of Quebec will be interested to learn that the agency was specifically charged to speak about guidelines and speak about a cabinet committee on security and the control which the politicians exercised over this group. There was a list of subversive organizations. These were three that were listed as subversive to occupy the attention of this agency in the province of Quebec: the Quebec Teachers' Corporation, the CNTU, and the Quebec Federation of Labour.

The Praxis group in Toronto was linked to "Our Generation," a publication edited by a gentleman named Rousopolis. There the agency was charged to infiltrate three sections of government with the intention of using government resources and contracts to overthrow itself. They called it the microbe concept.

It will surprise hon. members, but possibly not some of those opposite and certainly not the Solicitor General and his predecessors, that all of this activity was funded without benefit of approval of any estimates by parliament. It was funded by taking funds from Defence estimates. In addition, it was funded by, and this will interest the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), taking funds from those which were intended for the federal penitentiary system in the country, amongst others. That is where the money was gleaned from so that we parliamentarians would not be able to put our fingers on the operations of this agency.

It has gained some respectability since General Dare was smuggled into the RCMP, and the S and I responsibility of that force has been swept into his control rather than remaining where it should be.

In Montreal another organization that came in for scrutiny was The Parallel Institute, an organization roughly similar to that of Praxis. They got a $200,000 grant. I do not know whether it was for making wooden ducks or what. The Commercial Association was the name of the applicant that got the LIP grant for the purpose of operating this organization. As one gentleman in the press gallery put it—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, that unexpectedly low-key speech by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), which at least was based on a considerable amount of research, draws to our attention that our colleagues in the opposition have been operating tonight considerably below their capacity.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) treated us to a red herring the size of a whale, reading us a lecture on the difference between subversion and dissent. It could hardly have failed to come to his notice that it was the police who sought subversion in scrutinizing the Parti Québécois and it was the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who told the police this was dissent and to cease and desist.

Mr. Orlikow: Why did he promote—

Mr. MacGuigan: Do you think the Prime Minister is responsible for all the promotions in the public service?

Mr. Woolliams: You better believe it.

Mr. MacGuigan: These interjections merely show the depth to which the opposition is willing to bring the debate.

RCMP

The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) was here a moment ago. He, I am sorry to say, ended his speech on a note of tastelessness which I have seldom heard in this House. It was far below the usual standard we expect from that esteemed gentleman.

Mr. Woolliams: Come on!

Mr. MacGuigan: Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who likes to interject from time to time, will be able to restore the opposition's honour with his remarks, which I believe are scheduled to follow mine.

The facts have been sufficiently well stated at this point. I do not think they need any further elucidation.

I would like to take my principles from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). I have no fear to fight this battle on his ground. He stated two principles, I think he called them two great principles of democracy. I am more than happy to discuss this issue on the basis of those principles. The first was the rule of law. The second was ministerial responsibility.

Let us look first at the rule of law. I believe he said it was the principle that all citizens must act in accordance with the laws established by this parliament. In other words, the same law applies equally to all citizens, rich or poor, weak or strong, police or not, members of parliament or not. That is not in question here. There is no one in this House, certainly not on this side, who doubts that justice according to law must be done. Justice according to law must be sought by the government at all times and for all citizens of the country.

An hon. Member: Justice must also appear to be done.

Mr. MacGuigan: Certainly, it must also appear to be done.

Mr. Orlikow: So the police can break in, that is OK?

Mr. MacGuigan: I am not saying it is OK, but let me remind the hon. member that it was the hon. member for New Westminster who said that you were protecting the reputations of the police. They were the ones who broke in, so why are you protecting their reputation? Why are you inverting facts and values? Why are you attacking the government, which is upholding the law, and protecting the police, who have broken the law?

Mr. Paproski: Check into the Prime Minister in 1968.

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member will have a chance to make his speech later.

The administration of justice is also part of the rule of law. The administration of justice must be free from all external direction, especially political direction. This is what the rule of law is about too, Mr. Speaker. Not only must everybody obey the law, but there must be no interference in the administration of law, especially no political interference. This is the reason why it is so unfortunate that opposition members have chosen to drag in the Watergate affair.

Mr. Gillies: It is the same thing.

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) says it is the same thing.

Mr. Gillies: That is the issue.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen should not need elementary lectures, but let me spell out the elements of this in as elementary a fashion as I can so that they can understand. In the Watergate affair there were two elements: there was the break-in and the cover-up. The break-in at Watergate was carried out as a matter of private entrepreneurship.

Mr. Orlikow: Not by the police.

Mr. MacGuigan: No, not by the police.

Mr. Orlikow: It was worse with the police.

Mr. MacGuigan: I agree. That is precisely my point. The hon. member is helping me to make my speech.

Mr. Orlikow: Let us have discipline then.

Mr. MacGuigan: We are having an investigation in order to discipline the police; it is precisely for that reason.

The break-in in the Watergate case was a question of private entrepreneurship, political entrepreneurship, by people motivated by partisan political objectives. Even if you extend Watergate to apply to all of the other evidences of break-ins which occurred during the Nixon regime, they were all either of this kind or perhaps, in some cases, at the very most, police operations which were directed by political parties for political purposes.

We have a lot of speeches going on here, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if I could ask you to—

Mr. Alexander: Yours is not very good, Mark.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I think the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) has quite appropriately brought to my attention that there are many speeches going on. I wish to remind hon. members that if they want to take part in the debate, if they want to stand in their place I will recognize them. Presently the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville has the floor.

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not mind, Mr. Speaker, whether they hear me or not, but I should like to hear myself when I am talking.

As I was saying, the break-in at Watergate was entirely a question of political interference; it was directed by a political party. In the present case we have incidents which occurred wholly on police initiative and direction.

Mr. Gillies: How do we know?

Mr. MacGuigan: We will find out. There is no evidence of any kind to suggest anything beyond that, and if there is any evidence of that kind it will come out. But it is too soon to suggest that it is there. I do not think members of this House should be trying individuals who are not here before us.

The second element of the Watergate affair was the cover-up. This involved, first of all, a denial of the facts, secondly a denial of a forum in which the facts could be discussed. Here we have had a complete frankness with the House by the government. We have also had a royal commission of inquiry, to establish the forum. So again, we have no government participation in the break-in, it was a police affair; we have no government participation in the cover-up.

Mr. Gillies: But we do not know.

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member says they do not know. A moment ago he was making allegations based on knowledge which he now says he does not have. This is exactly my point: they do not know. Not knowing, it is their obligation to the rule of law in this country, which they say is important and which we also say is important, to be quiet and not make innuendoes about a Watergate in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: In other words, if the rule of law was infringed—and it probably was, it appears that it was—then it was infringed by the police, not by the government. If there is government responsibility, it cannot be found under the principle of the rule of law; it must be found under the principle of ministerial responsibility.

I should like to turn now to a consideration of that other principle, the great democratic principle, as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby called it. Here the meaning is that responsibility must be commensurate with authority. To the extent that the executive has authority, it must be responsible for how the authority is executed. If a politician enjoys the benefits, then he must accept the blame which results from the exercise of the powers directly under his control.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, when we speak of government and of ministerial responsibility we are dealing with what philosophers would call an analogous concept. We are dealing with something which is different in a lot of respects and in a lot of instances, because not all the instances are the same. I will not go into an analysis of all the organs of government tonight, but I would certainly argue that when we are dealing with an independent agency, such as the police or the RCMP, the application of the principle of ministerial responsibility has to be almost wholly different from the application of that principle to an ordinary department of government.

The principle can be applied to the police only in a very limited sense in order to avoid political interference. The accountability of the ministry in a case of this kind is only to ensure that, when there is fault, change takes place in the agency. My argument is based on the principles of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby himself, who put the rule of law in the first place, gave it priority of place with respect to democratic principles, putting in second place the principle of ministerial responsibility. If there is a conflict, the principle of the rule of law governs.

In this case, since the rule of law insists that there be absolute impartiality in the administration of justice free from external direction, especially political direction, this could not be achieved if the minister were to assume total responsibility for all the actions of the agency.

We have a government which has assumed its responsibility. It has stopped the surveillance of the PQ which was taking place, as soon as it found out about the—

Mr. Orlikow: After the fact.

Mr. MacGuigan: Yes, of course after the fact, because the police hid the facts. The government took its responsibility. That is the difference between the police and other agencies of government, and it is time that members of the opposition understood that.

In addition to stopping the surveillance of the PQ, the government consulted regularly with top officers in the RCMP in an attempt to find out the facts. In many cases it seemed that the top officers themselves did not know the facts. There seems to have been a persistent policy in the force in recent years to deny even the top officers in the force knowledge of what was being done lower down, and sometimes not that much lower down either.

The government also gave a full account to the government of Quebec, which was the concerned government in charge of the administration of justice in the area where the offences took place, so that it could lay charges according to the normal juridical process. Finally it set up a royal commission with very broad terms. In addition to those terms, the government promised with complete co-operation.

My interpretation of that is that the government will change the terms of reference of that royal commission, if the royal commission should request additional powers to enable them to fulfil their mandate, and that the ministers will co-operate completely with the royal commission in appearing before it as witnesses if they are summoned. I see one of the former solicitors general is nodding his head in assent.

An hon. Member: He is asleep.

Mr. MacGuigan: I have no doubt that will be the policy which will be followed. The government's position is one in which it has given complete information concerning its own activities and all the police activities of which it was aware to parliament, to the people, and to the relevant authorities of the Quebec government.

Sometimes Canadians ask if Watergate could happen here.

An hon. Member: It has happened here.

Mr. Leggatt: At least two or three times.

Mr. MacGuigan: Now we know the answer: Watergate can happen here, but not with the political motivation.

Mr. Gillies: Why not?

An hon. Member: We need a Judge Sirica. That is what we need.

Mr. MacGuigan: We have a Justice McDonald whom I am willing to put up against Judge Sirica or any American judge any day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: We talked about the rule of law. We want the rule of law. We do not want a police state. We do not want a country which is subject to the dictates of the police.

An hon. Member: We do not want your government.

Mr. MacGuigan: We want a government prepared to respect the police but also prepared to clamp down on them if they exceed their mandate. That is exactly what this government is doing. The opposition is attempting to pillory the government because it is honest and is telling the people what it is about.

An hon. Member: Honest?

Mr. Gillies: Do you really think they are honest?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), I feel I should try to get us back on the track. Even with the scholastic and academic standing that he has, he has overlooked what the debate is all about. He has overlooked the fact that the RCMP is the police force. Any police force in this nation is administering the law in a civil way across the country. That is one form of the administration of justice. When people of authority in any type of police force are asked to look into the security of the nation, that falls directly under the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and a special cabinet committee. That is where the hon. member's entire argument falls apart.

If it were just a matter of the administration of justice when dealing with civil and criminal matters, any interference by any government would be entirely wrong.

Mr. MacGuigan: It would have been worse here.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know how naive the government thinks we are to suggest for one moment that the minister or the Prime Minister did not give instructions to the security planning analysis branch, which in turn used the police and got the RCMP into some difficulty. I could blame this government for eroding the image of a great force.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Woolliams: Over the years I have been in the House, I think the record will indicate that I have made many speeches and have asked many questions. I have always defended the RCMP, and I shall continue to do so. Everyone on this side of the House has taken the same position: it is the government which has put the RCMP into the difficulty of eroding their image by mixing the question of security with the ordinary administration of law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: When we consider the rule of law, I do not think it takes a great mind or a dean of a university to indicate that it gives protection to every individual in Canada. We are all equal under the law and we are protected. We are not protected by the Prime Minister, any premier or any minister. Our protection and liberty flow from the rule of law.

When we consider that principle, we must consider also the fact that everyone is equal before the law, no matter what position they hold. If they hold a position in the government as a minister, if they hold a job in the security planning and analysis branch, or if they hold a job in any police force in Canada, they are protected by the law. If they break the law, or they are instructed to break the law, then they must face the same kinds of remedies, procedures, and charges as any other individual in Canada. If that is not a fundamental basis and the foundation of the administration of justice, then there is no foundation.

Is this not a Canadian Watergate? For one hour we have questioned and interrogated the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), and he came out of it very beautifully because he was evasive and refused to answer one question in the House of Commons today. Why did he refuse? He refused because he wanted to have a complete cover-up. What was he covering up? No one could be so naive as to believe that the present Solicitor General or the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), did not have some knowledge in reference to this affair. I am referring to the break-in at the offices of a legal political party in Canada.

When the Solicitor General refused to answer those questions, in a very psychological way he was refusing because he wanted to cover up the sins of the government. For example, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked twice who authorized this break-in. Twice the question was evaded by the Solicitor General. Twice I asked who authorized this break-in, and after the second time I received an answer: it was the director general of security, John Starnes. Why did he not answer deliberately in the first place?

Mr. MacGuigan: He did.

Mr. Woolliams: Why did he not answer when the Leader of the Opposition asked that question? The hon. member opposite is indicating that he did. I have checked the blues. The record will be out tomorrow, and if it is read by the hon. member opposite he will see that the first time the Solicitor General answered that question was after he had been interrogated four or five times on the point. In fact the CBC referred to that in the news tonight.

Mr. MacGuigan: His answer was not understood.

Mr. Woolliams: We have heard a lot about the rule of law. I am concerned about the fact that the office of a political party can be raided and names can be obtained not only of the supporters of the party but of those who made financial contributions. What are we leading up to?

I think we are leading up to getting a list for another War Measures Act. I should like to refer to an article in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, May 12, 1971, which referred to October 16, 1970, when the War Measures Act was implemented.

Mrs. Holt: The Globe and Mail is not a good paper to quote.

Mr. Woolliams: I hope the hon. member will bear with me. Actually I know she will listen because she is always so fair. The article reads as follows:

> The federal government will resort again to the War Measures Act if violence like that of the October crisis in Quebec breaks out and parliament gets bogged down in considering special anti-terrorist laws. This was promised recently by the Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau, on two occasions, one in a letter dated May 7 of that year to premier Robert Bourassa of Quebec, and secondly, in a lengthy interview the same day with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television crew.

When I listened to the debate tonight I was reminded of that long debate on that tragic occasion when the government implemented the War Measures Act. Ministers could have used any other legal means provided under the Criminal Code. They know now it was a mistake.

An hon. Member: You voted for it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if hon. members opposite could control themselves.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Say it, you voted for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer that question right now, and I was coming to it. I will tell you what we said. We said to the government, "You have the facts, we do not, and if those facts are true, then we have to put the security of the nation ahead of anything else". But then we found out that the government lied to us. We knew we had been deceived in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Let me quote now a man who is at present a director of more corporations than I can name, the former minister of justice. I call as my witness, Mr. Turner, minister of justice at that time. That is what he said on October 16, 1970, as reported at page 215 of Hansard of that day:

> It is my hope that some day the full details of the intelligence upon which the government acted can be made public, because until that day comes the people of Canada will not be able fully to appraise the course of action which has been taken by the government.

If you read the newspapers at that time you must have realized that he came close to resigning because he knew the government deceived the Canadian people in implementing the War Measures Act, as it deceived the people today.

They had their lists. How many people were arrested under the War Measures Act? I hold in my hand a copy of Maclean's magazine of that time. The caption on the front page reads, "Get Your Clothes On, Pauline Julien, You're Coming with Us". Four hundred and fifty people were arrested, held without bail for a considerable length of time, and 62 charges were laid, but only two cases were tried, and I do not think they had one conviction. That was the situation. If there was a revolution or subversive activity in the province of Quebec at that time, then surely somebody would have been charged and found guilty and a penalty would have been handed out by the courts. I repeat, we were deceived by the answers given by the Solicitor General, as we were deceived by the former minister of justice on October 16, 1970. The Canadian people will not accept that kind of drivel any longer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: The Liberals have done this before. They have said there were spies afoot in the civil service. They passed an order in council in the middle of the night, and that is the party that stands for civil rights.

People were arrested, held without charges, without bail, with lights on in the cells all night. You would have thought somebody would have stood up for the rule of law.

Let me quote the Hon. C. G. Power, a former Liberal member, who said the following in a speech in the House:

> As for me, brought up in an atmosphere wherein a framed photograph of Magna Carta was on almost every wall, accompanied with a warrant for the execution of Charles I, and steeped through my reading in the traditions of the martyrs of liberty and freedom, I cannot wish to turn back the pages of history 700 years and repeal Magna Carta. I cannot by my silence appear to approve even tacitly what I believe to have been a great mistake on the part of the government. If this is to be the funeral of liberalism I do not desire to be even an honorary pall-bearer at the funeral, and I do not wish by not taking part in this debate to give silent approval to the procedure which has taken place.

That is exactly what is going on. You would have thought that one Liberal in this large government would have stood up and said, "We stand for the rule of law". You would have thought one Liberal would have said what the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) said. As soon as you ask them a question, whom do they blame? They say, "The RCMP did this". Surely when it is a question of security, the Solicitor General, the Prime Minister or the cabinet committee gives instructions to that planning and security group, and in turn they give instructions to the RCMP. They should be the ones who are blamed for the sins and tragedies of this government which does not lead and which does not govern. But they do not stand up for the rule of law or the protection of the civil rights of this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Let us hope that tomorrow this debate will be put on the right track and that when we ask the question, who authorized this raid, the government will give us an answer. I noticed that the former solicitor general was not very well tonight and I am sorry to see that. Whether it is anxiety or something else that has caused this, I do not know, but when we asked him what he talked about, can you believe, the solicitor general, one of the highest officers administering the law in this country, did not know that the office of a political party was raided.

Mr. Forrestall: Nobody mentioned it tonight. It is incredible.

Mr. Woolliams: When we asked them, they said, "We don't know anything about it, the police run the country". I do not accept that. I say that is a lie, and I will go that far. I say the government runs the country, or is supposed to. It gave the instructions, but when it is caught tampering with the civil rights of this country, it blames it on the RCMP. I am convinced that the government planned and plotted for a long time to get rid of the traditional force from western Canada which became the national force, that is, the RCMP. It planned and plotted to do it this way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: Again hon. members opposite are speaking from their seats. Somebody spoke about brains, but I would not be that complimentary at the moment. I say to them that tomorrow we expect answers to our questions, and if we do not get them tomorrow, we will ask them the next day, and we will ask the Prime Minister to measure up to his responsibilities as the chief minister in this country and head of security. I hope he is here tomorrow so that we can hear his answers.

He had knowledge of it for almost a year without telling any of the solicitors general, if you can believe them. Unfortunately, I do not accept the excuses that have been given in this cover-up.

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me say at the outset that I hope to be able to reach a common ground with all members of the House of Commons. I think we all believe that there is one law for all Canadians and that the rule of law must not be different for those in authority and those in ordinary walks of life, and that when the rule of law is broken, no matter by whom and in what position, they should bear the full brunt of the law.

If the law is broken, prosecution should follow the ordinary course. If the evidence is there, it should be brought before a judge and jury. No matter who has broken the law, they must face the consequences of their act.

It should not take more than the first year in Sunday school or the first year in catechism class, let alone the first year in law school, to know that it is wrong to break and enter or to steal.

These are fundamental things, but I become sickened when I hear hon. members opposite, in pious righteousness, continue to condemn the RCMP. They condemn them time after time, speaker after speaker, saying that they have not been doing the right things in this country.

Usually the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) is one of the most sane and sensible members of this House, but tonight he said it is the opposition which is protecting the RCMP. The truth is anything but that. Every hon. member opposite who has spoken has condemned the RCMP and its operations, if not directly then indeed by the innuendo drifting from their mouths in every statement they make. It is shameful.

We on this side of the House have said that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) continually makes innuendoes without having the guts to make any direct allegation against the RCMP. He referred to the Bronfman case a little while ago. In the Bronfman case, the Statistics Canada case, the Hamilton Harbour case, and in the dredging case, the hon. member has taken to himself credit for bringing these things to the public. The Commissioner of the RCMP has said, time and again, that the hon. member has not furthered these cases but that he has impeded them by bringing out six months' premature disclosures while the investigations were under way.

In the Bronfman case I replied to the hon. member as the parliamentary secretary in the way the hon. member indicated, but he came across the floor to me afterwards and showed me documents he had. They were indeed marked "Secret," but the documents stated something which was very ambiguous. They did not indicate that the RCMP was coercing Mr. Bronfman into not laying charges or into not going ahead. What really happened was that Mr. Bronfman took his case to the Federal Court of Canada. He decided to withdraw his case. He felt he did not have enough goods to go on, but this is the kind of allegation the hon. member for Central Nova continually makes. Hit and run, hit and run. He does not come across with any facts because he just does not have any.

The hon. member is not here now. Somebody said his office was bugged. I do not know what might be obtained from his office other than perhaps an allegation he might make against somebody, without any facts to back it up. He has never backed anything up in anything he has done.

One of the investigations the hon. member prompted with his questions in this House involved the Hamilton Harbour matter. The former solicitor general and the solicitor general at the time of this matter were questioned in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The hon. member ran out of questions, as did all the members of the opposition. As a matter of fact the solicitors general exonerated themselves completely and totally with respect to any allegations made at that time. They did so with respect to Statistics Canada, with respect to Mitchell Bronfman, and with respect to all the others. Hon. members opposite who make allegations should have the courage to present facts upon which those allegations are based. It is great to come in with carloads of suspicion, but they come in with not even a wheelbarrow-full of truth, yet they build these things up far out of proportion.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) spoke about the performance of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) today. I was elected in 1972, five years ago yesterday, and today was the first time I have seen a question period in this House in which all the questions from the great minds and intelligence of the opposition were directed to one minister alone. That happened today. The Solicitor General of Canada, a fine young man, was able to answer every question with fairness and candor. Once again the opposition ran out of questions. The hon. member for Calgary North said this evening that the Solicitor General avoided and dodged the questions asked of him, but I say he answered the questions directly and factually.

Let it not be forgotten that the revelations which caused this special debate tonight were not brought forward by the opposition parties. Not one member of the opposition brought forward these facts, which are now known to the Canadian people. Each one of these facts was presented by the Solicitor General or through his offices to the people of Canada. It was he who last Friday disclosed in this House the matters which came to his attention very shortly before that. There was no attempt to hide anything. In the last few days I have heard the question: "Is this a Canadian Watergate?" Watergate was a cover-up.

Mr. Brewin: So is this.

Mr. Poulin: It is anything but a cover-up; it is complete disclosure. I believe that in the last few days and weeks the government has disclosed more about the operations of the national security force than has heretofore been heard in this country. Perhaps it is a good wind that is blowing. It is a good thing that we have more of this kind of thing, but let it not be forgotten that it was this government and this Solicitor General who brought these facts out. These facts were not brought out by any probing, any investigation or any initiative by hon. members opposite.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Come off it!

Mr. Poulin: This should be remembered by hon. members opposite, yet they take advantage of the fact that there are some members of the RCMP who are deeply concerned about the future of their force and about their leadership. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) said that the morale of the RCMP has never been as low as it is now. I think it would be good for the members of the RCMP to know that during this debate tonight their Commissioner has been in this House listening to this debate. He has done so because of a real concern for himself and his force. I do not see him now. Perhaps he has left in the last few minutes.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That was when you started to speak.

Mr. Poulin: The unfair, unnecessary, and unwarranted attacks on the RCMP by hon. members opposite will take a long time for the RCMP to overcome. It is too bad that hon. members opposite do not realize the damage they are doing to one of the most respected police forces in the world. The president of Interpol is a former commissioner of the RCMP. Commissioner Higgitt's police force was recognized as the most efficient, honest, and honourable in the world. It is not we on this side who have been attacking this force and criticizing its operations. It has been members of the opposition, such as the hon. member for Central Nova and others who do not have the guts to come across with the facts they say they have. They really have no facts. They have only a hope and a desire to further their political careers by blackening and damaging one of the finest police forces in this world.

The hon. member for Central Nova has still not come forward with any facts with respect to Statistics Canada, the Mitchell Bronfman case, the dredging charges, or the Hamilton Harbour matter, but he throws irresponsible allegations around this House with careless abandon because he is not answerable.

This government has been answerable in this House for the actions of the RCMP. It is prepared to take it on the chin when the RCMP, through over-exuberance, moves across the line, as it has done in this case. Maybe it has committed an illegal act. I would rather have it that way than have the government in control of each and every operation of the police force in this country, or in the provinces of this country.

If we, as members of parliament, are going to insist that members of cabinet be in day-to-day charge of the operation of police forces, then I think we should take the criticism of those things they do wrong, and I think we should take accolades for those things they do right. If we begin to take charge of their operations this parliament will investigate a police state. I am not prepared to see that happen in this Canada that I love so well.

What is the alternative, Mr. Speaker? It is to have trust, faith and confidence in these officers who have made a career of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of the municipal and provincial police forces of this country. The other alternative, according to the hon. member for Calgary North, the hon. member for Yukon, and the hon. member for Central Nova, would be to have the Solicitor General and other members of the cabinet direct the operations of this police force in criminal investigations, national security, customs and excise, and all such matters. This is not the role of parliament and it is not the role of a minister. A mandate must be given unequivocally, however, to the police department on what they should or should not do to carry out their functions within this country.

I believe that this parliament, especially in the field of criminal law, attempts to pass laws without reference to partisan political stances. I also believe that the police forces of this land should carry out their functions in the same way, and I think they have done so. I think it is unfair for the opposition to harangue the RCMP continually, particularly because they cannot defend themselves. At the present time their favourite target is the security and intelligence division of the RCMP, which is being accused of illegal activities.

The Solicitor General in his speech today, and in answer to questions today, indicated that the actions taken in 1973 in the break-in at the Parti Québécois offices was honestly believed, by those who did it, to be in the national interest. I think we will have to wait, and I am prepared to wait, for a legal process, a judge and jury, to determine whether there is guilt or innocence in the matter. When the Solicitor General cautioned us on Friday not to be too hasty in making judgments in this matter, I believe he was right.

I think it is time that members of the opposition began to conduct themselves with some forebearance, and gathered the facts before making reckless and careless accusations which are doing great harm to a great and highly respected police force in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) that my target is not the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. My target is this government which, through incompetence and worse than incompetence, has brought about the situation which precipitated this debate. The hon. member and others in the backbenches of the Liberal party share that responsibility with those in the frontbenches.

We have had some interesting comments in this debate. I listened to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) with great wonderment as he laid down the criteria, and indisputably so, indicating what was political vetting of certain organizations in the past with respect to their capability to participate in public affairs and their probable danger to the state. Mr. Speaker, if that criteria had existed in 1963, '64 or '65, the man who went on to become the hon. member for Mount Royal and subsequently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country, would never have got into parliament.

I also heard the hon. member for Ottawa-Centre (Mr. Poulin) and the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) labouring the question of Watergate. Obviously they are affected by Watergate and its similarity to the situation which exists here. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre said that the principles of Watergate do not apply to Canada because this government disclosed the facts. It only disclosed the facts and the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) only disclosed his facts because he and members of the government knew that those facts were coming out in the inquiry in Montreal under Commissioner Keable. Knowing that, he cut his losses and made admissions about what is going on.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that as and when the commission in Montreal, and possibly the Laycraft commission in Edmonton, come to the point where they will be disclosing facts, such disclosures will be preceded by a statement in this House by the Solicitor General. It is only because of that, and because of the fact that documents were made known, that public inquiries and/or prosecutions were undertaken in that long, sordid calendar of deception, corruption, and lying which surrounded the skirts of this government for the last five or six years.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville laboured the point about this not being Watergate.

If the government wants to come clean, let it do so. The leader of this party (Mr. Clark), the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), and other members of the party have requested a parliamentary committee. It is before a parliamentary committee that we should bring to judgment those ministers who might, under conditions and facts which are known, be tried for what I suggest are very serious political delinquencies. Let us establish a committee. Let it take from those ministers the powers of Crown privilege which they can exercise in debate and questioning. Let those members of government, from the Prime Minister down, be sworn and heard. Let the former commissioners, other officials attached, and the directors of the intelligence branch be brought before that committee. Let us find out how much was told, what information was given to members of government, from the Prime Minister down, at the pertinent times.

The government should set up such a committee with unrestricted terms of reference so that there is a fair and reasonable opportunity for questioning and challenging the truthfulness of statements made on the other side of this House. Only then can we say the government is coming clean by letting there be an investigation before a proper forum under terms of reference. This is essential if this issue is to be brought out in the open.

It was a pretty sad day for this House, after the Solicitor General had finished almost an hour of questions and answers this afternoon, when there was a spontaneous burst of applause from his colleagues. It was a considerable performance by the minister—subtle, brittle, evading the issues and not answering directly. Not one answer did the Solicitor General give today of facts not previously known. He did not, in one single answer, give us information we had sought. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that parliament was dragged to a very low level by that performance this afternoon. If this House is going to survive, question period must be more than entertainment. At the present time, because of the advent of television in the House, the tendency of the government and ministers to oscillate, to evade issues, to refuse to answer, to give incorrect answers to questions, is fortunately becoming more apparent to the public. The public of Canada is now having a chance to see what we have seen for many years, now—a government without the answers, without the capacity, and without the competence to do the job for which it was elected.

I say to the Solicitor General that it is not enough for him to do what he did this afternoon. There is a principle known to law, particularly to lawyers involved in insurance law, that it is not enough just not to tell lies; there must be no material concealment; there must be full disclosure of the facts. This did not happen today. It rarely happens in this Chamber as far as ministers are concerned. That is a principle which I suggest ministers of the Crown should adopt so that the people might be able to feel greater confidence in those who govern their affairs.

I am a member of the opposition, but I say that the lack of confidence which exists all over the country in the government is a sad story. The government has addressed itself to various measures in an attempt to alleviate economic conditions. To my mind, the one element which is requisite if these measures are to take effect is confidence among the people in their government and in its proposals. Such confidence does not exist today and, until it does, we shall not make progress in overcoming the problems which face us.

Far from criticizing the RCMP, I pay tribute to them. I practised law for many years in a rural, frontier area, where it was not unknown for two-constable detachments to patrol thousands of square miles. They kept the faith, maintained the vigil, and had the support of the public. It was a great force, and I believe it still is. Basically, I believe it is still a sound force and one of the greatest in the world. Unfortunately, the treatment the government has meted out to it is such that, as my hon. friend from the Yukon said, it has lost its morale. There is anxiety.

I do not suggest the government has instigated some of the incidents to which we have been directing our attention, but I remember the play about Becket in which the King said, "Will no one rid me of this man?" And I suggest some of the things which were done by the RCMP or by this intelligence unit were performed in the expectation that they would be pleasing to the government.

Morale in the force will not be restored until the government makes some substantial changes. The fault really lies across the floor. The Prime Minister is alleged to have said in his press conference that police may break the law, sometimes. I challenge that assertion. There are no circumstances in which the police may break the law. The Solicitor General has suggested that if the law is not effective enough to give the police the weapons they need to combat organized crime, subversion, alleged terrorism, apprehended insurrection and so on, we should change the law. Well, if the government has facts upon which it can base this proposition that the law be changed, let us have those facts.

Others, beside myself, have spoken of the government's obsession with secrecy. Out of secrecy come corruption and incompetence—this government's record ever since it embraced secrecy as its watchword.

I shall not keep the House much longer. This has been a good debate. I suggest it will be useful and that it would probably obviate situations of the kind which have arisen so many times in the past if we had a reasonable law with regard to the freedom of information. I shall not pursue the issue, now, but there is no question in my mind but that the government has said "No" on three occasions. My sources tell me that before the last Speech from the Throne the government said no, that it said no again just before the green paper was issued, and that it again said no just before the Speech from the Throne which we have recently finished discussing. Some of the younger cabinet ministers may have been in favour of it but the older members of the cabinet, those who have been there long enough to know what secrets are rattling around like skeletons in the closet, said no because they feared that a freedom of information law would make known things they do not wish to be made known to the public.

Other reasons have been advanced, of course. They have said that judges should not over-rule decisions of ministers. Mr. Speaker, I am told that in one department of the United States government, the Department of Justice, there are 55,000 people who have the right to put the stamp "Confidential" on a document, 18,000 with the right to put "Secret" on a document and 3,000 who have the right to mark documents "Top Secret". I do not know how many people have similar authority in this country, but I suggest that if civil servants are entitled to say a document should be marked confidential, an objective, independent judge should surely be entitled to say that, in his opinion, a certain document is one which should be made available to the public on request.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we would not today be facing the situation which has developed if government, police forces, intelligence units, and senior civil servants knew that the things they did today might be made public tomorrow or the week afterward. Knowledge that what they did one day might be made public the next would encourage those concerned to make sure that their actions would bear the light of public scrutiny. Such a situation does not prevail at the present time.

In my view we cannot tolerate the continuation of the situation we have observed over the last months and years. It is for parliament, acting on behalf of the people of Canada, to lay down the rules and circumstances under which the police force must function. I realize that day-to-day implementation is a matter for the government, but it is a question of the conflict between various public interests. The widest possible public interest of the people of Canada lies in having a government and a police force which are subject to the laws of the land, and this must be maintained as against the narrower public interests of those who use the term "security" in order to engage in activities of the kind of which we have heard. I am afraid that all too often as far as the term "security" is concerned the government equates that word with the preservation of the Liberal party. It means something more than that.

Some method should be designed whereby this House, in the final analysis, has the right to maintain some watch over the public's money. We do not know how much money is spent or where it is spent. A committee of this House should be established under conditions which are susceptible to the security interests so that the public interest will be subject to the scrutiny and challenge by members of this House which it needs. If that is not done, this debate will have been fruitless.

Out of this debate must come some ideas for a settlement of the very difficult problems which have been raised. I know they are difficult. I realize some of the problems of the government. However, power must come back to this House where it belongs. It is not for the opposition to govern, but it is for the opposition to exercise scrutiny over the government which it so far has managed to escape. That scrutiny must be restored if this problem is ever going to be settled in a reasonable way.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, throughout my previous career and my present career, I have worked with the RCMP—it goes back almost a third of a century. I looked up in the gallery tonight, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin). We saw the Commissioner sitting there facing this type of thing. I have known Commissioner Simmonds for more than 15 years. He is a dedicated policeman.

As much as I respect many of you over there, I felt saddened that he had to listen to this kind of talk, cruelty, partisan politics, and the destruction that you have spewed out tonight.

I felt saddened that former Commissioner Nadon—equally dedicated—is left with a stigma you placed on him. I dedicated the biggest work of my life to those officers. I researched back to the era of the Northwest Mounted Police. Their record is flawless.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), whom I admire very much, said that the RCMP was not his target, but rather it is the government. Exactly. But you use the RCMP to try and get the government. You play politics—that is the shame of this place. You are ready to destroy the RCMP to win an election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must invite the hon. member to address herself to the Chair, otherwise it confuses the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Stick to the rules.

Mrs. Holt: The rules have all been made by lawyers. I regret I am just an ordinary citizen, a common person elected to serve common people. I am not sure whether I have displeased you, Mr. Speaker, but you have corrected me properly.

I wonder what would have happened if, during the period when the RCMP were working to end the terror by the Sons of Freedom in the Kootenays, members opposite had been working then as they are now toward an election? Would the police have had to stop what they had to do? At that time, every citizen's car underwent four, six, eight searches for dynamite, within 24 miles. We accepted that because we wanted to be safe. There is no security and freedom if you are dead.

There were bombings and burnings. Dams were blown up, people were killed. This happened in the Kootenays in Canada for years and years. The RCMP ended the terror there. They did a great job. However, if this group opposite had been able to play with their right to investigate, to check and even break the law perhaps, I do not know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: They had to do many, many things in order to stop the bombings. The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) can say oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: I do.

Mrs. Holt: That hon. member can say the safety of people is less important than the police doing their job. Is that what he is saying? I venture to say that if this group had been working toward votes instead of the safety of this nation, we would still see bridges and power dams being blown up. People would be locked into flooded mines because the power system had been bombed and blown out. All of these tragedies still would be happening, if those opposite had their way. Also, organized crime would be invited to work freely in our society. Terrorists and kidnappers would be allowed freedom of operation in this country.

Members opposite talk about the War Measures Act. They are very righteous in retrospect. They say the government acted wrongly because nothing happened. Nothing happened because there was strong action taken in an emergency situation. It is easy to say in retrospect that it did not happen, but it could have happened.

The citizens of this country have a right to be protected by police who have been hired to do the job. Members opposite talk out of both sides of their mouths. They like to say they defend the police, that some of their best friends are policemen, but they tear them apart in this place.

An hon. Member: It was the Liberal government.

Mrs. Holt: The Liberal government has done a good job. It is a good country because of the Liberals.

Mr. Epp: It is not synonymous, and you know it.

Mrs. Holt: My goodness, Mr. Speaker, would they like an aspirin over there or something to help them? The opposition are having a problem with dyspepsia.

The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was concerned about the difference between subversion and dissent. It is very difficult to separate the two. We have reached the stage where we consider that nothing can be subversion. We are so permissive, we will not allow the police to investigate subversion. Watch how soon our freedom will be destroyed! We have a right to expect our police force to look into subversion.

We have had private meetings with the security forces. We have had public meetings where they have said they dare not even touch certain problems which they know are the work of subversives that could wreck our country. But because we inhibit their actions by this very political gerrymandering, we may see our long cherished freedom slowly disappear. I feel it disappearing every time the police become the target in this House.

Mr. Whiteway: It is your government that is under attack.

Mrs. Holt: This is a strange club. Little boys yell, "It's your government". Partisan politics have no place in the freedom and security of this nation.

One member opposite said he did not know how it was possible to break the law when you are a policeman. He is very naive about police work.

How do members opposite think they solve crime? Do they think they play like boy scouts, use the Marquess of Queensberry rules and say, "by your leave, we have found you are ready to kill and murder." Would they do that with Al Capone? No, they go underground and live in the underworld.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) tonight said something very interesting. He was very selective in quoting the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He tried to say it was a cover-up. However, he only read two sentences. The Prime Minister did use the word "gee". That got him very excited. The Leader of the Opposition actually said that when he heard about the surveillance the Prime minister said, "gee, we have got to stop this. We cannot go on exercising surveillance on a democratic party. It is a legal party and it has a right." It was too good a statement for him to distort in this House. I will put it on the record.

The Prime Minister said, in his statement on October 28:

It (referring to the PQ) is a legal party and it has a right to exist and I stated in the House that our policy henceforth was not to have this kind of surveillance. So in the sense that I was informed at the time that this was done I was not informed nor were the Solicitors General so they tell me that in order to exercise this surveillance there was some action which might be described as illegal which will be brought before the courts if the attorney general of the province feels that should be the case. In other words, the precise action which Mr. Fox and I learned about, I believe, at the end of last week about taking tapes from an office I believe—this I do not know about. Of course I knew when they told me that they were looking at the Parti Quebecois. I said don't do that. It's a democratic party.

In this area I may even disagree with my Prime Minister and project what the police might have been thinking. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, separatists are not exactly my idea of people who are building a country. During the period of the War Measures Act invocation and subsequently, separatists were feared in this country. The police were assigned, by us, to do the job of protecting the security, safety, and unity of this country. At that time separatism and René Lévesque did not have the respectability they seem to have today. I am not sure they have all that respectability with me, Mr. Speaker, but the Prime Minister did say that it was at least a democratic party. That is what he said on October 28. We are discussing what happened at a different time.

Mr. Broadbent: Who said it is a democratic party?

Mrs. Holt: The leader of the NDP did not ask that when he put in his little contribution. The Prime Minister went on to say that it was a legal party.

In court, Mr. Speaker, it is said that it is not truth unless it is the whole truth. The oath a person takes in court is to tell the whole truth. I notice that in this House some members selectively tell only half truths to win their point and seemingly to campaign for votes. I hear the Leader of the Opposition burbling, and perhaps the people of Canada will get more sense out of his burbling than they do out of his words. The Prime Minister went on to say:

You can't exercise surveillance on it systematically any more than you can on the Liberal or NDP or Conservative party, or Social Credit.

He then went on to discuss the illegality question. If you know someone is going to blow up a city you may not have time to get a search warrant, or to go into some place and say, "By your leave, I hear you have an atom bomb in your safe and we would like to get it". It does not matter that while the police are getting all the legalities sorted out to please the lawyers, the city might be blown up. Hon. members say we must always be right and legal, and to me that is naiveté. It is expecting the impossible of the police in crisis or energency situations where life and public safety may be in jeopardy.

Whenever possible, Mr. Speaker, they must do their job. The security of the country must come first. The people of this country must be safe and free. As crime grows in this country, I venture to say and dare to predict that we will see terrorism here soon, and the brand of kidnapping occurring almost daily in Italy. The Leader of the Opposition is not very informed, which is why he burbles. I mean the leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not like to interrupt the hon. lady's speech but she makes continual reference to the Leader of the Opposition and I just want to keep the record straight. The member who is doing all the burbling right now is the leader of the New Democratic Party and I hope that in the future she refers to him rather than to the Leader of the Opposition, who has done his bit in this debate and has done it very well.

Mrs. Holt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think the people of Canada should know that when the leader of the NDP heckles he can only burble.

I should like to refer briefly to terrorism. I know a great deal about terrorism, having spent seven years of my life researching terrorism and recently talking to terrorists who are in Israeli prisons. Terrorism is the kind of crime where anything that they do is right, so long as it satisfies their own imagined goals of justified violence. They do not rely on the rule of law. Neither is there rule of law in organized crime. With all the sophisticated methods used by those in organized crime and the hundreds of millions of dollars which international terrorists have at their disposal, how naive to think that our police force should work like boy scouts in dealing with crime. The police would not be able to use the sophisticated devices which are available to the most dangerous of criminals if hon. members opposite had their way. They would have to obey all of the rules, the legal niceties, and play nice games under the Marquess of Queensberry rules, rather than matching their skills, knowledge, wisdom and powers.

They must have some powers to counter organized crime and international terrorists, to protect the people of Canada. I expect the leader of the NDP will burble at that. He likes to use extreme phrases, like "evil act". He sanctimoniously uses religious and spiritual words. He talks about a calculated evil act. Perhaps the police believe it is evil they are fighting when the security of the country is threatened. I think my constituents and constituents across Canada as a whole want their peace, freedom and security, their right to walk the streets in safety.

I am not sure that the opposition has any kind of case, Mr. Speaker. They will keep on questioning because they think they have a Watergate here. None of them has studied Watergate.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight more in sorrow than in anger, disappointed in this institution as such. I must indicate that even at the end of a long day like this which drains one of any passion or emotion, especially on a subject about which we could get very passionate and emotional, I am disappointed in this institution and in what has gone on here today. Like a lot of other members, I came to parliament today expecting explanations and expecting information. I got neither. The people of this country got neither, nor did the members of this House.

This is a terribly important subject, or it should be, to members on both sides, and certainly to the people of Canada. During question period today we were given, by an aggressively evasive single minister—I emphasize single minister, a fact which I deprecate as well—absolutely nothing that was new, even though evidence is piling up outside the House, and perhaps inside as well. This evidence indicates that there have been a whole series of acts which, if they had been committed by non-police groups, would have landed the performers of those acts, those who counselled those acts, those who directed those acts, and perhaps even those who permitted those acts, in jail.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: We have had the strange spectacle of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last Friday merely saying that these actions were "misguided". He left the very clear intimation in my mind that what was done was illegal. I am sure anyone who reads the press conference or who has heard the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) this evening, which was echoed last night on national television and again in this House today by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), will realize if what was done was illegal, then we really have only two alternatives because of the high motives of the people involved. Either we let the law enforcement agencies of this country continue to break the law themselves, in the belief that the national interest is a higher priority and more important than the mere imposition of those standards of legal observance that we have for everyone else, or the law should be changed. We have just heard an intimation of that as well from the previous speaker. In other words, there would be one standard of legal observance and lawful behaviour for those engaged in so-called national security, and a far higher one for ordinary citizens. As far as I am concerned, that is a double standard of behaviour.

[Mrs. Holt.]

The other alternative emanating from the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General is that perhaps the law should be changed to recognize this problem, and instead of merely tolerating the double standard I have indicated, we should recognize it and enshrine it in the law. According to the Prime Minister, these are the only two alternatives. Of course that is just simply not so.

There is another choice, and that is to make sure that the proven, experienced, just, and traditional criminal law of this land and country, and the common law which we follow, are enforced equally against everyone. There should be no exceptions, no interference, no double standards. In law enforcement, in my experienced opinion, there can be no fighting fire with fire. You do not rape to find a rapist. You do not use drugs to find those who are abusing our drug rules and laws. You do not blackmail to catch a blackmailer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: You can speak about terrorism, but you do not bomb to trap a bomber. Certainly you do not burgle to convict a burglar. It does not matter whether it is a major crime or a minor misdemeanour. It does not matter whether the allegation is the bugging of a member of parliament's office or whether it is a question of national security. The law is the law. It is open, known, fair, and impartial. The high and mighty, as well as the low and miserable, are equally bound. If they cannot fairly obey the law, then they cannot fairly enforce the law. This applies to the police, to security groups, and to governments.

Primarily what are we talking about in this debate? We are concerned about the incident in January of 1973 when a flagrantly lawless act occurred that cannot, on any grounds, be justified. What should have happened? The hon. member who preceded me poked fun at it in one way, and attempted to pour scorn on the legal procedures which should have been followed.

If the security officers had any sort of reasonable ground for believing that a crime had been committed, and that evidence of it could be found in a political party's office, then the security officers involved could have easily obtained from a justice of the peace a proper and legal search warrant. I do not care if it was a Parti Québécois office, a Liberal office, a Conservative office, a Social Credit office or an NDP office.

I know a search warrant is just a scrap of paper in the eyes of some of the members. I know that the case in the eyes of some police officers, because I have had experience with them, is that it is merely a token, sometimes antiquated, certainly routine and, in many cases, a bothersome procedure. It is certainly a very irksome procedure to a police group in a hurry, and impatient to get a job done which they have been ordered to complete by their superiors. It may be irksome, but it is necessary because it is the law. The law in some instances may be an ass, but it is not up to a security group or the police to change it, or apply it to others and not themselves.

In this case the police did not follow the law. They broke in during the dead of night, which suggests in itself that they knew they were acting illegally. They put themselves above the law. To indicate that what they stole, copied, and then put back, was not a theft is simply ludicrous for anybody with any legal training and anybody with any responsibility, such as our Prime Minister has, especially in view of his training and in view of his past experience as the minister of justice.

The ameliorating thing in the eyes of some members opposite is the motive, that they were moved by a high ideal of national security. Motive simply does not enter into it. Whether it is dealing with national security or not, should any group be permitted to break the law which it has been sworn to enforce? There is little to suggest in this particular case that national unity was at stake. Should any group of security advisers—and that is what the security and intelligence service is—be permitted to go beyond the limits of the authority given to them, not by this government but by this parliament? This government is duty bound to enforce and to supervise, as trustees of this parliament and of our people as a whole, this security and intelligence service.

Can we afford the superciliousness and the callousness of the head of this government who indicated that if such a group breaks the law then they are not to blame, but somehow in this twisted and warped mental process he intimates that we are to blame because obviously the law should be changed? Obviously the people in charge should be changed, and not the law.

Since 1969 there have been serious problems that have not been resolved. I do not think there is a single member in the House who would stand up in his place tonight, no matter how forgiving he may be and no matter how much a lackey of the government he may be, who would indicate that since 1969 there have not been serious problems, or who would intimate that they were solved. There are serious problems that have not been resolved. In the final result there has to be political control, political supervision, political knowledge, and known limits and restrictions, accountability and responsibility. Since 1969 there has been none.

Who revamped the security services and laid on the control and supervision mechanisms which have failed? It is this government. Who picked the people and put them in charge? It is this government. Who set up the communication, the reporting and liaison procedures? What was done in the name of the government was supposedly controlled by the government, who else? Who now comes, unbelievingly and unbelievably, and suggests a weird mixture of responses ranging from, "We didn't know" to "We didn't want to know" and finally "If they did it, they were right"? No one else but this government.

The Prime Minister intimates that he said, as an hon. member reiterated a few moments ago, "Stop the political surveillance". Let us make no mistake about it, we are not talking about national security surveillance, we are talking about political surveillance. That is what it is, pure and simple. We are not dealing with national security matters. We are dealing with internal, domestic, political matters. When the Prime Minister said "Stop the political surveillance," he indicated, with a gallic shrug, that it is not his job to find out what has been going on. It is his job, however, to stop what has been going on. He indicated that it is not his job to ascertain what was involved in that surveillance, that it is not his job to determine what had been going on. I simply ask, whose job is it if not the Prime Minister's? Of course it has to be his and that of his ministers. They show an infuriating indifference to their own responsibility.

There is simply no excuse for the leader of the Canadian government, in a matter that is as important as this, to be absent from the House of Commons, and it is simply unthinkable that he should not be back here tonight for this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: This is the attitude we have to put up with. This is the attitude on many matters, not just on security matters but on many matters that touch on integrity and on the morality of the government. So long as the right question is not asked by those who should ask it, so long as the correct guideline on conduct is not issued by those who should issue it, and so long as the proper person is not held responsible for what he does or does not do by those who have a duty to hold others responsible to them so that they in turn are responsible to this parliament and to the people, we will continue to wallow in these re-occurring waves of non-accountability and irresponsibility that are becoming the hallmarks of this administration. This country deserves better than what we are getting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in my understanding, the duty of police forces is to prevent offences against the laws of Canada and, I think we can say fairly at the present time, especially acts of terrorism and sabotage. We do not question their responsibility in this field, nor do we question that society must be protected against these critical problems. But the first and most important protection we have is the respect that we must all have for the law itself. How can law and order prevail if the guardians of the law themselves spurn and infringe the clear precepts of the law?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated the following in 1976—I am indebted to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) for the reference which is at page 13389 of Hansard of that year, and also the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) referred to the same quotation:

It is my view and the view of the government that if the party is legal, it should not be under surveillance systematically by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or any other police.

I could not agree more, and I hope that members of parliament agree with this remark. But it now appears that the RCMP broke into the premises of the Parti Québécois in Montreal in January of 1973, and removed computer tapes and certain other financial material which belonged to that organization. This was all authorized, according to the Solicitor General himself, by senior officers of the security services. Later the information was destroyed by the RCMP in the spring of 1975.

I want to say to the members of the government, who have been accusing us of attacking the RCMP, that we have not attacked the RCMP. What we have attacked and what we have criticized, and what is our duty to criticize is clear, open infringement of the law by certain people connected with the RCMP. We are just as concerned with the good reputation of the RCMP as are other members of the House. To pretend that the opposition as a whole is attacking the RCMP when they are only doing their clear and obvious duty of pointing out these serious occurrences is a complete perversion of the facts and an abuse of the debate in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General keeps talking about a dilemma. What dilemma existed in 1973? He has not begun to explain that in any way. The Prime Minister suggested that there might be conditions of emergency when the law has to be temporarily overlooked. What emergency existed in 1973? We have not had a word on either of these two things. The FLQ activities, which were certainly criminal and very much deplored by Canadians generally, were shown, not only in the number of arrests which have been cited in the House but in the number of weapons that were seized after careful search by the army and the police in Montreal, to have been infinitesimally small. But be that as it may, they were not an active force in 1973, and no one can pretend that they were. So then what was the emergency which justified this defence of acts of illegality?

● (0012)

It is indeed of the utmost gravity that senior police and security officers, apparently without seeking or obtaining the advice or consent of their political superiors, authorized the break-in into the premises of a legal political party. In my opinion police, under our system of democracy, must never be above the law. They must be subject to over-all supervision by the political government of the day. Some of us who have looked outside this country know what happens to people who have ignored this salutary rule. Those people have lost their freedom, and we have to be very careful that we do not start on the slippery path that leads precisely to that result.

[Mr. Brewin.]

In this whole affair what I find most disturbing is the casual attitude of the Prime Minister and of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) which they have taken in certain statements they have made. Indeed, they have both used expressions which can be interpreted only as seeking to excuse, to some measure at least, the irresponsibility for this criminal conduct which is perfectly apparent.

The Prime Minister referred to the mood of the time. What was the mood at the time? He has not said a word about that. How could any mood possibly justify such blatant political acts as those which were carried out? The Prime Minister is a distinguished lawyer; how could he possibly overlook the fact that of all the crimes in the Criminal Code the one best known even to our children is breaking and entering? Is he going to say that that is something which should be excused because of some alleged motive or some theoretical need for security measures?

Mr. Broadbent: Exactly what Nixon said.

Mr. Brewin: The leader of my party says that is exactly what Mr. Nixon said. We are seeing a repetition of precisely the same line of thought.

The Solicitor General is one of the law officers of the Crown. He holds a special responsibility for maintaining law and order, but what is his attitude? He quotes the royal commission on security as indicating that there might hypothetically be a conflict between respect for the law and the effective protection of national security. Of course that is a theoretical possibility. The royal commission did not condone or approve of breaking the law, and I challenge the Solicitor General to find anything in its report which indicates for a moment that it did. But in this actual case where was the dilemma? Was a search warrant not obtainable if there was evidence incriminating the Parti Québécois? Of course no such evidence existed, so they relied on totally illegal methods.

The dilemma is a figment of the imagination of the Solicitor General, and as he puts so much of his case on that, it breaks down to absolutely nothing but specious reasoning. Was it an emergency? What was the emergency? We never heard a word to explain what the emergency was. Nervertheless, the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General exculpate those who were responsible for a very serious crime and for gross interference with the rights and property of a lawful political party.

I am not asking the Solicitor General to convict those responsible. That is not his job. I do not think we can convict them without hearing evidence, but neither is it the job of the Solicitor General to bring up phony excuses for those who are responsible for what clearly was an illegal and utterly improper act. I have no doubt that the Solicitor General feels a duty or obligation to support the morale and integrity of the police force under his general surpervision, and for which he answers to this House. I think we would all feel that.

We all want to be able to respect and assist the integrity and morale of the RCMP, but the effect of the Solicitor General's words, rather than his general statements, is to palliate inexcusable conduct in high places. How can he, with such an attitude, typify to Canadians the guardian of law and order? In my opinion he has let us down and the people of Canada down. I think if there is no superior official of the government who will tell him so, his own conscience should dictate to him that the time has come for him to resign.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the rhetoric, the emotionalism and the outbursts which have taken place this evening for some four hours and 15 minutes, following 45 minutes of question period earlier today, my mind goes back to some of the basic elements and, I think, to some of the foundation issues on which a debate like this is based.

My mind is taken back to some of the incidents of terrorism and subversion which have unfortunately become the ever-increasing experience of many countries in recent years. My mind is taken to the question of how to deal with them, for these are relatively new experiences in our history. How do we contain them? How do we put an end to them? No country has any particular or extensive background to go on because the modus operandi of dissidents, radicals and terrorists has tended to shift from day to day. They know no moral bounds. The unthinkable has become the commonplace.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), so well said, for terrorists and subversives there are no Marquess of Queensberry rules. There are no rules of war.

Fifteen years ago when jet travel was becoming popular, who would have given thought to political hijacking? Who would have thought of bombings when planning a vacation? Who would have envisaged political kidnappings and murder? Who would have envisaged disruption and death at a world athletic event such as that which occurred at the Munich Olympics in 1972? I mention these things in passing because, contrary to what the opposition has said tonight, this is a debate concerning a subject which is conditioned by the distemper of our times. This is a debate concerning the efficiency and efficacy of security services. Does anyone in this House seriously question the need for their existence? I think not.

The essence of the debate is, and should be, what mandate is it that our security forces should have? How are they to carry out that mandate? To whom are they responsible and to whom should they report? It seems that after some five hours of debate in this House there is an obvious disagreement on the part of some hon. members opposite.

If we listen to this debate and if we go back to past debates it seems that if any government of the day assumes control, total direction, and intimate responsibility for all of the actions of its surveillance forces, the opposition is heard to scream and shout that that is only a political surveillance and security force.

The suggestion is made that there should be a hands-off approach to allow a measure of independence in the day-to-day security and surveillance reports.

On the other hand, if there is no reporting of all the immediate and intimate details, then the argument is put forward by the opposition that the government has lost control, has abandoned responsibility. The opposition cannot have it both ways at the same time, Mr. Speaker. You cannot suck and whistle at the same time; you cannot sit on the fence all the time; you cannot blow with the wind and shift as it does, from hour to hour. In this House and in this debate you cannot be a mugwump. If I may be so bold at this time of the evening, I seem to see the spectacle of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) playing the role of mug on the one hand, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) playing the role of wump on the other.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Who writes your stuff?

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) disagrees, I do not mind if he changes his mug for their wump at any time.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was just commenting on the writing. If the hon. member is paying for it, he is being taken for a ride.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I always write my own speeches.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is no time to boast.

Mr. Young: I am glad to see I stuck them with that one, Mr. Speaker.

There has been talk in the debate this evening about the rule of law. I do not think anyone would question the general principle of the rule of law—that we are all accountable to the law and no one stands above the law. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said that no one, not even a policeman, has the right to break a law.

Would any one of us question the right of a police officer giving chase to a speeder, to a bank robber, to a murderer, to go over the speed limit in order to apprehend such a person? The hon. member argues that there is one hard and fast rule and that is all.

The hon. member for Nurthumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) is a former attorney general of the province of Ontario. Did he never prosecute a case where one of his police officers acted as an agent provocateur? I doubt it.

Those are examples in simple form, Mr. Speaker, but I think they destroy the simplistic arguments of hon. members opposite.

What is important is that we go further and ask ourselves what happens when the question concerns the essence or existence of the nation? That is a very difficult question. What are the guidelines for an officer when he suspects that an activity may go to the heart of the freedom and democracy under which he and the rest of us live? What happens when the decision is a matter of split-second judgment? How does that officer approach such a situation when the "enemy" knows no moral bounds, no bounds to the activities which he or it undertakes?

It has been suggested that there is never a point when security becomes so paramount that the law is broken. I suggest to hon. members that they check the history of some people who did go beyond the bounds of the law at the time. They need go no further than one of the best selling novels popular at the moment, entitled "A Man Called Intrepid". Were it not for the fact that Intrepid and many of his colleagues in their minds stood somewhat above the law at the time in England, there might not be an England at this moment.

Those are the essential questions, Mr. Speaker, but what constructive suggestions has the opposition put forward this evening? The Leader of the Official Opposition wants to know all the wrongdoings that took place. Seemingly he expects that those who might have broken the law went back to their offices and wrote memos acknowledging their transgressions and filing daily reports on themselves. Nobody would claim that there had never been an immoral law enforcement officer. From time to time cases come to light in forces around the world, but in every one that I know of the offenders have been dealt with severely. They are not a daily occurrence and it takes a great deal of investigation and patience to bring them to light.

The Leader of the Official Opposition seems to expect the Solicitor General to know the actions of every single officer at every moment of every day. I should like to ask the opposition House leader whether the Leader of the Official Opposition knows what actions are taken by every member of his party every day. I think he does not know, and it is a much smaller group than the RCMP.

I will give the opposition House leader a couple of instances. He does not know, and his leader does not seem to know, what the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) is going to say at any given time during any one day. He certainly does not seem to know what the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) is going to say on any given day, or what a lot of his backbenchers are going to say on any given day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member could tell us if he knows what he is doing at any time of day.

Mr. Young: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do.

The opposition has tried to smuggle in the idea of a Watergate and a cover-up. I think it is apparent to anyone who listened to the debate this evening that the revelations made today, last week, in July and in June by the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister, are an illustration of the government's frankness. While the standard of conduct in certain of these questionable incidents may be embarrassing and the revelations discouraging, the government has not shrunk from bringing these matters into the light of day even at the cost of its own discomfort.

I return to the essence of this debate, which is to discuss the mandate of the security and surveillance forces, the lines of responsibility and the question of accountability. I think that, aside from all the rhetoric, we would do well to address our minds to these points rather than wander through some of the scurrilous meanderings of hon. members opposite.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that this is the second time this year when, at 12.30 in the evening, I have risen to speak in a debate of this kind, a debate brought on by an emergency situation in response to a motion by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). We have discovered that something is out of control in our country, but we have not yet determined whether it is the police or the government.

Today, or on Friday, the climate was obviously right for the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to tell us of yet another occasion on which a law enforcement or security agency had broken the law. The latest report concerned an incident which occurred in 1973. It was in that year that a former prime minister, the late Mr. Pearson, said that if our security policy did not take into account the basic rights of an individual, it would operate not to defend but to destroy the liberties which are our first concern. A year later, our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) addressed himself to the same question and he said, referring to the security service, that it was the custodian of a part of the independence which every citizen yields so that the state may act with the necessary authority for the common good.

As reported by the Globe and Mail of October 29, the Prime Minister added to this profound statement on Saturday. He said it was sometimes permissible for the police to break the law technically. All of us here are very much concerned about what was said by the Solicitor General and by the Prime Minister on Friday. We really do not know where the buck stops. The government has a great capacity for passing on responsibility for its actions to anybody in sight. Our economic difficulties are the fault of large corporations and of the unions, or of foreign countries. Our legal problems are the fault of the RCMP.

There is no one in charge.

I asked the Solicitor General on June 21 if, at that time, there were any other indications of illegal acts—if, having searched his files, he had found evidence of other illegal actions by law enforcement agencies. He replied there was no indication of any of the law enforcement agencies having committed any illegal act. He called us muck-rakers; he had us inventing Machiavellian schemes to undermine the integrity of the RCMP.

The climate today is obviously different from that of 1973, because in 1973 there was a Liberal government in trouble in the province of Quebec and a Liberal government in trouble in Ottawa as well. The need was felt to wipe out the "extra-parliamentary opposition". It was for this reason certain of the law enforcement agencies had to keep an eye on terrorists, people engaged in sabotaging our society, and organized criminals. And the organization which was being investigated and which was under suspicion of committing acts of this kind was the National Farmers' Union, along with the Quebec and British Columbia teacher's organizations. The United Appeal, you will recall, was one of the agencies which had to be watched, as well as the Department of National Health and Welfare because of its involvement with Local Initiatives Program grants.

Let us for a moment consider what is meant by the term security forces. Take a look at some of them. We must be specific. Apart from the RCMP law enforcement agency, the federal agency, there is, of course, what we know as the security service which is responsible to the Commissioner of the RCMP but which has a very special task, that of reacting to subversives, terrorists and so on. This is an intelligence agency within the RCMP.

Then there are other law enforcement agencies in this country, and many Canadians do not know this. There is, for instance, the cabinet committee on security and intelligence which gives direction to all the security services in the country. The Prime Minister is chairman of that committee and, incidentally, he is the only person in the House today who has had direct responsibility since 1970 and is still in the same portfolio. We have had three Solicitors General since then and three Attorneys General. The cabinet committee is an advisory committee and, in turn, 16 persons are advising that committee on matters relating to security in this country.

Then there is another security force which is called the security analysis group and which operates under the auspices of the Solicitor General. Perhaps I may quote a former solicitor general, the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), explaining its functions on September 21, 1971. He said the purpose was to study the nature, origin, and causes of subversive and revolutionary action, its objectives and techniques, as well as measures necessary to protect Canadians from internal threats.

Mr. Blackburn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member who is speaking but I should like it to go on record that, during this very important debate, there are only two members in the House on the government side at this hour.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: No ministers!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Though it may not be a point of order, I am glad the hon. member raised it. Furthermore, the task of this particular security force is to compile and analyze information on subversive and revolutionary groups and other activities, to investigate the nature and scope of the internal threat to Canadians, and to plan measures to counteract those threats. The Solicitor General told us repeatedly that this particular group was not an operational group. We know better. As my hon. friend from the Yukon has clearly shown, this group is indeed an operational police force. It recruits and trains agents to provoke actions within unions and on university campuses, to infiltrate right wing and left wing societies, to encourage them to demonstrate on the streets, and to promote acts which are normally illegal.

Now that we have an idea as to the kind of security forces which are operating in this country I ask the question: why is it necessary sometimes, as the Prime Minister says, for these agencies to break the law?

The reason why they so seldom act against one of the legitimate agencies, including political parties, is that they have no clear evidence on which to ask a judge for a warrant to break into a place. If a police officer, or an officer of one of these secret agencies, told a judge that he wanted to break into the offices of the National Farmers' Union to see what they have in their files, without any evidence to substantiate the claim, the judge would tell him where to go.

I want to speak a little about the term subversive. It has never been clearly defined. There is no doubt in anyone's mind as to what the Liberal government understands the term subversive to mean. A subversive is simply someone who does not agree with the government.

Extraparliamentary opposition is a group of individuals who, in a legal and legitimate fashion, demonstrate against the government and make their opinions known about the government's performance. That is a subversive, in the view of the Prime Minister. How else if that were not so? Why would the offices of Praxis Corporation in Toronto be raided? Why else would they break into the offices of the Parti Québécois in Montreal? Why would an officer of the RCMP and other security agents break into the offices of a publishing agency in Montreal known as L'Agence de Presse Libre?

The Solicitor General has ripened with the season since June 21. He now admits there will probably be a revelation of a whole number of these kinds of illegal acts during the session of the McDonald royal commission. Indeed, I can assure the Solicitor General there will be a revelation of a whole series of illegal acts. I have a number to reveal. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) will have a number to reveal. During the debate tonight, a number of my colleagues in the House stated they will have submissions to make to the royal commission, revealing some of the Machiavellian schemes. They were not conceived by the opposition, but by the government and by some of the sick paranoid minds that operate within the security analysis group of the Solicitor General's office.

The Solicitor General was very much concerned tonight that the accused might be tried in the highest court of the land, the House of Commons, without a chance to defend themselves. I, too, am concerned about that. Hon. members will recall the case I made when my friend, Walter Rudnicki, was indeed tried and convicted without a chance to defend himself. A brilliant civil service career was destroyed. His family life was interrupted by this government simply because he was identified as a subversive. He was fired from the public service. There is a long list of people on whose behalf members have spoken in the House of Commons.

The Solicitor General now wants the sun to shine. He wants it all to hang out. He wants it all known. In order to accomplish that, he said that he established a judicial inquiry, a royal commission. We may have lost faith in the RCMP and the security agencies, but we must have respect for the judiciary and the courts.

I want to say tonight that I very much question the government's respect for the judiciary. There is a section of the Federal Court Act, Section 41(2), which gives the cabinet an executive privilege. That privilege is not available to any other Canadian, nor is it available to any minister in any free country in the world.

Under that section, a minister may swear an affidavit stating that certain evidence or certain documents that the courts may require to bring a case to conclusion are injurious for a variety of reasons. Section 14(2) of the Federal Court Act, which the minister often hides behind, reads as follows:

> When a Minister of the Crown certifies to any court by affidavit that the production or discovery of a document or its contents would be injurious to international relations, national defence or security, or to federal-provincial relations, or that it would disclose a confidence of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, discovery and production shall be refused without any examination of the document by the court.

Hon. members will recall on several occasions I asked the Solicitor General whether, in the case of this inquiry, he would forgo Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. Hon. members will also recall the minister has said he is not prepared to do that. Indeed, he has already withheld information, documentation, and evidence from the inquiry officer in the province of Quebec.

We have a government that puts itself above the law. It is a law unto itself. This government does not trust the judiciary. The minister will not show the judge the document that will be required to get to the bottom of this because the judge may be subversive, even though he has been appointed by the Liberal government. They do not even trust their own troops anymore. The buck has to stop somewhere. This government is out of control.

Justice Deschênes in the province of Quebec had some choice words, as the hon. member for Central Nova said earlier today, when this particular section of the Federal Court Act was exercised in the case of the dismissal of a couple of young ladies who were employed by the Olympics committee in the province of Quebec. The remarks of Judge David Mullan on the general tenure of that section are also worth repeating. I quote him:

> Indeed, it is one of the strange contradictions of the Federal Court Act that an act which generally gives the courts greater authority over the executive branch of government, should at the same time show a lack of faith in the integrity of the courts to responsibly adjudicate in all cases on claims of Crown privilege and protect the genuine security interests of the State.

[Mr. Oberle.]

Only the Prime Minister knows what is injurious to cabinet secrecy, federal-provincial relations, national security, foreign relations and a whole variety of things. If President Nixon of the United States had had such a choice little phrase in his federal court act, there is no way anyone would have ever listened to his tapes.

I suggest there is no way anyone will get to the bottom of the matter we are discussing here tonight. As soon as a document or piece of evidence is required by the McDonald commission, one of the ministers will swear an affidavit stating it will break the confidence of the Queen's Privy Council.

I suggest the break-in in 1973 had a reference to the cabinet committee on security and intelligence at that time. I suggest that the EPO break-in in 1971 at the Praxis Institute, and several other break-ins that I will be revealing to the House in short order, had reference to the cabinet committee on security and intelligence. Unless the judge of an inquiry, or unless a committee of this House has power to subpoena—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Wm. Andres (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am not happy to be here tonight to take part in this debate but I feel it my responsibility to do so. At this hour I am usually well tucked under the blankets with my eyes closed, resting well for the next day, as all hon. members should be.

This afternoon and this evening I have heard hon. members opposite challenging the integrity of the security force of the RCMP, the pride of the nation. They charged the RCMP with burglary—

Mr. Kempling: We are charging ministers.

Mr. Andres: They have been charged with stealing and with arson. As the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) said, it is a sad day. It is a sad night for me, Mr. Speaker, to see this kind of attitude taken by the opposition.

What is the purpose? It is to try to discredit someone, and, by trying to discredit someone, they seem to be erecting a halo around themselves. This is what I have witnessed tonight and it is a sorry state of affairs. They then charge the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with being absent from the House today. Each and every one of them knows where he is.

Mr. Crosbie: He should be right here.

Mr. Andres: The Prime Minister is on important business for the state today. Certainly this muckraking by members on the other side of the House is no cause for him to be here, but I could not resist staying here to tell hon. members opposite how I feel.

I have sat in this House for many hours and days and, even though I do not speak often, what I have witnessed tonight makes me almost ashamed to associate in the same House with these members. They still call themselves Canadians, and I am surprised. They have used every opportunity to try to discredit someone. It is about time they took their responsibilities as members of the opposition.

They talk in platitudes and say, "Wait till the next election". Let them just wait for the next election, Mr. Speaker. I was in my riding this past weekend and I know what the people in my riding are thinking and saying. They will not go for this kind of muckraking and for the negative attitude displayed tonight by the opposition.

Mr. Oberle: They certainly will not send you back here.

Mr. Andres: The people of Canada will decide who will be back here. They are the judges and they will judge what hon. members' responsibilities are and how they accept them.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Liberalism is on its way out.

Mr. Andres: The hon. member says that liberalism is on its way out. I cannot accept that kind of statement from that kind of member at this early hour of the morning, because the hon. member has not slept for a while, obviously.

Mr. Friesen: Your members will all be going to the Senate.

Mr. Andres: That is where all good members should be at this time of day, but some members across the way are trying to build up their reputations, not on rocks but on rot. The opposition seem to thrive on rot. They challenge the pride of the nation, as I said earlier.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) on a point of order.

Mr. Blackburn: I appreciate the fact that the hon. member who is now on his feet is very emotionally worked up, but I hope he keeps in mind that certain members of the RCM Police have already admitted to breaking the law, and in fact have been convicted of breaking the law. So when he talks about the pride and joy of the RCM Police, I hope he keeps the real facts in mind.

Mr. Andres: If the hon. member wants to speak I am sure he will be given the opportunity. He can stay here until any hour he wants. I am a little surprised he intervenes in my time while I am on my feet.

Just a few weeks ago I saw 120 members of the RCMP here in Ottawa when Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second opened parliament, and I was proud of them. Now a few weeks later members are demeaning the force and the integrity of the force. That is the point I am making. Hon. members can talk about one or two members of the force, or whatever it may be, but they are including the whole force, and this is a blot on our RCMP.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Andres: The hon. member does not have a point of order.

Mr. Blackburn: Then I rise on a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Brant is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I am not demeaning the entire RCM Police. I simply made the statement that certain members of the RCM Police had admitted to and been convicted of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest the hon. member for Brant does not have a point of order but a point for debate. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) has the floor.

Mr. Andres: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If hon. members opposite want to keep digging up this kind of smut and rot, then I will give them that opportunity. I am sure the people of this country will be the judges, and I will leave it with them. I, for one, stand for law and order.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about your leader?

Mr. Andres: My leader stands for law and order.

Mr. Mazankowski: But whose law and order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) has the floor.

Mr. Andres: Hon. members opposite can shout all they want; I will continue to talk until I am finished. When national security is at stake, I believe the RCMP act in an expedient manner for all Canadians. Yet hon. members are running them down, and I am surprised at them. I will leave it at that, Mr. Speaker. I will let the people of Canada be the judge. I am sure many members on the other side of the House will be looking for a job after the next election.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I know it will come as a considerable surprise to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) that we are fighting tonight for the integrity of the finest police force in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: We are trying to protect them from the machinations and manipulations of a vested interest within the Liberal government to use them for private interests within that government. That police force has been manipulated by this government in order to shore up and create a scaffolding for a doddering, decadent Bourassa government.

• (0102)

The hon. member for Lincoln has had the audacity to say that we are impugning the RCMP.

Mr. Andres: You sure are.

Mr. Friesen: We are examining the government and seeing the scurrilous way we are using the finest police force in the world.

Mrs. Holt: So righteous!

An hon. Member: You are the righteous one.

Mr. Friesen: For generations Canadians have had the right to demand respect from the RCMP across Canada. RCMP officers have been delighted to give them that respect. Because of the secrecy of this government and its refusal to have the books opened, it means that Canadians across Canada look at an RCMP officer and wonder how that person is performing his duties and, more fundamentally, for whom he is performing those duties.

I should like to draw attention to the dilemma faced by every RCMP officer in Canada today. When a directive comes out from someone representing the government—we do not know who it is because the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) will not tell us—indicating that the RCMP should break into an office without warrant, or they are supposed to burn down a barn, every officer has a choice to make. On the one hand, an officer can obey the order and break the law. On the other hand, the officer can quit. Lastly, the officer can disobey that order and be sacked by the government. Those are the choices every RCMP officer has to make in the face of the kind of evidence we are being presented with now.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) would permit a question. He has made an accusation that the RCMP has been manipulated deliberately by the government to perform certain acts. I ask the hon. member to set forth before this House one iota of evidence that that statement is correct. There is nothing on the record whatsoever which the hon. member can offer to support that scandalous statement.

An hon. Member: Try any border in the country.

Mr. Friesen: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) rises to make that kind of a statement because he knows the way the Solicitor General has been behaving in the House. It is difficult to bring all the matters before the House, but I would like to point out the Solicitor General's consistent and deliberate attempts to point to the events of 1973.

Mrs. Holt: Answer the question.

Mr. Friesen: The Solicitor General has attempted to refer to the atmosphere or the air which was in the country at that time, as though it was the Pequiste attitude to overthrow the Government of Canada and as though we were facing an insurrection. He overlooked the fact that we were in a minority government situation here and the government was interested in looking for re-election. He also overlooked the fact that the Bourassa government was facing a credibility crisis. Somehow those facts seem to be left out.

[Mr. Andres.]

My second point is related to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) statements on Friday and Saturday.

Mrs. Holt: You did not answer the question.

Mr. Friesen: I think the hon. member for Lincoln should listen to my comments in particular.

Mr. Andres: Why do you not answer the question?

Mrs. Holt: He cannot answer it.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for Lincoln always tells me that he believes in absolutes, that there are some things which are right and some things which are wrong. On the weekend the Prime Minister indicated that sometimes the police can break the law technically—

An hon. Member: When are you going to bed, Bill?

Mr. Friesen: It seems to me that the Prime Minister is saying that in extreme circumstances the police are justified in breaking the law. In so doing, he has provided people all across Canada with a justification for breaking the law, as long as it is in extreme circumstances.

I think the hon. member for Lincoln will identify with the term "situational ethics", which is exactly what the Prime Minister has been spouting. In certain situations things, which would normally be wrong, are right as long as the situation is right. The hon. member for Lincoln told me that he believes in absolutes. I wonder if he does.

Mr. Andres: When did I tell you that?

Mr. Friesen: One million Canadians are already unemployed and will be facing very extreme economic deprivation this winter. Depending on how extreme their deprivations are, will they be justified in breaking the law to relieve their pressures? Those are questions which each Canadian will ask himself. It seems to me that the Prime Minister has provided for all young people across Canada a whole new code of morality—it all depends on the circumstances.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It is called "situational ethics".

Mr. Andres: Explain, explain!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member would not understand at this hour.

An hon. Member: The circumstances explain it.

Mr. Friesen: If those who are providing the standards of morality for our country hold a standard of morality which is open to question, what are the so-called common people supposed to do? If gold will rust, what will iron do?

I should like to refer to the statement made by the Solicitor General in the House on Friday. I listened to him make that speech. At page 394 of Hansard for October 28, 1977, he is reported as saying the following:

... the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated the positions of the government in the Commons in 1976 when he indicated clearly that a legally constituted political party should not be systematically monitored by the RCMP.

What does that mean? Is it OK to do it once in a while? Is it OK as the occasion demands, just as long as it is not done systematically?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What do you think of that, Andras?

Mr. Andras: That is not correct.

Mr. Friesen: The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) said, "That is not correct". I should like to indicate to him that this can be found on page 394 of Hansard. How often can it be done and still be within the bounds of the law? How often is it OK?

An hon. Member: Never on Sunday.

Mr. Andres: Seven times seventy is OK.

Mr. Friesen: Now it is total forgiveness for the government.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Come on, Bill.

Mr. Friesen: Whom are we protecting?

Mr. Andres: The Canadian public.

Mr. Friesen: Every RCMP officer faces a delemma when he is given an order which he knows is a violation of the law. What should he do? Should he quit? Should he disobey it and be sacked? Should he obey it and break the law?

What should we do with the evaluation of the Prime Minister's new standard of morality? How often can we do things wrong and still be right?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member started off his speech with a clear accusation that the government had deliberately manipulated the RCMP to its own end. I suggest to the hon. member that he should either substantiate that in this House or withdraw that scurrilous remark.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to check the blues and, if I have misrepresented the facts, I will gladly withdraw it. I would like to check the blues before I make any concession on that.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, for some members of this House, who have watched the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on earlier occasions and have had a great deal of respect for him and the manner in which he is trying to perform his duties, his speech tonight was, to say the least, disappointing. Indeed it was amazing. He ignored the facts, the questions, the charges, and wrapped himself in a flag. He warned all members of the House about the dangers of subversion. He tried to cloak the improprieties that have taken place by warning us not to rock the boat, not to give our enemies information which would be harmful to the state.

No member of parliament wants to attack the RCMP. Every member of parliament knows the role which the RCMP has played in this country. We respect the RCMP for the good things which it has done, but some of us expect the RCMP to obey the law, as we expect every citizen to preserve the law. If they break the law, in our opinion they must be criticized and they must be disciplined. That is why we are having this debate tonight and that is what the government obviously does not want to discuss.

While the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was speaking, the Solicitor General interjected several times. He challenged the description of the APLQ or the PQ break-in and challenged the suggestion that these were in fact break-ins. I am not a lawyer, but if it was not breaking and entering, I would like to know what it was.

Let me quote from an article in the Globe and Mail of Saturday, October 29. One of the main stories there is headed, "RCMP Broke Into PQ Office Without Warrant, Fox Says". The article begins:

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police entered a Montreal office of the Parti Québécois without a warrant on January 9, 1973, and removed, copied, and returned PQ membership lists, Solicitor General Francis Fox said yesterday.

If that is not breaking and entering, I wonder what it is. Later the same story reads:

Asked if he felt an illegal act had been committed, Mr. Fox replied that a judge must decide.

Surely nobody in this country has the right to break into premises. Surely people are entitled to the protection of the law from anybody who takes upon themselves the right to break into their premises. Does the Solicitor General believe that any police, including the RCMP, should have the power to enter the premises of organizations or individuals, to take documents or records, whenever they believe it is necessary or useful, without authorization from the appropriate ministers of the Crown, without the authorization of judges?

If the RCMP believe that the Parti Québécois was somehow subversive, why did they not apply for a search warrant? The Solicitor General and the Prime Minister have talked about the climate of the times. This break-in did not occur in 1970. It did not occur at the time of the kidnappings in October of 1970. We were not faced, as the minister at that time, who has now gone to his reward in the Senate, said, with thousands, literally thousands of revolutionaries who were going to destroy this country. We are talking about 1973, and we are talking about a party which every member of this parliament, regardless of party, disagrees with, a party which believes in the separation of the province of Quebec from Canada. But surely that is their right. Surely in a democratic system they have the right to advocate separation of their province. The Prime Minister said as much on Saturday.

He said that he told the RCMP to cease and desist when he found out they were doing it. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), the one-term member, contradicted the Prime Minister when she suggested that she did not mind if the RCMP were to keep tabs on the Parti Québécois. Of course she does not mind, that is typical Liberalism. If you disagree with Liberals, you are a subversive.

Is the Parti Québécois subversive? If it is not, why did the RCMP feel that it had the right to steal the membership list of the PQ? Is it illegal for people in Quebec or anywhere else to make contributions of money to the PQ? If not, why did the RCMP feel that they had the right to steal the lists of contributors of money to the PQ?

My colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), revealed tonight that labour leaders in B.C. were being investigated by the RCMP. Labour leaders in B.C. and in other provinces disagree with the government's anti-inflation program. Is that illegal? Is that subversive?

The hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) referred to the investigation by the security forces of the Indian Association of Alberta. Is it illegal or subversive for the Indian Association of Alberta to feel that the Indians in this country have been mistreated? I find it hard to understand why one arm of the government, the security forces, would be investigating the Indian Association of Alberta, while another arm of the government, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, appoints the president of the Indian Association of Alberta to be their director of its department in charge of the spending of all the money that goes from the federal government to the native people of Alberta, to make him the director of the department for the whole province of Alberta.

The government does not know the difference between dissent which is permissible in a democratic society, and subversion. It is not surprising. Members of the Liberal party have formed the government of this country for 50 of the last 60 years and they think that anybody who disagrees with them is subversive. Some of us believe that democracy means that people who disagree with us have a right to express their views and to believe that the police will not interfere with their rights.

The Solicitor General and other members of the Liberal party who have spoken tonight have tried to create the impression that, as soon as the government found out about the improprieties, the break-ins, the arson, the burning and the stealing of dynamite in which the RCMP was apparently involved, they came to parliament and they told the people of Canada all about it and that they disapproved of it and would stop it. The facts are entirely different. The government did not voluntarily tell the people of Canada that the representatives of the three police forces, the RCMP, the Quebec Provincial Police and the Montreal Police, had broken into the APLQ offices. No, that information came out when an RCMP officer, who was involved in a bombing which had nothing to do with politics, bungled the job, wound up in hospital and, when arrested and tried for the bombing, blurted out that he and other officers had been involved in that break-in. That is when the government decided it had to tell the people of Canada, not until then.

When the representatives of the three police forces were charged and brought to court, and when they pleaded guilty, what did the government say about that? Did the government say to the officer concerned, "You should not have done that, you broke the law, you were involved in an illegal act. We are going to discipline you"? Oh, no, it did not do that at all. It let him keep the promotion which he had received. What did the people of Canada believe? What can they believe? They can only believe that the government approved of what he did. Otherwise hoe could it have permitted him to get a promotion and keep it?

We are told now that the government is giving the public information about RCMP involvement in burning a barn and in the theft of dynamite. I wish that, instead of the nonsense that we heard from the parliamentary secretary, he had addressed himself to the actual cases and he had the guts to defend those actions of the RCMP if he really believed that they were proper or necessary. However, he did not do that. He talked in vague generalities because he did not have the courage to say what he really believed; either that, or he did not know what he was talking about.

Did the government come forward voluntarily to tell the people of Canada about these illegal acts committed by RCMP officers? No, it did not do that. Why are we getting the information now? Because the government knows that the commission appointed by the government of Quebec has the power of subpoena, it has access to the files of the ministry of justice of Quebec and has access to the files of the Quebec Provincial Police. The government knows that many of the illegal actions in which police were involved will undoubtedly become public, as will some of the illegal actions of the police in the province of Alberta which will come out during the Laycraft Inquiry, despite everything the Solicitor General is doing to try to choke that inquiry off.

It is because this information is going to become public that the government has moved to tell the people of Canada about illegal acts. I do not know whether the government ordered them, but its silence until now makes it clear to anybody who wants to look at the records that the government at least condoned those illegal acts.

The minister regretted the fact that opposition members, according to him, were not being constructive. Of course any time one criticizes a Liberal government, the least he is accused of is that he is not being constructive. The most the government will accuse a person of, if it can, is that he is being subversive.

I think that there are several fundamental principles we can recommend to the Solicitor General, if he really wants advice, and it seems to me that they are very simple. First, all Canadians must observe and obey the laws of Canada. I ask the Solicitor General to consider this question sometimes. How can he expect the people of Canada to observe the law and live by the law if the police, who have the responsibility of enforcing the law, are permitted to break the law, as some police officers have done? If the police who break the law are not disciplined and, indeed, rewarded, what happens to the rule of law?

It is not good enough for the Solicitor General to say he will wait for the royal commission to make its findings. The royal commission has the job of finding out how many times this happened, how it happened and why it happened, but the Solicitor General does not have to wait until the royal commission makes its report before he disciplines people in the police force who have broken the law.

If the security services find that the present laws do not give them the power or authority to do their job—this was a suggestion made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to protect the citizens because he thinks the law as it is now written restricts the activities of these security services too closely—surely the proper procedure is not to say that the police have to break the law. Surely this government, which may know or may think that the police do not have the authority they need, should have come to parliament, told parliament that the police do not have the authority they need, and proposed changes in the laws. That is the way a democratic government should operate. Did we get that kind of action from the government? Of course not. When the illegal acts of the police become known we get this stupid belated rewriting of the facts we have had here tonight and in the last few days.

The second concrete suggestion I make to the government is that it rethink its concept of democracy. It should realize that even though the Liberal party has been in power for 50 of the last 60 years, we still live in a democratic society. People have a right to disagree with governments, even Liberal governments.

People have a right to express their views and to publicize their position and to do this freely, without secret investigation by the police and security forces of this country. If the Solicitor General and the government would keep those two basic principles in mind and live by them, we would not have the distasteful task we have had the last few days, and the one we are doing tonight, of criticizing a few members of a police force which has had a wonderful record in this country.

The police have a job to do. Their job is one which the government should outline for them. The basic principles they should follow should be made clear by the government. We have had enough cover-ups by the government and acts which ought not to have taken place. I hope—although I did not get much of the impression that the government really understands how things have gone wrong—that the government will take the time to rethink what has happened, to re-evaluate what has happened and to take steps to change the law, if that is necessary, and to see that the laws of this country and their administration are handled in a way which will bring pride to people in a democratic society rather than the way we have seen revealed in the last few days.

RCMP

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, this is my first late night debate in this hallowed Chamber. When I was a member of the Newfoundland House, there were several night sittings. There is one difference between the Newfoundland House and this Chamber. In the Newfoundland House when we were having an all-night sitting, the minister or ministers involved in our discussions were present in the Chamber, and they stayed in the Chamber every minute the debates were going on. They might have gone out into the hall for a cigarette, but they did not bail out and abandon the Chamber and run off somewhere while the debate was still going on about something for which they were responsible.

Of course the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) may not be responsible for anything, but I am surprised that he is not here in the Chamber tonight at 1.28 a.m. doing speakers the courtesy of listening to them.

Mr. Paproski: Especially on your anniversary.

Mr. Crosbie: Today is one year since I was brought up to the bar.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: It has been an interesting debate for me, and I have listened to most of the speakers. One or two speakers could not possibly have been listened to unless one were screwed down in one's chair, but most speakers were quite interesting. I suppose most hon. gentlemen opposite are intelligent and honourable men. How where you sit in this House dictates what you say is really quite amazing. I suppose that is the way the system works. However, it is a pity and a weakness in the system. How a former law dean for whom I have a great deal of respect, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), and another former law dean, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), can countenance these kinds of shenanigans is beyond me. The remarks of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville were specious nonsense. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) had the gall to challenge the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) because the hon. member said that the government was involved in a cover-up.

Mr. Andras: Manipulating.

Mr. Crosbie: I say that the government was manipulating the RCMP, because I have heard nothing to persuade me otherwise.

Mr. Cafik: Lay a specific charge.

Mr. Crosbie: Just listen to me. I have only 18 minutes left. You will hear a few charges.

I just finished reading a book about the Nixon years in the United States entitled "The Time of Illusion", by Jonathan Schell. I recommend hon. members to get this book because much of the paranoia in evidence in the United States during those years, which is analyzed in this book, is present now in Canada with this government, and hon. gentlemen opposite should start getting wise to themselves.

My position on the whole business of the RCMP and illegal break-ins can be summed up with a quotation from pages 379 and 380 near the end of this book. The author says:

On the other hand, it is not the purpose of these remarks to in any way excuse the political actors of the period—some of whom were also key strategists—from responsibility on the ground that they did what they did in the cause of human survival.

● (0132)

There is a lot of similarity between what this government is saying and the situation described here. This government wants to intimate that it is the question of human survival that causes it to do these things in the name of security.

He continues:

All governments have their burdens to bear and their decisions to make, and if the heaviness of the responsibilities were to be considered justification for repressive action, no country would remain free. A free country does not place responsibilities in one of the scales and the liberties of the people in the other. It holds to the faith that only in an atmosphere of freedom can the responsibilities be squarely met.

It applies directly to this situation when he says:

A free country does not place responsibilities in one of the scales and the liberties of the people in the other.

That is what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is doing. That is what the Solicitor General is doing in the argument he presented to the House. He says this is in the cause of national security.

At this press conference the Prime Minister showed his disdain for the intelligence of the Canadian people and for this House. He shows nothing but ennui, and disdain for members of the House and the people of Canada. When it came out at the press conference that the RCMP security branch had illegally entered premises and taken the membership lists of a democratically formed political party in Quebec, copied them and put them back again—well, Mr. Speaker, that is break and entry. It is theft.

Then we found out they burned down a barn. That is arson. What did the Prime Minister say about that? He started talking about a city. What would you do if somebody was smuggling an atom bomb and you discovered it? Would you break into his place before he set it off? That is the Prime Minister's example. We are supposed to equate that with the RCMP breaking into the offices of the Parti Quebecois and taking the membership lists. What are we supposed to be? What are members of cabinet and of the Liberal caucus supposed to be if they are to listen to that kind of nonsense from the Prime Minister? He is so contemptuous of us that he thinks he can get away with anything.

I have a transcript of the press conference here, but the Prime Minister is not present to defend his actions or the actions of his ministers. He does not want to meet us face to face and argue with us; he just argues with the press. There he has the upper hand because he can say the press conference is over. On page four of the transcript he says:

[Mr. Crosbie.]

I think if in circumstances like that the law has to be broken technically in order to save a city, then I think either it should be broken technically or the law should be changed . . .

I am sure I agree that if somebody had an atom bomb and is about to set it off, I would approve the RCMP rushing in illegally to stop him, and so would everybody else. But, Mr. Speaker, that has nothing to do with breaking into the premises of a political party and the kind of activity that has apparently been going on.

There are three issues here. First is the dissembling of the government, its lack of concern about the administration of justice. The ministers who are responsible for the administration of justice have nothing but contempt for it. As I watched the Solicitor General today I thought the fetish of the fox must be the stonewall. He was not at all concerned about the reputation of the RCMP, the reputation of security agencies, or the reputation of the government. That is shocking, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), who is sworn to uphold the law, is not in his place, and the Prime Minister, the big culprit, is out talking with Premier Lougheed when he should be in this House giving us an explanation. This shows a lack of concern about the administration of justice and a lack of care about the RCMP. Then they have the gall to accuse the opposition of attacking the RCMP. They show a lack of care about parliamentary government and democratic liberties. The Prime Minister was the author of articles in Cité Libre—now it is Cuba Libre. Where is he when we are talking about our democratic liberties in this House?

The second issue, Mr. Speaker, is the effect of being too long in power. This is government by disdain. The Prime Minister's statement reeks of disdain—"You are going to put up with me, Emperor Trudeau, no matter what I say or do." This shows arrogance and cynicism. On television you can see the cynical boredom of it all—the boredom of having to answer these questions, having to deal with these fools of reporters, these incompetent fools in the opposition. He does not mind the fools in his own caucus because he finds them even easier to deal with. He is like the Roman emperor who made his horse a Senator. He does not care who he has in the cabinet, how wooden headed they are, how incompetent, how lazy, how stupid—he does not care about that.

The third issue is the cover-up. This is Trudeaugate, not Watergate. It is a cover-up in this House in interfering with royal commissions. Is nobody shocked when they pick up the newspaper and read a heading "Ottawa Blocks Alberta Probe Into RCMP, Tax Activities" in the Globe and Mail? It refers to the solicitors general and a former minister of revenue firing off affidavits to stop a provincial royal commission from finding out whether the RCMP was involved with certain Winnipeg policemen and what happened in a secret agreement between the RCMP and the Department of National Revenue.

The article alleges that a civil servant admittedly lied. One Edmund Swatzack, a federal tax investigator, lied about the fact that wiretaps were given to the Department of National Revenue when he was first questioned about them. An RCMP inspector, Graham George, overseer of the probe admitted under questioning:

. . . When the RCMP knows they can't wiretap under the tax act, they look for a Criminal Code violation and then the information gathered is used for income tax . . .

This is in Canada where the government is supposed to be responsible to parliament. Our system has gone completely off the rails. We do not have the checks and balances of the United States constitution. We do not have congressional committees—in this House we have eunuchs, not committees. They have no power and can do nothing when there is a majority government.

Not one government backbencher got up tonight and showed concern or alarm about this. Not even one who is a former law dean expressed any disquiet about it.

What is happening about this RCMP inspector and this federal tax investigator who has admitted lying? How is it that a Corporal Williams of the RCMP made a statement in March that on one occasion he had searched rooms under instructions from another constable and then, when testifying before an inquiry in June, he could no longer remember whether he had made a sweep? Is the royal commission to be allowed to get to the bottom of this, or is the stonewalling going to extend to that as well? What can anyone reading this newspaper think of our system of justice, Mr. Speaker? Why should we assume that anyone is going to observe the law if he can get away with not observing it?

These things are scandalous. Twenty years ago each incident would have made the headlines, but today nobody seems to care. The one who cares least is the Solicitor General who had the gall to stonewall all day and give these false arguments tonight, but no information.

The Prime Minister does not care. He only has disdain for the House and for us. What are they doing about John C. Doyle, one of the contributors to the Liberal party, who owes $3.5 million in income tax for 20 years and still does not pay. One case was heard last week when the judges threw out a spurious appeal, but there is another case to go. For 20 years income tax and interest have not been collected from John C. Doyle, a fugitive from justice whom the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) in his latest book shows was heavily involved in certain peculiar events surrounding this House in 1963 and 1965. That is the kind of justice we have in Canada.

If you are on medium income or are poor, they put the old justice right to you, but if you are in the security forces, or if you are John C. Doyle, you are treated with kid gloves. If the people of Canada do not want to correct that, I suppose we can only shrug our shoulders and say we all have to get along.

The next thing is, they will be bugging us. They have already bugged the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). Lo and behold, they are bugging poor old Central Nova.

● (0142)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I say they are bugging. I cannot say it is the government bugging him. I don't know who else is being bugged. I am afraid I haven't been bugged, but I hope they find a bug when I ask them to look for one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the Globe and Mail of October 29 we read: "Fox Reveals Break-in." The fearful Fox, or fretful Fox, only revealed that break-in when he knew it would be revealed in any event. Asked if the mounties had broken into the headquarters of other political parties, such as the New Democratic Party, Mr. Fox said, and I quote: "We have made inquiries about headquarters of other parties and the answer is no. That is, to the best of our knowledge."

He is pretty careful. He cannot even guarantee that the RCMP had not broken into the headquarters of the New Democratic Party much less the Progressive Conservative headquarters, or the United News in Agony from Unemployment Headquarters, or whatever headquarters they are going to break into next. No the Solicitor General cannot guarantee that the RCMP have not broken into the New Democratic Party headquarters. That is what that statement in quotation marks tells me. "Not to the best of our knowledge". He should have said, "No, they've never broken into the New Democratic Party headquarters, and they never will break into the headquarters of the New Democratic Party as long as I am Solicitor General. I will protect the right of the New Democratic Party members to be wrong." But he did not say that.

Mr. Speaker, is it not peculiar that these events all happened in the province of Quebec? Is it because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is just mesmerized by the province of Quebec? Anything goes in Quebec. It is like a foreign country. In the United States they can do anything outside the U.S., but they are not supposed to operate in the U.S. In Canada they can do anything they like in Quebec because the Prime Minister is obsessed with the Parti Quebecois. He is afraid he cannot meet them on their own terms. He says they can separate and there won't be violence used to stop them. He says there won't be force if they can persuade a majority to support them. The Prime Minister has conceded that, but then he turns around and apparently permits every kind of action to be taken to thwart them behind the scenes. It is because he is absolutely mesmerized by Quebec that all he can see is the problem in Quebec. He is afraid he cannot deal with it in a normal democratic way or on the hustings. That is why the Prime Minister is using all these other tactics. All those incidents we know most about—the arson, the break and enter, the theft, have all taken place in Quebec. There was one in Toronto, but most of them have occurred in Quebec because of this preoccupation of the Prime Minister.

I do not care what happens. If this House and if the government and the people agree that the Parti Québécois are free to organize in the proper manner and to use reason—not to use force—to try to persuade their people to separate, then illegal means should not be used to try to prevent this. The Solicitor General himself in his speech last Friday was discussing what the security force can do. I refer to page four of his speech. He said that they can ascertain and assess the nature of the separatist threat in Canada with a view to identifying individual groups and organizations whose real or apparent purpose was to subvert or destroy by force, by violence or by threats of force or violence, Canada as a united country. No one has brought forward any evidence that the Parti Québécois has, as an objective or purpose, the destruction of Canada as a united country by force or by violence or by threats of force or violence. That is just not the case.

There is no excuse. These are directives given to the RCMP. They are the same as those given on March 27, 1975 for the same purpose when describing what the security service can do. It had to be clear to the security branch and the RCMP that they cannot and there is no justification for them breaking the law in connection with the Parti Québécois.

At least President Nixon taped himself, not just the opposition. One can only hope that there will be a few tapes in the future from which we might be able to get the truth, tapes of the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister not just tapes of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and a few others.

As far as the RCMP is concerned, everyone has been careful to say that they are not attacking the RCMP. Well, nor am I, Mr. Speaker. The RCMP is a fine police force, but I look at all police forces with a healthy scepticism and I am not afraid to say it. I have no fetish about the RCMP, and if members of the RCMP are going about Canada committing illegal acts in the manner we have evidence they have done in three or four instances, then I say the RCMP have to be brought to heel. They have to be brought to heel, and their political masters who encouraged them, or who are hiding them, or who directed them or who condoned those acts, have to be brought to heel also.

I believe this has been a valuable debate but it will be all to no purpose unless it helps change the government at the next election or unless some of the members opposite, when they go to caucus, do something to bring this lot to heel. If they are not prepared to do it here in the House then it must be done in caucus. Something has got to be done to shake them up. They are the only ones who can do it since everyone here knows that the government can do what it likes so long as it has a majority here. It is only some of its own members in caucus who can put a stop to it.

I suppose some may think that what we are doing here is a waste of time, Mr. Speaker. We are just putting our case on the record. But I am sure that there must be many members on the government side who must be just as dissatisfied with the kind of leadership they are getting and the kind of incidents that are going on. It has not yet reached the point reached in the Nixon affair, but that started out by people breaking the law in small ways, realizing that they had enemies and looking into tax files and all the rest. Look where it finally got them, Mr. Speaker. The same thing can happen with this government. The more it gets away with the worse it will get.

It is time the government came to its senses and gave us the whole story. Otherwise it is time for Liberal members to do something about it in caucus or for the people of Canada to terminate the regime of the members opposite. It is tired, disdainful, arrogant, worn out, and uncaring.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, the debate which has been going on all evening has now lasted well into the morning hours, it now being about 11 minutes to two. However, I think it has been a very worth-while debate and I hope that the members of the press will draw to the attention of the people of this country the seriousness of what we are discussing tonight.

For a number of years I was a schoolteacher. For several years in the riding I represent the incidence of breaking and entering on the part of teenagers has been on the increase. A lot of people in the community are becoming very concerned about this serious criminal activity. Yet the matter we are now considering involves, among other things, the conviction of three members of the RCMP, I believe, on charges of breaking and entering. In this case, though, for some reason or other, they were given a discharge or a conditional discharge—I do not know what the exact term is. Even though they were convicted, they were exonerated under the law. How do we address ourselves to the young people of this country when, on one hand, three law enforcement officers, presumably instructed by officials senior to them to break the law, are exonerated, when a 14 or 17 year old who breaks and enters a public or private residence is given two days, two weeks, two months, or whatever the sentence may be?

I am starting out on a very personal note this evening because I think we have to talk in terms of people. We have to talk in terms of how the law is applied to individuals. It is not so much how we philosophize on general principles and how those laws are applied to the people as a whole.

When I go home tomorrow, I may find a young man or young woman coming into my office and saying, "Why were those three RCMP officers given virtually carte blanche to break the law? When I stole a bicycle on November 12, 1975, I got a criminal record. I had to pay a fine or go to jail for a certain length of time." I will find that very difficult.

What we are talking about tonight goes beyond the individual, although I have the utmost respect for, and indeed our democratic system in this country must depend on, individual freedom and liberty. What we are talking about is essentially a conflict between how we define a security system under the law and how we protect people from that system.

I am quite convinced, although some of my colleagues might not agree with me on this point, that unfortunately we are living in an age where violence, terrorism, hijacking, spiriting people away and hiding them for 60, 80 or 90 days, and kidnapping, are commonplace. We do not know exactly how to cope with the situation.

I submit that we need to have a security system in a democracy, but where does the responsibility lie in this kind of arrangement? I charge the government with not really knowing where the responsibility lies. We have the RCMP and certain other security organizations within the government and the office of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). However, members on both sides of this House, and I presume I speak on behalf of the people of Canada, do not know where the responsibility lies.

You can talk about MI-5, the Security Intelligence Service, the Deuxième Bureau, all the security agencies in England, France, Italy, Germany and so on. We also have to address ourselves to the reality that we live in a world where there is espionage, terrorism, and covert activity. This country so far has been reasonably blessed with very few outbreaks of terrorism, hijackings, skyjackings and so on.

Where do we, as legislators in a democracy, draw the line? It is my opinion that the government by default tries to pass the blame whenever something happens such as the PQ office break-in in Montreal. Whenever the RCMP security and intelligence branch breaks into an office and somebody feeds the information to the press or a member of parliament, the government backtracks and says it is not its responsibility. Ministers say they knew nothing about it until it came to their attention last night, or somebody telephoned at eleven o'clock that morning.

The government puts the blame on the security system within the RCMP. However, if, and I say this hypothetically, some subversive element in this country were to be caught in the act, I am quite sure that those people opposite who are condemning the RCMP would take the credit for stopping that illegal activity. This puts the RCMP in a very embarrassing position.

I think we have the best police forces in the world at all levels of law enforcement in this country. Some may disagree. When talking about the township, county, regional, provincial or federal level, you find that in spite of our criminal justices system, which is lacking terribly in the due process, we have outstanding members in our police forces. That is why I find it difficult to condemn the RCMP out of hand. That is not what I am doing. That is why I stood up earlier on a point of order. I was not criticizing the RCMP per se. I was simply pointing out that three officers had in fact admitted to a criminal offence and had been convicted of that offence.

It is not easy today in our society to maintain law and order. We are the civil authority in this country as far as the Criminal Code is concerned. That goes for both sides of this House. I often have the impression that for some reason or other members opposite, specifically those on the Treasury Benches, members of the cabinet, have the idea that they are the only lawmakers in this country.

We are the lawmakers of this country. We have the right to stand up and speak our mind. That is exactly what I am doing tonight. However, how far does it go? For example, I see the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) sitting opposite at this late hour. As a cabinet minister, I congratulate him for being here at this late hour, and I say that in all honesty and integrity. But not too long ago the minister was minister of "unemployment", I think it was in those days, and of manpower, and we did have a problem.

● (0202)

Mr. Andras: Don't tell me we are going to hear all about Tran Van Quang.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, we are going to hear about Dang Van Quang again. I understand he has changed his name, is alive and well, and living somewhere in Montreal.

I will deal briefly with this because it relates to the RCM Police. At that time the minister was responsible, not for the RCM Police but for the Department of Manpower and Immigration. As a member of the House of Commons I could get no official information about what the RCM Police had done with respect to this former South Vietnamese general who was obviously implicated in the narcotics industry of Southeast Asia.

I am not blaming the minister specifically for this. I do not know whether he himself could find out; I have an idea he could not. I have an idea that the RCM Police did not have that information. If they had, they may not have given it to him anyway. This leads me to the argument I am making now, that the RCM Police will give certain ministers of the Crown certain information that the RCM Police think they should have.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, who runs the country? Is it those of us who are democratically elected, or those of us who are members on the government side, or more specifically those of us who are members of cabinet? We on this side, and I dare say the press, do not know whether or not cabinet ministers can dial a certain number at the RCM Police and say, "I want the facts and I want them fast. I want all the facts".

If we on this side of the House do not know this, Mr. Speaker, then how in heaven's name do the backbenchers of the Liberal party know, and how do the public of Canada know, what in hell is going on in this country, whether something is subversive, whether something is above board, whether something is level or not level, whether a mistake has been made—in the case in point, the mistake being the former general from South Vietnam—whether it was simply a mistake that he came into the country or whether he came in by design, whether in fact certain people were paid to allow him to come in, whether certain members of the immigration department have since been removed from their positions? We do not know this.

The minister may stand up and say that this is innuendo. I agree, it is innuendo.

Mr. Andras: That is what it is.

Mr. Blackburn: Fine. But can he assure me he is absolutely correct, and that the one mistake made was in allowing Tran Van Quang into this country?

Mr. Andras: One very bad one was made; he was allowed in.

Mr. Blackburn: The minister has never told me who the person was who allowed that mistake to occur. He has never told me in the past three or three and a half years if he knew who made that mistake and whether any action was taken against that person. It is very easy for the minister to say that an error was made, but he has not given me any written evidence to the effect that a thorough investigation was made. There is nothing in print, either in Hansard or in the committee reports, indicating that a thorough investigation was made.

I still have great respect for this Chamber, Mr. Speaker. I think I speak for members on both sides of the House when I say that if we are to continue to have the same respect for the Chamber, then as the representatives of the people of Canada, from one coast to another and from the United States boundary to the northland, we will have to establish a much stronger and more effective committee system where we can, as committee members, subpoena witnesses, whether the government likes it or not. Somehow we have to maintain the great tradition of parliamentary democracy and at the same time adopt in part the congressional system under which committees have the right to subpoena witnesses and bring them before committees so they can be interrogated and asked questions.

If we are ever to resolve the questions surrounding the break-ins by the RCM Police—and the break-in at the premises of a duly constituted political party in Quebec is, in my opinion, even worse than Watergate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Rod Blaker (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Friesen: We will applaud you since you have no one over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blaker: That is the best news I have had today, Mr. Speaker. I am getting a little tired at this hour of the morning, so I hope my contribution will meet the hon. member's standards.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have had a long day, have we not?

Mr. Blaker: It has been a long day, as the hon. member indicates. Some of us started in the early hours on a television program with the same debate this morning, and we are still at it late this evening.

I had hoped to acquire some insight into the subject matter of the national security service and the dilemma, as it has been properly called today, between, on the one hand, the need for security provisions and for an effective counterforce to deal with such matters as terrorism, and, on the other hand, the individual liberties of the citizen. I expected some attention to be paid to the matter of ministerial responsibility.

Part of my problem this evening is that I have jotted down a list of what looks to me to be about 20 items which might incur the wrath of the opposition parties in their view that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) or previous solicitors general, or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the cabinet, or any one or combination of those, could be held responsible for the break-in or for any other acts, whether legal or not.

The impression I have from the various arguments put forward by the opposition parties is that it does not seem to make too much difference whether or not an act committed by one or more members of the national security force or RCMP was committed at any particular time. It seemed to me that some of the comments indicated that responsibility went back as far as 1867. I could not understand whether or not it was sufficient that a member of the RCMP was accused, or whether it was necessary that he be found guilty of a criminal act, before we could conclude that there was any ministerial responsibility involved.

I was not too clear whether or not all members of the opposition, particularly the Conservative members, were of the opinion that knowledge of every specific operation undertaken by the security forces of Canada was required on the part of the Solicitor General, or whether, as others in the opposition seemed to indicate, the political forces of this country, specifically the Solicitor General, the cabinet and the Prime Minister, were altogether too aware of the activities carried out by the national police force and the security service. Therefore, I have not got very far in my understanding of what the contribution of the opposition parties is in regard to a better relationship between the elected government and the police force of this country.

I learned a little bit about some of the thinking of the various members of parliament. I am a bit disappointed that the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) found it desirable to walk into the House of Commons at three o'clock after the question period this afternoon and indicate that he had found an electronic bug in a chair in his office. Obviously I accept that as the truth, but I found it rather disappointing that he immediately went before the television cameras and suggested that this constituted evidence of an illegal act by the RCMP or by the police and security analysis planning branch.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He did not say that.

Mr. Paproski: He did not say that.

Mr. Blaker: I am prepared to be interrupted and I am prepared to be corrected. I was watching the eleven o'clock television news in the lobby, and when the hon. member for Central Nova was asked who he thought was responsible for the placing of an electronic bug, he said that he did not like to make accusations but it was his guess that it would be the RCMP or Colonel Robin Bourne. Those were his words, to the best of my recollection. If it becomes an issue, I will rely on my memory. I would be prepared to have a transcript of that television news program verified.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Which channel was it on?

Mr. Blaker: I am sorry I have to indicate to the Official Opposition House leader that I did not notice what particular channel the television was on. I am reasonably sure of that. In good faith, I would certainly pay attention to a demand on the part of the hon. member for Central Nova for a withdrawal of those remarks, if I am wrong. I do not think I am wrong. In any event, that does not please me. It has been brought up on the floor of the House this evening. Members of the force are not able to appear in the House to answer the charges which have been made. It is distressing that a particular member would see fit to make an accusation when he is unable to give any particular reason for believing they would be responsible. It could have been me just as well, or it might have been another member of this House.

Mr. Orlikow: A gremlin did it.

Mr. Blaker: The hon. member opposite said that a gremlin did it. The last time it was brought to the attention of the House it was done by the news media in the presence of CTV, if I recall correctly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They did it to us.

Mr. Blaker: Yes, it was done to the New Democratic Party. If I were in the position of finding such a situation, I would not rush directly to an accusation of the RCMP. I would say that at least there is a possibility that it may be someone else. I am a little hesitant. I wonder whether we have contributed to an understanding of this problem of security across Canada when we just drop those accusations without any proof.

Another problem which I ran across during the course of the evening was that a number of members indicated that previous solicitors general, one of whom is now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and the other of whom is now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), in fact knew that certain legal acts had taken place by the RCMP, either during the tenure of their offices as solicitors general or subsequently thereto.

My understanding is that the Minister of Supply and Services and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have clearly and absolutely denied any knowledge on their part with respect to the references to break-ins and the various illegal acts which have been attributed to the RCMP, and either proven in the case of the APLQ incident or other cases which have not been proven. It seems to me that comes very close to one of the traditional rules of the House of Commons, that we do not accuse people of lying unless there is very serious reason to believe that it is so. If there is an accusation by a member to the effect that a Minister is lying, normally it is brought before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. In the calm of the early hours of the morning, I hope members, who left the impression unwittingly that the ministers are lying, would give some consideration overnight to that proposition.

RCMP

I understand the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has raised already a matter of privilege, wherein the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) indicated that the RCMP has been deliberately manipulated by certain elements of the Liberal party. I hope I am not too inaccurate in my reference.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I think you are, on that one.

Mr. Andras: A vested interest within the government.

Mr. Blaker: I have just been corrected, and I understand that it is vested interests of the Liberal party, of deliberately manipulating the RCMP. It is the privilege of the hon. member to bring up such an accusation, but it is also a privilege of the hon. members on this side to invite the gentleman to go before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or to withdraw his remarks.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Blaker: Not only is it an accusation against government ministers, it is also an accusation against the national police force of this country. It is a serious accusation if the public is permitted to go on believing, whoever the vested interests of the party are, that they can in fact manipulate the national police force.

An hon. Member: They certainly can.

Mr. Blaker: There is another accusation regarding a cover-up. In July the Solicitor General announced to the House that he had been misinformed, if I am correct in my wording, to this effect, whereas in the previous month he had been told that the APLQ incident was an isolated incident, that he had been informed subsequently by the RCMP that there were further allegations and it was not an isolated incident. In the view of the RCMP, he indicated that it would be desirable to have a commission of inquiry, whereupon the Solicitor General moved to institute a commission of inquiry led by Mr. Justice McDonald. He turned over certain documentation to Mr. Justice McDonald, which included the references which were made in the House today and Friday relating to what is now referred to as the barn burning incident and the theft of dynamite.

An hon. Member: Who burned the barn?

Mr. Blaker: I fail to see the comprehension of a cover-up when several months ago the Solicitor General, at the behest of the RCMP, created a commission of inquiry to investigate those charges. An hon. member opposite asks: who burned the barn? That brings us back to another kind of accusation. Members of the RCMP are being accused on the floor of the House of being guilty of barn burning and the theft of dynamite. I am sure the Official Opposition House leader will agree with what I am saying. We ought not leave before the public an understanding that there is right now guilt on the part of certain officers of the RCMP.

Mr. Orlikow: Is it not true?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it not true?

Mr. Blaker: The people in our society who determine whether those allegations are true are the courts and the judges. It is not up to members of parliament to assess whether or not members of the RCMP are guilty of a criminal act. You have to hear the other person's side of the story before you find him guilty. Members of the RCMP are not being given the basic courtesy of presenting their side of the story. At the time that these acts took place, there was not strict law prohibiting the use of electronic surveillance and many other actions of the RCMP. In 1975 a law was enacted, and that is still in existence now. In order to determine the guilt of an officer of the RCMP, you have to establish, as you do in other courts, that under the Criminal Code there is mens rea—a guilty mind. It is very open to question whether or not officers of the RCMP had the necessary degree of mens rea in order to qualify for an accusation of criminal offence. That will come up again and again. This not the first time that members of parliament are going to hear that.

Mr. Peters: You mean they do not know the difference between right and wrong?

Mr. Blaker: That was nothing to do with the question of mens rea before a criminal charge.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the APLQ break in.

Mr. Blaker: I am doing precisely that when I say that the proper way of handling such accusations is to have them heard before a judge in a court. That was done in the case of the APLQ. What is not done in the present case is to give members of the force the same opportunity to prove their innocence. Members of the House are left with the impression that members of the force are guilty of criminal offences for which they have not been tried and obviously not convicted. It goes a bit far when we stand here, with all our references to the rule of law and our approval of the RCMP, and take it upon ourselves to run individual men and women down without having heard proof of their guilt.

An hon. Member: We do not have their names.

Mr. Blaker: All the more reason not to make accusations of such a general nature because it smears hundreds of people in the RCMP rather than specific individuals.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who has been busy commenting with me—and incidentally I am enjoying the debate—is responsible for another remarkable criticism or accusation. He says the only reason these facts are coming out now is that the government, specifically the Solicitor General, is afraid that these facts will come out before the Keable Commission in Montreal set up by the PQ in Quebec. I thought it was perfectly clear to all members that it is the Solicitor General of Canada and the RCMP who forwarded documents to the government of Quebec which in turn gave documents to the Keable Commission, and which is the entire origin of all the details which are now available to the public.

Mr. Orlikow: How many documents have they classified as secret?

Mr. Blaker: I will answer that, but we should stay on one argument at a time.

How does the hon. member for Winnipeg North justify the accusation against the Solicitor General that he is afraid he must dribble forth this information at this time because of what the commission might say, when in fact it is the Solicitor General himself who, on September 19, better than a month ago, wrote to the minister of justice of Quebec and provided him with all that information? I think that if the arguments of partisan politics are to be accepted, a lot of leeway is left for members to argue as they see fit. Many interpretations can be put, but a direct contradiction with fact is more than we can afford, especially on this issue. If we are careless about facts, then the people of Canada will misunderstand our basic concerns.

We have in this country individuals and groups who will not accept the rule of the law and who are prepared to use methods to gain their ends that are extremely dangerous to the rest of society. Against that we have the rights of individuals, rights and liberties. The dilemma which was referred to in the House today is how to balance the one against the other. Instead of having a debate on the dilemma between the rights of society and the rights of individuals, about the function of a police force and the function of a security service, what we have are accusations against individual ministers, politicians, the cabinet, and the Prime Minister, which are obviously intended to score partisan points.

I warn hon. members opposite who have been on the worst end of it that, in the long run, obviously it will lessen the effectiveness of the national security force if it is possible to come on the floor of the House and make accusations which are unfounded, to accuse members of the force when no guilt has yet been proven, and generally to smear the activities of the force of which, at the same time, members themselves unanimously approve.

The hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) put forward arguments which I had some difficulty in following. I had the impression that he was suggesting that the Prime Minister had actually encouraged the RCMP to investigate the PQ.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

Mr. Blaker: That is an interesting statement.

Mr. Crosbie: That is what I suspect.

Mr. Blaker: Then I am not misquoting the hon. member; that is what he suspects. The Prime Minister went before a press conference on Friday and said that he learned of the investigation of the PQ which was in 1974 or 1975, he had forgotten precisely which. The hon. member for St. John's West suspects the Prime Minister was responsible for ordering that investigation. I think we are agreed on the terminology, that he suspects the Prime Minister actively encouraged the RCMP to carry out that investigation. That is totally and flatly in contradiction of what the Prime Minister said. I hope the hon. member will take his responsibilities—since he is accusing the Prime Minister of being a liar and there is a time in our House of Commons when any member can stand on his feet and make such an accusation—and will give some thought to standing up and saying so publicly tomorrow at three o'clock, and take the consequences that go with it. This is a fairly serious business.

Now I turn with considerable respect to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). What concerns me, and I hope to hear some views about that, is the subject of ministerial responsibility and parliamentary responsibility for the national police force of Canada and for national security. The hon. member for Peace River came very close to making the suggestion that what we need is a committee of parliamentarians who would oversee the national security service. I am puzzled about that. I have heard up and down the halls of the House of Commons members indicating that under the British system there is a committee of members of parliament who oversee national security service in Britain. That is MI-5 and MI-6. That is not true. There is no committee of members in Britain which oversees the national security service of Britain.

An hon. Member: The SIS.

Mr. Blaker: The SIS is one of the functions of the MI-5 and MI-6. Not only is there no committee of parliamentarians in Britain which oversees the activities of the security service, what is more, unlike Canada, there is interference in the right of editors to print what they see fit to print. In the British House of Commons the attorney general does not respond to questions related to the security service. It is unheard of in their tradition to have a debate of the nature we are having in the House of Commons today. It is completely out of the question, out of bounds, not done. To go further than that, in Britain, under a specific order of the government a D notice can be issued which prevents an editor from printing certain facts related to a particular issue of national security that is under consideration. We do not have any such control here.

I find that the issue of ministerial responsibility as it seems to be seen by the opposition puzzles me. If the opposition really and truly believe that the Solicitor General should be aware of every single operation undertaken by the RCMP or by the security service of Canada throughout the year, he would have to be personally aware of anywhere between 5,000, 10,000 or 15,000 operations undertaken by the police force in a year.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to rise to tell me that my time is up. I accept that, and I apologize to members for keeping them so late.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the parliamentary secretary has left. I just listened to him a few moments ago. He talked about the British system, and I would like to deal with his points one by one.

The hon. member is quite correct that, with respect to a matter of national security, questions would be asked and they would not be answered, but I hope the parliamentary secretary is not falling into the same line as that of the leader of the Liberal party, that this matter is one of national security, and that somehow the Parti Québécois, if this is what he is saying, a duly constituted political party—a party I abhor in terms of its objects, but it is duly constituted—was suddenly involved in upsetting national security. I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) was absolutely right that the government cannot distinguish the issues, and the parliamentary secretary illustrated that. It is too bad, because he was summing up for the government.

The issue here in that one case is purely and simply political surveillance, and I dare say that in the U.K. House, the New Zealand House, the Australian House, or in the Canadian House, if a member of parliament did not ask a question about such a questionable practice as this or the government failed to answer if that question was asked, the people involved would be in equally bad odour, and they ought to be.

The parliamentary secretary seeks the floor. He had his moment. In fact he ran three minutes over his time.

The parliamentary secretary then commented on the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) indicating that he had said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had ordered the investigations which give rise to all this. I do not know whether the hon. member said that or not—

Mr. Crosbie: I didn't.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —but the record will clear that up, and the two hon. gentlemen can go at it in the usual parliamentary way.

What I am saying to the parliamentary secretary is that the Prime Minister certainly did not act like a vigilant Prime Minister. He said, "Gee whiz, boys, you've got to stop that". Then we heard nothing else until he suddenly erupted in surprise about the fact that something was happening. The narrow issue in terms of the Prime Minister is what he did. What did he do besides say "Gee whiz"?

An hon. Member: He didn't want to know.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did he turn his back? My friend is the parliamentary secretary to a law officer of the Crown. There is a concept in law that you cannot do indirectly what it would be improper for you to do directly. I suggest the parliamentary secretary look to this lack of vigilance in the Prime Minister with respect to that, because when the issues of this time are sorted out that is one of the questions which must be answered.

Then the parliamentary secretary talked about the openness of the government. I think I am quoting him reasonably correctly. I think he said that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) moved very quickly. We have no evidence to prove that. All we know is that there appeared to be a certain reluctance on the part of the Solicitor General when he refused, knowing what was in his heart last Friday, to come into the House and to make a statement on motions, but instead bootlegged his statement into the throne speech debate so that he could not be asked any questions. It was shabby parliamentary practice. I have called it that before, and will say it now.

It was shabby parliamentary practice. They would not do that in Newfoundland, and they would not likely do that in the U.K. parliament. The parliamentary secretary holds that behaviour up as an example. That would not be allowed, and a minister would not even try to do that, in the U.K. parliament, but it was tried here so that the statement could get on the floor on a Friday afternoon. That was done so that when the Thibault Commission meets this week there will at least be a semblance of disclosure.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Blaker) tried to say that it has been an accusation of the opposition that wrongdoing was committed by members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Well, I was down in Room 130-S on Friday and heard the Solicitor General himself condemn the RCMP when asked whether the acts were illegal. When asked whether those actions had been legalized by the issue of a warrant he said, "Well, I wouldn't be here if that were the case". In other words, there would have been no reason for the Solicitor General to come before parliament unless he was prepared—as he was here on Friday and as he did downstairs before national television—to make the first accusations against the RCMP. The parliamentary secretary is shaking his head. He is entitled to do that. I think he should take a look at the transcript. I was there, and I saw that story being made.

Given that situation, the other matter with respect to the Parliament of Canada is the parliamentary secretary saying in this place, which we call the highest court in the country when it is convenient, that somehow it is improper or wrong for a member of parliament from any side of this House to stand up and ask a question about the activities of any Canadian employed in the Public Service of Canada.

Mr. Blaker: I never suggested that.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The parliamentary secretary came awfully close to it. He talked about the damage to reputation either through debate or through questions in this House. He just finished doing that, and surely he cannot hold to that view. If he does—and I do not believe he does; I think in that sense he was defending the indefensible—then surely he is wrong and he must admit that.

The parliamentary secretary is right that the word "cover-up" has been used in the course of this debate. Cover-up is a word which has acquired its own particular meaning because of certain things which occurred in the southern part of North America to which this matter has been likened, rightly or wrongly, and I am not impressed with the pedantic arguments about whether it should be compared with Watergate. It really does not matter with what label it is painted; the fact is that a question has been raised in this House about the breadth of the terms of reference and whether they should be broadened to drive out of the mind of the most suspicious—not just in this House but outside as well—the thought that perhaps the terms of reference of the McDonald Commission are so narrow that they could reasonably be construed by the commissioners to apply only to the activities of the RCMP.

Incidentally, I say to the parliamentary secretary that that in itself could be an implied accusation by the government against the RCMP. I do not think it is fair that in the circumstances of this case there should be any doubt or even a difference of opinion between the government and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) on the breadth of the terms of reference. I think the government should move immediately to broaden them. In his speech today the Leader of the Opposition indicated how far he thought they should be broadened. If we are to err in this House in terms of that investigation, we ought to err in giving the broadest possible powers. That is not an unreasonable request, and when there is this question, when there is this doubt, and when there are reputations at stake I cannot understand why there is not the broadest possible opportunity to look into the question of ministerial responsibility.

What passed between the ministers and the security service and the security service and the RCMP? If anything passed, what was it? Surely the ministers have a responsibility.

The interesting thing about all this is that the two former ministers who could perhaps cast the best light on what went on in this debate did not step forward. Those two ministers have been sitting together as seat mates and, I suppose, soul mates. They sat listening to the debate but did not leap to their feet saying, "This is my position—this is what I knew, not about l'Agence de Presse Libre, about which statements were made on former occasions, but about the things said in this debate tonight." But they said nothing, Mr. Speaker. What is anybody to think about such silence? That is where the cover-up comes in, because the government has not come clean.

● (0242)

The minister didn't come completely clean in his statement to the House today, even though he was on his feet for an hour and subjected to questions. If he had the issue would not still be in the news at eleven o'clock tonight. There it stands, and the government has the answer. As long as that is unanswered an accusation is implied—and perhaps more strongly than that—against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

One of the problems with this government is that while things are going well ministers take the credit, but when things start to go to hell they suddenly become innocent bystanders. I think we have to consider the position of the government then.

The hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) asked in a humorous fashion whether the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) should have knowledge of any matter undertaken by any agent or agency under his control. He expected me to answer yes to that question, but we know that is physically impossible. The minister cannot have such knowledge but, Mr. Speaker, he must have responsibility, and that is the issue in this case.

It has always been the tradition in our parliamentary system and in all parliaments in the Commonwealth, that a minister has responsibility for what happens in his department, even though he may not have knowledge. That applies here. Of course the minister cannot have knowledge, but he has ultimate responsibility. Of all the things in which the government is involved, it is inevitable that security activities will be primarily the responsibility of the executive branch and that, no matter what devices we think of, parliament can never have any great control over those security services. These things are given to a government willingly, on trust, but when that trust is violated, when a bug is found in a member's office—whether a government agency put it there God only knows—but when there are questions of agencies of government being involved in illegal acts, then that trust must be said to be violated. The government then owes this House and the people of Canada an explanation.

Thus far in this debate and during the question period today we have not been given an explanation. I say to them and to the parliamentary secretary who did his best to defend the indefensible, that the government's perspective in this matter is not in keeping with what I like to think are the traditions and demands of a democratic society.

What has happened, unfortunately, is that this defensive government, this secretive government, this arrogant government has somehow equated its interest with the national interest, and that is wrong, Mr. Speaker. That is the dilemma the government faces, not the dilemma put by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. The government violated the most sacred trust given to it by a trusting people—to keep control of the security services of the country. There is no other way they can be controlled, Mr. Speaker. The government violated that trust, and I say with respect to the Solicitor General, his predecessors and any ministers involved, even to the highest minister, that being the case, they are not fit for office. They are nice men and good to their families I suppose, but they are not fit for office. That is the issue we have to address.

The parliamentary secretary spoke of the need for security balanced against individual rights. I regard it as one of my individual rights that the security service will never overstep itself. I am not satisfied that this will not happen. I am not satisfied with the defence put up by the government.

The issue is simply ministerial responsibility. Either ministers knew and are part of the cover-up, or did not know and are incapable of supervising the most sensitive part of their departmental operations. In either event the ministry is wrong and the ministry should be ashamed of itself. It has let itself down, it has let this parliament down, and it has let the people of this country down. It will be answerable to those people for what has occurred.

I do not blame the RCMP, but they, like everybody else, are subject to the rule of law. The ministers have the ultimate responsibility for what must be done in this regard, however, and they will have to bear the ultimate burden for their failure to exercise it.

Before I go, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all members of the House I should like to express to you and to the staff who have served us well and long this evening and morning, our grateful thanks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my name and everyone's, may I say we were very happy to be here to listen to this important debate.

Pursuant to Standing Order 26(13) I am satisfied that the debate has been concluded. I therefore declare the motion carried.

The House stands adjourned until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 2.50 a.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER BE PRESENT TO ANSWER QUESTIONS ON ALLEGED COVER-UP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, indeed a matter which is taken as being of the utmost seriousness by everybody except this government which treats it by casting aside questions and keeping the Prime Minister away from the House of Commons. Since the Prime Minister is responsible personally and directly for the integrity of this government and, more specifically, for the direction of national security activities by the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House demands that the Prime Minister of Canada be in his seat in this chamber at 2 p.m. tomorrow in order to answer for the illegal activities and cover-up by his government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR VERIFICATION OF LETTER TO MINISTER CONCERNING BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that I have been informed that a letter was written to the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, by the director general of security of the RCMP, dated December 19, 1972, bringing to his attention information about the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre in the fall of that year, and considering that the former solicitor general has maintained that he did not become aware of this break-in until March, 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instruct the Solicitor General to search his files to ascertain if such a letter, referred to as document No. 26 in the proceedings of the Quebec Keable inquiry, exists.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS CONCERNING CO-OPERATION PENDING COMPLETION OF POLICE INQUIRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, in view of tensions between federal authorities and provinces such as Alberta and Quebec which are holding inquiries into various aspects of the administration of justice and affecting the RCMP since there are constitutional and legal aspects involved which, in all likelihood, cannot be considered fully by these inquiries until several months have elapsed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice convene a conference as soon as practical with their provincial counterparts to explore, on an immediate basis, ways of mutual co-operation until such time as all of the commissions of inquiry, including the McDonald Royal Commission, have had a chance to come to reasoned conclusions and recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSAL THAT AUTHORITIES WHO ABUSED POWER BE FIRED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the confusion which has been created by the illegal actions of the special RCMP committee which is responsible for the security of the state; given the general indignation among the Canadian people and considering that the government is directly involved in this inadmissible abuse of power, this situation resulting from their narrow views on the matter of national unity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the authorities who are directly or indirectly responsible for this abuse of power be immediately fired and that, if any minister of the cabinet is involved, he should resign forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion put forward by the hon. member. The introduction of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ACCESS TO COMPUTER IN PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the public revenues of Canada have been used to purchase and operate a $1 million computer in the East Block due to an idea that "sort of bubbled up" in the Privy Council office, with expenditures hidden under administrative services for the Privy Council, and in view of the fact that one major function of this computer is a highly sophisticated press information retrieval system for the Prime Minister, and since a computer expert states it was intended as a support for the Liberal party and has essentially become a Trudeau research bureau, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the members of the Privy Council office be ordered to desist from bubbling up expensive baubles for the Prime Minister and that access to the computer and its information be given to all political parties represented in the House so that no one will be tempted henceforth to bug the bauble or retrieve the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO BREAK-INS OF PROPERTIES OF POLITICAL PARTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity in accordance with Standing Order 43.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That in the light of the fact that the federal office of the New Democratic Party was broken into on December 3, 1972 the government be directed to institute full inquiries into the searching or breaking into the property of any political party in Canada.

I do not refer, as the minister did, to party headquarters only.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF SUBJECT OF DISABILITY PENSIONS TO COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The statement in this House by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) to the effect that the basic rate of disability pension will not be increased because of economic restraint has caused widespread national concern and dismay on the part of veterans' organizations and veterans generally. This refusal by the minister makes a mockery of Canada's commitment to veterans of the First World War, the Second World War and the Korean War. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the matter of disability pensions for veterans be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROPOSAL TO REINSTATE CAPITAL PUNISHMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I would like to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that every reliable indicator and poll in the last five years has shown that about 80 per cent of the Canadian people want to see a return of capital punishment in Canada, and in view of the fact that yet another police officer, Sergeant Ronald McKean, was recently gunned down and killed in Collingwood, Ontario in the performance of his duty, and as the people of Canada should no longer have to tolerate the procrastination of this government in bringing forward a referendum on this important issue of national concern, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government take immediate steps to reinstate capital punishment in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The question period would ordinarily begin at this time. I have received notice of a question of privilege by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) which has a basic indication that it may pertain to events which would ordinarily follow in the question period. I should hear it in a preliminary way first, and I will guard the proper time for the question period.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FOX—REFERENCE TO STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS FOR NEW WESTMINSTER AND CENTRAL NOVA

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which I believe affects the privileges of hon. members of the House and which, in the course of the information I will give, should materially affect the course of the question period today.

During the course of the emergency debate last night the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) referred in his speech to a document which on its face purports to be a memorandum addressed by Mr. Robin Bourne of the security planning and analysis branch of my department to the Minister of Labour of British Columbia. The hon. member referred to the document publicly, in spite of doubts expressed himself as to its authenticity. I want to report to the House at the first opportunity today that the document did not originate with Mr. Bourne and that it is indeed a false document.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Fox: The paper it is written on is widely available in the Ottawa area. Further, the branch title is not correct. The document is unsigned, and the filing number is not even remotely similar to that used in that branch of my department. It is quite clear that the document is the work of a mischievous person or persons. Unfortunately, the hon. member for New Westminster, who expressed doubts about the document, did not choose to check it out with my office before making it public.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Fox: It is my intention to turn the document over to the appropriate authorities for investigation. I sincerely hope that the hon. member for New Westminster would wish to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the Solicitor General is permitted to raise matters which might affect the question period, he ought to be confined very strictly to the merits of those matters.

Mr. Fox: I would like to raise a second point, but I hope the hon. member for New Westminster wishes to co-operate fully with that investigation so that the mischievous person or persons may be known.

• (1417)

Mr. Fox: The other point is that yesterday the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) also rose on a question of privilege concerning a bugging device found inside his office. The hon. member, according to press reports, indicated that this could well be the work of the security service of the RCMP. I have had the matter examined and I can assure the House that I, as Solicitor General, never authorized any eavesdropping of the hon. member's office and can further state that the Commissioner of the force assures me that no such bugging was done on the criminal side of the force. However, we on this side believe this to be a matter of the utmost importance, requiring that a full, complete, investigation be carried out in order to determine who is involved in such a despicable act. I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if you so desire you can count on the complete co-operation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in this regard.

An hon. Member: How about the government?

Mr. Fox: This matter is far too important to be dropped with the passage of time. Insinuations have been made. It is time for insinuations to be replaced by the truth and the truth can only come out through a quick, complete and thorough investigation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to tell the House that I accept the explanation provided today by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) concerning the nature of the document in that it is what appears to be a sophisticated hoax.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Leggatt: But, Mr. Speaker, it is not unusual that any member of this House, given the kind of information that has been available to members in so many areas, would come to the conclusion that the document itself was legitimate. As I say, I accept the Solicitor General's explanation of course. I hope he will go further and not only tell the House that the document itself is false but that the information contained therein is false and that no intelligence activity of the nature alleged in the document took place with regard to the individuals named in the document.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I think if he could do that, it would certainly satisfy the House. I do accept his explanation concerning the document, however. I should say also that I am delighted he is following up with an investigation of the document because we are just as interested in getting to the bottom of these things as is the Solicitor General.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I want to thank the Solicitor General for his statement. I also want to ask a question for clarification—perhaps he has covered this point but I did not quite catch it—did he indicate that it was the RCMP on the criminal side only from whom he had received this assurance or does this assurance cover all aspects of the RCMP or related agencies?

Mr. Fox: All aspects of the RCMP, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this has contributed to a more reasoned question of privilege on the basis of those matters that have been raised. In any case, the question period would have begun about seven minutes ago and I would therefore propose to continue it until about seven minutes past three.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MEMBERS NOT UNDER SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it was certainly refreshing and unusual for us to hear from the lips of the Solicitor General the phrase that the truth can only come out through a quick, complete and thorough examination. We certainly believe that and wish that the government would consequently pay more attention to our demands for a special committee inquiry. In the absence of the Prime Minister who should be here in the House of Commons today—

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It relates to a letter to me from the Prime Minister received in my office on October 18 this year. I think it important that I quote it. It says in part:

I can, however, state unequivocally, that as long as I have been Prime Minister of Canada no Member of the Federal Parliament without his consent has ever been the subject of authorized surveillance, including electronic surveillance, carried out by the Security Service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

● (1422)

That is the end of the relevant quotation. I would draw to the attention of the House that the Prime Minister explicitly limited that guarantee to the security service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

In light of the revelation made yesterday by my colleague from Central Nova, I should like to have from the Acting Prime Minister the categorical statement that he has sought and received from the security service of the RCMP, and from any other security branch of the government of Canada, an assurance that the statement made to me by the Prime Minister is still operative.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member that so far as presence in the House of Commons is concerned the Prime Minister has a much better record than he has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: I had a meeting this morning with the Solicitor General and I have nothing to add to what he had to report to the House of Commons today about the bugging of the office of the hon. member for Central Nova. He asked the RCMP and all branches of the RCMP, as well as any people involved in security, about this and they gave him their word that they were not involved. Because of the importance of this matter, Mr. Speaker, and because it affects all members of parliament, I urge Your Honour to take upon yourself the carrying out of a full inquiry so that we will know exactly who has done this bugging.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister very carefully avoided my question. Can we have a categorical undertaking by the Acting Prime Minister, on behalf of the government, that the assurance given me by the Prime Minister in a letter received in my office on October 18 is still operative and that it applies not simply to the security service but also to every other security agency of the government of Canada? Can we have that assurance?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have no security organization but the RCMP. The Prime Minister wrote this letter and we have no changes to make to it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, since the Acting Prime Minister, acting in his capacity as Prime Minister for the moment and responsible for all the activities of the government, has now given me a categorical assurance—because that is what I sought—that the undertaking given by the Prime Minister is still operative and that it applies to any security activity of the Government of Canada, will the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether, before coming to the House of Commons with that assurance, he personally consulted with the director general of the security service, General Dare, with the head of the security planning and analysis branch group in the Solicitor General's department, Colonel Bourne, and did he receive from each of them the unequivocal and total assurance that neither group had any involvement whatsoever, or has had any involvement whatsoever, in the surveillance, electronic or otherwise, of any member of parliament? Has the Acting Prime Minister sought and received that specific assurance from those officers?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that I talked with the Solicitor General this morning and that he sought those assurances from the RCMP. He gave his answer in the House of Commons a few minutes ago and I am thoroughly satisfied with the word of the Solicitor General.

NAME OF PERSON AUTHORIZING SURVEILLANCE OF CERTAIN GROUPS IN COMMUNITY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we had on Friday the Solicitor General spell out for the House of Commons the March, 1975 mandate that is supposed to guide the activities of the security service of the government. Yet it has become evident that the government has been engaged in surveillance of individuals and groups who at best are involved in political dissent and not involved in subversion. This includes political parties, the media, labour unions and, for all we know, individual private Canadian citizens. What I want to know of the Acting Prime Minister or Solicitor General is who authorized the surveillance of political parties, the media and perhaps ordinary citizens of this country.

● (1427)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a rather unacceptable question. Yesterday the Solicitor General replied to all questions. He made himself available to the public on Friday. He gave all the facts to the House of Commons as to who authorized the taking of the computer tapes in Montreal. Insinuations like that are not worthy of a responsible leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS BREAK-IN—ACTION TO REFER TO SOLICITOR GENERAL OF QUEBEC

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General. Last Friday the Solicitor General reported to the House that he had informed the authorities in Quebec of an illegal act involving the break-in of the Parti Québécois headquarters in Quebec four years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: Those are his words. They are on the record. What we are dealing with here is the commission of two crimes. The first one has been referred to the attorney general of Quebec and quite properly so. What action has the Solicitor General taken to investigate what is a clear prima facie case of obstruction of justice under the Criminal Code by persons within his department or in his office? Clearly this would involve his predecessor, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in a conspiracy or maladministration. Either way he stands indicted by the people of this country.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member cares to read my statement, he will see that at no point did I ever refer to a break-in at the Parti Québécois headquarters. That is a statement that has been repeated a number of times by the leader of the New Democratic Party in spite of my repeated statements to the effect that that is not the case. It was a break-in in another building in Montreal which housed the computer tapes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Further to that, the hon. member asked a question concerning possible obstruction of justice. During the course of my tenure as Solicitor General, I have had the opportunity of reviewing the files concerning possible illegalities. In no case was there any evidence of obstruction by any one of my predecessors. On the contrary, all indications in the file are to the effect that as soon as my predecessor, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, became aware of an illegal activity, he immediately advised the provincial authorities so that appropriate action could be taken.

PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS BREAK-IN—POSSIBILITY OF ACTION AGAINST DIRECTOR GENERAL OF SECURITY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the statement made yesterday by the Solicitor General to my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont, to the effect that no one within the security service at the time, including the Director General of Security Service, considered this to be an illegal action, clearly an illegal act was committed and has been referred to the attorney general of Quebec. There are at least four sections of the Criminal Code that have been violated, including theft, break and entry, obstruction of justice and conspiracy. In the shameful absence of the chief law enforcement officer of this country, the Attorney General of Canada who has the responsibility here, I will direct my question to the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that he is obviously in a conflict of interest vis-à-vis his predecessor, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, with regard to any attempt to commit a conspiracy under the Criminal Code, what action does the Solicitor General intend to take against the Director General of Security at the time who obviously knew that a crime had been committed? Also, what steps will he take to establish a clear objective and impartial inquiry into the operations of the office of the Solicitor General of Canada?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that instead of asking questions the hon. member wishes to act as a judge and, in the absence of due process, condemn people who have entered into certain activities. As far as we, on this side of the House are concerned, we are ready to let the due process of law take place. We believe that the proper person to decide whether someone is guilty or not is a judge who has heard all the evidence or all the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: The hon. member also asked about a possible conflict of interest between my office and that of the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is quite clear that on this side of the House we have wanted to ensure that there is not even the slightest appearance of conflict of interest and that is why we have set up a commission of inquiry which has all the powers necessary to examine any illegal acts committed by the RCMP. Also, in spite of what members of the opposition have said and in spite of what the editorial said in the Globe and Mail this morning, the commission has the power to call the appropriate ministers before it. I might add that the appropriate ministers, both the Minister of Supply and Services and the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs have already indicated publicly their intention to respond to any request to appear in front of that commission.

● (1432)

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REASON FOR DELAY IN INFORMING QUEBEC POLICE AUTHORITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Solicitor General as well, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the obstruction of justice, not on the part of his predecessors, but of himself. I should like to ask the minister why, having learned of the RCMP involvement in arson and theft, two very serious offences, and having informed the Macdonald Royal Commission in the middle of July of this year about such activity, he took more than two months before getting in touch with the police authorities in the Province of Quebec to inform them of the same activity.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The answer to that question is quite clear. It is interesting to note that the leader of the New Democratic Party accuses me of having obstructed justice when I have brought the matter to the attention of the royal commission of inquiry which he, among others, requested should be set up. We set up a royal commission of inquiry in order that there might be an independent, impartial body to look into these various allegations. We thought it would be improper for the RCMP to conduct a complete investigation of those matters. We also thought it would be regarded by members of this House as an obstruction of justice if the RCMP had gone outside the force to interview, for instance, former members or other persons who might be involved in those acts.

For these reasons we referred the matter to the Macdonald Commission, but as we had some evidence coming forward of illegal acts we thought it would be proper to refer the matter to the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec. I find it rather an astounding proposition to hold that in cases where we have referred these facts both to a federal royal commission and to the Attorney General of the Province of Quebec that the hon. member would have the gall to talk about obstruction of justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, we on this side can put up with just so much rhetorical baloney. I have no objection to his informing the royal commission. The whole point of the question is that when the minister found out that there had been criminal wrongdoing involving arson and theft he took more than two months to inform the correct police authority so that they might investigate and prosecute. That is the question.

Mr. Fox: I answered the question previously—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Fox: —I would point out to the hon. member that in the course of the debate during the month of June when I was saying that these questions involving criminal acts ought to be handled at the provincial level, the hon. member was telling us we were sending the RCMP to the dogs by confining them to a provincial commission of inquiry. The facts are there. We have referred the matter to police authorities. There are other allegations which have been made against the force and they have all been referred to the royal commission in order that they may produce the evidence. If they do come up with evidence, I would expect them to talk to me and to advise me to which attorney general I should refer it.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR VERIFICATION OF LETTER INFORMING MINISTER OF EVENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): You have not answered the question! Rarely have I heard such blatant nonsense from a lawyer. It is just rubbish. My last question concerns his predecessor but it must be put to the Solicitor General because, in accordance with the rules of the House, his predecessor cannot answer. The former solicitor general, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, said in the House that he did not learn of the break-in of the office of L'Agence de Presse Libre which took place in the fall of 1972 until March of 1976. I was informed yesterday that a letter, signed by the Director General of Security, was sent to the then solicitor general on December 19, 1972 providing information about the break-in that fall. In view of the serious contradiction between those two alleged sets of facts, would the minister investigate the situation and find out whether such a letter was sent on that date and whether it was received?

An hon. Member: Read the letter!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

SMALL BUSINESS

SUGGESTION MEASURES BE TAKEN TO PROTECT SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I know we have been discussing a very important topic in the last few days, but still we should not drop all other matters of importance in Canada. I should like to put a question to the Minister of State responsible for Small Business. Can he tell us whether the government, during the summer break which ended recently, studied the problems of small business in Canada and whether, as the minister in charge, he intends to take concrete steps, first, to define what small business is and, then, introduce efficient legislation to better protect it in Canada and enable it to develop normally?

[English]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, my predecessor spent a year studying the problems of small business and a good many of these studies resulted in—

An hon. Member: More studies!

Mr. Abbott: —a declaration by myself on his behalf early in my tenure outlining a ten-point program. But I will confess that the program is somewhat skeletal and thereby hangs a requirement to flesh it out in the coming months. I think that as time goes by we will be bringing in definitive programs which I believe will meet many of the problems faced by small business today. I cannot say they will meet all those problems because small business, like large business today, is facing very serious difficulties. I think we are going to bring in a number of measures—the hon. member is aware of the recent introduction of the CALURA amendments which will go a long way to reducing paperwork now faced by 70,000 small businesses.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. As small and medium-sized businesses are an important source of employment both steady and new, can the minister tell us whether he intends to recommend that a committee of the House study the question as proposed recently, in ten points, by his predecessor?

[English]

Mr. Abbott: Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that when I introduce measures in the House I shall have the full co-operation of hon. members. I trust that the hon. member for Abitibi will take part in the debate.

NATIONAL SECURITY

POSSIBLE USE OF CENTRAL TELEPHONE SYSTEM TO KEEP UNDER SURVEILLANCE TELEPHONES IN OTTAWA AREA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In April of 1973 I directed a number of questions to the government. One of them was whether the government had considered or developed a scheme under the Defence Research Board, Shirley's Bay, to utilize the central telephone system in Ottawa to keep under surveillance all telephones in the Ottawa area. If that was not happening, I would have expected a direct negative answer from the Prime Minister. But his response was: "It is not considered in the public interest for reasons of national security to disclose the details of intelligence activities."

In the light of recent events, particularly those of yesterday, will the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether or not the Shirley's Bay establishment has the capability of utilizing the central telephone system in Ottawa to keep under surveillance telephones in the Ottawa area and, if it has that capability, whether it is being so used?

● (1442)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not particularly aware of this problem, but I will check and report to the hon. member. I do not think I am in a position to add anything to the answer given by the Prime Minister a few months ago, but I will check and if there is anything new about it, I will report to the hon. member.

[English]

POSSIBLE MONITORING OF MEMBERS' LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE CALLS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, can the Acting Prime Minister inform the members of this House whether telephone calls, particularly long distance telephone calls, of members of this House were in any way monitored? Are there tapes being made of the conversations, particularly long distance telephone conversations of members? Does this capability to monitor and tape exist?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think it is in our interest to do that. In a letter addressed to the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister has made it clear that the government had never allowed anyone to monitor telephone calls or keep the Parliament Hill offices of hon. members under surveillance.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, either the Acting Prime Minister did not get the gist of the question or chose to ignore it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: My question was this: does the capability exist to monitor and tape telephone calls, particularly long distance telephone calls, of members? Perhaps he could reply to that at a later time after looking into it.

My final supplementary question is: if tapes are kept of telephone conversations, particularly long distance calls, are these tapes listened to on a regular basis at meetings of officers of various deputy ministers, for instance, the deputy minister to the Postmaster General?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any capacity or any capability of this organization to do that. We are here today experiencing a fishing expedition, and I think fishing is better in the Yukon than in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It depends on what you catch.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REASON FOR WITHHOLDING INFORMATION FROM CABINET COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it refers to two answers which he gave yesterday. Since the Solicitor General confirmed yesterday once again that the illegal break-in had been "authorized by the most senior level of the security service of the RCMP, and that was by the person holding the rank of director general", and later in an answer to me he said that the cabinet committee on security and intelligence did not know about the illegal break-in, arson and theft because "everyone within the security service at that time, including the director general of the security service, did not consider it to be an illegal operation", I wonder if he can tell the House what made the director general think it was legal? Why was the information on this activity deliberately withheld from the cabinet committee for a period of some years?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think there is a commission of inquiry which will have the full opportunity to explore those matters in detail.

Mr. Clark: This is the House of Commons.

Mr. Fox: It will have the opportunity of examining the director general and to hear his story. I do not intend to put words into the mouth of the then director general of the security service. I assume the proper place for this type of thing is in front of the royal commission of inquiry. We do not see why we have set up a royal commission of inquiry if we are going to conduct an inquiry on the floor of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Perhaps the hon. members opposite could make up their minds as to whether they want a royal commission of inquiry, for which they themselves pressed for a long time, or whether they want us to talk about the details on the floor of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General cannot have it both ways. He cannot make a statement in this chamber on Friday on one of the most important issues which has come before this House for some time and then expect that questions as to ministerial information and responsibility are not going to be answered in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANDATE GIVEN TO SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): The Solicitor General may be a fancy skater, but he has a responsibility to this House. If he is not able to inform the House, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister could, because he is all we have to deal with today. What was the mandate given to the security and intelligence services of the government by the cabinet committee on security and intelligence from 1970 on, which would have led senior officers to believe illegal activities would be justified if not publicly acceptable?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there was no mandate given to the security service at any time indicating that illegal activities were justifiable in any way. The point has been made time and time again that all their activities had to be carried out within the framework of the law. There are a lot of people on the other side who are willing to judge and would apparently like to be appointed to the bench; but the judgment they are showing in this House certainly is not to their credibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: You are the one who reported it.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY SECURITY INFORMATION STORED IN PRIVY COUNCIL COMPUTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is for the Acting Prime Minister. Perhaps he will be able to clarify this situation. With respect to the secret million dollar computer located in the basement of the East Block, which serves the Privy Council and the Prime Minister's office, can the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether any security or intelligence information, gathered either legally or illegally, has been fed into this computer? If so, who has had access to it, and has the information that has been gathered illegally now been disposed of?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this computer which is now at the Privy Council is for the exclusive use of the Privy Council and the federal-provincial relations committee. It stores any information related to the activities of that office as in any other department. However, it does not collect information about national security.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER SURVEILLANCE ACTIVITIES APPROVED BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and it is designed to seek clarification of that remarkable four-year period between the Parti Quebecois break-in and the time when the Solicitor General, the Prime Minister and other ministers were made aware of the illegal act. Is it the policy of the government to allow the director general of the security services, General Dare, to proceed with surveillance activities, including illegal operations against political parties, labour unions, farm groups and individuals, without prior reference to and approval from General Dare's superior, the Solicitor General?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government has never authorized any official to commit illegal acts in Canada. General Dare received new directives from the government a few years ago and this entire organization now works according to directives issued by the government in 1975, I believe.

[English]

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF GUIDELINES FOR SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, evidently there was no answer. I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. In view of the answer of the Acting Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: You have already indicated that there was no answer. Make up your mind.

Mr. Jarvis: In view of the answer of the Acting Prime Minister, would the Solicitor General be willing to table in this House the guidelines which are now in place, together with those which were in effect prior to January 9, 1973, to ensure that the director general of the security services does not make what the Prime Minister prefers to call "technical" breaches of the law in his attempt to apprehend real criminals and not at the same time deny the obvious rights of private citizens of Canada?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as the present mandate is concerned, the hon. member can refer to the speech I made in the House on Friday. I described and quoted from that mandate in detail. It is included in my speech.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Selective discussion.

Mr. Fox: Hon. members opposite have honed in on one possible offence against the Parti Québécois, which is included in my speech, but perhaps in that process they are referring to a number of policy directives which were included in my speech. I ask the hon. member to refresh his memory.

Mr. Clark: He is evading the question once again.

Mr. Allmand: You cannot read either.

TRANSPORTATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC FOR BUS LANE ON CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell the House what is the present situation in the negotiations with the province of Quebec about a lane to be used only by buses on the Champlain bridge between Montreal and the south shore?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think that the National Harbours Board will give its approval tomorrow to the agreement with the government of the province of Quebec. We are awaiting approval from the province of Quebec.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REASON FOR DELAY IN PROSECUTING MEMBERS OF SECURITY SERVICE FOR ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Solicitor General as well. Today the minister said that there was a delay in informing the attorney general of Quebec about allegations of criminal actions pending a royal commission. I ask him whether the fact clearly is that the administration of justice, primarily, generally and certainly in this case, is the responsibility of the provinces? Why should the provincial administration of justice be delayed pending an inquiry that may take months, even years? I ask this question in light of the fact that thousands of other people, probably even tens of thousands, have answered in the courts charges of theft, arson and of breaking and entering. Why is special treatment given to these particular people?

• (1452)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): It is not a question of particular treatment given to anyone. The question is really one of developing evidence in examining complaints that have come in. What the hon. member is suggesting is that every time a complaint comes in concerning the operations or practices of the force, I should send the complaint to the provincial attorney general. The fact of the matter is that we have set up a royal commission inquiry which will examine the complaints to obtain factual evidence as to whether or not these complaints are substantiated.

Mr. Brewin: To see whether you can cover up.

Mr. Fox: I really do not see how, by referring the complaint to a royal commission of inquiry, which is chaired by a judge of the Supreme Court of Alberta, I can be accused of covering up.

Mr. Broadbent: Because Quebec had the information, that is why.

Mr. Fox: I would hope that the royal commission of inquiry will examine, as a priority matter, all the complaints, which may include allegations of illegal activities. If in the course of the examination of these complaints they come up with hard evidence that there has been a commission of an illegality, I assume that the royal commission of inquiry will advise me of the evidence they have come up with and will recommend that that evidence be brought to the attention of the relevant attorney general of the province. I really do not see why, if that is the attitude of the members of the NDP, they were pressing to such an extent to have the royal commission of inquiry. What they are saying is that they want a royal commission of inquiry but they do not want it to do anything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would again like to ask the Solicitor General whether he is now claiming there is any doubt whatever that there was an illegal break in? Did it take months for the royal commission to discover that fact?

Mr. Fox: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that it can be handled quite expeditiously by the royal commission—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: —along with the other complaints that have been made. Once again, Mr. Speaker, the proof is in the pudding. We have referred all these complaints to the attention of the royal commission of inquiry and we expect them to examine them in an impartial light and to come to relevant conclusions.

[Mr. Brewin.]

PROPOSED CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES TO ESTABLISH WORKING RELATIONSHIP PENDING REPORTS OF POLICE INQUIRIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Greenwood is aware, as we all are in the House except for the Solicitor General, that the terms of reference of the McDonald Commission are not adequate to do the job for which it was set up. In view of the growing tensions that are becoming so obvious between federal justice authorities and provinces, particularly the provinces of Quebec and Alberta, does the Solicitor General have plans to meet with his provincial counterparts as soon as possible in order to come to some interim working relationship until such time as the various commissions of inquiry are able to complete their work, which may take some months, and in order to facilitate the position of the police who are being caught in the middle of this important situation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I met the attorneys general of all provinces, along with the Attorney General of Canada, during the month of June. I believe the situation as described by the hon. member is not quite exact.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. member to a point of misinformation which was contained in his speech last night when he once again, in an ominous fashion, tried to indicate that there was some plot between the government and the House and the fact—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MEASURES TO ASSURE CO-OPERATION BETWEEN VARIOUS POLICE FORCES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, if I have given, advertently or inadvertently, misinformation in the House, certainly my record in the House is far below that of the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The record is available for all to see. I want to ask the Solicitor General, in order to facilitate and co-ordinate proper and amiable relationships between various police forces in this country, what new initiatives does the Solicitor General have in mind following, or in addition to, the meetings held from time to time of the criminal intelligence service of Canada? Does he have any new initiatives to meet what is obviously an urgent situation?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I say that in spite of the misinformation, the hon. member does not have the courage to stand up and ask the question which would permit us to clear it up. There are a number of initiatives that have been taken by the government in connection with the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police in order to ensure greater co-ordination among the police forces of this country. So far as attorneys general are concerned, I indicated, along with my colleague, the Minister of Justice, during my conference with the attorneys general last June, that we are ready to explore methods and means to have greater co-operation among all attorneys general because we think it is extremely important in the fight against crime in this country which is a matter of interest to all Canadian citizens.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PURPOSE OF OBTAINING LISTS OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS MEMBERS—POSSIBILITY INFORMATION GIVEN TO POLITICAL GROUPS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and it is a follow-up of the general import of the question from my colleague, the hon. member for Egmont. It relates to the exchange of information. Certainly the raid or the break-in, whatever the Solicitor General wants to call it, of the two premises, that is the APLQ premises and the printing plant utilized by the PQ in the province of Quebec, had for its purpose, even though there was not a scintilla of evidence of any crime having been committed, to obtain lists, in one case a subscription list and in the other case a membership list. My question to the chief lieutenant of the Prime Minister in the province of Quebec, the temporary head of the government here today, the Acting Prime Minister, is this: The Minister of State for Urban Affairs in the House late last spring indicated that as the chief political organizer for the Liberal party in Quebec he had in his possession a list of all known separatist sympathizers in the province of Quebec. Is there any connection between these lists that the security services were after and the list now in the possession of one of the ministers from the province of Quebec? What was the purpose in getting those lists as far as the security service was concerned?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): The answer is no.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Why?

An hon. Member: Answer it.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I gave a clear answer, Mr. Speaker. It is no.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: When my colleague, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, referred to a list of people who belong to the Parti Québécois, let me say that I know a lot of them in my riding and anyway I am not worried about the next election.

An hon. Member: Why don't you worry about the country?

Mr. Lawrence: I am glad the Acting Prime Minister can be that definite and that blunt in his answer. Perhaps today he will not be able to give me that assurance, but I wonder if he would make a very thorough check so that he could assure the House and the public tomorrow that no information gathered by the security services of the RCMP or any other security service of this government has in any way been passed through, passed over or given to any other political groups in this country as distinct from governmental groups either at the provincial or the federal level.

Mr. Chrétien: If I can make myself clearer, I will reply in French. La réponse est non.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I want an assurance—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

KNOWLEDGE OF MINISTER AND PRIME MINISTER OF SCOPE OF SECURITY OPERATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. When the MacKenzie report was tabled in the House in 1969, I made a statement with, I think, the full approval of the House, that it would be completely unacceptable for the House to have the security operations of this country put beyond the knowledge of the Prime Minister or the responsible minister of the government. Is it the position of the Solicitor General and of the government of this country today that the scope, not to mention the methods, of some of the security operations conducted in this country in the intervening years were beyond the knowledge of the supposedly responsible minister and the Prime Minister?

● (1502)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned it is quite clear that during the course of my experience as Solicitor General the RCMP security service was already operating under a very clear mandate which was given to it by the government in 1975. It was also made very clear to the security service and the commissioner of the force that all operations of the security service were to be carried out in full compliance with the law. The law, of course, has been amended since the period in question, and a number of new safeguards which I enumerated last night—eight or nine of them—have been introduced by the government to ensure greater accountability and greater control of the security service of this country.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish the Solicitor General or the acting Prime Minister would give me a simple answer to a very simple question. I did not ask the Solicitor General whether security operations have been conducted within the law. I asked him whether it was the position of the government that the scope of the operations—for example, surveillance of the Parti Québécois and others—was beyond the knowledge of the responsible minister and the Prime Minister. That is the question I asked, and I would like a simple answer.

An hon. Member: Yes or no to that.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I can answer from my own experience as Solicitor General for the past year that I have had weekly meetings with the head of the security service.

Mr. Clark: That is not the question.

Mr. Fox: I am kept fully apprised of the scope of the surveillance which is done by the RCMP in our country at the moment.

KNOWLEDGE OF PRIME MINISTER OF SCOPE OF SURVEILLANCE OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can get an answer from the Acting Prime Minister to that very simple question. When the Prime Minister speaks as he has about surveillance of the Parti Québécois by security operations in this country, is it the position of the Prime Minister that the scope of these operations was beyond the ken or knowledge of himself and the responsible minister, despite the emphasis we placed on the importance of this when the McKenzie report was tabled in the House back in 1969?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer on behalf of the Prime Minister on this specific case. According to what I know in the case, as soon as the Prime Minister knew that there was an investigation going on about the Parti Québécois he immediately ordered that that investigation stop, and the moment the Solicitor General learned that there had been some illegal activity he immediately referred the case to the attorney general of the province of Quebec.

ACCEPTABILITY OF CONDUCT OF SECURITY SERVICE TO SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. I want to have some clarification as a result of the statement he made last Friday. Perhaps you will excuse me, Mr. Speaker, if I give a preamble.

The minister asked the people of Canada not to be overly hasty in their judgment of this case. Those are strange words coming from the Solicitor General. He said the following:

> The action was taken on the authority of officers whose motives were of the highest order and beyond any doubt. It was authorized and carried out in the absolute conviction that its sole object was to promote the security of Canada given the political and social climate prevailing in 1973.
> [Mr. Stanfield.]

Was the Solicitor General suggesting to the people of Canada that the conduct engaged in in 1973 was and is acceptable to the Government of Canada, particularly the Solicitor General? That is what I want to ask. Has the minister an answer?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to repeat the answer I have already given to the House at least ten times in the past two days, and that is that any illegal operation is of course unacceptable to the government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED POLICE ILLEGALITIES—POSSIBILITY MINISTER WILL NOT INVOKE EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General as well, and I for one am delighted by his obsession and commitment to arriving at the truth in the most expedient and efficient manner; the truth, incidentally, to which only he seems to be a stranger.

Having regard to the fact that the minister relies totally on the royal commission to bring out the truth about all these matters and because of the fact that there will be the revelation of at least ministerial indiscretions if not criminal involvement by ministers, I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he is now prepared to commit himself to forgoing his executive privilege which is inherent in section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act under which he can withhold evidence and documentation from this commission. Is he prepared to forgo this executive privilege in this case?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in theory I cannot answer the question, but it is my intention to make all documents and all files in the possession of the RCMP available to the royal commission of inquiry. There may be some cases where I will ask the royal commission of inquiry not to make the contents of those files public if the matter of national security is involved. However, I will make all the files which are in my possession available to the royal commission of inquiry.

Mr. Oberle: The minister has told us that he is not prepared to forgo his executive privilege, and there may be documents which will be withheld by him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Oberle: If the minister is extending this qualified co-operation to the federal royal commission which he himself appointed, will he also not forgo his executive privileges with respect to the commissions which are operating at the present time in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Alberta?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the answer is quite clear: I definitely will not. It is my duty to exercise the rights which have been conferred on me by parliament under section 41(2). A provincial commission of inquiry has no right whatsoever to inquire into the day-to-day operations of a federal agency. That would definitely go against the terms of our constitution. It is my intention to make all documents available to provincial commissions of inquiry inasmuch as they relate to criminal actions which have been committed within the boundaries of those provinces, but I will not allow a provincial commission of inquiry to go on a fishing expedition with regard to matters which are of no concern to them, that is, the day-to-day operations of an agency of the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. HNATYSHYN—SEARCH FOR "BUGGING" DEVICES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the revelation made yesterday by the hon. member for Central Nova and the action taken by Your Honour in response to it. My question of privilege deals with the sweep and the investigation which is being conducted, at Your Honour's behest, of the offices of members of parliament on Parliament Hill and Your Honour's invitation to hon. members from both sides of the House to request, if they deem it appropriate, that each of their offices be investigated by some authorities with respect to electronic devices and telephone-tapping devices.

If this offer is being made, if this service is being performed, and if police officials or others are coming on to Parliament Hill at Your Honour's request and with your consent, it seems to me that that consideration ought to be extended beyond Parliament Hill. With the greatest of deference to Your Honour, I think it should be extended to constituency offices which are funded, if not totally, at least partly by the House of Commons. Indeed, if hon. members deem it appropriate, it should be extended to their residence telephones.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The heckling comes from hon. members opposite because they may think they have information we on this side do not have. But the point is that I have received complaints from constituents, and concern has been expressed that information given to and communications made with members of parliament at constituency offices and at their residences may be the subject of wiretaps, scrutiny and surveillance by certain agencies, firms or persons we do not know at this time.

Because of the fact that the House of Commons budget provides for constituency offices, because the discussions there are between constituents and members of parliament, and because political discussions between members of parliament and their colleagues are sacrosanct to our system of government, the courtesy Your Honour has extended to members with regard to their offices here ought to be extended further to include constituency offices and residences of members of parliament. I would ask Your Honour to see if it is possible to provide that kind of service to us as members of parliament in the continued performance of our duties.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar makes the suggestion that the Chair consider extending this service, or making it available to members, upon request, in respect of constituency offices. I will take the matter under advisement and see whether it is feasible.

MR. LANDERS—CORRECTION TO ANSWER

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct an answer, appearing on page 383 of Hansard, that I gave on October 28 in response to a question from the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) concerning the cutting of timber in the area of a proposed reservoir at Gull Island on the Churchill River in Labrador.

Last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I told the House that the environmental impact statement respecting the project would be presented very shortly. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is the guidelines for the preparation of the statement which will be issued in the near future, not the statement itself.

RCMP STRENGTH

Question No. 50—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What was the total strength of the RCMP during each of the past four years and what is the strength of the force at the present time?

2. How many persons left the RCMP by (a) retirement (b) personal choice (c) dismissal, or any other reason, during each of the past four years and what was the total of all those leaving the RCMP during the past four years combined?

3. Did the government at any time in the past four years investigate a morale problem in the RCMP particularly in higher levels and, if so, was one of the reasons found to be political interference with performance of RCMP duties?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): 1.

	Regular Members	Special Constables	Civilian Members	Total
1973/74	11,097	847	1,093	13,037
1974/75	11,872	1,169	1,230	14,271
1975/76	12,336	1,248	1,357	14,941
1976/77	12,340	1,238	1,443	15,021
April 77	12,431	1,243	1,448	15,122

Regular Members, Civilian Members and Special Constables Only

	(a) Retirement (Pensioned)	(b) Personal Choice (Time Expired) (Free Discharge) (Purchased) (See Note 1)	(c) Dismissal and (Dismissed) (Unsuitable)	Other (Died) (Invalided)	Total
1973/74	135	338	73	26	572
1975/76	184	375	40	10	609
1976/77	193	354 (Resigned—see Note 2)	8	7	562
Total					2,348

NOTE 1: These terms were used to describe methods of voluntary discharge pursuant to the now repealed RCMP Regulations 162, 166, and 167. For clarity, "time expired', was the method to discharge a member who declined to re-engage on expiration of his initial term of engagement; "free discharge" was the method to discharge— (a) a regular member, other than an officer, with more than five years service in the force; and (b) a civilian member at any stage of his service who requested to be released from the force, and "purchased" was the method to discharge a regular member, other than an officer, with less than five years service in the force who requested to be released. A condition of release by "purchase" required the payment of an amount of not less than $200 nor more than $432.

NOTE 2: On may 14, 1976, the commissioner granted members the option of taking a voluntary discharge while facing disciplinary action. Members are taking advantage of this option and this has reduced the number actually being discharged as unsuitable or by dismissal.

3. No.

ANGLOPHONE MINORITY OF QUEBEC OUTSIDE MONTREAL

Question No. 125—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the government recently receive a report concerning the anglophone minority of Quebec outside of Montreal and, if so, does the report indicate that (a) the Quebec City area and the Eastern townships counties of Arthabaska, Megantic, Drummond, Wolfe and Shefford have reached the point where the anglophone presence is no longer of significance, that anglophones in these areas have accepted the predominance of French, and all of those who have to be bilingual in order to function have already made the transition (b) the Gaspe, the Eastern townships counties of Richmond, Sherbrooke, Compton, Mississquoi and Stanstead as well as Hull, Papineau, Argenteuil and Gatineau are all moving in the direction of francophone dominance and to these may be added two counties which still have relatively substantial anglophone populations—Brome and Huntingdon, and that in both cases, recent demographic changes as well as attitudes of residents indicate the trend is toward increasing francisation and francophone ascendance (c) Hull and Gatineau are marked by a general trend towards increasing linguistic and attitudinal francophone predominance?

2. Does the report contain any indication that the Quebec francophone majority is in danger of being dominated by the anglophone minority?

3. Has the government communicated the contents of the report to the Quebec Provincial Government?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): 1. A report on the anglophone minority of Quebec outside Montreal was submitted to the Department of the Secretary of State in March 1977. (a) Yes (quoted from page 72 of the report). (b) Yes (quoted from page 73). (c) Yes (quoted from pages 74 and 75).

2. Yes, in the dominantly anglophone township of Pontiac. As Hull and Gatineau are considered "transitional areas", the general trend towards increasing linguistic and attitudinal francophone dominance might be threatened or even reversed in future as a result of expansion of Federal Government facilities, the presence of the National Capital Commission, and the influence of the anglophone majority in close proximity and able to reinforce the use of English by the anglophone minorities of Hull and Gatineau.

3. No, but the report has been made available to the public and has been forwarded to libraries as a resource tool.

CANADA DAY

Question No. 144—Mr. Jones:

1. Was the name Canada Day designated by law as the name of the official holiday on July 1 and which was formerly known as Dominion Day?

2. What authority does the government have to issue material and letters referring to July 1, 1977 as Canada Day and the week preceding as Canada Week?

3. Is it the intention of the government to change Dominion Day to another date closer to June 24, St. Jean Baptiste Day?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Insofar as the Secretary of State is concerned: 1. No.

2. The government uses the statutory designation "Dominion Day" in official texts in which reference is made to the July 1 holiday. There is no act forbidding the use of the term "Canada Day" or "Canada Week".

3. No.

RETIRED PUBLIC SERVANTS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 193—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Canadian Intergovernmental Conference Secretariat and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. Number of persons under contract—3; retired public servants—nil.

2. (a) 1975-76—$18,333; (b) 1976-77—$17,743. Retired public servants—not applicable.

Question No. 207—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Commissioner of Election Expenses and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. One retired public servant.

2. (a) Nil; (b) $100 to one retired public servant.

PERSONNEL UNDER CONTRACT TO COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Question No. 208—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Commissioner of Official Languages and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him.

RETIRED PUBLIC SERVANTS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 214—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Economic Council of Canada and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. Number of persons under contract—50; retired public servants—2.

2. (a) 1975—$311,782; (b) 1976—$378,119. Retired public servants—$6,925.

EMPLOYEES OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES—1975 AND 1976

Question No. 297—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Commissioner of Election Expenses obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Commissioner of Election Expenses in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. Nil.

3. N/A.

COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—EMPLOYEES FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 298—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Commissioner of Official Languages obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Commissioner of Official Languages in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I might take this opportunity, because of the amended procedures during the short term with respect to the conduct of the adjournment debate proceedings to 6 p.m. instead of 10 p.m., of informing the House, pursuant to Standing Order 40, that the questions to be raised on the adjournment motion at 6 p.m. are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie)—Industry; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Customs; the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp)—Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

Motion No. 1—

That Bill C-3, an act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be amended in clause 7 by striking out lines 6 to 9 at page 4.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When we were dealing with the question of carrying business over from the last session of this parliament to this session, an understanding was reached among the various parties that we would proceed with the bills at the stage at which they are. Unfortunately, the amendments that were on the order paper—I am referring to one dated July 11, 1977—have not been set down.

There have been discussions among the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and representatives of our party indicating that all those motions which stood in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) could be put down today as if they had been set down in the ordinary course, and would be considered during debate on Bill C-3. I understand that to be the case. I would ask the agreement of the minister for unanimous consent to do that, so that the essence of our understanding in the last session may be carried out.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it would be agreeable to us to give consent to allow those motions to be heard. Naturally, I am interested in hearing the further wisdom of hon. members on the subject of the Air Canada bill. If it is more convenient to do so with regard to these motions, I am pleased to do so. I am given to understand that we may be able to dispose of these matters very quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it that the sense of the agreement is that this bill, having been carried over from the last session, will be reinstated in the same position as it was in the previous session, and that it would be inequitable to restore the bill without restoring the report stage amendments that were outstanding at the time the restoration was made.

Therefore, I take it there is unanimous consent that the motion be now put that the report stage amendments outstanding at the time the bill was ordered restored, or at the conclusion of consideration in the last session, be now reinstated along with the report stage of the bill, in order that they can now be taken into consideration. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is one further matter with respect to House business. We are now proceeding with Bill C-3. In view of the motions that were put down today by the Minister of Finance, could I ask the deputy House leader of the government about the legislative program? Does the bill that flows therefrom now take priority in terms of House business, as indicated earlier? It would be very helpful if we knew that, and when it would be taken up the first time.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, in response to the question, I had informal discussions with the hon. member to the effect that today we will deal with the Air Canada bill, Bill C-3, followed by Bill C-8, the Canada Labour Code; then we would move to Bill C-7, CALURA. The ways and means motion tabled today will be dealt with on Thursday, I think, subject to some adjustments. I will speak to the hon. member and other House leaders later if there is any change.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I refrained from taking part in the point of order discussion that arose a few moments ago because I have no objection to last session's report stage amendments being reinstated. However, I understood it the other way. I thought it was required that we put our report stage amendments back on the order paper, but apparently I am the only one who did.

Mr. Mazankowski: You probably never left the place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to the order paper it was filed on October 21, and by then most hon. members were back here too. However, I am also caught by surprise because I thought we would be debating the bill to amend the Canada Elections Act this afternoon; but here we are on Bill C-3 and in particular we are on my report stage amendment, which is one that was put down in the previous session and debated but not voted on prior to the prorogation of that session.

The standing committee which dealt with the bill wrote into it a clause which was not there when the bill was given second reading in the House. The clause is one which was proposed in one form or another by members of the Progressive Conservative party, and although the government did not accept the precise wording proposed by the Progressive Conservative members, it did accept the idea. As a result, there was put into the bill subclause 7(1.1) which reads:

In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

We think it was a mistake, Mr. Speaker, to put that sort of language into this bill. We think the purpose of an organization like Air Canada should be mainly to provide service to the people of Canada, and that it is a mistaken view to say that its main purpose should be the contemplation of profit. We are not suggesting that its purpose should be to go into the red; we are not opposed to the making of a profit if things work out that way. But we do suggest that it puts Air Canada off on the wrong foot, if you can say that about an airline, to say that its main purpose should be the contemplation of profit. Therefore, we think that those words, which were put in by mistake when the bill was in committee during the last session, ought to be removed, and this is why I have put down this report stage amendment to remove lines 6 to 9 of clause 7 on page 4 of Bill C-3.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the new Air Canada Act, Bill C-3, a measure respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, and I particularly welcome the opportunity to speak on the motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a very respected member of parliament and the second senior member of parliament in this country. I was somewhat amazed, however, when I read his motion requesting removal of this clause which provides as follows:

In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that should be written into every act today which deals with Crown corporations and government agencies, not only in the federal government but in the provinces. What the Canadian people are looking for today is better management within government and the cutting out of much waste and mismanagement costing hundreds of millions of dollars. I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has read the Estey report, but it was a very critical document so far as Air Canada management is concerned.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is well aware of the number of times I have spoken in regard to Air Canada, particularly its finance branch in Winnipeg where there were no end of problems in connection with unaccounted for airline tickets totalling at one stage some 225,000. Last spring Mr. Taylor, president of Air Canada, informed us that this number had been reduced to about 80,000 tickets.

I think the amendment presented in committee by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), to the effect that Air Canada be accountable and that it operate in a business-like manner, is an excellent one. If I may just refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on July 19 last when the bill was at report stage, the hon. member made this comment, as reported at page 7810 of Hansard:

The business world has had charge of this country for 110 years and has had plenty of opportunity to pursue sound business principles. And look at the mess we are in today.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are in this mess in our country today because we have had a number of provincial socialist governments as well as one here in Ottawa. We had the Barrett government which was in power in British Columbia for three years and exercised no sound business principles whatsoever. They turned a $50 million surplus into a $500 million deficit in just three years. The Canadian people are fed up with this kind of government. They want some sound business principles introduced into the operations of government, Crown corporations and the like.

Despite the missing airline tickets and the mismanagement outlined in the Estey report, Air Canada has still been allowed to increase air fares. I have objected to this because it is one other way in which the Canadian public has been gouged. Air Canada should be put on a sound footing first, before being allowed to increase air fares. This is another example of how we would protect the Canadian public, Mr. Speaker.

In explaining his motion, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said this:

It is not our suggestion that the board of Air Canada should work hard to achieve a loss, but we do think that the main purpose of a government-owned corporation should be the provision of service.

I agree there should be provision of service, but if the airline has unprofitable routes, the government should subsidize them. In committee last spring, Mr. Taylor had no objection to the motion having to do with Air Canada being run in a business-like manner; as a matter of fact, as I recollect it, he welcomed it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went on to say:

—we are faced with massive unemployment today, with runaway inflation and with conditions which deny to our people the kind of economy and justice to which they are entitled.

Unless we have more sound business principles and are able to deal more effectively with business in Canada, there will not be any businesses to deal with. There is a mass exodus of businesses and investment money from this country because businessmen and investors do not trust socialist governments.

What four men have done to this country, Mr. Speaker, is just unbelieavable. One of them, Mr. Barrett, has been removed. Premier Schreyer of Manitoba had a very bad record in Manitoba, as a result of which there has been a mass exodus from the province of businesses and investment money which is attributable to the socialist climate. Then when Mr. Blakeney nationalized the potash industry of Saskatchewan, he put the fear of death into American investors throughout the United States. In addition, we have a government today which governs by order in council, and has also put the fear of death into the business community. Thus you can see, Mr. Speaker, why it is so important that we return to sound business principles while there are still some businesses left in this country.

Another example of a government that did not operate on sound business principles was the Schreyer government in Manitoba. When it left office we were told there was a deficit of perhaps $21 million. We have since found out that the deficit in Manitoba will reach $71 million. It can, therefore, be seen that sound business principles were not exercised in Manitoba. The new Manitoba government will have to get along with the many money-losing ventures the socialist government entered into in that province. It has cost Manitoba taxpayers a tremendous amount of money.

The Manitoba government did not use sound business principles when it went into the airplane manufacturing business. Saunders Aircraft cost Manitoba taxpayers $38 million through this failure. Also, they are in the bus manufacturing business. This has cost the taxpayers over $35 million. It goes on and on. They even got into the Chinese food business. I like Chinese food, but I like to buy it from a Chinese restaurant, not the government. They did not last very long in the Chinese food business. However, I have not seen any Chinese restaurants fold up in Manitoba; they use sound business principles such as we want to see introduced into the Air Canada Act and the Air Canada operation.

Another example of governments getting involved in business and not using sound business practices is the socialist governments which have been in Saskatchewan for many years. Their bauxite factories, and all the rest, folded up.

Another reason a clause like this should be introduced with regard to this particular Crown corporation operating on sound business principles is found in a recent statement by the Auditor General. He said:

> The present state of financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the government of Canada is significantly below acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.
> We feel very strongly about the fact that unless the systems are corrected the day may well come when I cannot give a clear certificate on the accounts of Canada.

That is what we want from Air Canada, a clear certificate of the accounts. We do not have that now; this was highlighted in the Estey report. The business community, business people and investors are looking for sound business principles. I wish to quote a financial expert who wrote an article in the October 3 edition of the Winnipeg Free Press. He stated that clients investing outside the province will cost the province 4,000 jobs. This is because of having a government which did not use sound business principles. They were interfering with the business community, causing them no end of concern.

The article points out that you can live with a lot of high taxes and government interference, but you cannot live with uncertainties brought about by socialist governments. No business or investor will invest when there is uncertainty. That is why there was such a mass exodus of businesses leaving for the United States. Who ends up paying for this? It is the Canadian taxpayer: he must pay the huge amount of money required to operate the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

A further example of why we should be operating on sound business principles is the uncontrolled spending and uncontrolled growth we have had with the federal Liberal government. In ten years the federal budget has skyrocketed by 350 per cent, from $8.8 billion to a forecast $46 billion in the fiscal year April 1, 1976, to March 31, 1977. Transfer payments of $21.4 billion represent a little more than half the current budget. Of these, more than $9 billion went directly to Canadian citizens in social welfare expenditures such as old age security, family allowances and unemployment insurance payments.

Everyone in Canada knows that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the champion of old age pensions and veterans pensions. We have all supported him in this. I am sure he will agree that if all government departments and Crown corporations operated in a businesslike manner, a lot more money would be available for pensions. I would sooner see money spent on pensions than allow Crown corporations to operate on their own, not properly accountable to parliament.

Because this government has not been using sound business principles, the national debt of the federal government will be around $28 billion at the end of the fiscal year, the result of budget deficits in 20 of the last 23 years. The interest on the national debt, which was $1.2 billion in 1967, will be around $4.6 billion at the end of this fiscal year, making it the third largest federal expenditure after health and welfare, economic development and support. If the government were following sounder practices, the money would not be going out to pay this huge debt. More money would be available for pensions which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others speak about on a regular basis.

With regard to businesses leaving Canada because of the uncertainty here, I wish to point out some of the reasons for their leaving. Uncertainty is the many-headed monster that has been established by the various socialist governments we have had across Canada. It has been perpetuated by our collective leadership.

What seduces businesses to look south of the border is not necessarily the big market, the bigger tax incentives, lower taxes, lower interest rates, less government interference, a more stable work force with better motivation and a strong sense of the work ethic, lower wages and high productivity; rather, these factors more often than not are just the last straw for belaboured-by-paper-work businessmen pronounced guilty until proven innocent by the all-powerful and daily growing governments of our day. Any one may tend to be just the icing on the cake of uncertainty.

Because we do not deal in sound business practices with the business community, we are governed today by order in council, something I do not support. It causes uncertainty and lack of accountability. This has been highlighted by the many auditors general reports we have received over the past few years. Under the circumstances in this country today, and after the election in Manitoba, it has been made quite clear that the people want to get back to responsible government. The government which has just taken over in Manitoba gives every indication that it will be a down to earth, no nonsense government. This is what the Canadian people want.

I suggest that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reconsider this motion calling for Air Canada not to be accountable, because the Canadian people are calling for Crown corporations and all government departments to be accountable. It is time we took a step in this direction. I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that once we get on to these sound business practices there will be a lot of money for increasing pensions for veterans, senior citizens and everyone else. I therefore suggest that he reconsider his motion at this time and withdraw it.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the motion put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I begin by wondering about the comments of the previous speaker, which sounded to me more like Manitoba politics than anything pursuant to the motion or to the bill we are considering. I really do not understand what this has to do with a defeat or otherwise in Manitoba provincial politics.

We are dealing now with an important Crown corporation and with a principle which has been injected into the debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, whether a Crown corporation should give first priority to making a profit or whether its first duty is to serve the public. In my view, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre takes the rather extreme view that we should abandon the idea of such a corporation operating on the basis of sound business principles.

Before pursuing this subject further, I should like to draw attention to the rather excellent job, in my opinion, which Air Canada has done in the past year or 18 months since the new president took charge. We all know that it is customary for people in this country to complain about Air Canada. I think it is time we paid Air Canada some of the compliments which are due to it, particularly under the management of the new president.

When I hear about the desirability of applying sound business principles to the airline business, I find difficulty in thinking of any airline which operates solely on the basis of those principles, that is, without a great deal of government assistance. The airline industry is famous for the various forms of government assistance it requires, ranging from direct subsidies to contracts for carrying mails and contracts for carrying government employees.

The purchasing of aircraft is, in itself, a complex business. We all remember what happened a year or two ago with the Lockheed experience. We know, for example, that Lockheed was selling airframes—it was not the case in Canada—to various airline companies, using very dubious procedures. The best example of an airline which operates in accordance with business principles would, I suppose, be Pan-American, and I do not think Pan-American is any paragon among airlines. The last time I was on one, they had cockroaches in the galley. I took great interest in bringing this to the attention of the stewardess.

An hon. Member: Why were you in the galley?

Mr. Stollery: I was having a drink, of course. That is what I was doing in the galley.

Mr. Peters: It is pretty bad when you have a cockroach in the booze.

Mr. Stollery: Yes. As the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) said, it is pretty bad when you have a cockroach in the booze.

I think we should give credit where credit is due, and the improvement in Air Canada is due in great measure to the new management. Everyone in Canada complains about Air Canada. I think that in the last year or 18 months Air Canada has done a fantastic job in improving the service, while at the same time operating generally on the basis of sound business principles. I think we would be very remiss if we did not insist that an airline should pay regard to sound business principles, and I see no reason why Air Canada should not at least contemplate making a profit: it may not do so, but I do not see why we should tell them that they should not even contemplate a profit. If that were the approach, I think the taxpayers of Canada who have to make up the deficiency if the airline does not make a profit would not find the situation very satisfactory.

I say this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre: I think Air Canada should serve routes on which it is bound to take losses, otherwise there is no reason for the existence of Air Canada. If only profitable routes were served, there would be no point in having a national airline. I also think that Air Canada should have the right to operate on the profitable routes to offset losses incurred in maintaining flights to cities which private airlines cannot possibly serve without government subsidy. Airlines and government subsidies seem to go together—this includes private airlines—and will increasingly go together as energy becomes more expensive and the cost of buying new fleets of aircraft increases.

I cannot at this time go into the various financial arrangements among the regional air carriers and federal or provincial governments. I will simply note that Western Airlines is now owned, I believe, by the government of Alberta because that government—which, incidentally, is known to be a great supporter of free enterprise—has, presumably, decided it should get into the aircraft business on the ground, for all I know, because there are parts of western Canada which require to be served by a state-supported airline.

Whether there is a credit balance shown at the end of the year means nothing because of the many forms of subsidy which can be made available. We are most unfair to Air Canada in asking them to do so many things at once. We want them to serve parts of the country which cannot be served by other airlines. We want them to make a profit. We want them to give better service than is given by similar airlines in other countries. We want them to put in fewer seats than do similar airlines in other countries. In effect, we have asked them to do what is impossible; and when they cannot do it, we complain. I do not think that is right.

I cannot agree with the motion, because it would be folly to operate Crown corporations in other than a businesslike way as far as possible. Such an approach would discourage Crown corporations from even contemplating making a profit, and that is something which no responsible government could endorse. So with all due respect to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, when he reflects on the motion which he has put on the order paper I am sure he will see that it really does not make sense even to one who fundamentally supports the concept of this kind of Crown corporation, to one who believes strongly that Air Canada should serve communities across the country, and to one who thinks that Air Canada, particularly under the new management, has done an excellent job in satisfying a lot of very difficult and almost irreconcilable requests of the government, members of parliament and the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise in opposition to the motion which we are debating. I listened with interest for a while to the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), and I did not know whether he was for or against the motion. I had difficulty following his rationale, but it was nice to see him back on board. It should be noted that this particular amendment had the support of the Liberal and Conservative parties in committee.

We are not debating whether Air Canada is a good or a bad airline. We all agree that the airline stacks up very well in terms of all the carriers involved in the carrying of passengers, both domestically and internationally. It is fair to say that the leadership and management which is provided by the present chief executive officer is sound. Actually, it goes beyond that: the kind of managerial expertise that the present chief executive officer has brought to Air Canada augurs well and creates, probably, a new climate of confidence in the area of Crown corporations. This is something which is really needed, having regard to some of the revelations which have occurred during the past 12 or 18 months.

The hon. member referred to the fact that the airline industry is heavily subsidized, which is true. There is not one form of transportation in this country which is not subsidized in some way, shape or form. This bill sets out to provide the avenue for which the subsidy can be identified, which is important. The hon. member referred to the fact that Pacific Western Airlines was taken over by the free enterprise government of the province of Alberta. PWA is certainly better off in the hands of a private enterprise government than a socialist government. Given the record of achievement of the Barrett government in British Columbia, it clearly speaks for itself.

When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) introduced this amendment he said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this report stage amendment to Bill C-17 is to strike out a few ridiculous lines which were written into the bill when it was in the hands of the Standing Committee on Transportation and Communications.

All we are saying here is something which is very, very significant, particularly at this juncture in our history and our economic climate. The words the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to remove read as follows:

> (1.1) In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

This is a directive to the board of directors of Air Canada, comprised of the chairman and the president appointed pursuant to section 5. I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre refer to those lines as being ridiculous and all I can say is that if we have more than an average number of Canadians who feel that way, then we are in serious trouble in this country. This particular amendment was thoroughly and extensively debated in committee. I think it is reasonable and realistic, and certainly it is a fair directive to advance in any business enterprise, be it a private enterprise venture or a Crown corporation. The hon. member seems to disregard anything which would characterize efficiency, orderly management, productivity or profit. It seems that sound business sense is something the hon. member does not have in his vocabulary.

There has been an implication by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I believe the hon. member for Spadina, that good service cannot be provided and at the same time a profit made. As far as I am concerned, the two are almost inseparable. If you have a good enterprise which is functioning smoothly, doing a good job, making a profit, expanding, upgrading and streamlining its operations, in order to maintain a proper capital equity and cash flow, and in order to streamline and mechanize, you have to make a profit in order to provide that service. These two principles are compatible with one another. I see no difficulty in combining the two and providing a directive to any business enterprise which is engaged in the transportation of people. As the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) said, many of the economic problems we have in this country and many of the problems we have in some of our government-run agencies are primarily because sound business principles have not been the primary motivating factor.

The hon. member made reference to the mismanagement in government circles and the fact that the Auditor General indicated in his last report that the government is close to losing control of the purse-strings, and even parliament. It behooves us all to take a second look at operations involving the use of public funds. When we are dealing with a Crown corporation such as this, we are dealing with public funds. The hon. member also said that we have been engaged in pursuing sound business principles for the last 110 years. I categorically reject that statement. The facts speak for themselves. The hon.

member for Winnipeg South Centre elaborated on that matter as well.

One of the reasons we in our party supported this amendment was the fact that we felt it gave the airline a directive and, indeed, a mandate. The former chairman of Air Canada had long complained that he did not really know the specific mandate of Air Canada. He did not know whether the operations of Air Canada should be conducted in contemplation of a profit, or whether it should be strictly operated along the lines of providing a service at any cost. We think it is important that a realistic definition of a mandate be provided in the terms of reference for a piece of legislation which governs a multimillion dollar corporation such as this.

It is sound practice on the part of parliamentarians who act in the interests of Canadians to provide such a directive. This is particularly important in view of the fact that there is another important clause in this bill, clause 9, which gives the governor in council authority to pay to Air Canada the losses that are incurred as a result of any directive which may be made to the corporation for the provision of service in an area where it is deemed to be in the public interest that such service be provided.

This will not involve total cross-subsidization. The cost, as I understand it, will be clearly identified and will be paid for out of the public treasury. That is all the more reason for the over-all objective and goal of the corporation being that the operation be conducted on the basis of sound business principles and in anticipation of profit. So I think that particular clause certainly balances any fear which some may have that routes might be lost because the provision of service on a particular regional line may or may not be economically feasible. I think that is a very important element.

In a corporation such as Air Canada, or in any other enterprise, there will always be a certain amount of cross-subsidization. As I see it, some routes would make a very good profit, some might show a loss, and some might show a medium amount of profit. So I think one has to look at this point in a global context. I think we should not single out any particular line, but if—as the bill has provided—a service is needed which cannot be provided on an economic basis, the government has the power to direct the airline to provide it and to cover any losses that evolve therefrom.

Reference has been made to the present chief executive officer of Air Canada, and I simply want to reiterate the sentiments expressed. I think I would go even further and say that both our Crown corporations which are engaged in the transportation of people and goods, CNR and Air Canada, are guided by very competent men. The president of CNR, Mr. Robert Bandeen, and Mr. Claude Taylor provide Canadians with an excellent example of competent leadership. They have distinguished themselves in their endeavours in both fields of transportation, and I think we can look to these two gentlemen to provide the kind of leadership that will be necessary as we approach challenging times in the transportation industry.

I think, also, we can look to these gentlemen to put their corporations on a sound business footing. It certainly behooves us to give them the tools and the instruments to do their job as effectively as possible. I want to say one thing in conclusion. Air Canada and, for that matter, CPA will have to take their blinkers off with regard to domestic charter operations. The concern is that any domestic charter operation may undermine regular scheduled air traffic. I believe that argument is overstated. It is interesting to note that Air Canada, for example, plans to triple the available seat capacity on its low-cost, charter class schedules for travel within Canada in the peak summer season next year.

There is every indication that this kind of market is growing and will continue to grow, and I do not think the corporation should be blinded by the fact that it cannot now merchandise the kind of package that the consuming public is demanding these days. Let me go back to the time a few years ago when, in my view, Air Canada did not establish a solid footing in the international air charter business. They were left in the dust. Then they wanted to pay an abnormally high price for the operations of Wardair so as to get a foothold in the air charter business.

I hope they will take a second look at their position in reference to the domestic air charter service, that they will approach it with an open mind, having regard to the realities of the marketplace and to the fact that there is a vacuum there which should be filled and will be filled in one form or another. While I am on the subject of domestic air charters, let me say that I think they will provide an excellent vehicle for assisting this country in its desperate need to achieve a greater sense of national unity. I think that some form of domestic air charter system would help alleviate the lack of understanding which exists from region to region in this country, and would provide an opportunity for Canadians to get to know each other better. I think it would assist us in our balance of trade, particularly with reference to tourist industry dollars. Many of those dollars go outside this country, dollars that could well be spent here if we developed a more reasonable charter package for Canadians.

I know that the former commissioner of official languages made some very relevant observations in this regard. I think it will require, not only the leadership of Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Airlines but also initiative and leadership from the federal government. I hope that at the earliest possible moment the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and all other ministers who have some influence in this area will sit down with the management of our national airlines and map out a strategy for encouraging domestic air travel in this country, one which would reap benefits not only in the economic sense but for national unity.

Again I want to express my opposition to the motion that has been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I hope he will reconsider it, having regard to some of the enlightened comments that have been made from this side of the House, and give Air Canada the kind of tools and mechanisms that they need to do the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say only a few words at this time about the motion which has been proposed and about the remarks just made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski). I should like to say, first of all, that I welcome him back to his role in the transportation field. I think it is a very important task and I am glad to see him in that role. I may say that I was delighted to hear him repeat the words of praise of his predecessor as transportation critic. When I recommended the appointment of the president of Air Canada, I was very pleased to hear the kind words of praise from his predecessor. Now it is even more wonderful, after a good period of operation by the president, to hear those words confirmed by the hon. member for Vegreville.

I appreciate his remarks and I thank him, also, on behalf of the president of Air Canada, because I think it is an airline which is doing an increasingly good job. Our purpose in the House today is to ensure that under the bill before us Air Canada is free to do just that, and to do it more effectively. It is for that reason that I join the hon. member in opposing the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The acceptance of that amendment would defeat the spirit of this bill.

The bill represents a significant step in the course of Air Canada's history, because it is a demonstration of the belief by the House of Commons that the airline has come to a certain stage of maturity at which it should be freed from the burdens of special government obligations, and at which it should also be relieved of the special advantages which have sometimes been given to it.

The bill does that with regard to contracts. It does that in requiring Air Canada to apply for licences in the ordinary way. It does that by setting up a system in which we hope Air Canada will engage with other airlines in special services which are not justified on an economic basis, whereby we can make it possible for all the airlines to offer to provide those services and have competition between them as to which one will provide the services most effectively. In all these ways we are recognizing that there is a possibility now for the airline, which was created in 1937 as Trans-Canada Air Lines, to be in full competition without special burdens or privileges from the government or from the structure by which it has been created.

I think what has happened is that time and circumstances have changed. In putting this bill forward, I do not disagree at all with the spirit which moved the Hon. C. D. Howe in 1937 when he saw the need to put Trans-Canada Airlines together to provide national airline services for this country. But times have changed, and I am rather sure that the Hon. C. D. Howe would fully agree with the change which is being made here, in that the airline situation has reached that degree of maturity where we can free it in order to compete.

The Right Hon. C. D. Howe would fully agree that the special position of Air Canada in relation to the government is no longer a necessity. Indeed, the spirit of competition was difficult in the airline industry as long as special obligations and special burdens existed. I am, therefore, very interested in seeing this bill move forward and the whole new status of this corporation recognized.

I emphasize that it is a matter of this House and this government recognizing that where it is possible for a private sector-like operation to do a job effectively, that indeed is where it should be done. We are, in effect, giving the airline that kind of status while not yet having decided that, as owners of the airline, it is commercially right or the time to dispose of our investment interest in it. I see this happening with Air Canada and I see it happening with Canadian National, both of which now have good, strong management teams which can pull the airline and the railroad, respectively, forward effectively. I foresee both of them making profits over time as their effective operation continues.

I emphasize that where we want a service performed as a matter of public policy, it is seen by us to be our obligation to quantify the cost and to be prepared to pay it, rather than impose it in a hidden fashion upon other users of the service. It is because the amendment here moved would seem to negate that spirit that I, also, will oppose it and hope that other hon. members will do so.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I was quite perturbed by the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). However, he does not hold a candle to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who, if I heard him correctly, has almost reached the stage where he is about to sell CNR and Air Canada. He says he can see the day coming when we will sell the profitable parts and keep the unprofitable parts to provide service. The Minister of Transport certainly has a friend in the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), who feels he should get into the field of establishing his own ground carrier system in competition with some of the other carriers.

It always surprises me when I hear people such as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre say that one of the problems is that this service has to make a profit and fit into the good old free enterprise system, or that governments should not run anything except to break even or make a profit. I asked one of my colleagues about the background of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, because I thought he was a rich entrepreneur, like many other hon. members, who had speculated in mining ventures, in oil, the stock market or something of that nature. It is very interesting to learn that he is only an embittered employee of a government-run organization.

He comes to Ottawa and takes out his frustrations on a Conservative-established Crown corporation, the Manitoba Telephone System. That was established, I understand, in 1908 by Grandfather Roblin. I really wonder about the mentality of people who use their perverted backgrounds and their frustrated hopes as a reason for their position with regard to something as important to the people of Canada as Air Canada.

It is true that Air Canada will not be used by everyone. It is true, as the minister just said, that it is going to be subsidized for those who need the service and use it. It may be that the minister is not part of the jet set. Perhaps he does not want to be, or perhaps the jet set does not want him; but there is a certain class of people which travels by air, and these people are subsidized all over the world. Mr. Speaker, I know you are a world traveller. How many countries have you travelled to where you have seen aeroplanes with the names of the countries on them, and known full well that they were leased or that the money to buy them was a gift?

This is true all around the world because there is a certain pride attached to air travel, and most countries want to have good airlines. Despite what the government has done to our airline, we have a good airline. What has the government done to it? It has allowed regional carriers to drain off much of the lucrative business in weekend travel to many countries. You can go to airports all across Europe, in the Caribbean or in Mexico and find Wardair, Quebecair, CP Air, Western Pacific or any of the five regional carriers sitting at those airports in conjunction with Air Canada.

It is interesting to note that even in Great Britain the tourist operation has been combined with the major carrier. The reason was prestige, and it was also economic to do so. Yet we ask a national airline to carry passengers into areas in which it is difficult to provide service. We ask the national airline to provide this service because it is the right of the Canadian public to travel on its national airline. We ask the national airline to go to areas where it is not feasible or profitable to operate, yet we tell the board of directors that it should use good business practices.

I have had the opportunity to be on the committee studying the estimates of the Department of Transport over a number of years. I have seen the machinations which have taken place in obtaining financing for Air Canada. I have seen the difficulties it has had because it has been a stepchild of the government. It has been relegated to the foster home of Canadian National. I am aware of the great difficulties, and I congratulate the government for making this change and for putting the airline into the position where it can borrow on its own and establish sound business practices. But we say it has to make a profit.

We say that the board "shall have due regard to sound business principles". Everybody agrees with that. If it went on to say, "in particular the national interest", that it would provide additional air service, we would understand that. Maybe it should be thinking of going into some of the other branches of air service. When we say that the board of directors in particular must give consideration to making a profit, let us not kid ourselves: we are doing exactly what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) says we are trying to do—we will split it up into profitable and non-profitable areas. The profitable areas will sell, and the unprofitable areas will operate.

In the past even Conservative governments which contemplated establishing Crown corporations always had as the principle reason that they were the most economic way of providing maximum service. This was done with hydro by a Conservative government in Ontario, and with a telephone system by a Conservative government in Manitoba 70 years ago. It has been done in every province where they have contemplated providing necessary services to the greatest number of people at the lowest possible cost. They do this knowing full well that the operation has to be subsidized if they are to provide any kind of equality in areas disadvantaged by distance from resources, or in any other way.

I am quite surprised at the number of Conservatives who are violently opposed to any kind of government-run operation. It is true the Liberal party does it badly, but that does not mean government-run operations, under proper management, could not be well run. I think the first part of the sentence is admirable; we should employ sound business practices. You will remember the machinations of this government in order to raise finances on a number of occasions for Air Canada. It is a wonder it exists at all: it was a political practice, not a business practice.

I agree with the hon. member who said we now have good management for Air Canada in Mr. Taylor. He also said we have good management in Canadian National. I disagree with his view about Canadian National, but I agree that we have pretty good management now in Air Canada. I think the management now can run it whether it is a private company or a Crown corporation. What is important is how the government will provide the financing for the corporation—whether we lend money to it as a private company or a public company.

If I were the manager of Air Canada and I had to make a profit, it seems to me the logical way to do it would be to keep on boosting fares. But even I, who know nothing about business, know that as fares are boosted there will be fewer passengers. That happened when we raised the price of milk, and I suppose it happens with other commodities. There comes a time when the price is higher than people are willing to pay, so the competition wins the business. That is true with airlines as well. Socialists may have a solution that others do not have. We could eliminate the competition. That is what multinational corporations do.

The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) mentioned a number of airlines in the United States. But there are fewer now than a year ago, and next year there may be fewer still. They are becoming consolidated by various means. It is probably true that even the United States will only be able to support two or three major carriers. We could do that as well by nationalizing and putting them altogether. In that way we would get all the business and then decide how to run it efficiently.

I am not really suggesting that, Mr. Speaker, because there may be merit in having small carriers. I think they should come under Air Canada, however, for such things as reservations, raising capital to buy replacements, and so on, and there should be an orderly division of what airlines are to do in specific areas. For instance, Air Canada went to Sudbury and opposed the advent of Nordair. It also opposed Bradley, which is now First Air, and they have no intention of running that line themselves. If they do run it, it will be at a time when it is going to lose money, and that is not good business practice. That is just keeping both feet in the manger while not being able to get your head in to eat the hay.

I think Air Canada should be the bright spot in advertising Canada around the world. This would cost money, of course, if we are going to use it as a flagship of the nation, then we should encourage it in sound business practices. If it makes a profit, that is good; but let us not cut services, let us not cut safety factors or the things that have made it a good airline. It seems to me we are saying that if the board of directors does not make a profit, then it ought to resign because it has not fulfilled its main requirement, the "in particular" requirement of making a profit. That is not what I think is important. Having a good airline and servicing the people is important. Whether it makes a profit is inconsequential.

If you consider the way in which we raise the necessary money, it has never made a profit. I do not think an airline in the world that is operated as the flag ship airline makes a profit. I know of 20 or 30 that are highly subsidized, to the detriment of running the country. That is true of airlines that in the past have borrowed large planes from Great Britain and have operated at great loss.

I do not think a national airline has to make a profit, Mr. Speaker; I do not think hydro has to make a profit; I do not think garbage collectors have to make a profit; nor do I think the Post Office has to make a profit. These are services that we need and depend upon. The people would scream if any of these services were removed. We have to pay for them, and they are necessary. Not too many people in this country would want us to be without an airline.

I think the Minister of Transport will find that his conservatism is too much for the swing that is taking place in the west. He will find himself out-conservatizing the Conservatives in western Canada. I do not think Canadians travelling abroad would want to think that their airline was not the flagship airline. They would not substitute that for regional carriers or, in my opinion, for anything else. Canadian Pacific Airlines travels the world, yet it does not receive the adoration which the Canadian public appears to have lavished on Air Canada over the years. Nevertheless, we expect that this measure will cost money.

I agree entirely with the members of the committee who studied this bill, that Air Canada should be placed on a sound business footing. Never was an organization established in such a haphazard way as Trans-Canada Air Lines, which later became Air Canada. The Minister has tried to hide behind C. D. Howe, and I am sure C. D. Howe would not talk to him if he were here today. Just the same, C. D. Howe did not use business principles; he just made it happen. One day we had an airline. It was established under Canadian National and it could not be, and probably never would have been, a viable organization, given its initial financial basis.

Over the years things really did not change much. Its debt was transferred to Canadian National rather than carrying even a book debt. All kinds of machinations took place. This was bad business practice because it allowed management to do many things it should not have been allowed to do. The accounting system was poor. In addition, the airline could not even hire an auditor until the government, through its patronage structure, chose one for them, and then it was a considerable period of time before an audited report was submitted to parliament.

No one will disagree that Air Canada should be put on sound business principles and that this change is desirable, but our objection is not that. We say, never mind the service; never mind providing reasonably priced air tickets for Canadians to travel across Canada. Indeed, we are in great trouble, Mr. Speaker, because you can travel to Europe for less than it costs to go from here to Vancouver. If you are operating a national air line for Canadians, it seems to me it should be cheaper to travel across this country than to cross the ocean.

Air Canada has an excellent reputation for service, and this must be maintained in a way other than profit being the deciding factor. Therefore, I hope we can at least agree to remove the words "in particular" from this clause which provides that the main function of the board of directors is to chase and to anticipate profit for our national airline.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I had the good fortune to serve on the transport committee at the time the Air Canada bill was before it, and we discussed these matters thoroughly and completely over a period of a few weeks. It is rather unfortunate that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was not on that committee. He cannot be a member of every committee, of course, but it is unfortunate that he was not able to be with us when we discussed all these matters and the particular amendment which he has proposed. We spent considerable time on it. I think the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is to be commended for having proposed that amendment in the committee, with which most of us concurred. He should also be commended for the remarks he made today; I think he put the whole matter into proper perspective.

We can hardly compare Air Canada, a Crown corporation, with some of the other Crown corporations, such as the hydro utilities in the various provinces which were referred to by my hon. friend for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). In this case we are dealing with a corporation, a company, which is in competition with others. The hydro utilities are not necessarily in competition per se. The airlines are, and the competition is very stiff.

Air Canada is one of the greatest airlines in the world and is among the top eight or nine. It has been giving excellent service to various parts of the world and has a very good name. Those who have travelled with various other lines would agree that the service offered by Air Canada is good and that it is continually improving. This is particularly so since the present president took over the airline, as mentioned by a couple of members here today.

I am a little concerned, as was the committee, that by an amendment such as this we are trying to tie the hands of the president of the company so that it is unable to compete on equal ground with other airlines. I think that is a bad aspect of this amendment. Unfortunately, as soon as the word "profit" enters the picture, our socialist friends immediately become concerned. I do not mind the word "profit". I am happy to say that there are still a few of us who believe in the free enterprise system, and certainly I do not think that "profit" is a dirty word. Every company should be based on sound business principles and be ready to make a profit. If they are not ready to make a profit, then they should not be in business. Every other company with whom they compete is in business to make a profit.

This bill makes provision, in cases of an unprofitable operation, for the governor in council to instruct the directors of Air Canada to remedy the situation; for example, by subsidizing certain routes which are essential but which are not in themselves profitable. That is understandable and this is well provided for in other parts of the bill. This is why I do not understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre insisting that clause 7(1.1) be deleted so that the words "sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit" are removed.

It seems to me we cannot tie the hands of the people we have appointed to run Air Canada. If I remember correctly, there are in this bill about 28 places where the words "governor in council" appear. Reference was made to this in the committee hearings. It was suggested that each time the words "governor in council" appeared, the bureaucracy was entering the picture and trying to run the corporation. Many of us in the committee who believe in free enterprise were concerned about this aspect. We do not want the bureaucracy running a company such as Air Canada, because the bureaucracy already holds too much power in other Crown corporations. A bill will be coming before the House before very long which will try to control or restrict the power of the bureaucracy within Crown corporations. Some of us have been suggesting for a number of years that Crown corporations should be more answerable to the House of Commons, for example.

I conclude simply by saying that I urge all members in the House to vote against the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

● (1642)

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I preface my brief remarks by saying it is nice to see all the private enterprisers coming out of the woodwork this afternoon in connection with this amendment to the legislation. We are talking about, and I sometimes think that members of the House of Commons go off on a tangent, the principles under which we would like to see the board of Air Canada operate. The amendment states:

—the board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

However, we still find that our socialist friends in the House of Commons get very upset when we talk about an intent with regard to sound business practices. We on this side have given general agreement to the Air Canada Act. As the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) stated, the airline certainly appears headed in the right direction at the present time, with the new president and chief executive officers. For that all Canadians should certainly be happy and thankful.

There are a few things we do not particularly like in the proposed legislation. We feel it would be of benefit to the Canadian travelling public if the appointments of the no more than 13 people to the board of directors were made on a regional basis. At the present time, many things are dealt with or looked at in the context of regional make-up. If there are to be 13 appointed to the board of directors, they should certainly be looked at in the same way.

I may be mistaken, but I believe at the present time there are four people on the board of directors from Quebec, two from Ontario, one from Nova Scotia, and one from western Canada. I could be wrong, but I believe that is the present make-up. It would be fair and proper to say that if we are looking at a total of 13 people on the board of directors of Air Canada, we could consider three western Canada, four from Ontario, four from Quebec, and possibly two from the maritimes. This would give us roughly the kind of split we have in population. If that were the case, people from the regions would have far greater input into the regional problems which affect Air Canada from time to time.

I wish to go on record as stating that I feel the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is nonsensical. For example, everyone in business in this country should employ businesslike practices and, not necessarily make but should contemplate making a profit as one of the goals to which they adhere. It is totally irresponsible and ridiculous for the New Democratic Party to propose the kind of amendment they have. At various times, in various parts of Canada, we find that the word "profit", or even the contemplation of profit, is considered dirty. That is ridiculous. I do not think, in all seriousness, that the NDP mean what they say. If they do, my guess is that the NDP will come back with a significantly reduced number after the next federal election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) spoke earlier this afternoon. He indicated the kind of problems that governments have, and certainly the federal government is no stranger to these problems, when forming, running and operating Crown corporations or arm's length corporations which have a tie, or are under the jurisdiction of the government when this, at least intent, of profit is totally disregarded. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre said, and rightfully so, that we in Manitoba are looking at in the neighbourhood of a $71 million deficit this year for the same reasons the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is trying to strike out the words "sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit." What we are seeing is a reflection of the thinking that took place in Manitoba being reflected by the NDP here in the House of Commons.

We are generally against the proposed amendment. We will be voting for the way the bill stands at this time. We welcome the opportunity to investigate, talk with, talk at and talk about Air Canada. It has been a controversial subject in the House, certainly over the seven years I have been here. I see no reason why it will not be controversial in the future.

One area where there will be controversy with regard to Air Canada is the decision that will presumably be handed down by the Canadian Transport Commission in the not too distant future. That is on the whole question of domestic charters and the rates being charged in Canada vis-à-vis those being paid by Canadians who travel to other parts of the world. There are questions on both sides of this very important question which is attracting public attention more and more all the time. I certainly feel that the decision which will be rendered by the CTC in, presumably, a relatively short time will be a landmark decision. It will be very important, regardless of the way in which the CTC rules on the issue. Hopefully, we will have a full discussion in the House of Commons on that time.

I close by saying that Air Canada has done a reasonably good job. It appears it will do a good job in the future. I urge the members of the NDP either to vote against their House leader or have him stand up and strike his motion from the record. As I said before, it is nonsensical and has no place in this legislation.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. For a while this afternoon I thought this was a mutual admiration society. Many fine remarks were made about the chief executive officer of Air Canada who, incidentally, is a native of my constituency. It proves that we send from the maritime provinces some of the best administrators in Canada. Possibly a maritimer should head CN as well. I do not agree with any of the remarks that have been made about CN management. It needs a really good kick to straighten it out and to bring it up to proper status.

With regard to the amendment, let there be no doubt that I am a true free enterpriser. I believe in making a profit. However, this service, Air Canada, is a public utility. It is time that governments and the people of this nation realized that railways, Air Canada and other transportation facilities should, above all, be providing service. The words in the clause of the bill which have been referred to read:

> In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the board shall have due regard to sound business principles—

If it stopped there, it would accomplish what is right and proper for any Crown agency. However, it adds these words:

> —and in particular the contemplation of profit.

"Contemplation" goes further than "intent". Contemplation of a profit means more than intent to make a profit. Besides, these particular words conflict with other provisions which say that if you do not make a profit, you can go to the governor in council and maybe get a subsidy. If you have to do it the way Canadian National does it, by making application for discontinuance of service, it is pretty awful. I fear that putting in these words would only give the directors of Air Canada an excuse for further reducing the quality of air service in the maritimes, as well as increasing fares and other changes. In the maritime provinces, particularly in my constituency, scheduling and service are already very rugged; they are terrible. If you are going to Montreal, you have to get up in the middle of the night. I am talking about people who live in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

I repeat, I am a true enterpriser. You ask the tax collector. He knows how much money I pay to this bloody country. It is blood money, I can tell you. We praise Claude Taylor, the chief executive officer or the president of Air Canada, but he will not always be there. Maybe one day the government will get someone from another part of the country to fill that post, someone who is not so concerned about the situation in the maritimes.

Mr. Peters: They will get rid of him.

Mr. Jones: As the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) says, if he is good they will get rid of him. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to have the courage to get up and say, "We shall delete those words about the contemplation of profit. They do not mean anything."

Mr. Hogan: We are suffering from this corporation right now in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Jones: It is only wise to delete those words "in contemplation of profit". Air Canada is a public utility and each of us is entitled to service from the corporation. We in the maritimes are just not getting it. We are not getting anything from the government except a hand-out here or a hand-out there. It is like Hallowe'en—trick or treat.

An hon. Member: Did you get your trick last night, or your treat?

Mr. Jones: I got both. I do not object to the word "profit". I am a free enterpriser. I do not appreciate members on the other side referring to all of us in this part of the chamber as socialists. I do not know they are all socialists in the NDP. I am not; I am a free enterpriser. I know that a buck is a buck. But I wonder whether all the members of this House know that a buck is a buck. The people of Canada do not seem to know it yet, or they do not seem to realize it.

There are other words in the bill which conflict with this proposal. The minister and others make use of a passage in the bill which sets up an obvious fiction, that you have to declare a discontinuance of service and apply for a subsidy. It makes only good sense to take out the word "profit". If you are going to put it in, put in words like "in contemplation of profit and service". That is what Air Canada should be concerned about.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I must say I find myself very much in agreement with the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) with regard to this bill. I want to make one or two comments about one or two of the remarks made from the other side, particularly by Conservative members and especially by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie).

I believe there is a very strong feeling on the other side that we would be better off without Air Canada and without Canadian National. It seems to me we have had a constant struggle in committee even to hold on to what we have in terms of Air Canada and Canadian National. I notice that the hon. member took a long swipe at the government, talking about expenditures going up 350 per cent: I believe that was the figure he used. It seems to me there are too many of these loose figures being used in the House. I do not deny that the figure is correct, but these figures, taking them as they are, really do not tell the story.

In this country, taking a fixed, 1970 dollar—in other words, a non-inflated dollar—and leaving out inflation as a factor, means that personal consumption since 1968, the year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took over the reins of government, rose by 52 percent. In the period from 1970 to 1976, the gross national product increased by 42 per cent. But the cost of government services rose by only 41 per cent, on the basis of fixed dollars. So government spending has not been out of line when one discounts the inflation factor.

An hon. Member: That is the same speech as you gave last week.

Mr. McRae: I will give it again and again, because this is an important matter. If we blame the government for everything and we use figures which are not correct, because there are other factors, then we in government have to keep saying it over and over again so the Canadian people will understand that governments cannot take responsibility for all the problems of this country.

I am very concerned about where Air Canada is going. Without doubt, we have in this country one of the finest airlines in the world. Air Canada has to be one of the half dozen finest airlines in the world. It is a fine airline because it serves not only the large communities of this country but also the medium-sized communities. It does things well. It is very important to the hon. member for Moncton—

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual discussions and I understand there is agreement in the House to an order that if any votes are required on the report stage of Bill C-3, they should stand adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at 3 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You mean, deferred.

Mr. Lang: Deferred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, namely, public bills, private bills, and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

FINANCE

MEASURE RESPECTING COST OF PUBLISHING PUBLIC REPORTS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved that Bill C-201, respecting the cost of publishing public reports, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

● (1702)

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill we are discussing this afternoon derives from a feeling in the public sector that there is certain waste and inefficiency in the printing and publication of documents. Certainly there is a definite lack of communication among the public service, politicians and the public. That lack of communication cannot be attributed to the number of documents published by the various departments and agencies. Part of the problem in the offices of members of parliament is the number of documents issued. It is absolutely impossible to even scan the material which crosses our desks every day.

The bill I have introduced comes about because of a comment of a constituent, a doctor and a professor at MacDonald campus of McGill University, who drew attention to some legislation which exists in the United States. There were two objectives there: one was to publish the cost of all public documents, and the other one was to ensure annual verification of mailing lists to ensure that everyone who wanted documents would receive them at the correct price, and those who no longer wanted them would so indicate. My constituent pointed out that the identification of cost created a public awareness before public documents were wasted.

The explanatory note in my bill reads as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to ensure more adequate cost accountability in the production and dissemination of government and other public reports.

For the benefit of those persons reading Hansard, I should like to review briefly the four short paragraphs which form this bill. Of course the first paragraph is the title of the bill, "Public Reports Cost Control Act". The second paragraph attempts to define the word "report". It reads as follows:

"report" means any annual, biennial, regular or special report or document of which at least 500 copies are printed and that may be distributed to the public.

The third paragraph deals with the statement of cost and the purpose of the report. It reads as follows:

> Every person making a report that is intended to be submitted to or laid before parliament or either of the Houses of Parliament shall include in the report under the imprint or catalogue number a statement of the purpose and cost of producing and publishing the report.

Also, this paragraph includes the definition of the word "person" as including a minister of the Crown, a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act, a Crown corporation, a department and a commission, board or tribunal. The fourth paragraph of this short bill deals with the criteria in determination of cost, and of course is simply an assurance that all costs in connection with the publication should be taken into account. It reads as follows:

> For the purpose of determining the cost of producing and publishing a report, there shall be taken into account any special expenditure for additional salaries, equipment, materials or services made necessary for the formulation, composition, printing, publication and distribution of the report.

Persons issuing documents should know—and if they do not, they will be forced to find out—what moneys they are going to be spending in publishing a report. I would assume, if there is any kind of efficiency in any department, that those costs are known in advance, so that there are no additional costs in ascertaining what the figures are. The public should be aware of the cost of every document they receive. This short bill would attempt to make sure that the department is aware of what moneys they are spending; that they communicate that information to the public at large; and that the public will be aware of the amount of money that is being spent in communicating to them the various reports and forms of communication sent out by the various departments.

With those few explanatory remarks in mind, I hope hon. members will see fit to pass this bill on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, the private member's bill proposed by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is, I am sure, based on noble intentions. As everyone is acutely aware, we are in a time of economic restraint throughout the government of Canada. The growth in the public service has been reduced to under 1 per cent, and the over-all man-year allotment for many departments and agencies of the federal government has been drastically reduced. This is an important part of our over-all economic policy. Coupled with the efforts of the Anti-Inflation Board, the Canadian government's personal austerity program is having a real effect on the economy. This bill proposes the following:

> Every person making a report that is intended to be submitted to or laid before parliament or either of the Houses of Parliament shall include in the report under the imprint or catalogue number a statement of the purpose and cost of producing and publishing the report.

This is, by itself, not a great concern. However, the hon. member goes further, and again I quote directly from the bill which reads as follows:

> For the purpose of determining the cost of producing and publishing a report, there shall be taken into account any special expenditure for additional salaries, equipment, materials or services made necessary for the formulation, composition, printing, publication and distribution of the report.

I shudder to think of the added cost that such a proposal, if enacted, would mean to the taxpayers of this nation. This bill is a far-reaching, more or less omnibus type of bill because it is meant to apply to every document, report or other like publication that is to be presented to either of the two chambers of this parliament. Surely it is easy to see that the sheer volume of annual reports, background papers, etc., which are brought before the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada will mean substantial expenditures above and beyond the real cost of publication, if this bill is made law. Not only will the taxpayers carry the production and publication costs, but also they will have to carry the cost of the additional staff required to carry out the mandate of this legislation.

There are in excess of several score of government agencies, boards, commissions, etc., as well as over 30 separate ministries in the federal government. In order that this legislation is to be fully enacted and implemented, the additional staff requirement of the public service will be in excess of several hundreds, possibly thousands, of people. With each person receiving a salary commensurate to the gravity of his or her duties, it is not inconceivable to foresee increased expenditures of several million dollars.

The hon. member for Vaudreuil wants the cost per copy to be calculated to include such items as equipment, materials and additional services that are the result of the publications production. It is important to note that this is to apply to every stage of production, from the cost of the original thought process involved in the publication's beginning to the final distribution cost at the end. Without doubt, Mr. Speaker, the criteria for determination of the cost of publishing reports, as outlined in this bill, will result in the expenditure of many more dollars than are likely to be lost due to faulty financial accounting in the publishing sections of the various federal government departments, agencies and other bodies.

It will come as no surprise to hon. members that within each department of the federal government, and on the staff of every board, agency, Crown corporation, commission and other like bodies, is a person or persons directly responsible for the proper administration and direction of government funds. The publication sections of all of these bodies are also subject to similar scrutiny. Certainly there can be no misunderstanding in this regard. The mechanisms are already in place to regulate and to ensure proper financial management. This bill will merely duplicate existing practices and procedures. I cannot see usefulness in duplication.

This bill is certainly too wide in scope and in intent. In the final analysis, it is not going to save the Canadian taxpayer any money, and it is very likely that, if enacted, it will add to the publication cost of the federal government, a cost which will be borne by the Canadian workingman, the Canadian taxpayer. It will also result in an inevitable increase in the number of public service employees. In short, Mr. Speaker, this bill, which I am certain was drafted with the intent to save the Canadian taxpayers' money, will result in additional expenditure of more of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

It is on these grounds that I cannot support this legislation, but I would like to commend the hon. member for Vaudreuil for his efforts in this regard. Unfortunately, I find that the costs of the implementation and the direction of this proposal are simply too prohibitive.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I was detained a few moments ago and did not have the benefit of listening to the arguments put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn).

An hon. Member: A copy is in the research office.

Mr. Collenette: I am sure that the points he made were very valid, but I detected from what he said that he is against the bill. This is the second night in a row that I have risen in private members' hour to support my colleague, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) in what I consider to be a very worth-while suggestion incorporated in bill form. As we can see, the purpose of the bill is to ensure a more adequate cost accountability in the production and dissemination of government documents and reports.

Since I came to Ottawa three years ago, I have been struck with the amount of paperwork that comes across a member's desk. In fact, I have here a few publications which I can show to the cameras, if they want it. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I am just being facetious. Some of the material that comes across our desks is very expensively produced, not just the photographs but the other art work and writing, and I am sure that much money is needlessly wasted in the dissemination of these various reports. It seems to me that we are entering a new phase in our society where the public is at last concerned about where all their dollars go. I think it is safe to say that in the post-war years we have experienced an expanding role of government, and certainly I have supported the expanding role of government to bring very much needed social services to the majority of Canadians.

It has been inevitable, I think, that the role of government in society has been expanded. But along with this expansion has come the inevitable growth of the bureaucracy to support the activities of increased government intervention in society. As a result we have seen, perhaps, that the real accounting of government has not been as proficient as it should be. This has been brought out, I believe, in the reports of the Auditor General going back a number of years. Certainly, the most recent Auditor General was quite critical of government spending. I see one of my colleagues in the opposition chuckling with glee at my position. It is certainly not an anti-government position. I think it is incumbent on members on both sides of the House to ensure that the people of Canada get full value for the tax dollars that are spent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You are jeopardizing your chance to become a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Collenette: I did not hear all the arguments against the bill advanced by my colleague, the hon. member for Kitchener, but I understand that one of the basic arguments from the government's point of view is that the enactment of this legislation would perhaps create needless duplication and would not be in the best interests of the public. But from my experience on the Hill, I feel that it would be in the interests of the House and in the interests of the people of Canada if members on both sides allowed this bill to go to committee after second reading.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I, like the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette), stand in my place for the second time in as many days this week to speak on a bill that has been put forward by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I should start by complimenting the hon. member for bringing to the attention of the House last night not only the motion regarding education, but the problem tonight which has struck me probably as much as, if not more than, any other problem since I came to this place.

From the time of my arrival at the House it has become more and more painfully obvious that a single person cannot keep pace with the volume of material, the reports upon reports, the summaries of reports, and the two-page documents describing reports, that come across a member's desk day after day. Indeed, one is struck, as well, as the hon. member for York East pointed out, with the quality of the reports and one asks oneself what they must have cost. I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, as other members of the House, have seen from time to time the beautiful, glossy prints, the heavy bond paper and the photographs and wondered about their cost.

I am satisfied that not all of them are in the public domain or come from the public archives, but indeed we have artistry which requires a high cost to be incurred in order to make use of these documents.

We find very much difficulty using the process of the estimates to determine from a department what the cost of a particular item was, for the reason that it becomes, if not overtly, then by reason of intent or by sheer necessity, somehow lost in the figures which represent the publication costs of that department. Indeed, those costs might be almost irretrievable as a result of having been produced by an agency of a particular department.

However, one becomes struck with what the cost of those documents must be, and the unfortunate thing is that a number of them never really achieve the end for which they were produced, which is to communicate the ideas contained in them. All of us in this place recognize the problem of having too much on our desks to be able to make valid use of the materials, and as a consequence we become selective readers. It becomes almost a painful process to have these beautiful documents put before us, recognizing full well that they are probably going to be selectively read, scanned and then disposed of.

Although I support the essence of what the hon. member for Vaudreuil is trying to do with this bill, I become very concerned—notwithstanding the comments of the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Flynn) that we have a bill which may in a sense be too wide—that it is not wide enough, for at the end of the process we might have the total cost of production of a document which might not be sufficient to cover the problems of too many being produced or ineffective use of the document notwithstanding its limited cost. I think, for instance, of the number of one-page documents which are produced by a Multilith, or what have you, which would be of very limited cost on a per item basis or on a global basis. However, they are totally ineffectual in terms of their use, and I wonder how one could in a bill such as this or any other bill contemplate, on the spur of the moment, achieving the possibility of having that kind of effective control.

I think I would be delinquent if I did not point out to the House that I have noticed, notwithstanding all the bills I have described in terms of cost of production, that given the promotion by the government of the day of the idea of restraint, the volume of costly productions crossing my desk seems to be decreasing. The volumes, publications and works which are now coming to us appear more and more to be the type of thing that I have before me, "Policy and Guidelines on Canadian Government Publishing", produced by the Treasury Board. It has cardboard covers with plastic backs and is in simple and readable, yet inexpensive, type. More and more, this seems to be the format we are using. Therefore, I cannot but believe that the process of restraint is working its way down through the various ministries and departments and that, indeed, we are getting away from expensively bound and produced documents. Perhaps even without a bill of this type we are moving toward the intention of the hon. member.

That being said, let me return to some of the problems which concern me. We hear in this House constantly—not just from the other side but also from hon. members who sit on this side—that if and when publications are produced by a particular ministry, they should find their way into this House and on to the table at the earliest possible date. One of the greatest concerns I have about this bill is that it might involve another problem which a ministry or agency would have to solve before a document could find its way into the House.

We have heard about difficulties with translation and with having printing done. If we are now to add another obstacle, whereby the printing having been done and the translation having been completed, we then have to have departments going through the exercise of determining the ultimate cost, whatever that might be, I become gravely concerned about how long it might take before a document ever finds its way to the table in this House.

I say that realizing full well that many of the documents which find their way to the table now do not have their true cost, actual cost and final cost established for as long as six months after their production. It takes that much to draw back from the department the cost of translation, the cost of photography and the cost of publication. If we are to add another six months to the already long period of time it takes for these documents to get to us so that we might deal with them, I think the process will bog down completely, and I am very concerned that a bill such as this, in the terms in which it appears, should go forward to committee if for no other reason than that.

I think that the ill we are trying to cure should be cured. I do not accept the position of the hon. member for Kitchener when he says he is concerned that we are adding more cost, but I do believe, with the hon. member for Vaudreuil, that if we have responsible ministries, they should know before they publish what are the estimated costs of the productions. They should have general, ballpark figures, and they should be committing themselves, under a proper budgetary process, to bringing the productions within their budgets.

I suppose the difficulty in what I am saying is knowing within a reasonable timeframe that in fact you have succeeded in so doing. One has only to think about the possibility of publications becoming popular to the public as well as to this House and to the other place, and in the event of their popularity, a run on documents which require further printing and publication. Would we then get into difficulty, where we really would not know whether the documents could be brought forward? Should we estimate that they are going to be popular? Having so estimated popularity, should we run an over production and then run the risk of coming before the House having spent too much money on documents which did not sell? I am concerned that we might experience something like that. There are difficulties which are almost impossible to overcome at this early stage. How does one project how many should be published? I think actual costs are very difficult to estimate at an early stage of production.

I have pointed out some of my concerns, and I am certain the hon. member has given this matter more thought than I have had the opportunity to do so far. I am concerned, however, that this House might reject the idea, for some of the reasons put forward by the hon. member for Kitchener. I do not believe that we are adding an excessive amount to the cost of government by this particular concept. As I indicated a few moments ago, I think there must be budgetary restraints. There must be publication budgets to which ministries feel compelled to adhere before these items are published.

I think, as well, that there must already be people in ministries whose sole responsibility is to see that publications come within their budget. I find it difficult to believe that one would have to enter into an exercise of creating a whole new administrative and economic tier in ministries in order to get the kind of control which it is obvious the hon. member for Vaudreuil seeks with this bill.

In short, I do not believe that the bill proposed is too wide but, rather, that it may not be wide enough because it does not really deal with what we see happening around here. I am terribly concerned that we might be adding a time problem to already delayed bills and other documents that we would find unacceptable in this House.

● (1732)

I am concerned, although I suppose gratified to some extent that we are already taking this matter under our wing and that there is a response by ministries to the pressures of restraint. I am satisfied that although the concept of the bill is good, it needs more time, more thinking, in order to encompass these concerns I have tried to express, before we send it to committee.

May I again thank the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) for allowing me the opportunity to express something that has concerned me for a long time, and may I compliment him for bringing two very important matters before the House within two days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on the bill. I think it is fair to say that everyone in the House would agree with the concept that we should have accurate cost accountability in the production of the various papers and information distributed by the government. As the previous speaker mentioned, we get some overly spectacular documents from the government and the ministries. Many are expensive and exaggerated.

I am sure we all have days when we look at this stuff and realize that it is produced at a high cost for a limited audience. On the other hand, one of the great costs that is not addressed in the bill is the cost to this House of Commons and committees of answering questions. I am told that it sometimes costs as much as $5,000 to produce an answer. The information sought is readily available to members for many of these questions that are put on the order paper. I am dismayed when I think of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act passed in this House in the last session and the number of questions that were put regarding it when many of the answers were readily obtainable at the parliamentary library.

An examination of this bill gives me the impression that it might cost more to administer it than would be saved by publishing the accounts referred to. One more group of people would be required to produce each set of figures and this cost would go on and on whilst the group grew grander and larger. It too would probably produce a report, another piece of expensive literature, that would end up in the wastebasket along with the mountains of paper that come in all the time.

Like all other hon. members I am sure, when I get one of these expensive three or four-coloured productions on a subject that has a limited audience, I wonder at the expense involved. There are the three or four coloured books issued on such things as the spawning habits of the Atlantic salmon. But of course, members are guilty and some ask as many as 50 or 100 questions, the answers to which are readily available to them but which will cost large sums of money to print out. Referring again to the book published in both languages on the spawning habits of the Atlantic salmon, I have a copy in my office because the photographs are spectacular. There is a description of the Atlantic salmon proceeding up the rivers on the east coast to spawn and if I remember correctly it also describes how salmon on the west coast proceed up the creeks on Vancouver Island. It would be interesting to know how many people looked at that book which I think was prepared for a fisheries conference. It must have cost a lot of money.

● (1742)

An hon. Member: Perhaps we did it for the salmon too.

Mr. Stollery: As the hon. member says, perhaps we did that for some salmon. Somewhere in a river there must be a "salmon library" which is filled with small and medium-sized salmon which study these books in order to learn something about their birthright.

I know other members are waiting to speak on this most important issue, and in conclusion let me say that, although it is hard to disagree with the purpose of this bill, it does seem to present more problems and to raise more questions than it answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Alan G. Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and an honour for me to have the opportunity to address the House on a piece of legislation tabled by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who is much dedicated to his work here in Ottawa. I do not know any other member who is as dedicated and sincere in carrying on his responsibilities in the capital of Canada.

[English]

I think the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) touches upon an issue which is becoming increasingly a concern of Canadians in all walks of life, namely, the cost of government and government services in general across this country. It really does not matter whether we are talking about the federal level, the provincial level, the municipal level, various government agencies with which the average consumer must interface from time to time, universities, boards of education, hospitals, even down to fancier than necessary food wrappings which one finds in the supermarket, in general the consumer is constantly being faced with mounting concern over what his dollar, whether it be tax dollar or purchase dollar, can buy.

This may sound a long way from the issue of paper and cost accounting of paper used in government, but I suggest that it is not. The issue that is raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil is in a very real sense a microcosm of this whole problem. The hon. member for York East (Mr. Stollery) made reference a little earlier to recent Auditor General reports. The subject under discussion is an extremely difficult one for individual members, I suggest even for the Auditor General, to come to grips with.

The one thing that hits you immediately, Mr. Speaker, about government departments today, regardless of whether they are at the federal or provincial level, or whether it is some type of government agency or service—this is true of the large corporation in the private sector as well—is the tremendous amount of paper of one kind or another that is generated in the ordinary conduct of business. Sometimes this paper is very fancy paper, coloured, expensively printed, and done up in elaborate binders. At other times it can be in very simple form. The point is that this is just one other area of use for which, in one way or another, the consumer must foot the bill.

In some ways it would probably be very difficult for the government or any of its agencies to put a dollar stamp on each order it might process, as this bill suggests. On the other hand, I think what is being proposed is something which might be investigated a little more carefully by various levels of government, perhaps starting with our own, namely, an attempt to cost out various programs which are being undertaken. This may result in some very large figures.

The problem which I think some of us face is that in the past we have been members of committees which have examined expenditure proposals and have seen a program which might, for sake of argument, cost $10 million. I have been on committees with the hon. member for Vaudreuil and I have discussed this question. I think it is very difficult for members to analyse this $10 million and to ascertain just what the money is for. There are paper costs, reports and so on which are all basically hidden, as they must be. After all, you cannot be faced with large lists of items which include the number of paper clips being used, for example.

Nevertheless, the point remains that this $10 million cost represents tremendous value even though it will not figure, as it were, in the actual production of the department concerned to the extent that you can call the service being provided its production. The money is going into overhead, the overhead involved in producing reports for someone to read, on which are based further reports which analyse the situation, and so on further up the line, with various other mini-reports circulating while major reports are in process of preparation.

I honestly do not know, Mr. Speaker, how one comes to grips with this question and I am not sure that this is the answer. However, what the hon. member points up is something which should be followed through by the appropriate agencies, and presumably by Treasury Board, so that the ordinary taxpayer is constantly thought of in determining the kind of overhead that is associated with government services. As I say, this overhead can vary from paper to office supplies, to office space, to furnishings, and all the rest of it.

The average consumer in Canada today is not convinced that there is a general feeling of cost consciousness among the various levels of government, universities, school boards, or organizations which do not have to worry about a bottom line or have to meet a payroll which is contingent upon the profit they make. The ordinary consumer does worry about how much organizations determine the amount to be spent by way of overhead. I suggest they will worry more and more in the future, and will insist upon more cost consciousness throughout all these kinds of organizations.

[Mr. Martin.]

This bill requires each printing order of more than 500 copies to be costed as such, the total amount and the per copy amount. Knowing the way government bureaucracies tend to operate, this would probably mean that someone would have to say; "We will have to hire a number of extra people to do this for us". I can see this situation spreading throughout each department, each bureau, as it were, and this in itself would create a problem in terms of implementing the program. For this reason I am not completely in support of the detail that the hon. member has put forward, but I very much support the general thrust of this bill.

I hope that somehow or other, as we grapple with the larger items of government expenditure and worry whether we are spending hundreds of millions of dollars in the right place, groups and agencies will also worry about the lesser amounts which, when added together, do not take very long to amount to several million dollars.

● (1752)

In conclusion, I know the hon. member brings this concept forth with the utmost sincerity and a deliberation of his point of real intent to try to pinpoint a concern that more and more Canadians need to have, including members of parliament, in the various costs associated with making the whole governmental process work. To that extent, whether this bill moves beyond this chamber or not, I think he has served a very real purpose. I hope the appropriate persons will take the message back to the departments that are in a position to do something about this very real area of concern.

[Translation]

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues and once again congratulate the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) who has drawn once more the attention of hon. members on a matter of interest to himself and his constituents.

[English]

I would like to say, as previous members have stated, that the question in this bill raises many other questions. In other words, should the cost of a public document put out by a government department become the main criterion in deciding whether such a document should be published?

A document may interest very few persons because it is a highly technical and very complicated publication. Therefore it would have a very narrow distribution. It may be very important as a reference document. The cost of each such document would appear very high related to other documents, pamphlets or booklets which had a very wide distribution. Such a technical document, while only for certain scientific groups, may have major repercussions on the way of life and future of Canadian citizens. That is one objection I have with regard to publishing the cost of such a document.

Printers will often quote a certain price for a stated number of publications. Because they then have the plates and the staff is trained to reprint a pamphlet, there will be a reduction in cost on further orders. A first run may cost "X" number of dollars for 5,000 copies. Because the plates have been made and the machines are set up, a second, third, fourth or fifth printing will cost less. Therefore, how could you quote a cost of any government or private publication? For 100,000 pamphlets you may have a 25 per cent cost compared with that for only 10,000 in the first run. I am told this happens often, not only with government publications but publications printed for private companies or individuals.

If a pamphlet becomes very popular and there is a heavy demand, the publication will be reordered. The cost per unit will keep going down. Under those conditions it will be impossible to print on the cover of a document the cost per unit. You do not know whether you will be ordering 10,000 or whether this will increase to 100,000.

Government departments make a serious study not only of the cost of publishing a certain text, pamphlet or catalogue, but its importance to the general public. Decisions are not taken lightly. As others pointed out, within each department a careful study is made of the cost of a certain document. They consider whether the importance of a pamphlet, booklet or catalogue should be the main criterion, or its usefulness to the Canadian citizen. They consider the businessmen, farmers, civil servants, professionals and students who would make use of it to develop and improve a particular field of interest.

What is more important, the benefit of a certain publication to everyone interested in reading, studying or using it, or the cost? As I said before, it could have a very small field of interest or a very wide field. Even though it may appear important to a very small group, it could affect every citizen in Canada. The cost of such a booklet may appear astronomical compared to that of a publication which has a run of hundreds of thousands.

As the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) pointed out, costs of answering questions placed on the order paper by members of parliament are very high. Some questions are very extensive. However, who would deny the right of a member of parliament on behalf of his constituents if he feels a subject is of sufficient interest to put such questions on the order paper? It may not appear important to other members, but it may be an important question for his constituents.

If every time a question was answered in the House the cost of answering would be stated as $3,000, $5,000 or $50,000, depending on the complexity of the question, it would become extremely difficult. Some questions take civil servants many weeks to compile an answer. Should the cost of answering be a criterion when questions are placed on the order paper?

In conclusion, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for bringing this matter to our attention.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INDUSTRY—ALLEGED MOVEMENT OF INVESTMENT MONEY TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on October 19 I questioned the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) with regard to the movement of investment money and businesses to the United States. He provided me with a most unsuitable answer, stating that we enjoy in Canada complete freedom of investment in a free country. That is not the answer I was seeking. There is no way we can cure unemployment, or that Canada can expand, with the mass exodus of businesses and investment money to the United States.

I see the minister is in the chamber. I hope his answer will not be based on the Foreign Investment Review Agency report which reached my office today. It contains the most mixed up civil service jargon that I have ever seen in my life on figures on investment. I hope I will get a more satisfactory answer than that.

I am concerned, and I am sure many Canadians are, when we read articles like "New York Woos Canadians in Ottawa", "United States holding seminars here in Canada to assist in encouraging businesses to move to the United States". We read articles like this: "United States firms shy away from investment in Canada". Here is a report out of Washington.

Worried by a sluggish economy, political uncertainty and a devaluing dollar, United States firms have sliced increases in their planned investment in Canada to $380 million from $804 million during the course of this year, a U.S. Commerce Department survey shows.

I wish we could obtain statistics of this type in Canada. We have to rely on the United States for this information. Further, in the Ottawa Journal this week we read an article headed: "Canada Losing Business Grip". It reads in part:

A United States business said Thursday Canada is losing its grip on business and has only a short time to improve the situation.

John Reardon, chamber of commerce manager in Niagara Falls, N.Y., told a Chamber of Commerce meeting here today that investment money previously spent in Canada is now being kept in the U.S.

I should also like to refer to a recent article in the Winnipeg Free Press. This is based on statistical information compiled by a financial expert. The headline is: "$40 Million Seen Lost to Manitoba; Finance Expert Says Clients Investing Outside Province Will Cost 4,000 Jobs." To some extent this trend should be stopped with the change in provincial government which came about a few weeks ago. The political climate has improved 100 per cent in Manitoba since then.

I should also like to refer to the November edition of Quest, which I hope the minister has read. There is an article in it entitled "The Unpatriotic Investor" and it begins with the comment:

> The true north is still strong and free. Only it's moving south of the border. The hard facts on how you may be better off investing your money out of the country.

This is a very interesting article. It is all about uncertainty in Canada and the problems created by successive Liberal governments for business and investment in this country.

I heard with great interest the speech which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) made in Toronto yesterday in which he suggested that the business community should bite the bullet. I am suggesting that it is the minister who should bite the bullet and do something about all this investment money and all these businesses moving south of the border. We cannot cure unemployment in the face of this sort of trend, and a trend like this cannot be stopped overnight. Something is radically wrong in Canada and it is the responsibility of the government and of the minister to take immediate action. If the United States can hold seminars in Ottawa to move Canadian businesses to the United States, the Canadian government can hold seminars and find out what has to be done to stop businesses and investment money leaving this country.

I should like to read some statistical information for the minister's benefit. This was compiled by Peter Henry Jerch & Associates, and it covers 42 Canadian smaller and medium-sized active manufacturing and service enterprises. Just 12 were looking for acquisitions in Canada only.

Incidentally, the information given here about these 42 Canadian businesses implies a loss of between 4,300 and 13,000 jobs to Canadians. Moreover, this is information from only one consultant firm. They go on to say:

> Fifteen thought they would consider a further investment or acquisition in Canada as a second alternative, which suggests that reason tells them to go elsewhere but that they still tend to be optimistic despite all their complaints. However, 30 of the 42 are either actively looking in the U.S. or have already made one or more acquisition or investment decisions there. These 42 are, incidentally, a fair and representative sample of the average successful Canadian business enterprise. Together they are likely to spend, directly and indirectly, from a low of $63 million to a high of $116 million in their invesments and acquisitions over the next few years. Only between $7 million to $19 million are definitely scheduled for Canada, with the remainder going to the U.S. These aggressive firms know what they are talking about. They currently receive about $9 million annually for export sales. Which means that if they establish a subsidiary, joint venture or the like in the U.S., within the next couple of years they will expend, in investment or acquisition funds, realistically about $90 million. If you then consider that an additional $40 million will not be coming back, the loss to Canada of even this small sample is about $130 million, providing of course that their original Canadian plant stays here. While there may not be as much of a loss to the Canadian government in tax revenue—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed to a problem that Canada has, and I am glad that he is aware of it. I will not dispute his figures, but he complained about not being able to receive accurate figures. I am always amused, to some extent, by the fact that people always believe some other government's figures but they rarely believe their own government's figures.

Mr. McKenzie: That is understandable.

Mr. Horner: Perhaps I should set down a few figures for the hon. member. The actual Canadian net direct investment flow to the United States in the past 12 months, from July, 1976, to June, 1977, was $313 million, and not $627 million as the hon. member suggested in his original question.

In fact Canadian direct investment flow to the United States has been declining recently and is considerably lower than the average between 1973 and 1975. I should like to refer to the figures for the past number of years.

In 1971 the Canadian net direct investment flow into the United States was $122 million, in 1972 it was $149 million, in 1973 it was $453 million, in 1974 it was $482 million, in 1975 it was $454 million, in 1976 it was $234 million, and from July, 1976, to June, 1977, it was $313 million. Therefore that indicates that in recent years there has been a decline. We are well aware that there have been some causes for the recent increase in money flowing into the United States.

Mr. Epp: I wonder why.

Mr. Horner: I will give the hon. member some of the reasons why.

Mr. McKenzie: You only have three minutes left.

Mr. Horner: In recent years we have seen the Government of Canada purchase a potash company from American interests. That money flowed back into the United States. It did not stay in Canada. That was not an act by this government. It was not an act that this government could even stop. It certainly had the net effect of discouraging investments within this country.

Petro-Can bought Atlantic Richfield shares for $340 million. If the hon. member has been following the actions of Atlantic Richfield, in recent years it had to withdraw from participation within the Canadian oil industry.

Mr. McKenzie: Who owns Petro-Can?

Mr. Horner: So, that $340 million was a net flow out of this country, and more than likely into the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his allotted time has expired.

CUSTOMS—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN STAFF AT UNITED STATES-BRITISH COLUMBIA BORDER POINTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, ever since I was elected about three years ago, I have been making representations in this House regarding the problem of traffic pile-ups at the Douglas border crossing which is in my riding. One of the problems we face is that there is a traffic pile-up in the department. I think it has become the department for recycling cabinet ministers, because in the three years I have been here, there have been four different ministers in the Department of National Revenue. How long the present minister will be in his portfolio and how long he will be in cabinet I do not know.

Last Friday I asked the minister if he would take this problem seriously and deal with it so that it will be dealt with permanently. I got the following illuminating answer. He said, as reported at page 386 of Hansard of October 28:

● (1812)

I shall be pleased to consider the hon. member's representation, Mr. Speaker. I should like also to tell him that he does not need to come into the House to make representations because he can be in full communication with me on a daily basis. But I shall be glad to look into this matter and I shall be in contact with him further.

That is no solution to the problem. What I want is an answer. I have been bugging the department for years now on this.

Mr. Harquail: Is it you who put that bug in MacKay's office?

Mr. Friesen: I guess it is a dirty word, and I imagine there is enough fuss about that.

Mr. Harquail: Is it you who is bugging the department?

Mr. Friesen: Let me ask the parliamentary secretary, who is answering for all the ministers tonight, would he please use his own minutes? I want to use mine for myself.

Mr. Harquail: Go right ahead.

Mr. Friesen: I have in my hand a letter from a former minister of national revenue, dated March 15, 1976, a year and a half ago, in which he said the following:

Steps taken to alleviate the situation have included expanding our port facilities, decreasing the amount of our officers' clerical work, and hiring university students as casual officers during the summer months. Obviously the situation has not been resolved to everyone's satisfaction.

That is the understatement of the year because just ten days ago there was a line-up three miles long. I received a phone call last Sunday telling me again of a line-up three miles long. As I pointed out in my letter to the minister, people are staying in Washington overnight because they cannot get across the border in time. Is that a way to help our balance of payments?

I have here an answer to a question on the order paper of some months ago. It tells me that in 1966 there were 58 people working at that point, and in 1975, ten years later, there were 63 people, a net gain of only five people in ten years. Anybody who crosses that border point knows that the volume of traffic has doubled, but there is no appreciable hiring of staff to alleviate that pressure.

One of the former ministers told me that they were hiring extra casual help. I pointed out on February 8, as reported at page 2866 of Hansard, that it is no solution to hire help on a casual basis. What we have to do is to put it on a permanent basis. I am not asking the department to spend any more money. Surely they can cry austerity all they want, but we are not asking them to hire more casual help and increase the load on the taxpayer. All I am asking is that there be more staff, and if there were more staff, there would be greater security and a larger revenue coming into the country. I know for a fact that if extra staff were hired for surveillance there, there would be more revenue to pay for that extra staff they would be hiring.

The minister tells me that one of the solutions they are proposing is a greater use of overtime and more part time help. Overtime is no solution. As I pointed out in the House before, the extended use of overtime is nothing but a health risk for those people who are already working there. After overtime is built up, it is not long before the people working there have to take time off to regain their health. Furthermore, when we have one million unemployed people all across Canada, our government says that its solution is to let those who are already working work overtime. Is that a solution to the problem?

I have it on good authority that a couple of years ago the government had a deliberate policy to encourage overtime because it felt it would be cheaper to let people work overtime rather than hire extra help, as it would not have to pay the ancillary benefits to all the people whom it otherwise would have to hire. That is a great solution to the problem! On the one hand we will pay extra rates for overtime in order to save money on ancillary benefits, and on the other hand we will pay unemployment insurance benefits to people looking for work who cannot find jobs because the government has a policy of letting people work overtime.

I come back to the point I made earlier. I am not asking for an extra burden on the taxpayer by enlarging the burden on the Department of National Revenue's payroll. All I am asking for is that additional staff be hired so that there can be a closer surveillance and therefore better collections at the border, sufficient so that they would pay for the kind of service that the people deserve.

● (1817)

Last week end 4,000 people crossed that border to go to a soccer match. There is a law of physics which says that what goes up must come down. All the department has to do is look at the traffic crossing the border. The department should know that in a day or two people who cross the border will come back. I am not blaming the staff at the local office at all because I know they are working against insuperable odds put up by the mandarins here in Ottawa who will not give them extra man-years to staff that office. If they had the man-years they deserve, they would be able to carry out the surveillance that would allow them to prepare for the staffing they will need in the days ahead.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member failed in his comments to refer to the strike in 1975 and to the continuation of Canadian shoppers going to the American side to pick up their groceries.

My reply to the hon. member must be given within the same framework as the letter that the hon. member received from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) this very day, as the letter in question appears to cover the points at issue more than adequately. Judging from the hon. member's questions in this House recently, I gather that his main concern is about the slowness involved in processing line-ups of people crossing the border at the Douglas Pacific Highway customs office.

Due to the 1975 labour dispute which shut down Vancouver area supermarkets, the office in question was inundated with people crossing the border to buy groceries. Groceries are dutiable, and at various rates. It therefore took more staff a much longer time to compute customs charges on grocery items. We had to have more staff working than we did prior to the strike, and therefore there was less staff available at the inspection booths at customs. Even though no additional full time staff hiring was possible, the department dealt admirably with the situation through an extended use of overtime.

Although lately there has been a decline from 9,000 to 6,000 in the number of entries by individuals through the customs office, this remains double the number of people crossing the border as compared to the pre-strike period. The department cannot speed up the traffic flow by relaxing its standards of customs examination. I am sure the hon. member would not want to see that done. Six hundred seizures and 2,800 forced payment entries over the last period are evidence of this. There can be no claim of inadequate staffing on the part of the department.

Pertaining to the hon. member's concern about the time businessmen must spend awaiting clearance at the Douglas Pacific Highway customs office, the process of clearing the businessmen in question at customs is necessarily thorough. Normal clearance time is 20 minutes. Although customs offices provide advice and help as time and circumstances permit, it is very difficult to see how this time could be shortened.

Once again the hon. member's concern about staffing at the customs office in question, though sincere, does not appear to be justified, given the facts of the situation, particularly as previously outlined to him by the minister.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—MANITOBA—QUESTIONNAIRE CONCERNING SALE OF SENIOR CITIZENS' HOMES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I hope the quality of the answer the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) just received is not any harbinger of the type of answer I am going to get because, if that is the case, frankly we are wasting our time.

The reason I am on my feet once again is that this government cannot be believed. It cannot be believed on the larger issues, as we have seen in this House, and even when we ask simple, straightforward questions, its answers are not to be believed. I want to put evidence of that on the record today.

[Mr. Harquail.]

On August 27, 1977, I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) a question regarding a CMHC questionnaire which had been circulated to senior citizens in Manitoba. I asked the minister at the time whether it was the intention of the government and whether it was CMHC policy to buy the homes of Manitoba senior citizens and then to place those people in public housing.

The minister replied saying that that was not the policy of the corporation but it was an investigation carried out by a few social workers in that province simply for study purposes.

Then I asked a supplementary question of the minister. I asked whether he would be able to put to rest the anxiety senior citizens had regarding this encroachment on the one source of dignity they had left, namely, their own places of residence. The minister replied in part as follows:

● (1822)

I do not see why the hon. member blames the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for co-operating with people who want to find new solutions to offer more housing to senior citizens and at less cost.

The minister was trying to leave the impression that CMHC was co-operating with others and that this was not an in-house survey by them. But, Mr. Speaker, the envelope containing the questionnaire had a print-out from CMHC, it was addressographed by CMHC, and the return address was that of CMHC. The envelope in which the completed questionnaire was to be returned had the CMHC address of Suite 402—310 Broadway. I think Broadway is still in Winnipeg, Mr. Speaker.

Question No. 34 reads as follows:

There has been a lot of discussion about providing housing for people with mixed incomes. Would you want to live in housing in which people of all income ranges live?

Then there are questions along the lines of, "Are you willing to sell your house?" and "Can the government buy your house?" Mr. Speaker, surely in Canada senior citizens have the right to own their homes.

The government cannot be believed because of the following facts. Mrs. Yhetta M. Gold, executive director of the Age and Opportunity Centre, Inc. sent this material out under the auspices of CMHC. An article in the Winnipeg Free Press on October 28 comments:

All replies, she said, would be treated as confidential.

And further:

Mrs. Gold said she understood that the results of the survey were to be used as an "in-house document" (for the CMHC) to be used as "a tool for their corporation."

I hope today the parliamentary secretary will not get on his flat feet and be another tool of this corporation and the falsehoods that have been spoken.

Mr. Harquail: We are not deaf.

Mr. Epp: Yes you are, because we keep repeating the questions and you do not give answers.

I demand answers from CMHC, on behalf of senior citizens. Is the CMHC, as a social engineer, trying to bring about public housing for senior citizens and their quiet removal from their own homes? Let us not shunt aside the fact that some social worker has circulated a survey, whether it was CMHC that did it or not. Certainly CMHC sent it out, it wanted the results and it is now processing the results. I ask the parliamentary secretary to give us a straight answer and tell us unequivocally that it is not CMHC policy, that the material will not be used, and the intimidation of senior citizens, especially in Manitoba, will be stopped.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) would try to misconstrue the facts. It seems to me that is the situation that has prevailed in the last few days in regard to the attitude of the opposition toward any facts in this House or in the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member referred to Hansard for Thursday, October 27, when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) stated quite clearly that the story the hon. member has related this afternoon is not government policy.

I am surprised that the hon. member misunderstood the intent of the questionnaire circulated last summer to a group of senior citizens in the Manitoba area. However, Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the hon. member should take this approach. In his raised voice this evening, which impressed no one that I could see, he tried to put across this contrived idea which he has in regard to work being carried out by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation costing over $1 billion, money that is being spent in each and every province of the country to assist all Canadians, especially our seniors, find housing. Yet he comes here and relates a story of this kind.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to provide the House with additional comments on the survey to which he refers. This survey was undertaken jointly by CMHC and the Manitoba Housing and Renewal Corporation. It was designed to help determine the current housing situation and expenditure patterns of low income senior citizens. The respondents were selected with the help of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the list was drawn up from people who were receiving the full income supplement.

I am pleased to report that more than 25 per cent of the people receiving the questionnaires replied. This is a better than normal response to questionnaires distributed through the mails, Mr. Speaker, and I believe this level of participation is a good indication that the people who received the questionnaire did not question CMHC's motives, as the hon. member is attempting to do today, in undertaking the survey.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to point out that we are not aware of any objections to the survey apart from those registered by the hon. member, who takes up the important and costly time of this House by bringing them in in the way he did today. Not only that, but at no time were the survey participants asked for their names or addresses. The introductory letter distributed with the questionnaire notes specifically that the respondents are to answer the questions anonymously, and that the replies will be treated as confidential.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when we broke at five o'clock for private members' hour, I was talking about being proud of Air Canada and the concerns I have about this bill. I would like to continue in that same vein.

I mentioned that Air Canada is one of four or five of the world's greatest airlines. It leads in many areas. However, as with most Canadian endeavours, we tend to be critical of anything we have that is worthwhile. Canadians inevitably run down whatever is best in our society. That is deplorable.

Air Canada performs an invaluable transportation service in this difficult country. It is a service we badly need. I was very concerned when the minister stated earlier in the House today that Air Canada might be put on a different basis.

I understand there was a paper issued recently. I hope it was not the minister's department which issued it. In any event, discussion is going on about it at the air traffic conference this week. Air Canada may lose the short haul hops and become an airline dealing only with major centres in this country. That bothers me a great deal. If this is done, the medium and smaller sized cities in Canada will be ignored. As I was saying before we adjourned, the people in the city of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) and those in Thunder Bay will lose a valuable service. It is of tremendous importance to us.

If Air Canada is forced, coerced or persuaded to abandon chartered stops in cities like Thunder Bay, Sudbury, Sault Ste. Marie and Moncton, service into those areas will not be as it is today. The way this country is put together, you make your money on the long hauls and lose on the short hauls. It evens out.

The minister or the MOT people say that we can sell some of the short haul trips of less than 500 miles to the local carriers and they will be able to carry on. Northern Manitoba is one area where Air Canada had to give up some service. I do not have the figures because it goes back a few years. What happens when that is done? The rates go up.

Far from being one who objects to local carriers, I must submit that there is no way the local carrier who does not have the long hauls or the profitable Winnipeg, Toronto or Montreal stops can make the kind of money required to carry the short hauls. I am very concerned about that aspect of the minister's speech.

This bill does something that disturbs me a great deal. It ignores service to the Canadian community in favour of good business practices and profit. No one in his right mind would be against good, sound business practices. No one would be against the company making a profit. No one is against Air Canada making a profit.

There were quite a number of arguments, and amendments to this bill in committee. Now as I go through the bill, I do not see anything which talks about service to Canadian communities.

This bill is intended to separate Air Canada from its parent, CN. I think that is a reasonable proposition. If it does just that and nothing more, I accept it. If it does not have a preamble and does not set the duties and so on of Air Canada, I accept it.

The difficulty I have with the Conservative amendment is that it introduces into the bill another concept which is not compensated by some notion of service. I dislike the amendment that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has placed before us. It is too drastic. However, this bill was brought in rapidly. We did not get the notice we needed to put an amendment to correct this. It is too late to do this at report stage.

The amendment I would like to see would read something like this. I would leave in 7(1)(i) but I would change it. I did this in committee and it was not accepted in committee. This bothers me a great deal because the intentions of the minister in this respect are worrisome. I would amend the bill to read in section 7(1)(i):

In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the board, bearing in mind that service to Canadian communities shall be its prime responsibility, shall have due regard to business principles and particularly the contemplation of profit.

I would leave what is in there, but I would add that portion.

[Mr. McRae.]

I am very disturbed, Mr. Speaker. We are beginning to do this with CN. We are beginning to do the same with Air Canada. We say to these companies that their prime role is, in particular, to make profit, not to provide service. Nowhere in the whole act is there mention of service. Now, the charter of Air Canada may contain such reference, but instructions to a board should contain something specific. As I say, I have no objection to those things going into the act but the point of the matter is that profitability then becomes the sole purpose of Air Canada.

I have been sitting in the House for five years and I have never before voted against the government. A few times I have refrained from voting, and on other occasions have considered refraining. But on this occasion I feel compelled to accept the amendment even though I do not like it. I think the amendment is too drastic. But the point of the matter is that it is far more important that the amendment be accepted than that we have a bill which singles out profit as the only justification for Air Canada.

I would hope that somewhere along the line we could obtain the consent of the House to include my amendment. I will not pose it tonight, but at some stage it may be we can get consent to include my amendment which would put service first, followed by good business practice and profit in that order. If that were to be done, Mr. Speaker, I would find the bill entirely acceptable.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the bill before us. I would first say that I disagree with the principle of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I would agree that Air Canada, at least in the beginning, provided at least an element of service to the country.

I think the description of Air Canada as some poor little airline beset by private enterprise and hardly making its way in the Canadian scene is not quite accurate. Air Canada carries something like 60 to 70 per cent of the total Canadian air traffic compared to its competitor, CP Air, and the five regionals. By no means is Air Canada a small company, and by no means is it struggling. It should be remembered that the private airlines pay quite a bit more than Air Canada in corporation and dividend taxes. Tariffs are set for all airlines on the same basis, and I cannot see in which way it could be any different.

It has been said that Air Canada is one of the great airlines of the world. Well, when you consider all the people who go abroad you find that they don't make much distinction as to what airline they use. Air travel, at least among the airlines of the developing world, of Western Europe, Japan and North America, fortunately seems to be safe. They all seem to enjoy approximately the same degree of safety and I suspect that, by and large, the services offered by all the airlines seem to be much the same. Much seems to depend upon an individual's own interpretation of service as to whether or not the journey was acceptable to him.

We should remember that in Canada air travel is one area in which some competition could exist as compared with, say, railroads where we have only two main railroads which are more or less synonymous with each other and there is not much choice. There is the CNR with a government-appointed board of management, as opposed to CPR as a private corporation. But the boardrooms of both railroads are probably not all that different. And I suspect that the boardrooms of the large air carriers, Air Canada and CP Air, are not all that different from each other, either. I therefore feel that in air travel a certain amount of competition can be engendered.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) mentioned that Air Canada gave service to communities. Well, I can tell him that in northern Manitoba Air Canada never gave any service to the communities there. It was always provided by private airlines.

It is generally considered that if we are going to see the operation of north-south air routes which are reasonably viable, then some of the east-west air routes have to be given to these small private companies in order to make their operations profitable. There just is no way that fares on North-South routes will generate enough income for the companies concerned to remain viable.

We might consider what I understand has happened on the American scene. They have tended to let the larger airlines—those equivalent to Air Canada—fend for themselves. Where subsidies have been given they have gone to what I might call the secondary or tertiary airlines. This is something we might well examine.

Air Canada does not compete in very small centres. It does not compete in my centre. There is at the moment a proposed prairie regional air route encompassing Dauphin, Yorkton, Brandon, Saskatoon and Regina. Nobody seriously considers that Air Canada would be interested in running them because it is recognized that, with the large corporate structure they have, it would be impossible for them to run on routes such as these. It is important to realize that on these smaller routes throughout the country Air Canada cannot operate. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are paying to subsidize Air Canada but who can never take advantage of even taking a ride on an Air Canada flight.

In connection with whether Air Canada should be run along profitable lines there is a report in the Montreal Gazette on October 28 which might be interesting. It states that Air Canada is shifting many of its employees from Montreal to Toronto, causing consternation among the maintenance workers in the union. The reason for this is fairly simple. It appears that Mirabel is not at all successful, that travellers prefer Toronto because is more convenient, and Air Canada, in order to stay in business, presumably has to transfer much of its maintenance staff to the city of Toronto. Many people bypass Montreal and have chosen to go through New York when going abroad.

Air Canada should be charged with running a reasonably profitable organization conducted in accordance with business principles. Travel is not something which, by and large, ought to be subsidized out of the taxpayer's pockets. There are certain regional areas where travel is necessary and where transportation must be assisted. But by and large, if the public does not pay for its own travel costs, surely the taxpayers as a whole should not be required to subsidize the movement in any great quantity.

There has been some talk of travel for Canadians at a reduced rate. Supposedly we are in an energy crisis situation, and we recognize that one of the greatest users of energy is travel. It is interesting that in the concept of national unity it is said we should have cheap or free travel all over the country. This does not make sense in that the price of energy is rising and we in Canada are not blessed with a lot of cheap energy very far into the future. Some are suggesting that in the early 1980's we could have a real shortage.

I should like to support the idea that Air Canada should be run on sound business lines, and it should be run with the idea of making a profit, subject to the recognition that certain areas in this country are disadvantaged and need assistance. This should come out of the treasury so that it is recognized as a subsidy for that particular area.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I believe that what is important in this bill is not what is written in the bill but the implications of policies which will flow out of the power given to the government and to the minister, if and when this bill is passed.

The bill itself is rather simple. It provides for the setting up of Air Canada as a separate Crown corporation, split away from the Canadian National Railways which presently owns all of the outstanding shares, and some rearrangement of the financial matters which will be necessary.

We have no objection to that, but on top of that the bill gives the government a great deal more power over the direction and the policies adopted by Air Canada. The minister has expressed a concern about commercial viability. Also he expressed the need for greater competition and for the corporation to show a profit. The minister's obvious lack of concern in regard to the needs of Canadians for service, particularly in those areas which are not on the main routes of any airline, bothers us.

I am not surprised that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) spoke as he did a few moments ago. I am surprised at the manner in which members of the official opposition have talked, when so many of them come from areas which are not on the main lines. These areas will really feel the pinch and will experience a reduction in their services if Air Canada is required to have, as one of its major objectives, the showing of a profit.

The fact is that in most years Air Canada has shown a profit in terms of actual operation. The fact is that Air Canada is an efficient organization. The fact is that in recent years, if Air

Canada has not done as well financially as it did earlier, it is because both Conservative and Liberal governments of Canada have opened the lucrative, long haul lines to competition by CP Air with the result that we have an over capacity of seats.

The minister referred to the fact that we have reached the stage where we have a mature transportation system and we can afford competition, and so on. Indeed he invoked the memory of that late great Liberal statesman, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, who was able to make the economy work so well. Of course it is a long time since Mr. Howe was here. Therefore, in doing that the minister hopes that nobody will remember the role which C. D. Howe played in the establishment of the Trans Canada AirLines, which is known now as Air Canada.

On March 17, 1944, Mr. Howe, who was the minister responsible for the establishment and the running of the national airlines, said that service to the public must be the paramount consideration, and it seemed obvious in 1937 that the cost of non-competitive, non-profit service was the lowest that could be offered to the public. Also he said that an impartial analysis of the situation at that time led to no other conclusion.

I do not think anything has changed since 1937. It seems obvious to me that in a country as large as Canada, with a relatively small population, we simply cannot afford to depend for transportation, the movement of people or the movement of goods, on companies whose main purpose is the making of a profit. It is the areas wihich are not in the mainstream in terms of population which will be the most adversely affected.

In June, 1975, a former Liberal minister of transport, who has gone to his just deserts in the other place—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is just gone over there.

Mr. Orlikow: We can leave that type of discussion for another time. In June of 1975 Mr. Marchand said the following:

> If you look at the size of this country and the distribution of its population you will see that you cannot have a transportation network which is economic everywhere; you cannot have an economic system of transportation to service the north, for example, or to service those regions of the country where the population is very thin. You cannot have an economic system for regions which are remote from the centre.

Then he went on to compare the remote areas, which the hon. member for Fort William referred to, with what happened in central Canada. He said:

> In central Canada, for example, many transportation services and facilities are highly developed and competitive, with shippers having a choice as to rail, truck, ship or plane. In some parts of Canada, however, while the facilities and services may be well developed, there is a lack of competition.

That is what has happened in northern Ontario, northern Manitoba, northern Quebec, and I assume in northern British Columbia.

He went on to say:

> Transportation policy must therefore recognize the fact that there is a wide range of facilities and services, operating under different degrees of maturity and competition. It must enable each to be treated in an appropriate manner, and not, as is now the case, as exceptions to a policy which relies principally on competition.

The present Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has reversed that principle completely. He is now leading us on the road to more competition. All the evidence indicates that that road leads to disaster.

We are discussing Air Canada today, but I would remind the minister of the findings of Mr. Justice Hall in connection with the movement of grain. His findings are that competition simply does not meet the needs of the western farmer, and that what we need is an integrated system, with a great deal of planning.

We see in this bill a proposal really to dismantle the major gains made by Air Canada, to permit a further fracturing of the system, the splitting of air routes which Air Canada has, and the giving of routes to regional air carriers that will be given subsidies. They will not have the profitable routes which Air Canada now has to help equalize the cost. We know, and I can understand, the difficulties of any government, regardless of the political party which is in power, in giving subsidies, particularly in giving subsidies to areas which have very few people and therefore very few votes, and therefore very few members of parliament to represent their needs. So we believe that the aim of the minister is one which will have a very bad effect on Air Canada, and therefore on the ability of the people of Canada to get the services which they need.

One of the things that has disturbed me about this bill is the underlying feeling among members who have spoken. Although they do not want to say it, they think really that Air Canada is not a very efficient organization. After all, how could Air Canada be an efficient organization? My friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), believes, of course, that no government operation can be a success, that no government corporation can provide a service as efficiently as a privately owned corporation, despite the fact that the hon. member worked for the Manitoba telephone system, a publicly owned system serving the whole province, which has been publicly owned for almost 70 years. It was made a public utility by a Conservative premier of the day. It has consistently, until this time, provided the people of Manitoba with cheaper telephone rates than the private corporation which services the vast majority of the people in Ontario and Quebec. Any member of parliament who comes from Manitoba can vouch for the fact that the rates in Manitoba and Winnipeg are lower than the rates in Ontario and Ottawa.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is putting words in my mouth. I have considerably more knowledge of Crown corporations in the province of Manitoba. I am well aware of the fact that the Manitoba telephone system is not competitive and that it was made a Crown corporation back in 1908—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Orlikow: I think that any member of parliament or any citizen of Canada who wants to compare the record of the publicly owned telephone systems of Canada—there are a number of them—with the privately owned systems in Quebec, Ontario or British Columbia, will find very quickly that the publicly owned system offers as efficient a service at a cheaper rate than Bell Telephone and B.C. Telephone. The record is there.

But I want to come back to Air Canada—

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, again I rise on a point of order. If the member wishes to continue to speak about telephone companies or Crown corporations, we are going to turn this into a debate on how to run a telephone company in a large city or a small city.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member knows nothing about this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I do not recognize the point made by the hon. member as being a point of privilege or a point of order.

Mr. McKenzie: I want to protect myself, Mr. Speaker. He is putting words in my mouth. I must have some avenue in this House to protect myself. I want to speak out against this.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member might be offended by the comments made by a previous speaker, but surely what he is saying is a point of debate, not a point of privilege or a point of order.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not mind the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre interrupting me. The more he speaks, the more he proves to everybody who will listen that he does know what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: I do not mind his interruptions, Mr. Speaker, provided you keep track of the time which he has taken on his spurious points of order and make sure that I get whatever time members are permitted to have.

Mr. McKenzie: On this point of order, Mr. Speaker, are we going to open this up to a debate on Crown corporations? This afternoon I spoke on subsidization of air routes. This gentleman does not know what he is talking about.

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): As I have already explained to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), the point he is making is a point of debate, an argument. It is neither a point of order nor a question of privilege, and I think we should hear what the hon. member for Winnipeg North has to say.

Mr. Orlikow: It is very clear to any member who wants to look at the record that Air Canada has been and is an efficient organization. If you compare it with other airlines in Canada or outside Canada, you find that its record is an excellent one and that its performance is efficient. Air Canada has had difficulties, as have all airlines in recent years because of the tremendous increase in the cost of fuel. But if you compare Air Canada with other airlines, you see that on the whole it has done a very commendable job.

In 1976 Air Canada carried more than three times as many passengers as CP Air. It generated 157 per cent more passenger miles than did CP Air, while incurring only 6.5 per cent greater total loss. We know that CP Air has the profitable runs in this country, that it has the long hauls between the popular centres. It flies from Vancouver to Winnipeg, to Toronto and to Montreal, while Air Canada has the short hauls which my friend, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), has to use if he wants to come from Thunder Bay to Ottawa to do his job as a member of parliament. So when it was proposed, as it was proposed recently by CP Air, that its share of the transcontinental routes be increased from the present 25 per cent which it has to 45 per cent, the new president of Air Canada, Mr. Taylor, said the following, and I quote from an interview which he gave to Maclean's magazine:

> I think that is a totally predictable position for CP to take. If I were in their position, I would probably take it too. I would just look at the routes that you can make money on, the ones where you can really make money without any dispute. Toronto-Vancouver, Vancouver-Montreal, Calgary-Edmonton-Toronto: CP provided over half of the capacity on these routes. In other words, they put all their 25 per cent on those big routes so that we (Air Canada) were doing the Montreal-Torontos, the Toronto-Winnipegs, the Winnipeg-Reginas, the Calgary-Edmonton-Vancouvers . . .

That is the situation at which we have arrived by taking away from Air Canada some of the best routes in Canada and giving them to CP Air. What we have also permitted CP Air to do over the years was to get out of the short haul routes in which they were involved when they first organized their company and let them get into the very profitable long haul routes. The result is that the CP Air route structure has a higher percentage of long haul flights than Air Canada's route structure. In 1974 the average stage length was 563 miles for Air Canada but 937 miles for CP Air. That is the non-stop distance between airports. Despite this, in all but one of the past 16 years Air Canada has had a higher load factor than CP Air.

In my remaining few minutes I want to deal with the whole concept—which the minister has been advancing ever since he took over the portfolio—of a profitable or commercially viable airline in Canada. That concept is a myth. There is no air carrier which would be commercially viable without the almost $500 million of public assistance. I am talking about the cost of meteorological services, air service administration and capital investment, minus revenues in the form of airports which the public of Canada provides to all the airlines in this country. The total net income loss for CP Air and Air Canada is only 4.5 per cent of the less visible public assistance made in the form of airports and services.

I say that the concept of profitability which the minister has accepted in this bill, on the basis of an amendment moved last session by the Conservatives which the minister has also accepted, particularly if we do not talk at the same time about the need to provide service, is the beginning of a policy which will lead inevitably to poorer service and more difficulties for the people of Canada. Why should Air Canada be tied to the profitability clause, to reduce services or to raise fares when any operating losses are insignificant as compared to the much larger picture of the public's investment in Air Canada?

Based on statements made not just once but many times by the minister about the direction in which he and the department want to go, we feel that this bill—although we support the idea of splitting Air Canada off from the CNR—would move Air Canada and the service it provides to the people of Canada in the wrong direction.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ellis: Straighten out the socialists, please, Walter.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is impossible.

I think it is significant that most of the speakers who have taken part in this debate today are from western Canada, particularly the great plains region, and the hon. member from the government side who spoke tonight is from the Thunder Bay region. It goes without saying that a reliable and efficient public transportation system is absolutely essential to the economic, political, and social life of western Canada. Mr. W. P. Webb wrote on this subject some years ago in a book entitled "The Great Plains". He gave us a quotation which I think is quite apropos of many of the things which have been said here tonight, and I quote:

> . . . far from markets, burned by drought, beaten by hail, withered by hot winds, frozen by blizzards, eaten out by grasshoppers, exploited by eastern capitalists and cozened by politicians.

The western people have been able to survive because we have up until recent times had a reliable transportation system.

Some of my colleagues have been suggesting that I take issue with some of the statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). They say I should take time in this important debate to correct some of the impressions which have come from those "socialist sources". I am not going to take the time tonight other than to support what the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) has been saying as he has been attempting to straighten out the record with regard to the statements which have been made about him.

I think this is an opportune occasion to point out that the transportation system has been going steadily down hill in recent times in western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan. I specify those two areas because they are areas of immediate concern from the standpoint of my political responsibilities in the constituency I represent. There has been a continuing deterioration which is reflected in an economic slowdown, and I want to take this opportunity tonight to bring a few points to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), who is not with us at the moment, but he will be able to read Hansard. Perhaps he is out watching television. I do not know, but whatever the reason for his absence I think it is imperative to point out that under the new provisions of the legislation we are debating now and have been debating for some time in this parliament in the last session he must try to deal with the new parameters which are provided in the legislation and with the deterioration in first class air service which I shall outline briefly here tonight.

In the 1950's western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan had excellent air service. That was almost three decades ago. We had air service which took us right through to Calgary in the west, and of course we had an excellent connection with the city of Winnipeg by air. As Air Canada upgraded its equipment, moving into the turbo prop from the old DC-2 equipment, we were included in the Viscount service. As a result of the service which was provided by Air Canada in the 1950's and 1960' we had a marked period of progress. I need not say that in the last decade, for various reasons—there was a change of government in Manitoba, which could have been one of the reasons—there has been a considerable decline in the economic process in terms of industrial development from that which had been noted in the decade of the 1960's.

Air Canada withdrew this service, and it is coincidental with the withdrawal of Air Canada from that important part of Canada that the economic decline set in. The responsibility was turned over to a private regional carrier, Transair, which provided the service under the regional air policy which had been announced by the minister of transport of that day and which was re-emphasized by succeeding ministers of transport. There have been many of them in the game of shuffling cabinet ministers which has gone on in the two recent Liberal administrations. There have been so many changes in cabinet ministers' and departmental responsibility that it is difficult to place the blame, as was pointed out by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) during the debate on the Speech from the Throne.

The excuse for transferring the responsibility from Air Canada to the private carrier was that this was going to improve the service under the new, expanded regional air policy. Unfortunately the regional air policy is now in tatters and we have no air service of any kind in the western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan region, nor have we had any for the past four years. The rail passenger service has almost completely disappeared as well, so this important economic region of Canada, which includes the city of Brandon, the second largest in the province of Manitoba, is without air service of any kind. This, as I say, has been reflected in the marked decline of the industrial upsurge that began in the 1960's.

Two government departments are working against each other, Mr. Speaker. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been providing funds to assist regional development, while the Department of Transport has been downgrading the air service so essential in this modern era, to the extent that there is no air service of any kind. To make it even more ridiculous, removal of the air service came at precisely the time a brand new terminal was built at Brandon to serve that part of Canada. It was opened by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) then Minister of Transport, whose personal appearance underlined that this was a most significant development in transportation for that part of western Canada. No sooner had the air terminal been opened than air service was withdrawn, and I do not have to emphasize the stupidity of that decision.

I am sure the reason the present administration comes under such growing criticism is because of its lack of rational, economic leadership. It just did not make any sense at all. It became an issue in the 1974 election and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a special trip to Winnipeg, where he appeared with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), who was then a member of his cabinet. He has since resigned—I suppose in utter disillusionment and disappointment. At that time it was stated emphatically that air service would be restored at the earliest possible date. Mr. Speaker, that was four years ago and we still do not have air service.

The provincial government of Manitoba attempted to supply a commuter air service to this part of Canada. It was opposed by the Minister of Transport who said it was not adequate and that he wanted to give western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan a first-class jet service. This was encouraging, but the minister went further and said he would subsidize not only a commuter service but also a first-class jet service east and west on a daily basis. That is precisely the air service we require. Bids were called for, and Transair made an excellent proposal which was to be processed by the air transport committee. Then there was another development. Negotiations for the takeover of Transair by Pacific Western Airlines were commenced, approved by the Minister of Transport, and so we were back to the drawing board.

You can understand, Mr. Speaker, why there was so much frustration and why there is so much participation in this debate by members from the province of Manitoba.

When a former Minister of Transport who has now moved to the other place, the Hon. Jean Marchand, had responsibility for the portfolio, he hinted that a possible solution was for Air Canada to resume its responsibility to provide quality service and move us into the jet age as had been provided for in the 1950's and 1960's. I have made inquiries of the present minister from time to time and it seems that he is moving in this direction as well. Certainly with Transair out of the picture there is no private carrier that would take on the responsibility.

This legislation gives the minister the power to arrange for one flight per day each way and to use the brand new terminal facility that has been sitting idle for four years. The service could fly in from Regina to Brandon and go straight to the east if necessary. There is a potential market of 150,000 people who at present have to drive to the international airport at Winnipeg, often a distance of 200 miles. Each time I return to my constituency it takes me as long to drive from Winnipeg to Brandon as it does to fly from Ottawa to Winnipeg. This in the year 1977, Mr. Speaker, when the second largest city in Manitoba, Brandon, should be part of a first-class jet service. People still have to drive a long distance and pay substantial parking fees for their car while they are absent. There is plenty of parking at the new Brandon terminal which I am sure would be an added economic attraction to the people of western Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan who must have rapid, reliable air service if they are to maintain their place in the economic development of Canada.

Some members have mentioned the improvement in Air Canada's service in recent months under the new chairman, Mr. Claude Taylor. I can vouch for that from personal experience. I am sure he would be sympathetic to any gesture by the government to restore the quality service Air Canada once gave to this region of Canada. The latest statement of the minister was in a press release on September 9, 1977, when he pointed out that there is going to be a meeting of minds. It reads in part as follows:

Transport Minister Otto Lang and Air Transport Association of Canada President Angus Morrison jointly announced today that the government and the air transport industry have instituted discussions aimed at developing a new policy for domestic airline service, including mainline, regional and local service carriers.

There needs to be no further discussion respecting the problem I have outlined here, because the gentleman named in this release, Angus Morrison, who is the president of the Air Transport Association of Canada, was formerly actively associated and identified with Transair and was one of the moving spirits in putting forward the proposition that Transair should be given permission by the Air Transport Committee to provide daily jet service in and out of western Manitoba. Obviously he is a convinced individual, and in his current responsibilities he now has direct access to the transport minister.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am hoping that in the very near future we will have the announcement that Air Canada will pick up this responsibility, that there will be the further announcement that the infrastructure necessary for making it possible for Air Canada to fly into Brandon airport is ready, and that this will take place within the immediate future since it is a policy which has been delayed now for four years. It came up as an urgent issue during the last federal election, and it begins to appear that it is going to be an "urgent issue" in the next federal election. I urge the Minister of Transport to use the authority given to him under this legislation to do what he says he wants to do, and to do it as quickly as possible.

Air Canada

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to make a contribution to this debate on the reorganization of Air Canada. What the government, abetted by Conservative members in the House, is trying to propose I think is significant. I am afraid that we have another example of the user-pay philosophy of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that all modes of transportation with which the government has anything to do should be based on the principle of user-pay and profitability.

I and my colleagues have said time and time again, both in this House and elsewhere, that given the geography of Canada and its sparse population from region to region, if we were to adopt the user-pay philosophy, the philosophy which decrees that a transportation system must always aim to make a profit, then we are doing a great disservice to the people of this country, especially those who live in regions like northern Ontario, where I come from.

I say this because there are not people in sufficient numbers in these regions of Canada to use the transportation system in order always to make it profitable. If we move in the direction the Liberal government and Conservative members want us to move, then people in regions outside our urban centres will find the number of transportation options available to them reduced. For us in the New Democratic Party, the proposition that must be central to the design of any national transportation plan has to be the concept of service. Service must come before profit.

That is why we are particularly disturbed with an amendment to the Air Canada Act which is incorporated in the bill before us, one which the Conservatives tried to get passed in committee but were defeated by the Liberals, the Liberals then turning around and reintroducing it, supported by the Conservative members. I refer to clause 7(1.1), which provides:

In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the Board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

We are not against sound business principles, but the phrase which really worries us, Mr. Speaker, is "and in particular the contemplation of profit".

The nature of the air transportation system in this country I find very interesting, from the point of view of looking at what has happened over the past few years to our national air carrier, Air Canada, and its major competitor, CP Air. I find it very interesting that during this debate those members most indicative of being in an ideological straitjacket are my hon. friends in the Conservative and Liberal parties, who are wedded to the belief that at all times competition and profit are going to mean benefits to the average user of the transportation system. I am not against competition in certain circumstances. Nor am I against the profit motive. But when it comes to a national transportation system then, as I have said earlier, we must consider the aspect of service.

I should like to relate what happened since 1937 when the predecessor of Air Canada, Trans-Canada Air Lines, was first inaugurated. The airline was inaugurated by the government as a public enterprise, since private enterprise was not willing to serve the nation by setting up a national air transportation system. Therefore a responsible government, under the pressure of the people of Canada and the CCF, the predecessor of my party, moved to bring about a national airline with public money. TCA fulfilled a very important service.

Then when the Conservative government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was elected in 1957, it initiated a study of TCA and of the whole business of whether or not there should be competition in the field of air transportation in Canada. There was a great clamour from special interest groups to the effect that Air Canada should not have a monopoly. This was after Trans-Canada Air Lines was formed because other private competitors were not interested in providing the service. In 1957 and 1958 there was a great hue and cry to the effect that we must have competition in Canada in the air transport industry.

The Conservative government of the day hired a British transport expert, Mr. Wheatcroft, to do a study of the air transport situation in Canada. He concluded that TCA was as efficient a service as any in the world, even though it had no competition on the route. However, he said there was one serious deficiency in the service: a highly vocal section of the Canadian public was not satisfied with TCA's service. I should like to quote from his report to the government in 1958. He said:

There can be little doubt that a major reason for the undue degree of public criticism to which TCA has been subjected is that passengers with small grievances have magnified these into major complaints because they do not have the normal redress of taking their custom elsewhere.

This is a fundamental problem of public relations which is faced by any concern with an exclusive franchise. There can be little doubt that, whatever the other disadvantages of introducing transcontinental competition, there would in this respect be substantial benefit for TCA. Competitive operations, in other words, might well make the public more appreciative of the service provided by TCA.

Not because TCA was inefficient, not because it was losing money, but because some people said, "we do not have the option of taking our business elsewhere," the Conservative government followed the advice of Mr. Stephen Wheatcroft and allowed for competition on our national air routes. As Herschel Hardin in his brilliant book on Canadian public economic development, "A Nation Unaware", stated:

The hardest flying that TCA ever had to do was through a thick ideological fog.

What has happened is that since the introduction of competition we have found we have had too much competition in a country like Canada for the kind of passanger service that is demanded. As a result we find what the Americans have found, that a host of airlines competing for a fixed or limited number of passengers can only mean more planes flying with reduced load capacity, half empty or worse.

As the cost of operating those planes goes up, the consumer, the traveller, has to pay by means of higher air fares. The Americans have found this. The studies are numerous to point it out. I would like to give a few statistics to illustrate my point.

A study that Wheatcroft referred to at a later date shows in the United States in airline competition from 1952 to 1962 that in 1952, taking an index of competition at 12, the passenger load factor was 67.1 per cent and the return on capital to the industry was 15.3 per cent. By 1962, when more airlines were encouraged to get into the market and the index of competition had risen from 12 to 38, the passenger load factor had dropped to 54.5 per cent and the return on capital was down drastically from 15 per cent to 3.6 per cent. The same thing to a lesser degree has happened here in Canada.

As Canadian Pacific began to take part of the transcontinental service, and many of the regional air carriers took the regional routes, it reduced the passenger load factor of Air Canada and indeed of CP Air to the point that the two national air lines were flying with less than full capacity.

The only way you operate on a profitable basis, about which my friends are so concerned, is to have a plane full or near full each time it takes off. When you introduce a multitude of airplanes and airline companies, because we have a limited population with limited use of the air service, these planes fly with reduced load capacity, and that means a loss. The consumer, the traveller, pays more in higher air fares, and the taxpayer pays more in terms of subsidies to the Crown corporation and indeed in indirect subsidies to the other airlines as well.

We find that by 1960 and 1961, after competition was introduced, both Canadian Pacific and Air Canada began to lose money. Suddenly the great brainstorming among the civil servants was that perhaps we should have a merger and bring things back into a monopoly position. Despite that evidence, that the more competition the greater the loss would be to the airlines, we find that the Liberal government in 1967 extended CP Air's share of the Canadian market. Orange may be beautiful, but the entire airline industry may be in the red as a result of this misguided policy of the Liberal government, supported by the Conservatives, that competition in the airline business is ipso facto a good thing.

We found that the optimum load factor of a plane is around 70 to 75 per cent of the seat capacity. In 1975, CP had a load factor of 59.3 per cent and Air Canada had a load factor of 58 per cent. You cannot operate an airline profitably with that kind of load factor.

If my friends in the Conservative party and Liberal party are as interested as they say, by the amendment they got introduced into the bill, in having profit as the central goal of a national airline system, they would merge CP and Air Canada into one national airline. As I mentioned earlier, because of their ideological straitjacket, they cannot accept that proposition. They will still go along with competition and the airlines will continue to lose money.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Symes: I see I flushed them out.

Mr. Nystrom: Now flush them down.

Mr. Symes: The facts are there. Both airlines are losing money because of reduced load factor. That can be traced directly to increased competition with a limited passenger market in the air business.

Because of competition we are worse off. We have increased costs because of excess capacity, government subsidies and duplication of services. If we were really interested in having an efficient airline service which serves the public interest, we would have a monopoly in the national airline business. However, I am afraid my friends in the other parties will not accept that proposition arising from the circumstances I have described.

If we move toward this concept of user pay which the Minister of Transport is espousing, severing the profitable parts of Crown corporations and returning them to private industry, we have no guarantee that service will be maintained on behalf of the people of Canada. I know very well the results of the concept in my area. We have seen it happen in the form of railway transportation service.

CP rail service between Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury was subsidized by the government. The railways wanted to get out of the passenger rail service. They put enough pressure on the government to have that service suspended. As a result, the people in the small communities between Sault Ste. Marie and Sudbury, and indeed in those communities, now find themselves with one less option in terms of transportation service. The day after the railway service was cancelled, bus fares between these centres increased.

If that is not bad enough, we now find that the national airline, Air Canada, has reduced the number of flights to Sault Ste. Marie. We predicted that would happen when, a few years ago, the Canadian Transport Commission allowed Transair, or Trashair as the locals call it, to serve Sault Ste. Marie. It increased competition with the national airline and took passenger service away from Air Canada. As a consequence, in order to reduce losses the airline cut back on one of its flights. Transair is now in a state of economic collapse and will be taken over by that great Tory airline, Canadian Western Airlines.

What we find is a move afoot by the ministers officials, as recorded in today's Globe and Mail, that Air Canada would be better to give up short haul low density routes and turn those routes over to private airlines. At the same time, the government would subsidize those private airlines because those routes are not as profitable as the long haul routes.

My stand is that Air Canada should be the major servicer of Sault Ste. Marie and that the regional carriers should not move in because they have not proved to be efficient; they have not maintained the service for the people of the area, and the national airline has always proved to be highly reliable. Air Canada should be given the benefit of passenger loads as high as possible by way of exclusive rights to serve my constituency. I hope the CTC will not parcel off part of that business to a private airline as it did in the past in the case of Transair, because we in the north know that that would mean worse service. It is important that we not allow the clause I have described to remain in the bill, and that is why I am glad my hon. friend moved his motion.

Service must be the goal of any national transportation system. If we rely upon the profit motive alone it will mean reduced service in the less populated areas. The idea that making a profit and allowing competition will at all times serve the public best is a false one. It may suit the people who live in the larger cities very well, but it will not suit those in the smaller cities who depend so heavily upon airline service because of their distance from major centres. It is important they have an option always available to them, and I predict they will not have such an option if we move in the direction indicated in the bill before us.

The tourist industry is failing. It is cheaper to fly to Florida than to Vancouver. It seems to me there must be a national airlines system which is affordable and which provides service. This has to be a national goal, and that is why I support the motion standing in the name of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, last July I had prepared a few comments on this aspect of the debate in the old session. We are opposed to the amendment put forward in this new session by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and it is appropriate I should put my comments on record tonight. They will be short, but I think they apply.

The amendment about which we are concerned tonight, and which has provoked so much chit-chat between our party and the New Democratic Party, has to do with whether or not it is reasonable to expect on behalf of Canadian taxpayers that a Crown corporation or agency, Air Canada in particular, should be managed and operated both within and outside Canada on a sound business basis with a reasonable contemplation of making a profit. To remove this concept from the bill, as the amendment proposes, is, surely, to question the very basis of our private enterprise system.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. Hargrave: In the case of Air Canada, there is no reason why this basic principle should not still apply. I want to make specific comments about one aspect of the air freight side of Air Canada to show that at least some parts of the air freight operation are not being managed in accordance with sound business practice. I am referring to the air freight policy of Air Canada with respect to the transport of livestock, especially cattle, to foreign markets, nearly all of which lie across at least one ocean. I have in mind both purebred and commercial breeding cattle, both beef and dairy.

Canada rightly enjoys a very high reputation throughout the world for the excellent quality and high health standards of its beef and dairy cattle. Our cattle are in high demand, especially now when market prices are seriously depressed. With very few exceptions, customers or potential customers must be supplied by air freight. Expensive as this form of transport is, it is simply not practical or efficient to move live breeding cattle by boat or truck to offshore customers. Until a few years ago Canada had only one aircraft which was fully converted to permit the efficient movement of live cattle, by which I mean that they could be handled by a fast walk-on and walk-off system in conjunction with large cattle-liner transports. The particular aircraft I am thinking of belonged to Pacific Western Airlines, and it has now either been sold or converted to passenger service.

Air Canada has been involved to a very limited degree, but only with a most inefficient and impractical method. Cattle must first be loaded into smaller, separate crates and then loaded into the aircraft by fork lifts. The process is a time consuming one and does not lend itself to the movement of larger cattle. Accidents, such as broken legs and other similar injuries, are much more likely to happen, and this, of course, is very inefficient and expensive by comparison with the logical walk-on aircraft which are specially converted for this use. Air Canada, however, has not seen fit to supply these specially converted air carriers although they insist on having the "first right of refusal" when it comes to bids from other air freight carriers.

In effect this means that Canadian cattle suppliers or forwarders have a desperation choice, either to truck the cattle to the U.S.A. and then load on carriers other than Air Canada, or pay the higher air freight charges of Air Canada and use its antiquated carriers, and hope to remain competitive enough to attract offshore customers.

Two such Canadian suppliers have had very bitter experiences over this situation. I should like to name them. First there is the Alberta-Canada All Breeds Association with its headquarters in Calgary, a very good organization which has been set up to market special breeding cattle all over the world; and second, there is one that has been in operation much longer, which is known as the World Wide Forwarders of Farnham, Quebec. Both of these reputable Canadian suppliers are continually losing valuable international markets for our Canadian cattle industry because, in effect, Air Canada is essentially restricting Canadian based trade by this "first right of refusal policy" and its outdated, antiquated livestock policy which it has pursued for some time now.

I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to take a look at this very specific part of the Air Canada air freight policy. Since Air Canada is the only carrier in Canada that can realistically get into livestock air freight on a competitive basis, he will find ample support from Canadian cattle producers, forwarders and trade agencies, but the first requirement is a properly modified air freight carrier designed to do the job. This is possible. There are various examples of other foreign carriers which are doing this successfully now.

I should like to refer to a related matter dealing with Air Canada and make a comment about the quality of beef that is served on the menus of Air Canada. I am sure most hon. members appreciate the fact that I travel Air Canada considerably. Mostly every week, and sometimes every second week, I fly from Ottawa, change in Toronto and go on to Calgary. Then either by Time Air or the Greyhound bus I complete the balance of my journey to Medicine Hat. On that rather long trip I am always served at least one hot meal by Air Canada. The comment I wish to make relates to the feature dish, which is beef.

Most of the beef served on Air Canada is simulated steak. It looks like a lovely filet. All of it is produced in either Australia or New Zealand. When you cut into it, it is tough, stringy, and there is not a speck of cover fat on it. It has been frozen and it has been in transport for a long time. It is supplied under a tender system which Air Canada has been employing for some time.

I am not concerned about eating grass beef, and that is what it is. I eat grass beef all the time on my ranch, but at least my own beef has some fat cover on it. There is ample marbling within my beef, it is juicy and tender. The only difference between that home-grown grass beef and corn-fed or barley-fed beef produced in the feed lots in Canada is that it has a slightly different flavour. I am not critical of the fact that Air Canada beef is grass beef but surely, when we can produce the best beef in the world, we should be serving it properly on our own national air carrier system. I want to put in a plea that we ought to do better than we are doing now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the hon. member was preaching for a call that Air Canada should buy his tender, juicy beef.

Mr. Hargrave: We will supply Air Canada any time.

An hon. Member: How about some from your riding?

Mr. Nystrom: There is lots of beef in my riding.

An hon. Member: There is more bull than beef.

Mr. Nystrom: We have some bull as well for the Conservatives, but it is a rather endangered species. Actually, we have tough old bull for the Conservatives.

I am happy to say a few words on the amendment before us today moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in which he wants to strike out the words: "and in particular the contemplation of profit". When some Conservative members spoke today, they seemed to forget that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is referring to those words. When there is a section like this in the act, Air Canada will see as its mandate the particular objective of making a profit and seeking a profit.

I am not against profits in some industries and in some businesses. When one is dealing with a business like transportation, I do not think the primary objective of the airline should be a profit. If it is, the smaller communities will suffer. Sault Ste. Marie will suffer. The Lakehead will suffer. The smaller cities and communities across this country are going to suffer because they cannot make a profit for the company. If the objective is to make a profit, then they are not profitable parts of that enterprise and they will not receive the service to which they are entitled.

I am sure garbage collecting is not a profitable enterprise in this country, but we still have that service. There are various other services in this country which are not profitable. We have made a decision that these services are worth-while and they should be subsidized. It is done as a priority in our society. As a Crown corporation Air Canada's principal objective should not be the making of a profit. If that is its principal objective, then it will not provide service to a lot of communities in this country.

Conservative members have risen in this debate and have indicated that the New Democratic Party is speaking out of turn and is not correct. They are speaking on behalf of the big cities in this country. Only the seven or eight bigger cities in this country will have a good service, because Air Canada can be operated very profitably in those cities.

It is strange that the Conservative party is concerned about enterprise, purity, and making a profit. When other industries are in trouble, suddenly the Conservative party is not a free enterpriser and it wants a little bit of socialism. Some Conservatives often argue for more protection for a lot of the industries in Ontario. I am referring to tariffs, and I am also talking about assistance to some of the corporations in terms of tax grants. All one has to do is take a look at INCO with its socialism for the rich and free enterprise for the poor. That is the type of contradiction which is existent in the Conservative logic.

I can look out west and see how the cattle prices are dropping in Alberta. The cattlemen, who did not want to have a marketing board, are now saying that they want subsidies, support prices, and import quotas and restrictions.

Mr. Hurlburt: No we do not.

Mr. Nystrom: Now they want restrictions on beef which is coming into this country. They want some type of intervention, but they still want free enterprise. You can have one or the other, but you cannot be half pregnant.

Mr. Hurlburt: I suggest the hon. member does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Nystrom: I suggest the Conservative party quite often is half pregnant when they make arguments in this debate and other debates.

I see the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) is present in the Chamber. He was with his leader in his riding in August. His leader was talking about how the Wheat Board should expand, but at the same time he indicated that private organizations should be given the authority and the right to sell grain around the world. In other words, he was talking about getting rid of the Wheat Board as the sole grain marketing agency in this country and turning it over to private enterprise like Cargill. This is an example of Conservatives talking out of both sides of their mouths, depending on who their particular audience is.

We have the Air Canada bill before us, and the Conservatives want profit to be a major and main priority for Air Canada. If that is done, it will ruin one of the basic principles of transportation in this country, which is to provide a service to every Canadian regardless of where that Canadian lives, at the lowest possible cost. If that is done, a lot stronger country will be developed than we have today. Also there will be a lot more equity and fairness in the country than we have today, and there will be a lot more dispersed development.

If the country is set up on the profit motive, there will be a tremendous amount of centralization.

Mr. Hurlburt: What about Manitoba and British Columbia?

● (2142)

Mr. Nystrom: If you have subsidized transportation, then there will be more incentive for people to establish industries in this country in places other than Montreal, Vancouver, and Toronto. There will be more incentive for people to live in places other than the four or five big cities in the country if they can have good transportation facilities. I know what I am speaking about because I come from a constituency which has fought for years for a good air service. I believe the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) has already referred to places like Dauphin, Yorkton, and Brandon. But if you operate a transportation system only on profit, we will never get transportation by air for these centres because they are too small and it is not profitable. The official critic of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), says that is right. He is right, but if the priority of Air Canada is to operate solely on profit, you will not have a service for those communities.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: When the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) was speaking and the Conservatives started to heckle, somebody said he flushed them out. I think the time has come for me to flush them down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is what happened in Manitoba to you.

Mr. Nystrom: That is what happens in a society where huge corporations are given as much leeway as possible to make a profit. That is their guiding light, Mr. Speaker. Their guiding light is the almighty buck, profit, regardless of whom it might harm. This is the same Conservative party which, a few days or a few weeks ago, was talking about the great things that the government has done in defence of INCO, the great tax write-offs to create some incentives in our society. I am surprised they are not saying "hear, hear!". They want more of those incentives. But what happens when we have a corporation which gets those handouts, laying off workers in places such as Sudbury and Thompson? That is the type of philosophy that the Conservatives and the Liberals have.

As the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) said, both parties are the same. There are as many small "l" liberals in one party as in the other, and as many small "c" conservatives in one party as in the other. He ought to know, he has been in both of them, he has been inside the hides of both of them. He said that both of them had the same philosophy and the same ideology, and the only differences are in the personalities in the two parties. If it comes down to just personalities, there is no real difference if anyone wants to make any real changes.

I argue very strongly that the motion put before the House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre be supported, that we strike out of the bill in particular the contemplation of profit because, if it remains, Air Canada will have it as one of its primary objectives and this will be very destructive and negative for the air transportation facilities in our country.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order just to clarify the total misinterpretation by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) of what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said in my constituency this summer. The reason I waited until now is that I wanted to allow the hon. member to finish his remarks. I did not want to interrupt him. The reference was made in connection with the Canadian Wheat Board. The hon. member is totally wrong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member cannot use the procedure of raising a point of order to clarify a statement that was made outside the House. If it were a statement he had made himself, he could use the rules of the House to make a clarification, but to give an explanation of something that did not occur in this place can be done only if the hon. member sought the floor and participated in the debate.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I have already spoken in this debate. What I meant to do was to clarify an erroneous statement made by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville which I do not believe should go unchallenged in the House of Commons. It was in connection with what the Leader of the Opposition said in relation to the Canadian Wheat Board. The Leader of the Opposition is completely and totally behind the Canadian Wheat Board, as is the Conservative party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How far behind?

Mr. Murta: And we feel the Board has done a good job. We are looking at ways to improve their selling function. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said, and the hon. member left a totally false impression in the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The remarks of the hon. member prove that he was raising a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I am sure I have the right to say a couple of words in response to the misleading statement of the hon. member for Lisgar.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nystrom: I was only quoting a reputable journalist from the Regina Leader-Post named Fred Harrison, who had called the office of the Leader of the Opposition, who did not deny the statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat? What the hon. member is doing is to prove again that the Chair was right and that the point raised was just a point of debate, not a point of order, something which the Chair did not accept. It is certain therefore that I cannot accept another point of order which is an argument.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a draw.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): It is unfortunate that in dealing with this bill, instead of addressing themselves to it, the NDP have tended to launch into an ideological diatribe, beating their political drum for all its worth. I would respectfully draw to the attention of the NDP the particular passage over which they expressed so much concern, that is, that the board shall have due regard to sound business principles. This is not the complete quote, but there was genuine reason for concern on the part of the NDP with reference to sound business principles.

I can understand the NDP having difficulty with sound business principles, and I really appreciate their dilemma. Certainly the history of the NDP in British Columbia would indicate that they had a great many problems with sound business principles, but if they look at the clause which gives them so much difficulty and realize that the contemplation of profit is only there as a reference—it is not said there that Air Canada must make a profit, a word which sticks in their throats, they gag on the word "profit"—they would understand it better.

To put this ideological argument to rest, to put the whole thing in its proper perspective, let us quote one of their authorities. I am referring to the backroom mastermind of three Ontario election campaigns of the NDP. The man in question is Mr. Gerald Caplan. What does he have to say about the economic problems of the party he represents? He says:

> That lurking fear among potential supporters that we've never met a payroll, that we simply don't know how to run this store . . .

David Lewis, the former leader of the NDP, said the following:

> One of the real deficiencies in my own leadership was that I was never able to clarify adequately the NDP's proficiency with the economy.

I would be quite prepared to address myself entirely to this bill, but I think first we have to look at it in the perspective of the arguments which have been presented by my friends on my left. Mr. Caplan went on to say that the NDP failed to increase its vote because it did not prove itself responsible on economic matters. The red herring of garbage collection was raised here. I fail to see any similarity between garbage collection and Air Canada, and I am sure Air Canada would not appreciate that reference.

If we are going to get involved with whether a particular telephone company makes a profit or whether it is a Crown corporation, I suggest to my colleagues on my left both physically and politically that they examine the record of B.C. Hydro. If they think that Air Canada has a problem making a profit, perhaps they should examine British Columbia Hydro. After all, I notice in the guide which gives us a background and a history of all members of parliament, one member who used to serve the riding of Kootenay West and who said, "These accomplishments," referring to the accomplishments of his party, "include forcing the B.C. government to take over Hydro facilities". How the citizens of British Columbia have rued that day, and speakers from that particular party have expressed that same concern since then.

In Kootenay West there is a small utility company called West Kootenay Power. It is one of those nasty corporate companies which makes a profit. That company services the Kootenays, part of the Okanagan and right through to Princeton. The people of those areas will have nothing to do with B.C. Hydro. Why? Because West Kootenay Power, while it operates at a profit, has utility rates at least one quarter lower than those established by that giant, B.C. Hydro.

Mr. Hogan: Which government nationalized Ontario Hydro? It was a Progressive Conservative government.

Mr. Brisco: You will have your turn, brother.

Mr. Haidasz: It's "Father".

Mr. Brisco: I did not realize that he was promoted to a father. I hope it will not be long before he is canonized.

Mr. Hogan: Cheap shot there, boy.

Mr. Brisco: By its rates and by the inflated salaries it has paid to linemen and other hydro workers, B.C. Hydro has robbed utility companies of valued employees right across this country. Utility companies simply cannot compete with the wages which are paid by B.C. Hydro.

That is getting far and a way from this bill, but if the members of the NDP are going to bring in red herrings, then I feel responsible to respond to them. They have said that public transportation should never make a profit and that it is there to serve the public. Certainly public transportation is there to serve the public. I do not argue that point, and I do not suggest that in remote areas it will make a profit. However, a clause in this bill says that sound business principles have to be considered. Is there something wrong with that?

Is there some new economic policy of the NDP which would employ other than sound principles? They wail and moan about small communities which are going to be badly hit and terribly hurt if Air Canada decides to make a profit. At some time I would like to talk to them about the history of Castlegar and of Pacific Western Airlines. As a matter of fact, CP air sold that run because it could not make a profit. However, the economy of the area gradually improved, Pacific Western hung on, and now that operation is so busy that the airports are in need of expansion. The people find that there are not enough seats on the aircraft. We now have 737 jet service instead of Convair or DC-6 service. It is a small feeder service. It goes to Cranbrook, Castlegar, Penticton, Kelowna, and ultimately ends in Vancouver, Edmonton and Calgary, those major centres. It is a profitable run, in spite of the fact that, during the winter months, weather often causes cancelled flights.

We hear about that big, bad corporate monster, CP Air. Thank God we are not talking about CP Rail. I might be in sympathy with my friends.

Mr. Hogan: They are all the same; it is a conglomerate.

Mr. Brisco: My friends say CP Air is busy trying to get more and more routes and more and more profit, and is being granted long hauls. I think it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said it has been granted long hauls, the money-makers. I wonder how many have looked at the number of CP Air aircraft which fly into Ottawa and have compared it with the number of Air Canada aircraft which fly into Ottawa. If there ever was a profitable run, it is that bureaucratic air bus from Toronto to Ottawa.

Mr. Hogan: That is false. Look at the profits for last year. They lost money.

Mr. Brisco: There is no question in my mind, nor in the minds of hon. members on both sides of this House, that Air Canada should operate in a sound business manner. There is nothing wrong with operating in that fashion. There is nothing wrong with attempting to make a profit, and if hon. members to my left are so confused that they think our national airline is not listening to what hon. members say here, is not responsible to parliament or to the standing committee and will not be affected by changes, they are indeed very naïve. If Air Canada is squeezing the public in some cases on solely a profit motive, then surely the matter will be before this House in very shot order. So I say, what is wrong with Air Canada or any other Crown corporation using sound business principles and making a profit?

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the previous speaker with regard to the profitability of the Air Canada run from Ottawa to Montreal and Toronto. If we look at the figures, excluding the costs of the airports, we find that in the last two or three years, without getting any extra competition from CP Air, Air Canada has been losing money. This is one of the difficulties we have when talking about transportation policy in Canada from the point of view of an area like the Atlantic region. There is supposed to be competition, but in reality it does not add up to any competition at all.

How can a member of parliament come here and make a distinction in an abstract way between CP Air as an entity and Canadian Pacific as a corporation, which controls everything we see in its advertisements and how it is concerned about profit?

It is terrible that hon. members in the official opposition squabble with one another instead of with the leaders of the present government. This opposition party has shown that when it comes to cutting the cake there is no difference between it and the Liberal party. There is a difference in personalities but not in terms of what the last member called ideology but what I would call "idiology". The difference is basically that these two, large, old parties are committed to the profit motive, even if it means that areas like Atlantic Canada and others do not get the services they should. They deny that, but it is the conclusion that one has to draw from the way they argued tonight and on many other occasions.

Would anyone in their right senses object to a clause providing that Air Canada or any other business should be run along business lines? Does that mean we would therefore have to operate a national airline or national transportation system geared primarily to making a profit? The history of Europe, as opposed to that of this country, shows this is not the case. No one is going to object to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) trying to achieve better business management.

Coming from a region like mine in Atlantic Canada where private enterprise in the form of Hawker Siddeley and Dosco left us high and dry, just as Inco will leave Sudbury high and dry when the minerals are out of the ground, we know that what happens eventually is that the public has to take over. In such regions the profit motive is not paramount, and even in our market system service should take precedence. That does not mean we are against business enterprise but it means that we do our best to minimize losses.

Areas like Toronto, which because of large population can move great numbers of people who have high incomes, can make a profit on certain runs. These people share part of the cost of servicing the Atlantic region, the Kootenays, areas on Vancouver Island or in Newfoundland. That is what Confederation is about, Mr. Speaker. It is part of what the Parti Québécois is objecting to, leaving aside the linguistic and cultural concerns. Are we or are we not one country?

Because I come from a maritime part of the country must I accept inadequate public transportation so that some company can make more profit by serving central Canada, an area protected by tariffs, import quotas, and other types of protection alien to any kind of theoretical free enterprise system of which you can think?

I admire people who have enough gall to think that others are so stupid that they do not mind these companies that operate in Ontario behind a 40 per cent protective barrier, in furniture, footwear, textiles and other areas. I could go on down the list. They pretend that this is free enterprise. We live in a mixed economy with the government supplying the basic impetus which keeps the economy going. Where private enterprise and incentive come in is in retailing and in wholesaling. Who is going to object to that? What we object to is seeing so-called private corporations getting deferred taxes amounting to millions of dollars, taxes which have run into billions of dollars over the history of this country.

• (2207)

We have been listening to some of these right wing Conservatives who belong to the government across the way, a government which the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) has said has one of the weakest cabinets we have ever had. What kind of nonsense is it to say that we have free enterprise? Do the few people in the gallery listening to me tonight believe that kind of malarkey? The North American economy and the economy of the western world are underwritten by government. The risk that private enterprise takes is small because the taxpayers underwrite that risk.

About three weeks ago Ottawa sent 310 jobs to Cape Breton as part of its decentralization program. Twenty-six per cent of all civil servants, give or take a couple of percentage points, live either in this city or in Hull. Certainly I favour Hull over Ottawa. This is probably a hateful thing to say, but I think the Frenchmen have been screwed under Confederation in many ways.

As for the United States, 12 per cent of the civil servants in that country live in Washington. Some 6 to 8 per cent of Swedish civil servants are in Stockholm. With this big, centralized government bureaucracy, are hon. members trying to tell me that the basis of our economy is free enterprise? We are not opposed to free enterprise when it comes to buying a suit of clothes or going into a restaurant, but let us admit the reality of today. In one way or another we have a socialistic system.

With so much being underwritten and paid for by the taxpayers of Canada, either through the federal or the provincial governments, it is pure nonsense to say we have any other system. To call it a free enterprise system is so much nonsense. Yet this is what economic textbooks would have us believe.

Mr. Symes: Or an ideological straitjacket.

Mr. Hogan: The hon. member who preceded me tried to defend private enterprise when it does not exist. As I say, the whole system is underwritten by the government. One does not need a high school or college education, or to be an economist, to recognize that that is the sine qua non, the basic premise, of our economy today. We have evolved into a mixed capitalist-government economy. Who in their right mind would oppose that today?

The CNR has made a profit for the first time in 20 years. According to what I have read, the Minister of Transport now wants to sell the CNR because he says it is not making a profit. He says this after the Canadian taxpayers have underwritten that profit. What kind of nonsense is this?

Mr. Symes: It is Liberal nonsense.

Air Canada

Mr. Hogan: What kind of nonsense is it when a private enterprise firm leaves the Cape Breton steel industry and the federal government then turns it over to the provincial government of Nova Scotia and says, "You guys run it on your own"? Seven hundred thousand people, with one of the lowest income standards in this country, and they ask them to make it a competitive international steel industry! Then it wiped its hands clear of them. The people there have been suffering ever since.

• (2212)

Some are surprised and say to me it is an exaggeration that people are committing suicide because they are unemployed. It is not an exaggeration. These people felt what it was like to be constantly unemployed.

I realize I am getting terribly emotional. However, it is time somebody did.

Does anyone really think that the Indians of this country are inferior? Does anyone think they are the way they are because they want to be that way? Is it not because we have put them on reservations?

We are also putting others who are not red skinned on economic reservations. We are doing this to those in Cape Breton, and are in the process of putting those who work for Inco in the same position. This is a beautiful tale to be told about the multinational corporations.

The Canadian Export Development Corporation goes to Guatemala and Indonesia under the guise of helping the underdeveloped countries. At the same time, the government allows Canadian jobs to disappear. Is that what we need to help the underdeveloped world? What is happening?

Eric Kierans was right. He is a professor of economics at McGill University. He was a cabinet member of this Liberal government and sat in the Quebec legislature. He is no red radical socialist. He is a very well off man. He called it the way it is.

What has happened is that we have a marxism version of the twentieth century happening in Canada and all over the western world. It is not to the extent that Marx said it would happen. However, the government has certainly become the ruling committee of the bourgeois, and the bourgeois in our context is the multinational corporation.

The multinational corporations say they want more, without promising they will create more jobs. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) is supposed to be a friend of the ordinary worker in this country. I suggest that he and other ministers look at the figures of CALURA. They will see $10 billion to $12 billion in deferred taxes, with not a cent of interest being paid by the multinational corporations.

An idealistic woman is now head of Health and Welfare. She is trying to scrimp and scrape in order to get the basis for a guaranteed annual income. I will tell her, as Eric Kierans told the cabinet which he had to leave because he could not convince its right-wing people, if they put 10 per cent, which is less than the market price, on the current taxes that are owed, they would have $1 billion to $1½ billion to start a guaranteed annual income scheme in this country. We do not want to live in a country in which forever the lowest 25 per cent of the people are going to get 4 per cent of the gross national product.

I must say that I have become somewhat modified since coming to parliament. I realize, now, that many politicians work very hard and that they deserve to be higher than they are in the so-called pecking order, but, for God's sake, is not the time here for us to say in this country, in North America, that we cannot go on in this way, that we just have to make sacrifices in order that the lower income people, both here and in other parts of the world, get their fair share? Rhetoric alone will do nothing. We have to build the institutions which will make this possible, and if this is ranting, raving socialism, I apologize to my hon. friends.

● (2215)

When you know them well enough, they are all nice fellows in this Chamber, whether they are from the Liberal party, the Conservative party or whatever. I am talking about human beings. We are a very small percentage of the human beings who live on this earth, and unless we distribute income and wealth in a fairer way we shall find ourselves in still greater difficulty—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. My intention is not to remind the hon. member that his time has expired but merely to ask him to come back to the subject matter of the amendment which is before us.

Mr. Hogan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I come from the Atlantic region and I can tell you that in the Atlantic region, because of over-emphasis on the profit motive by a Crown corporation, we are getting less service. It is true that only 5 or 10 per cent of our people use the airlines anyway, and we in this Chamber are among those who are so privileged. But there are a lot of people who find they need to fly in certain circumstances because, for example, of the death of relatives living far away in other parts of the country. They are getting short-changed.

I want to tell the hon. member from the Kootenay area that we all understand the need for good business management and so on. But the Minister of Transport is one of the most conservative men I have ever met in my life—next to the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner)! That man has no idea what it means to live in an outport in Newfoundland, or what it means to live in isolated areas where transportation facilities are desperately needed. This does not mean you say "to hell with costs completely". Obviously, the Canadian taxpayer, through income tax or sales tax, or indirectly through the very weak corporation taxes, would in the end have to pick up the bill. There has to be a balance.

We are not complaining that a profit might be made. But we suspect that a profit will be made, as has been done so often in the past, at the price of service to Canadians. It is that type of thinking, especially if it is pursued to a logical conclusion in line with the wishes of the Minister of Transport, which will lead Canadians into great difficulty.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the socialists are at it again tonight and I think it is important that we should first of all take a look at what they are proposing. Many of their speeches have wandered from the point.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) spent a lot of time on the phrase "contemplation of profit" and that is what they said they intended to delete. But that is not exactly what the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) proposed to delete. It is going to delete the contemplation of profit, but it will also delete the requirement that the Board shall have due regard to sound business principles. It is important to emphasize that, because the type of thinking—

● (2222)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read the rest of it.

Mr. Stevens: —the socialists have been espousing here tonight is the type of thinking that the Trudeau Liberal government has been following for years. The hon. member decries unemployment. I agree with him, but the unemployment he decries is due to those very socialistic principles which are being espoused in this House tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will not take any more than a minute of the hon. member's time, but I should like to remind the hon. member that I come from an area in which private enterprise left us high and dry. With all the faults of this government, if it did not take over the coal mines and it failed to take over the steel mills, we would be in a worse position.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member is making an argument.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, before we vote on the proposed amendment, I think it is important for us to see in its entirety what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre intends to delete from the bill before us. According to his motion, he intends to delete lines 6 to 9 on page four of the bill. Those lines read as follows:

> In discharging its responsibilities under this act, the Board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

Let us not allow the socialists to confuse this issue. They are making a two-pronged attack. First of all, they want to make sure that the directors are not going to be required to follow sound business principles, and second, that they should not carry out their activities in contemplation of profit.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Primarily.

Mr. Stevens: It does not say "primarily". This is the type of confusion the hon. member continually attempts to put into this bill. If they want to espouse their garbage, I think it is high time that they at least stick to the facts. The amendment does not say "primarily", although I noticed that they almost uniformly used that type of wording to denote what they were trying to achieve.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The word is "particularly".

Mr. Stevens: I thank the hon. member for retracting that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the same thing.

Mr. Stevens: Now the hon. member is saying that it is the same thing. If he reads the dictionary, he will find that it is very much different.

Mr. Orlikow: What dictionary?

Mr. Stevens: The Oxford Dictionary. I think it is important to separate these two things. Surely there should be no serious suggestion that the Board of Directors of Air Canada should not follow sound business principles. Also it should be accepted that, in doing that, the evidence of their following sound business principles is the profit which they make. Their efficiency is simply registered or gauged by profit.

There has been a very serious misunderstanding of this legislation. I understand how the hon. members who did not attend this committee can make such a mistake. They are confusing the operation of Air Canada with service. The reason I feel a clear distinction is necessary is that clauses 8 and 9 of the bill, in my opinion, deal with service in the sense of service where Air Canada is being expected to run an airline into an area which is not viable. In that case the act contemplates the minister may, in effect, order Air Canada into that area, and it will be compensated out of the public treasury for whatever loss is incurred.

We are not saying that if there are areas in Canada that should have air service and it is not viable or profitable to put an air service there, we should abandon them. What we are saying is, let us get it out into the open, let us see what is the subsidy which the government will be called upon to pay, and clauses 8 and 9 contemplate that. They say very clearly that if the minister feels there is a need for a service and he asks the air line to go in, subsequently a calculation will be made of the cost and loss, and the loss will be repaid to Air Canada. So I say that basically the main thrust of the socialists' arguments tonight is really off the point. If essentially they want Air Canada to provide a service into areas that otherwise would not be profitable, they can get that simply by stressing that the Minister should implement clauses 8 or 9 in whatever areas they feel it is desirable to do so.

That is the service side. What we believe is a necessary ingredient in the bill is the provision which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to delete, namely, that when you give an airline such as Air Canada $370 million of capital, surely the least we can expect from them is that they will use that capital in a business-like way and make a profit. In short, if they put out $370 million at 10 per cent interest, they can make $37 million before they do anything. What we hope to instill in Air Canada, and certainly in their directors, is a sense that they are given in trust $370 million of public money, and that we hope that in running the airlines they will do so in accordance with sound business principles and will run up a profit, which, I think, is not too difficult.

If we look at the record, I think we have cause to ask that this airline be run at a profit, because for the last three years they have consistently lost huge amounts of public money.

Mr. Symes: Due to over-competition.

Mr. Stevens: Does the socialist from Sault Ste. Marie realize that Air Canada has 50 per cent of the total air travel in Canada at present? If he read the Globe and Mail this morning he would have seen that the total revenue in 1976 of all airlines in Canada was $2.57 billion. If he picked up the annual report of Air Canada he would find that their revenue was $1.125 billion.

An hon. Member: We want the load factor.

Mr. Stevens: If he wants the load factor, it is over 70 per cent. What the socialists love to do is to get big pots of money—$370 million would be lovely. They love to load on to that pot of money as many civil servants as they can hang on to it, and then when they come up with a loss their excuse always is that after all they provided a service. We have to start calling things the way they are. The entire approach of these socialists is a sham and a fraud on the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You want to continue with the tariffs, the grants, and the subsidies.

Mr. Stevens: In 1974 Air Canada had 50 per cent of the revenue of all airlines in this country. In 1974 they lost $18.7 million; in 1975, $24.9 million; in 1976, $22.2 million, for a total of almost $66 million. Is it wrong for members of the House to say simply that if they wish to be recapitalized they should at least make a profit in future? May I call it 10.30 p.m. Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED FREEZE ON PRACTICE OF CONTRACTING OUT WORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put forward a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of reports in the Argus Journal of the Public Service Alliance of Canada that the alliance is seriously concerned that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) is misleading taxpayers and the House of Commons about public service growth, and that members of the alliance are so concerned about government contracting, and contracting out to retired public servants that they plan mass rallies in such cities as Winnipeg to discuss such alarming figures as the fact that 29 departments have taken on 3,700 employees at a cost of $130 million for 1975 and 1976, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That this House instruct the President of the Treasury Board to place an immediate freeze on all government contracting out, and contracting out to retired public servants, that the President of the Treasury Board be directed to appear before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates to explain the necessity for contracting out work and also that the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada be invited to testify before this committee.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REFERENCE TO LETTER DATED DECEMBER 19, 1972, FROM DIRECTOR OF SECURITY TO SOLICITOR GENERAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 pertaining to an affidavit signed by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) on October 12 of this year. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to inform the House of the contents of a letter dated December 19, 1972 sent by the director general of security services of the RCMP to the then solicitor general on the subject of the illegal break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre in the fall of 1972.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO RAID INTO OFFICES OF SOCIAL CREDIT PARTY IN RIMOUSKI—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and particularly urgent matter.

As flagrant proof has forced the federal government into revealing the illegal and brutal acts of the RCMP, as those isolated cases may cover up a whole system of undue interference into the affairs of individuals and legally recognized organizations, and as the Rimouski offices of the Social Credit Party of Canada were cleared of all books and documents by agents of the RCMP, which books have yet, to my knowledge, to be returned, and bearing in mind that the agents of the RCMP, by taking all those books and documents—among which lists of the members of that party in Canada—by so doing and by other actions, have led to legal proceedings with the result of confessions obtained through duress, intimidation, and promises of all sorts pertaining to the application of the Canada Elections Act with regard to tax-deductible contributions, and that those circumstances have discredited all members of our party, and finally because the machinations of such a system must be brought to light, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That an inquiry be set up to determine to what extent the RCMP overstepped its rights by acting as it did when it searched, on May 7, 1975, the premises of the Social Credit Party of Canada in Rimouski, and to what extent it was entitled to terrorize peaceful and defenceless citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING DECLINE OF DOLLAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent necessity. Although the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has stated that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is not intervening in foreign exchange markets and that the public will not know the day to day fall in our exchange reserves, his own department has published figures today which show our foreign exchange reserves have fallen $605.5 million in one month, confirming earlier estimates. In view of this precarious state of our currency, temporarily stabilized by foreigners financing purchases of Canadian grain, and in view of the minister's misleading and contradictory statements about our exchange position, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

● (1412)

That this House refer the matter of our declining dollar to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and that that Committee be instructed to report on the adequacy of our foreign exchange reserves, the reason for their decline to an all time low in relation to our trade deficit, the reason why new 'stand-by' credits were arranged with private banks when there are already lines of credit available from other countries' Central Banks, and in particular, the terms of the stand-by arrangement.

Mr. Speaker: This motion under the provision of Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent for presentation. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR TARIFF PROTECTION FOR PAPER AND BOXBOARD MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since 80 per cent of Canada's paper industry is not protected by duties and Canadian boxboard mills cannot compete with mills in the United States because the Canadian government does not provide comparable conditions with regard to taxation, transportation, machinery and equipment costs and export incentives, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That the Minister of Finance ask our representatives in the Tokyo round of GATT negotiations now in progress, to protect the Canadian paper and boxboard industry against unfair exposure to market conditions which could be ruinous to this industry and the jobs of its employees.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with Standing Order 43 such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MANDATE OF SECURITY SERVICE PRIOR TO MARCH, 1975—PERSON AUTHORIZING OPERATIONS AND REPORTING PROVISION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister who I am pleased to welcome back to the House of Commons. On Friday the Solicitor General indicated that the Cabinet on March 27, 1975 defined the mandate of the security services. The Prime Minister will recall that those illegal offences of which the House of Commons has been informed to date occurred before that definition of the mandate. Will the Prime Minister tell the House what the mandate of the security services was prior to March 27, 1975 and specifically did that mandate, prior to March 1975, deal with the question of illegal activities and what instructions were given to the security services in regard to illegal activities?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the mandate which was that of the security services before the date of the giving of those guidelines to the RCMP, was the traditional mandate carried out by the RCMP under previous governments to mine. As far as I know, they go back as far as the RCMP has existed. We have not been able to find specific guidelines parallel to the ones we issued in March. The reason some were issued in March, 1975 was that at that time we realized the RCMP had been investigating a legal political party. They were asking us for guidance in terms of what they should be doing in order to best protect the security of the country. We indicated to them that the answer would be contained in these guidelines. There was nothing in the guidelines, of course, authorizing any illegal act, nor do I believe the common-law guidelines existing before the general mandate given to the RCMP security services under the RCMP Act has ever referred to the fact that the RCMP could commit any illegalities. It was not found necessary by my government, or by I think any previous government, to indicate to the police that they could not act illegally.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House who, prior to the March, 1975 guidelines had the ultimate authority to authorize security operations and what provisions existed for reporting upon those security operations to either the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General? Further, what actions did the Prime Minister take to satisfy himself that no illegal activities were undertaken?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the practice of reporting security operations is one which existed under my cabinet, as it existed under previous cabinets. There were periodic reports to cabinet of security risks. As infrequently as once a year, I believe we had a committee of cabinet listen to the RCMP in order that they may tell us what security risks were incurred by Canada, what they were doing about them, what dangerous groups were being investigated and so on. Of course, there were particular cases where information was given to me individually as the Prime Minister. Perhaps they would have to do with the police thinking that somebody should be declared a persona non grata in the country. In cases like this, they would discuss it with the Secretary of State for External Affairs or myself. Therefore, there were individual cases of security risks coming to the attention of the police; but generally there was an annual report, and sometimes more frequently.

ACTION TO ENSURE NO ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES BY SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in order to understand what went on during that period—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —is the Prime Minister telling this House that apart from an annual meeting, and perhaps occasional briefings which I gather were initiated by the security service, he as Prime Minister took no provision to assure or satisfy himself, as the responsible minister, that the security services were not involved in any illegal activity? Is that the position of the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and that was also my position with regard to any other agency of government. I took no particular precaution to tell them they should not break the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has admitted in this House that he became aware the security services were engaged in surveillance of a legitimate political party. At that time did he not ask who authorized that surveillance? At that time did the question not cross his mind as to whether the control he was keeping, as the responsible minister, over security services which were, by his own admission, then undertaking the surveillance of activities of political parties that might have been involved in illegal activities, that it was prudent for him to establish some means to ensure that the law was not being broken and that initiatives such as the surveillance of political parties or ordinary citizens were not being taken?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, when I heard that a political party was under surveillance, we issued guidelines indicating that that should not be done. The hon. Leader of the Opposition asked me if at that time I did not suspect that in order to undertake the surveillance of a political party the police would have to break the law. I do not think that follows at all. Certainly, it did not cross my mind. I imagine we could get a list of the members of the Conservative party just by giving some money to some member of the secretariat who would give us a list. There is nothing illegal about that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Surveillance is a different thing.

Mr. Trudeau: I just found it offensive that the RCMP had lists and was undertaking the surveillance of a political party.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is right.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know if I knew at the time they had lists. They told me they were undertaking the surveillance of a party. I would imagine surveillance implied knowing somebody was a member of that party. I told them they should not continue to do that. There was no more reason to suspect that they were breaking the law by conducting a surveillance of that party, than to suspect they were breaking the law by conducting a surveillance of any spy or terrorist who was coming into Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Civil libertarian!

• (1422)

DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMATION GAINED BY SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. What policy instructions did federal security services have prior to 1975 with regard to the dissemination of information gathered legally or illegally from surveillance of political parties? As a matter of policy, was the information gathered given to the Prime Minister or the cabinet committee on security and intelligence chaired by the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, since the time I became Prime Minister in 1968, I know of no surveillance exercise of any political party as such, only the one I referred to in the case of the Parti Quebecois and I had it stopped as soon as I learned about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am quite sure that the policy of the RCMP until that time had been to exercise surveillance on those who might be considered a security risk, whether they belonged to one party or another or to no party at all. However, the idea of surveillance of a party which was legal under the law was something absolutely unknown to me, and I presume previous Prime Ministers, until we realized there had been surveillance of the PQ for a short period of time. I repeat, as soon as we found that out, we asked that it be stopped.

Mr. Jarvis: Now that the Prime Minister has had an opportunity to check on this unhappy affair, can he say if anyone in government was given notice of the subscription lists taken from the APLQ in 1972 and the membership list and financial information of the Parti Québécois in 1973? Has the Prime Minister checked and determined that no one in government was given a copy of all that information?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have checked that the Solicitors General at the time did not have knowledge of this break-in which obtained lists of members of the PQ. I had no knowledge. I presume if the police were going to pass the knowledge on to anyone, it would be the Solicitor General or myself and they did not. I cannot vouch for the fact that some lists may not be leaked, for all I know to some members of the opposition. Things do leak from the RCMP. We saw just a year ago that a letter from General Dare to Mr. Bourne was leaked to the Toronto Sun. I cannot say that nothing leaked. I do say that this government has no knowledge of the content of those lists nor, as far as I know, any member on this side of the House.

INQUIRY IF PRIME MINISTER HAD LIST OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS MEMBERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. He is quoted in last Saturday's Globe and Mail as being amazed when he learned of the surveillance of a democratically constituted party in Canada. His words were "Gee, we have got to stop this." Given his alleged state of amazement that such serious and wrong activity was taking place in terms of monitoring political parties in Canada, and given the fact that he said "maybe they" with reference to the RCMP "did tell me" about having a membership list of the PQ, considering at one point in his answer today he said yes he did have a list but then corrected himself and said no he did not have a list, if he was amazed when told about this in 1974 or 1975, he could not remember the year either—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —can he now tell us definitively if he did have a list of the membership of the PQ and why in heaven's name he did not pursue the question to see if it had been obtained legally or not.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the leader of the New Democratic Party is distorting my words. I never said in the House or even in my press conference that I might or might not have had a list. I said they, the RCMP, might or might not have told me they had a list. That is something entirely different.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do know I was informed by the RCMP that they were exercising surveillance of the Parti Québécois. That was perhaps in 1974 or 1975 because we issued the guidelines in March 1975. These guidelines were meant to tell the police that they should only exercise certain types of surveillance, those spelled out by the Solicitor General in his speech in the House on Friday. Therefore it might have taken place in 1974 or early 1975. I could check the year by looking at some diaries, but it is not that relevant. The relevant thing is when we found out they were exercising surveillance of a democratically constituted political party, we told them to stop and issued the guidelines.

• (1427)

The hon. member wants to know whether or not I was told then that they had a list. I honestly do not remember them having told me they had a list. But I would agree that it is reasonable to presume that if you have police and they are reasonably smart, which they are, and they are exercising surveillance of a party, whether it is one of the parties over there or our party, one of the things they would do would be to get a list. You can buy a list. You can get a list very easily. There is no reason to suppose, as the Leader of the Opposition was supposing, that in order to get this particular piece of information they had to do anything illegal.

The police are getting information all the time. I am sure they are getting it from the members opposite but it is not always cooperative. The police are getting information, perhaps, on the activities of agents in this country which are detrimental to our security. The police are getting information on people who might be engaged in acts of terrorism, and so on. There is no reason to suppose that in order to get this information they have to break the law. And I did not presuppose that they broke the law in order to get those lists, assuming they told me at the time that they had them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LEGALITY OF MANNER IN WHICH PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS MEMBERSHIP LISTS OBTAINED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The Prime Minister's little speech will only persuade those who sit behind him. Considering the right hon. gentleman's serious moral and political responsibility—I say "political" in the context of the times when there was a rising separatist movement in the Province of Quebec and when the Prime Minister discovered that the federal police force were monitoring a political party, the Parti Québécois—did he not consider it his basic responsibility at least to find out whether they were doing it legally? If not, how can he claim to sit in his present seat with any confidence and assurance?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I told the Leader of the Opposition that from time to time, perhaps once a year in the earlier stages but much more frequently in the later stages, we had information from the police. They would tell the ministers involved with security—the Minister of National Defence, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Justice and myself—certain information. They would tell us about subversive groups in Canada, about terrorist groups in Canada, and so on. We did not ask them each time where they got this information.

Mr. Broadbent: Each time? It only came up once!

Mr. Trudeau: We did not ask the police where they got the information about these terrorists. We did not say to them: Did you break the law in order to get it? Did you have to infiltrate a group?

Mr. Baldwin: You should have done!

Mr. Trudeau: I hear from the hon. member for Peace River that a prime minister should ask that kind of question.

Some hon. Members: Yes!

Mr. Broadbent: Only if you want to know the truth.

Mr. Trudeau: To this, I can only say two things. The first is that we on this side presume that the police are an honest group of people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This does not mean they do not sometimes make mistakes. But when they do make mistakes and we discover them, for example, breaking the law, we report it to the Attorney General of the province where the act is suspected to have been committed. The second point is that if we on this side are to be urged by both opposition parties to begin monitoring the day by day operations of the police, asking them about their information, how they got it, who they got it from, we shall have secrets on a lot of Canadians and we will hear from the opposition that it is not the role of the government to involve itself in the political direction of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1432)

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—LETTER DATED DECEMBER 19, 1972, FROM DIRECTOR OF SECURITY TO MINISTER

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister takes five minutes to make little speeches. I would simply remind him that the questions which have come from the official opposition and from ourselves are not about things in general, they are about this specific incident concerning the Parti Québécois. So your baloney is not going to kid anyone, Mr. Prime Minister.

I should like to ask a question on a related matter. The Prime Minister and the former Solicitor General, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, have maintained that they did not learn of the illegal entry into the offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre until March, 1976. Since I have learned that, according to an affidavit signed by the present Solicitor General on the twelfth of this month, a letter dated December 19, 1972 was sent by the director-general of the security service on the subject of the 1972 break-in to the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, would the Prime Minister undertake to inform the House of the contents of this letter, at least as they pertain to that break-in?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party, like the Leader of the Opposition, was complaining a moment ago that I was not in the House yesterday. Now, they are complaining that I am answering at too great a length, Mr. Speaker. The answer to this question will be given by the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased to have the opportunity of responding to the specific question put by the leader of the New Democratic Party. It is my hope that in the months to come the members of the opposition will show as much morality in the pursuit of their parties' objectives as they expect from the police in the pursuit of national security. Perhaps the next time the members of the opposition receive stolen documents, Mr. Speaker, they will think in terms of returning them to the proper authority.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Solicitor General might confine himself to the answer.

Mr. Clark: He has not done so yet.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that the leader of the New Democratic Party, who has made a great deal about this letter since last night, captivating the attention of the people across the country and indicating that this letter contains material—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: If the Solicitor General has a response, will he make it forthwith.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the leader of the New Democratic Party that all the documents indicated in that affidavit will be made available to the McDonald commission of inquiry. I should like also to point out to the hon. member that the letter in question is not from Mr. Starnes to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; rather it is a letter from the present director-general of the security service, General Dare, to the minister. There is a typographical error in the document: the document in question ought properly to be dated December, 1973 and it relates in no manner whatsoever to the break-in at the APLQ headquarters in October of 1972. Had the hon. member communicated with me this morning, Mr. Speaker, I would have been delighted to give him that particular piece of information.

ALLEGED PAYMENT OF WITNESSES FOR TESTIMONY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

Could the Solicitor General indicate to the House whether it is common practice for the RCMP to pay out rather large amounts of money to witnesses who are to appear in court? In the affirmative, who is responsible for paying such amounts?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it is not common practice for the RCMP to pay out money to witnesses who are to appear in courts. There are times, however, when we must relocate individuals in other parts of Canada whose lives are threatened because of their willingness to testify in the interest of the administration of justice, especially where organized crime is involved, and we must assume our responsibilities.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Solicitor General indicate, in the case of individuals who are behind bars, the maximum amount which may be spent for protecting them?

Mr. Fox: If the hon. member has a precise case in mind, he should come out with it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a final supplementary question.

It is rather common practice, and I should like to ask the Solicitor General who paid out $25,000 to Frederic Thomas Ford, in British Columbia, and whether a promise was really made by the RCMP to pay out to him $60,000 to appear as a witness in court?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, no promise is ever made. As to the precise case the hon. member is referring to, I shall certainly make inquiry and report to him at a later date.

PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS BREAK-IN—REASON PRIME MINISTER DID NOT ASCERTAIN HOW MEMBERSHIP LISTS OBTAINED

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my questions to the right hon. Prime Minister. They relate to the matter brought up just a few moments ago by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. I am sure that the Prime Minister realizes that while I am not attacking the credibility of what he is saying I certainly want to give him the opportunity at this point of improving on the credibility of what he just told the House a little while ago. I mean that fairly and most sincerely, Mr. Speaker.

My question is this: Last week he could not remember when exactly this conversation took place with his security people. He said it was either 1974 or 1975. He now tells us that the new mandate came out in March, 1975, so it was obviously prior to that, because it was as a result of the conversation that the new mandate came out. Would the Prime Minister tell the House just how the whole subject matter came up in relation to the so-called surveillance of the PQ, the matter that he was most surprised about? We are not talking about terrorism, we are not talking about an atom bomb in the middle of a city—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am putting my question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: The question has been put.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Lawrence: My question is, when he was so surprised about this particular matter, did he not ask them what form that surveillance was taking, how they obtained the information that they had, and what was the result of that surveillance? Was it not in the form of lists?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the course of contacts between the security service, cabinet and myself, particularly since the events of October 1970, when there had been terrorism, murder and kidnapping, we directed the RCMP—and I believe this was the will of the House—to pay a little more attention to internal subversion caused by ideological sources in Canada and not only concentrate on externally sponsored types of subversion.

It then became obvious that one of the groups they were going to look at was one composed of those who were trying to break this country, separate it, and who had been using force in order to do it. There was a great deal of indignation on the part of members opposite, and indeed many people across the country, because at the time of the October, 1970, events, the police had to throw a very wide net indeed and arrest many people who were apparently guilty of nothing because the police were misinformed. They did not have inside information on the terrorists, those who had kidnapped Mr. Cross and Mr. Laporte. So obviously we told them—we did not have to tell them because they would have done it by themselves—to concentrate a little more on this threat. So I suppose that as a result of that they began infiltrating the FLQ and they began trying to get more information on those who would destroy the country by force, whether they be in Quebec or in other parts of the country.

Mr. Clark: The Parti Québécois?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, it was not my objective, and it is not still today, to ask the police how they went about getting information. I would bet my bottom dollar that it was not the practice of the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he was prime minister to intervene in the day to day operations of the security service. They came to us with information. If it was relevant to the security of the state, we tried to take action on it. I never made a practice of asking where they got their information and I shall not begin that practice, unless indeed the House believes that this should be the new orientation, the new dispensation of governments now that they should have the politicians second guess the police, they should have the politicians looking at the files that the police gather and saying, "you can get the information this way but don't do it that way and don't look into so and so because he is my friend". I think we would be blamed by the opposition if this were the political role played by the politicians. We have not played it and we do not intend to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: My supplementary question to the Prime Minister is as follows. The Prime Minister was shocked because this was not the FLQ, the terrorists or the bombers, this was the Parti Québécois. He himself was shocked and he said, "gee, don't do that". Well, surely under those circumstances it occurred to the Prime Minister, not in relation to a criminal activity but in regard to a political activity because this was political surveillance, to ask them what they were doing, how they were doing it and where they got their information. Surely, that occurred to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is a curious doctrine indeed, Mr. Speaker. I believe the hon. gentleman, who was at one time attorney general of Ontario, is now putting forth the doctrine that when the police get information on terrorists—

An hon. Member: No, security.

Mr. Trudeau: —there should be no political interference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is damn nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: I am trying to follow the trend of thought of the former attorney general of Ontario. What he is saying is that when they have exercised surveillance of a legitimate democratic party, then you, Mr. Politician, you, leader of the Liberal party, should try to get at that information.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. Trudeau: He is telling me that in the case of political surveillance—and I believe this was the burden of the argument of the leader of the NDP—in the case of surveillance of a political party, I should have made it my business to know more about what they found out and how they found it out. That is an absurd doctrine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE INFORMATION OBTAINED BY SECURITY SERVICE NOT DISTRIBUTED TO GOVERNMENT MEMBERS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I am afraid the Prime Minister has not increased his credibility as far as I am concerned—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: —because there are members of his own cabinet who have boasted of having membership lists in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Who?

Mr. Lawrence: The Minister of State for Urban Affairs has indicated that he has a list of the known separatists in the province of Quebec.

Would the Prime Minister assure me and the House now, if he can, that there has been no passage, no transfer of any of that information gathered by the security officers, not necessarily the RCMP but the security officers of this government, to members of his government who have then later used it for strictly political purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question is so preposterous that I do not know if it is worth trying to answer it.

An hon. Member: Give it a shot anyway, Pierre.

An hon. Member: Try it.

Mr. Trudeau: Maybe I will take a shot at it, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Trudeau: The simple answer is that no such list was in the hands of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

An hon. Member: Wherever he may be.

Mr. Trudeau: He never said he had any such list, nor did any other minister say he had such a list. I can tell you one thing, that if one wants to know the names of the members of the PQ or of those who sympathize with the PQ, one does not have to go to the RCMP. I would not have to go to the RCMP. The subscription lists of those parties are public; you just have to get the official documents and see who is interested in the PQ and you can read the list there. There is no point in suspecting that there is great skulduggery in getting the list. I repeat, the hon. member opposite could probably get a list of the members of my party in any constituency.

An hon. Member: It is a diminishing list.

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that in Alberta, where I was the day before yesterday, the list of those who still believe in the Leader of the Opposition is very short.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SURVEILLANCE OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS—ALLEGED DISCREPANCY IN DATE WHEN PRIME MINISTER ISSUED ORDERS TO STOP

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister now that I can be heard. At the Prime Minister's press conference on October 28 he was asked if it was last week that he told the police to stop looking at the PQ. The Prime Minister said, "no" and then he went on to explain:

It's back in '73 or '74 that I said "stop looking into the PQ".

My question is based on the letter which the Prime Minister mentioned a moment ago from General Dare to Colonel Bourne, dated February, 1976 wherein General Dare wrote to Colonel Bourne:

Please refer to my letter dated 13 June, 1975 advising that the Prime Minister has issued certain guidelines reiterating the security services inquiries with regard to the Parti Québécois.

Can the Prime Minister explain that discrepancy in dates?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I guess I can explain that if I said 1973 or 1974, and earlier today I said 1974 or 1975—

An hon. Member: It is a typographical error.

Mr. Trudeau: —I do not remember exactly the date when I saw the RCMP. I told the House that if it were relevant to the discussion, I would try to obtain it. I am sure the RCMP must have in their records a date on which the discussion took place, and I will undertake to give it to the House.

● (1452)

On the matter of the letter quoted by the hon. member for Yukon, if my memory is correct—and it may not be correct on that again—it was people on the other side of the House who were objecting at the time because we were not exercising sufficient surveillance of the PQ. Now, obviously they are complaining about the contrary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTING INSTRUCTION TO STOP SURVEILLANCE OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I think it becomes important that the Prime Minister present that date because it makes a difference as to when the instruction was issued to General Dare. However, there is an even more serious delay here. The letter was dated February of 1976, and it refers to a discussion between the Prime Minister and General Dare in mid-1975. General Dare apparently acted on the Prime Minister's instructions some eight months after he received them. Did the Prime Minister follow up on his instructions to General Dare to see if they were carried out? Can he tell us now why they were not carried out with more alacrity?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This was discussed in some detail in the House when the matter of the leaked letter was discussed last session. I indicated at the time that this directive was based on an understanding that General Dare had formed at a cabinet discussion which he attended. There was a record of the decision of that cabinet discussion stating precisely the guidelines that the Solicitor General made public in the House on Friday. I repeat that these guidelines were issued as a result of information we had had previously—how many months previously I cannot remember and I cannot say, but it was information we had previously about the RCMP exercising surveillance of a political party. As soon as we heard that, we said "stop".

Then they asked, "Well, what is our mandate? If we can't exercise surveillance on political parties, what is our mandate?" I said, "Do you have a mandate? Have you one from the previous government?" It appeared there was no precise directive to the police. At that point in cabinet we went about writing a precise directive. I suppose it may have taken a matter of weeks or months before we got it into shape. It was communicated to the police in March, 1975. I believe that is the date. It was the result, I repeat, of—as far as I know—the first time the Government of Canada deciding that the security service needed some political control in a general sense and that they had to be given some general guidelines. Otherwise, they would be victims of the kind of innuendo we have been hearing from the other side in the past few days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the matter will the Prime Minister undertake to table the document "The Role, Tasks and Methods of the RCMP Security Service" as well as cabinet directive 35, which was the instrument giving effect to the cabinet decision on security policy announced in the House by the then Prime Minister on October 25, 1963?

Mr. Trudeau: Does that complete the list of documents of cabinet that the hon. member for Yukon would like to have?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

REASON CABINET COMMITTEE UNAWARE OF ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—DIRECTIONS GIVEN SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I find it strange that since last Friday, during all of the discussions which have taken place in this House, the Prime Minister has not yet clarified the exact role of the cabinet committee which he chairs—and has chaired since becoming Prime Minister—on security and intelligence. I wonder if he can indicate how it was that so much activity could take place beneath this cabinet committee of which this committee was apparently unaware until some years after the incidents took place and whether we are supposed to believe that following the events of 1970, which the Prime Minister at the time described "an apprehended insurrection", there were no new instructions given to the security forces on which they thereupon acted, not an isolated incident but a series of events which are now being reported almost daily.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered earlier that after the events of October, 1970 we obviously did have meetings with the security branch of the RCMP, and we indicated to that branch that we would appreciate it very much indeed if it would concentrate a little bit more on getting information on the security side about those within Canada who might resort to illegal acts in order to break up our democratic country. Therefore, there were these meetings. We met with the police periodically. I could not give the exact number of times or the dates. We met with them to receive information from them about different groups which had to be put under surveillance. We met to give the police directives of a general nature, that they should perhaps be operating more in this direction or that direction. Very often these meetings were meant to brief us on specific people they had detected exchanging official secrets, and that resulted, as I said earlier, in the declaration of those particular persons to be persona non grata in Canada.

There was a whole series of meetings, the purpose of which was to receive from the security service information and to convey to it in general terms the desires of the cabinet of the day and its general directions so that the police in a sense could be controlled and told what areas they should be more particularly concerned about. This whole area is, once again, where we are constantly faced with the dilemma of how far a security service must go while at the same time respecting the rights of the individual and ensuring the security of the state. It is a dilemma that any police force faces. I see that the Leader of the Opposition is shaking his head. I am sure he could face the dilemma with a great deal of ease.

Mr. Clark: I am incredulous.

Mr. Trudeau: I have invited him, as I invited his predecessor, if he wants to be party to these security briefings, to be party to them. I have written to that effect, and I wrote to his predecessor in office to that effect.

Mr. Clark: Not to those briefings.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a distortion; you have not.

Mr. Clark: I am sure you would want to set the record straight.

Mr. Lawrence: You surely do need help.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The record is quite straight. I wrote to the Leader of the Opposition telling him that if he wanted to be party to security briefings by our security service, we would very gladly arrange such briefings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister seems either unwilling or unable to clarify his responsibility in the cabinet committee on security and intelligence. I wonder if he can indicate whether in the enumeration of these investigations or in the work that was to be carried out following the events of the fall of 1970 any distinction was drawn between associations, groups or political parties which might have views different from those of the Prime Minister and his government and those who were prepared to resort to violence and whether there was any requirement established or any direction given with respect to what would be proper in terms of investigation proceedings, because what we are dealing with here is not investigation but in effect new forms of illegal acts, if not some kind of counter-subversion, on behalf of the security forces.

Mr. Trudeau: That seems to be a repetition of the same question about directives. I repeat that the directives were to find out more about those within Canada who for ideological reasons would destroy this country. Those were the directives, and they were followed as best they could be followed by a police force which sometimes makes mistakes, but which basically has helped this country a great deal in the past and will in the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BASIS ON WHICH SECURITY OPERATIONS CONDUCTED— INQUIRY AS TO PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether I am to understand that he is today rejecting the doctrine that the then solicitor general quoted in the House, with approval, when he was establishing the security and research planning group on September 21, 1971 when he quoted the following:

> I am sure that members of parliament accept the necessity that much of the security operation is conducted outside our purview. What would be cause for grave concern would be any thought that much of the operation is beyond the ken of the ministry or the Prime Minister; that there are not ministers, elective and responsible members of government to whom the entire security operation is an open book, who have continuing access to everything that is going on in that area, and who give proper, responsible, political, civilian direction to the operation on a continuing basis.

● (1502)

That is the basis on which the then Solicitor General presented that organization to us in 1971. Am I correct in understanding that the Prime Minister is now rejecting that document?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax has read a long quotation which I understand is from the then solicitor general.

Mr. Stanfield: Quoting me.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is a quotation of the hon. member for Halifax by the then solicitor general. It is a long one and I cannot say in totality if I—

Miss MacDonald: You cannot understand it.

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry. I am not as bright as the hon. lady from Kingston.

Some hon. Members: D'accord.

An hon. Member: Not as bright as Goyer.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Halifax has quoted himself as enunciating some doctrine that the Solicitor General should be informed of every aspect of security. He says no. Would he read it again? We will take time to hear it.

An hon. Member: You are not the Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I will read it slowly for the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: You could not read it fast anyhow.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General was quoting a comment I made at the time the Mackenzie report was tabled in the House. Following a statement the Solicitor General quoted this, with approval:

> I am sure that members of parliament accept the necessity that much of the security operation is conducted outside our purview.

That is, members of parliament, Mr. Speaker.

> What would be cause for grave concern would be any thought that much of the operation is beyond the ken of the ministry or the Prime Minister; that there are not ministers, elective and responsible members of government to whom the entire security operation is an open book, who have continuing access to everything that is going on in that area, and who give proper, responsible, political, civilian direction to the operation on a continuing basis.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the continuing direction is obviously part of our doctrine and our policy. I have repeated earlier that that continuing direction was incorporated in its last form in the directives of March, 1975, so obviously we should believe in continuing direction by the civilian side of the security services, as indeed in any other arm of government.

I am a little bit dubious of the context in which the hon. member says that the operations should be an open book, if I am quoting him correctly. If he means the day-to-day operations—the hon. member for Halifax shakes his head, no. Then we do agree. If he means that all the RCMP know and what is in all their files—if the implication was that we should know about it, in other words, that we should know all the secrets about this country that the RCMP knows, then our answer to that is, that is not our policy. It does exist in some countries but it is not our policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We in this government, and I believe it was the case with previous governments, have removed ourselves from the day-to-day operations of the security services. Indeed, we have done it from the operations of the police on the criminal side. We just make sure that the general directives are those which issue from the government and the example of that kind of directive was given in the guidelines of March, 1975.

[Miss MacDonald.]

Mr. Stanfield: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not agree that this doctrine, approved by the Solicitor General of the day, certainly included the scope of security operations? Will the Prime Minister not agree that the failure of the government to check whether, in carrying out the mandate given to the security operations by the government whether or not they were investigating a democratic political party, was a breach of this responsibility and was a tremendous disaster for confederation?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the "scope and mandate"—the words used by the hon. member for Halifax—should be under the purview of the government of the day. Indeed, this was the purpose of these security briefings of which I was a member and which other ministers and I attended. In that sense the mandate, the scope, the areas that the police were looking into to protect the security of the country, were all of concern to us and indeed of periodic reporting and discussion with us by the security services. I repeat, we did not know every day-to-day operation.

An hon. Member: You did not care to know.

Mr. Trudeau: We did hear at one point that they were investigating a democratic party. As soon as we heard it we asked them to stop that. That seems perfectly straightforward. What seems to have caught the imagination of the House is the fact that a political party was under surveillance by the security services.

An hon. Member: More than that; a criminal act.

Mr. Trudeau: Also, that this surveillance was exercised by way of criminal action—alleged criminal action. Mr. Speaker, to these two points we have responded; in the case of the alleged criminal action, by referring the matter to the Attorney General of the province where the act was committed and as regards the surveillance of a political party, by asking that it be stopped. What could be more clear or definite than that?

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—BRIEFINGS OF SECURITY COMMITTEE OF PRIVY COUNCIL

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege simply to allow the Prime Minister the opportunity to correct a false impression which he gave, I am sure most inadvertently. He had been referring to regular briefings of the security committee of the Privy Council, of which he is the chairman, by the security services to the government of Canada. He had referred quite explicitly to those briefings, and he said in reference to the offer that he made to me that I had been invited to take part in those briefings. I am sure the Prime Minister will agree that is not the nature of the offer that was extended to me as Leader of the Opposition. I will quote from his letter, which reads in part:

Perhaps it is appropriate at this time—

Mr. Speaker, I emphasize "at this time". This letter was received in my office on October 18.

—to extend an invitation to you, as Leader of the Opposition, to attend a briefing that could be arranged at your convenience.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There is a difference between a briefing and regular briefings. There is also a very clear difference, which this Prime Minister appears unwilling to accept, between briefings and responsibility, including the responsibility to ask questions about methods and about potential illegalities.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the paragraph read by the Leader of the Opposition referred to practices in the United Kingdom and other countries where a practice has been developed of briefing the opposition from time to time on matters relating to national security. It was, I agree, only on October 18 that I made it quite clear that I had made the same offer to the previous leader of the opposition, as I am sure Mr. Pearson had made it to Mr. Diefenbaker, and probably Mr. Diefenbaker to Mr. Pearson.

The Leader of the Opposition has not yet had time to decide whether he wants such briefings or not. He has certainly not answered my letter, but he has told us today—he was probably too busy travelling.

Mr. Clark: I will reply before 18 months, Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: He told us today, with great emphasis, that he did not consider it sufficient to attend "a" briefing. That is his emphasis. If he wants more than "a" briefing; if he wants some briefings, if he wants them in different form than have traditionally been accorded the leader of the opposition, let him say so and let him answer my letter. Let him tell us what kinds of briefings he wants, and we will see if they can be given.

An hon. Member: Oh, sit down; don't waste time.

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell the Leader of the Opposition that if he thinks that in those briefings he will be able to ask members how they get information, who they get it from, and in which way, he will not get that information unless the law of the country is changed and the practices of time immemorial in this House are changed.

● (1512)

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED MISLEADING OF HOUSE IN ANSWER GIVEN BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a most serious question of privilege. In reply to a question put to the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General thinks that he has put to rest a matter which raises the integrity of the government. I want to say at the outset, on this serious question of privilege, that I want to deal with the points he raised, because he misled the House. Rather than solving or putting aside a certain problem, in my view, he has made it even more serious.

I put this point seriously and I believe it needs to be commented upon. The minister began by saying that morality plays a role in politics. I agree with him. It is for this reason that when I first learned of the alleged contents of the affidavit within two hours I phoned his colleague, the former solicitor general, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and told him that I had been given this serious information.

At that time I asked him if it was true. He said that he did not think so. Also, he indicated that he would look into it. At the same time, I repeated the phone calls to that minister because his integrity is under question here: I do not put it any more strongly than that. Yesterday morning I phoned him twice to see if I could receive an answer, and no call came back.

An hon. Member: Which minister?

Mr. Broadbent: The former solicitor general.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Then I raised it as a serious question by asking the present minister to investigate it. He did not reply to me. I waited two hours this morning for a reply, and none was forthcoming. So he raises the question of morality on the issue. I come now to the substance of the issue.

An hon. Member: It is about time.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has said that the affidavit, a legal document over his signature, residing with the Quebec inquiry contains a significant typographical error. I should like to point out that it took a question by us in the House of Commons to elicit the information that that very significant error, on which the Quebec inquiry is basing part of its judgment, has come to light. Would it have come to light if it had not been pursued in the House of Commons? I know not, because it was a document that the minister said was not going to be made available to the inquiry. That was a careless mistake. It did not originate from this side of the House; once again, it was from the other side of the House.

There were issues raised in the changing of the date from 1972 to 1973 which do not in one whit cancel the problem. I remind the minister that the Prime Minister and the former solicitor general are on record as saying that no such correspondence on the question of the break-in exists. As reported at page 6793 of Hansard dated June 17, 1977, the present Solicitor General is quoted as saying the following:

Our files and those of the RCMP contain no written report on the unlawful entry to the solicitor general.

An hon. Member: Pardon?

Mr. Broadbent: Well, you can look it up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: All right, I will read it again. It is a quotation from the Solicitor General which occurred on January 17, 1977.

Some hon. Members: June.

Mr. Broadbent: I am sorry, June.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That is the same type of mistake.

Mr. Broadbent: It reads as follows:

Our files and those of the RCMP contain no written report on the unlawful entry to the solicitor general.

The document in question, annexed to the minister's own affidavit—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sworn to.

Mr. Broadbent: —sworn to by himself, is a list of material which, according to paragraph 5 of the affidavit, pertains directly to the break-in of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec in the fall of 1972. The minister cannot have it both ways. Earlier in the question period he said that the document I referred to in my question—because I was basing it on his published information—did not pertain to the break-in.

Unless he has committed another incomprehensible error, he said in his own affidavit that all the documents listed on the last page pertain to the break-in. Unless he is going to correct that error, I take it for granted that his sworn statement holds. The document which he thinks if significantly different, because the date changes from 1972 to 1973, does not convince me.

I should like to come to the reason for that. As I have said, the Prime Minister, the present Solicitor General and the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, said that they did not find out anything about this break-in until 1976. If the date changes from 1972 to 1973, how significant is that change?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What is the difference?

Mr. Broadbent: It is still 2½ years ahead of the time the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet claim they knew anything about the break-in.

An hon. Member: So?

Mr. Broadbent: If the letter which, according to the affidavit, pertains to the break-in, and if it was written by General Dare, we know from earlier testimony that General Dare was fully cognizant of the events and fully cognizant of the break-in which took place in the fall of 1972. One would conclude that when he is writing on the subject of a break-in, he is writing to provide some information about the break-in to the Solicitor General.

On behalf of all members of the House and the people of Canada who are concerned about the integrity of the government, I should like to indicate that all I want is the information contained in that letter. It seems to me that it is very germane and it is hardly irresponsible. In fact, I would say it is a responsible course of action.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have stated previously in the House, all the documents in question which are indicated in the annex referred to by the leader of the New Democratic Party, will be made available to the royal commission of inquiry set up by this government last July.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: For that matter, it is very difficult to conclude that there has been any effort whatsoever at a cover-up. If that matter relates to a break-in or relates to information concerning knowledge brought to the attention of the minister, it will be brought to the attention of the royal commission. I have stated that a number of time in the House.

When the hon. member raised the question for the first time yesterday, I had the opportunity of speaking with him, and he told me that it related to a document which had been produced in Montreal under document number P. 26 tabled before the royal commission of inquiry. I was advised immediately by my own attorney who had appeared before that commission that document No. P. 26 refers to a letter which was written by the executive assistant, or the special assistant, to the then solicitor general and addressed to Mr. Jacques Hébert who was associated with L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec. It is a public document which is presently before the commission.

Then the hon. member raised a question concerning the document dated December 19, 1972. I caused an immediate search to be made of our files, and we could not come up with a document of that date.

Mr. Broadbent: Why did you not call me back?

Mr. Fox: If one wants to go through a matter carefully, it takes some time to come up with the facts. This morning I looked through the documents enclosed in an envelope. They pertained to the affidavit which I filed with the commission in Montreal. I discovered that there is a letter annexed to a note numbered D926-152D22. It is a letter from Mr. Dare to the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in December of 1973, and not 1972. The matter was excluded from the examination of the commission of inquiry because it did not refer to any illegal act whatsoever committed by the RCMP.

● (1522)

Even given that, Mr. Speaker, I am still willing to make the matter fully available to the McDonald royal commission of inquiry in order that they may satisfy themselves that that is indeed the case.

Mr. Broadbent: Table the letter.

Mr. Speaker: The question raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby under the heading of a question of privilege has been contributed to equally by the Solicitor General. It has reduced itself to a disagreement between the two members on the interpretation both of answers given and the documents in question. It is not a question of privilege.

MR. WOOLLIAMS—AFFIDAVIT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same subject with reference to the affidavit sworn to on October 12, 1977, by the Solicitor General and sworn to, as commissioner of oaths, the notary public, Mr. Goyer. In the letter in question, which is dated in this document December 19, 1972, it was not made clear whether there was a mistake in the date of the letter or the date as typed in the affidavit.

Under the circumstances, having listened to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and to the Solicitor General, I rose several times in my place this afternoon to ask a question with reference to that matter. I think it would be fair to the House, since we referred to it—and he is prepared to produce it in other proceedings, and as this is the highest court in the land—he should come clean and table the letter in this House of Commons so we can all see it.

MRS. HOLT—INABILITY TO BE RECOGNIZED BY CHAIR

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is one of personal privilege, in that I have been prevented from doing my job in this House on behalf of the constituents of Vancouver-Kingsway. For two weeks I have risen in my place to participate in the question period in order to ask—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter of recognition of any member during the question period is the responsibility entirely of the Chair and, it seems to me, in no case gives rise to a question of privilege.

AGRICULTURE

TABLING OF REPORT ON CANADIAN EGG MARKETING AGENCY

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 42 I wish to table, in both languages, a report on the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency prepared by C. M. Ross and Partners, dated July, 1977.

Rail Service

TRANSPORT

STATEMENT ON RAIL SERVICE

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in our desire to improve rail passenger service in Canada and give VIA Rail an opportunity to do so, we have decided to arrange the purchase of ten trains for passenger service rather than a smaller number which had been considered. This new equipment, to consist of 22 locomotives and 50 coaches at a cost of about $90 million, will be purchased jointly by the federal government and VIA Rail. Negotiations are now being finalized with Bombardier-MLW for the equipment related aspects of the program and it is hoped that a contract with them will be signed shortly.

This is the first major purchase of Canadian rail passenger equipment in more than a decade. These new trains will greatly assist VIA in providing modern, attractive and economical rail passenger service throughout this country. Several of these trains will be put into service in 1980 as part of a new high-quality rail passenger service between Quebec City and Montreal. The remaining trains will be used by VIA in the introduction of conveniently scheduled, fast, intercity trains across Canada to complement an upgraded transcontinental service, and will therefore be available to VIA for western Canada and the maritimes as well.

This equipment is a result of a tender call by Transport Canada for new rail passenger equipment on July 4, 1976. On February 1, 1977, four companies submitted bids. A thorough and extensive evaluation of these bids was undertaken jointly by senior officials from CN, CP, and the government. The choice of train was not based solely on price or delivery date; we also assessed the total expected cost over the life of the equipment, its revenue-generating capability, advancements in design such as speed capability, the firm's manufacturing expertise, the possible export potential, and Canadian content of the bid. Service improvements made possible with these trains should generate savings which more than offset their cost.

The LRC—light, rapid, comfortable—trains are the result of a high degree of Canadian technology and development. Alcan Canada Products Limited and Dominion Foundries and Steel Limited, co-developers of the LRC, will be major suppliers to Bombardier-MLW. They feature tilting body coaches which permit higher operating speeds on existing track and thereby eliminate extensive track improvements. They are designed to achieve potential speeds up to 125 miles per hour on intercity service, and contain electronic sensors and hydraulic cylinders to bank the coaches on track curves.

The new equipment will feature the attractive, modern interiors commissioned by Transport Canada last year as a result of an international design competition. Jacques Guillon Designers, of Montreal, produced interiors that are both flexible to the changing needs of rail passenger transportation and include features such as facilities for handicapped travellers.

The federal government will pay $24 million, and VIA the balance, for locomotives, cars, spares, maintenance and test equipment, the construction of which will create approximately 1,500 man-years of work spread out over a three-year period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this initiative by the federal government is not just of benefit to the future of railway passenger transportation in this country, but will have a positive effect on employment as well. This is but one of a number of steps which have been taken since the announcement in January, 1976, of our new rail passenger policy, and certainly the new equipment, efficient and attractive, will help VIA in the improvement of rail passenger service in this country. The creation of VIA itself was a major step in this regard and, of course, the final plan of the CTC which was one of the ongoing steps outlining the kinds of rail passenger service which should exist in Canada over time.

This announcement carries out the fifth recommendation of ten of the Canadian Transport Commission in their report, in that it will be providing the new equipment which will be efficient and attractive and allow for better service in this country. I believe the Canadian Transport Commission did a very good job in this report. With its flexibility and the scheme it has laid out, it will allow VIA to get on with the vigorous job of improving rail passenger service in this country. I very much believe, as does the government, in the future of rail passenger service and the need to attract passengers to the trains, as well as the complementary use of buses and the fact that trains must be run sensibly and efficiently and not in a way to interfere with the development of better bus service.

I am delighted that in the House today, watching these proceedings, is Mr. Frank Roberts, the new president of VIA Rail Canada. He is vigorous and enthusiastic, and I am sure he will lead VIA Rail in the development of a better rail passenger service in this country. I would ask that all members join me in wishing him well in this great work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, naturally we on this side of the House welcome the statement made by the minister this afternoon. If we are going to upgrade and rejuvenate rail passenger service in this country, we certainly require suitable and satisfactory equipment. The minister indicated this new equipment is designed to achieve potential speeds of up to 125 miles an hour. While that is not quite as fast as government jets, we hope that cabinet ministers will seize upon the opportunity to use this high-speed ground transportation when it becomes effective to replace some of the inordinate use of government jets which has plagued this country. I am sure that would meet the approval of many members of the House and, indeed, the public at large.

This is another in a series of announcements of intent by the government. We have had many. The minister seems to seize very readily upon these announcements in an attempt to achieve maximum political benefit. These many statements of intent really amount to a stalling procedure in the expeditious development of the Windsor-Quebec corridor. When speaking of intent, we on this side of the House, and Canadians in general, are well aware of the lofty promises made in the 1974 election campaign with regard to the expenditure of vast amounts of money, particularly on the urban transportation system. I believe something in the order of $290 million was promised at that time for urban transportation.

When I speak of attempts by the minister to maximize political benefit from these announcements, I am reminded of the fact that almost every time the minister goes out west for a meeting he talks about the $100 million he has announced on a dozen occasions for the purpose of upgrading western rail services. It is not that we do not appreciate it, but there are limitations upon the number of times we should be hearing these words. I was talking about the western rail system. I realize most of the money is being spent on upgrading the transportation system for the movement of grain, but it is still all part of the western rail transportation system. It is interesting that Mr. Hall should have recommended expenditures in the order of $450 million.

We also remember the 1975 announcement, repeated and reaffirmed in 1976, which called for the expenditure of $100 million over five years to purchase rail commuter equipment. Just last week it seemed this program had been scuttled. It had never really been implemented. The minister talked about the reorganization of this program. He hijacked $130 million from the railway relocation and crossings program and another $100 million from the commuter services program, and all this has not gone down well into the provinces. The fact is that no new funds have really been made available for the program. Yet the original announcement was greeted with much fanfare, although it has turned out to be, once again, merely an announcement of intent not followed by action.

When we review the history of the commitments made in connection with the Quebec-Windsor corridor, we find that the first announcement was made back in May of 1976. At that time some $30 million was to be provided by way of a grant. By December of 1976 it was elicited, in reply to questions in the House, that construction was to begin by the spring of 1977. By that time no action had been taken.

On May 25, in response to the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, the minister stated that decisions on tenders would be taken by the end of the summer, but up to that time nothing had been done. Now comes the announcement that the government is committing $24 million toward the purchase of $90 million worth of equipment. I am not sure whether this $24 million is part of the original $30 million which was allocated, nor am I sure where the other $66 million will come from. Will VIA Canada have to generate that sum from its own resources, or will it be provided in the estimates? The minister may be able to clear up this question later.

Our party is naturally committed to supporting and improving rail passenger service in this country. It is timely to take such an approach, and there is no question there is wide public support for expansion and improvement of service. In terms of energy conservation, the expansion and improvement of rail passenger service is not only an integral element in the fight for energy conservation, but it is vital.

At the present time, approximately 85 per cent of our intercity travel is conducted by passenger car. The passenger car provides an average of 140 passenger miles for every gallon of fuel consumed. The airplane provides some 70 passenger miles for every gallon of fuel consumed. The bus provides some 500 passenger miles, on average, for every gallon consumed. But the rail passenger train provides 1,000 passenger miles for every gallon of fuel consumed. So rail passenger service clearly rates very high from the point of view of fuel conservation and moving large numbers of people in intercity travel.

We hear a lot these days about the subsidies which are being paid out to the railways, but at the same time it should be noted that railway users cover the cost of the service very well. About 74 per cent of actual rail costs are covered by the users of the service. In the case of highway travel, 54 per cent of the cost is covered by the users. In the case of aviation, only 31 per cent of the cost is covered by users; and in the case of marine movement, only 19 per cent is covered.

So while there have been protests about the huge amounts of money paid to the railways by way of subsidies, we should bear in mind that the whole question needs to be placed in perspective. If we are providing expensive airport facilities at the cost of taxpayers, while the railways provide their own infrastructure at their own expense, there is obviously a differential involved.

I say, once again, that we welcome this announcement. I might add that we would appreciate it if in future the minister, in his announcements, were a little less political and a little more forthright.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, for those of us who have watched with despair the preoccupation of the minister and his department with air travel, while almost completely ignoring the advantage of passenger-rail service in terms of comfort and pure efficiency, this announcement is a welcome one. It would, obviously, be impossible to provide fast, comfortable rail passenger service without new and modern railway engines and passenger cars.

To the extent that this announcement means we are moving to eliminate past and present inadequacies, we in our party approve. But new equipment will not, in itself, provide the kind of service which is needed and which is now available in Japan and in most of the western European countries. Before we can look forward to service of this kind, a major improvement in track and elimination of the level crossings which still exist in large numbers must take place. Otherwise, the new equipment, capable—as the minister says—of speeds up to 125 miles per hour, will only be able to operate at a fraction of its capability. Also, there is no indication from the minister that he plans to make any major improvements in the track system or to eliminate level crossings.

In the second place, there can be no fast service for passengers if preference continues to be given by the railways to freight trains over passenger trains. Either the set of priorities which is followed at the present time must be turned around to give preference to passenger trains, or we must proceed with a large-scale program of double-tracking. There is no point having a train which can travel at 125 miles an hour if it sits for half an hour or more on a siding while a 150 car freight train is given the right of way.

Not only are the changes which I have listed required. It is really impossible to provide better service if we decide, as we have, on the recommendation of the minister, to cut the number of transcontinental trains in half. This, we believe, was a mistake. However, the mistake having been made, we hope the government will keep in mind the recommendations of the Canadian Transport Commission, that an extensive promotional and educational campaign explaining the new services will be directed to the public, and that steps will be taken to ensure that we have the equipment to meet the demand which will increase as service improves. Without the ability to meet that demand for rail service, the public will again come to believe, as they have with plenty of justification up to now, that the railway system is not equipped to meet their needs and will be looking for alternate methods of transportation, be it by bus, air or private passenger car—modes which have been increasing in recent years.

So to the extent that this is a step in the right direction, Mr. Speaker, we welcome it. But we see it as only the first step; many more steps are required.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the announcement made by the Minister of Transport. I think we have all been waiting for this announcement for a long time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I want to remind the hon. member that I recognized him, not as leader of a recognized party authorized to comment as other representatives of parties do under our Standing Orders. I recognized him for the purpose of asking a question. He might include in his question a short comment, but it will have to be a question.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to make a speech; I did not think it was necessary to do so. I should like to ask the minister whether he is going to use his good offices to make sure, firstly, that the roadbeds in the maritime region are to be brought up to proper standard to handle trains of this speed; secondly, are some of these trains going to be used in the maritimes; and thirdly, would he use his good offices to see that some of the equipment which is to be manufactured will be manufactured in the maritime provinces and thus provide jobs? There are places in the maritimes where this work can be done.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, so far as the actual location of the jobs is concerned, the contracts are being let with Bombardier-MLW and subcontracting and other arrangements will be in their hands. The Canadian content will be high; therefore, the jobs will be welcome, wherever they may be. In replying to the hon. member's other question, it will indeed be our long-run intention to improve railbeds where passenger services are to be run. These trains can run fairly effectively on many existing beds, but certainly in some regions improvements will be required to the signalling and bed systems.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the minister. Perhaps I can pose them both at the same time in the interest of time. My first question deals with rail passenger service and the VIA Rail announcement made by the minister today, which, of course, will exclude the province of Newfoundland. We lost our rail passenger service as a result of a decision by the CTC implemented in 1969. By that same decision, CN was ordered to operate a bus service within our province. That bus service, by proclamation of the minister under the transportation act, is now under the jurisdiction of the federal government, but it does not qualify under the rail policy passenger service for subsidies to meet its deficits, as is the case with rail passenger services elsewhere in the country. In addition, the bus service is now under federal jurisdiction and is the only mode of transportation across the province which has an exclusive franchise.

My question to the minister is: What benefits is the federal government prepared to provide to the CN bus services where they replace rail passenger services, especially in cases, as in the case of the province of Newfoundland, where they have an exclusive franchise and they are the only mode?

My second question deals with the same problem, or with a consequence of the same decision. CN are now doing the same thing with freight service in the province as they did with rail passenger service; they are allowing it to be downgraded. They are not providing proper maintenance for the roadbed and they are sending more and more freight across the province along the Trans-Canada Highway in trailer trucks. The reason for this is obvious: they pay nothing toward the cost of maintenance of the Trans-Canada Highway, whereas the cost of maintenance of the roadbed and the provision of rolling stock is exclusively theirs.

This brings me to the proposal by the government of Newfoundland, now before the minister, for a 75-25 per cent cost-sharing arrangement with the federal government to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway in Newfoundland which is well below standard and which is rapidly deteriorating because of the excessive use of freight by CN and others.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have offered to enter into a program of 50-50 cost-sharing on road improvements in Newfoundland. This, of course, is an area which is the prime responsibility of the province, but we have recognized the desirability of improving those roads. At this point in time, of course, that offer has not been accepted.

The whole question of freight service, use of the railroad and the increasing use of roads is one of significant concern and is one of the background reasons for the federal and provincial governments jointly agreeing on the setting up of the Sullivan commission which is now considering all the transportation questions in Newfoundland. We will certainly be looking forward to the results of that commission before too long.

As for the question of the bus system, which it is true is now fully under federal jurisdiction resulting from necessary action which had to be taken some time ago, my understanding is that the rates charged are comparable to bus rates in other parts of the country. If a subsidy is required because of a deficit on the system, because this is a Canadian National service it would be borne either by the system as a whole or by the government of Canada, in the ordinary course.

I look forward to direct federal action in attempting to improve that bus system arising out of the total transportation agreement entered into with the Atlantic provinces. I also look forward to discussing a role with VIA Rail Canada in relation to that bus service, because I think that the vigorous management approach toward passenger service which will be found to exist in VIA Rail may be very beneficial where associated bus services are required.

[Translation]

Mr. Gendron: Mr. Speaker, I understand from the announcement the minister just made that an important contract is to be awarded to Bombardier in La Pocatière.

Could the minister tell us the exact amount that would be awarded to Bombardier in La Pocatière under that policy, and also the approximate number of jobs that would be created through that contract?

[English]

Mr. Lang: As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, 1,500 man-years will be involved in the development of this equipment. The figure I have used is approximately $90 million. Final negotiating is still continuing.

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, would the minister say whether or not the two main transcontinental lines to western Canada will be maintained? Would he also say what the policy is regarding bilateral runs between places like Calgary and Edmonton?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Transport Commission's final plan is now available and indicates a particular method for maintaining the two transcontinental services between Winnipeg and Vancouver and an overtime implementation of that development. The other associated services are now frequently under special consideration by the Canadian Transport Commission and special decisions will be taken from time to time in that regard.

What I look forward to is the possibility of Via Rail looking vigorously, with all the provinces, at the question of where rail service is required and desirable, and where bus service can more effectively perform the service of bringing passengers to particular points where the rail service can begin.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the minister's personal affection for the Edmonton area, and bearing in mind the effect of the decision on VIA Rail to eliminate the direct transcontinental run from the main population area in the province of Alberta which is concentrated on the Edmonton side rather than that of Calgary, how does the minister rationalize this hope for increase in business of VIA Rail Canada and the decision that was taken by the government, through Treasury Board, the other day to eliminate or reject the proposals with regard to the necessary expansion and amelioration of the Edmonton international airport? Frankly, the airport cannot cope with the volume of traffic, yet one can foresee that as a result of this move for VIA Rail there will be an increase in demand on the airport's facilities, bearing in mind the Commonwealth Games and all the traffic which will be generated as a result.

Mr. Lang: No such cut in service for Edmonton is contemplated at this time. Of course, the best possible passenger service to Edmonton and to other areas will certainly be provided. I suppose that would answer the question as posed. However, I would like to reassure the hon. member that the unavailability of funds for the expansion of the Edmonton airport of the full type with which we wanted to go ahead at this time does not indicate a long-term situation, but only a very short-term one. We will be watching very closely the opportunity to find the money and to make it available in some fashion, so that changes in the air terminal service can go forward as quickly as possible.

An hon. Member: Just before the next election.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Can the minister tell us what sort of a lay-over is proposed in Winnipeg in the projected changes, the proposed plans for VIA Rail and for the modal points for persons wanting to use the service to eastern Canada, because if there is a 12-hour lay-over, or anything more than an hour or two, it becomes a grave inconvenience to people who want to use the train when they have to connect with the so called CPR route? Second, the traffic will be affected now or in the very near future, both rail and air traffic. It is not a question of 1981 or 1982 with regard to airport facilities, but 1978.

What are we going to do with those people? The immigration quarters are like cattle-pens and the modern aircraft and immigration facilities are greatly overtaxed. Also, people are paying the user tax, which is the minister's favourite.

Mr. Lang: On page 4 of the Canadian Transport Commission's preferred plan there is an example of a possible service which would indicate a 40-minute lay-over in Winnipeg for one of the services and a 30-minute lay-over for the other. Of course, the CTC has emphasized that VIA Rail must have flexibility, and one of the things which will concern the management of VIA Rail is the ability to maintain services which coincide effectively with the higher speeds required to make that happen. I will be expecting the management of VIA Rail to look at this matter carefully in order to seek ways of ensuring the best possible service, and discussing with the CTC such variations as may be required to ensure that service. But I do not see any diminution in the passenger rail service for Edmonton.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I still have eight more questioners on my list. Perhaps I should name them in the order in which they appear on my list, to see if this satisfies the House. I might conclude, then, that this should complete the questioning and we should go on to government orders.

I have on my list the hon. member for Battle River, the hon. member for Pembina, the hon. member for Vegreville, the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the hon. member for Hastings, the hon. member for South Shore, the hon. member for Dauphin, and the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, all of us in the House, I am sure, applaud the intentions in the minister's statement today. One idea with which I am sure we all agree is the one to speed up passenger service. But coming down to the question of methods, one of the concerns that I have is with regard to the method of speeding up the passenger service. Will it be done by increasing the speed at which the train travels, or will there also be a designation of the towns which will be provided with passenger train service?

If that is the case, can the minister tell us at this time the formula for designating certain towns? Will only the distance between certain major centres be taken into account, or will there be a guarantee that a town with a certain size of population, irrespective of its location relative to Edmonton, Saskatoon or Winnipeg, will be provided with that service? I have a couple of other questions, but perhaps the minister could answer that one, following which I will put my other questions to him.

Mr. Lang: I hope that VIA Rail will look at the various means of speeding up the service. Certainly they will have to look at the question of through service, or express service, and what local services are required in preparing the final plan which CTC indicates is a major question for the northern Ontario route.

I expect VIA Rail to be in close consultation with many people, including the users and associations interested in rail passenger service, as well as the provinces and ourselves. CTC, of course, will have a role to play in ensuring that the necessary services are maintained. Beyond saying that I hope the best passenger service will be provided, I would not want to predict precisely what the solutions will be.

Mr. Malone: I would ask the minister if, at an early date, he would let us know by mail what towns are scheduled for designation, because I assume from his answer that in all likelihood that will be forthcoming. The other question I have for him is whether it will not simply be a case, as I am sure the minister realizes, of improving rail equipment so as to encourage people to travel by rail, and also the improvement of the service provided in terms of station buildings, food on the trains, personnel, and so forth. What are the government's intentions in this regard? In view of the fact that he spoke about the VIA Rail service between Quebec City and Montreal being provided by 1980, when does he anticipate that we will have a rapid transcontinental VIA Rail service from one end of the country to the other?

Mr. Lang: The balance of the new equipment will be arriving in two or three years. I would not want to predict the speed at which trains will be travelling at that time. We are very conscious of the fact that all these factors lead to better rail passenger service. Of course, the improved design of the interior of trains is an example of that.

I also believe that the creation of VIA Rail and the dedication to rail passenger service will have an important impact upon the morale of those who are engaged in providing services, the men and women on the trains, because they will no longer be part of an operation which was getting little attention and looking as though it was the neglected child in the family of rail services. In this way, I believe the whole group will work together to provide better service and to make sure that the way of providing this service is best suited to the needs of travellers.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one put to the minister by the hon. member for Edmonton West. As are all my colleagues from the Edmonton area, I am concerned about the facilities at the airport at Edmonton. The minister stated that it is going to be only a short-term delay. Would the minister be kind enough to give us a hopeful date as to when the upgrading of the facilities at the Edmonton international airport will take place, in view of the fact that we will be hosting the Commonwealth Games in 1978?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to speculate upon a date, but I can assure the hon. member that as soon as I have a definite date, it will be given.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have two brief questions for the minister. Is the $24 million, which has been announced today for the purpose of purchasing equipment, a portion of the $30 million grant which was originally announced? Can the minister explain to the House, or elaborate as to how VIA Rail will be financing the balance of $66 million? Will it be a loan obtained from the private sector, a loan from the government, or will a portion of it be generated from within?

Mr. Lang: I believe that when the original $30 million figure was quoted, the intention was to allocate approximately $9 million of that toward equipment, and the balance toward other improvements. Therefore, the amount which will be spent in fact will be much larger than originally comtemplated, as this approximately $90 million indicates. The $24 million from the government will be going indirectly through an estimates vote. The balance and many other improvements which will go on will, indeed, be self-financing over the long term, and we will be acting to give VIA Rail Canada Limited the capability, either with CN or government guarantees, to raise the necessary funds for capital purchases. The over-all cost of servicing that capital will, of course, be included in later votes in this House.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if there are any early plans for upgrading the track between Ottawa and Montreal, and the elimination of the remaining level crossings. I should like to ask the same about the Toronto to Montreal line, so that people, including members of parliament and ministers, will be persuaded by the much shorter trip to take the train instead of the bus, driving in their own cars or flying, as they now do?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, a variety of routes will be getting attention, but I know that one in particular that is seen as deserving early attention is the Ottawa to Montreal route, because of the distance and therefore the possibility of attracting more passengers to the rail mode and away, perhaps, from their automobiles.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister can tell us whether there are similar plans to upgrade the line between Regina and Saskatoon and between Calgary and Edmonton. Both trips are now being made by a large number of private passenger cars or by aircraft, and both would be much more efficient and cheaper if they were made by a rail service which had the kind of speed which these new engines and rail cars the minister announced today could maintain if they were given the tracks upon which to operate.

Mr. Lang: VIA Rail will be giving consideration to the question of a variety of intercity services, particularly the Bud car type of service where an individual unit provides the service. But we will have to look at this question very carefully in order to determine whether the frequency and quality of the bus services which exist in some of the intercity links are, indeed, the better way to go, and whether they can in fact fulfil the service. So the extra cost of railway upgrading may be uneconomic compared with using that money for other good transportation services.

That is the kind of question we will be looking at progressively in order to provide the best transportation services, but certainly we will be looking at all modes and, very clearly, the bus mode as well as the rail mode.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I will try to combine my questions into one. Perhaps the minister will answer all of them at once. As the minister well knows, the city of Belleville, which I represent, is the Rideau area headquarters and has been the home of CN for many years. Recently, CN has obviously adopted a policy of reducing the work force in this area and the schedule of trains in and out of Belleville has been a deterrent to travellers to the point where people in the area who would normally use rail have been calling me frequently and complaining. Will the minister and his department have any input into the type of employment and the type of schedules in and out of that area?

Getting away from the specific Belleville area, I want to ask the minister whether any thought is being given to the upgrading of roadbeds. After all, freight trains go over them and pound them pretty hard, whereas a light passenger train could use a roadbed three, four or five times as often and not apply the same kind of beating. Is any thought being given to putting a single rail, particularly into the Quebec-Windsor corridor and perhaps electrifying that portion for particularly high speed?

I notice in the statement that the minister talks about LRCs. I understand they are diesel equipment. Is there any thought of electrification, a single rail and more use of the Rideau area headquarters in Belleville?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the management of VIA Rail will have heard the question about the desirability of good passenger service in that area. CN is aware of our general concern about the movement of jobs and centralization if it leads to movement toward large cities and away from small ones. Roadbed upgrading will be an important issue in relation to passenger service. The lighter trains which are now being ordered may, in fact, accomplish much better speeds on the existing roadbeds, but obviously the matter will have to be looked at.

I do not look toward electrification in the short term in this part of the country. Recent research which was undertaken by Transport Canada has made available the facts upon which electrification may well proceed, but very likely first in the mountain regions of the country rather than in other areas.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, the announcement by the minister of the purchase or construction of 22 locomotives and 50 coaches at a cost of $90 million, to be purchased by the federal government and VIA Rail from Bombardier, will of course not go unnoticed in Nova Scotia. I would like to ask the minister, who I know is aware of the ability to construct freight cars in Trenton, if in his planning he has given any thought to the high rate of unemployment in the province of Nova Scotia and to the possibility of ascertaining whether the plant at Trenton would be considered as a possible place to provide some components for this project.

Second, I noticed that by 1980 the service will be improved between Montreal and Quebec. Once again, I would like to remind the minister that Halifax, Nova Scotia, is one of the eastern terminals of the CNR. In light of the state of the track which presently exists between Quebec and Halifax, I would like to know if it is the intention of the government to examine this track in the hope of improving it, straightening it, upgrading it and providing an improved service to Atlantic Canada.

I notice in the minister's release that when this new equipment is put into service it will make available to VIA Rail, for western Canada and the maritimes some of the existing equipment. This brings to mind yet another question. When can we anticipate some of this existing equipment being put on the run between Quebec City and Halifax in order to update, upgrade and improve the service which we presently receive? It is very important to our area, and if I do say so, we feel that we are being let down today by the government with regard to improving our over-all transportation system, especially as it applies to the CNR.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Transport Commission is now looking at the question of the appropriate service between Montreal and the Atlantic, and I would not want to prejudge that except to underline that we indicated, as a matter of policy, the need to maintain a direct service from one end of the country to another as an irreducible minimum. Obviously, the upgrading will have to proceed from time to time. These trains will all be available by 1980 or 1981, and I am hoping that some of them, in the mix of old equipment and new equipment, can indeed be available for the western and Atlantic regions.

As far as Trenton is concerned, I will determine the likelihood of bid availability for supply there. Of course, the hon. member knows that I have had a great deal of concern for the Trenton area. At the present time, some hopper cars which are still being produced are, I think, still being manufactured there.

• (1612)

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister, if there is a $90 million order, whether it was arrived at by tender, if other companies were invited to participate—that is, if they have the capability—and what centres will benefit from this economic activity? Will DREE or some other government agencies be involved in this order?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the bid was on tender. There were four bids received and, as I indicated carefully, they were evaluated for all features. The supply will be spread over many different manufacturers. Perhaps the best thing would be for me to attempt to get out a more detailed statement on that than I have on hand at the moment, and endeavour to make that available.

The development of the LRC is, of course, something the government has had an important hand in over some time. Both through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and a PAIT grant of $2.5 million, the development was assisted. Then Transport Canada spent $1.12 million assisting in the testing of the equipment through the research and development centre. It was, therefore, a very happy thing indeed that the LRC, which may well have expansion potential, is the vehicle we are looking to today.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport this question. When VIA Rail comes on stream sometime next spring, when it becomes a separate entity, is it the intention to discontinue the passes of present employees of CN and CP and also those retired from CN and CP who have passes on those railways? Will these passes be continued once VIA Rail becomes a separate passenger service?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it certainly would not be the intention to do anything of the sort, but the question of the continuation of passes and the appropriate financial responsibility for them is a matter to be discussed between VIA Rail, on the one hand, and the two railways on the other. It has seemed to be logical that the passenger service, as such, ought not to bear the cost of passes for those engaged in non-passenger service on the railways. That is an internal matter and a matter of arrangement between the railways and VIA Rail. At this point, I think there should be no reason for anyone to worry about the passes changing in their nature.

Mr. Blackburn: When VIA Rail becomes operational, will it also provide a pass service for employees on an ongoing basis?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should not try to prejudge that, since it will be the kind of question dealt with by management. I think the normal thing would be to begin with many of the same arrangements that are now well known. To the great satisfaction of the unions involved in the changeover from CN and CP to VIA Rail, we have introduced and developed certain regulations to make sure that the changeover is as smooth as possible. Obviously, this will be a matter of significant concern and discussion. Perhaps I should not go further than that in my comments today.

WAYS AND MEANS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 60 (11) the adoption yesterday of two notices of ways and means was an order to bring in a bill based on those two notices. That bill is now ready and in the hands of the officers of the House. I would now like to move first reading of that bill.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PETROLEUM CORPORATIONS MONITORING ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR COLLECTION OF CERTAIN STATISTICS RELATING TO PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-12, to require the reporting of certain financial and other statistics relating to the affairs of certain petroleum companies carrying on business in Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding, as a result of discussion with opposition House leaders, that there would be unanimous agreement to vary the House orders to achieve an objective which seems to be commonly desired, namely, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs would be allowed to make a statement on the day preceding Armistice Day, prior to question period, and to extend the other proceedings in order to make up any lost time.

I would, therefore, propose a House order that, notwithstanding any Standing Order, the Minister of Veterans Affairs may make a statement, and spokesmen for parties in opposition may comment thereon, immediately the House is called to order on November 10, 1977, provided that Mr. Speaker shall allow the usual amount of time for routine proceedings and oral questions before the House proceeds to orders of the day.

Mr. Paproski: That is agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Allard: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed, and so ordered, that the proposal of the hon. Minister of State—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 1, consideration of Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications; and motion No. 1 of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, yesterday evening I touched upon certain relevant points with respect to the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which is now before us. He would like to have deleted a provision which was put into the Air Canada bill largely at the request of my colleagues in the Conservative party. That provision reads as follows:

In discharging its responsibilities under the act, the board shall have due regard to sound business principles, and in particular the contemplation of profit.

Also, I pointed out that there were two important matters before us. First, we are saying that the directors must follow sound business principles—I feel all members in this House agree with that—and second, that the directors should follow a pattern of activity in contemplation of profit. Apparently it was the suggestion of profit that caused some hysteria on the part of the socialists and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae). As a result, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre proposed that the entire clause be deleted, which would include the suggestion that the directors follow sound business principles.

I speak in favour of the provision as it now stands, and against the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Despite the fact that Air Canada has over 50 per cent of the total air revenue in Canada, they have experienced substantial losses over the last three years. In the aggregate, those losses were approximately $65 million. If we are going to recapitalize Air Canada and give them a potential capital of $750 million, surely it is not unreasonable to suggest that the board should follow sound business principles and carry out their activities in contemplation of profit.

The projections indicate that upon this bill becoming law, approximately $365 million of capital will be put into Air Canada. Therefore, their capital will rise from $5 million to $370 million. For example, if that money is put into bonds, Air Canada should receive at least 10 per cent interest on that sum. This would mean that it would be almost guaranteed $37 million, before tax profits, prior to flying the first plane.

To suggest that we are asking too much of the board of directors when we say they should run their airline in contemplation of profit is ridiculous. For too long now the socialists—and the Trudeau socialists on the other side of the House—have been telling us that Air Canada is a rather unique animal that should not earn a profit, and that somehow or other airlines just do not earn a profit. That is a misrepresentation of the facts.

In 1976, while Air Canada was losing substantial amounts of money, American Airlines made $56 million after taxes, Eastern Airlines made $46 million, Allegheni Airlines made $14 million, Braniff Airlines made $27 million, Ozark Airlines made $7 million, Pan American Airlines made $94 million, and Piedmont Airlines made $4 million. These are just a few examples of airlines in the United States which are comparable to ours. It is not true to say that historically airlines have lost money. Northwest Airlines, with which the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is very familiar, has about the same amount of revenue as Air Canada—approximately $1 billion. Last year, Northwest Airlines made approximately $100 million, while Air Canada lost some $20 million.

Because of the bureaucratic nature of a state-run airline, Air Canada has been operating at a substantial loss, while certain private-oriented airlines have made a substantial profit under the same basic conditions and during the same timeframe. It is totally wrong to suggest that Air Canada should not, and cannot, make a profit. The fact is that they can make a profit. Air Canada should not be discouraged from making a profit, because profit is a demonstration of an airline's efficiency.

It has been represented in the House and in committee that the recapitalization of Air Canada should be commenced because their debt load is no longer in ratio with their basic capital or equity. Compared to other airlines, Air Canada has an unduly high debt load. The fact which is cleverly glossed over is the reason for that heavy debt load. The short answer is that Air Canada has a heavy debt load in relation to their capital because it has not earned any money to speak of in the last 40 years.

Whereas other airlines have been able to accumulate substantial retained earnings, Air Canada's total retained earnings, after 40 years of activity, are only approximately $18 million. Delta Airlines have retained earnings of $304 million, Northwest Airlines have retained earnings of $473 million, and United Airlines have retained earnings of $306 million. Because Air Canada has not been able to pile up retained earnings comparable to other airlines, we are being asked to bail them out.

It is not a question of other airlines having had substantial capital at some point and Air Canada asking to be capitalized on a comparable basis. Those other airlines had relatively small capital at the beginning. They built up retained earnings, which has given them substantial capital today, whereas Air Canada has been building up very insignificant retained earnings in relation to their total size. What we are doing in the bill is, in effect, allowing Air Canada to catch up through this recapitalization as opposed to taking the route which other airlines have taken, that is, simply accumulating earnings over a period of years.

The next point is something that has often been overlooked. When we in committee asked the management of Air Canada to give us a proforma statement as to how they saw the earnings of Air Canada after capitalization, we were told that by 1981 they felt that if they were recapitalized, the total retained earnings of Air Canada would be $70 million; in other words, their retained earnings would go from about $13 million, in 1976, to $70 million.

It is rather surprising that on the second day, when we asked them to tell us what would be their retained earnings if they did not have this recapitalization, if they simply carried on with their $5 million capital and present debt structure, we were told the retained earnings on that projection would be almost identical. They said that if they carried on as they are, they would project their retained earnings to be $69 million in 1981, compared to $71 million in 1981, if they got the recapitalization. That has got to be a red flag for us. Their own internal projections show that if they are asked to carry on with the debt load they have, their retained earnings will be the same as if they were given the new recapitalization to which I referred, that is, additional capital of $365 million.

I say it is a red flag because we know that as long as they have the debt structure there is a certain obligation on them to at least pay the interest on that back to the treasury of Canada. However, once we recapitalize them and give them an additional $365 million, they have absolutely no requirement to pay dividends. They have absolutely no requirement to pay interest on that amount. They can have a free ride, if we do not make it clear in the legislation now before us that they must carry on their business in contemplation of profit.

It is important, if we are going to accommodate Air Canada as the government has asked us, that we, on behalf of the Canadian public, do not leave the public in the unfortunate position where one can have an airline with $370 million, maybe up to $750 million if the authorized capital is paid up, with no condition that they must run the airline on a profitable basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. Stevens: I thank hon. members for their co-operation, Mr. Speaker. I will be brief on the question of whether we approve the amendment now before us. I wish to touch on one other matter. When the minister was speaking, he made reference to the fact that we are heading toward the point where Air Canada might be sold, at least in part, to private interests. The minister stated, and I quote from page 526 of Hansard:

> I emphasize that it is a matter of this House and this government recognizing that where it is possible for a private sector-like operation to do a job effectively, that indeed is where it should be done. We are, in effect, giving the airline that kind of status while not yet having decided that, as owners of the airline, it is commercially right or the time to dispose of our investment interest in it. I see this happening with Air Canada—

This is the type of double-talk we get from the Trudeau Liberal government. They do one thing and then pretend that somehow or other they have a fundamental agreement or interest in the free enterprise system or in companies being left in the private sector. I raise this question because it is important to bear in mind that while the minister has put that on the record, if you read the bill you will find it disproves what he has said. For example, in clause 10 we find that, while the shares of Air Canada now have a par value of $100, it is proposed to raise them to a par value of $1,000. Surely that is not being done in contemplation of having private concerns buy into Air Canada. Let us not forget this fact. Not only are they proposing to raise the capital from the present $5 million to a possible $750 million, but they are also making that capital saleable only in shares of $1,000 or multiples thereof.

Second, the bill provides that the shares of the corporation are not transferable. When issued to the Minister of Finance, they will be registered in the books of the corporation in the name of the minister and held by him in trust for Her Majesty in right of Canada. There is not even a prediction that they will be transferred to the private sector. To make that abundantly clear, clause 10(4) reads:

> No shares of the corporation may be issued otherwise than as expressly authorized by this act.

Let us not allow the minister to convey the impression that somehow the passage of this bill will allow Air Canada in part to be owned in future by private concerns. This is also confirmed by the fact that the bill contemplates that in over 40 different respects Air Canada will be under the direction of various orders in council. Again, that is not being done in contemplation of Air Canada shifting to the private sector. The private sector will not invest in an airline dominated by a government which can simply instruct them what to do through orders in council.

I would state that with a capital of $750 million, if that is what they eventually issue, it would be difficult to sell any shares in Air Canada. However, it will be absolutely impossible to sell shares in Air Canada if it does not make a realistic profit in relation to what other airlines are doing. That is what brings me back to this amendment. We are not doing our duty as members of parliament if we allow this amendment to pass, bearing in mind it will confirm that the directors of this airline may in future carry on their operation with no contemplation of profit. If we have a capital of $350 million, up to $750 million, and there is not a comparable profit on that capital, there is no way that shares in Air Canada can ever be sold to the private sector. That is another reason why we need this provision in the bill.

As the Globe and Mail indicated yesterday, most airlines in Canada have turned the corner after two years of heavy losses and it is now contemplated they will be on the profitable side. That is all the more reason we should say to Air Canada, "We are giving you this relatively large amount as far as authorized capital is concerned," if that $750 million is issued, which will mean Air Canada will have the largest issued capital of any airline in the world, so surely the least we can say is, "Run your airline at a profit."

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) would accept a question.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Saltsman: I was interested in what the hon. member had to say. A problem arises from his argument, at least in my mind. It is one we are trying to deal with in the amendment now before the House. There are many areas of Canada which, if they had to be served by an airline intent only on profit, would simply not be served. The rationale for Air Canada in the first place was to establish an airline, not because the government was socialist in those days but simply because the private sector was unable or unwilling to service this vast country.

The hon. member suggests we go to a profit-oriented airline. It would not be difficult for Air Canada to do that. The easiest way would be simply to lop off all those areas it serves now which do not pay. That would isolate many people in this country, or put them in the position of having to pay extraordinary rates in order to get service. I would like the hon. member for York-Simcoe to address himself to that particular problem. How would he deal with it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before permitting the hon. member to answer the question, I must seek the unanimous consent of the House because the hon. member for York-Simcoe previously used up his allotted time. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

● (1642)

Mr. Stevens: I do not believe the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) was in the House last evening when I dealt with the specific question he has raised. I pointed out that the bill before us, in clauses 8 and 9, covers the very point to which he has referred. Those clauses contemplate that there may be areas in Canada which Air Canada might feel it could not serve in a viable or profitable way, in which case the government can ask Air Canada to serve such areas. Any losses are then to be calculated and charged to the treasury.

This is the point I am getting at: I think it is important to make a clear decision between running a service because you think it is in the public interest, and asking an airline to run a good, efficient, profitable undertaking. The socialists get into trouble because they confuse those two things. We in this House have every right to decide whether we feel public money should be used to provide an air service in certain areas. That is a matter of policy. But it should be public knowledge and we should understand exactly what we are doing.

If it costs $10 million or $100 million, the public has a right to understand what is being done. The socialist says, "Gloss it over. Don't expect the company to run at a profit, because the name of the game is public service". That approach usually results in no profit being made, because it leads to the building up of a bureaucracy and commitment to all kinds of expenditures in the name of delivering a service. We ought to keep the situation crystal clear. Air Canada, given the amount of capital at its disposal, should be expected to run as profitably as any comparable airline. If it feels it has unprofitable runs, let the corporation come back to us openly and ask for a subsidy. If it is warranted, that subsidy can be granted. But keep the record straight; do not gloss it over as all socialists gloss it over, building up these bureaucracies in the guise of somehow or other serving the Canadian public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Ellis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not recall there was agreement to defer this vote. There was agreement yesterday to defer any vote until three o'clock today, but there was no agreement to defer this vote today.

An hon. Member: It is by rule, now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): As I said, it was in accordance with Standing Order 75(11), which reads as follows:

When a recorded division has been demanded on any amendment proposed during the report stage of a bill, Mr. Speaker may defer the calling in of the members for the purpose of recording the "Yeas" and "Nays" until any or all subsequent amendments proposed to that bill have been considered.

A recorded division or divisions may be so deferred from sitting to sitting.

Mr. Ellis: May I ask, then, when the vote will be taken?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Look at the order paper. There are three or four amendments on it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): As the hon. member has just heard from my reading of Standing Order 75(11), the vote is deferred until any or all subsequent amendments proposed to the bill have been considered. After consultation, it has been proposed that motions Nos. 2 and 5 and motions Nos. 3 and 4 be grouped for debate and voted on separately. Is that agreeable to hon. members?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed, and so ordered.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I understand that under Standing Order 75 (11) the division on an amendment can be deferred until any or all subsequent amendments proposed have been considered. Of course I am not saying that you should state your decision immediately, but as I understand it, and you will correct me if I am wrong, you are not now necessarily deferring this vote to another sitting, but you wish to wait until 6:30 to see how the other amendments will be discussed before determining precisely when the vote can be taken. Is this correct?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is precisely as the parliamentary secretary has just said—until any or all subsequent amendments have been considered. That is left to the discretion of the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I suppose you will tell us about your decision sometime later today?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): If we finish with all the amendments today, we can take the vote later this afternoon. Otherwise, it can be deferred until later still.

Mr. Pinard: Must I then take it that we shall not consider all the amendments today? Will you effectively defer the vote to another day?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member will be consulted beforehand.

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

[Mr. Ellis.]

Motion No. 2—

That Bill C-3, an act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be amended in clause 7 by adding immediately after line 31 at page 5 the following new subclause:

"(11.1) Every material contract entered into between the corporation and

(a) a director or officer of the corporation, or

(b) a corporation or partnership in which a director or officer of the corporation has a material interest is null and void."

Motion No. 5—

That Bill C-3, an act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be amended in clause 22

(a) by striking out line 2 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor: "(2)(d)(ii) thereof, section 46, 111, 115,";

(b) by striking out line 5 at page 12 and substituting the following therefor: "(10), 117(1), 118(1) to (3), 119(1),"

He said: Speaking to the two motions in my name, Nos. 2 and 5, I draw attention to the fact that these, essentially, are attempts to tighten up conditions under which the directors will be allowed to run the activities of Air Canada. If this bill is passed, we shall have established an airline which will initially have a capital of something like $370 million, and potentially a capital of $750 million. They also have assets worth something over $1 billion. In short, they are an extremely large commercial concern.

• (1652)

The trustees of any corporation are the directors of that corporation. On behalf of the people of Canada, the directors of Air Canada are essentially charged with the well-being of our investment in Air Canada. We have had some unhappy instances where at one board meeting the officer in charge frankly stated that he could not keep the directors awake, they kept falling asleep. At another meeting it was also said that they tried to get everything through by at least two o'clock in the afternoon because the directors would fall asleep by that time and it was very difficult to get any of the business done. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, and bearing in mind that the widespread impression has been created that the directors of Air Canada are political hacks who are on the board—

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) seeks the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Stevens: Yes.

Mr. Lang: Would he cite his authority for those two references? I should certainly like to check into them, to be sure they are not simply wild speculation, rumour or imagination. If the hon. member has the source, I would be pleased to have it.

Mr. Stevens: I am sure the minister would be most curious to have the source. I can assure him that the source is very bona fide.

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Then put it on the record.

Mr. Stevens: I suggest that in jumping up on his point of order, the minister knows I have hit the mark. He knows that I am dead right. In the more general remarks which I intend to make in support of my amendments, I will specifically quote what one of the officers of Air Canada had to say concerning the directors of Air Canada. Perhaps the minister will be able to check with that officer once I have quoted him.

First of all, motion No. 2 is simply an attempt to make sure that the directors or officers of Air Canada, or directors who in turn are also materially interested in a corporation or partnership or who may have some contract with Air Canada, in future should not be able to enter into such contract. In short, Mr. Speaker, what I am saying —and this came out in committee—is that not only are the directors on this board a little sleepy but, in turn, they may have contracts with the very airline of which they are acting as trustees on behalf of the people of Canada.

Granted, in committee it was stated there is great vigilance, that an attempt is always made to have them declare their interest. But we feel this is not good enough. Why should we not put into this bill which reorganizes Air Canada the flat statement that the directors may not have any dealings with Air Canada, period? Similarly, why not say the officers may not have any dealings with Air Canada, period, other than those dealings which form part of their function as directors or officers of Air Canada? Without belabouring the point, this is essentially what I am asking for in motion No. 2.

I think I have to explain motion No. 5 a little more fully. It appears rather innocuous until one reads clause 22 of the Air Canada bill. I do not think most of us realize the significance of some of the provisions in that particular clause. May I refer hon. members to the top of page 12, where reference is made to section 112 of the Canada Business Corporations Act. If allowed to stand in the bill, section 112 of the Canada Business Corporations Act will become incorporated into the charter of Air Canada.

I ask hon. members to listen to what section 112 allows the directors of Air Canada to do if it does become so incorporated. They may, by a resolution in writing signed by all the directors entitled to vote on that resolution at a meeting of directors or committee of directors, vote as if they were at the meeting, provided they simply sign that resolution. In other words, if section 112 is allowed to remain in the bill before the House, the directors may simply, in future, be able to sign whatever resolution they are asked to sign in lieu of attending a meeting. It is bad enough to have them fall asleep at meetings, but surely if they are to perform their function properly as directors of Air Canada, they should at least be expected to leave their homes and attend meetings to hear what is going on, as opposed to dutifully signing some resolution which they did not have the benefit of discussing at the meeting.

Again I point out that on page 12 of the bill reference is made to the inclusion of section 109(9) of the Canada Business Corporations Act. Here, again, this appears rather innocuous until one reads section 109(9), which again refers to directors and calls for participation by telephone. That section provides:

> Subject to the by-laws, a director may, if all the directors of the corporation consent, participate in a meeting of directors or of a committee of directors by means of such telephone or other communications facilities as permit all persons participating in the meeting to hear each other, and a director participating in such a meeting by such means is deemed for the purposes of this Act to be present at that meeting.

In short, they are contemplating some type of conference call directors' meeting, and I think this is unforgiveable. First of all, we are proposing to recapitalize Air Canada with up to $750 million worth of capital. We are proposing that directors may deal with the company freely so far as outside contracts are concerned. In addition, they may not even have to attend directors' meetings. In short, they merely have to sign a resolution as if they had attended the meeting. Finally, they may make some kind of conference call arrangement and attend a meeting by telephone, as opposed to appearing in person. This is no way to run an airline, Mr. Speaker. As far as the members of my caucus are concerned, we believe those two provisions should be deleted, so that directors are at least obligated to attend meetings; and as stated in motion No. 2, so they will not be allowed to have contracts with Air Canada.

Let us try to take a look at this matter in perspective, Mr. Speaker. If any of us owned stock in a corporation which lost some $20 million last year, and in rescuing the company we decided to relax the rules governing the board of directors, surely the least we should do is to say that the directors in future must attend meetings of the board, and that they also not be given the privilege of making contracts with the very company of which they are trustees. Although this airline, in its over 40 years of existence, has accumulated virtually no retained earnings, we find that the directors, who collectively preside over a loss of some $65 million during the past three years, will not even be requested to attend board meetings, but may simply sign a resolution or be party to the meeting through a telephone call.

That is the reason we are suggesting these motions should be supported. During the committee hearings on this bill, several members of parliament challenged the negative guidelines for the selection of Air Canada directors, bearing in mind that there are only two rules at present: Air Canada directors must be Canadian citizens, and they must be under 70 years of age. The president of Air Canada, Claude Taylor, told the committee that he would welcome, to use his language, more positive guidelines for the selection and performance of board members. He also admitted that of the board's present nine members, only one had previous experience in the airline industry—the other eight are drawn from other walks of life.

All too often the government, which appoints Air Canada's directors, packs the board with political appointees and party hacks, rather than with the many capable and available

Canadians with knowledge and expertise in the aviation industry. By permitting absentee directors, the government is taking yet another step in reducing Air Canada's board to a rubber-stamp body with little or no say in airline management.

Rather than strengthening the board's hand in the day to day management of the airline, the provision in clause 22 would undermine the credibility of Air Canada's management at a time when it is vital that it put its own house in order. Surely the first step in putting the airline on a sound financial basis is to provide it with a committed and involved board of directors. It is concerned, capable management, not absentee directors, which brings success to any well-run business. Public corporations—certainly a Crown corporation such as Air Canada—are no exception.

For these reasons, I hope and trust that most members of the House will support my two motions which would delete certain provisions from the bill now before us and which would allow absentee directors to run Air Canada's affairs. If we are to rebuild Air Canada, we must first make the directors more accountable for, not more removed from, the operation of our nation's largest and oldest airline.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I only want to intervene very briefly to indicate that, of course, the proposed Air Canada Act as it is contained in the bill before the House incorporates significant protection which is found in the Canadian Business Corporations Act in relation to such matters as contracts. So that when the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) asks whether the material contracts can be entered into, he may leave the impression that this is being allowed in the absence of any over-all contracts, which is certainly not the case.

The ordinary provisions of the Canadian Business Corporations Act which are seen as being appropriate for corporations in general will apply in this case also. That is also true of the provision for potential informal votes and approval by directors. It has been found necessary over the years to give businesses that prerogative so they need not summon directors for every piece of business or for the finalization of it when they have conducted the main part of the business at an earlier meeting. That provision was incorporated in the Canadian Business Corporations Act and is also included in the bill before us. The very breadth of the motion which the hon. member has proposed might make it more difficult to obtain directors with a good deal of experience who happen also to be senior persons with an interest in major corporations, so in that sense he has been arguing against himself.

I should like to say one other word. I regret very much that the hon. member for York-Simcoe persists in what I think is an example of very bad conduct for members of the House, a degrading kind of conduct, when he refers to directors who are not present and cannot defend themselves. He said that he has reports about their falling asleep. When I asked for his source, he did not give it but snidely said that of course he thinks I would be interested in it.

[Mr. Stevens.]

What I am interested in is that members of the House do not abuse the privileges of the House by defaming in this way or being derogatory about people who are not here. I think it is very important that we adopt that standard of conduct and that we find ways in the House to deal with members who do not refrain from such conduct. If there is no record, if it is hearsay that is being relied upon, or evidence that is not sufficiently substantial to be brought before the House, then members should, in decency, refrain from making such references.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: I urge that we recognize the basic protection that exists in the law that is proposed and that, therefore, hon. members do not support the proposed amendments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question on motion No. 2?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on motion No. 2 stands deferred.

The question now is on motion No. 5. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, the recorded division on motion No. 5 stands deferred.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have no objection to there being one vote on motions Nos. 2 and 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is ordered that motions Nos. 2 and 5 be grouped for one vote. We are now on motions Nos. 3 and 4, which are grouped for debate.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe) moved:

Motion No. 3—

That Bill C-3, an act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be amended in clause 10 by striking out lines 25 and 26 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"corporation is four hundred million dollars divided into shares of ten".

Motion No. 4—

That Bill C-3, an act respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be amended in clause 10

(a) by striking out lines 34 and 35 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) The shares of the corporation when issued to the minister";

(b) by striking out line 42 at page 6 and substituting the following therefor:

"by this act, but shares so issued are transferable in accordance with section 47 of the Canada Business Corporations Act."

He said: In speaking to motions Nos. 3 and 4, I would again like to give an explanation to the House as to why we feel these motions deserve support. Dealing, first of all, with motion No. 3, we propose that clause 10, which appears on page 6 of the bill, be amended to provide that, rather than that there should be $750 million of capital divided into shares of $1,000 each, there should be $400 million worth of capital divided into shares of $10 each.

● (1712)

If I may speak to that amendment first, the evidence which was given before our standing committee made it very clear that the Air Canada management does not project using more than $370 million of capital between now and 1981. As we have already stated, its present capital is only $5 million. If this bill goes through, the government proposes to increase that capital by $365 million, to $370 million.

Our feeling is that if we look down the path for as much as five years and see that Air Canada will need only $370 million in capital, why does the government propose to authorize $750 million? In truth, I think this is a way in which the government feels it can bypass parliament. Clearly, if Air Canada decides at a later date, notwithstanding its projections which make it clear that it needs only $370 million, to add another $100 million or to go right up $750 million, and if the government has this legislation in its present form, there will be no obligation to come back to parliament to ask for a new amendment to the Air Canada Act. In short, we are nervous about giving Air Canada $750 million worth of capital. That would mean that it would be the most capitalized airline in the world. It would mean that it would have capital which would impose absolutely no fetter on it.

At 10 per cent that amount of capital could produce $75 million with no difficulty at all. That is a tremendous subsidy to be given to any Crown corporation by the people of Canada. Why the government insists on this is not clear. Our suggestion that the capital be authorized at $400 million appears to be a very common sense level at which to leave it. It allows $30 million of additional capital over the $370 million Air Canada asked for in its own projections.

Air Canada claims it can run the airline at a profit. In fact, by 1981 Air Canada says it can have the $70 million worth of retained earnings to which I referred earlier, so that leaves Air Canada with $440 million of capital and retained earnings at that point. Again I would like to point out that Air Canada's total assets would then be about $1.26 billion. That is what Air Canada claims. If that is so, having a capital of well over 40 per cent of its total assets is, I think, completely adequate.

The first thing we are asking for in motion No. 3 is that the government accept a lower authorized capital level of $400 million as opposed to the $750 million the government is proposing as a safeguard, and if more capital is needed for some reason in future years, let the government come back through the same route it is taking today and ask for the additional capital. In its wisdom, at that time parliament may or may not allow it; but why leave it to the government of the day to be able to hand out that additional capital with no further reference to this parliament?

We do not contemplate any gigantic dividends as far as the capital is concerned. The projections show a 4 per cent dividend running through to 1981. Now, 4 per cent with inflation running at 8 per cent is almost a laugh. It is a laugh if there is any serious intention on the part of the minister to make this stock in Air Canada saleable to private interests at some future date.

Speaking of making the stock saleable to private interests, this brings me to the second part of motion No. 3. As I indicated, we are proposing that the shares in Air Canada have a $10 par value as opposed to the $1,000 which the minister is suggesting. I do not think this is an unreasonable request, because presumably in the wisdom of C. D. Howe the present shares of Air Canada are $100. If there is any serious consideration on the part of the minister to allow Air Canada to be owned partly by private interests, why would the government raise the par value of the shares from $100 to $1,000? Our suggestion is to lower the par value to $10, and then perhaps some of the ordinary investors in this country would have an opportunity to buy some of those shares, if they are ever saleable, instead of having to put up $1,000 for just one share in the airline.

That is the thrust of motion No. 3. We are simply saying that Air Canada should be realistic with regard to its authorized capital. Four hundred million dollars is $30 million more than it is contemplated will be needed over the next five years. We say the par value of shares should be $10, so that ordinary investors will be able to buy them, if there is a serious intention to make them available, instead of selling them at $1,000.

Motion No. 4 deals essentially with the question of how realistic we are in assuming that Air Canada shares might be saleable to the private sector at some future date. As I indicated, the balance of clause 10 in Bill C-3 deals with the present transferability of the shares of Air Canada. There is no doubt that the shares of Air Canada can be registered only in the name of the Minister of Finance, on behalf of Her Majesty, and from there they are non-transferable. Subclause (4) of clause 10 makes it clear that no shares of the corporation may be issued otherwise than is expressly authorized by this bill.

It is fundamental to the belief of our caucus that wherever possible Crown corporations should be put back into the private sector if that is a viable thing to do. That is why we are suggesting that in recapitalizing Air Canada we should make meaningful provisions to have that restoration built into the legislation, without having to come back to parliament to get special legislation at a future date. In that connection I would like to read subclause (4) as it would read should the amendments in motion No. 4 go through. At the present time, clause 10(4) provides:

No shares of the corporation may be issued otherwise than as expressly authorized by this act.

We propose to add these words:

—but shares so issued are transferable in accordance with section 47 of the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Section 47 of the Canada Business Corporations Act allows the transfer of shares in the general course of affairs. In short, we are saying that there should be realistic authorized capital. Let us put that authorized capital into a denomination which the average Canadian investor might buy at some future time. Finally, let us make sure, through motion No. 4, that the shares are transferable at some future date into private hands as opposed to having to stay in the hands of the Minister of Finance.

If the government persists and votes down our suggested amendment, it has no serious intention of allowing Air Canada to go back into the private sector with respect to even one share. If that is so, let us smoke the government out today. I think it is great for the Minister of Transport to give wonderful assurances about the government's thinking about the private sector and about how it might put Air Canada's share ownership back into the private sector, but if he accepts our amendment it will do very much more in a concrete way to demonstrate the earnest desire of the government than any rhetoric the minister might put into the pages of Hansard.

● (1722)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I suppose I always have to rise to a challenge to be smoked out by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). I should say that the authorized capital proposed in the bill is the result of very serious consideration by Air Canada and the government, particularly the Minister of Finance, as to the appropriate figure. Like a good solicitor trying to assure that a corporation has adequate power, this figure was arrived at.

On the other issue of the smaller value of shares and ability to sell them, I have indicated the possibility of this at some point. The whole direction to Air Canada is to operate in such a way that it would be in a position to appeal to the market at some time. At that time it would be a fundamental issue and, as the hon. member for York-Simcoe may realize, it would be treated as a very fundamental issue by some of his colleagues to his left. It is probably fair to deal with the issue as a whole issue when it arises.

Many features of the Air Canada Act would have to be reconstructed for adequate transfer of those shares to the private sector. It seems desirable, therefore, to leave that issue for another day when this House can come to grips with it and decide if Air Canada has been able to operate in such a way that it is seen as a viable investment and able to offer its shares. I therefore recommend that hon. members not support this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The question is on motion No. 3 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on motion No. 3 stands deferred.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 4 in the name of the hon. member for York-Simcoe? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Stevens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it would be agreeable to us to have the vote on motions Nos. 3 and 4 put at the same time when we take the deferred votes. In other words, one vote on those two motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Motions Nos. 3 and 4 will be grouped for voting. Call in the members.

● (1802)

Mr. Speaker: I declare motions Nos. 3 and 4 lost.

● (1812)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): By leave, now.

Mr. Lang moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this bill should escape further comment on third reading, albeit it was before us in the past session and is with us again.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member may be permitted a short delay in order to catch his breath while the House reorganizes itself. Hon. members who wish to leave the chamber might do so quickly and quietly in order to permit the intervention of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it is not that they are leaving; it is the fact that they leave noisily that bothers us.

There are many features of this bill which I think commend themselves to this House. The amendments upon which we voted were matters of importance; they were part of the basic principle of the reorganization of Air Canada. But generally all of us welcome the intention of the bill and the features of the bill as they now have been passed. We cannot change it. I am sorry that the House could not see its way clear to accepting some of the amendments, but the decision having been made, I will not deal with them any further.

Having been a steady passenger on Air Canada for some 20 years now, I hope that this bill will permit Air Canada to put its operations on a more efficient administrative basis. There are areas of administration which many of us could say could be more efficiently run, but this bill should allow the administration to organize itself better, more efficiently and to be able to cope in a very competitive world.

Air Canada is our flag line, and we are competing with nationally-owned or publicly-owned airlines all over the world. On the other hand, there are some notable exceptions to that. These lines provide effective competition, and that is as it should be.

One thing, however, which I find very difficult to accept is that, as taxpayers, Canadians have to make up the losses in the operations of Air Canada, and they must also subsidize to a great extent the competition that exists abroad, with their domestic fare rates. I find it totally indecent, for instance, that Air Canada's fares from Ottawa to Edmonton and back, plus the charges of the Ministry of Transport, should now cost some $346 on an economy fare. On the other hand, my good friend, Max Ward, of Wardair can take people from Edmonton and Calgary to Hawaii, a far greater distance, for much less money. As a matter of fact, the fare runs anywhere from $229 to $319 return to Hawaii during the winter season.

It seems to me absolute nonsense to prohibit domestic charter fares. Air Canada has been resisting them. People in eastern Canada should recognize the fallacy of this insistence by bureaucrats of the air transport committee which implements government policy and protects both Air Canada and CP Air. It is far cheaper for Canadians to travel south to Florida in the winter and for western Canadians to ski in Colorado and Montana or to go south to Hawaii or Arizona. Is it any wonder that we have a $4 billion deficit in the tourism account? The government's policy drives Canadians out of the country. This is the most nonsensical aspect of air transport policy in Canada today.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) decries the size of our tourism deficit, but that is not the only reason for high domestic air fares in Canada. Mr. Speaker, we have beautiful and very efficient ski resorts in Alberta and British Columbia, but it is cheaper to fly from population centres in central Canada to Europe than to Banff or Jasper and, of course, it is even more expensive to go to British Columbia ski resorts.

The parks department has a companion policy which insists that Jasper be left to the bears. This policy will not permit construction of adequate accommodation at the ski slopes. Apparently, people are not supposed to ski or enjoy themselves in winter. They can go to Montana or Aspen, Colorado, but not to the Canadian mountains. In this way we pile up the deficit in the tourism account. The combination of the policy of the national parks with regard to Jasper and Banff, ski development in British Columbia, and the policy regarding domestic air fares, results in Canadians going abroad to ski. They go to Europe. I know people from Edmonton and Calgary who find it cheaper to ski in Austria or Switzerland.

We have some sort of blind spot, Mr. Speaker, and usually it is "made in Ottawa" at the bureaucratic level. The ministers do not help. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner), who is in charge of our national parks, says he made an inspection of an inn on the west coast of Vancouver Island, at Long Beach, and has confirmed that it shall be closed in order to become some sort of interpretive centre. That is some bureaucratic nightmare!

There we have one of the aspects with regard to Air Canada. Let us see how we can cure that. It does not have to be knocked all the time. Let us have air facilities in the country to accommodate the passengers, who are the important people because they pay the shot.

I should like to refer to the antiquated airport here in Ottawa. When it rains or snows, we throw everyone to the elements. There has been nothing done to accommodate them. We have seen cattle, pigs and various domestic animals going through the pens at the abattoirs or feedlots. Those animals have ample room compared to what passengers are faced with at some of the Canadian terminals. What is being done about this?

The decision of the Treasury Board some weeks ago to reject alterations and expansions which have been before the department for three years is of concern to myself and other hon. members from the Edmonton area. Those alterations and expansions have been cut. That is an utterly stupid decision. The Edmonton air terminal was designed for 1.2 million people. It already carries a capacity of two million people a year. The Commonwealth Games are coming up. The lack of capacity is not the fault of the terminal designers who worked on the project back in the fifties or early sixties. No one dreamed of a 1011 or a 747 back in those days.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) should be informed of what happens when a 747 overseas charter flight arrives at the Edmonton airport. The immigration and customs facilities are a disgrace. Those facilities can handle a D-9 or a stretched DC-8. I suppose the maximum number of passengers that could be handled would be those from a 727. Those facilities are taxed to the limit and baggage handling is chaotic. The Department of Transport occupies a good portion of that building. Can we get them out of there in order for the portion of the building they occupy to be used for passenger service? The answer is no. The $28 million program was cut back to $5.6 million. That program is for some outside cosmetic work, and it is taking an eternity.

• (1827)

The Montreal Olympics were fine. We in western Canada look forward to the Commonwealth Games. We expect to attract a lot of people. We hope they will come and go, leaving us with a good taste in our mouths. The worst thing you can do to air passengers is crowd them, mishandle their baggage, slow their processing through the airport and have a long and tedious processing through customs and immigration. Do that, and you have lost them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is the way to make friends!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) says, that is the way to make friends! Canada needs every friend it can get from abroad. The $2 billion tourism deficiency has to be cut down, not only by Canadians travelling a bit more in Canada, which they should do, but by attracting more foreigners to this country to compensate for all the Canadians who go abroad.

Everyone possible has approached the Minister of Transport. He may be in some sympathy with this; I do not know. The Minister of Transport has never been known as Edmonton's best friend. Treasury Board cut back the program. It was interesting to read the comments in the papers the other day following a delegation of the air services committee of the Edmonton area which met with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who feels his way around like a new boy, saying "Yes" to everybody. According to newspaper reports, he agreed with every proposition made by the air services committee. I ask that minister now, and I will do this again later, whether he agrees with the position of Treasury Board. Does he agree with the acceptance by the Minister of Transport of the decision of Treasury Board with regard to the Edmonton airport?

This afternoon the Minister of Transport indicated to me that this was a short-run decision. However, we have had short-run decisions twice before. Those facilities are now costing well over 50 per cent more than originally proposed. That, again, is false economy.

I compare that decision to cut back with the $150 million plus that was spent on Mirabel or Calgary where they are now in a position to put in pre-clearance. Pre-clearance, which has been negotiated now for the past several years, will not be instituted in Edmonton for some years to come if we follow the program of the Department of Transport with regard to that airport.

The Ministry of Transport should get off its collective duff and take a stand with regard to Treasury Board.

I hope the Minister of Transport, assisted by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will state publicly that they will do everything they can to see that these alternations and improvements are financed. Then we will see how Air Canada will develop. On the basis of this development, getting more passenger miles and greater utilization of aircraft, we will see a more successful operation. It will help CP Air as well. That is one aspect of Canadian industry which we wish the greatest success; but it has to start with government policy. Notwithstanding the good measures contained in this bill, I regret that Treasury Board and Transport have put a wet blanket on the potential of Air Canada.

May I call it 6:30, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Could the deputy House leader indicate what we will be doing tomorrow?

• (1832)

Mr. Cafik: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If it is not possible to conclude third reading of this measure tonight, it is the intention to continue with this item tomorrow in the hope it can be given early passage. After that—this is a tentative proposal,—we would consider the Canada Labour Code. If there is any change in that arrangement, I will inform the House leaders tomorrow morning so that they can make the appropriate adjustments.

While I am on my feet, I wonder whether there would be disposition, since the hon. member has completed his speech, to deal with this measure tonight. We could then go on with other matters tomorrow.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I have not finished.

Mr. Cafik: I am sorry. I did not realize that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6.32 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.32 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

ALLEGED CONFUSION CONCERNING DIRECTION OF FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the extreme importance of the administration of justice and in view of the provision in Section 5 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act which clearly states that the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under the direction of the minister has the "control and management" of the police while the "direction" of the force is under the minister whose jurisdiction is also defined in Section 4 of the Solicitor General's Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Prime Minister cease confusing the responsibility of himself and his ministers for direction of the force with the entirely different matter of the day to day operations so clearly invested in the commissioner under his mandate for control and management.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CABLES CONCERNING BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE FROM MR. STARNES TO FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That all the cables exchanged between the then Director General of Security Services Mr. John Starnes and the RCMP officials in Montreal concerning the break-in at the offices of L'Agence de Presse Libre in the fall of 1972 be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

SUGGESTION MR. STARNES TESTIFY BEFORE COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), on Monday of this week, indicated to this House that the illegal break-in had been "authorized by the most senior level of the RCMP, and that was by the person holding the rank of Director-General"—Mr. John Starnes, and since, in a telegram dated October 12, 1972, Mr. Starnes stated to RCMP Inspector J. L. Forrest that "He should be informed in advance of such action in this pre-election situation, and that he would want to know the extent of our involvement before giving advice to the Minister and Prime Minister", and since Mr. Starnes resigned on March 7, 1973, while the government claims not to be aware of any illegal security operations until 1976, even though further illegal acts are alleged to have occurred in early 1973, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the former Director-General of Security and Intelligence Services, Mr. John Starnes, be immediately invited to testify before the parliamentary Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, in order that parliament and the people of Canada may have a complete understanding of ministerial awareness and responsibility for these illegal acts.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

RECOMMENDATION THAT McDONALD COMMISSION ACCELERATE ITS WORK—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the RCMP has now fallen into discredit following the disclosure of illegal acts for which it is responsible—I am saying responsible because I do not want to say guilty, because it must be deemed innocent until proven guilty—and that the Canadian public will naturally be distrustful of the RCMP because of all the publicity surrounding this debate in the House of Commons, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House recommend to the Solicitor General to urge the McDonald Commission, which is currently investigating the RCMP, to accelerate its work in order to shed light on all the illegal break-ins which were dealt with in the House and reassure the Canadian public.

Electronic Devices

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF AGREEMENT WITH UNITED STATES ON CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the construction of the pipeline.

In the absence of any guarantees for Canadian producers and in light of the very serious statements made by United States Senators Durkin, Jackson and Stevens, members of the United States Senate Energy Committee to the effect that they oppose any favourable or preferential treatment for Canada and Canadian producers regarding the supply of pipe which now raises very serious questions about the agreement entered into by Canada and the United States of America, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

● (1412)

That the agreement dated September 20, 1977 between Canada and the United States of America on principles applicable to a northern natural gas pipeline, be referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and that that Committee be instructed to report on the adequacy of the said agreement in terms of benefit to Canada and Canadian producers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY INTO RESPONSIBILITY FOR PLACING ELECTRONIC DEVICE IN OFFICE OF MEMBER FOR CENTRAL NOVA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): I rise under Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which arises out of recent events put before the House by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette):

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

That this House bring all of its resources to bear to discover what person or persons conspired to place that electronic device in the hon. member's office, and more specifically, whether any private detective agency was involved directly or indirectly in the placing and the discovery of such a device; if yes, who that agency was, how much money was involved and where that money came from;

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Stollery: My motion continues:

why the hon. member for Central Nova did not delay publicizing the bug in his office, which apparently had a time limit of only 72 hours, in order to permit adequate surveillance which would have surely trapped the person or persons involved in the bugging operation.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A motion presented at this time can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has given its consent to the presentation of this motion. The motion having now been presented, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You will be in the back benches in the House forever.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no!

An hon. Member: You will be back there with Goodale forever.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PENSIONS AND COMPENSATION FOR PRISONERS OF WAR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that the House will agree with the motion I shall present, and I hope that like the previous motion it will be supported. I therefore move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs in preparing the statement he intends to make next Thursday, November 10, in recognition of Remembrance Day, to include therein not just words of praise for our veterans, but an announcement of legislation to raise the basic rate of the war disability pension, to improve the position of veteran's widows, and to grant the prisoner of war compensation to the fewer than two hundred surviving Canadian veterans who were prisoners of war during World War I.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented to the House for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PERSON RESPONSIBLE FOR ENSURING SECURITY SERVICE OPERATES WITHIN LAW—ACTION TO ENSURE ADHERENCE TO LAW

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who demonstrated his capacity yesterday as an artful dodger.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: As the House knows, the fundamental question at issue here is ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1417)

Mr. Clark: I want the Prime Minister to tell the House of Commons now who in his government accepts responsibility for ensuring that security services operate within the law and follow the mandate given to them by the government. In other words, who in cabinet polices the security service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Solicitor General and myself as Prime Minister.

Mr. Clark: What specific or active actions other than simply passively listening to briefings did the Prime Minister and the solicitors general of the day take prior to the issuing of the mandate prior to March, 1975 and what active procedures are now taken by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General to ensure that the security service operates within the law and to ensure that the mandate that was spelled out in March, 1975 is honoured and respected in practice by the security service? Will the Prime Minister spell out the actions he takes to ensure that the law and the mandate are respected?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General in his answers to the House, and in his statement on Friday, indicated several actions which have been taken. Most of them originated with the first discovery by government that an illegal and what we thought at that time isolated act had been taken by the RCMP. Since all kinds of indications have been given to the RCMP, active searches of their files on specific incidents, whether spurious, imagined or real put forth by the opposition or other people have been followed up. Of course, each time an action was discovered which might have an aspect of illegality, reference was made to the McDonald Royal Commission of Inquiry which was set up last July I believe and to the attorney general of the province in which the suspected action had been taken with a view to that attorney general deciding under our laws whether a prosecution was warranted or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PERSON RESPONSIBLE FOR SURVEILLANCE OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I assume in carrying out this responsibility, which he has now admitted is his and that of the Solicitor General, when the Prime Minister learns of something that he thinks is improper he makes an inquiry to determine how that wrong act got started. Specifically, since the Prime Minister has gone to such great pains claiming credit for stopping the security surveillance of the Parti Québécois, will he now tell the House of Commons who started that surveillance of the Parti Québécois? Under whose authority was the major policy decision taken to put a legal political party under what the Prime Minister calls systematic surveillance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the order was given by us not to pursue systematic surveillance. That order was given as a result of a discussion in cabinet committee and a report to the cabinet committee by the security service that they were trying to follow the mandate that we had earlier given to them following the October, 1970 crisis. They were trying to find out more about sources of violence within the ranks of the separatists. It came to light at one point, as I said, at the end of 1974 or early 1975 that in order to discharge this perfectly legitimate mandate, and I am sure even the Leader of the Opposition agrees with that, they had systematically begun a surveillance of a democratic party. It was a matter not without importance and consideration. We discussed it in the cabinet committee on security.

After due reflection, we found that this action was improper and asked them not to pursue it. This is indeed what happened. With regard to the extent to which it had been pursued previous to that direction being given and the results that had been obtained, that is the security or otherwise information they had gotten on this particular party, as I told an hon. member opposite yesterday, I did not find it legitimate for me as leader of another political party to ask what they had found out or to give me their files. I said whatever you have, we do not want to see it or hear about it and we do not want you to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1422)

Mr. Clark: We now have a partial answer as to who started it. The partial answer is, "They started it." We want to know who are "they". Who took the decision to start the systematic surveillance of the Parti Québécois and under what direction from the cabinet? Under what general policy did those persons think they were acting when they took that initiative?

Mr. Trudeau: I did give an answer. I will repeat it. They were acting under the mandate they had from this government—

An hon. Member: They?

Mr. Trudeau: The RCMP security service were acting under the mandate they had from this government to try to discover terrorists or investigate suspected acts of subversion. That was the mandate they had under previous governments and which they still have under mine.

We discovered, as the House discovered, only in recent days and weeks, that the security service had entered into an act which might be deemed to be illegal. At that point we turned that matter over to the Attorney General of the province. I repeat, as was indicated in the House by myself and by the Solicitor General several times, that these initiatives were taken by the security service, by the Director-General and by the officers of that service at the highest level.

ACTION BY PRIME MINISTER TO ENSURE SECURITY SERVICE OPERATED WITHIN MANDATE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has said, he has admitted, they were operating under a general mandate from the government. Is he telling the House of Commons that he took no steps to ensure that the general mandate flowing out of the circumstances of 1970 was not being interpreted by the security services in a way which would lead to the surveillance of a legitimate political party? Did he simply sit back passively and not interest himself in the way in which that mandate was being carried out in practice?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I told the House yesterday that we were having periodic meetings with the security service and that they were informing us as to possible sources of subversion they were discovering. They were acquainting us with facts which they thought the cabinet or the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister should know. At one point it became clear that they were interpreting their mandate as the surveillance of a political party. They did it either in discussion or in asking us whether this was all right or in suggesting that this was what they wanted to do. They did not at any point tell us they had secret lists or that they had broken in anywhere to get secret lists.

When we discovered this was the way they were then interpreting the mandate—and, I repeat, we had had a series of briefings over the years—at the first point in the briefings at which it became apparent they were doing a certain thing that we thought objectionable, we asked them to stop.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

INQUIRY WHETHER GUIDELINES FOR SECURITY SERVICE WERE INTERPRETED

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Yesterday, the Prime Minister told the House that following the events in Quebec in 1970 the government modified the mandate of the RCMP or the security forces. He said, and I quote, "I directed the RCMP to pay a little more attention to internal subversion caused by ideological sources in Canada." I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, at the time those directions were given, the meaning of "internal subversion caused by ideological sources in Canada" was interpreted for the security service of the RCMP by the government, whether the directive was in writing and, if these were written directions, whether the Prime Minister would table them in the House.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can easily answer the first part of the question. The House will remember that in October, 1970 we had come to a crisis because of actions of the FLQ. That had arrived after a series of bombings, train derailments, looting of arsenals and so on.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Apprehended insurrection.

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member from Prince Edward Island correctly says, apprehended insurrection.

• (1427)

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is not the way I voted.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member now wants to leave his party, he can always leave his party. It has happened before, Mr. Speaker, and it might happen again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: To get back to the question of the hon. member for Halifax, it is obvious that in that context we are telling the police, as I believe they felt themselves, that the information they had on terrorism in the name of separatism was not sufficient. We gave them in discussion directives to increase and accelerate their surveillance and the nature of their intelligence in that particular area.

The hon. member wants to know if I can table this. This is obviously a direction which was given in cabinet. Whether it was incorporated in the precise record of decision, I do not know. Certainly, we would not table cabinet discussions or decisions in parliament, but let me tell the hon. member that this is what we decided and the wording of any particular RD may be secondary.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would hardly think it would be surprising to the Prime Minister anymore than to me if the RCM Police had some doubts as to what is meant by internal subversion caused by ideological sources. This might well lead to surveillance of a democratic party such as the Parti Québécois. Having clearly said yesterday that the government of the day is certainly responsible for the scope and mandate of the operations of the security force, how can the Prime Minister possibly maintain that he discharged his responsibility as Prime Minister at that time by giving what appears to be a rather vague direction to the security force which could very well have been interpreted by them in a very broad fashion? Unless the Prime Minister is prepared to show the House that the mandate was quite precise at that time, he will have to accept the interpretation which I am putting on this.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would want to read the blues because the hon. member for Halifax said something which I may not have understood correctly. I understood him to say that my concept of internal subversion may well have led to the surveillance of the Parti Québécois. If this is his feeling, then he has the explanation why the police decided to exercise surveillance of the Parti Québécois. They had the same conclusions as the hon. member for Halifax. I have told him that this was not in our mind, and when we discovered that this was being done we, contrary presumably to the hon. member for Halifax, would say that this is not a form of internal subversion, this is a democratic party.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's acceptance yesterday of responsibility for the scope of security operations, how can the Prime Minister evade responsibility for his failure to define precisely the meaning of internal subversion, which not only I but many others would interpret, perhaps in the circumstances, as including the operations of the Parti Québécois? How could he personally say that he discharged his responsibilities by making clear to the police that this does not include the operations of such a democratic party?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, there is a difference of view, here.

Mr. Alexander: Yours is wrong.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Hamilton West says that mine is wrong. He disagrees with me and perhaps he agrees with the hon. member for Halifax, but let him hear my answer and then he will be able to decide what is right and what is wrong after he knows the facts. The hon. member for Halifax presumes it would follow, if one is going to look at internal subversion, that you would conduct a surveillance of a democratic party.

● (1432)

An hon. Member: It could follow.

Mr. Trudeau: In our minds it did not. In my answer earlier I indicated that internal subversion was spelled out in the guidelines mentioned to the House by the Solicitor General on Friday. I have already indicated that it was the kind of subversion which might come from the use of violence or other illegal acts by any person. Obviously, if they were looking at separatists, it would make sense—and perhaps here I would agree with the hon. member for Halifax—that they would look at known separatists. I do not see anything objectionable to this. It is not objectionable that they would look at members of any party, whether it be the Conservative Party or a separatists party, who deserved surveillance for some reason. All I am saying is that it should not be systematic surveillance of the party as such, and I understand the hon. member for Hamilton West disagrees with this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIME MINISTER'S GUIDELINES TO MR. STARNES CONCERNING ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Prime Minister concerning the actions of Mr. John Starnes, a man whom I understand was appointed to his position at the personal recommendation of the Prime Minister. He said in a cable, which was sent to RCMP officials in Montreal some six days after the break-in of L'Agence de Presse Libre du Québec, "In this pre-election situation", he would not recommend this kind of action, and he also said "pre-election times". That would seem to fit in with the Prime Minister's interpretation of the rule of law, fitting in with the sort of spirit of the times attitude. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, with specific reference to Mr. John Starnes and his responsibilities, did he ever indicate that such illicit operations would not be acceptable, or conversely, with regard to Mr. Starnes, did he personally ever make it clear that they would not be tolerated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is referring to a telegram which was tabled before the Keable Commission in Quebec. That telegram related to a specific event. In order to find out how that event had come about, the break-in at APLQ, Mr. Starnes was, with some indignation as the telegram indicates, saying: "What did you do this for? I want to find out more". His words were: "I needed, in order to decide how best to deal with the matter in terms of the Prime Minister and the minister, both of whom have received representations from the APLQ and their associates"—

An hon. Member: You are reading it. Table it.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is contained in these words themselves. Mr. Starnes wanted to know how to deal with this subject because the Solicitor General at the time had been asking how he would answer the telegram sent to him by the members of the APLQ. Mr. Starnes was asking his subordinates for information about it in order that he would be able to direct how to answer it. How that was answered was stated some time ago when I believe the present Solicitor General dealt with those matters last spring.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REPLY TO MR. STARNES' CABLE OF OCTOBER 12

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared in this instance to accept that the Prime Minister did not understand the question as I put it. The question I asked him was: Did the Prime Minister ever convey to Mr. Starnes, after he got the position which he got, that illicit operations of the kind which took place at L'Agence de Presse Libre would be absolutely unacceptable to the government? Did he say or indicate in manner or attitude that it is quite possible the government would accept such illicit operations for some noble purpose?

The question I would like the Prime Minister to answer in relation to that is: considering that he sent the telegram which I referred to in order to get information so that he could brief the Prime Minister, can the Prime Minister tell us if that information he got back, as a result of that cable sent on October 12, is on file; what was done with it; was it ever sent to the Prime Minister's office; did anyone in his office ever see it at that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the first part of the question was: what did we do with it when we heard about illicit acts? This has been repeated in the House and answered many, many times. As soon as we heard that there had been an illicit act in relation to the APLQ, we referred it to the attorney general of the province of Quebec. Later on when it appeared that this was not an isolated incident, we set up a royal commission. That is a very clear answer: as soon as we learned about it, we took action on it. The hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is apparently trying to find out, in a very subtle way, whether we had heard about it before we acted. The answer is no. As soon as we heard about it, we acted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REASON FOR RESIGNATION OF MR. STARNES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I now assume the Prime Minister's hearing is going with his age. The hon. member for Halifax was smiling because he knew that the Prime Minister was asked a rather explicit question twice in a row and refused to answer. We are talking about before the act occurred. Before the act occurred, did the Prime Minister indicate to Mr. John Starnes that illicit, under-cover, illegal operations to obtain information of any kind would not be tolerated? Did he make that very explicit in his mandate? I have a third question—

Mr. Trudeau: Let me answer the first one.

Mr. Broadbent: Since Mr. John Starnes retired prematurely at the age of 54, within two months after the illegal break-in to obtain information on the Parti Québécois, does the government have reasons for the resignation? Can they be produced? Did he resign on his own volition, or was his resignation requested?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe just a couple of years ago the House was making a great event out of the fact that we had several deputy ministers resigning when they were reaching the age of 55.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You look phony today, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: The House knows the reason why that took place. If hon. members want to find out with greater certainty, they can pick up the phone and ask these various deputy ministers who resigned at that time.

An hon. Member: What are you hiding, Pierre?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Is he 65 or 52?

AGRICULTURE

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION TO END IMPORTATION OF MILK PRODUCTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the way things are going in the House these days, one would think that we are more concerned about saving the Parti Québecois than that party is concerned about saving itself. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question on economics to the Minister of Agriculture. Considering that industrial milk producers must spend $120 million a year to help the federal government export its milk powder surplus and keep in storage its butter surplus, considering that the Granby agricultural cooperative imports through one of its subsidiaries, namely, Québec Lait, some powdered buttermilk from New Zealand, could the minister inform the House whether or not he is aware of this and, if so, what he intends to do to remedy this serious problem?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the dairy farmers of Quebec, the industrial milk producers, are no different from the industrial milk producers of any other province. They all make contributions to the export fund to compete in the world market with the surplus product they have in Canada.

I am not sure exactly what the hon. member is talking about; but if he is talking about the skim milk powder from buttermilk, which comes in from New Zealand, that is a long standing arrangement with a fellow Commonwealth country. It is something I do not intend to break at this time. We have had discussions with the dairy farmers about this in the past. There has been a long standing arrangement with that country.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary. The Minister of Agriculture said last year that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had agreed to import $50 million worth of cheese because those types of cheese were not made in Canada, and this mostly to protect the consumer, on which I agree. Since he just said that we have milk powder surpluses and since because of those surpluses the manufacturing milk producers now cannot produce any more, would it not be possible to cancel or go around that agreement with New Zealand on milk powder imports?

● (1442)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member talks about production of skim milk powder. I am sure he knows that skim milk powder is a result of the production of butter. For every pound of butter there are two pounds of skim milk powder produced. There is a world surplus problem. The European Community has compounded this problem. When we are talking about directing milk to cheese factories, that is solely a provincial distribution problem. The provinces are the ones which issue the directives. Sometimes through subsidies and so forth we try to discourage the production of butter and skim milk powder so that people will go into cheese production. We think that is a good idea. Cheese consumption has gone up in Canada. Of all the cheese consumed in Canada 85 per cent is produced in Canada. I am sure the hon. member is aware that there is going to be a specialty cheese plant built in Quebec, if it is not already under construction. We probably will have one in Ontario also to produce specialty cheeses, which have not been produced in Canada before.

POSSIBILITY MR. STARNES RESIGNATION CONNECTED WITH ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES OF FORCE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Now that he has had a chance to refresh his memory by talking with the former solicitor general, I would like to come back to an answer given by the present Solicitor General on Monday. On Monday the Solicitor General indicated that the illegal break-in had been authorized by the most senior level of the security service of the RCMP, that is, the Director-General, Mr. John Starnes, who had been appointed to that office in October of 1969 by the Prime Minister. In as much as Mr. Starnes resigned on March 7, 1973 after the illegal break-ins, arson and theft had occurred, and given the Solicitor General's answer to me that everyone within the security service at that time, including the Director-General of the security service, did not consider its operations to be illegal, was there any aspect of Mr. Starnes' resignation in 1973 that was connected to any aspect of illegality with respect to the security and intelligence service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): None whatsoever, Mr. Speaker.

REASON FOR DELAY IN ASCERTAINING ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES TOOK PLACE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder then if the Prime Minister can indicate why it has taken so long for the government to ascertain that the various events that did occur during that period were illegal. Why has there been to date no responsibility either on the part of himself or the subsequent solicitors general with respect to this act and with respect particularly to the surveillance by the RCMP of the Parti Québécois which he indicated yesterday had occurred for a short period of time and was stopped as soon as it was found out? Can the Prime Minister indicate whether he found out how long the surveillance had taken place and when it was initiated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question, as to why it took so long, and on the second part of the question the answer is the same: because we were not involved in monitoring the day-to-day operations of the RCMP. That was not our practice. It was not the practice of the previous government, and it is not a practice we intend to follow in the future. We had periodic briefings in which the findings they thought important to put before us were reported to us. At no time did they ever say that "in order to make this report we have had to engage in an illegal act", and at no time did we suspect or have cause to suspect that they would have to engage in illegal acts to supply the government with information on security matters.

This matter came to light, I believe, in the spring of 1976 when the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was solicitor general. It came to light that there had been an illegal act perpetrated some three and a half or four years before. I repeat that that was the beginning of a series of events which led up to the setting up by the federal government of a royal commission of inquiry.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister expect us to believe that since that first information became available a year and a half ago with respect to the first of the illegal acts there was no examination of any of the communications that took place or any of the directives which were given with respect either to the appointment of Mr. Starnes in 1969, the appointment of the Bourne Group in 1971 or with respect to any of the acts which subsequently took place? Does the Prime Minister expect us to believe that the government does not yet know whether there is any responsibility lodged with any of the ministry or senior echelons of the government for a misunderstanding to occur which would have encouraged the kind of illegal acts and counter subversion which have in fact been reported in recent days?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member asks if I expect him to believe certain things we have in terms of information from the RCMP. I do not expect the Tories to believe that kind of thing. They have more faith in their own private detectives than in the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LETTER FROM GENERAL DARE MENTIONED IN MINISTER'S AFFIDAVIT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in reply to the Leader of the New Democratic Party the Solicitor General, referring to the affidavit he filed with the Quebec Commission, drew the attention of the House to a mistake in his sworn affidavit dealing with the APLQ break-in. The minister also told the House that the letter in question was from General Dare and in no way referred to the break-in at the APLQ. My question to the minister is what, then, did the letter refer to and why was it filed with the commission in the first place?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I received a subpoena from the commission asking me to file with it a file which had the code name "Bricole", which was the code name for the operation relating to the break-in at the APLQ headquarters on October 6 or 7 of 1972. I believe one of those dates is the correct date.

When I went through the file with the code name "Bricole" there were in that file three pieces of paper. There was one memorandum, and there was a letter from General Dare to the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. They were obviously not in the proper file. They should have been filed in another file because they had absolutely nothing to do with the Bricole file. However, instead of taking those documents out of the Bricole file and having them filed properly, I thought it would be more honest on my part to indicate that there were other documents in that file which had nothing to do with the Bricole operation and to indicate that to the commission and to the House, as I am doing today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUBJECT MATTER OF LETTER FROM GENERAL DARE TO FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, now we are told that another mistake was made in the affidavit which was sworn by the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. McGrath: Since we are dealing here with an obvious attempt to obstruct justice with regard to the commission of illegal acts which were not reported to the authorities for more than five years and since we are obviously concerned here with the culpabilities of ministers in this obstruction of justice and in this cover-up, I will now ask the minister if he is prepared to tell the House what was the subject matter of that letter from General Dare to the former solicitor general, now the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Furthermore, since the minister is prepared to file the letter with the McDonald Commission and since this matter is properly before the House as a result of the minister's statement to the House last week, will he now grant the House the courtesy of producing the letter to the House right now?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): The proposition, of course, is astounding. What the hon. member is saying is that from now on I should table in this House matters relating to current operational files relating to the national security of this country.

As far as this particular document is concerned, I indicated to the House yesterday—and I will reiterate it today—that document is available to the royal commission of inquiry, and I would be willing to forward the whole of the documents for which I have signed an affidavit to the royal commission, which was set up by me and the government in July of this year. I am ready to instruct my counsel to forward all those documents to the royal commission of inquiry at the first opportunity.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE BY SOLICITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. Has the minister satisfied himself, as the minister responsible for law enforcement in this country and for the Criminal Code, that there was not in fact an offence committed under the Criminal Code, namely, obstruction of justice and an attempt to conceal an offence by virtue of the fact that we are dealing here with at least three or four criminal acts which were not reported to the authorities for a period of five years? Has the minister, in his capacity as Attorney General of Canada, satisfied himself that there was not a crime committed in the office of the Solicitor General or in the offices of the government of Canada with regard to obstructing justice?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in co-operation with the Deputy Solicitor General, my officers have reviewed all the files in these matters, and any which they considered relevant to the commission of criminal offences they have recommended be passed to the minister of justice of Quebec.

REASON NO SANCTIONS AGAINST PERSONS RESPONSIBLE FOR RAID ON L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I will try to put a very simple question to the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister is aware, as we all are, of the increased concern of Canadians about that matter. In view of the fact that the search in the offices of the Parti Québécois was done on the eve of the 1973 general election; considering the many questions raised by some people about the time factor; considering also that the Prime Minister very seriously insists that he was not aware of the behaviour of the security services for which—he has just admitted—he is responsible as Prime Minister, will he publicly recognize—I think it is important for the credibility, the irresponsibility of his own government in all that affair—the incredible incompetence of the then Solicitor General—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member wants to ask a question, he should put it now.

Mr. La Salle: If so, why has the right hon. Prime Minister refused until now to take action against those who were responsible in the Solicitor General's office at that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the feigned or assumed indignation of the hon. member for Joliette seems to be based on ignorance, wilful or not, of the facts. When he asks why we did not take specific steps, I say we did as soon as we learned that, in fact, there had been illegal acts. We have repeated that perhaps a hundred times to the House in the last few days. Is it that the hon. member was not in the House? One thing must be remembered, however, and I shall sum up the debate in a few sentences for the benefit of the hon. member. As soon as the government learned that a legitimate and democratic Canadian political party was under systematic surveillance, we asked immediately that a stop be put to it. And as soon as we learned that the surveillance was being conducted by what may have been illegal means, we referred the matter to the department of justice of the province of Quebec leaving it to them to decide whether they should take legal action or not.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER ON L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE BREAK-IN

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Prime Minister goes on repeating the government were not aware of what was going on. I put the question because the Canadian people have reservations about that. Therefore, and since the current Solicitor General is forced to take the blame for his predecessor's incompetence, I put the question to the Prime Minister in the public's interest, because it is important in my view that the Canadian people be reassured. I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he is prepared to make a statement as early as next week, giving the Canadian people the real reasons for that break-in in the context of circumstances then prevailing, or whether he prefers attempting to save the Solicitor General's predecessors?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, once again that answer has been given a number of times, but I will repeat it for the hon. member's benefit. This government's policy is that there should be no intervention in the day-to-day operations of the RCMP as far as security is concerned. That is our policy. We, certain ministers and myself, are briefed on a regular basis on certain security matters involving Canada's security or possible terrorist or subversive action, in a general manner, but we have never felt it our duty—and I think this was also true of the former Prime Minister—Mr. Diefenbaker, to my knowledge no Prime Minister ever asked to intervene in the management of the RCMP's day-to-day operations, because in so doing we, as a government, as politicians, would get information on people investigated by the RCMP. We have no wish to so intervene in police operations, because we feel that civil liberties as we understand them would be harmed if the government of the day asked the police to open all their files to politicians in government.

REASON FOR INVESTIGATION OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I wish to ask another supplementary question.

I understand that the arguments put forth by the right hon. Prime Minister are interesting, that in the context of 1973, I think the Prime Minister must grasp the full scope of this question, in the political climate which existed then. Could the Prime Minister undertake to tell the House, given the type of information he must have been getting from the security service, what were the true reasons which led that service to investigate the membership list of the Parti Québécois? And the Prime Minister knows quite well what I mean, when one just looks at the situation in which the provincial Liberal government of the time found itself.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I already gave those reasons to the hon. member for Halifax a moment ago. I am quite prepared to repeat them for the benefit of the hon. member for Joliette. The hon. member will perhaps remember that before the October crisis of 1970, there had been various acts of violence, subversion, banditry and explosions. There was an assassination and various actions committed in the name of Quebec separatism by an organization calling itself the FLQ.

Mr. La Salle: The FLQ members were not separatists!

● (1452)

Mr. Trudeau: We are now learning from the member for Joliette that the FLQ members were not separatists. Of course I may not be an expert in the FLQ, I may not have the expertise of the hon. member in such matters—

Mr. La Salle: You know it too well.

[English]

REASON FOR FAILURE TO REQUEST MINISTER'S RESIGNATION IN VIEW OF ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES OF FORCE

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the fact that the fundamental foundation of our parliamentary system is Cabinet responsibility—probably there is no more heinous crime against the state than illegal activity on the part of a state police force—why did the Prime Minister not ask for the resignation from the ministry of the responsible Cabinet minister at the time the illegal acts were brought to their attention?

An hon. Member: A friend of the Prime Minister's, that is why.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to seek his answer in the Report of the Royal Commission on Security published in June 1969, a commission on security chaired by a very able and well-known former civil servant, by a present Justice of the Supreme Court and by a former leader of the New Democratic Party.

An hon. Member: Which you ignored.

Mr. Trudeau: This Royal Commission on Security stated at page 21 of the report:

A security service will inevitably be involved in actions that may contravene the spirit if not the letter of the law and with clandestine and other activities which may sometimes seem to infringe on individuals' rights;

Mr. Speaker, this is from a group of outside experts who realize, apparently more than the opposition of both parties wish to realize, that matters of subversion call for a very, very fine line to be drawn between respect for civil liberties on one side and the protection of the security of the state on the other.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Surely the right hon. Prime Minister will recognize in this, probably the most important problem to face this country in many, many years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillies: —that the responsibility that was being drawn in that report to the Cabinet and Prime Minister of this country was to always be certain that there was a difference between subversion and other activities that might not be agreeable to the government or that the government might agree were not appropriate and it is the responsibility of the government to make sure that this line is never transgressed. Surely, the Prime Minister must know that nothing is so threatening to the survival of democracy and in any situation or any country where democracy has fallen, it has fallen when this line has been transgressed. A government has to be responsible for making sure it is never transgressed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1502)

Mr. Trudeau: I agree completely with the hon. member in the preamble to his question. Not only do I agree with him in theory but I can point out that in fact we made sure that this very fine line between subversion and dissent was not crossed by the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You did not.

Mr. Trudeau: How did we make sure that this line was not crossed?

An hon. Member: According to Pierre.

[Mr. Gillies.]

Mr. Clark: You authorized the activities which led to the surveillance of the PQ.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition, without seeking the floor, is stating something which is absolutely, unequivocally, false, and I wish he would have the courage to stand up and say it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we made sure this fine line was not crossed.

An hon. Member: You did not.

An hon. Member: That is precisely the point—you never have.

An hon. Member: You did not do anything.

An hon. Member: You better see what your Solicitor General said last Friday.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Is this democracy? You don't let a man speak.

Mr. Trudeau: We have a fine example of respect for civil liberties from this howling mob sitting across the aisles.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They do not have to take my answers as the absolute truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They can stand in their places and challenge them, if they have the courage, but I would suggest that the way to do it is not by hiring private detectives, as that party does, and not by having some phony bugs planted in their office, which is the way they do it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Fraud.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You blew it this time, baby.

An hon. Member: Why don't you lay a charge?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Stand up and say it.

Mr. McGrath: Stand up and make a charge.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Greenwood.

ALLEGED DISMISSAL OF MEMBER OF SECURITY UNIT FOR REFUSING TO DESTROY PROPERTY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to thank you because we have heard a whole series of speeches under the guise of questions and even lengthier answers, and this is not the way, in my humble opinion, to conduct the question period.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, would he please put it.

An hon. Member: He will, like the Tories.

Mr. Brewin: My question is fairly brief and it is addressed to the Solicitor General. Has the Solicitor General inquired into the evidence given to the Keable inquiry in Montreal to the effect that members of an anti-terrorist squad, unit or group, or whatever you call it, attached, I presume, to the security forces, were ordered to smash a summer cottage owned by someone suspected—I emphasize the word suspected—of being a terrorist, and that a member of the unit was dismissed for refusing to carry out this order. I would like to ask the minister, if he has looked into that case and knows about the fact, what he intends to do about this grave injustice.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): If the hon. member is referring to some of the evidence that came out in Montreal, I believe it was yesterday, I have inquired into the matter and I have seen the response from the RCMP which is to the effect that the member of the force who left that unit was transferred to Paris in 1972 at his own request.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—ANSWER BY PRIME MINISTER ON "BUGGING" OF MEMBERS' OFFICES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning a matter which I believe affects the privileges of all members of the House. I should say, sir, that I take the first available opportunity to raise this matter, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova, on Monday and as the traditions of the House of Commons, as the hon. member for Spadina will know, require.

I should say that the question of privilege I will raise relates, or may well relate, to the charge or allegation that has just been made by the Prime Minister of Canada that electronic devices were planted by members of this party in offices of members of this party. That is a clear allegation that the Prime Minister has just made, and if he is a man of honour I am sure he will either stand in his place when I finish my remarks and cite the evidence which supports that allegation, or else he will stand up and withdraw it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Allmand: Let us hear the evidence for all the nonsense you have been spreading around.

An hon. Member: Why don't you listen?

Mr. Clark: If the former solicitor general wants to speak, we will be delighted to hear him.

An hon. Member: Rise.

Mr. Clark: He had an opportunity all Monday night during the long debate, and he sat there silent.

An hon. Member: You are a fraud, Allmand.

Mr. Clark: Immediately following the revelations of the hon. member for Central Nova on Monday of this week, officials of my office authorized an examination of the offices of the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. We received this morning a report of the professional firm undertaking that examination. They report the discovery of a device within a telephone in the conference room of the Leader of the Opposition. The firm advises that—

The conference room telephone was capable of being used as an eavesdropping device and, in fact, still was capable of being an eavesdropping device until 8.10 p.m. on Monday, October 31, 1977.

That is the time the device was dismantled. As Your Honour knows, I submitted that full report today to you, as the responsible officer for the security of these buildings, for any further action that Your Honour might deem necessary or appropriate, which action may well include the reference of the whole matter to the appropriate committee of the House. Of course, in awaiting Your Honour's decision in this regard and your review of this matter, I would like to reserve my rights under privilege in the House.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege, or on a different one with respect to myself, whichever you prefer. First, I want to say that I think the motion by my friend, the hon. member for Spadina, was entirely legitimate. I thank him for it and, although it might have been more carefully drawn up, I trust that it will assist the House in getting to the bottom of the affair.

I want to say to the Prime Minister that I can understand his consternation. I have noted from time to time, in reading Hansard, that he has expressed, usually in the form of heckling, great reservations about private detectives, which I deplore because I think private detectives, like everyone else including politicians, include some good ones and some bad ones, so I do not know why he is so paranoiac about them. In any event, I simply want to say, for the record, that I have no idea, under what circumstances or anything else concerning this listening device, where it came from. Certainly, I had no knowledge of it, nor anyone connected with me, that I know of.

I want to say, as well, that I trust that the Prime Minister, if he is really serious in his allegation that I had anything to do with it, will be honest enough to say so and make a charge, as he so often calls upon us to do when we are trying to elicit information.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a few words with regard to the question of privilege in the earlier motion that was passed, calling upon the House to use its full authority to investigate the matter and, I hope, the matter which Your Honour will investigate, raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and any other matters regarding bugging in this chamber and in the parliamentary precincts which might come to your attention, as requested by the Acting Prime Minister the other day, because I wish to put on the record very clearly, in case anyone is in doubt, that it is an immensely serious offence under the Criminal Code for people who are not authorized to have in their possession electronic surveillance devices, amounting to an indictable offence with a penalty of up to two years.

● (1512)

I hope, Mr. Speaker, in order to assist you and your officers in that investigation, that those finding or suspecting bugs will call upon Your Honour and leave them in place until such time as a proper investigation, with fingerprinting and otherwise, can be conducted so that any investigation you and your officers undertake will in no way be compromised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition, and on the particular comments of the hon. member for Central Nova who said that he was absolutely not involved in the placing of any bugging device in his office, of course I accept unequivocally his word on that. I have not, of course said that he had been involved. I said the inference might be that members of the other party, no one particular person, but the party itself—

Some hon. Members: Cheap.

Mr. Basford: No cheaper than saying the RCMP did it.

Mr. Trudeau: —the members of the other party, the Tory party, because they did resort to the hiring of private detectives, not only in this instance but in others, gives me some cause for suspicion. I would add that I have no evidence, any more than the hon. member for Central Nova had any evidence when he suspected this was done by the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition has raised, by way of a question of privilege, the discovery of a device which he has described as that which would lend to a telephone in his office the capability of being used as a listening apparatus. Contributions have been made by the hon. member for Central Nova, the Attorney General, and the Prime Minister.

The responsibility for the security of these premises, the offices of members and the buildings, and the privileges that we enjoy here is my own responsibility. Of course, several times in the past we have had occasion to re-examine our concept of security of the buildings and our approach to security. It has to be balanced, on the one hand, with the interest of the safety and privacy of members who occupy these buildings and attempt to do the very important work they have been assigned by their constituents. On the other hand is the desire to have free access to these buildings by the citizens of Canada and, of course, by the very many visitors we invite here. That balance is a delicate one indeed, one which we constantly try to adjust in order to achieve the maximum of both objectives.

The responsibility in this particular instance, the event raised and referred to by the hon. member for Central Nova on Monday, is mine. It was subsequently referred to by the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, in the hope that I would pursue that investigation.

The House should know that in pursuance of that obligation we asked for a preliminary investigation by my own security staff, the security staff of the House of Commons. That report arrived on my desk late yesterday. I turned it over to the hon. member for Central Nova as a preliminary analysis of the circumstances. I indicated that if we were to carry the matter further, to attempt to trace not only the circumstances of the finding or the location of this device but go beyond that to locate the source of it or to fix responsibility, that would be an investigative chore which is beyond the designed capability of the security staff of this House, and therefore I would await further advice from the hon. member.

Similarly, with respect to the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, we have been carrying out sweeps or electronic examinations of other offices and have as yet made no discovery in any other office. We indicated we would carry out this examination of all offices requested by hon. members. It will probably take another two or three days to do that. We will likely want to assess that part of the investigation before going any further. However, with respect to the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition, we will certainly carry forward today a further examination of the nature of the device and see whether there is anything else we should do.

In the final analysis, we will come to a point that tests the limit of our capabilities, and surely it should be as an investigative job for our responsibility is really confined to these buildings. If we are going to go beyond that, we will have to call in the assistance of other security forces, and I think properly we ought to do that only at the request of members involved in a very direct way. This is simply by way of a preliminary or interim report on the progress of the investigations we are carrying out at this time.

Mr. Basford: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The Attorney General on a fresh question of privilege.

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker, it is relative to the question of privilege we have been dealing with. I in no way want to reflect upon Your Honour's remarks. The purpose of my intervention was to make it very clear that if there are private persons and unauthorized persons operating within the precincts of parliament and placing bugs, that is a criminal offence. It is not up to any particular member to complain about it, it is an offence under the Criminal Code, which involves far more than the individual member of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: It clearly involves the privileges of all members of parliament. It clearly involves breaches of the criminal law away beyond the right of any particular member of parliament. I urge upon Your Honour that time is of the essence in these matters, that they do involve breaches of the law, and that it is in the interests of members of parliament and of this institution that we be protected against those violations of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: With respect, I do not think we need further elaboration on this point. In the case of both members whose offices or equipment have been involved, I suppose we could project ahead to the point where they might say, "There has been some allegation that we have brought to your attention as Speaker, but we do not want it pursued any further."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I do not know if that is about to happen. I only know we are ahead of ourselves. If that were to happen, I am simply projecting that the rest of the House, or the administration of justice, may have some rights in the matter. At the moment, I think it is only courtesy to the members involved to conduct a preliminary investigation and say to them that further investigation should probably go forward with their request, assistance and co-operation. If that were not to take place, I would advise the House; but surely we must come to that point first.

MR. BEAUDOIN—REMARKS IN NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege over a very important matter concerning an article published in the newspaper Le Devoir on October 29.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that reporter Pierre O'Neil has harmed my reputation. He has told lies about me in an article entitled:

From One Caucus to Another without Scruples

I would like to quote Mr. O'Neil:

Mr. Beaudoin attended the regional caucus of Liberal members of Parliament convened by Urban Affairs Minister André Ouellet to study the housing problem in the Montreal area.

Mr. Speaker, the reporter should have listened, read or learned about the matter before writing such things. This meeting was held in Montreal on Monday, October 24, and was aimed at informing all members from the Montreal area and the Eastern Townships about the new Urban Affairs programs. The mayors of all municipalities involved were invited and—

● (1522)

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is nearly impossible to hear the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. Beaudoin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The mayors of all the municipalities concerned were invited, and as far as I know they are not all Liberals. I am a federal member of parliament and when the time comes to work for my constituents, whenever possible I attend all meetings which could improve the lot of the people of my riding. Since most members from the province of Quebec are Liberals I am sure we are working together on these specific projects. That does not change in any way my personal political affiliation, that is my being a member of the Social Credit Party of Canada. Reporters who make up stories to destroy the reputation of federal members of parliament should be reproved by all federal members, whatever their party. To please certain reporters and prove them right we are soon all going to have to sit in separate places. I think that during an election we should fight for our own ideologies and principles and outside election campaigns we should all, without exception and whatever our allegiance, work together for the better-being of our ridings, provinces and country.

I think the newspaper Le Devoir should correct that falsehood about me, and I urge all media to get informed before they publish stupid stories like that. We are always available to answer their questions and they could then write articles based on facts, not wishes or dreams.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) raised a question of privilege relating to the newspaper Le Devoir and one of its employees, Mr. Pierre O'Neil. It does not relate to a member of parliament or things relating to this House. So this does not constitute a question of privilege as such but rather a very important and significant grievance.

MR. BALDWIN—REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which relates to what was said by the Prime Minister a little while ago, and by the Minister of Justice. Before the Prime Minister left—as he said, to meet the press—the leader of our party gave him formal notice that I intended to raise this question, as did the House leader.

The Prime Minister, making an intervention following what was said by my hon. friend from Central Nova, made it clear that in his mind the device might well have been planted by members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. The Minister of Justice, in his contribution, went on to aggravate the situation by suggesting—and I think he is right in his interpretation of the law—that anyone engaged in such conduct is in breach of the criminal law of this country. As matters now stand, every member of the opposition is now suspected of having committed an offence against the Criminal Code in the planting of this device.

If this were simply said in the heat of debate, we understand what happens in this House, and if the Prime Minister wants to come back and withdraw that charge, that is fine. But it is a charge of such considerable consequence that I would be inclined, if Your Honour decides there is a prima facie case, to make a motion referring it to a committee. The Prime Minister is not here now, and he may want to deal with it. We shall not be sitting tonight. Your Honour may wish to take it under advisement. But I cannot leave it as it stands without making it quite plain that I do not intend to sit here quietly and be charged by the right hon. gentleman with the commission of a criminal offence, unless he is prepared to make a formal charge. If not, he must be prepared to withdraw.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this question of privilege, because our privileges are affected every day in the House. In the last four days we have been repeatedly charged with cover-up, meddling and using the police for political purposes. This was the daily bread of members on the other side of the House. They have made all sorts of accusations against us and against other people who are serving the country.

The Prime Minister said that this bugging of the office of one of the MPs looks phony. There are a lot of people who think like that; I think like that, too, Mr. Speaker. If, as members of the government, we were to get up every time a member of the opposition imputes motives and bad actions to members of the administration, we would have no time to spend on other matters but would be occupied all the time with questions of privilege. If hon. members over there cannot stand the heat, they should not be in the House of Commons.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): One brief intervention. The Minister of Finance has done his best to evade the issue. The issue is that the Prime Minister has today charged members of this party with an illegal act.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Clark: If the Prime Minister believes that, let him come to the House of Commons and either submit his evidence, or withdraw. Let him not make such a charge and then run away to a press conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of bringing a little reason into this, I just want to go on record as saying that I fully agree with the interpretation which the chief law enforcement officer of Canada has given us in the House this afternoon. As far as I am concerned, this situation does, after Your Honour has dealt with it fully according to your own dispositions and feelings as the man most qualified to protect the rights of all of us, go beyond the rights and privileges of members of parliament. It is a serious act, as the Minister of Justice has said, and I want it on the record that I agree with the way he has put it forward up to this point.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, since the hon. member for Peace River has invited you to examine the record and think about this, may I express the hope that you will do, at the same time, what was implicit in the suggestion of the Minister of Finance, that is, look back over the blues of perhaps the last several weeks and determine the number of occasions on which the official opposition, particularly,—the Conservative party—has, without any evidence at all, impugned people on this side of the House, impugned people outside the House and impugned the RCMP, totally on the basis of hearsay, and sometimes not even on that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it has long been a tradition of this House—I know the Minister of Transport is ever aware of it and alert, on a daily basis, as is the Minister of Finance—that when members feel their honour has been impugned, or that a false accusation has been made, they rise then and there—

An hon. Member: Or they sue.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Or they sue, as the Minister of Transport has done, or they say, "Put your seat on the line". We haven't heard that for the last week or so in the House of Commons, so it seems to me we are coming awfully close to the truth.

The one thing that does worry me, however, about this whole thing is the irresponsible way in which the government has dallied and bandied with the good name of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): There are a lot of officers in Canada who walk the streets and do police work.

Mr. Blais: And you are destroying them.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The government has failed to distinguish between the very small number in the security and intelligence group and the balance of the RCMP. I would think that, as a former dean of law and as a former minister of justice—

Mr. Gillies: Make a charge. Put your seat on the line. Stand up.

• (1532)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On application of the Leader of the Opposition, supported by the leader of the New Democratic Party, the House set itself into session, pursuant to Standing Order 26, at eight o'clock on Monday night of this week to debate the allegations against the RCMP as a general subject. That was ordered, and it gave the House the opportunity to have a full exposé of all points of view on both sides of the House with respect to that matter. This is not the time to rehash that or to carry the debate further forward.

The question before the House is a narrow question of privilege which was raised by the hon. member for Peace River and relates to the remarks today of the Prime Minister. I will examine those remarks in their full context; firstly, the remarks made during the question period, and secondly the subsequent remarks made by the Prime Minister in response to a later question as to whether or not the Prime Minister had any evidence in support of the allegation, or whatever, which he made during the question period. I will then see whether or not he has transgressed any of the privileges or practices of the House, and I will deal with the matter when the House resumes on Monday.

[Translation]

MR. OUELLET—ALLEGATIONS MADE BY MR. LAWRENCE

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I must tell you that I take the first opportunity to raise this matter. It relates to some comments which have been made on two occasions earlier this week by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). I tried to contact the office of the hon. member to let him know that I would raise this matter but he had already left.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely hon. members in the centre of the House realize that it is impossible for the Chair to hear the question of privilege raised by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs unless there is quiet in the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that you asked opposition members to keep quiet, because they seem to believe that only what they have to say is important and they refuse to listen to answers the government is prepared to give them. I quote the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham:

> The Minister of State for Urban Affairs in the House late last spring indicated that as the chief political organizer for the Liberal party in Quebec he had in his possession a list of all known separatist sympathizers in the province of Quebec.

Now, this remark made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, as recorded on page 515 of Hansard, is totally unjustified. I have checked into the index of the House of Commons debates for the period from October 12, 1976 to August 9, 1977. I scrutinized all the official reports of the debates to check if it slipped my memory and if I really made that remark, but nowhere in the index in the House of Commons debates is there a reference to the remarks attributed to me by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). I find this allegation completely unacceptable and incorrect and I hope the hon. member will withdraw his inappropriate comments when he returns to the House.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this matter affects me particularly in my privileges as a member of this House. This is again an attempt at sending trial balloons and reflects the allegations made these last few days by members opposite who have become past masters at brewing storms in tea cups. Mr. Speaker, they remind me of a colony of termites ferociously attacking the rotten beam of a bridge while workers are busy installing a new one. I find their remarks bewildering, be they the incorrect allegations of the hon. member from Northumberland-Durham or the false allegations which were made in this House concerning the brazen and faulty speculation of the members of the opposition who are trying to make people believe that they are the victims of electronic surveillance when there is no evidence of it. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all these matters will be cleared up.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton rising on the question of privilege?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege raised by the hon. Minister of "Balloons"—I mean, Urban Affairs.

Mr. Chrétien: You look like a big one yourself.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am very happy to learn that the minister has searched the record of the House of Commons. I seem to recall a statement which was recorded in the press in which I thought he had said, in the city of Montreal, relative to Radio-Canada, that he had a list of separatists.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, it was in the press.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My hon. friend from Newfoundland confirms that it was, indeed, reported, so probably the minister would not find it in the record of the House of Commons. However, he might find it if he checks his press clippings in the parliamentary library or some other place. It had reference to Radio-Canada; my memory has now been refreshed.

In any event, I am sorry that the minister has decided that the ordinary and reasonable use of the question period by the opposition to probe the abominations of this government is an inconvenience to him. I just want to assure him that we intend to use the legitimate and ordinary rules of this House on every occasion, whether the responsibility is that of the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General, or even the Minister of State for Urban Affairs—who is known in other places as the "corporal from Quebec"—so we can deal with things which we think are wrong with this government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): So far as the question of privilege is concerned—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister has raised a rather narrow question of privilege which relates to some allegations made earlier by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. If there is to be further elaboration, perhaps it ought to be done by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham who is directly involved. For the moment, the matter should stand over. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Clark: Sit down, Ouellet.

Mr. Ouellet: The opposition is afraid to listen to the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has the floor.

Mr. Ouellet: You are talking about bugging by the RCMP.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You wouldn't know a bug if you fell over it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I am not able to hear the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I will have no choice but to adjourn the House.

MR. BROADBENT—ANSWERS GIVEN BY PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a different question of privilege concerning the answers given by the Prime Minister earlier in the question period. If I heard accurately—and I have checked with others—and if the Prime Minister did not make a slip of the tongue, we have a potentially serious contradiction of certain information which has been given to the House.

Mr. Gillies: What's new?

Mr. Broadbent: I was asking the Prime Minister about the request for information sent to Montreal by the then director general of security services, Mr. John Starnes, at the time of the break-in at L'Agence de Presse Libre, and the Prime Minister said—these are the words I recall—"Well, that request came in response to inquiries that had been made in the minister's office and in my office for a response to the break-in".

Now, if the Prime Minister said that—and I recall that he said that, and others beside me do—then that is new. In previous discussions we have had on this matter, very serious discussions indeed, late last spring, as Your Honour recalls we were informed that a request for information went to the then solicitor general, to the Montreal police and to the Quebec police.

● (1542)

Up to this point, if I recall correctly, it was assumed that the Prime Minister's office heard nothing about this break-in for many months; indeed, many years. I hope the Prime Minister will clear the record on this. Did he say that his office had been informed and was aware of the break-in shortly after it occurred? Did his office make a request of Mr. John Starnes to produce some kind of a written report on the break-in? If that is so, certainly it contradicts what I understood was the Prime Minister's previously stated position on this matter.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby raises a question of privilege which I presume will be contributed to by the Prime Minister at the first opportunity.

MR. POULIN—REMARKS OF PRIME MINISTER AND MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I know it has been a trying day for you and I do not intend to cause any more aggravation to you. I will try to be of some assistance on one of the matters referred to in the questions of privilege raised today.

The Leader of the Opposition has advised us of a second very serious criminal offence alleged to have been committed in the House of Commons. On Monday, the hon. member for Central Nova advised us of a very serious criminal offence which was committed here. I am referring to the bugging or the planting of listening devices in the offices of these two members. As the Minister of Justice stated, this involves far more than just the rights and privileges of the members of the House of Commons. It is a very serious allegation of a criminal offence having been committed. In the event that the culprit is found—and I hope he or she is—the style of cause would read: "Regina versus" whoever the accused person is. It would be the state against the individual.

The motion brought on earlier today by the hon. member for Spadina indicated that we all want to get to the bottom of this matter. It is my grave concern that this alleged criminal offence should not be dealt with any differently than any other criminal offence. For example, if there had been an assault in the office of an hon. minister or an hon. member which resulted in a homicide, none of us would be saying that we should wait until members decided whether it should be proceeded with; with dispatch, law enforcement officers would be asked to come in and conduct an investigation.

From Monday until now the trail has got cold. Perhaps some fingerprints have been lost and this type of thing. Because of the serious allegation made today by the Leader of the Opposition of another criminal offence, it is my suggestion that without further delay the Ottawa city police be called in to assist in this investigation, to ensure that all the evidence is uncovered in a most expeditious and professional way in relation to both these cases. It may well be that the Ottawa city police would request the assistance of the Ontario provincial police and its criminal investigation division and crime labs. Also, it may well be that they would request the most excellent assistance and advice of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Most of your constituents do not have converters.

Mr. Poulin: These alleged criminal offences should be investigated by professionals in a most thorough way, and as soon as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I thought the hon. member for the Central Nova made it quite clear that we would have no objection to this, but in the event he did not, I want Your Honour to know that we would have no objection to the Chair carrying out its function in any way it can. I concur completely with the point of view expressed by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Chrétien: Call in the police.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): However, the House has bound itself by the motion under Standing Order 43 which was moved by the hon. member for Spadina. It may well be that we will have to have some consultation with respect to what we do, because of the fact that our hands are tied.

An hon. Member: Cover-up.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): If we can be of assistance to the Minister of Justice or to Your Honour with respect to the difficult position in which these revelations have placed this chamber. I assure Your Honour of the co-operation of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, this question affects my privileges as a member of this House, as it does the privileges of all members who adopted unanimously the motion made earlier today, which Your Honour will have a chance to look at more carefully later on. In view of Your Honour's comments on the limitations of the House to investigate these matters, I should like to bring to your attention at this time that the House has unanimously adopted three specific recommendations. I do not see any limitations put on those specific proposals which were adopted unanimously by all members of the House of Commons. Therefore, I should like to bring to Your Honour's attention, as mover of a motion adopted by all members of the House, that there are three very specific elements which in my view must be looked into very, very thoroughly.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Are you the chairman of the Liberal caucus?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am aware of the motion passed by the House earlier this day, and I am aware of the concern of all members for a proper investigation of the events raised first on Monday by the hon. member for Central Nova and today by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

These events ought to be pursued very vigorously. However, the matter of an investigation by any outside police force of any of these premises, and especially of the private premises of members' offices, has always been one of very clear privilege. The entry into these premises, particularly into the offices of members, without permission and without consent would be regarded, on a very fundamental basis, as a breach of the privileges of any member of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, to suggest now that I ought to take upon myself unilaterally the authority to invite other police forces in here is really an extension, it seems to me, of a privilege which has long been respected by this House.

I think we have to keep these two events separate. In the first place, we have an order by the House today which, surely, can relate to the events described by the hon. member for Central Nova but can hardly relate to the events disclosed only this afternoon by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Both are of equal importance and both deserve equal vigor in investigation. I have no hesitation in saying that I will receive the undivided co-operation of both members in respect to the carrying out of the investigation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: To repeat what I said earlier, if I did not, perhaps I would feel obligated to report that matter to the House, because the privileges of all members are affected. If I were to find that I could not go forward with the investigation, indeed I would report that to the House. However, the indications at this point are that that will not be the difficulty.

I have reported the preliminary findings to the hon. member for Central Nova and I have indicated to him that we are prepared to go forward with assistance from outside forces if that is what he wants. I will indicate the same thing as soon as we have had a chance to check in a preliminary way the matters raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. If I have any hesitation about the response and co-operation of any of the members involved, and if I think it involves the privileges of members, I will report that to the House before taking any further action.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a procedural point of order. I hesitate to bring it up at this time; however, I think Your Honour should consider it. My point of order stems from a new revelation made in the House today by the Prime Minister. It was referred to by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby during the course of his question of privilege. I refer to the quotation which the Prime Minister made from a document which he has in his possession today, from Mr. John Starnes.

• (1552)

On the face of it, it seems to shed new light on a question which has been seizing the attention of the House for the last number of days. According to our rules, once it has been quoted from it should be laid on the table of the House. In support of my argument I draw the attention of the Chair to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 159 (2) which states:

Point of Order—Mr. McGrath

A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevent counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence. The principle is so reasonable that it has not been contested; and when the objection has been made in time, it has been generally acquiesced in.

That document may very well shed new light on the matter which is before the House which has seized the attention of the House and was officially brought to the attention of the House by the Solicitor General on Friday last.

At the same time, Your Honour, I would refer you to references which have been made, in answers to questions in the House by the Solicitor General, to a letter which appears in the affidavit referred to in the question period today and yesterday. The affidavit was filed with the Quebec commission of inquiry. The affidavit refers to a letter between the then director general of the security services and the Solicitor General. Numerous references have been made, as Your Honour will learn upon examination of the record, to that letter.

The letter has been the subject of questions, and I submit that it clearly falls within the interpretation placed upon these matters by Beauchesne and by our Standing Orders. I respectfully submit that the Solicitor General, who has already agreed to lay this letter before the federal commission of inquiry, the McDonald commission, should be obliged under the rules, traditions and practices of the House to lay the letter on the table of the House.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think it is obvious that the Prime Minister, to whom reference was made, would have to be here for there to be a final disposition of this question. However, I would just like to say at this time that it did not seem to me that he was indicating specifically that he was quoting from a document.

An hon. Member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Lang: Hon. members, as I have, probably read the words referred to this morning in a newspaper, and perhaps that is the document which was being quoted from.

Mr. Speaker: As I have always attempted to do in the past, I think I should follow the practice of inviting representatives of the government, as I will, to examine the transcript of today's proceedings in order to see what the Prime Minister in fact said, and then to pursue arguments as to whether that technically constitutes the citation of a document.

The conditions which require a document to be produced are quite clear and capable of very precise definition, and if those conditions exist, I am sure they will be immediately recognizable. Therefore, I invite hon. members on both sides who are interested in this argument to examine today's transcript and to renew the argument on Monday, as I will, to see whether the circumstances are such as to warrant production of the document pursuant to our practices.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, you could check the video-tape also.

[Mr. McGrath.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I must say that the hon. member for Edmonton Centre is fairly close to the mark, now that we also have an electronic Hansard. However, that is not the reason I rose.

I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council whether he can advise us of the business of the House for the balance of today, and what the intentions of the government are with respect to Monday and next week as far as he can see.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, during the time we have left this afternoon we shall continue consideration on third reading of Bill C-3 concerning the reorganization of Air Canada. If we conclude the third reading today we shall continue with Bill C-8 entitled an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code. Monday morning we should proceed with consideration of Bill C-5 entitled an Act amending the Canada Elections Act and Monday night with Bill C-11 of the Minister of Finance amending the fiscal legislation. Mr. Speaker, as concerns our business for the following days and the rest of the week it will depend on the duration of the debate on Bill C-11. We should be able to inform the House leaders of the opposition on this subject next Monday.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

TABLING OF REPORT "PEOPLE IN ACTION"

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 41(2), I should like to table in the House copies, in both official languages, of "People in Action", a very important report of the National Advisory Council on voluntary action, to the Government of Canada.

ANTI-INFLATION BOARD

TABLING OF REPORTS MADE TO ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 17(2) of the Anti-Inflation Act, I wish to table, in both official languages, copies of reports sent to the administrator by the Anti-Inflation Board.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 149, 195, 205 and 295.

[Text]

VENDING MACHINE FRANCHISES

Question No. 149—Mr. MacKay:

1. Does the Department of Supply and Services award vending machine franchises in government owned buildings and, if so, what procedures are followed?

2. Have any companies been awarded contracts in (a) Halifax (b) Moncton (c) Montreal (d) Quebec City (e) Toronto (f) St. Catharines (g) Hamilton (h) Sault Ste. Marie (i) Winnipeg (j) Regina (k) Calgary (l) Edmonton (m) Vancouver and, if so, what is the name of the company and the details of the contract?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. No.

2. Not applicable.

PERSONS UNDER CONTRACT TO CPDL

Question No. 195—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to Canadian Patents and Development and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as Canadian Patents and Development Limited is concerned: 1.

PERSONNEL UNDER CONTRACT TO OFFICE OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Question No. 205—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. One—not retired public servant.

2. (a) $4,150; (b) $12,000. None of the persons involved were retired public servants.

NOTE: The answers to 1 and 2 (b) relate to the Commissioner required to be appointed by the Chief Electoral Officer pursuant to the provisions of subsection 70(4.1) of the Canada Elections Act.

OFFICE OF CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER—PERSONNEL OBTAINED FROM PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Question No. 295—Mr. McKenzie:

1. Has the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer obtained (a) part-time (b) full-time employees from private employment agencies in (i) British Columbia (ii) Alberta (iii) Saskatchewan (iv) Manitoba (v) Ontario (vi) Quebec (vii) New Brunswick (viii) Nova Scotia (ix) Prince Edward Island (x) Newfoundland and, if so, in each case, how many?

2. Are such employees paid from supplementary estimates and, if not, from what estimates are they paid?

3. By province, what was the (a) average hourly rate paid to employment agencies (b) average hourly rate paid to employees (c) total amount paid by the Office of the Chief Electoral Officer in (i) 1975 (ii) 1976?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) (i) Nil; (ii) Nil; (iii) Nil; (iv) Nil; (v) 2—1975; 9—1976; (vi) 2—1976; (vii) Nil; (viii) Nil; (ix) Nil; (x) Nil. (b) N/A.

Mr. Paproski: There is no translation.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, all I am saying is that the hon. member is now in possession of those answers. Usually we give the list of questions to be answered in advance. It was inadvertent that today this came late. We are sorry for that. I assure the hon. member that in future we will have the list in advance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are an honourable man.

Mr. Pinard: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I do not think you will find my comments as provocative as those we have already heard this afternoon. But that is not to say they are without some importance, especially for the people I have the honour to represent in this chamber. I want to assure the House that it is not my intention to delay unnecessarily the progress of Bill C-3, but I intend to make a short intervention.

I think it is necessary to support and emphasize the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) last night when he began the debate on third reading of the Air Canada bill by speaking of the very real need to improve the services at the Edmonton international airport as a way of carrying out the services this bill is intended to provide. After all, if we are to be concerned about improved management of Air Canada and improved service in the air, it makes little sense to be concerned about those things without, at the same time, being concerned about improving service for travellers when they are on the ground and, particularly in Edmonton, to be concerned about breaking the log jams which occur there.

I recognize that the reorganization of Air Canada will be of major importance to the travelling public in our country. As one who has, as I am sure have so many of my colleagues in this House, flown half a million miles in my parliamentary career, I think it necessary to emphasize that without the improvement of ground services relative to the increasing speed with which air passengers are transported, the air transportation policy, particularly as it affects western Canada, makes little sense.

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, it is not only the present I am concerned about, but the future as well. It is clear that the west is emerging as the pre-eminent economic force in the life of Canada. We see the balance of economic power shifting westward. It is the west, and particularly northern Alberta because of its position as the gateway to the north, that will provide the cutting edge to a strong and stable economic future for Canada. As Mr. Justice Hall recently noted:

It would not be too much to say that the Alberta gateway to the north provides a setting for the national dream in a contemporary context.

If this is true of rail service, which Mr. Justice Hall has been studying so deeply, how much more true it is of air service, in the new era we have entered. The cut in the allocations by Treasury Board for certain alterations and expansions will have profound implications for air travellers, particularly those using the international terminal in Edmonton. These things are of great concern, not only to myself and members from the Edmonton area but to members representing constituents who in increasing numbers use the airport serving northern Alberta. As a matter of fact, we are assured by no less an authority than the general manager of the Edmonton area air service commission, Mr. Allan Bleiken, that 1.2 million passengers per year now use the Edmonton airport and that very shortly the number will be in excess of 2 million.

The cut from $28 million to $5.6 million will mean that the minimum required improvements to the Edmonton airport will take place, since the $5.6 million has been applied to secondary improvements such as parking and baggage facilities. While these are important by themselves, they do not address themselves to the central question in that airport, which has to do with needed structural changes to enlarge the gateways and, secondly, the necessity for preclearance for passengers travelling to the United States. In a letter written to me recently, Mr. Bleiken writes:

The decision by the Treasury Board will result in serious air service problems for the citizens of Edmonton and for visitors to our city.

The way in which the cutback has been announced, following repeated assurances that Edmonton would be in line for increased facilities precisely because of the growth of passenger traffic in the area, was peremptory and ill reflects the need to strengthen the development of transportation services as a means of enhancing the economic development of the west, particularly Alberta.

The structural expansion of the airport would enable Edmonton to handle the large sized 747s and 10-11s that are now becoming part of the service in the province of Alberta as part of the over-all transportation system moving westward. The conditions which result from larger-sized planes now using an airport designed for smaller jet craft with services planned in the 1950s, although the airport was opened in the early 1960s, demonstrate that the facilities are now outmoded. I think it is time we put this question to the minister: Will he not give consideration to reopening the matter with Treasury Board? The argument of restraint, or that there is expansion at other airports, particularly Calgary and Mirabel which have taken the money that would otherwise have been available to Edmonton, needs to be re-examined.

I think it would be helpful, Mr. Speaker, if I read a passage from a letter I received from a distinguished Edmonton citizen, Mr. Robert Matheson, a former councillor of that city. He chose not to run in the recent municipal election, so speaks now as a private citizen, but out of his experience and study of transportation questions affecting Edmonton. He writes:

I have been one of the greatest advocates of restraints in all government spending whether municipal, provincial or federal, but the federal Ministry of Transport action in rejecting the completion of the minimum requirements to provide Edmonton with a transportation facility which is absolutely essential, having regard to our position as the gateway to the north, the seat and centre of a vast industrial expansion and the site of the Commonwealth Games to be carried out in 1978, is, without qualification, uncalled for, unfair and completely discriminatory.

When we realize that the province of Alberta is pouring billions of dollars of additional revenue into the federal treasury from the production of our natural resource, and no natural resource production from any other province in this Dominion has been taxed in the same manner and to this extent, it makes one realize why there is so much anti-federal government feeling growing up throughout the entire country.

The vast and unwise expenditures by the Ministry of Transport in such projects as Mirabel and the proposed new Toronto airport should be no justification for completely ignoring the legitimate and reasonable request and requirements of the capital of Alberta.

I wanted to share that letter with the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Roche: When I have finished my speech, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Stop terrorizing us, Otto.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, I turn from the primary question of structural enlargement of the Edmonton international airport in order to better serve the travelling public of western Canada. The second argument I wish to present to the House concerns the facilities for preclearance. That is a subject which has been repeatedly drawn to the attention of the minister and to that of his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay). I wish to pay tribute to the former minister of national revenue, now Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). In her capacity as minister of national revenue she made some marginal improvements in having overtime facilities provided for customs officials servicing Edmonton-bound passengers travelling back from pacific destinations. That is an improvement which I wish to acknowledge. I must add, parenthetically, that it was an improvement brought about as a result of a tremendous wave of pressure from the Edmonton travelling public.

● (1612)

Mr. Paproski: And from Edmonton members.

Mr. Roche: We now turn to the question of the preclearance facilities put in on a regular basis to serve passengers travelling to the United States who do not wish to be inconvenienced, especially now with the opening of the Calgary airport with preclearance facilities, by having to get off the plane in Alberta for preclearance, once having got on in Edmonton, and then going on to the United States. The argument that has been presented, namely, that structural changes in order to permit preclearance facilities put in at the Edmonton airport, demand a great expenditure of money, is one that is open to question.

I call as my witness in this question of how much needs to be spent in order to put in preclearance facilities, Mr. H. L. Morrison, consulting engineer, who has already written to the minister. I am not sure that the minister has had an opportunity to examine Mr. Morrison's argument, but I will reduce it to one or two sentences. Mr. Morrison is saying that smaller projects in the Edmonton airport could well be undertaken by the government, consistent with its general policy of expenditure restraint, to provide the kind of service that the travelling public has the right to expect. Mr. Morrison writes:

I simply cannot believe that preclearance service cannot be provided to everyone's satisfaction without a major modification to the terminal.

In other words, it would be possible and consistent with the government's restraint policies to honour its commitment for preclearance soon, and not repeat the argument that we cannot have preclearance in Edmonton until the restraint has been lifted and more money can be spent.

Mr. Paproski: Before the next election.

Mr. Roche: I believe we should take into consideration the 1974 bilateral agreement between Canada and the U.S. which provided for the establishment of preclearance facilities in Edmonton and in Calgary, and note that these facilties are not in place in the manner provided in the agreement.

Mr. John Barry, president of the Edmonton Chamber of Commerce, pointed out as follows:

Passengers travelling to the United States from Edmonton and Calgary are severely inconvenienced by the lack of preclearance facilities.

My argument now is that if the permanent structural facilities cannot be installed, then consideration should be given to the installation of temporary preclearance facilities, in order that the public attending the Commonwealth Games in Edmonton in 1978 can be served more expeditiously, and the movement of traffic to the Edmonton airport expedited. My argument for an improvement soon at the international airport at Edmonton is not based only on the convenience of travellers. It is centred on the economic imperative—if the minister wishes to pursue this matter, I hope he will listen to my concluding argument as to why I am making this representation on behalf of the Edmonton airport—of improving transportation services as an essential component of development that will be of benefit to the entire west, and hence to Canada.

My approach is not chauvinistic, but national. If we are to save Canada in a renewed confederation, there must be stronger regional development, and this cannot be done, in such a far-flung country as ours, without better transportation facilities. Improvements at the Edmonton international airport are part of the institutional changes that will accommodate this new economic era for Canada, led by the west. I would, therefore, like to suggest in conclusion that proposals to improve Air Canada should include not only reorganization, which we have been discussing in our debate on this bill, but consideration of the physical needs of air travellers and the role that Air Canada can play in keeping Canada together.

Finally, if we must avoid a commitment to large expenditures now, then I suggest that certain structural changes at the Edmonton airport, and the immediate implementation of preclearance facilities, can be done with expenditures that are consistent with restraint in the government and will also be of service to the travelling public in the manner I have described.

Mr. Lang: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood the hon. member was willing to answer a question. I refer back to the point at which I wanted to ask the question.

I do so as a member from western Canada who has fought long and hard for many things in the west, and who has a proud record of achievement in that regard, even with regard to measures which I myself have sought, particularly in the grain area, such as hopper cars, two-price wheat, and the like.

I refer to the quote from the hon. member's correspondent about facilities for other places. I hope the hon. member will tell me that he was not quoting with approval this kind of reference from one region to other regions as though that were a ground for complaint of a separatist nature. I also hope he will tell me that when he replies to the correspondent he will draw his attention to the recent opening of the Calgary airport, at a cost of about $130 million, and point out that on a per capita basis per province that is a larger investment in that province than the Mirabel airport was in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Roche: The minister has drawn a rather excessive interpretation from the quotation and, I may say, an unfortunate interpretation of my correspondent's letter. He pointed out, very properly, that the commitment, having been given some time ago for structural expansion of the Edmonton airport, it is now delayed because of increased expenses at other airports as a result of inflation because this government has not been able to stop inflation in this country, which is hardly a reasonable policy for the strengthening of confederation which is at the heart of so many questions in the House. I will be responding to my correspondent very fully and indicating to him the response of the minister.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, there is a certain plausibility to this bill and to some of the changes that the bill proposes which, I think, obscures the basic irrationality of the bill and why it is very bad legislation going in the wrong direction. Over the years I have seen many ministers of transport, and I think each of them, in his own way, turned out to be a greater failure than his predecessor. It is not that the ministers of transport whom I have known over the years intentionally wanted to be failures, intentionally did not seek to do good, or felt that the kind of things they were doing would give them some kind of immortal gloss in that office which history would remember with gratitude; they get going in the wrong direction, forgetting the fundamental thing about the nature of transportation in a country like Canada. Transportation in Canada is not just another service to be looked at in terms of profitability and efficiency. That is not to say these things are not important, because they are important. What tends to be forgotten, and I regret that it is something the old Tories knew but the new Tories do not seem to know, is that transportation in this country, more so than any other country in the western world, was an instrument of binding and holding the nation together.

We hear talk of doing this, that or the other, lopping off this line, saying this one is not paying, and so on. What that does is tear apart the cement that holds confederation together. Many say it was 100 or 110 years ago that the railroad was promised to British Columbia, that it was a long time ago that the Crowsnest rates were put into place, and we had to subsidize the maritimes in order to bring them in. However, that is an on-going debate. No issue in Canadian history has remained so much to the fore as has the issue of transportation.

I make these remarks in the way of a preamble. I do not do this in a way critical of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Some people accuse him of being a rather cold man. I do not think he goes out of his way to change that impression. He is an intelligent man, one who wants to do what is right in his portfolio. I am not saying that what I am going to suggest is necessarily right in all its detail; I am suggesting to the minister that he must get off the kind of track he has been pushed on to by the conservative element in this country.

Mr. Friesen: Small "c".

Mr. Saltsman: Small "c" and big "C". I will be quoting some big "C". It is the great irony of our time that the Liberals, who did so well for a long time in terms of public policies when they were picking up ideas from the NDP, suddenly reversed and are taking them from an area which will not be as productive for this country. I say this with some degree of seriousness, because transportation is important. In the time available to me, I will not be able to discuss fully this subject; however, I want to discuss such matters as competition, monopoly, public ownership, efficiency, profit and those kinds of concepts.

I want to state my basic premise. I have already stated one, that transportation is not just another service; it is the cement of this nation and must be viewed in that light. I will point out later that even the argument about efficiency and profitability does not change that. If we are to have a transportation system that unites this nation, it can only be done by a monopoly; it cannot be done through competition. Competition may be very useful with Mac's Milk stores; however, it is not useful for railroads, aircraft and buses. What this country needs more than anything else in the transportation system is co-ordination, planning and conservation, rather than the wasteful inefficiency of the kind of competitive structure that has grown up.

Whether we are talking about railroads or airlines, competition simply means that the private carriers pick up the profitable end of the deal and the public carriers get the other end of the stick. They are saddled with something called public responsibility. The problem is, it just does not work. There is competition in transportation without this crazy kind of civil war between different modes of transportation. There is international competition as a result of the international carriers. This country is too small for domestic cut-throat competition. At a time when we talk about saving energy, it is ridiculous to have planes flying half empty, and airlines competing with each other to see who can make the most smoke from one end of Canada to the other. I agree that a monopoly will not give everything the people want; there will be some inconvenience.

Someone might say that if we have competition, the stewardesses will be prettier and more polite and we will be able to get a little more gin while flying. That is a lousy argument for a national transportation system. If you look at the sad history of transportation in this country, you will see that the whole air transportation system has been sabotaged into inefficiency by those kinds of demands.

Trans-Canada Air Lines, Air Canada's predecessor, was a fine airline. It had one of the best records in the air. It was efficient and profitable at a time when nobody wanted to touch it. However, we in Canada are not satisfied with that kind of thing. Businessmen could not stand having a government enterprise work, so they systematically set out to destroy it. I level the charge at the business community in Canada for destroying air transport in Canada. They are the ones who use the airlines and who made the ridiculous complaints about service. They said they must have a choice. What do they care? They just write it off under income tax. They talked about efficiency and profitability, yet they destroyed air transport in Canada with their silly arguments about the canapes being too dry, and the gin not strong enough. That is why we have competitive airlines in this country.

We had an airline that was a model of its kind, and we set up an enemy for it. We could not stand our own prosperity, and destroyed our own child. On this issue of public ownership, Liberal and Conservative governments see eye to eye. It is very convenient.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: When it comes to private enterprise, they put their hands over their hearts and say, "That is the answer". The Liberals have always done that. The Tories should know better. Sir John A. Macdonald would be ashamed of them. I say this with some degree of feeling. Why did they create competition for Air Canada? To begin with, the government starved TCA. It was only after there was competition that they allowed them to expand and obtain proper aircraft. We had the makings of a fine air transportation system. The consequence was that with competition came increased costs and reduced service. The businessman was happy because he could threaten to go from one airline to the other. What a terrible cost to this country in order to satisfy that kind of silly carping demand! How long is a person on an airplane? It is usually only about an hour. If the coffee is not quite as good as it should be, big deal! I do not fly on airlines in order to drink coffee.

I know the minister will see this bill pass through the House. That is his responsibility. I do not know how he feels about it personally. It is a government bill, and the minister accepts the responsibility to put it through the House. I ask the minister to think about what I am saying. What is the virtue of public ownership? I do not see any particular virtue. I have never been hung-up on ownership one way or the other. I am not making an ideological argument that public ownership is better than private ownership, or vice versa. The argument I make is that the nature of transportation, the need to conserve energy, the need for forward planning, and the large amounts the government spends to build airports and the infrastructure, calls for a monopoly situation.

Competition in internal air transport is ridiculous. International competition is sufficient. You cannot have an efficient airline by cutting its throat. It is not an efficient use of resources to have planes flying with half loads. You need a monopoly in order to have efficiency and, as some of my friends say, profitability. The question of public ownership does not arise because of an inherent virtue in public ownership, but because of the question: To whom do you give the monopoly? A case can be made that monopoly in transportation is the way to go. If you make that kind of case, to whom will you give it? You could give it to a private company. I guess that would work. We do that in the case of Bell Telephone. Or you could give it to the government because the government has to underwrite the private company, anyway. If the company fails to do certain things which are in the public interest, the government is asked to pay for it.

I listened with great interest to the intervention of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) yesterday. When he had finished, I directed a question to him. He wanted to place the airline on a basis of some sort of profitability, and I asked him, "What do you do about the small places where it is not profitable to go, places where it doesn't pay?" "Oh," he said, "you subsidize". Surely, that is the worst kind of illusion, whether you subsidize externally or internally. External subsidization may in the end be more expensive, because you run into a situation where the ones who are paying the subsidy—in this case the government—try to make a case that the subsidy is not needed, where as the ones applying for the subsidy certainly have a tendency—I will not say they cook their books; they are not dishonest people—to present the best possible case for their need of assistance and call attention to their poverty. So you end up with two bureaucracies tearing away at each other, each trying to prove the other wrong. Before the matter can be decided, both of them must appear before a third bureaucracy which is called the Transport Commission.

Some day we shall get public ownership, not because anybody is going to listen to the arguments of the socialists but because people will get tired of this whole mess, people arguing with each other back and forth, as is the case with the Bell Telephone, one side wanting to raise the rates and the other side wanting to lower the rates, politicians getting in the middle and a board trying to decide the whole thing.

People will throw up their hands in despair and say, "For God's sake place it under public ownership and be done with these lawyers, these accountants, these bureaucrats, these computers, these inputs and outputs and the regressive analyses that no one can understand". They will say, "Let us run it on that basis". So socialism will come in with a whimper, rather than with a bang, and for different kinds of reasons.

An hon. Member: Yes, and they will nationalize the dry cleaners, too.

Mr. Saltsman: Well, there are times when I wish they would nationalize the dry cleaners and take me off the hook. A lot of this illusion about profitability is an illusion for purely ideological purposes because I think it suits the ideological needs of some people, some nice people for that matter, who say that if you have profitability as a test, it always works even though you have to add, as a rider, that to serve the public interest you have to provide very large subsidies and then you have a problem about how those subsidies should be allocated.

I should like to recall the experience I have had with the CNR and the CP railways. The Parliament of Canada, very properly, felt that passenger services were in danger and that we should do more to restore them. In parliament after parliament, committees have urged both the CP and the CNR to do this. It is interesting to note what the consequences have been. If you go to the Union Station in Toronto, a very good example, and you look at the board showing passenger services, you will find that the CPR has three passenger train runs out of Toronto. All the rest—and there are dozens of them—are run by CNR. What is the reason? The CPR is, of course, privately owned. People say the CPR is a marvellous example of how private ownership works, and public ownership of the CNR is a disaster.

Of course the CPR works; they get out of their responsibility for carrying passengers. Their tracks are free to run freight like mad. But the CNR, the one we are supporting, gets stuck with "social purposes". The people say, "See, I told you. Everything the government touches is no good". The CNR has to go to places where CP will not go because it is not profitable to do so. Someone says the CN does not go to some of those places either. Well, the CNR is picking up the same bad habits of profitability. It is natural. It is an example of Gresham's law on currency.

Mr. Whittaker: That's going rather far.

Mr. Saltsman: I am glad to see there is somebody in the House who understands Gresham's law. Perhaps if I explain it the hon. member will find he does not understand it after all. Gresham's law is very simple. It says that bad currency drives out good currency. If you put bad and good currency together—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest that the hon. member get back on the rails.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: Well, I listened to that advice. When I hear "back on the track" from the distinguished occupant of the chair, I listen with great attention and respect, both from a procedural and from a practical point of view.

An hon. Member: And he can blow the whistle, too.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, and he has the advantage of being in a position to blow the whistle in addition to all the other power he possesses as one who occupies such an exalted position.

This is a very serious discussion, and while levity is always of some help in breaking the tension of a serious discussion, I think we have to go back to the argument I am trying to make to the House.

We went through an examination of the Telesat Corporation when it was first set up at the time the Hon. Eric Kierans was minister of communications. The original proposal brought before a committee of the House of Commons was that Telesat be a troika. Troika was a very popular conception in those days, being three horses running off in different directions with a Russian carriage behind them. Nobody ever figures out what happens to the carriage, whether it goes in three parts or stays in one piece. The troika was supposed to consist of the government as the third partner holding one-third of the shares, the communications corporations holding another third of the shares, and the public holding the remaining third.

Here was a case of the government taking all the risks. The government was virtually putting up the capital, the government was making the decisions as to the rates—it was not a public enterprise—but was only getting one-third of the shares. I said at the time that those shares would never be put on the market, because why in the world would private shareholders be needed in connection with something like that? There was some argument for bringing in the common carriers because they were going to be the users of it, and there was the argument that they would have some technology which they could make available to the corporation. So some kind of a case could be made along that line. Now we have nothing but trouble with this concept.

They are coming to parliament. Some people don't want Bell Telephone in it. They say that having Bell associated with Telesat creates a conflict of interest—and it does create a conflict of interest. There was never any reason for having the common carriers in there. If they have good advice to offer, hire them. If you were willing to pay their consulting fees, they would be very glad to consult with you. If they were not willing to do it, there would be other communications companies that would. So why cut them into the deal, and why complicate things by having mixed objectives?

The foolishness of the whole thing is simply this: they said the thing might not make money. How could it avoid making money, because if it loses money the government simply authorizes a rate increase? So it would always make money. It is the next best thing to Lord Thomson's television station. It is a licence to print money. The government has to make sure it does not go broke, and they are responsible for the rate. It is like Bell Telephone. How can Bell Telephone not make money? What telephone company would you go to, if you did not use Bell Telephone? If Bell Telephone is not making money, it simply goes to the Transport Commission and opens up its books, to the extent that they have their books organized, and says, "Look, we are not making enough money. Increase the rates". That would be a very risky type of private enterprise. For example, people might stop using the telephone.

● (1642)

I overstate the case, Mr. Speaker, and I do so because I want to point out what I think is the ridiculousness of having all these things which are natural monopolies, which are there for the service of the public, things which tie a country together and regarding which you do not apply the ordinary test of market profitability and competition.

Mr. Friesen: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Friesen: Would the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) permit a question?

Mr. Saltsman: I will always permit a question from such a distinguished member.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member used the term "natural monopoly". In the extension of his philosophy, does not everything soon become a natural monopoly?

Mr. Saltsman: I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that I had made my position clear. There are not that many natural monopolies, nor are there are many things which benefit from a monopoly. But I say seriously to the hon. member who has asked this question that when we are worried about running out of gas and oil, when we are worried about flying planes which are half empty from Vancouver to Toronto or Montreal, does it make sense? Does it make any sense at all to have two planes flying the same route, using twice the amount of fuel that would be required if one plane were to do that job?

Mr. Friesen: That is only Otto and Jack.

Mr. Saltsman: No, it is not only Otto and Jack. You can blame him for that so long as it is in Canada. If you want to blame the Minister of Transport for your wife's carbuncles, if she has carbuncles, or for my children's buck teeth, if they have buck teeth, fine, so long as they are living in Canada. The same kind of silliness is going on in the United States, but as powerful as the Minister of Transport may be, I do not think that he is so omnipotent that he is able to affect events in the United States.

I have heard the hon. member and other hon. members talk about the need to conserve energy because we are running out of fossil fuels. What could be more wasteful than the stupid kind of duplication which we have where several aircrafts fly the same routes, none with full loads, and all competing with each other for businessmen who are going deduct the cost of their fares from their income tax, so that the government is going to pay half anyway? Of course, politicians use the airlines, but we are no revenue producers. Although there are people who use the airlines to visit mothers, sons and daughters, the airlines really exist, like the Post Office, as a service to the businessmen of this country.

It is the businessmen of this country, with their shortsightedness and their talk of profitability, who have destroyed the transportation system, as they have destroyed the Post Office. They are always talking about the Post Office. As far as most people are concerned, Mr. Speaker, you could shut the Post Office down permanently, for all the effect it would have. But all our businessmen would never be able to collect their bills. The Post Office exists so it can distribute all these stupid circulars and bills. It is the businessmen who are the first to be critical of the Post Office. Heaven help the government if the Post Office raises the cost of postage by two cents. Businessmen will give $2 to a private courier, but they will not give the government 14 cents to post their mail.

Mr. Friesen: You are giving us the hyperbole.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, I am, because sometimes the hyperbole is the reality. This is the kind of silliness that goes on when talking about public effort versus private effort. As all hon. members know, I am an advocate of public ownership. I am not afraid of it. I think public ownership very useful in many ways. But neither am I an ideologist who says that public ownership is always better than private ownership, that profit is no good. I simply ask that on things like transportation, which is vital to this country, the conservation of energy and use of our resources, you keep an open mind.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I have far from exhausted what I wanted to say, and I make no pretence that I have covered everything, but we in Canada who have really pioneered public transportation, the concept of public responsibility and public involvement as a way of nation-building, are moving backwards now at a time when our neighbours to the south are realizing that we were right in the first place. They have introduced Amtrak now. They are consolidating their airlines and co-ordinating them to eliminate the wastefulness of the competitive system which exists among American airlines. But we are being regressive. We are going backwards. It is difficult to know why, except for this kind of prevailing mythology.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if I want to do something substantial to improve the profitability of our airlines' system for the nation, we should get rid of this phony kind of competition that exists between the railroad system and the airlines. Both should be co-ordinated. A person should be able to stop off at a train station and make, not a direct connection at that point but at least a better connection to an airline or a bus than is now the case. We have a disjointed, disorganized, inefficient, unprofitable transportation system, and all because of this misguided notion that transportation is like selling soap.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, the first thing I should like to do is to compliment you, sir, as Speaker, on staying in your chair during the last speech. I think it shows a degree of bravery on your part that I would commend you for. I listened to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) putting forward some of his—I was going to say "reasons", but I will backtrack on that and say "some of his whatever that was". For example, he said that he believes in public ownership in areas which are vital, without giving any further definition, believing that that meant transportation.

I put to him a challenge: if he assumes that transportation is vital, and that therefore it ought to be publicly-owned, what does he say about the oil industry, about timber, about housing, about clothing, textiles and food? In other words, simply to say that because something is vital to a human being, it ought to be under public ownership is not enough; this covers far more than just the field of transportation. I think the hon. member would have to give that particular argument more substance than he has today.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I come from farming and ranching country, and we are not very happy when we see our beef filled with cereal. We call that filler, and I think that is what the last speech was. Instead of using cereal grains as filler, though, it was dandelion fuzz. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge said that competition will not work. He said that in the essential services you need to have public ownership for reasons of efficiency. I should like to see him use that example in my riding, or indeed anywhere in Canada, and to say that the Post Office is the institution which is the epitome of efficiency in this country. I submit that virtually everywhere in Canada today the view is held that the Post Office, with its monopoly, does not demonstrate in any way the concept of efficiency.

The hon. member also said that we needed a monopoly in air transport because it is the government that builds the airports and the runways. To follow that argument through to its logical conclusion, we would have, as is the case in the Soviet Union, little cars with no style at all going across this country because the government builds the highways. In other words, he is saying that because the government builds part of a system, it ought to be owned by the government and there should be no private carriers. This would mean, in this country, that no individual could own a private car.

Then the hon. member said public ownership would avoid proliferation of the bureaucracy. That, Mr. Speaker, is when I noticed that you did up your safety belt. If he suggests to us that we should have public ownership in order to get rid of bureaucracy, it is evident he has done no reading at all about the last few years, what has happened to this government and what has happened to the bureaucracy within government agencies.

● (1652)

As the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche) indicated, I should like to refer to some of the problems relating to the Edmonton international airport and the tremendous need to resolve the problems in that area. I noticed the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) rose today in an attempt to take some credit for the fact that a $130 million airport terminal was built in Calgary and, therefore, presumably he had done something great for western Canada. It is interesting that the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) could not ride in the same plane to the same city. They took two Jetstars out there, which is one example of inefficiency.

Mr. Max Ward, the president of Wardair, indicated that it was a pretty enough airport to look at, but they cannot afford the landing fees at that airport. There is a need for getting a system into place in order for the people of this country to have basic, efficient transportation, yet they build a marble hall for the Minister of Transport in order for him to be in a position to say, "I built this for the people of western Canada", regardless of the fact that it does not do justice or provide a service to the whole, integrated network of air transportation in this country.

Surely, Edmonton is one of the major cities of the prairies. As the gateway to the north, it should not have to suffer through the situation of two Jetstars sitting at the airport in Calgary, when paraplegics and invalids are required to go down two sets of steps in order to board an aeroplane in Edmonton, Alberta. If you come to Edmonton from other countries, you are literally herded into rooms which are as insufficient as cattle pens, while you are cleared through customs. The reason is that there are no facilities at that airport to handle people in a humane way. I do not say that in jest; I say it in all seriousness. The fact that when someone arrives in Edmonton and is required to take an invalid down two sets of stairs is simply an insult. As the president of Wardair said, it is a case of overbuilding in places like Mirabel and the Calgary international airport, while short-changing some other part of our country. That is unacceptable to us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. It seems to me we are wandering quite far from the bill before us. Unless the House order was changed in my absence earlier this afternoon, we are debating whether to incorporate Air Canada on a different basis. As I understand it, we are not examining the estimates of the Department of Transport.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) was critical of the remarks of the preceding speaker, who was at least on the theme or the principle of the bill. The preceding speaker was dealing with the bill before us more adequately than the hon. member for Battle River and the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). I share some of their concerns with respect to that airport, but surely they are completely out of order in making purely local representations on a bill which does not deal with that question. Surely it would be better dealt with in committee.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. McIsaac). This intervention demonstrated that we touched a sore point. As he mentioned, he is aware of the inadequate facilities at the Edmonton international airport. Therefore, he did not want us bringing up that subject in the House of Commons, because he thought we should not embarrass the government about it. It is time to recognize that there was a precedent in the third reading debate on this bill last night. It was set by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who spoke upon that issue. It has been referred to in the House today, as well. The precedent has been established that this is part of the issue we are talking about when dealing with third reading of this bill related to Air Canada.

It has been stated that the economic power of Canada is being shifted from central Canada to a centre of gravity somewhere to the west. As that happens, the prairies and British Columbia will become a more important economic and integral part of confederation. We need to recognize that in part we are talking about the concept of national unity.

When we talk about national unity, it is important to note that in a nation such as Canada there can be no such preview to the notion of national unity, if there is no method of national communications or national transportation. Instead of those types of objectives, we have a sense of favouring some areas over others. That is exemplified by the freight rates in this country, which are discriminatory to certain regions, the fact that we have air corridors which are discriminatory to some regions, and that the infrastructure in the whole mode of transportation across this country holds biases against certain areas.

When we talk about the Edmonton international airport, we are not talking about the citizens of the city of Edmonton; we are referring to the entire Northwest Territories, which comprise more than a third of Canada, and we are talking about the northern parts of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. The hon. member should be reminded that my riding extends 200 miles from the city of Edmonton, and that airport is not serving a local constituency need; it is serving a major, potential economic thrust in this country.

If people had vision as to the future of the nation, they would recognize that Edmonton international airport, if developed properly, would open up enormous economic potential. As much as we would like to underline and underscore the fact that the Commonwealth Games will be held in Edmonton, it means nothing in relation to the potential development of the Northwest Territories, the Yukon and northern Alberta, all of which are relying heavily upon a national air policy that will give adequate service to the Edmonton international airport.

If we look at Air Canada's statistics, we will note that in 1974 the airline lost $18.7 million.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills. As there are no notices of motions (papers), the House will proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Bell Canada

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East) moved that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

• (1702)

He said: Mr. Speaker, this private bill, Bill C-1001, is a measure respecting Bell Canada. It is identical to Bill S-2 which was passed by the Senate of Canada some 11 months ago, in December, 1976. As the House will recall, Bill S-2 was subsequently given first reading in this House in December of last year. Second reading debate began on January 27, 1977, some nine months ago, but did not conclude before the House prorogued on October 17, just a few weeks ago. In reintroducing this bill under its new number, Bill C-1001, I would like to review briefly its four main objectives. Then I want to conclude with an appeal or a plea that the House send the bill to committee as early as possible so that a detailed examination of its objectives and clauses can be made.

Perhaps it would be worth while to remind ourselves of certain basic facts about Bell Canada. One of the least known facts is that this company has a charter which, in effect, is a special act of parliament and the charter can be changed. Many companies seek changes to their basic constitutions as conditions in the economy change, but the charter of this company can be changed only in a special way, that is, by a private bill introduced into this House by a private member, and not by the government. That means that in respect of this major Canadian corporation, some obligation is imposed upon us, as members of this House—not in this instance being led by the government, not in this instance having a party majority behind the government, but simply acting as private members—to proceed as quickly as we can to detailed examination, and the only place where that can be done is in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Bell Canada is almost 100 years old; it was incorporated in 1880. As we know, it provides telecommunications services and facilities in Ontario, Quebec and the Northwest Territories. In addition, through affiliated companies it supplies telephone and telecommunications services in the four Atlantic provinces. Bell Canada is a Canadian-owned company and it is operated by Canadians. The company has more shareholders throughout Canada than any other Canadian corporation; some 209,000 registered shareholders alone own over 97 per cent of Bell Canada's issued shares.

This, of course, not only reflects the confidence Canadians have in the company as a major Canadian utility, but it also indicates the on-going practice of Bell Canada of raising large sums of money in capital markets by way of issuing common shares. One of the objectives of this bill is to authorize the company to go into capital markets to raise more common shares, to sell more common shares and to raise more capital, after its present authorization has run out, than the present charter will permit.

The Bell Canada group of companies employs some 80,000 people. Among these are 48,000 employees who operate the Bell system proper, the telephone system, in virtually all the communities of central Canada. A further 24,000 employees work for Northern Telecom, a subsidiary of Bell Canada. This company is the largest manufacturer of telecommunications equipment in Canada; it is a manufacturing company. A further 1,800 highly trained, skilled and scientific personnel work for a combination of Bell and Northern Telecom, a company known as Bell Northern Research Limited, which is Canada's largest industrial research and development organization.

These two companies which combine in the research and development organization have taken Canada to the forefront of the world in telecommunications technology. The integration of research with the manufacturing and the operational service section of the Bell family makes this an industrial organization which is one of the strongest in Canada. It is a model of industrial organization, and in turn it helps the telephone company to provide its telephone subscribers with economical and high-quality services.

Bell Canada's special act, which we are now proposing to amend by the bill before us, has been amended 12 times in almost 100 years by private bills not unlike that which is before us. These amendments have authorized additional share capital for the company's operations, and have kept the company's powers up to date. This bill is another in that series. In addition to those purposes, the bill proposes an alternative method for altering the company's powers, objects and share capital in the future.

As hon. members know, Bell Canada is subject to regulation by a regulatory commission which we know as the CRTC, with respect to the rates it charges its subscribers and the issuance of its capital stock.

The first objective of the bill—and there are four to which I would like to refer—is to increase the present ceiling on share capital, a ceiling provided by specific, special legislation of parliament. The ceiling was set at $1.75 billion share capital. This bill would increase that level to $5 billion. The request for an increase is prompted by the need to finance part of the huge capital expenditures program facing Bell. This program is expected to cost $15 billion over the next decade in order to expand services and facilities. The company provides its capital expenditures through three basic sources: internally-generated revenues, borrowings on the debt market through bonds and, finally, the method that is subject to approval by this House, namely, issuing common shares to tens of thousands of Canadians who invest in the company.

The second principal objective of the bill is to provide greater financial flexibility to this company in keeping with changes in the economy and in capital markets. I will not spend much time on those changes, but I might just say that presently, through this special act—which is subject to our decisions—the company can issue common shares at the par value of only $25. It cannot split its shares—splitting shares is a common practice as the value of shares rises, in order to enable companies to reach more shareholders with smaller amounts to invest—nor can it borrow under the authority of a general borrowing by-law. I do not think these are controversial provisions, but I am bold enough to suggest that they will not be in the charter unless we put them there. I simply will draw them to the attention of my colleagues and suggest they are in there for greater flexibility. Among the amendments included in the flexibility ones is a set to which I would draw your attention, for provision to enable Bell Canada in the future, if we approve, to issue stock without the prior approval of the CRTC, the regulatory commission. Currently we authorize the ceiling of, say, $5 billion in shares and then when the company wishes a share issue of $100 million, say, it must go to the CRTC and it must do this with respect to each issue. There is a certain irrelevance in respect of that today, as I outlined in my speech to the House on January 27 this year.

• (1712)

There is also the question of timing of a share issue and the difficulties faced by underwriters if they are going to make a commitment to underwrite the shares and then be delayed by a hearing.

The third aim of the bill is to modernize the corporate powers of the company. This is an important section, incorporating into its charter Section 16 of the Canada Corporations Act. The amendment, as proposed, would achieve the object of clarifying the existing, ancillary and incidental powers of Bell Canada and of broadening the existing, ancillary and incidental powers. For example, if adopted it would allow the company to invest in other companies having objectives in whole or in part similar to those of Bell Canada. It would also enable Bell Canada to implement government policy regarding provision of computer services by communication carriers through separate, arm's length affiliates.

The application of Section 16 to the company would place it on the same level as most other companies which can carry out their objectives in the most appropriate manner without being hampered by the constraints which presently preclude Bell Canada, except in limited instances, from incorporating or acquiring subsidiaries to perform activities it could undertake itself.

The last purpose of the bill is to authorize the company to alter its objectives, its power and its share capital in the future by applying for letters patent, that is to say, by making an application to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), who is the registrar general for patent purposes. Such a request would be holding the company still in parliament through a different technique than a private bill, in that the letters patent, if granted by the registrar general, would be subject to being nullified by either House of parliament during a period of 30 sitting days following their tabling in parliament. This is known as the negative resolution procedure found in the Telesat Canada Act and found in another version in the income tax conventions legislation.

I think this is a request for a change of considerable significance to all of us. I suggest we should get the bill as quickly as we can to the committee where we can examine the officers of the company and consider this matter in greater detail.

I will shorten my remarks, Mr. Speaker, as I know other members want to speak. In the debate that took place last session some members drew attention to the advisability of developing and improving the rural service provided by Bell Canada. In respect to the request for authority for new capital let me say that on January 1, 1977, the company started to implement a five-year non-urban service improvement program which, as a result of the regulatory commission's decision, was accelerated by one year. Under this program some 256,000 multi-party line subscribers will have their service improved to no more than four subscribers per line, some less than four but none more than four, over the next four years. This program alone will require approximately $600 million of capital expenditures during the four years ending 1980.

There is only one further point I should like to make, and that is to draw attention again to the parliamentary process in which we, as private members, are engaged with a private bill like this. A special act company like Bell, although regulated by a regulatory commission, the CRTC, is still required to come back to us to seek changes in its charter by a private bill without the normal legislative process of being backed as a government measure. No other way is provided for changes.

Surely in these circumstances, with a corporation of this significance employing so many people, we have an obligation to work this parliamentary process in such a manner as to move the bill to committee. It is only in committee that the merits of the proposed changes can be fully explored and debated. It is only in committee, not in this chamber on second reading, that the desirable changes, if any, can be made. Is this not the real object of the exercise of a private bill dealing with an established company like this—to examine it ourselves as members on that committee, to follow the implications of its clauses as far as we can, to question the officers of the company on their operations and the objects proposed in this new bill, including the proposal to alter the procedure for the future of amending their charter?

I submit these procedures cannot be done in this House. We dealt with the bill throughout the last session. We have had it before us in these very limited occasions of private members' hour. We are possibly in a short session. In a few months the estimates will go to committee. I appeal, as I did at the beginning, that we use this process of the private bill in private members' hour to move this bill as quickly as we can to committee where we can examine it in the detail it deserves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the privilege of speaking on this particular bill. I view it with some interest, because about 15 minutes ago we listened to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) speak on Bill C-3 and say that some of the industries, certainly the service industries, must have a monopoly because the nature of our country demands monopolies. I spoke briefly to the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) and I appreciate the enlightenment he provided on this bill. He pointed out that essentially the bill would make some fundamental changes to the charter of Bell Canada.

• (1722)

I note with interest that the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) said that the bill would give more borrowing power and greater flexibility to the Company. I really have no objections to that. I think that we are living in inflationary times and inflationary pressures are on large companies such as this, so they need that extended flexibility. But I really have great concern about a bill that would materially alter the charter of the company in such a way as to eliminate—at least it would appear so—the checks and balances that parliament would exercise over that monopoly.

I believe in free enterprise and I like to see it encouraged. Because I believe in free enterprise I recognize that large companies which become monopolies pose a danger to our entire free enterprise system, and therefore there must be a check and a balance imposed on such an enterprise. For that reason I question the advisability of a bill that would allow changes to be brought in which would alter the nature of the charter and eliminate one of the checks against that monopoly on behalf of the Canadian public.

I notice that the hon. member for Scarborough East said that one of the checks would be that Bell Canada would still have to come before the CRTC for approval of rates, and so forth. That does not give me great comfort because I have made representations before the CRTC on behalf of my constituents and constituents from the lower mainland of British Columbia, and I have cause for concern about the effectiveness of those representations. I am not referring primarily to the representations I made before that body in relation to the CBC in Vancouver but, more immediately and more to the point, in relation to the brief I presented to the CRTC a few months ago when B.C. Telephone Company asked for an increase in rates in our province.

The CRTC went to great lengths to provide an opportunity for the people of the lower mainland in particular to have some input into those meetings and hearings. B.C. Telephone had corporate representatives at each of those meetings and there was an interchange between the private citizens making representations and presenting briefs and the vice chairman of CRTC and officials of the company, and in terms of the operations of those hearings they were beautiful. But when I saw the conclusions of CRTC as a result of those representations—and I remember specifically those made on behalf of, for example, senior citizens who could not afford the increase in rates, and on behalf of all citizens who were not getting the kind of service in terms of the kind of equipment being used there, and break-downs in equipment—I could not derive great comfort from them, nor was I reassured that the CRTC is providing an adequate check on a monopoly.

So I am really concerned about a private member's bill of this nature which includes a radical change of the charter, if I understand the bill correctly. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie will correct me if I am wrong, and again I am indebted to him for his help. If this is an essential change in the charter, then I have cause to fear the passage of this bill, because I think that whenever we are in a monopoly situation, people who are serviced by a company deserve as much protection from that monopoly as they can possibly get. As the structure now permits it, the best check and balance that we have is that Bell Canada has to come back to parliament for approval of its services and the changes that it wants to make. Again I say I have no quarrel with making it more flexible and expanding the borrowing powers in relation to the inflationary pressures which exist in today's economy, but I think we need to continue the provision whereby the monopoly must come before parliament and gain approval for the major changes it is seeking.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-1001 relating to Bell Canada is an important bill the import of which, I fear, many members of the House do not understand fully.

It is not just the innocuous bill that the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) would like us to believe, that is, just a bill to update the borrowing powers of the company. If that were all it were in terms of having parliament authorize an increase in the capitalization of Bell, we would not find objection to it. But this bill is an exact replica of Bill S-2 passed by the Senate last year, to which we raised objections when it came to the House for approval. Our objections still stand.

What in reality this bill attempts to do besides allowing for an increase in the capitalization of Bell is to try to subvert and lessen public and regulatory scrutiny of this large and powerful monopoly. Under the act of parliament which now governs Bell, it must come back to parliament to get an authorization for an increase in its capitalization. That is not an accident. Parliament in its wisdom decided that if it were to give this private company, Bell Canada, a monopoly over the telephone system over much of this country, then it better do so only on condition that members of parliament who granted that power to the company would have, in the future, some kind of continuing supervisory power over how that company operated with reference to the very important area of capitalization.

If this bill passes unamended, we, as members of parliament, will never again have the opportunity to examine this procedure that Bell has to observe in its desire to increase its capitalization in the form that we now have before us. In the future we will not be faced with another bill of a similar nature because, if this bill passes, we will find that debate and votes will have been skirted or avoided, because the bill will get around the procedure that we have at this point. Therefore it seems to me that we will be doing a disservice to our constituents who are telephone subscribers who, over the years, have legitimate complaints against the way in which the company is operating, who have not received satisfaction from the CRTC and who, in the end, rely on members of parliament to speak up about the way in which the company is operating and to try to influence the company.

I maintain that the bill is a very dangerous one because it ends parliamentary scrutiny of the company in that sense. How will it be done? I ask hon. members to examine Clause 2 of the bill carefully because it permits Bell Canada to alter its objects, powers and capital stock by a method of letters patent. In the future it will not have to come before parliament with a special bill. By the letters patent procedure, Bell will simply apply to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) for the change. Letters patent will be tabled in the House of Commons. There will be no debate, no amendments possible, and no votes possible under that procedure. After 30 days of the tabling of these letters patent, they have the power to change the objects and powers of the corporation. It becomes law in terms of the way the company can operate.

As well, in Clause 2 in various subclauses we see that if this bill as it is now before us is passed, Bell will come under the Canada Corporations Act. If that happens, Bell will be allowed powers it does not have at the present time. It will be allowed to be treated as any other corporation in this country.

I submit to hon. members that Bell in no way can be conceived as just any other corporation. It is a monopoly. Because it is a monopoly, we in the New Democratic Party maintain we have to strengthen, not lessen, public regulation of the company. If Bell comes under Section 16 of the Canada Corporations Act, as is intended by this bill, it will allow the company to invest in any field it wants, not just telecommunications as the company is presently limited to investing in under the terms of its act of incorportion passed by the Parliament of Canada. We could conceivably have Bell investing in motels or any other kind of business, or getting into sub-banking activities which are totally unrelated to the telecommunications field.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been following very closely the speech of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). With regard to the letters patent, he said they would be tabled and lay there for 30 days—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Lie there, I hope.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —and they would be approved and parliament is virtually powerless to deal with it. I cannot conceive that that would be the case. I wonder if my friend has inadvertently misled the House, because it states at page 7 of the draft bill that the letters patent, and I quote:

> —become effective on the thirtieth sitting day of either House of Parliament after they have been laid before Parliament unless before that day either House of Parliament resolves that the letters patent shall be annulled whereupon the letters patent are annulled and of no effect.

Does that not preserve the right of parliamentary action with regard to those letters patent, or have I misread the clause?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure the hon. member is using the right procedure to intervene. He is not intervening in the form of a question but clarifying the bill on a point of order, which could be done when making a speech. In any case, we will assume it is a question and perhaps the hon. member can reply to it. The hon. member should have asked for consent of the hon. member who had the floor.

Mr. Symes: I thank the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) for rising on that point of order. He knows as well as I the difficulty in parliament ever deciding that issue he has described. I think back to the tabling of letters patent under the Telesat Canada Act, which received absolutely no scrutiny by the House. The hon. member knows that things that are tabled often go by without the general knowledge of members of the House.

Even if it were drawn to the knowledge of members of the House, the procedure whereby the business of the House can be interrupted for debate is very complicated and difficult. It requires a certain number of members to petition for that. There is the difficulty of whether it can be done at the government's pleasure or at the time it is required, as well as the difficulty in the sense that it is an either/or proposition. You cannot make amendments. It can only be negated.

For these reasons I make the claim from the point of view of historical practice. In effect, that provision is meaningless. Technically I can see the point of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, but the experience here is that that procedure is not fail-safe in terms of the kind of scrutiny I would expect members of parliament to give to it.

Our fear is that if we move into the letters patent procedure it will lessen the power the House has over Bell Canada. If Bell can move into these non-telecommunications fields, it will mean, as has often happened in the past, that basic telephone service will be neglected. For example, instead of Bell putting money into improved rural service, it will begin to move its profits and investments into other companies and other areas. I maintain that would be to the detriment of basic telephone service.

I argue that we must maintain parliamentary scrutiny of the monopoly because in the past, the regulatory process has been deficient. I can speak from experience because I have intervened before the Canadian Transport Commission against rate increases for which Bell has applied. In the past the CTC has not fully examined the argument. Indeed, the CRTC, which has taken over from the CTC, has reacted to the lack of scrutiny that the CTC had and has improved some of the procedures. But in my opinion, it is still far from adequate.

Let me give the House an example of what I mean by a weak regulatory process. Bell goes before the CRTC and argues that it needs a rate increase in order to have sufficient funds to carry out its business. Bell always pleads poverty to a degree. It has always been successful in the past in getting a rate increase before the regulatory commission.

I think of one exception in recent years. That was during the minority parliament when my party held the balance of power. We were able to put pressure on the cabinet to roll back a rate increase that had been granted.

The point is that if Bell does not get its way before the regulatory group, it usually begins to threaten consumers. We have seen this. Bell says, "Because we did not get our rate increase, we are not going to be able to put in any telephone." It tries to panic its subscribers into saying the government or the CRTC was wrong in not allowing some of its demands.

Bell is not a poor company. It had a net income in 1976 of $289,712,000. It also had deferred taxes, as of 1976, of $719 million. That in effect is an interest free loan to Bell, but it has never been taken into account by the regulatory agency when determining Bell's profitability. For that reason Bell's profitability is under-estimated. It allows the company to argue for a rate increase that the ordinary subscriber has to pay.

Nor do the regulatory agencies take into account Bell's subsidiaries when assessing its profitability. I think, for example, of Northern Telecom, a company that manufactures telephones and telephone equipment, which is 69 per cent owned by Bell. Indeed that relationship is now under investigation by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission.

Last year Northern Telecom had total sales of $1.112 billion. It had a net profit after taxes of $77.1 million. It is a very profitable company, which is owned by Bell to a large degree. But the CRTC, when it assesses Bell's profitability, does not take into account the profitability of the subsidiaries which Bell owns. If it did, it would lessen the weight of the argument that Bell always makes in favour of a rate increase and subscribers would, of course, benefit from lower rates. Northern Telecommunications is so profitable and strong that I find it hard to believe they have laid off a thousand workers in the past few months despite the $3 million in tax concessions announced in the last budget. We are arguing that its profitability be assessed.

I believe the bill as it is now ought not to be accepted. As members of parliament we have the right to scrutinize this monopoly and I want the right to be able to raise the issues I have described. Bill C-1001 would deny me that right. I want Bell to be held accountable for the fact that it has supplied over 21,000 of its employees with free telephones at a cost of some $2.7 million while telling me, as a member of parliament, that it cannot afford to provide basic telephone service to 13 families along the Searchmount road to Sault Ste. Marie.

I want Bell to explain to me why its 32 executive officers received, in 1975, an average salary of $102,000 at a cost of $2.5 million, and that in 1976, under the anti-inflation program, they were able to get an average salary increase of $20,000, while at the same time the company used the AIB to roll back the wage settlements of its ordinary workers by some $28 million.

Goings-on of that kind need scrutiny and explanation because they relate to the telephone service and the rates which are charged. Those issues will not be raised by members of parliament if this bill passes because they will not have an opportunity to do so.

I want to know why Bell can spend $1.5 million annually on charter aircraft flights for its executives and still charge people living in Searchmount, 25 miles from Sault Ste. Marie, long distance rates. There are too many inconsistencies in the arguments put up by Bell when it goes before the CRTC and claims it cannot afford to improve services. The regulatory process does not afford an opportunity for close scrutiny. It is only in parliament that we have an opportunity to raise these issues, and we want to have the right to continue to discuss these matters and to hold the company accountable.

I do not object to Bell coming to parliament to get its capitalization increased. In fact, had it brought a bill before us containing a clause to that effect, I am sure such a bill would go through. But the corporation has not been content with that. It has added these other clauses which restrict our ability to scrutinize the company's affairs and restrict the ability of the regulatory agency to do so. For these reasons the bill, as presently drawn up, is unacceptable to members of the New Democratic Party, and we shall continue to oppose it until there is some indication that Bell is willing to modify its stand and serve the people of Canada in accordance with the directives issued to it.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the number of this bill used to be S-2. I notice it has been changed. The first thing which caught my eye is the new number, a very significant number—1001. That is an historic number, one which will forever remind us of "The Arabian Nights". It would seem to me that Bell has learned a lot from Scheherezade, a most resourceful and intelligent young woman, one who was able to deliver the womenfolk of her community from the designs of a very cruel sultan. She certainly showed a lot of courage. It seems to me Bell is now bringing forward a Scheherezade of some kind to get its capitalization increased and to escape criticism by the CRTC. Some of the stories we associate with "The Arabian Nights" are capable, perhaps, of being incorporated in this bill. For example, "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves" could become "Bell Canada and its Forty Subsidiaries"; "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp" could become "Ma Bell and the Wonderful telephone"; "The Merchant and the Genie" could become "The Company and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs".

An hon. Member: Ay, there's the rub!

Mr. Rodriguez: One can find a lot of history in these things. I have often commented on the history of Bell Canada. Some time ago the government agreed to give Bell Canada a monopoly over telephone communications. There was one proviso—that the company should come before parliament each time it needed to increase capitalization and that it should be subject to regulatory provisions within the scope of the program laid down at that time. My hon. friend from Sault Ste. Marie has correctly stated that, if this bill were to carry in its present form, the company would escape proper scrutiny by parliament. Individual members of parliament would be prevented from playing a meaningful role in examining requests for increased capitalization. I know there are members across the way who agree with us, and I hope they will get up and speak on this bill, too.

I have been here since 1972, and I have gone before the CTC, and, latterly, the CRTC, to make interventions with regard to applications by Bell Canada for rate increases. Mr. Speaker, you never saw such a charade. The process is absolutely meaningless. You go and make your presentation. You ask questions. The question I have been asking for some time was simple. All I wanted was an answer to a simple question. The question was: what does it cost to produce a black plastic telephone, and how much does Bell Canada pay for it? That is all I needed to know. That is a very crucial question. It puts into question the whole Bell Canada multinational corporate structure. It puts the whole matter in focus.

At these hearings I was also concerned about rural service. I was presented with a schedule a couple of days ago showing what they call non-urban telephone service. They listed communities, these non-urban communities, which were going to receive telephone service in 1978. I looked for the exchanges for communities in my riding and I was amazed to see that Burlington, Grimsby, and Beamsville have now suddenly become non-urban communities. I looked for my own community, but it was not there. The controller was a very knowledgeable chap and I asked him where my exchanges were. He said, "Oh, I think you must be scheduled into 1982."

I think that this bill is going to be scheduled into 1982, Mr. Speaker, or until I see some improvement in rural service in northern Ontario as a whole, and in my riding of Nickel Belt in particular. I am opposed to this bill and I will do everything in my power to block its passage.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): Like what? Talk it out?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is exactly correct. I will talk and talk until this bill is defeated. I am here to serve the particular concerns of my constituents, and I would be absolutely stupid to let this bill through. The hon. member in the Liberal party across the aisle can make smart remarks, but he is laughing at the people in my constituency where there are 10 families on one line. Hon. members opposite would not know that; they probably come from big cities and don't know about the inconveniences of the rural telephone service. The hon. member's constituency representatives went to the hearings in Sudbury and complained about rural service in Owen Sound.

Bell Canada has suddenly discovered the need to improve non-urban telephone service. Magically this has been discovered in 1977. I have been here since 1972 and I, along I am sure with other members in the House, have been telling Bell it has to improve its service.

Some of the exotic equipment which Bell Canada is developing for the business community includes dataroute and memory banking. The rentals paid by families who share 10 to a line are going to pay for all kinds of exotic equipment. These families know they are going to be stuck 10 on a line. Sometimes when they need a doctor the line is busy and they cannot get through.

When people in my community want telephone service and they ask Bell to instal it, Bell says it will cost $7,000. I know this is not a lot of money to Liberals on the other side, but to people in my constituency $7,000 is a heck of a lot of money to instal a telephone. Yet I am asked to accept Bell's good will when they say that in 1982, or at some other time in the future, rural service in my constituency, as well as across northern Ontario and northern Quebec, will be improved.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Where are all the Conservatives?

Mr. Rodriguez: The Tories are so interested in this bill that not one of them is here.

Nothing that Bell Canada has done in the past has convinced me that I should place any trust in their breast beating and their promises that they will put in improved rural service in northern Ontario and Quebec by 1982 onwards.

I am also opposed to the bill because Bell Canada is interested only in one thing. The controller I met the other day told me that it was extremely important that they have a three star rating. He says they have to have three stars, two stars or one star, but they are trying for three stars.

When I was a teacher we used to give the best readers in the class three stars; they had to read two pages without a mistake. If someone could read two pages with one mistake, they would get two stars. If they could read two pages with three mistakes, they got one star. But they all got stars, Mr. Speaker; that was a great pat on the back and it certainly gave them some encouragement. So I asked this controller from Bell Canada, "If you have not got a three star rating, surely one star will get you some money on the market? Perhaps it will not get you a lot of money, but you might be able to borrow $150 million instead of $300 million". He replied: "Yes, Mr. Rodriguez, but then we might have to reschedule the non-urban telephone service if we do not have the money". That is the kind of threat to which they resort, Mr. Speaker.

As my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie pointed out, instead of all this flying around in jets and spending millions of dollars on highfaluting living, we should spend the money on improving rural telephone service. Nothing which Bell has said to me in meetings with my colleague and with the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) with respect to its credit rating, has convinced me otherwise. I think it now has a two star credit rating, and with that I think it can borrow a heck of a lot of money.

I am very concerned about the lack of input by parliament, by the elected people of this country, in terms of directing the growth and development of large corporations. Are these large corporations growing only for themselves? Are they saying to us, "Our aims are your aims? What is good enough for Bell must also be good enough for the people of Canada. What is good enough for INCO has to be good enough for the people of Canada"? I do not subscribe to that philosophy, Mr. Speaker. I think Liberals and Tories subscribe to that. They call it staying out of the market place. I believe that government has the responsibility to be slap in the middle of the market place. It must be there to direct investment. If we give Bell permission to increase its capitalization, in effect we have given it holus-bolus free rein to wheel and deal in the market place, instead of telling Bell that it should put in this kind of service by such and such a date.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I should like to call it six o'clock so I can take this up again next week.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being six o'clock, pursuant to order made Thursday, October 27, 1977, this House stands adjourned until Monday, November 7, 1977, at two o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

CABINET ACCEPTANCE OF TELESAT MERGER AND REJECTION OF CRTC DECISION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the cabinet decision last Thursday which fundamentally affects the future of telecommunications in this country, and in view of the arrogant, arbitrary and regressive decision of the cabinet on Thursday last rejecting the decision of the CRTC of August 24 opposing the merger of Telesat with TCTS on the basis it was against the public interest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That, since the Minister of Communications has become an advocate for monopolies and has failed to discharge her duty to defend and uphold the independence and integrity of the CRTC, she tender her resignation forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, the presentation of any such motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL REPORT TO CREATE RAILWAY-RELATED JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise too under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank members of the Convervative party. Obviously, their convention was a rousing success and I note that their generosity has spilt over to this part of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the railways have announced cutbacks affecting some 6,000 jobs in the recent past or in the early future, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to commit itself to a full implementation of the Hall Royal Commission report as one means of ensuring that more needed railway-related jobs will take place in the prairies, Quebec and Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can only be presented under the provisions of Standing Order 43 with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEW MARKETING STRATEGIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Having regard to recent predictions advanced by the Economic Council of Canada of a gloomy future for prairie grain farmers because of rising costs, depressed prices and a poor export potential, and given the fact that senior marketing analysts have predicted that Canada's future grain exports will fall by more than 20 per cent by the mid-1980s, and further given the fact that outstanding farm debt has doubled in the last six years from $4.3 to $8.5 billion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board make a statement on motions at the earliest possible date outlining to the farmers and the people of Canada what new initiatives and marketing strategies are being proposed by the Canadian Wheat Board and the government of Canada to improve our export position, and further indicate what export targets and income prospects may be attainable into the 1980s in order that the producers may plan their futures in a more orderly manner.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

ALLEGED FAILURE OF MINISTER TO ENSURE SECURITY FORCES OBEY LAW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

My motion relates to the revelation by the Prime Minister that it is not the responsibility of the cabinet or even of individual ministers to ensure that the security apparatus of the state obeys the law. In light of the fact that under the parliamentary system of government it has traditionally been common practice for ministers to accept responsibility for ensuring that officials and other servants of the Crown do uphold the law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House condemns the former solicitor general, now the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs, for his failure to exercise ministerial responsibility in the upholding of the law and demand that the minister resign.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF TAX ON OIL PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the special 10 cent excise tax on a gallon of gas which the federal government imposed on June 24, 1975 is unevenly applied; that this tax is unfair and discriminatory because it applies to only one class of gas users; that the reimbursement system is complex, and that research has indicated that the price of gas exerts only minimal influence on consumption; I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the House call upon the federal government to give immediate effect to the Canadian Automobile Association's recommendation to reconsider its policy by reducing the amount of this tax by 3 cents a gallon, and by taxing all oil product users, which would yield the same $600 million in annual revenues and eliminate in the process a cumbersome reimbursement system which entails nearly $3 million in annual expenditures.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT AND CONFIDENCE IN MEMBERS OF FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a motion under Standing Order 43 which I believe should receive special attention at this time by both sides of the House due to the important and pressing necessity of the matter.

In view of the revelations made during the last week or so, and notwithstanding the events which have led the government to look into allegations of improper and, at times, unlawful acts by some members of our national security forces; because of this, along with such recent irresponsible statements as the one made by Premier René Lévesque whereby he referred to all members of the RCMP force as "jerks", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House formally endorse and ratify to the people of Canada our over-all support and confidence in the rank and file members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who continue to exemplify the legend and tradition of national pride which has made them famous and respected throughout the world.

I place emphasis on my reference to the "rank and file" members.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF NEED FOR INCREASE IN DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. speaker, I wish to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. An editorial in the official publication "The Fragment" by the War Amputations of Canada entitled "Time to take the gloves off" expresses the wide concern of veterans' organizations across the country over the reluctance of the government to bring up to par the basic rate of disability pension for veterans, in line with the established formula to equate those pensions with the average salary of the five lowest categories in the public service. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles):

That, as he requested in his motion of November 1, it is incumbent on the government to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and that the National Council of Veterans Organizations be called as witnesses to present the case on behalf of the veterans of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSAL TELESAT BE ALLOWED TO JOIN TRANS-CANADA TELEPHONE SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the CRTC, the regulatory agency for telecommunications undertakings, has concluded that Telesat Canada's membership in the Trans-Canada telephone system would substantially prejudice the rate regulation process, and that the Liberal cabinet has overturned this CRTC decision thereby lessening public scrutiny and control over this important sector of the economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That this House reaffirm CRTC decision 77-10 thereby nullifying the cabinet decision allowing Telesat Canada to join the Trans-Canada Telephone system and reaffirm the principle that this motion is in keeping with legislative principles adopted by the parliament of Canada in the Telesat Canada Act, the Broadcast Act and the Railway Act.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION OF ADVERTISEMENT IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OFFERING ABORTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the promise of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to investigate the May 9 advertisement in the Ottawa Journal advertising legal abortions on demand, and in view of the fact that these abortions take place in Montreal at a cost of $250 on a same day, no questions asked basis, and are in obvious and direct violation of the Criminal Code, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That this House directs the Minister of Justice to make a statement on motions today outlining what actions have been taken in conjunction with the Ontario and Quebec ministers of justice and clearly indicate what charges have been laid.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

POWERS OF McDONALD COMMISSION INVESTIGATING ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Solicitor General whom I presume to be the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As we all know, the Prime Minister has consistently refused to appear before parliamentary committees. In that light, I would like to ask the Acting Solicitor General if it is the decision of the government of Canada that the McDonald Royal Commission shall have power to subpoena the Prime Minister and any present or former Solicitor General.

● (1417)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is clear from the terms of reference of the McDonald Royal Commission which were tabled in the House in June that those terms of reference are sufficiently wide, as has been stated many times by the Solicitor General, for that inquiry to determine the facts in this whole matter.

POSSIBLE LIMITATION ON DISCLOSURE IF MINISTERS SUBPOENAED BY McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I am surprised that the government is determined to keep the former minister so far from the Department of the Solicitor General. I rather wish it had been someone other than the acting minister who gave that reply, because then we might have got an answer.

My question now concerns a matter of policy—has the government decided whether the acting minister would answer a subpoena from the McDonald Royal Commission, and, if he did appear, whether there would be any limit placed on full disclosure of the role of the Prime Minister or any of his ministers on matters which are before the inquiry? I should like the Acting Prime Minister to tell the House of Commons whether any limits are to be placed on full disclosure by the Prime Minister or any of the ministers, and, if so, what those limits would be.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on the vote he received over the weekend. We all agree he has a great future as Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I think the first thing he should know as leader of his party is that we do not answer hypothetical questions.

Mr. Clark: One of the things we know as members of the House of Commons is that ministers do not answer policy questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I am interested in a question of policy based on the expectation that the government, knowing that the chairman of the Royal Commission has indicated that he is considering issuing a subpoena to the Prime Minister, will have established a policy on this question—any government which looks ahead would have done so. I want to know what is the policy of the government of Canada with regard to the response to a subpoena to the Prime Minister and whether any limit would be placed upon the Prime Minister or his colleagues with regard to disclosure relative to matters which are now before the McDonald Royal Commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice said earlier that the terms of reference of the McDonald inquiry commission give them all the necessary powers to discover all the facts which are relevant to the inquiry.

Mr. Clark: I have a supplementary. The essential question is whether the government of Canada is prepared to see the Prime Minister accept this subpoena by the McDonald inquiry commission, and if such a decision is made by the government, whether evidence by the Prime Minister or other ministers will be restricted.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said earlier. The Leader of the Opposition asked me a hypothetical question. We do not know whether it will be necessary to serve subpoenas. All the facts pertaining to the record will be available to the chairman and the commissioners, and I think they will really be in a position to make a quite useful report in the best interest of all Canadians.

[English]

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—SUGGESTION FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL BE ALLOWED TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): A supplementary to the Acting Prime Minister. Given that the government will now allow the former solicitor general, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, to testify before the McDonald Royal Commission, will the Acting Prime Minister, as a matter of policy, accept in a positive way a motion which would permit that minister to answer questions about government security services in this House of Commons?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I answered that very same question a while ago.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me there is a vast difference between the question asked by the hon. member and the question just asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I did not interfere during the earlier question because, although certain of its aspects were hypothetical, it seemed to me the hon. gentleman was inquiring as to present policy and whether the government was in a position to disclose any policy. But the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot is talking about a motion which has no existence at the moment and about circumstances which are purely hypothetical.

● (1422)

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—REASON FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL HAD NO BRIEFINGS BY FORCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): I would not have expected to get an answer anyway, Mr. Speaker. Let me put another question to the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Solicitor General. Given that the present Solicitor General apparently now has weekly briefings from security service officers, thereby at least acknowledging some degree of responsibility at the ministerial level for the activities of government security agencies, would the Acting Prime Minister tell this House why the present Solicitor General's predecessor apparently had no such briefings? In other words, the previous Solicitor General knew nothing about anything: the question is why?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the statement of the hon. member is based on the facts. All Solicitors General have received regular briefings from the RCMP on matters of security.

MANPOWER

LAY-OFFS BY RAILWAYS—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO COUNTERACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As the minister knows, the most recent government figures indicate that some 70,000 lay-offs are taking place each month in Canada, an alarming and worsening situation which affects almost every sector of our economy. I should like to ask the minister, with reference to a particular sector, namely the railways, what his department is now doing given the decision that has recently been made affecting the lay-offs of some 6,000 Canadians in that particular sector.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, without getting into specifics, I think the hon. member, of all people, should know the many splendid services that are available from this particular department to cope with a lay-off situation.

Mr. Broadbent: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member chooses to ignore the many excellent things which are being done in that field. In addition to that, we have regular discussions. We have an inter-departmental committee which meets on these specific problems. This is not something which has just come to light in recent statistics. This is something which we indicated would happen as early as October, 1976, when we were able to provide $358 million and later $458 million through Treasury Board to take care of this problem, which as I say we recognized some time ago and not as the result of a recent headline.

FINANCE

PROPOSED IMPLEMENTATION OF HALL REPORT TO PROVIDE JOBS FOR RAILWAY WORKERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and maybe the Minister of Finance will answer the question. I asked what the government was doing specifically with regard to the 6,000 railway workers who are affected. I did not ask for one of the minister's old speeches. I now ask the Minister of Finance this question. Considering that the Hall royal commission recommendations, if they were implemented, would affect in a very positive way job creation and bring benefits to the prairies, Quebec and Atlantic Canada, and in particular provide jobs for up to 4,000 people in Pictou county and Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, where they manufacture railway cars and track, would the Minister of Finance now commit the government to implementing the central recommendations made by the Hall royal commission over the next two years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the people involved are meeting with my colleague the Minister of Labour later this afternoon to discuss this problem. So far as the Hall report is concerned, we have received the report and we think it is an excellent one. We shall be looking at all policy aspects of the report, and as soon as policy is developed the House will be informed of its progress.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister should know that the Minister of Transport has committed the government to spending only about one-fifth of what is required. He has committed the government to only $100 million over the next two years which will provide minimal upgrading. This is why I ask the Minister of Finance whether he would undertake on behalf of the government a reconsideration of this commitment and provide the needed $500 million on the ground that this would provide additional jobs, jobs that are important in three different areas of Canada. In addition, there is the important fact that it makes a lot more sense to provide people with jobs than with handouts.

• (1427)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that $100 million is quite a lot of money, and of course we are looking at other alternatives, but I am not in a position to give more to the House at this moment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIME MINISTER'S REFERENCE TO FINDING OF ELECTRONIC DEVICE IN OFFICE OF MEMBER FOR CENTRAL NOVA

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, before putting my question I would be remiss if I did not place on the record of this House a welcome to Your Honour upon your return from a recent visit to the Yukon where you performed a very pleasant and historic function in the presentation of a table to the Yukon Legislative Assembly. That was a ceremony I could not attend because of other pressing matters here in this part of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I get it whether I am here or there.

The Prime Minister was quoted outside this House as saying that the device found in the office of the hon. member for Central Nova could be purchased in a five and ten cent store. May I ask the Minister of Justice, in connection with that remark and also the remark of the Prime Minister that it was amateurish in the manner of its installation, to advise the Prime Minister that the device found in the office of the hon. member for Central Nova cannot be purchased in Canada? Would he also advise the Prime Minister that it is an offence to have in one's possession the device found in the office of the hon. member?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I made it clear in the House last Thursday that under the Criminal Code it is a serious offence to have in one's possession, unless authorized, any device for electronic surveillance of private communications. With regard to the specific question and that specific device I am unable to reply to the hon. member's question because as the hon. member may know, my officers or officers of the RCMP have not been allowed to investigate that particular matter because the investigation of the matter is quite properly under the jurisdiction of Mr. Speaker and his officers.

Mr. Nielsen: The Prime Minister also suggested to the media that the hon. member for Central Nova advanced the notion that official authorities were responsible for placing this device in his office. Indeed, I think he put it in stronger terms. Would the minister undertake to inform the Prime Minister that at no time has such a statement been attributed to the hon. member for Central Nova. What he said was that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I let the hon. member for Yukon get away with one statement by way of a question. I do not think I can let him get away with two.

COMMUNICATIONS

CABINET ACCEPTANCE OF TELESAT MERGER—ABILITY OF CABINET TO DEFINE PUBLIC INTEREST

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications, and it refers to the cabinet decision of Thursday rejecting the CRTC decision of August 24 which was against the merger of TCTS and Telesat because the CRTC felt it was against the public interest. Since the minister herself on November 23, 1976 in a letter to the President of Telesat said that the CRTC had jurisdiction in this matter and since the CRTC found against a merger on broad issues of public interest as reported in its decision, I would like to ask the minister, in view of the decision of the cabinet, if she is prepared to tell the House that the cabinet, behind closed doors, is in a better position to define public interest than the independent regulatory authority created by parliament to do just that in an open public forum?

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the reason for varying the decision of the CRTC was that the government had to refer to broader concerns of the government, that is, to ensure that Canadians would get the services which can be provided by this new technology in the north as in the south and at as reasonable a cost as possible. The prerogative of the CRTC remains, and it is in no way superseded by the agreement which will come to pass between Telesat and TCTS. If the hon. member would read the order in council precisely, he would note that it serves notice to both parties of the environment within which this agreement can occur, and that is to ensure and to say emphatically that in no way are the powers of the CRTC with regard to its responsibility to decide on the rate of return or the conditions under which someone can have access to the system to be superseded by anything that is in that agreement, just as my own powers under the Radio Act to look into matters such as ownership of earth stations are not superseded.

EFFECT OF MERGER OF TELESAT ON PUBLIC PARTICIPATION IN OPERATION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my next question to that part of the minister's answer on public policy, as distinct from public interest. We will not get into a debate on how public interest is served. A public policy for Canada's participation in telecommunications was defined in the white paper on communications filed by one of the former ministers in this House in March 1968, which was the basis for the Telesat legislation. As set out in Hansard in 1969 that debate and policy dictated that the Canadian government was to have an independent regulatory authority in telecommunications with public participation and not a minority of telephone companies. Since that was rejected, can the minister tell the House what factors have changed to allow now, in effect, a de facto telephone company monopoly of telecommunications, an effective amendment of Telesat and an elimination or a reduction of any hope of public participation in the Telesat operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member confuses too many things. CRTC is still existing and has to assume certain responsibilities under the law, which I have just reaffirmed and which were reaffirmed in the order in council amending the CRTC's decision. The general interest of the government was to preserve the right of Canadians to an effective telecommunication system which will become entirely effective the day when the land and spatial systems are fully integrated. It is not a matter of monopoly, Mr. Speaker. Telesat has never been designed to compete with the telecommunication industries; on the contrary, it is a complement to those industries. The agreement concluded between those two parties precisely confirms that such an integration will now be possible. As for the more general government policies involved in that agreement, it is my duty to preserve them. Hon. members have been referring since last week to ministerial responsibility. Such responsibility has been exercised in the case of the agreement between Telesat and the TCTS. The prerogatives of the CRTC and the general policies of the government have been maintained under the order in council.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR THOMPSON INQUIRY—REQUEST MINISTER CONSULT WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF FISHERMEN

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Environment). Can the hon. minister tell this House whether the government is going to extend the time necessary to allow the Thompson inquiry into tanker superports on the west coast to hear all of the evidence of all the intervenors, keeping in mind that under the present terms of reference the hearings were to have been completed by the end of December and clearly they cannot be under the present schedule?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I and the other ministers involved in this particular inquiry will be meeting with Mr. Thompson tomorrow night, and this particular matter will be discussed then.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the president and other members of the fishermen's union are here in Ottawa seeking an audience with the members of the cabinet on this particular matter, can we have the assurance of the hon. Minister that every effort will be made to give an audience in the next day or so to members of the fishermen's union representing fishermen on the west coast of British Columbia?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will take that under consideration. Of course, we members from British Columbia are always very much concerned with the views of the fishermen on the west coast.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

WITHDRAWAL OF UNITED STATES FROM ORGANIZATION—INQUIRY WHETHER CANADA WILL INCREASE CONTRIBUTION

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Lafontaine-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Given President Carter's recent decision to get the United States of America out of the International Labour Organization and to cease contributing to its financing, could the minister tell the House whether the Canadian government intends to help the ILO bridge the financial gap left by the U.S. withdrawal by increasing its usual contribution, and this in order to allow the organization to carry on its activities, if possible, at the same level as before; at the same time this would allow us to reassert Canadian support for the ILO?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, yes, we are concerned about the United States withdrawal from the ILO. There are many meetings going on right now in Geneva with respect to the restructuring of the ILO to make up for the deficiencies which will result from the United States withdrawal in terms of funding. Canada is very much a part of that. We will adopt as constructive an attitude as possible in an attempt to enable this organization to carry on the job it is trying to do in terms of upgrading the standards of workers.

CONSTRUCTION OF FACILITIES AT CHARLOTTETOWN—ALLEGED DELAY FOR ECONOMIC REASONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport. In light of the current and disturbing reports that the construction of an adequate airport in Charlottetown is now being further delayed for "economic reasons", will the minister advise or ascertain if such a decision, which inter alia will contribute to unemployment in Prince Edward Island, has in fact been taken?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that matter is now under study with the Department of Transport, and as soon as there is an announcement to make, the Minister of Transport will make it in the House. I believe there could be one during the next few weeks.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF TAX CONCESSIONS TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's announcement that his government would continue the $1.2 billion tax concessions for large corporations announced last March as a means to stimulate expansion and job creation; and in view of the fact that these concessions are worth $11 million to Alcan, which has announced lay-offs of 400 workers in Newfoundland, that Northern Telecom will gain $3 million and will be laying off over 1,000 workers, and that INCO will gain $10 million and is laying off nearly 4,000 workers, will the minister, in light of the failure of this policy in job creation, now cancel these tax concessions to corporations and direct them, instead, to ordinary Canadians to stimulate demand and hence job creation?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, we cannot apply a selective tax policy for one corporation and a different one for another.

Mr. Broadbent: That was not the question.

Mr. Chrétien: Anyway, we will have a chance to deal with those things because we will be dealing with second reading of this bill later today.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my broad question on the relative merits of that tax policy. I should like to ask why he believes businesses will use these tax concessions to expand and create jobs when already industry is only operating at about 80 per cent capacity due to reduced demand? Surely, the fact that we have had over 34,000 lay-offs in manufacturing alone during the past eight months indicates—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ALLEGED THEFT OF DYNAMITE—REFERENCE TO EARLIER THEFT OF DYNAMITE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Solicitor General. I wonder if the hon. Minister can advise me if the cache of dynamite referred to by the Solicitor General as being stolen is the same dynamite which was the subject of a very impassioned discussion by the then minister of transport some years ago, and which the government obviously knew about, and which was the subject of questioning on this side of the House. At that time the Prime Minister and other members of the government indicated that it was one of the reasons for the apprehended insurrection. Is that the same dynamite which the government apparently has just rediscovered now?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would want to review the earlier debate to which the hon. member is referring, but I do not believe that is the case.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED INFILTRATION OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): When the hon. minister is doing that, would he also look up the question of what happened to the request from the opposition benches as to the alleged infiltration of the Parti Québécois by law enforcement agencies and intelligence units of the RCMP some years ago? What happened to the request from this side of the House for that type of investigation? Did that stay on the file? Is the government still aware of that particular request?

Hon. Ron Basford (Acting Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe that was dealt with by the Prime Minister last week.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board. Can he enlarge on the statement he made in September 1977 to the effect that he was going to decrease family allowances in order to finance the public debt?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): I made no such statement, Mr. Speaker, so I really cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: In September, the minister is reported as having said that he was going to decrease family allowances in order to finance the public debt. That is quite clear. It seems to me the minister could add a few details in that regard.

We know France has made considerable investments in Canada. I refer here to the Michelin company in Nova Scotia, uranium in Saskatchewan and oil in Alberta.

COMBINES

INQUIRY WHETHER DIRECTOR APPROVED CABINET DECISION PERMITTING TELESAT MERGER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and it has to do with the unprecedented decision of the cabinet to overrule the CRTC decision on Telesat Canada. My question is based on a submission by counsel acting on behalf of the director of Combines Investigation when he appeared before CRTC and said:

> . . . the Agreement in its proposed form is clearly anti-competitive, and . . . this anti-competitive nature renders the Agreement contrary to the public interest . . .

Since the minister and his colleagues are not above the law certainly in this case, I would like to ask him whether in fact the director of the Combines Investigation Branch has approved the decision of the government in overruling CRTC with respect to Telesat Canada.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): We have not had an opportunity yet to have a reaction from the Director of Investigation under the Combines Act but we did make the representations of the director well known to the cabinet during the discussions.

Mr. McGrath: Is it the position of the minister then that they would make a decision of this nature, unprecedented in its scope, overruling CRTC which had extensive hearings on this subject, without first consulting the law officers of the Crown? Surely one of the principal law officers of the Crown in this case would be the director of the Combines Investigation Branch. I ask the minister now if it is the position of the government that their decision to overrule CRTC is consistent with the decision taken by the director of the Combines Investigation Branch before CRTC?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as was pointed out earlier, the cabinet had the right to overrule the CRTC decision in law and during the discussions on that subject the representations of the director of the Combines Investigation Branch were made well known to the cabinet.

FISHERIES

ALLEGED LANDINGS OF SWORDFISH IN UNITED STATES BY CANADIANS—POSSIBLE CHANGE IN REGULATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the fact that the U.S. Department of Commerce news report B-127 of Tuesday, October 25, 1977 lists as imports fresh swordfish from Canada on the vessels Carlo Joyce on September 30, 1977 and the Sea Gull on October 5, 1977 at Boston, Massachusetts, a species that the minister has been telling us for years could not be landed in the United States, I would ask him whether there have been any recent developments in the fishery of which Canadian fishermen generally are unaware and, if not, would the minister enlighten the House as to why such a listing should occur in this U.S. publication?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the publication in question. The hon. member knows very well, and I said it in the House, that it is the import regulation of the national government, that is the government whose seat of power is in Washington, which is causing difficulty through the Food and Drug Administration. There is nothing to stop individual states—in this case, if I understand the hon. member's statement, it was in Boston, therefore Massachusetts—from importing within their own landing ports fish from Canada. If the U.S. import regulations under the national government's regulations were lifted, we would certainly authorize the landing of swordfish.

Mr. Crouse: For the minister's information, because obviously he is not informed of this matter, the publication to which I referred is U.S. Department of Commerce National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Crouse: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The publication to which I referred indicates that fresh swordfish were landed by Canadian registered vessels in Boston, Massachusetts, not by U.S. ships as the minister infers, and I gave him the names of the ships. I would ask the minister if he will check into this and ascertain under what regulations these landings were permitted and also when we can anticipate—in view of the fact that fish are being landed and that fishery represents a $5 million to $6 million industry to Atlantic Canada where there is massive unemployment at present—a statement from him regarding the possibility of reopening the swordfishery to all Atlantic Canada?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): At the risk of being repetitious I must again tell the hon. member that there is nothing in the United States regulations, so far as we know, to stop fish from being landed in the port of a state. It is interstate trade which is not allowed by the Food and Drug Administration and also clearance by customs and excise—I do not know what the equivalent in the United States is—which is not given because of the regulations of the Food and Drug Administration. We are working through our Department of National Health and Welfare in trying to make the case that the regulations applying to swordfish, which is not eaten frequently, poses no threat to health. At the moment the health authorities in both countries have not come around to our point of view, but I am hoping they may do so eventually.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT NEXT YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In his October 20 statement the minister offered a forecast of the level of inflation next year and of real growth in this country but he avoided very carefully any estimate as to what the level of unemployment might be, although he did acknowledge the current 8.3 per cent unemployment level. Would the minister now inform the House what he anticipates the level of unemployment to be next year in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did not specify a figure in my speech, but I hope that with a growth rate of 5 per cent the unemployment rate in Canada will decline.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Again my question is for the Minister of Finance. As OECD has asked that all member countries belonging to that organization set targets, including targets for unemployment, would the minister indicate whether he is willing to accept the suggestion of establishing an unemployment target and, if so, what is the unemployment target level that he is heading for next year?

Mr. Chrétien: It is a very complex issue because when the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale, introduced his last budget he made the prediction that 250,000 jobs would be created this year in Canada. In fact, we have achieved that level, but the increase in the participation rate of the labour force in Canada has been so large that, despite the fact we have created the 250,000 more jobs, unfortunately the level of unemployment has increased.

Mr. Stevens: My question is directed again to the Minister of Finance. Accepting the fact that the question is complicated, may I point out that the minister has indicated that we are heading for a $9.2 billion deficit in the current fiscal year.

Would the minister indicate, in estimating that deficit, what were the unemployment levels he anticipated?

● (1452)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have used the figures that we have until the end of the year. I said at that time that the level of unemployment is too high. It is 8.3 per cent. This is giving us a basis to estimate the level of the cash requirement or the budgetary deficit at the end of the year.

The unwarranted and provocative interference by the government of France in Canadian affairs continues. Will the Canadian government give consideration to inviting to Ottawa the leaders of the separatist parties in Corsica and Brittany to encourage them to destroy the integral sovereignty of France?

SOCIAL SECURITY

PROPOSED GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PROGRAM—COST AND SOURCE OF FUNDS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A few days ago the minister told the House that it is her hope and her aspiration to bring in the guaranteed annual income for Canadians and that indeed she hopes to place legislation to that effect before the House soon. Can the minister tell the House whether she can estimate the cost of such a program on an annual basis and secondly, in view of the deficit the government faces and in view of its espoused policy of restraint, can she state where the funds for such a program would come from?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago when I assured the house of my interest and commitment to the progressive implementation of a guaranteed annual income program for Canadians, I intended doing it within the national budget and without any tax increase. I am pleased the hon. member asked me this question because it enables me to say precisely that I intend to develop this program for the benefit of the most needy groups. I am thinking, in particular, about three groups, and not about the whole of Canada. Of course, any improvement in federal government social security programs means tax rearrangements of some kind.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, as usual the minister did not answer the question.

Miss Bégin: Yes I did.

POSSIBLE STUDY ON EFFECT OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME ON MOTIVATION TO WORK

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am sure if the minister reviews the question she will find that she has not answered, so I would like to ask another. Has the minister conducted any study to determine what effect a guaranteed annual income might have on the motivation to work? If she has done such a study, can she report the results and if she has not, has she at least consulted her colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to determine what his position on that subject would be?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will try to use my best English to answer in order that my colleague can try to understand me. I repeat, I am aiming at target groups, namely, three groups in Canada right now. My officials are working on these programs. I will just sum up my previous remarks by saying that I intend to do it within the present federal budget which means that I do not intend to ask for or recommend raising taxes. I intend to recommend instead a rearrangement of the existing tax structure and spending in my department.

This being said, the hon. member, who I believe is my official critic on the other side, should know that we are studying and have published reports on exactly his second question which, by the way, was not at all the same as the first one. There are three or four reports at least, including a profile of the low wage earner in Canada, which are available to the public. I will have great pleasure sending another set of these reports to the hon. member.

ENERGY

OIL—SUGGESTED SHORTAGE BY MID-1980'S—REQUEST FOR INCREASED COAL PRODUCTION IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The minister said recently in Paris and before that in Toronto, that by the middle 1980's or shortly thereafter Canada will have to import more and more oil, that the situation is like the tip of an iceberg in relation to the Titanic. Does the minister still feel that way in view of the recent findings and the talk there is about conventional oil being found in Alberta and other parts of Canada, as well as other parts of the world?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Yes Mr. Speaker, I believe the western world is facing a very serious energy crunch. Most experts forecast that it will occur some time in the mid-1980's, at which time oil will not be available in the quantities the western nations have built their economies upon.

Mr. Hogan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of that statement will the minister get together with the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and increase coal production in Cape Breton by opening new coal mines because we in Nova Scotia pay more for imported oil than any other province?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ACTION TO PREVENT DELAYS IN PAYMENT OF BENEFITS

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since the October 1 decision by the British Columbia Department of Human Resources to deny welfare benefits to those entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, what steps has the minister taken to streamline the processing of UIC claims in order to prevent the lengthy delays that prompted the decision of the B.C. government?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, some time ago we took action to see that the provinces, and particularly departments of welfare, would have an opportunity to make these advances and make some arrangement with the commission in order that cheques could be paid and they would be reimbursed so that there would not be a double payment of UI and welfare. I hope the British Columbia government will take advantage of that specific move.

Mr. Johnston: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can we assume that all existing manpower offices will shortly be able to handle UIC claims?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, that is going to be one of the strengths of the integration of manpower in UI offices so that we can have a one-step and a one-stop service and individuals, we hope, will find the administration even better than it is now.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON INDEXING OF PENSIONS—DATE OF PUBLICATION OF REPORT OF ACTUARIAL CONSULTANTS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. In light of the statement attributed to him last September to the effect that in his view the indexing formula may have to be changed so that increases in the public service pension will trail slightly behind the consumer price index and the statement attributed to the Prime Minister in a letter to one of the public service unions endorsing the principle of full indexation, was the minister expressing a view of the government at that time, is he floating a balloon or is something causing him or the Prime Minister to change the policy of the government in this respect and if so, what?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, there is no difference of opinion between the Prime Minister and myself on this matter. We respect the principle of protecting the purchasing power of retirement incomes. We are obviously awaiting the report of the independent actuarial consultants as to the efficacy and future projection of the financing of the Public Service pension plan, including indexation. We will make our decisions when we receive that report. In the interests of public servants enjoying pensions now and in the future, we want to ensure that the plan is properly financed. Based on that report we will have to address ourselves to the amount of indexation that is financially possible.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In other words, the minister is saying the views he expressed in late September were not based on the report, suggesting that the report is not yet in his hands. I wonder whether he can tell the House when he expects that report and whether it will be made public immediately upon receipt in his office.

● (1502)

Mr. Andras: The report is not yet available. I expect it shortly, but I cannot give the hon. member a precise date. Of course, I have made a commitment in this House that it will be made public when we receive it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S STATEMENT PLAN IS BASED ON INSURANCE PRINCIPLE IN VIEW OF DEFICIT

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It concerns the apparent flood of advertisements appearing in newspapers and magazines extolling the virtues of the unemployment insurance system. I want to ask the minister about the statement in the advertisements that unemployment insurance is not another kind of welfare but it is like any other kind of insurance. I want to know how that can be when we are told that the deficit is $1.7 billion for the current fiscal year, which will be borne by all taxpayers whether they are entitled to benefits or not.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member is playing fast and loose with figures. In point of fact, we have indicated that the premium rate will not be increased this year. It will remain at $1.50 per hundred. It is the figure we discussed with both labour and management. We indicated to them the actuarial soundness of the program. To spread this kind of malicious, imprecise information does a good program a disservice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, the minister is ignoring the fact that there is a $1.7 billion deficit. He ignored my question, and I would like him to try to answer this one. This cost of $1.7 billion will be borne not by employers and not by employees who pay into the fund and are entitled to benefits, which we acknowledge, but by taxpayers who are not entitled to benefits. How can that be justified?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would take the time to read the legislation, he would see how the system is set up, and I say he is being imprecise. He is using the word "deficit" when he knows it is a government commitment to pay a certain amount after the floating average figure has been established.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON BILL C-5, CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order resulting from a number of discussions which have taken place among opposition House leaders and myself respecting the disposition of Bill C-5. I would like to indicate to the House that the lack of a certain provision in the bill before the House, which may allow anonymous contributions under the Canada Elections Act in excess of $100, in the view of the government is not desirable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: I am prepared to make a commitment to the House at this time that the government will be prepared to allow an amendment at the committee stage to eliminate the present anomaly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: Secondly, there has been some concern expressed by members of parliament in relation to the escalation provisions of the bill. I would like to indicate that the government is going to adopt a flexible attitude toward this question and take into account the deliberations of the committee and the various positions brought before the committee with respect to this aspect of the bill. On the basis of those two commitments, I think there would be unanimous agreement to the following House order. I move:

That not later than 5.00 p.m. this day, Mr. Speaker shall put all questions necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

[Mr. Cullen.]

While I am on my feet, I should also indicate that it is the intention of the government, in the event that Bill C-5 is concluded prior to five o'clock—which is our hope—to call Bill C-3, the Air Canada bill, which is at the third reading stage. It is my understanding that there may be only one speaker on that bill, and hopefully we will dispose of it by five o'clock as well. Following that, we would move at eight o'clock this evening to tax measures.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that the government has decided to accept the view which was first advanced by the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): —with respect to the iniquitous brown-bagging provisions allowing anonymous contributions under the bill referred to. Quite frankly, we welcome that. In view of the representation made today with respect to that situation, and the flexible and open attitude the government has displayed—it is marvellous what the cool weather brings on in this city—with respect to the principle of indexation and how it might apply, I am prepared to say that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is prepared to agree to the order put forward.

However, I want to make it clear, because my hon. friend has been very forthcoming, that we reserve completely our rights with respect to what our position might be after we have gone through the committee hearings to which this bill will be subjected, because we regard the election expenses legislation as a benchmark in electoral law and the principles of that bill ought not to be idly tinkered with by anyone.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we, too, are grateful that the government has seen the sense of the strong representations which were made on this matter by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Since this seems to be a day for getting commercials in, I thought I might get one in as well. Given the commitments the minister has made this afternoon, we are prepared to let second reading be given fairly soon, and on that basis we are prepared to agree to the House order regarding the ending of this debate. Frankly, we doubt if it will take until five o'clock, but if the government would like to have the order to be sure, we do not mind agreeing to it.

However, we wish also to reserve our position with respect to the bill at later stages, depending on what is actually done when the bill is dealt with in the standing committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat reluctant to give my consent on behalf of the Social Credit Party of Canada because my colleagues are not here and I think that we have far more important pieces of legislation before us now including the one to amend the Canada Elections Act.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be put at this time by the minister only with the consent of the House. Does the House give its consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, questions Nos. 49 and 61 will be answered today and I ask that the other questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MONEY OWED BY MR. CHAPMAN TO C.N.R.

Question No. 49—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since April 20, 1968, how many accounts owing to CNR owned Chateau Laurier Hotel by Mr. Vic Chapman have been uncollected, written off, charged to business promotion by the Hotel or which have been unpaid?

2. What was the total amount paid or unpaid to the Chateau Laurier since April 20, 1968 by or on behalf of Mr. Chapman?

3. Is this Mr. Chapman the same Mr. Victor Chapman who has been employed by the Prime Minister?

4. Were any attempts made by the Chateau Laurier to collect the accounts owing and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): It is not company policy to disclose details of its hotel guest lists or transactions between its hotels and guests.

NATURE PROTECTION AND WILDLIFE PRESERVATION

Question No. 61—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the government ratified the OAS Convention on Nature Protection and Wildlife Preservation in the Western Hemisphere and, if not, is consideration being given to ratifying the Convention?

2. On what date can action be expected on this matter?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): 1. No; matter being considered.

2. Convention is being reviewed by the Canadian Wildlife Service, Parks Canada, Department of External Affairs and the provincial governments to determine if it is to Canada's advantage to sign.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has to do with the anticipated disposition of questions on the order paper and the form which Your Honour, the whips, the Clerk Assistant, the Journals office and the press gallery receive as soon as we are assembled in this chamber. The production of this form has been delayed half an hour. I would like to know why, because as the whip on this side I need this information to make sure that there are no points of order to be raised after the question period. I can anticipate points of order if I am given notice of the numbers of the questions which are going to be answered. There seems to be a delay, now, of half an hour, and this causes some difficulty on this side of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders provide that we answer questions on the order paper at three o'clock in the afternoon or after the oral question period. It is only mere courtesy on our part to distribute in advance to hon. members the list of questions which will be answered. Last week the hon. member rightfully complained that he did not receive in advance the list of questions to be answered. He pointed out at that time that he would like to receive it half an hour in advance. Therefore I saw to it today that it be done and he did receive it at 2:30 p.m.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

The House resumed, from Monday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cafik (for Mr. MacEachen) that Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I say, through you, to the deputy House leader that I will not be long in my remarks. I understand I will be the last speaker for this party. In making this contribution to the second reading debate on Bill C-5, I offer congratulations to the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Hamel, and the all-party committee which worked so diligently for many months on the contents of Bill C-5, amendments to the Canada Elections Act passed by this parliament in 1974.

I had the pleasure of participating in the committee. It spent many months going over the amendments to the Canada Elections Act. It produced two very important changes to our electoral procedure: first, contributions to election campaigns will now be declared publicly—the accusation can no longer be made about devious methods being used to finance political parties—and, second, there will be a limit on the amount of money spent on election campaigns.

My leader pointed out, in starting the second reading debate, that the amendments contained in Bill C-5 unfortunately seriously affected these two very important considerations. The deputy House leader of the government indicated today, certainly with regard to anonymous donations, that the government is prepared to entertain a motion. We offer our congratulations and thanks to the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) who, through his contribution to the second reading debate, had a great deal to do with the government's change of attitude in this regard.

On the question of indexing, the whole manner in which the limits to election campaign spending were arrived at in the terms of the original bill at least contained a strong arbitrary component. Before we automatically attach spending limits to the consumer price index and index these limits automatically, there should be a much more careful examination than has previously been the case.

The third point I wish to make is with regard to the question of all-party co-operation. I had the pleasure of attending several meetings of the ad hoc, all-party committee which met with the Chief Electoral Officer. I know of the co-operation which existed among the members of the committee. It was something of a change from the type of attitude that sometimes exists in this House. It was, therefore, most distressing to find, when Bill C-5 was produced, that some of the recommendations agreed to by the all-party committee had been arbitrarily changed by cabinet. Every member of the House of Commons should promote opportunities for co-operation among all parties, for the common good of not only this institution but the country. It was disturbing to witness the type of action that was earlier intended.

The reaction of the government, in indicating it will reconsider these two provisions as a result of having heard the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), is a welcome step in the right direction. I can state, on behalf of members of my party who participated in the committee proceedings, that we intend to co-operate fully, as we have to this point. This bill can receive expeditious treatment in committee, be returned to this House and passed at third reading in ample time for the next election, whenever it might come. On that note, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I, too, will be brief because the government is prepared to introduce an amendment to plug at least one very serious loophole in the bill as presented to us at second reading stage. I intend to participate in this debate when the committee reports to the House. This party has waited many years for electoral reform with regard to election expenses. For far too long the Liberal party and the Progressive Conservative party have received large sums of money from the big corporations. There has been literally no accounting whatever of those donations. I congratulate the government in finally seeing the light. We in this country must not only have political democracy, but economic democracy vis-à-vis elections. This bill will permit an ordinary income earner to contribute to the party of his choice or, indeed, more than one party.

With regard to the indexing expenses clause of the bill, this party is not totally opposed to that. However, we sincerely hope that the committee will take a serious look at this part of the bill to ensure that the indexing is kept to an absolute minimum. What is the point of trying to control election expenses if they are permitted to escalate at a very rapid rate from one election to the next? That is not fair to the smaller parties in this country.

The main point I wish to deal with is the anonymous donations section of the bill. This was amply dealt with by my colleague, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes). I want to make clear at the outset how we define anonymous donations. Some members seem to think that an anonymous donation is a sum of money in cash handed to a candidate or party, with no name attached; under the table, or however you want to put it. Obviously, that cannot be permitted if this bill is to have any meaning. I hope the amendment which the government will introduce, or which the committee accepts, will do away with that kind of chicanery, because that is all it is.

There is another very important aspect with regard to anonymous donations. In American campaign politics, in growing numbers we see full page ads asking voters to elect or re-elect John Smith, Joe Blow, or Mary Brown. Underneath the ad it states, "This ad is sponsored and paid for by the citizens to elect", or "re-elect", a particular person. Will that kind of underhanded tactic be incorporated in this bill? That slipshod method is just a gimmick to show that a certain party has the support of the clergy, labour, big business, small business, women's groups, or whatever. What they do is get token individuals from each of these major groups within an electoral district in the United States. It takes away from the rather harsh partisanship. I agree that many people today are doing that. The candidate is made to appear more accessible to the voters because these advertisements are sponsored by an anonymous committee which could be called together perhaps several months before an election.

As members are aware, in the United States election dates are known in advance. I hope that under our system, every advertisement, whether on radio, television, in the newspapers or by way of leaflets or pamphlets, will be covered by the bill we are considering, to the extent that all such material would need to be publicly sponsored by a political party; it could not be sponsored privately and paid for by "citizens to back John Smith", and so on.

If such a provision is not in the amended bill, what is the point of bringing down a bill at all? As things are, the entire concept is nullified, because it would be very easy for a group of wealthy people to get together to organize a committee to support the candidate of their choice. What it really means is that a small group with a lot of money to spend on advertising could not contribute to the campaign of a particular candidate without accounting for such expenditures, along lines which, surely, were envisaged when the elections act was debated.

I plead with members of the appropriate committee to make sure that my suggestion is given consideration and that ad hoc committees of the kind I have described are not permitted. In my view, they are frivolous and unacceptable groups whose activities go beyond the spirit of this bill. In short, if my suggestion is not accepted, the bill will mean nothing.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cafik (for Mr. MacEachen) that Bill C-5, to amend the Canada Elections Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the bill which is before us. When the acting House leader rose, he covered, I think quite adequately, two of the three concerns we have, one being anonymous contributions and, second, the desirability of taking a serious look at indexing in the bill before us. The third concern is one which I think is very important, that is, third party advertising, the subject dealt with by my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Blackburn).

There was a case very recently, the Roach case, where the judge ruled in favour of Mr. Roach and in favour of third party advertising. If that sets a precedent, then the whole effect of the elections act in controlling expenditures may be nullified. On October 24 this year, in a judgment, His Honour Judge Zimmerman said the following:

> Mr. Roach in his evidence made it clear, in my opinion, that the aims of CUPE, Local 767, were to oppose the anti-inflation program, that his own personal views on the issue were in accord with those aims, and that the means adopted by CUPE Local 767 were intended to attract publicity for the purpose of advancing those aims. Mr. Roach also made it clear in his evidence, and I accept the fact, that no contact was made with any candidates or official agents, so it cannot be said that the expense was related to any provision of the act limiting election expenses. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the expense was made in good faith.

I do not quarrel, of course, with the judgment of His Honour, but I do think we as parliamentarians should concern ourselves with plugging the loopholes in the act so that this type of activity is not permitted, because if we were to allow what I would call third party advertising, we would be inviting nullification of the act. Not only would we be allowing private citizens to put advertisements in the media campaigning for a certain point of view during an election campaign, but we would also be allowing citizens' committees of all sorts to be formed, committees of concern, citizens in defence of freedom, citizens in defence of God knows what. We would also be allowing the Canadian Manufacturers Association, trade unions, mining associations, insurance companies, and so on, to get involved in election campaigns and campaign for certain ideas or for certain philosophies and not come under the scope of election expenditures. That could distort the whole intent of the act.

As this ruling says, Mr. Roach—and I do not disagree with the objectives Mr. Roach was talking about; this party opposed very vigorously the anti-inflation program—was putting forth his personal views opposing the program during a by-election campaign when the election expenses act had application. He made it clear this was his personal position and that he was in contact with no official agents or candidates of any political party. It was his own personal position in opposition to the anti-inflation program. As I say, I agree with him on that particular issue, but there might be other issues with regard to which I would not agree with him.

I think we have to set aside our personal feelings and look at the merits of this activity. He was trying to influence the outcome of the by-election and was acting totally outside the scope of the elections act. Before it passes the bill before us, I think parliament ought to plug that loophole so that associations cannot be formed during an election campaign in order to present certain points of view.

I recall very vividly the recent British Columbia election when the insurance companies were actively involved in a campaign of their own against the government of the day because it had set up auto insurance in the province. There could be many associations in the next election campaign attacking us, attacking the Conservatives or attacking the government for certain points of view. They would not come under the scope of the elections act as it is drafted, if the Roach decision is to become a precedent. I hope the government will take a serious look at this question. I know many members of the government are very concerned about this judgment being used as a precedent. I know many officials of the Liberal party are very concerned about it—as we are—and as, I am sure, are many members of the Conservative party.

Since we are all concerned about this matter, I hope members more directly involved will put their legal minds to work and come up with amendments to the elections law which will plug this loophole. Perhaps the acting House leader will have a response to the questions I am posing. I hope he does, because that perhaps would shorten the debate.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise at this time to conclude the debate on Bill C-5 and indicate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I must advise the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate on this matter. Does any other member wish to speak?

Mr. Cafik: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I took it for granted, because I introduced this bill, that my remarks now would conclude the debate. I appreciate the co-operation of all hon. members.

I will repeat very briefly the two points that I indicated to the House earlier. One is in relationship to anonymous contributions. It had been the view of the government, when this matter was being discussed in contemplation of amendments, that it was not a loophole which would allow for anonymous contributions. It is evident that other members of the House do not share that point of view. It is not as though there is some provision in the amendments which would directly allow anonymous contributions over $100. The question really arises because some suspect we have not taken measures to plug a loophole which existed in the original statute.

The legal officers of the Crown, as I understand it, originally felt that the existing statute did not require an amendment to prohibit anonymous contributions of over $100. But it is quite evident that hon. members do not share that view. Acting on behalf of the government, may I say I can see no objection to putting forward what I would call a "comfort" amendment to make sure that the law is absolutely clear and precise in this respect. Then all hon. members will know the law and how it is to be interpreted and they will be able to follow it without any doubt or question with respect thereto. That is our first position.

The second one, as I have already indicated, relates to the proposed escalation provisions. A whole number of approaches could be taken to correct some of the problems existing in the present statute in this regard. I have indicated that the government will have an open mind in the hearings before the committee; it will take into account the various approaches which may be proposed and, hopefully, arrive at an approach which is acceptable to both sides of the House.

It is quite evident, from discussions with my colleagues in caucus and from listening to the debate which has taken place in the House of Commons, that there are a number of other questions in the forefront of hon. members' minds in relation to this statute. I cannot make a commitment to the House at this time as to specific resolutions which we might be willing to accept. However, it goes almost without saying that we are taking a pretty flexible approach to this statute. After all, it affects all of us as members of parliament; it affects our very existence as members of parliament.

I do not think it is a partisan matter, but one to which we all have to address our minds very specifically in the hope that we will pass a bill that will achieve the central purpose of the legislation, that of full disclosure and of getting rid of suspicions which may have existed in years gone by as to how parties and members of parliament are supported financially. That objective, of course, we all share. We shall examine whatever amendments and proposals are put forward to ensure that these central principles are left intact, so we can produce a law which will serve the public interest and to which individual members of parliament can relate.

I hope this matter will be dealt with expeditiously in committee, Mr. Speaker. I believe there is a broad basis of agreement. We will need sufficient time to formulate our approach to the specifics which have been mentioned in this debate, and I assure all hon. members that it is the government's intention to look at these matters very carefully. But any amendments to the bill should be put into the law as quickly as possible, since the Chief Electoral Officer requires the legislation so he will be prepared for any possible electoral opportunities which may present themselves to hon. members in the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to answer a brief question.

Mr. Cafik: Of course, Mr. Speaker, if it is agreeable to members of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on a question.

Mr. Nystrom: At least, I hope the question will be brief. The minister did not refer to the Roach case when he was speaking a few moments ago. Would he make a comment or two as to whether or not it is the government's intention to try to plug some loopholes concerning third party advertising?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak on behalf of the whole government on this question; I am not the government, but only one member of it, as hon. members know. I can indicate, from a personal standpoint, that I have concerns which I share with the hon. member who raised this question. This is a matter of some importance to which the committee should address itself and make what the committee believes appropriate recommendations for amendment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AIR CANADA ACT, 1977

MEASURE RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF AIR CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-3, respecting the reorganization of Air Canada, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly in this debate because I would like to call the minister's attention to an unacceptable development at Victoria International Airport, the bilingualization of security agents in that airport. Oddly enough, orders to that effect were issued in the name of Air Canada's president rather than the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I will come back to this later.

[English]

In May of this year, a general instruction issued by Air Canada contained the requirement that the security checking teams clearing passengers through airports across Canada possess competency in both of Canada's official languages. Presumably this was pursuant to recommendations made to the president of Air Canada by the commissioner of official languages in his report of 1976. In this report, the sixth annual report of the commissioner of official languages, there was a recommendation specifically directed to Air Canada. I suggest it is an unusual recommendation. It appears under the heading "Bilingualism Policy and Guidelines for Implementation". It is recommendation No. 58, and reads as follows:

—wherever the word "practical" appears in reference to the use of the two official languages, delete it.

Then under the heading "Job Security" appears recommendation No. 68 which reads:

—ensure that the job security of its personnel is not jeopardized in implementing the recommendations listed in this report.

I find this second recommendation completely comprehensible since it applies to all of the Air Canada recommendations. I should like to turn to another document, one which I suggest is much more official, issued by the government. I suppose it might be called the "grey paper" on the official languages of Canada. It is entitled "A National Understanding", and I should like to refer to chapter 4, page 44. I have checked the English and the French versions, and they are identical. At page 44 the following appears:

Canadians should be able to communicate with, and to obtain service from, the federal institutions of government in the official language of their choice and arrangements should be made to this effect wherever there is sufficient demand for it.

I relate the words "wherever there is sufficient demand for it" to recommendation No. 58 of the commissioner of official languages, which reads:

—wherever the word "practical" appears—delete it.

I find a certain inconsistency there, Mr. Speaker. I think all members of the House would subscribe completely to this particular guideline. Canadians should be able to communicate with, and to obtain service from, the federal institutions of government in the official language of their choice. That is fair enough. It goes on to say that arrangements should be made to this effect wherever there is sufficient demand for it.

● (1542)

Aside from my puzzlement as to why Air Canada should issue this general requirement in this area, Air Canada did not, as far as I know, make any attempt to determine the need at the Victoria international airport for competency in the French language by the staff at that checkpoint area. What triplicates the puzzlement in my mind about that basic instruction to the security check personnel is that they do not speak to the passengers. What this amounts to—and it becomes farcical, if not absurd—is that they are looking for mute bilinguals. I find it difficult to understand why, at the Victoria international airport—where there has been no attempt to determine the need, as far as I know—they are seeking to recruit mute bilinguals.

I know that if the need should arise for use of the second official language at Victoria international airport—and this has happened in the past on rare occasions—in half an hour at the very outside, and more often in a matter of minutes, it could be satisfied. Bilingual people could be obtained very quickly, as there are French language teachers in the area and, in fact, bilingual employees at the airport during normal working days, all of whom I am sure would be happy to come forward and help. However, I find it quite absurd to insist, under this requirement, that there be competency in this particular area of the airport's activities.

When I got wind of this requirement I immediately wrote to the president of Air Canada. That was on September 20 last, some six weeks ago. I have not yet received a reply. I assure the House that I wrote to him outlining the extracts I have put on the record from the "grey paper" issued by the government. I wondered why he had found it necessary, at the Victoria international airport, to put forward this particular recommendation. I am still awaiting a reply to my letter. In the meantime, I must admit that he has succeeded in stirring up a veritable hornets' nest of aggravation in the area. There is no need for such aggravation at this time, in face of problems currently confronting this country. Certainly, there is no need for that kind of aggravation being thrust upon the community in this area.

I indicate, also, that two years ago a similar thing happened in respect of the car rental area, where a bilingual requirement was to be laid down. I intervened at the time. I asked members of the car rental area to check and find out how many times, at the Victoria international airport, there had been a requirement for the use of the other official language. I asked how many times they had been asked in the French language, during the years they had been operating there, about the possibility of renting a car. The answer was that it had not happened even once.

I agree completely that we should have bilingual forms, but I am puzzled by the requirement I have mentioned, when there have been no verbal problems at all, as far as I am able to determine. Had there been any verbal problems in this regard, I would have come forward and helped had I been in the area. I know there are others in the area who would do the same.

I question the need for this competency at the Victoria airport. There are other international airports in Canada where such competency is required. I do not question that fact at all. I also question why Air Canada should be the agent for circulating this instruction. The area to which I refer is located in a Department of Transport building. Air Canada is not the only air service which uses the building. Why was it the president of Air Canada who issued the instruction? If the instruction had to be issued at all, it should have been issued by the Minister of Transport. Therefore, I feel there should be, in this reorganization bill about which we are now speaking, a clear understanding of the scope of the requirement of Air Canada. Air Canada is operating its aircraft on the ground and in the air, and in that capacity it has a responsibility in respect of bilingualism, which it is exercising. But surely it does not have the same responsibility with respect to federal properties such as airport buildings.

Let me end on a happy note, Mr. Speaker. I make it clear that, due to the very good sense of representatives of Air Canada in Victoria, supported by the president of Air Canada, it was agreed there would be no implementation of this requirement until vacancies occurred through attrition. There has been no change. Let me suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the form of aggravation which occurred in that area would be as great in Schefferville, for example, if Air Canada insisted upon English language competency in that area. I am just not sure about baggage handlers; probably they do not talk to the passengers, either. It may very well be that such a requirement would be circulated in that area, as well, by Air Canada.

As I have said, I have raised this matter with the president of Air Canada and I am awaiting a reply to my letter. I raise this question today because of the absurdity of the requirement and because of my puzzlement as to why the president of Air Canada would be the person to suggest such a requirement.

[Translation]

There can be no objection to our Crown corporations' commitment to offer our citizens the required services in the official language of their choice, and take the necessary measures wherever there is sufficient demand. But requiring the second language in areas where demand is almost non existent can only worsen the language situation that is intricate enough already. I hope that Air Canada officers have learned their lesson and will apply bilingualism in places where there is sufficient demand for the second official language, whether it be English or French.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief at this stage of the debate. However, I wish to reiterate the concern of the NDP regarding the bill before us, which is to reorganize Air Canada. We know that certain clauses of the bill indicate the government wishes Air Canada to operate primarily at a profit, even if that means—as we all know it will—reduction of service in certain areas. Because of the stated opinion of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) here and elsewhere, we are concerned about the selling off of profitable parts of public enterprises to private enterprise. He voiced that opinion regarding Canadian National Railways and parts of Air Canada.

● (1552)

As I have said before in this debate, and as has been stated by my colleagues, our transportation system is vital to the unity and the economic strength of this country. Because we are a large geographic area with sparse population, it means that we cannot operate a transportation system solely on the concept of making a profit, whether it be rail or air service. If we want to bind the country together and service people in regions of low population, in order for them to have access to good transportation services like people in large urban centres we must realize that Air Canada and other modes of transportation will operate at a deficit at times in order to serve the public good.

We in the New Democratic Party are not saying we should abandon all fiscal responsibility and not worry about the kind of deficit that is mounting. Obviously, we are concerned about efficient operation. What worries us is that this bill and this Liberal government, supported by the Conservatives, seems to indicate that the concept of service will be secondary to the concept of making a profit. That principle is totally unacceptable. Air Canada and the CNR were formed in response to the public need for adequate service and transportation which the private industry was not willing or able to fulfil because such service could not be operated at a profit. Therefore, the government had to step in to provide a service. In any civilized society, surely that is the rational and correct thing to do.

Under the direction of the Minister of Transport, we see an attempt by this government to dismantle the great public enterprises which have been formulated in the past in order to service the public good. We in this party cannot accept that kind of philosophy. We see moves afoot to reduce Air Canada's service to the smaller centres and hear the argument of some transport advisory committees that Air Canada should drop the small-centres routes, such as the routes to many places in northern Ontario and Atlantic Canada, and turn those over to the smaller regional carriers.

We know from experience that the smaller regional carriers do not provide the same high level of service as Air Canada. In all likelihood, the smaller carrier will face a deficit, just as Air Canada does, in terms of servicing the smaller population centres. Whether it is the private carrier that is subsidized, or Air Canada, the taxpayers will foot the bill.

In the concept of public enterprise, we as members of parliament have some say in how that public enterprise operates, which we do not have in respect of private enterprise. Public enterprise should be the norm in our transportation system, not the private carriers. The reason Air Canada and the entire airline business is facing deficits in this country is the degree of overcompetition which is allowed by this Liberal government. There is no sense in flying a half-empty Air Canada plane to Thunder Bay or Sault Ste. Marie, and at the same time flying a half-empty Transair plane to the same centres.

Overcompetition is reducing the load factor for the airlines. The only way an airline can be profitable is for it to keep the number of seats occupied at the highest level, and not fly half empty. The more competition we introduce into our national airline transportation system, the greater the likelihood of deficit on the part of individual carriers. We in this country realize that we do not have a large enough population to maintain a full load factor for the many airlines which are in existence.

The concept written into the bill, that profit must be the primary guideline, and not service, worries us. The minister's statements with regard to selling off parts of public enterprise worries us as well. For these reasons, we do not want this bill to go through as it is; we want to force a vote so that Canadians may see where their elected representatives stand on the vital issue of service in the transportation system of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all last week and again today we heard many remarks about Bill C-3 respecting the reorganization of Air Canada. Having attended all the debates, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of my college days when I frequently won first prize in literary analysis. I was quite surprised to see my hon. colleagues spend more than five days on four lines of subclause (1.1) of clause 7 (1), namely the concept of Air Canada profitability. I do not see why so much time was spent discussing that question because it seems to me only logical for a corporation, whether a Crown corporation or not, to operate on sound business principles, and especially for such a corporation to try to make a profit.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, no mention was made of the fact that clauses 8 and 9 of this bill are there precisely to ensure that notion of service that seems to be overly worrying our colleagues of the NDP. Clause 8 says, and I quote:

8. The Corporation shall, in the exercise of its capacities and the carrying out of its activities, comply with directions of a general nature given to it in writing by the Governor in Council.

It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in spite of the so-called lessons of history and geography that we were given by certain colleagues of the NDP, members of this House realize that our national carrier, Air Canada, must provide service to certain disadvantaged areas of this country, not in the large population centres of our capitals or our large provincial cities. And this clause 8 empowering the governor in council to give directions to Air Canada is there precisely to allow the governor in council to say to Air Canada: You are going to provide service in such and such areas of this country, and on the other hand, as provided in clause 9, the government will be able to reimburse any losses incurred through any such non-profitable service as the airline may be required to provide.

During all that debate last week, Mr. Speaker, we heard, for example, our colleague from York Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) accuse the government of nearly causing Air Canada to go bankrupt, of piling on government deficits, because of their socialist principles. Immediately after, we heard our friends of the NDP say that this was another case of mismanagement because we were sacrificing the objectives of our national transportation policy for the sake of profit.

I think that if we must choose between what the hon. member for York-Simcoe says and the criticism from our friends of the New Democratic Party concerning this bill, the government is right and the old Latin proverb in medio stat virtus applies once more.

We had another surprise during that debate, Mr. Speaker, and it brings me to say that it might be highly desirable to reflect on the work of this House. For almost two days we have been listening to our colleagues from the Edmonton area express their preoccupations concerning problems at the Edmonton airport. Mr. Speaker, however serious the problem I still do not believe that the Edmonton airport issue is very much related to the reform of Air Canada.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say very briefly how surprised I was to listen today to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) who seemed astonished that some Victoria airport employees had to speak both official languages of this country. Mr. Speaker, it does not matter whether this guideline was issued by Air Canada or the Department of Transport, it simply requires some employees dealing with security to be proficient in both official languages. My conclusion, Mr. Speaker, is that the official languages issue should not be hidden behind a series of regulations, that we should stop splitting hairs and consider that the use of both official languages of Canada is a matter of courtesy in public services. If we cannot or if, according to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich, it is ridiculous to expect bilingual services from Victoria airport security personnel, this same principle will apply at Baie-Comeau, Sept-Îles, Roberval and other airports.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to that bilingualism policy, I should have thought that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich would have rejoiced in the fact that an attempt is being made to have bilingual employees at the Victoria airport.

I feel that only with that type of good will, everywhere in Canada, while protecting the persons who now hold those jobs, can bilingual employees replace unilingual ones as jobs become available. That is the only way true understanding of that bilingualism policy can be achieved.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, Bill C-3 is well-balanced and I urge all hon. members to adopt it very quickly.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Lang) which was agreed to on the following division:

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-11 is now before the House for second reading. Its purpose is twofold: first, to implement amendments to the Income Tax Act as announced by myself on October 20 and as put forward by my predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), in his March 31 budget; second, to increase government borrowing authority.

This legislation is important. It is designed to assist in solving short and medium term economic problems. Tax rebates granted to individual taxpayers will have an immediate effect on consumer expenditures, hence promoting job creation. A number of investment incentive measures will be the basic landmarks for a sustained economic recovery. This legislation will help establish a climate of confidence which business needs badly to plan, expand and overcome problems inherent in changes and readjustments of industry. The bill is clearly directed towards the need to encourage job creation in the private sector, at present and in future. We must direct all our efforts to this purpose, but we must also pass these measures so they will have immediate results.

[English]

Let me turn to changes in the personal income tax. These measures will reduce by $500 million the taxes paid by individuals for 1977, and by $1,200 million for 1978. Together with the indexing adjustment, the changes will reduce by more than $2 million the income tax of individuals for 1978. The measures affecting individuals include an increase of $100 in the maximum of the employment expense deduction. It will now become $250.

There are two important changes in the federal tax credit. As proposed on October 20, the minimum credit is increased to $300 from $200. This $100 cut in taxes will benefit over 7,500,000 Canadians. Many will receive it in January and February. Also, as announced in March, a $50 credit for each dependent child was introduced. These changes are of most help to individuals with low and minimum incomes. For example, the effect of these measures will be to completely eliminate the federal tax payable next year by a taxpayer with earnings of $8,435 who supports a wife and two children.

We want to stimulate private investment. A number of measures in the bill will help achieve this objective. They will do this by improving the business and investment climate and by providing direct incentives. The 5 per cent investment tax credit was supposed to expire this year. The bill provides for a three-year exemption. Furthermore, it introduces the concept of differing benefits to reflect regional disparities. For certain designated areas the credit will be 7½ per cent instead of 5 per cent, and it will be 10 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec. It applies to new investment in Canada and will benefit manufacturing, the resource industry, forestry, fishing and farming. This, by the way, is an example of how the federal fiscal policy can, and does, take regional disparities into account.

The credit is also now being extended to include capital and current expenditures on scientific research. The cost of the measure is estimated at $385 million for the current year. This bill will help to reduce the effects of inflation on Canadian business. In Canada and elsewhere, a search is under way for an accounting system which accommodates inflation. In the meantime, business faces a cash flow problem in part because of inflation. The tax system already goes some way toward meeting the problem in the area of capital equipment by special concessions such as fast write-offs and the investment tax credit. But we still need to recognize the impact of inflation on inventories. The proposal to allow a special deduction of 3 per cent of the cost of inventories will ease the cash flow problem to the extent of some $300 million annually.

To stimulate investment further, the bill includes measures to help business borrowing abroad. It also expands the $1,000 dividend and interest exemption to include capital gains. It introduces special rules for replacement of business and farm properties. It increases the offset for capital losses and provides a guarantee of capital gains treatment on disposal of Canadian securities. These and other measures will assist all business. Many of them give special help to small business. Of particular significance in this vital area, the area of small business, are the measures to stimulate investment. These include the increase in the dividend tax credit from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent beginning next year, the special inventory allowance, and the extension of the investment tax credit.

The bill will facilitate expansion by Canadian-controlled private companies through joint ventures, business acquisitions and plant replacement. The special provisions for employee stock options and share-purchase loans will permit smaller companies to better compete in attracting managerial expertise. Funds for small business will be encouraged by the guarantee of capital gains treatment for investors and the special accommodation of provincial venture investment corporations.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, a number of provisions in this legislation will also promote investment in Canadian equity. This will arise from the increase in the dividend tax credit. Another amendment will make dividends of public company stocks more attractive to shareholders. These measures will improve the market of transferable securities and promote those subscriptions of shares which are necessary to any business development. Amendments to the dividend tax credit relate to a series of measures announced in the budget concerning the distribution of corporate surplus. It is most urgent to simplify this very complex area of the legislation.

The amendment made to the provisions concerning dividends enables us to rationalize the various rules concerning the distribution of corporate surplus. The need for designated surplus is eliminated as well as the need for the other complicated regulations whose purpose was to prevent the taxation of dividends.

Following these changes, several business reorganizations which could not be carried out because of fiscal considerations will now take place only on the basis of strictly commercial considerations. Other amendments will further facilitate these reorganizations. For example, any unused commercial loss, any capital loss or investment tax credit of a corporation belonging to a group of corporations will be transferable to another corporation of that same group when there is a merger or a liquidation.

As I mentioned in my speech of October 20, I do not intend to carry through the proposal to make taxable upon the death of the insured that part of the life insurance proceeds which consitutes a revenue from an investment. This bill also contains important amendments affecting the insurance companies. Their main objective was to draft a set of regulations establishing a fair level of taxation for this important sector of our financial system, not only with regard to that industrial sector as a whole, but also for the companies as they relate toward each other. I will have to monitor carefully the implementation of these regulations to make sure that the objective is reached. These rules bear mainly on the treatment granted to the various reserves which insurance companies can claim and on the way the revenue from that investment is considered. In that past, the regulations have favoured multinational insurance companies. Had we not amended the already existing regulations, insurance companies operating only in Canada would have been placed in a very disadvantageous competitive position. It was then a pressing matter to solve this problem; this is what the bill does by guaranteeing an equitable share of the tax burden between multinational and strictly national insurers.

[English]

The bill proposes an increase in the statutory borrowing authority by $9 billion. The Financial Administration Act provides that "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of parliament". This refers to "new" money only, as there is a continuing authority in the act for the government to borrow funds to repay maturing debt. The increase in borrowing authority sought at present is to cover estimated financial requirements into the next fiscal year and to provide a substantial margin for contingencies.

In the past, borrowing authority has normally been sought in one of the first appropriation acts of a new fiscal year. The long-established procedure was to attach a clause requesting new borrowing powers to supply bills brought before the House. However, as hon. members are aware, this procedure provided no opportunity to debate the authority being sought. In the past two years, following a recommendation by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization and agreement between the House leaders, one day was established for debate on this topic. Furthermore, it was agreed that the government would change the procedure for obtaining new borrowing authority. The government intends to introduce a bill soon providing a new procedure which will give ample opportunity for normal debate. In the meantime, there is need for an increase in the borrowing authority.

The size of the request for additional borrowing authority requires some explanation. Earlier this year, this House approved $7 billion of new borrowing authority. This amount was based on the $6.4 billion in cash requirements anticipated for the 1977-78 fiscal year. The cash requirements have now increased to $8.5 billion. Furthermore, the government has just announced a standby credit of $1.5 billion in the U.S.-Eurodollar market. Foreign loans, even of a standby nature, to replenish foreign exchange reserves are not part of the normal cash requirements. These loans are a charge on borrowing authority over and above the increased cash requirements announced for this fiscal year. The government also needs a large contingency amount to provide it with flexibility in planning next year's Canada Savings Bonds campaign. The increase in the borrowing authority will serve to cover our financial requirements well into the next fiscal year and will provide a cushion for contingencies.

It is essential to increase the borrowing authority as soon as possible. To date, we have raised approximately $4 billion in new money through the issue of marketable securities, and we have arranged a $1.5 billion U.S.-Eurodollar standby credit. This year's Canada Savings Bonds campaign is under way, and net sales of this series will also be charged against borrowing authority. As a part of the normal debt program, the government plans to raise some new money through November and December. As a result, the government is rapidly running out of borrowing authority. To meet current requirements, to provide for a margin to meet normal requirements for some months into the next fiscal year, and to provide for a large contingency, it is essential to increase borrowing authority in the amount of $9 billion.

Members of this House will appreciate the importance of this bill to a large segment of Canadian society. It is vital to avoid any unnecessary delay in proceeding with it. The implementing legislation for the tax changes in the budget of May 25, 1976, was not finally passed until late February of 1977. The delay caused very serious inconvenience and disruption for the thousands of taxpayers affected by those changes. I therefore urge members to consider the provisions of this bill, not hastily, for it is complex, but with dispatch. To a considerable extent, the economy depends on business confidence. Passage of the bill before us is extremely important in securing that confidence.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as we tackle these income tax bills following recent budgets, we witness a variety of practices which seem to change almost from budget to budget. We had a March budget and we were expecting to have an income tax bill, but right in the middle of the throne speech debate the minister came forward and presented a mini-budget. Then, following the adoption of the throne speech resolution, a ways and means motion was put down, as well as what I call a bootleg motion, to increase the borrowing authority of the government of Canada. It has been a good smuggling effort on the part of the government.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, there should have been an appropriation bill for that purpose; but no, this was done by means of an income tax amendment bill. I see nowhere in the bill the royal recommendation with regard to increasing borrowing authority. I shall look into this matter and I reserve the right to question the practice of the government in not complying with the requirement of the royal recommendation with regard to this increase in borrowing authority.

When one compares the ways and means motion with the one moved last March, one is struck by the attempt of the government to inject some sort of stimulus into the economy by means of a tax cut and in other ways, having seen that its budget proposals of March 31 had run into difficulties. I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) must have accumulated a file a couple of feet high, consisting of letters from supporters of the government as well as members of this House, protesting the proposal to tax as earned income payments made under insurance policies. That is to say, the minister was going to tax the earned surplus left after death benefits and premium contributions—

Mr. Chrétien: I have changed that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Since the insurance companies themselves have not written to the minister, I am wondering whether this is merely a shuffling of the beans, whether it is part of a bean game, as was the case before. The minister must have made calculations as to whether this would result in an increase in government revenue or in a diminution of government revenue.

The original proposal, which was to eliminate taxation, as such, of insurance companies, or a portion thereof, under part XV of the act, and to transfer the burden of taxation to the beneficiaries as their policies matured, resulted in better cash flow for the insurance companies. I agree that taxing the profits of insurance companies on a multinational basis might somehow result in double taxation in that the government of Canada taxes as earned income proceeds from foreign-held policies. But what puzzles me is: What has been the change in the burden of taxation on life insurance companies as between the companies and their policyholders? Since a large number of Canadian insurance companies are mutual companies, we are taking money out of the right pocket instead of the left pocket.

If corporate revenues are taxed more, this will mean there is less money available to be added to the value of policies in the hands of participating policyholders. The shareholders of mutual insurance companies receive no profits because they are themselves the policyholders. The beauty of the insurance industry is that they are Canadians. The former minister of finance recognized the sterility and illogicality of his move to tax as earned income proceeds from insurance policies, insurance being a means of saving, and belatedly, after receiving representations and he and I having discussed the matter in committee, he came in with a threshold figure. This eliminated a good deal of the incidence of taxation of beneficiaries under insurance policies. This proposal has now been dropped, except that if one reads the minister's proposals regarding taxation of insurance companies—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills. Then at six o'clock the House will take into consideration the adjournment motion.

• (1702)

It being five o'clock, we will proceed to private members' hour. The first order is No. 2, but I have been advised there was some understanding and agreement among members that, by unanimous consent, motions Nos. 2 to 9 would be stood, and the House would proceed with motion No. 10 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

[Translation]

Is the House ready, as suggested to the Chair, to defer the study of motions Nos. 2 to 9 and proceed immediately with motion No. 10 in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I have risen before on this subject. The rules of the House state that all items standing on the orders of the day shall be taken up according to precedent assigned to each order of the day. This is the second time in this session of parliament that motions have been called, and it is my understanding that if certain motions are to be stood, it is being done possibly in accordance with Standing Order 19(1).

However, I should like to draw to the attention of the Chair Standing Order 49(1), which states clearly that when a private member's notice of motion shall be called by the Chair twice and not proceeded with, it shall be dropped. This is the second time notices of motions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 have been called from the chair. I would request that the next time the motions are called, presumably next week, there be clarification from the Chair of the apparent discrepancy between Standing Order 19(1) and Standing Order 49(1), so that members will know whether we are to follow the order as it appears on the order paper or whether there is to be some other agreement of which we are not aware which would not enable us to prepare for a particular motion to be brought up at the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have noticed, of course, that the Chair took it upon itself to refer to unanimous consent that had been brought to the Chair's attention. Normally, I think this initiative should have come from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), his parliamentary secretary, or the Acting President of the Privy Council. These agreements are made between the parties, and I think the Chair should stay out of them.

Perhaps the hon. member is raising a valid point, in the sense that if House leaders cannot agree on organizing the work of the House, they should not expect the Chair to do the job for them. At the same time, the Chair would have no alternative, then, but to call the orders one by one. The hon. member will admit that when the notices of motions to which he has referred are called, they are stood at the request of the government. Thus, according to Standing Order 19, they retain their place.

At the same time, unanimous consent was given. If the hon. member does not wish to give unanimous consent at this time, my interpretation of the rules would be that these notices of motions would be considered as having been called once, and that the next time they are called, if not proceeded with they will disappear from the order paper unless there is a specific request from the government that they stand.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, that is correct. There is this specific request by the government to stand the other motions and keep them on the order paper until they are called again.

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I just want to point out that these items come up during private members' hour. Whether a notice of motion is called depends, really, on the wish of the member who has placed the notice on the order paper. It is not for the government to say whether a member should bring forward a notice of motion or a bill. What the government does in this case is facilitate arrangements, which private members have made. The procedure, really, is one of finding out whether members are prepared to proceed with their motions at any given point in time. The government facilitates that procedure.

What the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is trying to do is attack the role of private members to determine when the pieces of legislation they have proposed shall be brought before the House of Commons. While it may be something which irritates the hon. member, for many private members it is very important that they have some right to choose the time they want to bring forward a particular piece of legislation or a notice of motion. It would seem to me that any step by the Chair that forced members of parliament to bring their motions before the House when the Chair or the hon. member for Vaudreuil chose would indeed be a retrograde step.

All we really want to do is give members the opportunity to place their ideas before the House in the form of motions or private legislative items, allowing them to choose the time when those items should be brought forward. Let me point out to Your Honour that even though the orders of the day lists a whole series of things in numerical order, under government orders they are only brought forward when the government chooses to bring them forward after consultation. I would urge upon Your Honour to take into account the wishes of private members as a whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to rise on this particular point of order?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker, I wish to proceed with my motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to see the debate on the motion proceed. Therefore, I will be very brief. First, I should like to join in the view Your Honour expresses, namely, that motions 2, 3, 4 and 5 are really being called today for the first time in terms of the Standing Orders. When they were called previously, they were allowed to stand both at the request of the government and by unanimous consent. There is no problem there. Motions 7, 8 and 9 are, of course, being called for the first time on any account.

The point I want to make to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) has said, this involves a matter of convenience to hon. members and there should not be any objection by the hon. member for Vaudreuil unless somebody is abusing something, such as trying to squeeze somebody out of order or play some other kind of trick. In that case he should complain. However, if it is just a matter of convenience which has been agreed upon in advance, I think the hon. member should go along with it.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to be brief because I would like to see the debate proceed. I merely suggest that when the motions are brought forward again, presumably next week, Your Honour makes a ruling in relation to Standing Order 49(1).

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, now that the question has been raised in such a way that it calls or asks for a ruling by the Chair, I think it should be fully understood that Standing Order 49(1) and Standing Order 19(1) are not in contradiction. There is really no discrepancy between the two. They can both be followed at exactly the same time. Standing Order 19(1) takes into account the situation where there was not a request by the government to stand a motion when it was called. In that case, It is quite clear that when it has been called twice it should disappear from the order paper. Standing Order 19(1) provides, also, that when the government has in fact made a request that a motion be set aside, it shall not be taken up but shall retain its rightful position. I do not see any discrepancy between the Standing Orders.

It may be there is a problem in terms of the government formally making a request to allow a motion to stand and retain its rightful place. In my role as the acting government House leader—or some other acting House leader—perhaps there should be a formal request, so that we will all know exactly what position a motion is in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. As far as the Chair is concerned, there is not much difficulty in making a ruling on the request by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I think he would have great difficulty in making his position stand, unless he forgets Standing Order 19(1) which provides for the government's right to request that a private member's motion be stood.

I agree with the point raised by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) as to the validity of this procedure which facilitates the workings of the House particularly in private members' hour. It gives members a chance to be present and, at the same time, to prepare their interventions; and perhaps that facilitates the debate.

At the same time, the Chair has to abide by the Standing Order. It is not the responsibility of the Chair to beg the government, as it sometimes has to do, to agree to the motion being stood at the request of the government. This is the complaint of the Chair at this time and I take advantage of the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil to bring it to the attention of the government and the representative of the government.

The parliamentary secretary has already indicated that it is at the request of the government that motions Nos. 2 to 9 be stood, which is the right of the government. Therefore, I think we should proceed with motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF AGE OF COMPULSORY RETIREMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of enacting legislative proposals to raise the compulsory retirement age from 65 to 70 for any person aged 65 or more who does not so wish to retire and is prepared to give up his/her entitlements to any private pension plan or annuity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I hope no persons over the age of 65 have died in the interval and that we will not prejudice the purpose of this motion. Briefly, I do not claim that I am the first to speak on this matter; I know in the other place there is a motion or some procedure related to it.

I am sure all hon. members have received, at one time or another, correspondence from constituents objecting to mandatory retirement at the age of 65. Over the years we have seen a population growing older, but in better condition. There are many instances where we have been amazed at men and women aged 65 being put out to pasture compulsorily. Retirement at age 65 is a legend from the make work philosophy of the depression years that has continued too long as an anachronism.

We cannot afford to lose the expertise, the physical strength and the productive capabilities of men and women aged 65 or more who are able to carry on their employment. Population studies in this country indicate that there has been a drastic reduction in the number of Canadian children being born, and that before too long we will face a domestically generated manpower crisis within this country. In part, my motion will take steps to alleviate that danger and to best utilize the capabilities in this country on a voluntary basis.

My motion does not refer to forcing people to work beyond 65. It does not penalize them, if they work, from drawing old age security benefits for which they have contributed. It is agreed that old age security will start at age 65, but it is not at the support level; it is part of the income that a person 65 or more receives from a variety of sources. Much of the post-65 support comes from subsidized housing in senior citizens' homes, dental care programs, programs for glasses and programs for additional drugs. It varies for persons over 65. Persons over the age of 65 have guaranteed income supplements available to them, income from private pensions and from one source or another.

It would be a form of national lunacy if this country did not say to people aged 65 or more that they must retire from certain occupations. Compulsory retirement at age 65 is rigidly adhered to in the public service and in a number of industrial concerns. In fact, it is compulsory under the Canada Pension Plan. Also, under the unemployment insurance plan there are discouragements or deterrents to persons working over the age of 70 because they cannot be insured under that plan. I do not think that is the answer to the employment problem. What we have here is the question of utilizing the capabilities of Canadians who, having reached the age of 65, are still able and willing to contribute. They can make that decision.

I should like to refer hon. members to a bill recently passed in the House of Representatives in Washington. It has also been the subject of discussion in the United States Senate. I am referring to Bill HR-5383, to which reference is made in the Congressional Record of the House of Representatives under the date September 13, 1977. It is a piece of legislation amending a five-year old bill. It is entitled Age Discrimination and Employment Act Amendments, 1977. Earlier this year the House of Commons passed a bill on human rights indicating that there shall not be discrimination by reason of age, which I am afraid is observed more in the breach than in compliance with it. Compulsory retirement at the age of 65 is contained in the immigration regulations.

I should like to return to the United States legislation to which I referred a moment ago. There was some controversy about it and I cannot say that there was unanimity between the United States Senate and the House of Representatives.

It is not my purpose this afternoon to convince my colleagues that they should adopt the motion. This is the first time this subject has really hit the floor of the House for discussion. I want to initiate discussion among hon. members in order to examine this question in depth. It would be my hope that, rather than talking out this motion—which is the usual way—and having it go to the bottom of the list, our colleagues across the way on the government side would agree that at the adjournment time a motion be made that the subject matter of this motion and of related matters be referred to the appropriate House committee—it could be the committee on health and welfare—for public hearings and to receive representations.

I do not want to cram this idea down anyone's throat because I think it is a worthy idea but, on the other hand, there may be some points that organized labour might find difficult to accept with regard to this type of legislation. There might be difficulties from an industrial point of view, or from those organizations which provide pension plans. But, if I may say so, if it can be done in the United States, I think it can be done here in Canada. Let us consider the following:

The ADEA of 1967 was designed to promote employment of older persons based on their ability to perform in the job rather than on age and to prohibit arbitrary age discrimination in employment. The current act extends coverage to individuals who are at least 40 years of age but less than 65. The upper age limit of 65 was selected because it was a customary retirement age—

I would say it is one that grew out of a depression mentality.

—and the age at which many public and private pension benefits became payable rather than by any scientific objective standard. In 1974, protection to state, local and federal employees was added.

I am citing the proposer of the bill, Congressman Hawkins, who said the following:

Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has come to amend the age discrimination in employment act to take the essential first step toward eliminating mandatory retirement on the basis of age and to clarify the exemption for bona fide retirement and pension plans in the current law.

During the ninety-fifth congress several of my colleagues authored legislation which I co-sponsored, in an effort to accomplish this goal. The legislation before us today is a culmination of those efforts.

As a result of studies by the subcommittee on employment opportunities and the committee on education and labour, an effort has been made to eliminate age as the sole criteria for hiring, firing, promotion or involuntary retirement. The congressman went on to say:

The major provisions included in H. R. 5383 are:

First, the upper age limit protected under the act for non-federal employees is extended from the current level of 65 years of age to 70 years of age 180 days after enactment.

Second, the upper age protection for federal employees is lifted entirely; and Third, the exemption for bona fide retirement and pension plans under current law is clarified to prohibit involuntary retirement at an age less than the protected age under the act.

I do not want to go into further detail, because of the time requirement and because I think a number of my colleagues will want to speak on this matter.

Briefly, and in résumé, my proposal is that the question of mandatory retirement at age 65 be the subject matter of inquiry by the appropriate committee of the House, with a view to lifting that mandatory age completely as being, first of all, not in the national interest with regard to utilization of the capabilities of Canadian residents and, secondly, that it is, in effect, an abuse and an offence, at least in spirit, of our human rights' legislation both at the federal level and the provincial level. We can provide examples to show that there is no mandatory retirement age in the House of Commons unless one is defeated. A number of members very effectively carry out their duties and they are over the age of 65.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Why should John Smith, working in the public service of Canada, the public service of Ontario or the city of Ottawa, be told that at the age of 65 he must stop work, but his brother, Adam Smith, a member of the House of Commons, may continue and render good service? There is discrimination between those two persons, and it seems to me that now is the convenient time to initiate studies by members of the House, either in a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs or in the committee itself, and investigate this matter. It might consult public bodies with regard to the question and report back to the House. In essence, the government could consider those as proposals which would do away with mandatory retirement age at 65.

Mind you, anybody who wishes to retire under a private or public plan at age 65 should not have to suffer any penalty. Such a person should be able to exercise his or her right; and if there are entitlements to retirement at the age of 60, then, of course, actuarial and financial provisions should be made for that. However, what I am saying is that we should eliminate mandatory retirement at age 65.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is to be commended for focusing the attention of the House on the sometimes precarious situation facing the ever-expanding number of Canadians now in their 60s who, because of the dramatic life-saving advances in medicine and technology in recent years, can look forward with confidence to a considerably longer lifespan than previous generations could anticipate.

I am not talking just of a longer life, but also of a healthier and potentially more productive one. I had a good example of this in the last few days in my constituency office. A gentleman came to see me. He had been in touch with me in the past, and had retired at the age of 66 from the Canadian forces base at Lowther, near Kapuskasing, where he had been granted an optional extra year because there was no one else to take his place. But now this year, when he is 66 and they have someone else to fill his job, he is obliged to leave. Of course, this is very sad, particularly because this individual happens to be a very young 66; he is vigorous and capable and has a great deal to offer.

It can be a very tough problem. Of course there are other arguments, and I know this as do other hon. members, that mitigate against keeping people for a long time.

In view of the furor south of the border which Time magazine calls "the revolt of the old", I am not surprised to hear motions similar to that moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West. What is disappointing in the motion is the assumption that the Government of Canada has imposed a universal, compulsory retirement age of 65 in legislation. Let me read a portion of the motion, as follows:

—the government should consider the advisability of enacting legislative proposals to raise the compulsory retirement age from 65 . . .

I want to emphasize that the federal government has never enacted legislation to force all active, able-bodied Canadians to leave the work force at age 65. Dr. Selye, who is a world authority on the body's physiological response to stress, and who is a Companion of the Order of Canada, has made some very pertinent observations on retirement on the basis of 40 years of observation. He has remarked:

. . . for many older people, the most difficult aspect of retirement to bear is the feeling of being useless . . . The continuous leisure of enforced retirement is certainly not an attractive way of life.

To suggest that Canadian statutes currently impose mandatory retirement on each and every citizen who reaches 65 years of age is simply incorrect. If such were in fact the case, the courts of this country would be overflowing with the estimated 188,000 Canadian men and women, 65 or older who, according to Statistics Canada, were employed in September, 1977. In fact during that same month the participation rate for Canadian men aged 65 to 69 years of age, that is, the labour force in that group expressed as a percentage of the population for that group, was estimated to be 26.7 per cent. I said earlier that 188,000 Canadians 65 years of age and over were calculated to have been employed in the labour force in September, 1977. This figure can be classified further into two additional groups. Of these estimated 188,000 workers, 124,000 were 65 to 69 years of age, and 64,000 were 70 years of age and over.

If the motion of the member for Edmonton West were to be taken literally, these 64,000 Canadians would be tossed from their positions and legally forced to remove their experience and expertise from the labour market. Sixty-four thousand Canadians would find themselves ostracized from the work force simply because they were 70 and not 69. I do not think any member can honestly expect this or any government to take this kind of step. I do not think the hon. member for Edmonton West intended that such steps be taken; in fact I am sure it was not his intention.

Many of civilization's most significant contributions in the diverse fields of science, art, music, literature, law, philosophy, even in the realm of politics, were made by men and women who were leading productive lives long after age 70. Illustrious names such as Einstein, Galileo, Michelangelo, Goya, Picasso, Verdi, Voltaire, Socrates, Plato, Kant, Confucius, Queen Victoria, and Winston Churchill form a far from totally inclusive list. In fact hon. members need search no further than the confines of this Chamber to appreciate that the ability to make important contributions to society does not cease automatically once a person celebrates a birthday. We cannot afford callously to toss aside the resources, the rich vein of experience, knowledge and expertise to be mined from the most senior strata of our population.

Certainly we could not contest the assertion that, for some Canadians, to work beyond 65 years of age is the healthiest thing they can do not only for their own well-being, but also for the social and economic health of this nation. But is that the case for all Canadians? Do we all want to spend the twilight years of our lives toiling on a production line, drilling in a mine, or sitting behind a desk? I think not. After all, for many Canadians retirement is the culmination of a fruitful career, a fulfilling segment of life when time-consuming interests can be pursued. For others, it means simply that they can take a long awaited rest from their labours, in relative financial security. If it were ever possible for the Government of Canada to enact legislation such as the hon. member for Edmonton West has proposed, I fear it could well prove to be to the detriment of the needs and dreams of a vast segment of our population.

In this regard, I can appreciate that considerable attention of late has been focused on the United States' movement to enact such legislation. However, while it may be commendable to clamber aboard the United State's bandwagon on many issues, it is not clear that it would be appropriate in this case. The Canadian government has a limited mandate in this social area. I think that is the nub of the problem.

Much of the constitutional authority on the subject of pensions rests with the provinces. Hon. members will recall that the enactment of, first, the Old Age Security Act, and later the Canada Pension Plan, necessitated amendments to the British North America Act to grant the federal government sufficient constitutional authority to proceed with the establishment of these programs. In the field of private pension plans the federal government has jurisdiction over only the limited number covering certain types of federally-regulated employment. The majority of private pension plans in Canada fall under provincial jurisdiction.

I am quite concerned that Canadians might be led to believe that the federal government has somehow instituted a compulsory retirement age through our two national pension schemes. What must be underlined is that neither the Canada Pension Plan nor the old age security program imposes a compulsory retirement age on Canadians. The limits which both these programs contain are simply provisions setting a minimum age of 65 for receipt of retirement pensions. That point is clearly made by the hon. member for Edmonton West. I appreciate that.

Here, perhaps, is the root of the confusion. The government plans allow payment of benefits as early as age 65. For a variety of reasons, employers across the country have followed the pattern and instituted normal retirement ages of 65 for purposes of their pension plans as well. I should like to stress the word "normal" because many, perhaps even a majority of Canadian pension plans contain provisions which explicitly permit the deferment of a member's retirement date. In other words, even in the private sector the mechanism is flexible enough that retirement at age 65 is not a hard and fast rule. Of course it cannot be ignored that the private pension plan can be used as a rationale for retiring employees at 65. However, it should also be remembered that, for most private plans, the pension contract is subject to collective bargaining. Thus, employee representatives must share the responsibility for establishing a retirement date in these cases.

I have stated that both the Canada Pension Plan and the old age security program provide for the payment of benefits when the applicant reaches age 65. This was not, of course, always the case. Many members will remember that the decision to reduce to 65 the age for payment of these benefits received widespread acclaim. Also, it was not so very long ago when the Canada Pension Plan applied retirement and earnings tests to Canadians between the ages of 65 and 69 who were in receipt of retirement pensions. Under these tests, a Canadian who continued to work beyond age 65, for example, could not receive any benefits, while even those who had retired were subject to a test reducing their Canada Pension Plan retirement pension by half of all earned income on a specified salary band.

The rationale for these tests was the idea that a Canada Pension Plan retirement pension should be paid only to those who were truly retired. Parallels were drawn with the private pension field, where there is an implicit retirement requirement in the sense that an individual cannot be in receipt of a retirement pension from his employer's pension plan and simultaneously work for the same employer. Thus, at the time the plan was being designed it was decided to provide a pension on retirement rather than an annuity payable automatically at a prescribed age, such as the old age security benefit. The retirement pension was intended to provide a partial replacement of earnings lost due to retirement.

● (1742)

However, as time went on the rationale underlying the retirement and earnings tests was continually questioned and criticized. After all, why should an individual's retirement pension be reduced as a result of earnings received after retirement when the Canada Pension Plan retirement benefit is, in fact, an earned pension paid entirely from the contributions of Canadian workers and their employers? Clearly, the earnings test served as a deterrent even to part-time employment. It was argued that the decision on whether or not to remain in employment or to seek work after retirement ought to be the free choice of the individual, rather than being curtailed through artificial mechanisms such as retirement and earnings tests. For these reasons the retirement and earnings tests were removed under the authority of Chapter 4 of the Statutes of Canada for 1974-75.

Now a contributor can draw his Canada Pension Plan benefit at age 65 even if he continues to work. Moreover, he can decide not to draw his retirement pension at that age but continue to contribute for additional years, up to age 70, in order to increase the size of his benefit.

Clearly, then, while relaxing the conditions facing the Canada Pension Plan pensioners who choose to work, the amendment to the Canada Pension Plan did not in any way impose a mandatory retirement age of 65 on the Canadian public. On the contrary, by removing financial penalties it served to encourage those aged 65 to 69 to remain in the active work force. I might add parenthetically that only this year the Quebec Pension Plan followed the example of the Canada Pension Plan with respect to the earnings and retirement tests.

What about the old age security program? Universal old age security pensions began in January, 1952, and provided a universal benefit to every person in Canada aged 70 or over who met the residence requirements. Whether or not the person was employed did not enter the picture then, nor does it now.

Over the years successive amendments to the legislation have increased the level of benefits, lowered the age of eligibility, and relaxed the residence requirements. The Canada Pension Plan which, as we all know, went into operation in January of 1966, provided an additional earnings related retirement pension for all who contributed. When the Canada Pension Plan was passed, amendments were made to lower the pension age under the Old Age Security Act as well as the Canada Pension Plan. It was reduced one year at a time—and we all know that story—until finally, in 1970, the pensionable age under the old age security program had been lowered to 65 years. However, even with the lowered pensionable age an individual need not cease working to receive old age security benefits. This does not enter into the determination of his eligibility.

For these reasons it would be utterly incorrect to imply that the Canada Pension Plan or the old age security program compel Canadian men and women to quit the work force when they are willing to continue working. On the contrary, these two government-administered programs give concrete financial support to those Canadians who exercise their right to work.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

It cannot be denied that, for some, Benjamin Franklin's famous aphorism, "There is nothing wrong with retirement as long as one doesn't allow it to interfere with one's work", is fraught with truth.

Let me expound for a moment on the long-term implications of various retirement trends that are predicted to spread across this country. It has become clear that there are problems associated with early retirement. It does not take a mathematical wizard to reach the conclusion that the younger the age at retirement—and hence the longer the expectation of life thereafter—the more severe is the impact of inflation. Too many pensioners have discovered too late that they retired too early. The adverse effect of early retirement in an inflationary environment can destroy a life-time dream of a leisurely and rewarding retirement. It is for this reason that the Canada Pension Plan and old age security benefits are indexed to the cost of living.

In addition, if the predilection for an even lower retirement age gains widespread popularity, some experts foresee fiscal difficulties for the next generation of Canadians as the tidal wave of the so-called baby boom causes a flood of people to reach pensionable age at the same time. Within the lifetime of those Canadians the ratio of pensioners will double. This may result in a reversal of the current trend toward early retirement. However, there is no reason to expect that we will ever have to force people to work to a minimum age or force them to retire at some maximum age.

Hon. members must not lose sight of the fact that retirement itself is a social institution. When presented with a motion such as the one we have before us today we must first question the validity of a full cessation of work as a desirable end in itself. Even if it were within the constitutional realm of this House to do so, I cannot help but ponder aloud whether, as elected representatives of the people of this nation, we could in all good faith seek to impose legally such constraints upon the work force.

Secondly, we must weigh very carefully the import of giving any serious consideration to a proposal which could be construed as endorsing age 70 as an appropriate, normal retirement age. We must not inflict the hardship of prolonged working careers upon those Canadians who, quite rightly, feel that at age 65 they have contributed their just share to the well-being of our country and who wish to be free to spend their remaining days as their own masters.

Ideally one's later years will be years of self-realization, creativity, stimulation, development, growth and self-respect. A motion such as the one we have before us today will bring us no closer to assisting Canadians to attain this objective. It might, however, impede us and them.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for raising the matter of retirement in this House. I should point out to the hon. member that I will stop shortly before six o'clock in order to give this House an opportunity to refer this matter to a committee. I do not want to be the one to talk it out.

I disagree with the position taken by the hon. member for Edmonton West; not that I always have or always will. In the past I think I would have been very sympathetic to the proposal he put before us today, and I think that perhaps at some time in the future I might be. For the moment, however, I see our problem in a different light.

I suspect that we are going into a society which, despite the best efforts of governments to improve the situation in terms of employment—a great deal of improvement can take place at this time—there are not going to be enough good jobs to go around. This is true not just in Canada; it is true in the western world. We are facing a phenomenon in which, despite the growth of western economies, and despite the large number of highly educated people coming out of our school systems, the number of good jobs is becoming smaller and smaller.

We have a choice. We can keep those who are holding the good jobs in those good jobs longer, while we keep young people in school for a longer period of time or pay them unemployment insurance or give them jobs inadequate to their talent, or we can recognize what is happening to our civilization and try to do something about it.

In my experience, there seem to be two kinds of people working past the age of 65 or, for that matter, past the age of 60. There are those like ourselves, judges, executives and self-employed professionals who have very good jobs. They like their jobs. Their jobs are their hobbies, their entertainment. Their jobs are everything to them. They live and breathe their jobs. That is fine, because they are very exciting jobs to have. There are many problems associated with them, there is insecurity perhaps, but nevertheless they are exciting jobs, and these people are very reluctant to give up those good jobs regardless of their age. It is quite true that many people in these good jobs can function extremely well, well past the age of 65. Perhaps they can function even better after the age of 65.

However, there is another very large group of people who are working past the age of 65, not because they want to work and not because they have good jobs but simply because our pension schemes are inadequate, and they have to work.

● (1752)

When I go to my constituency, and I am sure this is the experience of other members, it is seldom that someone comes to me and says that we must raise the age of retirement to 70 or 75 because that person does not want to stop work. What I do get is people saying that it does not make much sense for them to slug it out in a factory until they are 65 when there are almost one million unemployed, half of them young people, who would like to work. "Why is there not a pension arrangement whereby people like myself could retire at age 63, 62 or 61? It would open up these jobs for younger people who want them," they say, rather than having them live through a kind of debilitating unemployment. Some young people face almost a permanent state of unemployment as a result of what is happening in our society.

I say to the hon. member for Edmonton West, and I say it critically, that his sentiments do him justice. However, in light of what is happening in our society, is this the appropriate time to do it?

The question being put to this House to consider is important and should be debated. I hope the consequence of the debate will not be to raise the age of retirement. Rather, I hope it will be to increase the pension arrangement for people who want to retire because there are more of them than those who want to hang on to their jobs.

I know people who want to hang on to their jobs. They are the ones who have it made. They have seniority. They have mastered their work so they can almost do it with one hand tied behind their backs. They like the social benefits, the emoluments that come with the job. Because they are senior people they are looked up to, and they command a fair amount of respect. However, that is hardly a job.

However, the auto worker in a factory, slugging it out day after day tightening a nut, can hardly wait to retire at age 50. The same is true of the coke-oven worker, the miner, or the person operating a sewing machine. Those are difficult grinding jobs, as are most jobs in this world.

To advance a proposal that is really attractive to a minute section of our population under the guise of civil liberties or the freedom or right of the individual to do as he pleases, while our society has a serious social problem and economic dislocation, is not the correct way of going about it. If this House wants to do something about correcting a grave inequity in our society, it should lower the age of retirement for women to 60.

An hon. Member: Men also.

Mr. Saltsman: Men later. Women's lib will not like it because in this area they have done a terrible disservice to the women of this country. Unfortunately, women have had some of the most rotten, lowest paying jobs. They are ready for retirement at 60. I guess we dare not talk about that because if men are not ready to retire at 60, then women should not retire at 60.

If the public were ever asked to give its opinion on this, I think it would be found that lowering the age of retirement to 60 for women, and for men progressively later, would be very much what people want. Certainly it would be good for our economy.

We really have one of three choices. We can go on having people work past the stage where they really want to work. That is what most people are doing. Most people work not because they are crazy about their jobs but because they cannot afford to quit. Our pension provisions are not adequate. If a working man wants to quit and his wife is not in receipt of the old age pension, even with the kind of supplementary arrangements that exist, it is still not sufficient.

Mrs. Pigott: Some of you men are old at 35.

Mr. Saltsman: Of course some men are old at 35, and some people are as young as the hon. lady at 27. One of the difficulties with an argument of this type is that if you talk about society generally, making over-all rules, you are bound to find examples of injustice in a particular case.

Somebody might say that if we had forced Einstein to retire at 65 or Madam Curie at 60, it would have been a terrible thing. Even if they had been forced to retire, their brains would not have retired. They would have kept on working. Therefore it is not much of an argument.

There is a great deal more I should like to say, but time is running out. I say to the hon. member for Edmonton West, through you, Mr. Speaker, that the motion is important and worthy. It should go to committee and it should get an opinion from the House. Therefore, I will resume my seat. I sincerely hope it will not be talked out but will find its way to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for having finally understood that for a long—may I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: It is not six o'clock yet.

Mr. Allard: There are only a few minutes left. I would like to congratulate the hon. member and others for having finally realized that for a long time we have been asking for such legislation to lower the pension eligibility age to 60. We do not want to make this compulsory, but we would like the worker who wishes to retire after many years of work to be able to do so. Of course, since these people have started working hard when they were 12 or 15, like the member of the New Democratic Party said earlier, when they reach 60 they have contributed at least 40 years of hard work to society, earning barely sufficient wages and trying to raise their families in spite of their hardships. Therefore, it would be quite natural for those people to take it easy finally and to be able to retire at 60.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) said that women should be able to retire at 60, and I agree, but why should we discriminate? Men have the same needs as women and they should also be eligible for retirement at 60.

As I said earlier, for many years, we of the Social Credit Party have been asking that the pension eligibility age be lowered to 60 and that the amount of pensions be substantially increased. After a hard struggle, we have finally obtained that the basic old age pension be increased to $150 or $149, I believe. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion we can never do too much for those people who have worked hard for many years, and I very humbly submit that the pension eligibility age should be lowered to 60 on an optional basis, that is the individual concerned should be able to decide. If he wants or needs to keep on working, he should be able to do so. Sometimes it may not be through love of work but because he has obligations. There are many people of 60 who still have children in school and they cannot afford to retire. This is why it should be up to the worker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The private members' hour has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I find this a little difficult, and I suppose there is this difficulty any time one has something to which hon. members would like to contribute and on which we would like a general disposition. However, private members' hour lost 15 minutes on what I considered a rather sterile debate on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has to apply the rule. One hour is allocated for private members' business and it has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PERFORMING ARTS—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY ON FEATURE FILMS—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I questioned the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) with respect to when we might expect a new film policy which would deal effectively with the difficulties which have been encountered for many years in terms of ensuring an adequate distribution system for Canadian films as well as a reasonable return for Canadian producers. I must say the minister's answer to my question the other day was not an encouraging one.

It was 12 years ago, on April 5, that we read in the Speech from the Throne:

> You will be asked to consider . . . a measure to help the development of a feature film industry in Canada.

Since that time, with the exception of the formation of the Canadian Feature Film Production Corporation, which took place in 1967-68, there has been no reason to be over-confident with regard to the amount of support that the Canadian government has given to the development of this new industry. I want to be fair and recognize that the establishment of the Feature Film Development Corporation was a major initiative and that, without it, I doubt whether we would have seen the kind of film production which has taken place—I have in mind particularly the period immediately after its formation. But as I said at the time, and as I have been saying since, over the past decade, just having a government agency which assists in some way in the production of scripts and the provision of a certain amount of capital will not ensure the establishment of a nationally-developed feature film industry.

After almost ten years of the existence of the CFDC, the production of some 200 Canadian films, and the expenditure of about $20 million in public funds, we are faced with the fact that roughly 96 per cent of screen time in this country is dominated by foreign films. This means, of course, a much higher percentage in English-speaking Canada, probably closer to 98 per cent; the figure is less in French-speaking Canada. Around $250 million is spent by Canadians annually to see feature films and a large part of that sum is, of course, exported to the United States—something like $63 million in profits.

At the time the CFDC was set up, Canada was the sixth largest market for American productions, but since that time we have risen to become the largest foreign market for Hollywood. That is a depressing comment on the state of our own feature film industry. Last year the two major television networks, CBC and CTV, showed a certain number of Canadian films. The publicly-owned network, the CBC, showed four, and CTV showed five. For those who wish to argue that the private network is assuming a greater responsibility toward Canadian production than the public network, it is time to wave a flag. It is certainly a sorry statistic, a sorry admission for the CBC that it took so little responsibility with respect to the Canadian feature film industry.

In a recent article in the magazine Canadian Forum, Sandra Gathercole of the Council of Canadian Film Makers, writes:

> The central fact of film production in Canada is that it is disconnected from its own market, and does not benefit from the enormous revenues generated by that market.

No less than 93 per cent of film rentals in Canada flow to seven American distributors, representing an annual outflow across the border of around $63 million. Think of the number of lost jobs, the loss of income to the Canadian economy, let alone the tremendous loss of opportunity for cultural communication.

● (1807)

As a matter of fact, American films have had for many decades a guaranteed access to Canadian screens through the two principal chains, Odeon and Famous Players, a functional quota vastly more effective than the weak voluntary arrangement worked out for Canadian films. In a television production, I think last year, called "The Great Canadian Culture Hunt", George Destounis, the president of Famous Players, made this comment:

> It's been an historical fact that ... major distributors align themselves with either one circuit or the other. People like Paramount, Warners and United Artists will play one hundred per cent Famous, and people like Columbia, and two thirds Universal, and one third Fox would play Odeon ... It was agreed, I understand, (in the) early forties how the breakdown (worked) when Odeon was first formed.

If there is one area where there seems to be almost total control of the Canadian cultural system by foreign producers and foreign companies, it surcly must be in the Canadian feature film industry. Indeed the CFDC, in its annual report published recently, acknowledged as much concerning the supposedly voluntary quota, which was vaunted by the previous secretary of state, for showing four weeks of Canadian films at regular theatres and one week at drive-ins. Neither Famous Players nor Odeon came even close to meeting their commitment. In the case of Odeon, less than 30 per cent either exceeded or even met the quota. In the case of Famous Players it was a bit better; the percentage was something like 42 per cent. Some 48 per cent of Famous Players theatres met less than one half the quota and 53 per cent of Odeon met less than one half the quota.

I think this is an indication that we are in a situation, to quote Sandra Gathercole again, where voluntary agreements have been about as successful as voluntary income tax. If we need a reminder from one of the ministers responsible for this matter, the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), speaking to the CAB last year, said that unless we take direct action to enhance the production capability of Canadian broadcasters, Canadian broadcasting will also go the way of The Saturday Evening Post.

I think we have a major dilemma on our hands, Mr. Speaker. It is not enough for the Secretary of State to say that he hopes to have an answer by the end of the year. Surely the whole question of culture and communication is basic to our sense of identity and our national unity. If the Secretary of State is genuinely concerned, as he seemed to suggest the other day in answer to me, surely we should have a more concrete and effective answer from the government than the one I have received to date.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, once again I should like on behalf of the minister to indicate our thanks to the hon. member for raising an issue which does not receive that much light in the House. As the hon. member has said, the minister agreed with the hon. member that questions of distribution are indeed the key to a resolution of the problems the industry is facing. He indicated as well that the government is now considering proposals concerning which it hoped to make an announcement before the end of the year.

That the hon. member would argue that this in fact is not a sufficient response is indeed a bit of a puzzle, Mr. Speaker, unless one is to argue that what the hon. member is saying is that the end of the year is not soon enough, that he wants something sooner, say today, or even yesterday. As I say, the minister is in fact committing himself to some kind of statement before the end of the year.

I stress the government's commitment to assist in whatever way it can the development of a Canadian film industry. I stress this general commitment because, in trying to resolve the many complex problems that arise in the film industry, the over-all objective is often forgotten, namely, the encouragement of the production of Canadian films because they are an important means of cultural expression that can teach Canadians about themselves.

Without in any way limiting the access of Canadians to foreign films, we need also, and should have, films that are produced by Canadians which reflect the Canadian experience. The government finances feature film production directly through the Canadian Film Development Corporation and indirectly through the 100 per cent capital cost allowance, which encourages Canadian taxpayers to invest in Canadian films. In the 38 Canadian productions certified for 100 per cent capital allowance to date, 88 per cent of the key creative positions were filled by Canadians. Further, only individuals and corporations paying Canadian taxes can benefit from this incentive, and these people, to become eligible for the 100 per cent capital cost allowance, assume ownership and control of the film.

I am glad that the hon. member acknowledged the government's incentive in regard to the feature film industry and the feature film development corporation. He indicated that the government has responded in some manner; but it is unfortunate he feels that it has not been a reasonable response together with the government's movement toward a film policy.

There is no doubt that this incentive is encouraging the production of films which are financed and created by Canadians. In the area of distribution, the situation is far more serious. As the hon. member has stated, the major distribution and exhibition companies in this country are foreign-owned, and the profits they earn in Canada are not usually reinvested in ways that benefit our film industry. As the minister indicated to the hon. member at an earlier date, this is a situation which greatly concerns the government. The government is considering proposals to deal with this situation and hopes it will be in a position to make an announcement before the end of the year.

FINANCE—EFFECT ON JOBS OF TAX INCENTIVES TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, on October 25 I raised a question with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) concerning the income tax policy and job creation in industry. I should like to deal with that matter in more detail today, because I believe the minister did not answer my question fully enough.

I referred to the example of Northern Telecom, which is a subsidiary of Bell Canada. Under the budget announced last March, and subsequently introduced by the Minister of Finance under the general framework of the $1.2 billion in corporate tax concession to create jobs, Northern Telecom would receive approximately $3 million. At the same time as it is receiving this benefit, it has announced that it is laying off over 1,000 workers, mainly in Ontario and Quebec. Also I should like to draw to the minister's attention that Northern Telecom is not an isolated incident.

[Mr. Daudlin.]

The Alcan Company of Canada, under the same tax provisions, will receive an $11 million tax break. That company has announced already that it has laid off 400 workers in Newfoundland in favour of expanding an operation in Mexico. Of course the House is aware that INCO has received $10 million in tax concessions under this provision, and it has announced laying off over 3,500 workers while it expands its operations in Indonesia and Guatemala. The Noranda Company will receive approximately $5 million under tax concessions in the budget, and it has already laid off 400 employees, and the future of some 1,700 employees in the Gaspé region is in doubt.

The corporate tax incentives announced in the budget for the purpose of expansion in industry, thereby creating jobs, are not working. The minister had better come clean and admit this in order that $1.2 billion will not be wasted in concessions to large corporations when they are not fulfilling the intended purpose of those concessions, namely, to create jobs.

Why should any businessman in his right mind use these incentives at this time to expand his operation when, even with these incentives, he realizes that industry in this country is working only at approximately an 80 per cent capacity? Because demand is down, business cannot sell its total potential of goods produced. Therefore any kind of incentive along this line at this time, when demand is so low, will be ineffective.

The statistics bear me out on that. Since the announcement of these concessions, in manufacturing alone we have had over 34,000 lay-offs despite the so-called incentives which were to create and produce new jobs. These particular incentives are the wrong ones at the wrong time. That kind of money could be better spent in this economy.

I know the minister has advanced the argument that if we did not give this $1.2 billion to the corporations, the lay-offs could have been worse. We were not told this when the budget was first introduced. We were told that these incentives were necessary for expansion and new job creation, not to prevent the situation from getting worse. Also, it is very easy to make that kind of argument, that if we do not give these incentives, unemployment will be worse. I would like to know, if companies are claiming that, where is the guarantee on the part of the government that if it gives these kinds of tax breaks some condition must be attached to them?

If we are going to deprive the public Treasury of $1.2 billion in corporate taxes, some conditions should be attached to that kind of tax break. The minister has said that there is no scrutiny of the various industries to see that they are fulfilling the requirements or the promises that the minister announced in his budget.

The largest 1,000 corporations in this country have had more tax concessions than any other sector in our economy. I think immediately of the fact that they have been able to defer paying $9 billion in corporate income tax. That is like a $9 billion interest free loan. That, and the recent announcements in the budget, are the wrong kinds of programs in terms of what we need for job creation. The result of all these kinds of tax breaks and concessions has been more lay-offs, more expansion by the multinationals outside of Canada, and the highest unemployment we have had since the depression.

I would argue that it would be far better to take that $1.2 billion and redirect it, in terms of personal income tax cuts to stimulate demand by low and middle income Canadians, and some of that largesse should go to small businesses which are starved for capital, which still employ 60 per cent of the people in this country, and which for far too long have been ignored by the Liberal government whenever it gives tax breaks to stimulate employment.

I am asking the minister will he please explain to me how this kind of program makes sense when all the statistics indicate we are getting lay-offs instead of job creation.

Mr. Ed Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my minister replied to the hon. member on October 25, and again today during the question period, it is almost impossible to determine the long term benefits of any tax incentives by isolating one specific period of time. If the hon. member looked at past history he would recognize that the growth of jobs, which is the real solution to solving unemployment, has been the growth of employment in the private sector. If our private sector is to be competitive with its international competitors, tax incentives of this nature are imperative.

The hon. member talks about the capacity in the private sector here in Canada today. He must also consider that some of these incentives are not just to solve that situation but also for the modernization of equipment, again to maintain international competitiveness.

The extension of the investment tax credit proposed in the March 31 budget was one of a number of incentives announced at that time to stimulate business expansion and regional growth, to assist small business, and to encourage research and development. The beneficial impacts of such measures naturally take a little while to be fully felt. When they are, they will have a positive effect on economic growth and thereby on job creation. These measures, and the additional measures announced on October 20 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in his economic and fiscal statement, are necessary to overcome Canada's short term economic difficulties and to set the stage for sustained growth in the private sector.

The government therefore attaches a high priority to the passage of legislation to implement the various measures—including the corporate tax incentives—so that their impact on the economy will not be any longer delayed than is absolutely necessary. These measures are necessary to restore business confidence, to maintain Canada's competitive position and to get the economy moving—in short, to get on with the job of providing jobs.

The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) indicated that we should be putting more emphasis on small business. If he looks at specific details of the economic measures announced by the Minister of Finance on October 20, and by his predecessor on March 31, he will see there are many stimuli to provide incentives for small business to expand.

GRAIN—WHEAT—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN UTILITY GRADES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to debate a problem which affects my constituents and a good number of the wheat producers in the west. It is a recurrent problem that has come with the rain we have had, particularly in the northern prairies. Last week, in reply to my question, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) gave a crop and weather report but did not shed much light on this problem, perhaps due to its technical nature.

● (1822)

The problem of low grades of wheat and their eventual disposal is an economic and recurring one in western Canada, particularly in wet seasons which seem to occur every three or four years. The old grading system which was changed a few years ago had more grades of grain, and therefore when wheat was weathered and damaged it was easier to fit it into a fairer grade in order to give the producer a better return for what he actually produced. The introduction of the new grading system for hard red spring wheat has created problems at the lower end of the scale. I think perhaps the grading system is satisfactory at the top end of the scale. By and large the top three grades seem to be accepted with a differential of something like ten cents a bushel each between No. 1 Canada Red Spring and No. 2 and No. 3. However, there is a 50 cents differential per bushel between No. 3 Canadian Red Spring wheat and No. 3 utility which gives cause for great complaints and grumblings and, furthermore, it is extremely damaging to the growers who live in the Parkland areas. I believe that the present grading of wheat is really designed for the hard spring wheat areas of the southern prairies, mainly in Saskatchewan, and that the Wheat Board and the Grain Commission have not dealt fairly with this problem in the Parkland areas of the northern prairies which, in years such as this, have an abnormally large amount of low grade wheat.

To show the wide range of grading, for instance, an hon. member showed me two samples that a constituent had sent to him, one of which is very good looking wheat that weighed 61 pounds to the bushel. The other was a very poor sample weighing 38 pounds to the bushel. Both were graded No. 3 utility and the producer will receive payment for this grade. Considering the vast difference in quality between the two samples, it is obvious that the grading system is a mess. I believe that part of the problem is due, at least in practice, to the workings of the Board of Grain Commissioners whereby wheat with hardly any damage at all is relegated to this No. 3 utility grade.

I must suspect that the Canadian Wheat Board and the grain handling companies are not all that unsympathetic to this arrangement. In times of surplus of wheat, all of this No. 3 utility will likely move into feed channels. But there are certainly occasions, and I think this year is one of them, where as much as 50 million to 100 million bushels of wheat might move into the milling trade, particularly if world supplies of wheat become low. Although the world wheat surplus is quite large, recent market reports indicate that the Russians are now in the market for larger quantities of wheat than was anticipated and that the price of wheat has risen about 50 cents per bushel in the past month or so. Whether they would be interested in this low grade wheat we have produced on the prairies this year I am not sure, but any large cut in the American surplus would allow our wheat to fill markets around the world. The American grain trade may well bring that country much higher wheat prices because of the coup of the Canadian Wheat Board last fall in selling most of its wheat at very low prices. Prices in the Chicago exchange are more than 50 per cent over what they were last fall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this problem is not a partisan one. It affects to a varying degree, all farmers, regardless of their party, on occasion, and should be explored. Surely more effort might work out a more reasonable solution such as the possibility of introducing a grade between No. 3 utility and No. 3 CRSW. If it is in the interests of the economy of handling, that a large amount of wheat is relegated to one grade with widely varying qualities and values, then we should very carefully consider whether or not some adjustments should be made in this area. I would hope that the minister would look at the problem and have his experts carefully study the situation. It is certainly to our national advantage to develop the best possible system of identifying the varying qualities of our wheat, while at the same time bearing in mind the economics of selling, handling and moving this wheat. I believe that the problem has been looked at before and that results have been inconclusive. I understand also that some government machinery may be in motion to look at the situation.

I have entered this adjournment debate, in which I am not a frequent participant, in order to pinpoint the gravity of the situation for the wheat farmer in my constituency as well as the many other farmers in the three prairie provinces that are affected this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): It gives me pleasure to answer the question put by the member for Dauphin on the 26th of October 1967.

Schedule I of the Canada Grain Act now indicates classifications for three different grades of Canada utility wheat. These grades were established in 1971 and are applied for the classification of wheat in the rural terminal elevators. The first two grades consist namely of varieties designated for uses other than bakery. The third grade includes all the other varieties and types which do not belong to other classifications because of damage or excessive lightness.

The Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada has estimated that the percentage of No. 3 utility grade for this year's harvest is around 16 per cent because of the bad weather. The split of this grade into one or several other classifications will increase the stress on storage facilities and consequently will not bring any benefit to either producers or consumers. Therefore, the Canadian classification system has enabled our clients to get the benefit of high quality products associated with standardized classifications. Depending upon their classification these products are in great demand by foreign customers. The assurance of a standard classification of our grains has always helped us in our sales.

The same situation happened again in 1974. After consultations, the government at that time decided not to change our classification system and it all worked out to the satisfaction of the buyers. However, because of an exceptional situation due to rainy conditions in the west, it might be necessary to consider the need for reviewing the wheat grading system. As the minister indicated in his answer on this subject on October 27, experts in this field are now considering the possibility of revising the grades. Indeed the committee on western grain classification will meet this week and when a decision is reached I will be pleased to advise the hon. member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, before private members' hour I had been talking about some of the proposed changes in the insurance company provisions. Here we will need a much more detailed explanation from the minister than is contained in the ways and means motion and in the bill.

The language of the bill is like any income tax bill. I do not think one has to apologize to anyone. It is terribly complicated. If you want to apologize and say you do not understand it, you join 99.9 per cent of the people of the country. There are only a few tax lawyers, tax accountants and people at National Revenue who understand the Income Tax Act. I do not make any pretext of so doing; however, I think I understand some of the principles that apply to income tax.

In so far as declaring that a loan against the cash surrender value of a policy shall be to some degree taken into income, in so far as the income portion is there at the time the loan is made this seems to be in the present day something that may be justifiable. It would be very simple for the policy to have been built up, a loan taken and not repaid.

I do not agree with the provision that interest payable on that loan will not be chargeable by a businessman who borrows against his life insurance in order to get working capital, or for inventory purposes or something of that nature. There is a very arguable case that that interest is a source of capital which he has to borrow from someone.

He would be entitled to charge up the interest if he got a loan at a co-op, credit union, bank or trust company. Why not from his insurance company? He is paying interest on the money and it is being borrowed for purposes of business. It is more than nit-picking in so far as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is concerned, not personally, but in so far as the proposals he had put forward are concerned.

There are some things that do not appear in this budget. I want to tell the minister I have a private bill to undo something that went through under the guillotine at the time of the last Income Tax Act amendment, that is, the requirement that social insurance numbers must be provided on the applications for Canada Savings Bonds and furnished to banks when Canada Savings Bonds coupons are cashed or the banks will withhold 25 per cent of the value of the coupons.

That is an unwarranted extension of the use of social security numbers. I refer the minister to Hansard of 1964 when the principal of social insurance numbers was introduced. There were exchanges between the then leader of the opposition, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the then minister of labour, now President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). In an exchange between the then leader of the opposition and the then Minister of Labour on April 8, 1964, at page 1918 of Hansard we have this:

MR. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, the minister seems to have such difficulty answering this question. The question, repeated to him, is this: is it clear and definite on his part and on the part of the government that any information given in these application forms will be used exclusively by the Department of Labour and will not be passed over to any other department? That is what I want to know.

MR. MACEACHEN: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will recall that the Glassco commission made a proposal that there be a common system of government record keeping and I am saying—and this is all the responsibility I can take—that this information is to be used for the unemployment insurance system and for the Canada pension plan.

MR. DIEFENBAKER: And nothing else?

MR. MACEACHEN: I am not in a position to indicate at this stage what system of government record keeping will be involved in the future, but that is the present attitude of the government.

● (2012)

MR. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, income tax and so on.

MR. PEARSON: Certainly not.

Here is a further extension!

Income Tax

I asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) whether there were any agreements between his department and, say, the Unemployment Insurance Commission or the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to the exchange of information, particularly regarding social insurance numbers. I wondered whether this was a method of cross-checking the identity of individuals. The minister refused to answer. He skated around the question. He gave details concerning the improper use of agreements with regard to income tax information as revealed in the Laycraft inquiry, but he did not answer the question. I asked the minister again whether there were any agreements between the Department of National Revenue, the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Department of National Health and Welfare or any other department or agency affecting the disclosure of social insurance numbers as they appear on income tax returns.

This extension, or requirement, was in clause 75 of Bill C-22, which went through last year, and the record will show that it went through "on division". I was opposed to it then and I am opposed to it now. Indeed, I have introduced a private bill with the object of removing that particular section. It amounts to a bureaucratic invasion, on the totally unjustifiable pretext that because a taxpayer claims not to have a social insurance number he is in some respects prejudiced. Mr. Speaker, there is no obligation upon anyone to have a social insurance number. It is argued that such a person would lose 25 per cent of bond interest when funds are deposited in a bank or a trust company. But that money could always be reclaimed a year later when filing for the $1,000 exemption on bond interest. What I am saying is: there was no need for all this in the first place. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance and his officials, or the Minister of National Revenue and his officials know how many elderly persons do not possess social insurance numbers. Do they know what it is like to try to get a number? It is almost as difficult as getting a citizenship certificate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member has the floor, and I suggest we should all listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hear an observation by the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). He should be out trying to settle the business of the Post Office, which is the lousiest operation going—and that opinion comes from government backbenchers. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) down there ought to begin worrying about social insurance numbers, too, and listen to what the elderly citizens in his constituency are telling him about that subject. After all, many of these persons 75 and over were not born Canadians. They migrated to this country and do not have evidence of their citizenship. Overseas marriage certificates are no good when it comes to applying for social insurance numbers. Other primary evidence is needed.

Even elderly persons who were born in this country find difficulty getting a birth certificate. Then there has to be secondary evidence, for example, a driving licence. But very few people over the age of 75 have driving licences, particularly if they are women. Then there are tax notices if property happens to be held in joint tenancy. There are all sorts of things. I have received any number of phone calls at my constituency office about this. And it is all totally unnecessary from the point of view of the public.

Of course some bureaucrat thinks it is great. Mr. Speaker, we do not run this country for the benefit of the bureaucrats, or at least we should not. The bureaucrats should be there for the benefit of the people, not the people for the bureaucracy. Yet, I am sorry to say, that is what we have come to. We are now being enmeshed, roped in, tied together for the benefit of some bureaucratic machine.

I can recall the days when social insurance numbers were introduced. It was clear then that they would be used more and more, that there would one day be an absolute requirement to be identified by such numbers. So help me, I am sure some bureaucrat is going to say that from the day a child is born, "We can get the footprint off that child and issue a social security number right away."

As far as I am concerned, clause 75 of Bill C-22 should never have been passed. Back in the summer, of course, government backbenchers didn't even know it existed. I am sure the present Minister of National Revenue did not even know it existed at that time. I want to ask him to tell us what he intends to do about it and I should like him to give us information with regard to agreements, some of them secret agreements which are never published—

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): They are not secret agreements.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They were secret agreements because they were kept from the attorney general of Alberta. The minister and I have a difference of opinion here, because I have read the testimony given before the Laycraft inquiry and he has not. I do not think he is really aware of what went on at that inquiry.

I turn, now, to another area. Last fall, I believe, the department issued an interpretive bulletin having to do with loans to employees to purchase shares or to finance housing. The minister was arbitrarily fixing the rate of interest to these employers at 8 per cent because, somehow or other, the volume of these loans had grown to such a point that the department had decided to tax the benefit of the lower interest rate. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the nature of any of these loans was changed by their frequency.

Business institutions in this country often made loans to some of their executives or employees being transferred from one part of the country to another, in order to assist them to relocate—they were prepared to make a loan amounting to almost 50 per cent of the value of the house; there might be no interest payable for the first two years and perhaps an interest rate of 4 per cent or 5 per cent for the balance of the term. The same practice was followed with regard to the purchase of shares in the company to be held by employees.

The former minister said that in accordance with Section 6 of the Income Tax Act she was deeming this a benefit and arbitrarily setting the interest rate at 8 per cent. Therefore the difference between 8 per cent and the actual rate paid by the employee was deemed to be a benefit added on to income, and to be taxed at the marginal rate. We asked some questions about this. We now see the minister incorporating it, not through an interpretation bulletin but in a clause of Bill C-11.

Now there is an exemption. First of all, loans to employees to buy shares will be exempt. Therefore a company can lend $50,000 or $100,000 to a manager at 2 per cent, one per cent, or at no interest at all, to buy shares in the company, and this is not to be deemed a benefit. If a manager or junior executive in the firm is transferred, a mortgage of up to $50,000 at anything less than 8 per cent which is advanced will not be considered a benefit. Then we have what I might call a nuisance threshold whereby any benefit of less than $500 will not be taxed; it will be exempt.

Why get into this whole area in the first place, Mr. Speaker? A $50,000 low interest loan to buy a home goes a long way; I do not suppose there would be very many such advances. There will also be precious few $50,000 or $100,000 advances to buy shares in a company. I should like to tell both ministers that there are many other benefits which are given to employees, such as low cost meals in cafeterias, free parking and suchlike. If the Minister of National Revenue is going to interpret Section 6 of the act as granting certain benefits which are taxable, he will have to get up early in the morning and work until late at night because the list will be very long.

This practice was quite all right two years ago, but now this year the practice has become tainted because the minister apparently feels there is too much of it. He means there is not enough of it among the assessors of the department; they feel cheated. Perhaps the Department of National Revenue should start making loans to some of its employees as they are transferred across the country. If that were so I do not think we would hear too much about this practice. I suggest to both ministers that this particular provision in the Income Tax Act should be withdrawn because it is nitpicking. It will not raise very much revenue and will create further complications, so why get into it? Are Canadians not taxed enough as it is?

Let me cite some figures provided by both ministers. On March 31 the former minister of finance estimated that in the year 1976-77 $14,885 million would be collected in personal income taxes. The present Minister of Finance on October 20 revised this figure to $14,620 million; in other words, there was a drop of $265 million. But what is the forecast? Even with these cuts the figure is $14,100 million. This is almost three times the corporate income tax estimate.

Mr. Benjamin: Shame!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I hear "shame" coming from the NDP. They do not know that business operations are so bad that there is a reduced forecast of corporate income tax because profits this year are not good. It is amazing, Mr. Speaker, but they feel there is one big herd of milk cows in this country known as corporations, which you milk four at a time. You just hang on tight and milk, and that is the solution to this country's economic ills and to government's shortage of funds. You milk the corporations.

I am talking about taxing individuals. Millions of people do not pay tax. Under the last budget, with the additional $200 cut which is to apply primarily next January and February, a lot of presently marginal taxpayers will be removed from the tax rolls. But because of inflationary pressures and increases, even a 6 per cent increase in salaries or wages will mean that by the end of the year such people will once again be back on the tax rolls. It is all very nice to be off the tax rolls at the beginning of the year, but if you find yourself back on the rolls at the end of the year it is very little relief. I would have much rather seen a tax credit.

Personal income taxes have had a very regressive influence in this country ever since 1972 with the coming into force of the so-called tax reforms under a former finance minister, Mr. Benson. At that time there were dire predictions from all sides. I remember the former treasurer for the province of Ontario arguing with the then minister of finance and proving that the tax system was far too heavy-handed, that the impost by government under personal income tax was far too heavy for the Canadian economy. This has been proved because every year there have been cutbacks, and the government has always tried to justify why it has taken another half a million people off the tax roll. The very next year, however, inflation was moving them right up again, and with the tax rates and the tax system being what they are, it was just a case of a revolving door; you took them out at budget time, and a few months later they were back in as taxpayers. It meant very little.

If we took the totals claimed by the successive ministers of finance since 1968 or 1970 as having been taken off the tax rolls, we would not have any taxpayers left.

A recent proposal which was started by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), and adopted by the government, to save energy, was to increase insulation. This was the giving of a grant of up to $350 to certain persons owning rather older homes, which are to be insulated according to certain standards. The idea is fine. A lot of those homes require insulating, and undoubtedly there will be a lot of energy saving. But it is absolute gall then to turn around and say to an individual, "We will help you to the extent of $350, but we will add the $350 to your taxable income". It is given with one hand, and then it is taken back with two hands. That is totally wrong. Why do it that way? If the grant is to be $350 for this particular house or that particular house, that is how much it should be. Why tax the grant? It that is the case, then that should be the contribution of the economy toward energy saving.

I have heard of people insulating their houses at a cost of $800 or $1,000. This is what it costs to insulate some of the older, larger houses. But to tax that grant causes me to invite my colleagues to vote against that particular item in Bill C-11.

I could go through all of the ways and means motions, but the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) has some original comments to make. Also some of my colleagues want to speak about other matters. I hope and trust that the members of the House, particularly those on the government side, will take a very good look at this particular bill, because there are some things said and done in the name of income tax that should never see the light of day. I invite them to participate in the discussion at this level. They must have embarrassing times when they are faced with constituents who say, "What did you say at that time?" and all they can do is grin or smile and say, "I did nothing and I said nothing. I took it at face value."

Mr. Alexander: They raised it in caucus.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Bill C-11 was never even discussed in caucus. People who are interested in taxes are told they will receive recommendations, but what recommendations come out of the Liberal caucus? Not one, not one.

I will put an end to my remarks concerning this somewhat disjointed amending bill and pass the mantle on to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge. I know he is champing at the bit. I expect to have a good half hour session from some of the Liberal backbenchers who will expound on the values of this bill, since they are backing the Minister of Finance. I hope some of the provisions will merit the fate they deserve and be defeated in the committee of the whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but let the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) know that this evening the rabbi has consented to giving his place up to me.

It would appear on the surface that the opposition of NDP members to Bill C-11 is simply an anti-corporation move on our part without any substantial basis in economic theory. If we leave the theory aside temporarily, which has come to us in the post-war period mainly through the policy implications of John Maynard Keynes, as they relate to control of the aggregate or over-all demand in the economy; and if we stick to the pragmatic or practical results of such large tax cuts for corporations and investors, which come to $1.2 billion, we find adequate reason for the NDP to be apprehensive about such tax cuts as they relate to the major problem which exists in the Canadian economy today as we see it, namely, the creation of jobs for at least a half a million more Canadians out of the approximate 1.2 million who are out of work.

Our leader has pointed out the failures of the measures to boost job creation. This is already reflected in the fact that some of the firms, which will receive great benefits from the new tax measures, are now actually decreating jobs in spite of these extremely large tax cuts announced in the budget of last March. Some prominent examples have already been noted.

The Aluminum Company of Canada will receive approximately $11 million because of these tax cuts. One might say, "Well, so what? Won't that mean they will be able to increase jobs or at least hold the jobs they have?" The fact is that the Aluminum Company of Canada is laying off 400 workers in Newfoundland, which has the highest unemployment rate of any province in this country.

Another large multinational firm, which we all refer to as INCO, will receive a tax break of $10 million under the terms of Bill C-11; but we all know that between Sudbury, Port Colborne and Thompson, INCO is in the process of laying off some 4,000 workers.

Northern Telecom, another large company, will receive approximately $3 million under this bill, and they are not creating jobs with this but are laying off 1,000 workers. Noranda Mines will receive approximately $5 million and plans to lay off at least 500 workers, and it may yet go up to 1,000 or more.

In March, and again in the mini-budget presented by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the government has failed to get the economy revitalized because it is not providing enough of a stimulant to consumer demand for non-durable goods, durable goods, and for many services that are needed by the ordinary Canadian family. By putting the emphasis on these large tax deductions for corporations, it is obvious from the examples given above that they are not reducing the present high degree of under-utilized human beings, as shown by our official and unofficial unemployment figures.

The large corporations are not responding to corporation tax cuts by creating new jobs, as is apparent in the increasing number of lay-offs that are occurring in the manufacturing sector of our economy which is operating at about 80 per cent capacity. Their profit levels which, from some points of view, are healthy, are well below those that have historically occurred in the recovery stage of the traditional Canadian business cycle. Therefore the conclusion of the NDP is that the investment stimuli given in this budget are obviously not going to do too much to improve our national economy. What was needed, and is needed, are even more substantial tax cuts for the lower and middle income families in this country to give a push to the investment sector to help revitalize the economy and get the spending income stream moving at levels which will bring back confidence in the management of the Canadian economy both inside the country and abroad.

The government has insisted, both implicitly and explicitly, that such tax cuts to consumers could result in even higher levels of inflation. They would have to be very large tax cuts indeed, given the under-utilized capacity of our manufacturing sector at present, before demand, that is, over-all aggregate demand, would outstrip the capacity to supply these goods and services and hence increase the general level of prices, causing what we call the inflationary spiral, higher than what will occur, of course, as a result of the increasing cost of fuel and of other imports, because we have become a net importer of oil, as well as because of the lower value of our dollar.

However, I would argue as an economist that in the long run our exchange rate, accompanied by the type of consumer stimulation that I have mentioned earlier, would be advantageous to our export trade, which in turn would give a greater lift to the business sector of our economy than the action which the government is now proposing, which is an inefficient way of allocating our scarce resources. In other words, the government is stressing too much direct stimulation of the private sector by way of corporate taxes which amount to over $1 billion, and yet corporations continually show they lack the confidence necessary to create jobs in this country. In fact we note that some of them are doing the very opposite to creating jobs. The money which they receive from the government to improve their cash flow is used, in the case of multinationals, to help subsidiaries in other countries, and to concentrate the corporate sector further through the buying up of securities in other corporations. It does not go toward creating jobs in this country. All this occurs while we as a nation have a $10 billion deficit in manufactured products and an almost $3 billion deficit in debt services, that is, in interest payments abroad.

Now I wish to speak briefly about how the government, through public expenditures, can improve the economy in the Atlantic region and elsewhere across the country. It is obvious that in the first place we should invest in energy and conservation. One reason why the attempts of the government in this direction have not been too successful is that they have not followed through with a national energy policy which would make sense to any of us. I have put questions in the House to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), concerning this matter and he has spoken on this subject in Toronto in September, and again in Paris at the International Energy Agency meeting, having listened to such experts as the head of the Venezuelan Oil Export Corporation. He said that all the studies that have been carried out until now show that a complete breakdown of the OPEC cartel will mean that Canada will have a deficit in oil imports of at least $2 billion by 1985. He woke up very late to the fact that we will have great difficulties in that respect.

My province of Nova Scotia is the second province after Prince Edward Island most dependent on oil, and yet the government which has set up the Cape Breton Development Corporation knows that by 1985, or shortly thereafter, Nova Scotia will have to import oil from somewhere at a very high price, as the Venezuelan minister said two weeks ago when he spoke at the Gas Association meeting in Toronto. In 1985 we will have to pay $20 in 1977 prices for a barrel of oil. Of course, no one can be 100 per cent right on this, but this is not information that comes solely from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is also information which comes from MIT studies which were not done at government instigation but, one suspects, by the CIA in the United States and by OECD, as well as from a source in which I put the greatest credence, that is, the minister in Venezuela, a country greatly dependent on oil and which knows what is going on in the OPEC countries. This, of course, does not take into account the types of difficulties that we could have as a result of political difficulties in the Middle East.

The fact is that in a few years we will be facing immense problems. Yet coal is one of our resources, a resource that in the past was not considered to be as valuable as oil because, in the 1950's in Canada as well as in western Europe and the United States, the oil industry drove the coal industry into a sharp decline in so far as the supply of energy was concerned. However, that has changed, and it will change still further in the next ten years.

I say that the government has been seriously deficient in its energy policy in not opening two new coal mines in the Cape Breton area, at a time when the minister in charge told us that we in Nova Scotia will be facing this kind of deficiency in oil in the near future, to say nothing about the situation in the whole of the nation. Given this, and given the high unemployment in our area, which has been a chronic and traditional situation since the coal industry started to decline in the 1950's we must put particular stress, as I have suggested, on close co-ordination between the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), who is also in charge of DEVCO. They should be saying, "We know the resources are there, so next year we will start a new coal mine in the Cape Breton area". I shall have a little more to say on that in closing, and I shall be quoting what the premier of Nova Scotia said recently in that connection.

As we know, there are other possibilities for the Maritime Energy Corporation and this is a step in the right direction, but we can legitimately criticize the government for setting up the corporation so late. There are also other possibilities for the whole of the Atlantic region which can now be viewed in another light, possibilities which not long ago could not be considered as being practical, such as the Fundy Tidal power project.

In view of the chronic unemployment problem in my constituency I see the possibility of the Government of Canada getting a tremendous return on investment in two new coal mines that would help our balance of payments and, as I have said before, would help industries in southern Quebec. We all hope it will remain part of Canada, and indeed most of us are willing to bet on that.

Some companies are now burning oil. Can you imagine what they will have to pay if they are to survive in the Canadian economy ten or 12 years from now if the leader of the Venezuelan Oil Export Corporation and these studies are right, as is likely? They should be converting to coal. It should be part of the energy policy of this country to use coal, instead of putting all kinds of unemployment insurance into areas like that where there are literally thousands and thousands of potential coal miners who are willing and able to go to work. Such an approach would rectify this situation which has been with us since the 1950's.

I could say much more about this, Mr. Speaker, but I just want to say now that there is a great lack of an energy policy in this country.

I do not know if all members will agree with me but, looking ahead for the next 15 years in Canada, I see a tremendous gap in the field of transportation, especially rail transportation. The Mirabels and other white elephants that were built across this country use the most intensive energy consuming type of transportation, the airplane. Instead of looking ahead and seeing that we have to put more money into freight and passenger rail services, we are allowing the other expenditures to go ahead. Let me give an example of how important this is to the nation, Mr. Speaker.

The Ontario utilities and Ontario steel plants—Stelco, Dofasco, Algoma—will be running out of coal within the next 15 years—metallurgical coal—and they are now planning along with MOT, along with the utilities, along with the CNR, to rebuild the railbed from Alberta and parts of British Columbia to the terminal at the Lakehead in order to move unitrains to get those coal resources to Ontario where they are desperately needed. They know it is not going to be as easy as in the past to get coking coal, metallurgical coal and low sulphur coal from the United States, for making steel and for thermal purposes. It will cost at least $2 billion to do that. I should mention that the steel plant in Sydney produces rail, primarily.

While they are doing that, why does the government not seriously look at these other matters? I took this up with the CTC and they admitted they were not doing it because of the shortsightedness of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and probably of others before him. They have tunnel vision as far as the airways and highways are concerned. This is unfortunate, especially in view of the difficulties in the supply of petroleum which will become increasingly serious over the next 15 or 20 years. They should be starting now to do cost benefit studies on the improvement of railbeds from Sydney to Montreal so that goods could be moved more easily, so that the Sydney plant could sell more rail, and so that the plant in Pictou County which produces cars for the movement of grain could be built up. If this were done we would not have thousands of unemployed at the Sydney steel plant or in Pictou County. This sort of thing does harm to the unity of this nation, and it happens continually.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is a good speech. Right on.

Mr. Hogan: I do not know if I am being kidded by the hon. member or if I am being encouraged.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You are right on.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, if the government has any thoughts on this problem it has never made them public. It is hard to get the Minister of Transport to say whether he is considering it. I write to him and talk to him, but all I can find out is that the emphasis is on air travel. In my opinion, as far as major public sector transportation is concerned, the concentration should be on rail—not to the exclusion of air travel of course.

It is obvious that we need tremendous public investment in the fishing sector in the Atlantic region, both offshore and inshore. As I have said before, one of the reasons the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast has suffered as opposed to the Pacific coast, is that the late Lester B. Pearson, whom many revered because of his co-operative federalism and his international stance, neglected to be a nationalist at a time when we could have used one. As a result of his policies, offshore fisheries came into the area. Big foreign fleets owned, controlled or subsidized by other governments, have depleted our resource. Now the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) tells us that the mistakes of the last 15 years have to be made up. Mr. Speaker, it will take a very large public sector expenditure to do that. The inshore fishery that constitutes the greater part of the Atlantic area must not be sacrificed in order to promote a monopoly or a few multinational corporations that want to control the offshore fishery—as important as the offshore fishery is going to be, and I have no objection to that.

I would remind members from the Atlantic region—and some of them know this better than I—that 90 per cent of our fishermen are inshore fishermen. They expect new policies from this government and new investment in order to rebuild that fishery as well as the offshore fishery.

There is another sector in the Atlantic region that requires a great deal of additional public expenditure over the next few years. One of the difficulties of Confederation is the administrative inflexibility of some of our large bureaucratic institutions. Like CMHC they may be well intentioned, but they cannot seem to adapt programs established for a national income level to areas of low income like the Atlantic region. I am concerned about new housing starts, public housing and co-operative housing, and also about the repair of existing housing.

I put a proposal to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), and I put it to the former minister. I thought I was getting to the former minister, but then he was shifted to the Department of National Defence. However, the new minister seems to agree that, in a region such as Cape Breton, where there are many old company houses it would be a worth-while investment to set up, between DEVCO and CMHC, their own repair company to give these houses a longer life. That would save the government immense amounts of money in terms of public housing. It would provide decent shelter in their old age for people who have been good Canadians all their lives, as well as short term and medium term employment. That is a must, but not just for my region. It is also a must for other parts of the Atlantic region. I travelled through northern Ontario during the Ontario election campaign, and it is a must there too. It is time we started to think about these things.

Because of the INCO lay-offs the Ontario government and to some extent the federal government are now discovering that they have a potentially large problem. It can multiply, because wherever there is a natural resource base which is non-renewable it can move, and where there are many people involved governments must plan beforehand and try to broaden those resource bases. Unless communities in those areas are built up in other ways with good construction sectors and so on, eventually there will be big problems like the problem we now have in Sudbury.

DREE was established in 1969 as what I call the son of ADA. That is not a bad word. It means Area Development Agency. DREE was the grandson, if you will, of the Atlantic Development Board. It was supposed to make a big difference in closing the disparity gap as far as jobs and income are concerned between Atlantic Canada and the rest of Canada, especially the better-off provinces. However, only a few weeks ago in Halifax the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), formerly the minister of regional economic expansion, said that "much of the DREE incentive program has been a failure". That is what the minister is quoted in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald as saying. The minister suggested that we must re-think our approaches to regional development because economic disparities are still glaringly with us.

I think there are indications that Nova Scotia's economic performance has worsened considerably in the last five years, despite what I hear from spokesmen for DREE. One indication of that is that, like the other Atlantic provinces, Nova Scotia is much more dependent on Ottawa for its revenues than ever. We pay almost the highest taxes in the country. Any income improvements in general are mainly due to transfer payments, and there is little indication that earned personal income or income per capita is growing.

If hon. members would look at the economic review of the Department of Finance for May, 1977—and I know they will not all go rushing out to do so—they will find that in the whole of the Atlantic region private investment, which is supposed to do the major job there, according to the thinking of many, excluding housing, actually dropped in 1976. That is a fact which was also true in the province of Quebec.

When we add public investment to private investment we find in that economic review that between 1970 and 1976 the increase was 135 per cent in New Brunswick, 96 per cent in Prince Edward Island, 63 per cent in Nova Scotia, and 60 per cent in Newfoundland.

Before preparing this speech I looked at the taxation statistics in the 1977 publication of the Department of National Revenue. I found there something I have spoken about often with regard to DREE, as the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) knows from past experience, and it has been repeated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). What I found there were some startling figures, despite the growth of the metropolitan areas of the Atlantic region, for reasons we do not need to go into here, but primarily because their base is a government base, something like Ottawa, and DREE has built upon this. I am not saying that DREE has not done anything. But as the hon. member for Halifax noted about two years ago in a banquet given in his honour in Dartmouth, one of our great difficulties now is not only the disparity between the whole of the Atlantic region and the average for the whole country but also the disparities within the region between metropolitan areas and outlying areas.

Figures for 1975 are the latest figures, and they show the average income—which for these purposes means total income—to be $7,862 in Sydney, and of a hundred Canadian cities Sydney ranked 94. In Halifax the average income was $9,273, and its rank was 38th, which put the average income in Halifax at about 77 per cent of the Canadian average, and the average income in Sydney at 66 per cent. Of course the figures include only selected cities and exclude large towns like my own town of Glace Bay, which has some 24,000 people, and New Waterford, a mining town in my riding, which has a population of 10,000. The final figures in the 1971 census—they are not available from the 1976 census—showed Sydney as having 68 per cent of the national average while Glace Bay was at 54 per cent and New Waterford was at 48 per cent. There is obviously a desperate need for new jobs in these mining areas of my constituency in Cape Breton and in parts of other constituencies, such as the constituency of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir), which has as its major industry a steel plant. There is a need for new jobs in the riding of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen). There is a desperate need for at least two new coal mines. The coal is there, and it happens to be within the confines of my constituency, in Glace Bay and in the New Waterford area.

We should not wait until 1979 or until an election for the people I have talked about to get together, in view of what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is saying about what is going to happen in the mid-1980's or thereabouts. They must get together and build two new mines. This would probably cost the government $80 million. I admit that the government has already put a lot of money in, but this investment would guarantee viable operations. There would be new mines, and the only old one would be modernized. Hundreds of millions of dollars would be saved, if I am right in terms of what oil costs are going to be.

Some of this coal could be sent to the province of Quebec for the cement companies, which were the traditional markets in the 1950's. This would be a worth-while investment, and not just for a particular part of the country. It would not be money going down a sink hole. These are not the fifties. These are the 1970's and we must get ready for the 1980's, unless the assumptions about the price of oil are wrong—and it is hard to conceive that that could be so—and unless everybody is wrong about shortages which are going to occur.

We have a huge unemployment problem, and this proposal could have a good effect on our balance of payments deficit problem. Canada is going to need help. If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is correct, we will have a deficit of $2 billion in our oil imports, as well as a deficit in our gas imports and other petroleum exports by the year 1985.

• (2112)

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said last week, and it was quoted in a recent editorial, that what is facing us is like the tip of the iceberg that the Titanic did not see. Surely the government can see it now. It would not take that much co-ordination to put some kind of energy structure together.

Rather than putting so much unemployment insurance into places like Cape Breton, this investment should go into at least two new coal mines.

The premier of Nova Scotia was quoted in the Toronto Star of Saturday, October 29. I know the Liberals will believe him because he is a Liberal. There may be some on this side who will not take his word, but he should know whereof he speaks. I quote:

> Liberal Premier Gerald Regan of Nova Scotia blamed Ottawa for failing to act on its promises. Proposals to sink another coal mine in Nova Scotia have become entangled in federal government red tape, he said.

That is the difficulty as far as co-ordination is concerned. This is not good enough for many unemployed Cape Bretoners. Nor does it say much for this country's national energy policy and the co-ordination existing between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, Energy, Mines and Resources, the Nova Scotia government and the Federal Treasury Board.

Is there any reason why those here tonight should not expect the NDP members to get excited about further handouts to private corporations at a time when more and more people are being laid off and jobs are not being created? We should go the reverse route. There should be deeper cuts to stimulate the economy and get national priorities assessed. Long term strategy goals should be established in the fields of energy, transportation, especially rail, housing and so on, so that the country can get moving again. We will then not have to worry about a relatively small group of separatists, 25 or 30 per cent, because they will not be able to move people, those who are content and have jobs, away from Confederation.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about one outstanding feature or Bill C-11, clause 61, which deals with the incentives for scientific research.

It is in detail an investment tax credit, 5 per cent of current and capital expenditures on scientific research performed in this country with a regional aspect to it. If this research and development are done in regions of Canada designated under the Regional Development Incentives Act, the investment tax credit is 7½ per cent, with the exception of the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé Peninsula where it is 10 per cent.

This means that for research and development in the Gaspé and Atlantic provinces, 10 per cent of the total of the current and capital expenditures on scientific research will be a prepayment of tax payable. It will be a deduction from tax that is owned to the government. This is a very good, positive, concrete move, that is estimated to be worth $35 million to $40 million in this current fiscal year.

The reason I feel it is such a good move is that primarily it means there will be less government involvement and interference. This is to be admired. We have heard comments from both sides of the House, as well as across the country, on the problem of government interference. This gives industry the advantage of making the decision on what it wants to do and when. They are best fitted to make these kinds of decisions. It also avoids the bureaucratic involvement and the delays associated with this.

I wish to contrast this investment tax credit with another piece of good legislation that has gone through recently, but had handicaps because of the bureaucratic involvement. I refer to the Enterprise Development Program. The minister said it would be less cumbersome, there would be less paperwork, and it would be easier to administer. As far as the simplification of dealing with all the government alphabet programs is concerned, it was certainly a move in the right direction.

Unfortunately the bureaucrats in the department have managed to do a complete inversion and have made this simplification into a multiplication of paperwork and of the bureaucracy involved. They have managed to effect results contrary to the intentions of the government. It will be very advantageous if we can manage to avoid government involvement in the decision-making process as much as possible, leaving industry to make the decisions it is best able to make. For this reason I commend clause 61 of Bill C-11 and encourage the government to proceed more in this direction than in the direction evidenced by the Enterprise Development Program.

There is no question that to increase the number of jobs in this country in the long term, we need more industrial research and development. It has been well shown recently that high technology industry creates many more jobs than a low technology, more mature type of industry. I refer here, for example, to the textile industry and the footwear industry where increased involvement with technology in recent years has been minimal, as has been the creation of new jobs.

In high technology areas, especially in the electronics sector, we have seen very small companies increase in size quite dramatically in the last few years, with a consequent increase in the number of jobs available. There are several studies to verify the comment that it is the high technology industry which is creating the most jobs. Therefore as a government we should be doing more to encourage industrial research and development, especially in the high technology area of industry.

There are two areas which we can use to tackle this objective. One is in the small Canadian-owned and controlled companies involved in high technology. I refer to the electronics industry as a good example of this. Relatively good progress has been made in encouraging some of these companies.

The "unsolicited proposal aspect" of the "Make or Buy" government program should be increased. At present it receives $12 million per year funding. It has demonstrated beyond any criticism that it has been very successful. We need more of that type of encouragement to increase the results and effectiveness.

If I am criticized for advocating more government spending, I would say it should not increase spending but divert money to this area which is very effective in creating jobs. Not only will it have the effect of creating high technology jobs, but in the long term there will be a much larger increase in jobs created for the technology applied to products by these companies.

If we really want to make a serious dent into the industrial area in this country, we have to tackle the large industries which make up the bulk of the industrial sector of the economy. When we talk about the large industries in this country, the ones which really have some effect on the economy, whether we like it or not, we are talking about multinational corporations. A large number of these multinationals are U.S.-based. We have to seek the reason why there is not more industrial research and development being done in Canada by these companies. We need to consider what we can do to encourage an increase in research and development in Canada by these companies. It is in this vein that I wish to draw the attention of the House to an article I came across earlier this year in Forbes Magazine, the issue of December 15 last. I think it explains very well why we do not see more industrial research and development being carried on by subsidiaries of large U.S.-based multinational corporations.

This article was written at a time when a change was proposed by the U.S. Treasury to increase the amount of money U.S. corporations were repatriating from foreign countries where their subsidiaries were operating. Let me briefly give a resume of the change which was proposed by the U.S. Treasury. Essentially U.S. companies could deduct the cost of research and development done in the United States against the cost of operations in foreign countries as a legitimate cost of doing business there. Applied to Canada, this meant Canadians were paying for research to be done in the United States by U.S. corporations and citizens. So why should these multinationals do research in Canada? They are already getting paid by Canada for doing it in the United States. There is no incentive at all for them to adopt a practice of spending money and doing research anywhere other than in the United States. This, of course, creates high technology jobs for their own university graduates. It is of no help to Canada, however, which also wants jobs for its university graduates in these high technology fields. The change which the U.S. Treasury proposed was to increase the amount of money which U.S. companies could repatriate from U.S. subsidiaries in foreign countries.

The criticism which was levelled at this proposal in the article to which I referred was that foreign tax collectors might well disallow research and development deductions against sales in that country if the research and development were carried out, say, in New Jersey. Well, I don't ruddy well blame them. I, for one, would certainly want to see Canada disallow increased amounts of money being used as deductions for research done in the United States for business in this country.

I think this was a very regressive measure. I do not know how many people in the Department of Finance knew this was going on, but certainly the scientific community was not aware of it. This is a very strong reason why there is so little research and development done in the industrial sector of the subsidiaries of foreign-based multinationals.

The situation is similar to the one which existed with respect to the Time and Reader's Digest legislation when it was brought before us. I feel we should take similar measures in this case, and not only reject any increase in the amount of money they want Canada to pay for research and development done in the United States, but even disallow that which is already being repatriated, a procedure which would come to grips with the problem of getting research and development done in Canadian industries here, whether they be foreign multinationals or Canadian-owned.

In my opinion it is a very serious situation but one which should be tackled if we really wish to increase the amount of research and development done by industry in Canada, the point at which it is translated into the economy, where it creates jobs and where it benefits the standard of living of all Canadians.

There is another aspect to the attack on this problem, that is, the general proposal to build on our strengths. Where are our strengths as far as research and development are concerned? They are in our universities and in our government laboratories. That is where most of our research and development are carried on and that is where most of our people who do the best work are located. I therefore think we should bring in measures to encourage the transfer to industry of the technology which already exists so that it can be translated into the economy.

Our universities should be working on problems of national concern, in addition to their fundamental curiosity-oriented research. Once they have done this work we should also make sure there are ways to integrate this into the economy so we can benefit in an economic, material way from the application of this research. The same applies to work done in government laboratories. How much of the work which has been carried on in these institutions has really gone into the economy in a way to benefit our industries and our economy? There are many cases in which this has happened, but there are, alas, also many examples to show that the work has not been transferred or, if it has been transferred to industry, that the benefits have not remained in Canada. In some cases it is foreign countries which have benefited from our government research, and our taxpayers which have paid for it.

I realize that the measures I propose are quite wide. I realize a lot has to be done as far as legislation is concerned to implement them, but I feel the proposals brought in under the terms of Bill C-11 are a good start in the right direction. Much more action is needed in this direction to tackle the problem of job creation—long-term job creation, not short-term, stop-gap measures—and we need that action soon.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity to speak on Bill C-11 in connection with the Income Tax Act because it gives us an opportunity to discuss in considerable detail our economic situation. Certainly our present economic situation must be considered one of the worst we have ever experienced, if not one of desperation. Some people are even calling it one of despair.

By all indexes, as a developed nation, the state of our economy can only be described as in a desperate situation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), just a few weeks after assuming his new post, finds it necessary to bootleg in a budget which has been called an economic and fiscal statement. In fact he has a new budget in all but name. He had only a month or so to prepare this, and while it offers me my first opportunity to wish the minister personal regards on his appointment, it only shows the depth of the necessity which he has attached to these changes. It may be that the Minister of Finance can say, as Hamlet said, "This budget, 'tis a poor thing, but it is my very own". I suspect, however, that in this case he has to carry what he inherited from his predecessor, and we can discuss that, too.

It is true that part of these amendments are a hold-over from the May budget of the minister's predecessor, and it seems interesting that the previous minister of finance was not allowed, or did not wish to finish with the budget he had started. It should have been debated and passed and I think then the public would have been better informed, and we would know where we are going. It should have been done three or four months ago.

There is no doubt about the ballooning deficit. It is now estimated at $9.2 billion for the fiscal year ending next March, and even more for the next year cannot be considered as anything less than a disaster—and there is more yet to come. Moreover, there is the problem of national unity which arose in an acute form last November with the election of the Parti Québécois and the headlong rush and steady progression of the province of Quebec to an independent, economic state. This certainly does not excite a feeling of economic stability such as we in this country have long been famous for in the international field. The possible negotiation of separation is, of course, a horrendous job. It also indicates that this will spill over into other sections.

All these political problems give rise to uncertainty as to whether government bonds, federal or provincial, will be met some time down the road. This year the federal government will need to borrow almost enough to increase our national debt by something like 20 per cent. Surely this booming deficit, in a period of peacetime, a time of relative world stability in the economy, is an indication that we are almost approaching wartime deficits.

It is true, according to some estimates I have seen, that we would be borrowing something like $25 billion a year if we were borrowing amounts comparable to those borrowed in the war years in the forties, but then it was recognized that the war would end one way or the other shortly and that borrowing was a necessity to preserve the country from external forces.

There is no sign of this massive government expenditure being curtailed. We cannot suddenly terminate transfer payments to the disadvantaged, to old age pensioners, the funding of health and welfare programs and education programs. We are already talking about huge amounts required to meet educational expansion and are asking the provinces to institute second language training, which will cost hundreds of millions of dollars and create an entirely new situation for our schools.

During the budget speech of his predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), the then minister suggested we would increase economic growth by 5 per cent. With the new cuts of some $600 million in income tax and $100 million in tax credits and other stimuli, nearly $1 billion in all, the present Minister of Finance cannot hope to achieve 5 per cent growth next year. Although the amount of the tax cuts, $700 million, is substantial, it amounts to only $100 for the typical married taxpayer earning between $9,000 and $16,000 per annum. Making it applicable in January and February means, presumably, that the Minister of Finance is looking for some kind of psychological impact and is trying to tell Canadians they are being too pessimistic.

As for wage and price controls, the minister has gone back on the promise of his predecessors to protect the real wages of workers by adjusting the anti-inflation guidelines to 6 per cent. That is to say, the guidelines remain at 6 per cent although inflation will likely be much higher than that. When the government set up the Anti-Inflation Board it said it would allow for increases in the real wages of workers. In order to do this the Minister should have allowed the ceiling to be 8 per cent, not 6 per cent.

Or does the government really want to bow out of inflation controls? This is an indication that the minister is paying lip service to the removal of controls and that he really very much wants them to continue. By choosing April 14 as the date for beginning the phase out period, he will sweep into the controls program for the whole year a large number of companies with an April 1 year end, coinciding with the end of the income tax year, as well as large unions, such as the inside postal workers and the railway workers.

All of us wonder whether the mini-budget is going to work. It certainly reflects the great uncertainty in our economy, and I wonder whether the approximately $1 billion stimulus which the finance minister has announced will be sufficient. Perhaps controls have the most significant effect on our economy, but since the controls were implemented nothing has been done to change the structure of the Canadian economy. The government said it would gradually reduce controls, but it has done nothing to make sure that the same sequence of events will not occur again. If the government runs into the same sequence of events as occurred between 1973 and 1975, with rising prices followed by large wage increases, it must remember the lesson that it should have learned over the past few years, namely, that controls can hold down wages but have practically no effect on prices.

While in the long run there may be a connection between lower rates of wage increases and lower rates of price increases, wage settlements in the past year have dropped but inflation has increased. Yet the government continues to claim, in face of its own statistics, that controls have effectively restrained prices and given workers a bigger increase in real income. This really does not hold true.

As for the government's figures, the switch in economic priorities from inflation fighting of a year ago to unemployment fighting today is an interesting one. A year ago inflation was running at an annual rate of 6.2 per cent. The government said inflation was the most important obstacle to real growth. Inflation is now running at 8.4 per cent, yet unemployment has been labelled the most serious obstacle to economic growth. According to the 1976 throne speech, inflation was a destructive force which took jobs and incomes from workers, robbed the elderly, impeded the flow of capital, and obstructed the fight against poverty. But this year the villain is unemployment. It deprives Canadians, so says the throne speech, of the dignity of self-supporting work. It supposedly loads them with an unfair burden of worry and uncertainty which is unjust and intolerable.

Last year's all out attack on inflation has now been replaced by vague statements in the throne speech to the effect that the government, in stimulative actions, will not shrink from its objective of continuing to reduce inflation. Will Canada's 800,000 unemployed go the same way as the inflation fighters of the last throne speech? The fight to "reduce" inflation in Canada has resulted in an increase in inflation from 6.2 per cent to 8.4 per cent. The additional employment opportunities promised turned out to be 200,000 jobs, only about half the number needed to ensure growth of the labour force.

Last year the government promised to keep the rate of growth of the public service below one per cent and to see what could be turned over to private enterprise in order to reduce the size of government. The latest Statistics Canada figures show that the federal government has 580,000 employees, 2.4 per cent more than it had a year ago. I have not heard of the government turning anything over to private enterprise, but it has created three new enterprises, Petro-Canada, de Havilland Aircraft of Canada, and Canadair. So much for the government keeping its promise not to increase the public service and to turn over certain operations to private enterprise.

We now have some idea of what the government has in store for us. It is organizing under, wonder of wonders, Michael Pitfield, the DM-5. This sounds like a cell in the FLQ or the secret service. The government has finally decided that the economy is in some sort of disarray and the bureaucrats are rushing to fill the breaches, led so ably by Mr. Pitfield, the Clerk of the Privy Council. About the only thing the public knows is that whenever Mr. Pitfield is in the middle of the crowd something is up, something is amiss.

It will be remembered that Mr. Pitfield headed up DM-10 a year ago, which was a meeting of ten deputy ministers to chart a way out for the post control economy. At that time it was announced that it would "initiate a formal process of discussion, dialogue, and consultation with all elements of Canadian society; provincial governments, representatives of business, labour and consumer organizations, other special interest groups and individual Canadians." Ten months later it has not amounted to anything. Will half as many bureaucrats as the name DM-5 implies produce twice as much? What about the government's own 2,000 economists which it employs? Can it not find some gleam of talent to offset this high-powered DM-5?

There are a few things in the budget which will bear closer scrutiny as we progress through the committee stage. I think the Minister of Finance was too optimistic, when we look at what seems to be ahead. Almost certainly in 1978 unemployment will remain high and inflation will exceed the revised target of 6 per cent. Our trade deficits are scheduled to grow as we borrow more abroad, and particularly as the vast borrowings of the federal government in the domestic scene force provincial governments to borrow abroad.

What about this money that we are borrowing abroad? The OECD has suggested that in the group of the 24 richest countries of the world something like $31 billion was loaned outside their borders. Of that total last year, Canadian governments and companies borrowed $8.9 billion, or almost a third. This year, according to the OECD, borrowing by Canada has been running at an annual rate of $5.2 billion, a relatively low figure when compared with 1976. But even with these relatively low Canadian borrowings, they are bigger than those of any other country. In the first nine months of this year, Canadian bond sales came to $4 billion. Britain, Norway and Japan borrowed about $1.5 billion in the world markets. France borrowed about $1.3 billion, and the United States about $1 billion. These borrowings were generally company borrowings and not by governments.

Canada's federal government might consider borrowing abroad if it wanted to stop the descent of the Canadian dollar; but no other country in the world has come to the state where it borrows so much abroad as Canada. Canada is particularly unusual in its pattern of borrowing. Private corporations are the dominant foreign borrowers, but in Canada it is borrowing by our junior governments. Provincial and municipal governments sold 63 per cent of all the bonds put on the international market by Canadian borrowers. The rest was chiefly by companies.

Why do we borrow so much abroad? It seems as though our credit rating abroad is better than our economic management. The recent fall of the Canadian dollar indicates that as well as a political uncertainty facing Canada, people are now starting to question our economic stability. Because of our location and our wealth, Canada should be one of the most stable countries around. Commitments of Canadian governments have outrun their revenues by billions of dollars. The biggest deficits are in the federal fields, but the provincial ones are substantial. If the federal government is going to raise money locally then there is that much less for the junior governments.

All of this points to the problem that governments are now in a bind. To maintain the same level of services would mean extra borrowing is necessary. I think it is a vicious cycle. It is estimated that last year we had a deficit of something like $4.4 billion. It is estimated that in 1978 this will amount to $5 billion, and in 1979 it will amount to $6.3 billion. These estimates are according to Wood Gundy. There are many reasons for this. The Department of Finance has indicated that part of the over-all deterioration is cyclical; but the most recent period of rapid wage and price inflation in Canada has made it more difficult for Canadian manufacturers to compete.

Even if we have a surplus of merchandise trade, we must recognize that the huge borrowing abroad brings with it increased costs which must be met. While the Canadian dollar has only fallen 14 per cent as against the United States dollar, there is some indication of its real value when we compare it to 33 per cent as against the yen in the past year, 28 per cent as against the British pound, and 21 per cent as against the West German mark.

What can we do to increase the possibility of meeting our foreign obligations? Obviously the first area to tackle would be travel, but that would be difficult unless currency controls are instituted and travellers going abroad are prevented from carrying as much money as they would like, which politically would be a very discouraging thing. Increased borrowing for a while would meet these interest obligations, but eventually they would overpower us.

Obviously the best way to encourage meeting the foreign deficit is through exports. Perhaps we forget that we have been hewers of wood and drawers of water. If we do it well, and that is all we can do, we must look at it. We might consider increasing food exports, which seems possible and probable, if we do not have a stifling degree of boards to prevent production and to keep prices up in the interests of stability. We should consider the export of energy, particularly since recent finds have indicated that substantial amounts of natural gas are available and will likely be so for some time in the future. We have to remember that we are interdependent in energy and that we cannot sit on energy, because even when exporting manufactured goods, in a sense you are exporting energy.

It might be wise to consider that the whole thrust of the Foreign Investment Review Board has been wrong. One of the advantages of inviting a partner into a business is that when he does not make any money and the firm does not make any money, you do not pay dividends. But if you borrow from that person, you also incur interest and capital payments, even when the business is falling behind or going broke. In many ways the policies of discouraging foreign investment, and then on the other hand encouraging borrowing abroad with interest and capital payments, are not the best. I feel the foreign investment review thrust has been basically detrimental to our Canadian economy, unless we wish it to run at a much lower level.

As business activity decreases, heavier loads are placed on provincial governments to carry the same and even greater social welfare benefits. Today's Globe and Mail carried a headline to the effect that an Ontario hospital association director warned that the province's will have to discharge 4,000 staff members and charge an extra $5 a day because of provincial budget cuts. This is an indication of things to come. It states that Ontario's hospitals are scheduled to receive an increase of only 4 per cent, which is not nearly enough to meet the 8 per cent inflation rate and to keep them at the present level of operation.

Certainly very serious troubles lie ahead of us. But we are not quite alone and it is comforting to know that other countries face this problem. The Ottawa Journal of today carried an article taken from the London Economist on whether or not growth can continue without inflation. It is interesting that in the United States, which has a much better record than we have, inflation has been hovering around 6 per cent since 1975, a much lower rate of inflation than ours, but the projections are that this inflation rate will continue in the United States. It is obvious to me from discussions that we accept that there should be a lower rate of inflation, but this may well mean a loss of jobs and a loss in output. On the other hand, if we continue to expand our money supply to equal the inflation rate, disaster will occur.

All the western countries appear to be facing Hobson's choice. West Germany is keeping unemployment high but its growth is historically low. Even so, its unemployment rate seems to me considerably lower than ours. How do we reduce inflation without creating a slump in the economy? There seems to be some hope in tax incentive schemes linked to the performance of individual companies, or perhaps more important, a moratorium on cost-increasing legislation. Canadians have had more than their share of vast social programs and we should be wary of expanding them further. Surely we should not have social programs which stunt individual incentive and limit rewards. We must carefully assess whether or not our vast social programs dissuade individuals from saving. At present the only way in which an individual can cope with inflation is to spend as much as possible. In other words, ownership of things is certainly better than ownership of paper savings, such as stocks, bonds and bank accounts.

I believe that this mini-budget, or whatever else you want to call it, is only significant because it has been brought down at this time. I think that the minister has understated the gravity of our economic situation and that only the future will tell us how we have coped in this situation.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, Wetaskiwin is hard to pronounce, and I forgive you for mispronouncing it because members of my own party have had the same difficulty from time to time. I said I would point that out to get back at a member who mispronounced the name of my riding on a platform some time ago.

I consider Bill C-11 to be a very important piece of legislation in that it deals with income tax. The tax part of the legislation is important in that tax policy will determine whether or not our country will move ahead. Goodness knows, at this time we need the kind of guidance that will result in our economy moving ahead. The taxation tool must be used with discretion because, just as positive and progressive taxation measures can result in a vital and growth oriented economy, an ill-advised tax policy can contribute to a sluggish growth in the economy and high unemployment rates. Thus, these proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act must be carefully considered and their implications fully understood before final approval is granted to Bill C-11.

I would like to say at the outset that I find a number of proposals in this bill to be constructive. Measures pertaining to the taxation of the resource industries are proposals that we have been advocating for some time. I have listened to many members speak about the necessity of discovering more energy resources in our country and developing them. Just now we listened to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) say that we should encourage the development of the coal industry in Cape Breton as well as in Alberta and British Columbia. We welcome proposals that will help the oil industry in western Canada in particular look for pools of oil which we know exist in our province, and we need to encourage people to go out and look for them. Perhaps we are learning now the importance of making risk capital available to our small industries for oil discovery because anyone who is associated with the oil industry knows that every time you drill a hole in the ground oil does not come gushing to the surface.

I am also happy to see the measure dealing with the deferral of the capital gains tax, particularly for farmers. I represent a farming area and I know that the farmers in my riding will be looking at this proposal with favour. I am referring to the proposal of the former minister of finance, followed by the present minister, to defer the capital gains tax on the sale of a business or a farm when that amount of money is used to buy another similar business, another farm, equipment or buildings necessary to expand the farm or business. This measure has been advocated for years by the P.C. party. In fact in the last session I moved a private member's motion which advocated exactly the same kind of deferral of capital gains tax on money obtained from the sale of a farm when those proceeds are used to buy another farm or farm equipment.

The government has finally recognized the fact that in many instances a farmer may want to increase the size of his operation but in his area it might be impossible to find more land and therefore he must sell out entirely and buy a piece of property in another area. In the past his options were limited because, in order to do that, he had to sell his property and pay the capital gains tax on the proceeds, which deterred him from expanding his operation in another area. That is why I heartily endorse the amendments to the Income Tax Act in this bill which would allow farmers and small businessmen to defer the capital gains tax.

There is a definite need to change the capital gains tax legislation for corporate farms. In the motion I introduced last spring I also called for the government to defer capital gains tax on corporate farms where the farm was going to be transferred from the owner, whether father or mother, to the child. This idea is not new and many members on all sides of the House regard it as a necessary amendment. The thrust of such legislation would be to extend this roll-over provision to all family farms that are incorporated if it is desired to pass them on to sons or daughters.

The predecessor of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), explaining why such farms were not made eligible for capital gains tax deferral, stated that incorporated farms are normally larger, better financed, and spread over members of a family in order to be used for estate planning. To my way of thinking, the argument that incorporated farms are normally larger is nonsense. The truth of the matter is that many farmers, whether they have large or small scale operations, were strongly influenced some years ago by the Department of Agriculture and encouraged to incorporate. The department's support was apparently based on tax benefits that could result, as well as the more coherent estate planning to be gained from incorporation. Many farmers incorporated because of that advice.

An article in the November 16, 1976, issue of Farm and Country states as follows:

> Forming a farm company has brought more headaches than happiness to many farmers. Producers who heeded earlier advice to incorporate their operations have often found themselves boxed into disadvantageous situations. Now the experts are advising against incorporation.

While this advice forewarns farmers who are considering incorporation, it does little to help those farmers who heeded that advice some years ago and have already incorporated.

The advice given at that time was sound. I should like to put on the record why they stated that farmers at that time—and it applies today—would derive some benefit from incorporation. There are five good reasons for incorporating.

First, a company can be useful for purposes of estate planning or estate freezing, depending upon to whom the shares are issued.

Second, there is preservation of capital. A farm making a net income of $20,000 would pay $5,400 in taxes. If incorporated and no salary was taken, the taxes would be only $4,800. On the other hand if the whole $20,000 were paid out—$10,000 to the farmer and $10,000 to his wife—the taxes would only be $3,800. There is obviously a benefit in taxes if a farm is incorporated.

Third, if the corporation pays the wife a salary, both she and her husband are allowed to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, and upon retirement would draw two pensions.

Fourth, because of limited liability, any act resulting in a judgment against the company would only go against the assets of the company and not against personal assets. That does not often happen, but it is a protection available upon incorporation.

● (2207)

The last reason is that the problems of a company operation after the death of one shareholder are very much smaller than those of an individually owned operation. These are the considerations that the agrologists have been using in giving advice to farm operations about incorporation.

It is my opinion that the roll-over provisions pertaining to capital gains tax which are set out in this bill should be extended to include incorporated family farms. It is not my intention that the wealthy professionals acting as gentlemen farmers should benefit from a roll-over. To my way of thinking the roll-over should be resticted to farm operations where 50 per cent plus of the shares are owned by a bona fide farmer.

I suggest that we put a limit on the assets of a farm which would qualify. Just off the top of my head I think $1 million in assets would be a nice figure with which to start. We should at least get into the act in order to help small incorporated farms. Today $1 million is not a lot of money when we consider how the price of land and machinery is increasing so rapidly.

In addition to extending the roll-over for farm corporations I think the minister should look very seriously at moving up the valuation date for capital gains tax. It is close to six years since the date of December 31, 1971, and at that time the value of farmland was very depressed. As we look at the agricultural situation today, with rising costs and the plummeting of prices, particularly grain prices, it is very difficult for farmers to make any profit to set aside as a retirement fund. The minister should look very seriously at moving up that date so that when a farmer decides to retire and sell his operation, he can use the larger amount of funds for his retirement.

Moving on to the last part of the bill, Part IV, this part asks us to extend some $9 billion in loans to the government. This is an admission by the government that it has lost control of spending. A government which has the audacity to tell Canadians to stop living beyond their means, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told us recently in the Speech from the Throne, now asks parliament to approve what amounts to a $9 billion deficit. Recently the Minister of Finance told us that we should stop saving money and that we should spend it on Canadian goods. This $9 billion is larger than the total budget of the last Progressive Conservative government in this country. It is a telling indictment of a government that long ago ceased to manage that it can look upon drift in our economy as leadership. Canada has become the highest cost producer in the world. Our wages are higher than those of our leading competitor, the United States. Our taxes are amongst the highest in the world. Our transportation costs are relatively higher than those in any other country, and that is because of our vast geography.

In terms of total merchandising trade this country has had a surplus since the early 1960's, with the exception of 1975, when our exports were severly curtailed by the recession in the United States. In the face of this evidence one might conclude that we do not have any trade problem, but our surpluses have obscured alarming trends in the secondary manufacturing area. All during the sixties there was an annual trade deficit in manufactured products of about $3 billion. This deficit has been growing since the turn of the decade. Last year it was over $10 billion. It is getting worse in every single commodity group.

We had been offsetting this deficit up until a few years ago by trade in our natural resource and farm products. Now the price of grain has dropped. Our dollar is worth very much less than it used to be. As well, many of our mineral and forest product prices have dropped.

How many lost jobs are we ignoring in the manufacturing sector by such a deficit? Economists tell us that a $10 billion trade deficit in manufactured goods translates into 175,000 jobs. We need policies, leadership, and confidence in that leadership to get the manufacturing sector going, and the decisions that are being made by hundreds of thousands of businessmen, consumers and people in trade unions must be the right kinds of decisions to get this country going again.

I now wish to speak on clause 13 of the bill. It deals with deductions allowed in respect of an outlay or expense incurred after September 21, 1977, for an advertisement directed primarily to a market in Canada and broadcast by a foreign radio or television station regardless of the date on which the contract of the advertisement was entered into. This gives an advantage to our Canadian broadcasting stations, the CBC, CTV and others. While I endorse the principle, I have some problems with what we are imposing on our businessmen and organizations in that we are restricting their ability to reach the greatest listening audience. As well, we may be forcing them to back a certain program or station they do not like in order to reach that audience and sell a product they are putting on the market.

A couple of weeks ago I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 to that effect that the CBC's presentation and the subject matter contained in the program "The Tar Sands" be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. The reasons for doing that were that they used a mixture of fact and fiction in that program.

The capability of their doing damage to the reputations of prominent figures in this country was there. I was totally disgusted with the premise that a respected radio personality came on and said that part of the program was fact and part was fiction. How were the listening public to know which was which? How were they to discern what was fact and what was fiction?

[Mr. Schellenberger.]

People soon forgot the warning and believed that the drama was all true. This was particularly so because they used look-alike characters, mimicked voices, and used real names which are still very much part of the public world. We cannot allow this kind of character assasination to go on, particularly by our public broadcasting corporation which should be respected as an educational medium as well as a medium to promote harmony and unity. If they had a charge, they should have backed it with facts, and made it. We must protect our freedom and our responsibility to the public with our every efforts. If by supporting these amendments we are in any way encouraging businessmen or advertisers to back a program of this kind, we are doing a disservice to our country.

In conclusion, we can no longer regard the two major issues affecting our future, disunity and worsening economic conditions, as being unrelated. The two are closely intertwined. The days of our strongest unity have been the most prosperous years of our existence. A strong economy is by no means the only answer to national disunity, but it is an essential element of that unity. If this bill does anything to strengthen our economy, it can count on our support.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in the debate on Bill C-11. Our economy is certainly in a serious state. As has been stated earlier, we are facing a $9.2 billion deficit. The minister brought in not long ago this whatever-he-calls-it, he did not call it a budget but it is a budget in everything but name, and in the days that followed, many of us on this side took exception to his smuggling it in so that he could shorten debate and cut off the opposition rather than spend the regular amount of time traditionally allotted to a budget debate. I said the budget was smuggled into the House. He was a smuggler. My hon. friend from Norfolk-Haldimand said it was bootlegged in.

I commend the minister for getting the cabinet to recant as far as the iniquitous legislation having to do with life insurance proceeds is concerned. But he did not go far enough. The legislation still contains certain clauses which will not be satisfactory to those who carry life insurance. Businessmen will be seriously affected. They have probably scrimped and saved to keep up their life insurance policies as a guarantee of security for their families, but also—and this is very important—as an ace-in-the-whole should their businesses run into difficulty and need additional financing.

At this point I must confess to some conflict of interest because I have held a life insurance agent's licence for many years, and I know that when talking to businessmen, as to many types of prospects, attention is drawn to the fact that while a policyholder is living the policy can come to their rescue if they run into hard times. From time to time businessmen go to the bank and the manager asks them to list their assets. And when they list their assets they find they are really not too liquid. One of the questions put to them is whether they have any life insurance. This is because life insurance has a cash value and many businessmen are wise enough to carry life insurance. They are able to assign their policies to the bank and borrow money, using their policies as collateral. This is mostly in their earlier years. Now, if they take an insurance policy to a bank and put it up as security, they can borrow money, depending on their credit, at anywhere from 10 to 12 per cent. They then deduct the interest of 12 per cent as a perfectly legitimate business expense.

The government agrees with this wholeheartedly. With a $20,000 loan at 12 per cent interest, the interest amounts to $2,400. Yet if a person has an insurance policy with a large cash value so he can borrow on the proceeds direct from the insurance company, I can assure my hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton that the interest could be half as much. With many policies which were written a few years ago the borrowing rate is 5 per cent or perhaps 6 per cent. I do not think there are any over 7 per cent. Yet ironically, according to this legislation, Bill C-11, if the rate is 12 per cent or whatever, interest payments on money borrowed for business purposes can be deducted provided the money is borrowed from a bank. Anyone who borrows money on a policy at 6 or 7 per cent is denied that privilege. How logical is that, Mr. Speaker? Money borrowed at 6 or 7 per cent means smaller expense, and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) receives additional income tax. I feel consideration should be given to this point.

If a person has an insurance policy with a cash value of $10,000, and the premiums paid in amount to only $9,000, if the policy is cashed in the holder pays tax on the $1,000 since this is deemed to be income for the year. I suggest that is unfair. I see no reason why the situation should not remain as it was.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is grossly unfair.

Mr. Darling: That is right. I hope the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will see fit to withdraw that provision. Again congratulations to the government for doing what it did, though it certainly did not do it out of the goodness of its heart. I am sure it did it because of tremendous pressure, not only from all across the country but also from some of my very fine friends on the government side who influenced these wiseacres in the cabinet. I hope they will continue to exert the same pressure and see that the remaining clauses are removed as well.

Another matter I want to refer to was mentioned earlier by one of my colleagues. I refer to the generous $350 grant to homeowners to update the insulation of their homes. The kicker in this $350 is that it must be included in taxable income. This will not mean too much to a great many senior citizens and those on fixed incomes because they will not pay income tax on that amount, but I believe that insulating a home could cost as much as $800, $900 or $1,000, and $350 does not go a great way toward meeting that kind of cost. Although it is a help, it is not much help if a person has to pay income tax on the $350. At the present time we are aware that the only homes which will benefit are those homes built prior to 1921. I assume on a sliding scale, as the years go on, it will be upgraded, that is, slightly newer homes will be allowed to participate in this. As I have mentioned before, the grants are higher than this in two specific provinces, namely, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, where the grants are $500 and are non-taxable. Why should there be discrimination against the other eight provinces and the territories? It hardly seems fair, because the amount is little enough at $350.

We are in an energy crisis, and those who live in the northern part of our country know that it costs quite a bit to heat homes. As I have said, $350 is not a big amount. I hope the Minister of Finance will see fit to say that the $350 should not be taxable and classed as income. Surely that is not asking too much.

All of us are trying to conserve energy in every way possible. What better way is there than to insulate our homes to the nth degree? I hope the minister will consider that, on the basis that Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia receive $500 tax-free. I am well aware of the fact that they are entitled to it, but when one considers some of our northern areas, in the west, in the Yukon and so on, one realizes that it requires a lot of oil, gas or whatever, to heat a house during the winter. And one must not forget that the winters are longer up north. I hope the minister will give serious consideration to the request for that $350 to be tax-free and not added to income. I am aware of the fact that certain families can well afford to pay it; but even those in the $15,000 to $20,000 bracket are paying substantial taxes. A great many of them have young families. Perhaps both the husband and wife have to work in order to make that income.

Housing is an important thing in the country's economy. I know the minister in his budget is doing his best to see that the economy will be upgraded and unemployment will be reduced. One way to do that is to make it more attractive for people to buy older homes, which they can improve and insulate.

May I call it 10.30, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR NEW BUDGETARY MEASURES TO RESTORE FULL EMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of today's unemployment statistics showing that unemployment levels in this country remain at crisis levels and will go higher, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the government introduce a budget better designed to restore full employment and stable prices and to ensure our economy will return to its real growth potential.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED NEW BUDGET TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Considering that the Economic Council of Canada in its annual report which was published today forecasts unemployment remaining above eight per cent until the 1980's, even after the effects of the minibudget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) are considered, considering that the same report points out that the recovery of the Canadian economy has been inferior to the recovery of other western economies and considering that the Economic Council recommends an additional $2 billion tax stimulus for the Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Minister of Finance to bring in a new pre-Christmas budget which will have as its principal focus, the creation of jobs for the more than one million unemployed Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMPORTANCE OF ECONOMIC STABILITY IN RELATION TO NATIONAL UNITY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the escalating economic problems that plague this country as a result of the government's inept handling of the economy, and in view of the fact that opposition members have consistently, but without success, been trying to direct the government's attention to the gravity of the economic situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House acknowledges that the profound, if belated, insight revealed by the minister in charge of federal-provincial relations that economic stability is the most urgent priority facing this country fundamental to national unity is one more instance where the Liberal government has belatedly adopted a position put forward by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Statistics Canada today released the unemployment figures for October which show a very substantial increase in the rate of unemployment for the four Atlantic provinces. It now stands seasonally adjusted at 13.5 per cent, an increase of over a full percentage point in one month. Newfoundland is once again leading at 17.4 per cent, up from 15.8 per cent in September, and up 3.5 per cent over the same period last year, thus setting the stage for a crisis of major economic proportions, not to mention the individual suffering that lies behind each one of the statistics. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House directs the Minister of Employment and Immigration to make a statement in the House at the first opportunity outlining what steps the government proposes to take to deal with the growing crisis in the four Atlantic provinces and Quebec, which, while representing 37 per cent of the total work force, already account for 48 per cent of the total national unemployment rate.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTED STATEMENT BY FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL CONCERNING ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES OF FORCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the many questions surrounding the activities of the security service while the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) was Solicitor General. In view of the fact that to date that hon. gentleman has not only neglected to make a personal statement about his involvement and responsibility to this House, but has also been unavailable for questioning, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs be permitted to answer questions about his activities or lack of them as Solicitor General and further that he make a statement about his failure to control continuing illegal activities by officials for whom he was constitutionally responsible.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT OLD AGE PENSION BE GRANTED TO WIDOWS 60 YEARS OF AGE OR OVER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and pressing matter.

Given the fact that widows aged 60 to 65 lose the spouse pension and since they are thus practically to return on the labour market or are forced to rely on social welfare, and given the fact that because of this blatant and inconceivable injustice these persons cannot enjoy peace of mind, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That this House urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to put forward as soon as possible an amendment to the old age security legislation which would allow the spouse to enjoy the benefits of a rightfully entitled pensioner.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be presented without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO RESTORE ECONOMIC EQUILIBRIUM IN QUEBEC AND MARITIMES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the unemployment statistics released today show a constant and increasingly alarming rise in unemployment in Quebec as well as in the Atlantic provinces, that the steps taken by the government to fight unemployment have not given the expected results either in Quebec or the Maritime provinces, and that a serious economic imbalance is being created which runs the risk of becoming irreparable between these and other provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the House urge the Minister of Finance to meet immediately with his Quebec and Atlantic province counterparts to discuss with them special measures which could help correct the current economic imbalance and eliminate in the process any new problem which might disturb our national harmony.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

TRADE

SUGGESTION GATT NEGOTIATORS REQUEST INCREASED ACCESS TO MARKETS FOR AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having regard to the fact that the Canadian fruit and vegetable industry continues to suffer serious financial losses, primarily because of unfair and inadequate tariff levels, and given the fact that on November 1, 1977 the United States government gave notice to all nations taking part in the GATT negotiations that it wants increased market access for its agriculture exports, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta):

That the government immediately serve similar notice to participating countries and that instructions be issued to Canadian negotiators to bargain vigorously on behalf of our domestic industry to ensure that Canadian farmers and food processing industries no longer bear the brunt of international trade-offs.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent before it can be put to the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

RESOURCES

SUGGESTION FEDERAL OFFICIALS APPROVE OPENING NEW COAL MINE IN CAPE BRETON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Premier Gerald Regan of Nova Scotia is quoted in the Toronto Star of October 29 as blaming Ottawa for failing to act on Nova Scotia's problems. According to Premier Regan, and I quote, "Proposals to sink another coal mine in Nova Scotia have become entangled in federal government red tape."

Since, as the minister knows, we are in desperate need of another coal mine in the province, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the federal officials involved remove such red tape in order to clear the way for the immediate opening of a new coal mine in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion under Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

TRANSPORT

PROPOSED COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION OF HALL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS ON MOVEMENT OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, that being the lack of public commitment by the government to recommendations in the Hall Commission Report on grain transportation in relation to, first, the elimination of the stop-off charges for storage and milling of grain in Western Canada, and, second, the elimination of additional charges for moving rapeseed meal and hopper cars and removal of present inequities in rail rates for shipping various grains and livestock products.

Because of the lack of public commitment, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the Minister of Transport appear before the Standing Committee on Transportation to outline the government's proposals for the implementation of the above-mentioned Hall Commission recommendations.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43 such a motion can only be put forward with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF EMPLOYMENT CREDIT SCHEME—POSSIBILITY OF NEW MEASURES

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance I will address my question to the Prime Minister. With today's unemployment figures confirming that regional disparities in our country with respect to the jobless are widening, for example, one in five of our youth in the Atlantic provinces now being out of work and over 50 per cent of those in the construction industry in Saint John, New Brunswick, being without jobs, would the Prime Minister confirm, as did the Minister of Finance, that we shall continue to experience an unemployment level of 8.3 per cent and that 1.1 million may well be without jobs during the winter months?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I would not confirm that.

Mr. Stevens: Having regard to today's disappointing unemployment figures would the Prime Minister tell us when we may expect further elaboration of the employment credit scheme first announced by the Minister of Finance on October 20, bearing in mind that if the scheme is to have any effect on unemployment this winter it must be implemented immediately?

● (1417)

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister did indicate, as we have already indicated in the Speech from the Throne, that we wanted to move forward with this plan. We would be very appreciative if the opposition would co-operate in getting the stimulative measures which are now before the House passed, notably the tax cuts which the minister has moved, so that we can pass on to the next measure.

Mr. Stevens: A final supplementary question, which again I will address to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister asks us to expedite that piece of legislation, but as he will realize, the bill was introduced only yesterday. With unemployment becoming more and more chronic in the country, particularly in Quebec where over 40 per cent of those out of work and looking for jobs have been out of work for three months or longer, would the Prime Minister indicate whether we have seen his entire government's program to relieve unemployment? Has it all been announced to the extent that it is available? In short, did he come up with any new plans which we could hear about while he was snorkeling in the Bahamas?

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO RESTORE ECONOMIC EQUILIBRIUM IN QUEBEC AND MARITIMES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. Considering the statistics released this morning which show that problems are increasing in Quebec and the Maritimes, is the minister willing, under the circumstances, to summon immediately the finance ministers of those provinces so that together they may find solutions to correct that economic imbalance at the national level?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, about a month ago I had the opportunity to meet all finance ministers for two days in Ottawa. We dealt with those problems and I told them about the general steps taken in the budget. By and large the finance ministers of Quebec and the Maritimes entirely agreed with the economic policy which I intended to follow.

INQUIRY AS TO MINISTER'S USE OF $100 MILLION PROVINCIAL CREDIT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. I know that the Minister of Finance has referred to a $100 million credit for direct employment. Would he be prepared to tell us soon whether this $100 million will be spent mainly in these provinces, and could he tell us today to what type of program this $100 million will be allotted to correct the situation in these provinces?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the bill I introduced in the House yesterday, we are using for the first time a formula providing for particular tax incentives for the Maritime provinces and Gaspésie. Instead of credits of 5 per cent, we are allowing credits of 10 per cent and 7½ per cent for the rest of the province of Quebec. It is the first time our tax policy includes incentives of this nature which are to be applied on a regional basis.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL AID CONSTRUCTION OF CONGRESS CENTRE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary. The Minister of Finance met recently with the ministers of the province of Quebec who are responsible for economy-oriented departments, and I do not think we have heard any details about this meeting as yet. Is the Minister of Finance in a position to tell the House today what kind of concrete proposals were discussed and whether his government has made a decision on the funding of the congress center proposed by the government of Quebec in Montreal?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): As far as the last part of the question is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is of course a decision to be made by the provincial government. They have not yet determined the site nor the style of the congress center they would like to build, so it is up to them to make the necessary decision.

As to the particular situation of Quebec, I am constantly concerned because the unemployment level rises regularly and because the factors which were responsible for a decrease in the unemployment rate in Ontario last month should have applied in Quebec. I think perhaps the government of Quebec should begin to contemplate removing the uncertainty among investors and holding its referendum as soon as possible.

[English]

REQUEST FOR NEW BUDGET TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister always has an excuse for his own government's failure. I should like to quote from the report of the Economic Council of Canada released this morning which states that the recovery of the Canadian economy has lagged behind that of other western countries. They suggested it has lagged behind, and, therefore, the government's excuse that we are suffering from some international problem does not hold water. Let me point out to the minister that the same council suggests we are going to have eight per cent unemployment well into the 1980's, and specifically suggested that the government ought to stimulate the economy by a further $2 billion. Will the Minister of Finance recognize at long last that his policies have been wrong and now promise the people of Canada he will bring in a budget before Christmas that will produce some jobs?

● (1422)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would think that to borrow another $2 billion at this time in an attempt to buy our way out of the economic difficulties we are in would not be responsible. I think what is required is a joint effort by the federal government, the provincial governments and the private sector. It is not my belief that irresponsible action on the part of the Minister of Finance would be of any good to the nation.

UNEMPLOYMENT—MEASURES TO CREATE JOBS IN CERTAIN SECTORS OF THE ECONOMY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, that is the first time I have heard that stimulation of the consumer side would lead to unemployment or would be buying our way out. Every economist in the country except the minister's own advisers are recommending that course of action.

Considering that the real problem is a sector problem—and I agree with the minister in that regard, because the government has done nothing about it—will the minister tell us with reference to the shoe industry, the textile industry, the shipbuilding industry and/or the auto industry, all of which are in trouble now, what specific proposals his government has to produce jobs in those sectors?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am thinking of all those sectors to which the hon. member referred. In particular, last November, when I was Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I took it upon myself to impose quotas in the textile industry. A number of people on the other side blamed me for having done that. In addition to that, in relation to the construction of naval equipment, and perhaps the hon. member does not know that, we have increased from 12 per cent to 20 per cent the subsidies in that construction field. Further to that, the statistics today indicated that within a year in Canada we have created 292,000 new jobs, which is in fact 40,000 more than was predicted by the Minister of Finance in the spring.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED CANCELLATION OF TAX CONCESSIONS TO CORPORATIONS AND USE OF MONEY FOR DIRECT JOB CREATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Just one million fewer than are required. If we consider the crucial manufacturing sector, comparing the number of jobs we had in October of this year with October of last year, we will find we have lost 59,000. That was a net loss of jobs in that manufacturing sector in spite of the minister's decision to give $1.2 billion in special corporate tax concessions for that industry to overexpand even more. Industry is not using that money to expand further because its directors are not stupid. Given the crucial importance of the manufacturing industry to Canada and the need for stimulation, will the minister cancel this ridiculous $1.2 billion corporate tax concession to encourage further unused capacity and use the same money in the form of direct job creation or as a tax stimulus to the consumer?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that in the budget which I presented in the House a few weeks ago I indicated I was giving more than $700 million—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: It was a budget?

Mr. Chrétien: If you prefer I could call it an economic speech, but for me it was the same thing. Perhaps it was not the same thing for you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: I know that hon. members were complaining at the time that we were not acting. Now they are complaining that we are acting with imagination and too quickly for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: The best way to improve the Canadian economy is by making Canadian products more competitive in world markets. We have taken some very important steps in that regard as I outlined in the House of Commons, specifically when I asked all Canadians to reduce increased compensation to six per cent in order that our competitive position, as compared to other nations in the world, would improve. Considering the fact that the Canadian dollar has returned to a more reasonable level I think the situation will now improve by making Canadian products more competitive in the world, and the situation will correct itself.

● (1427)

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVE PROGRAM FOR INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. To begin with, I am sure all members of the House would join me in welcoming him back to the House from his holiday where he was scuba diving while the economy was nose diving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: As a practical and workable plan containing an employment incentive for industry is our best hope, the same type of thing that I worked out and presented on January 25, 1977 in detail—and the government was well aware of the presentation I made at that time—I would ask the Prime Minister why it is that his government has waited so long and still shows no sign of presenting such an employment incentive to create jobs in our present economic atmosphere? In fact the government's plan is reported to be nothing more than having made available $100 million. Do we have to wait for the government to make up its mind as to what it is going to do?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has a question, perhaps he can put it.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in view of what I have said, I ask the Prime Minister why the government has not presented an employment incentive plan such as I have outlined to him? If the government ever intends to present such an incentive, when will that time be?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be back in the House now that the opposition is turning its mind to economic questions, rather than knocking the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: It is all your fault.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You will have to apologize twice today.

Mr. Trudeau: We plan to bring the tax incentive scheme for job creation, which the Minister of Finance talked about, before the House before Christmas.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Which Christmas? I hope it is not the Ukrainian Christmas.

Oral Questions

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO INCREASE EMPLOYMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Given the fact that the Statistics Canada report on unemployment today indicates that the five eastern provinces of this country, while representing only 37 per cent of the work force, have more than 48 per cent of the total unemployment—for example, 13.5 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and 11.4 per cent in Quebec; given the fact that the Economic Council of Canada in its report indicated that job creation incentives of the minister are not enough and that new initiatives are needed; and given the crisis situation we are facing in the Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec, my question to the minister is: what response can the unemployed of those provinces expect from him as the Minister of Employment and Immigration?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, from time to time we have the doom and gloom emphasis of the hon. member; but in so far as his particular province is concerned—

An hon. Member: When you lose your home, it is pretty sad.

Mr. Cullen: Do you want to hear some figures? I have listened to the shouting. Perhaps we should hear some facts. Institutional and industrial trade for 1977-1978 for the province of Newfoundland alone will be $13.3 million; 8,000 jobs on Canada Works Phase II; 3,200 jobs on Canada Works Phase I; and Canada Works, 3,000 jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: These were initiatives taken by the government recognizing the situation and not waiting for reports from OECD, from any other agency or newspaper headlines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wish the minister would tell that to the 100,000 people in the Atlantic provinces who are unemployed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1432)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding what the minister has said, 40 per cent of those looking for work have been unemployed for three months or more; their unemployment insurance benefits have thereby expired. Given the tragedy behind all these statistics, I ask the minister sincerely what he intends to present to the employment ministers of the four Atlantic provinces with whom he will meet on November 15. Is he prepared to broaden that meeting to include the manpower minister from the province of Quebec, and is he prepared to tell the House that indeed new initiatives are necessary in order to prevent what everybody but the minister recognizes will be a crisis this winter?

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, there was quite a bit in that speech. I think I should respond first by saying that I have pointed out to the unemployed people in the Atlantic provinces that these initiatives are being taken and that there is some hope. The gloom and doom approach of the opposition is not very helpful.

In so far as the meeting with the Atlantic ministers is concerned, that meeting is their initiative, and I have agreed to meet with them. They are meeting with me here in Ottawa, and I am prepared to meet with the minister from Quebec if that should be that minister's wish. However, they are the people setting the terms and conditions, and they are the people bringing other representations to me. In the interim we are looking at things like the spruce budworm situation in Nova Scotia to see what can be done. We are looking at the Gull Island project to see if something can be done there by way of an emergency response by the Canada Works program. There is a myriad of things. We recognize that we have a problem, particularly at this time. There has always been seasonal unemployment in that area, but we do not give up hope like the hon. member does.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, this gloom and doom does not come from me; it comes from Statistics Canada. Given the fact that there has been an increase of only 6,000 jobs in the labour force of the Atlantic provinces so far but that there has been a net increase in the number of people coming on to the labour force of 20,000, a lag of 14,000 in this region alone, is the minister prepared to recognize that job creation programs, commendable and necessary as they are, by and of themselves are not enough? We need more right now.

An hon. Member: We always need more.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, let us consider that thanks to the representations made by hon. members from Newfoundland—primarily on this side of the House—Newfoundland stands fourth in the gross amount of money made available under Canada Works and Young Canada Works. No one is suggesting that the government alone can meet this particular problem. It is not something which can be solved by one department alone. That is why I hope the initiatives taken by the Minister of Finance will receive speedy passage. They were introduced yesterday or the day before, and I say let us get on with those initiatives and create some jobs.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

PLANS TO MODERNIZE SYDNEY STEEL MILL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the latest tragic unemployment figures released today and in view of the continuing, nauseating increasing unemployment figures on Cape Breton Island and eastern Nova Scotia, where at the moment it reaches 30 per cent—those are not my figures; they come from academics, clergymen, chambers of commerce and labour—what steps is the minister and his government taking at the moment, and what steps have been taken with the premier of Nova Scotia or the President of Sydney Steel Corporation, to provide the necessary funds to modernize and rejuvenate the Sydney steel mill? That would create more jobs.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, during the last few years my department and DEVCO in particular have invested each year an average of $40 million in Cape Breton to support and develop existing businesses and create new ones. That is what we have done. We are now considering a subsidy application from SYSCO for a plant upgrading program and we hope that a decision will soon be taken in that regard.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman seems to be a bit confused. I asked a question about SYSCO, not DEVCO. I asked about the Sydney Steel Corporation. In view of the fact that the minister and other ministers sitting over there have told me in the past that moneys would be made available for modernization and rejuvenation of the Sydney Steel plant and that they have also made statements outside the House—and I should warn the minister and the government that if something is not done on Cape Breton Island we will have severe unrest this winter—for God's sake what is the minister, the Prime Minister and this government going to do?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. gentleman missed the latter part of my answer. We have received an application from SYSCO—

Mr. Muir: I know that.

Mr. Lessard: —with regard to a proposal to modernize the existing facilities. This is being considered, and a decision should be arrived at very soon. However, that is only part of our activities in support of the economy of Cape Breton Island. The hon. gentleman knows very well that we have been very active in trying to bring industries and all kinds of development to Cape Breton Island over the last few years.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, since we have been assured that money is going to be provided to rejuvenate the Sydney Steel plant, and the minister says soon, is it going to be next month or the month after, or do we have to wait until there is a provincial election or a federal election and let these poor people be used as pawns in an election?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, election or not, every year we have been spending money through DEVCO and other agencies in Cape Breton, in Nova Scotia and in the maritimes, and we will carry on doing so for the purpose of meeting the needs of these people.

INQUIRY WHETHER FORCE MADE ILLEGAL RAIDS BEFORE 1973

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General.

In view of the revelations made with regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police activities in 1973, which actions were revealed by the minister himself, can the minister tell the House whether or not he has checked to see if similar activities took place prior to 1973, and more specifically during and before the October 1970 crisis?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, naturally, following my statement to the House in June of last year, we examined our files in an effort to determine whether or not the RCMP might possibly have committed other illegalities. As a result of that decision, Mr. Speaker, we decided to refer the whole matter to a royal commission of inquiry set up by the federal government whose terms of reference include the study of all practices and procedures, and the calling in of witnesses and taking of their depositions under oath to determine whether or not there may indeed have been other illegal activities. Mr. Speaker, I feel that that is now the responsibility of the commission. In any event, even if I were to say yes or no to the hon. member in this House, he would not be satisfied with my answer. To some extent that is why, Mr. Speaker, we ourselves set up a royal commission of inquiry in order that this type of activity might be completely brought to light.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. I would ask the minister to be more specific since this is a very serious issue. Has he obtained, in respect of events of 1970, the same kind of information he has had about those of 1973? This is a very specific question.

Mr. Fox: The question is extremely specific, Mr. Speaker. If my understanding of it is correct, it asked whether there were before 1970 indications of the type referred to in connection with the 1972-73 period. The answer is extremely clear, extremely specific. I have had no indication whatever of that type of activity in the period referred to by the hon. member.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—SUGGESTED MODERATION OF PROPOSED INCREASE IN TOLLS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Given the serious divergence of opinion as between the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and the many well informed users of the seaway from Sept Iles to Thunder Bay, who believe that the near doubling of the tolls will create disastrous results, possibly some diversion of iron ore from Sept Iles to Philadelphia and grain perhaps through the Mississippi system, is the minister looking at these serious concerns, and will he come up with a proposal which is a little more moderate than the present proposal and also a little more in keeping with the spirit of the anti-inflation program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question of the impact of the St. Lawrence Seaway tolls upon shipments through the seaway was taken very fully into consideration before proposals were made in relation to those tolls. I am not surprised that those who actually have to pay tolls would prefer lower rates. That is the group from whom we have been hearing. The fact is that other costs of transportation have increased much more in the period since 1959, and no toll increases have taken place since then. The new tolls will represent, generally speaking, a smaller portion of transportation costs than the tolls did in 1959. They will represent a smaller portion related to the value of the goods than was the case in 1959. While any increase may be cited later as a reason for one or other particular diversion, I think these facts should be borne in mind when analyzing that and recognizing that other costs have been increasing much more. I am confident that the volume of goods going through the seaway will continue to increase quite remarkably over the next three or four years, notwithstanding our going to a more sensible financial arrangement in relation to tolls.

ALLEGED FAILURE OF PROGRAMS TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Today's figures show that unemployment among young people continues to run at two and a half times the unemployment rate for those over 25 and that this trend is accelerating. Will the minister tell the House why this government's programs to reduce unemployment among young people have failed so dismally and what he intends to do about this problem?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if there were an area of major concern, it is the fact of youth unemployment. That is why I will be attending a meeting of the OECD in Paris to discuss with my colleagues from other countries the same problem that is being faced by them. In addition, we have a series and a myriad of programs that are in place. Our job experience training program for the summer will be increased sixfold for the winter component. We will be looking at that as only one of several avenues to be taken in dealing with what is a very, very difficult problem.

[Mr. McRae.]

GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO REDUCE LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG PEOPLE

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. The 1977 Review of the Economic Council of Canada forecasts unemployment rates of seven per cent or more into the 1980's. It notes that if their projections are correct the extra $150 million federal winter works projects and the new $100 million employment credit program will not be sufficient to bring about the reduction in either youth or adult unemployment that is needed. It cautions that additional measures at both levels of government are likely to be necessary in both 1978 and 1979. May I ask the minister what action he is prepared to take to reduce this level of unemployment among young people which is currently at the level of 383,000 young Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the most efficient step at this time would be to restore throughout Canada a spirit of confidence and a new belief in this country's future. In the budgets that were put forward we have stated I believe that there was no way the problem could be solved by a government or governments, the private sector must assume its responsibilities. For that reason we have decided to reintroduce the measures put forward by my predecessor the hon. member for Rosedale. It is our hope that the incentives proposed last spring in the budget, together with my economic statement of this fall, will create the kind of climate that is desirable for a strong economic recovery in Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST OVER DECORATION AWARDED PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the statement of the French premier, Raymond Barre in which he rebuffed the protest expressed by the Canadian ambassador, Mr. Gerard Pelletier, over the award of a high decoration to the premier of Quebec and who is quoted in the newspapers as saying that the French government is well brought up in the rules of international courtesy, does the Canadian government intend to express any further diplomatic initiative in reply to this statement?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, beyond pointing out to the people of Quebec, as I believe the Minister of Finance did the other day, that Quebec would be more interested in receiving investment from France as Saskatchewan, as Alberta or Nova Scotia does, than receiving medals.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister and the government regard the expression as being within the rules and parameters of diplomatic usage?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Well, once more, Mr. Speaker, that matter of medals has less significance to the Quebec people than that of investments. But as everyone knows, while France has numerous investments in other Canadian provinces, it seems that in Quebec the government will be satisfied with medals. I do not think the significance is any greater than that.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—DISPOSITION OF INSPECTOR VERMETTE'S LETTER

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. No doubt it has been called to the attention of the Prime Minister that Senior Inspector Vermette, six weeks after the break-in at the APLQ, wrote to the Ottawa headquarters of the RCMP suggesting or recommending that matters in regard to the break-in be put at the disposition of the Prime Minister and/or the Security Council "because of the present political climate." I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has checked to see if Inspector Vermette's advice or message was conveyed to anybody within the RCMP and if so, to whom?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, whether it would be conveyed to someone within the RCMP I believe would be a question to be directed to the Solicitor General. So far as it being directed to my office or myself, we have checked and there has been no reference of that kind.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question which I think directly relates to the Prime Minister and his responsibilities. The suggestion that was made was that the matter also be called to the attention of Mr. Walter Luyendyk, who I understand was assistant secretary to the Cabinet committee on security and intelligence. Can the Prime Minister say whether in fact this break-in was called to the attention of the assistant secretary of the Cabinet committee at or about this time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will check into that. I do know that if it was it certainly was not called to my attention but I doubt very much if it would have been called to the attention of the assistant secretary of Cabinet.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST THAT LANDING STRIP AT ST. LEONARD BE EXTENDED

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Since a 4,000-foot runway is under construction in St. Leonard for the northwestern New Brunswick airport, and since Eastern Provincial Airways filed an application with the Canadian Transport Commission to add St. Leonard to their flight schedule, is the minister inclined to recommend immediately that the runway be extended to 6,000 feet, and also to go forward with other airport projects in the Atlantic area, to improve significantly the chances of survival of the regional air carrier designated by the government?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to discuss an even longer runway than that presently planned for St. Leonard. I will be going to Grand Falls on November 21 and will be glad to discuss that issue with the airport commission at that time. Of course, airports in the Atlantic region have been receiving a good deal of attention from us because, in addition to the improvements at St. Leonard, work is going on at Charlo, Wabush and Gander. I am happy to say we have today announced the decision to proceed with the major new improvements to the airport on Prince Edward Island.

BREAK-IN AT L'AGENCE DE PRESSE LIBRE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISPOSITION OF LETTER FROM INSPECTOR VERMETTE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and follows along the lines of the questions asked by the hon. member for Greenwood. In his answer the Prime Minister said with certainty that the communication referred to had not come to him. As he will recall from published news reports, the report was that the recommendation had been that it go either to the Prime Minister and or ministers. I assume since the Prime Minister has investigated his own case he has also investigated the case of his ministers. Can he give us a categorical assurance today that the communication referred to did not go to any of his ministers as well? If he cannot give us that today will he give an undertaking to report tomorrow? I understand he is going to be away again tomorrow so could he have somebody report tomorrow both upon whether there was a communication to any minister and whether there was a communication to the official of the Cabinet committee on security and intelligence?

● (1452)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the last part of the question is concerned, I just gave the undertaking to the hon. member for Greenwood. In so far as other ministers are concerned, the Solicitor General would be the minister to whom it would be conveyed other than myself. He has already stated that he did not receive that communication. I can ask him to ascertain once again that fact.

Mr. Clark: We are dealing here with the Solicitor General at least twice removed in this case. Are we to understand we now have from either the Prime Minister or the present Solicitor General an assurance that the correspondence or report referred to did not come to either the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the present Minister of Supply and Services or the present Solicitor General? Is that the case?

Mr. Trudeau: If the question is related to the break-in of the APLQ, yes, that assurance has been given to me by the previous Solicitor General.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—POSSIBLE LIMITATION ON DISCLOSURE BY MINISTERS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question. It relates to the policy of the Government of Canada concerning testimony that the Prime Minister of Canada will be giving when he responds to any subpoena that might come from the McDonald royal commission. I would like to know whether it will be the policy of the government of Canada to have limits upon the full disclosure of the role of the Prime Minister or any minister in any matter before the McDonald inquiry.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, "in the modern world, governments have to authorize and follow some secret activities."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure from where that quotation came which the Prime Minister so carefully read, but I would like him to stop keeping secrets from the House of Commons on the question of policy of the government. Is it the policy of the government that in any testimony he gives under subpoena to the McDonald royal commission there will be any limits upon the full disclosure of his role or the role of any minister in any matter relating to the terms of reference of the commission of Mr. Justice McDonald?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition wants to know from where I got that quotation. I got it from page 453 of Hansard. I was reading the beginning of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this may appear to the Prime Minister to be good grammar, but I remind him that this is the House of Commons of Canada where he is responsible to parliament on questions relating to the policy of this government. Three times I have asked him what is the policy of his government on this question. Twice, as usual, he refused to answer questions on policy in this House. I would like him now to answer that question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Leader of the Opposition should be saying I am downgrading the House of Commons when I share his opinion. Even the Leader of the Opposition realizes there are some areas of government which might operate in secrecy. Having stated that very wise piece of policy, I read in vain all of his speech on Monday night of last week and found nothing constructive as to what the policy should be for the government on revealing or not revealing what should be kept secret.

If there were a subpoena, and the question is hypothetical, issued to any member of this government, he would be guided by the law officers of the Crown as to what he would be entitled to say or not say under the Official Secrets Act. I can say for my part and the part of all members of my government that we would be anxious to tell the commission everything we knew. However, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated, there may be some areas which must be kept secret and we would be guided by the law officers of the Crown in that regard.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ALLEGED FAILURE OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE OF POLICY FOR ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with a problem equally as pressing to those in the Atlantic provinces. I direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In the words of the minister's colleagues, the regional economic programs of his department have failed. The Economic Council of Canada indicated in its second last report and other working papers that there is a surplus potential for development in the Atlantic provinces which has not been tapped. It can be tapped by an application of fiscal policies far beyond those suggested by the Minister of Finance the other night. Does the minister agree that it is now time to propose to his colleagues the very serious proposition that the basic philosophy and utilization of DREE, AIDA and other programs have failed and suggest a change in basic primary philosophy?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I obviously do not share the hon. member's point of view that the activities of DREE have been a failure. At the APEC meeting in Halifax the other day, the discussion, as I understand it, was that although DREE had not achieved all the expectations, it was not a failure. The support we receive from groups in the Atlantic area will be of great help in achieving solutions and new programs in that area which will help to alleviate unemployment. We are working with the people in the area as well as the provincial government in an attempt to bring in that development.

Mr. Forrestall: Has the minister given consideration to changing the basic program and finding a program to alleviate the very desperate situation with regard to economic development in the Atlantic region? Is he saying that at this time consideration is not being given to the development of a new philosophy and policy with regard to the development of the Atlantic economy?

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, the development program we have at present with each of the provinces is a very flexible mechanism. It can respond to any firm proposal from individuals as well as provincial governments. Through that mechanism we are engaged in promoting development of the area. We are in full consultation and cooperating with the provinces and private industry in this matter.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL STATEMENT LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT EIGHT PER CENT UNTIL 1980—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It concerns the lack of concern shown by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance regarding the state of our unemployed. The minister is probably aware of this report which was recently released by the Economic Council of Canada. It states that even with the measures announced in October by the federal Minister of Finance, the unemployment rate will probably remain above the eight per cent level until the 1980's. In my view, that means we will be faced with an eight per cent unemployment rate until 1980 affecting some 1.3 million people. Does the minister agree with that statement? If not, what is the rate and the target that his government is proceeding with right now?

● (1502)

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I have not seen the report the hon. member quoted; it was issued only this morning. But we are working on a joint effort with provincial governments all over Canada, particularly in the Atlantic provinces, in conjunction with the private enterprise system. That is what we are doing. It is not only our responsibility. It is a responsibility shared with all three elements involved. We are doing everything possible to expand the opportunities available, to bring about development and reduce the number of the unemployed. It is not an easy task, but we are facing it.

Mr. Alexander: I wish the minister would quit foot dragging with me. I asked him a specific question. I asked him whether he accepts the statement of the Economic Council that we shall be faced with unemployment running at over eight per cent until the 1980s, and, if he disagrees with it, what target is the government considering. Don't play games, Sir. This is a very serious matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lessard: I am not playing any games with the hon. gentleman. I am not agreeing with any figures. What I am aiming to do is to reduce unemployment. There is no set level in my mind. My level will be enough jobs for all who wish to work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—ALLEGED "BUGGING" OF MEMBERS' OFFICES—PRIME MINISTER'S REMARKS

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are two procedural matters outstanding. There is the question of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition on Thursday of last week concerning remarks made by the Prime Minister, and there is also the point of order raised by the hon. member for St. John's East concerning documents allegedly cited by the Solicitor General and by the Prime Minister. It would be appropriate, perhaps, to take first the question of privilege which is outstanding. A contribution was made initially by the Leader of the Opposition, while reserving his right to make further argument. Perhaps we might hear further argument at this time. I might add that the motion outstanding on the question of privilege is in the name of the hon. member for Peace River. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I was, of course, following the excellent and wise course taken by the Leader of the Opposition when he first rose on this question. Despite all my yammering, friends opposite may say, it was legitimately and properly raised by the Leader of the Opposition who, unlike the Prime Minister does feel the House of Commons has an important part to play.

This is a very precise case, and the facts are fairly simple. I think probably the Prime Minister lost his cool. However, he has had an opportunity to cool off in the Bahamas. He should have taken the advice he so often gives to other people, to go placidly amid the noise and haste and remember what peace there may be in silence. At any rate, the Prime Minister, as reported at page 600 of Hansard, said this:

> They can stand in their places and challenge them, if they have the courage, but I would suggest the way to do it is not by hiring private detectives, as that party does, and not by having some phony bugs planted in their office, which is the way they do it.

The right hon. gentleman might have been in a mood of impotence—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —or political frustration. Leaders of governments often get into that position, especially when their governments are like the one he leads, and I sympathize with him in this respect. But when the statement to which I have just referred was called to the attention of the Prime Minister by the leader of my party, he saw fit to compound his offence by saying:

> I have not, of course, said that he has been involved. I said the inference might be that members of the other party, no one particular person but the party itself—

After that, the Minister of Justice rose and said, in the course of a limited intervention, that what had been complained of constituted a criminal offence. Put those two together and there is no other inference to be drawn than that the Prime Minister was suggesting that members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition stood suspected of having committed a criminal offence.

If the Prime Minister had seen fit, when I started, to get up and make a generous withdrawal, it might not have been necessary to have taken the matter further. However, I do not see a look of generosity on his face at the moment, so I shall continue. It may be argued that this was a statement made against a number of members who were unnamed.

I would call to Your Honour's attention a number of precedents and, in particular, a very interesting brief by Mr. Laundy of the Library of Parliament research branch, dated May 28, 1969, in which reference is made to a famous case in England where a number of Conservative members who were holding private meetings in connection with government business were the subject of allegations that they were selling private information for food and drink provided by the press gallery.

Mr. Gillies: It could never happen here.

Mr. Baldwin: The following is from a report which was made by a committee which considered the issue:

> An unfounded imputation in regard to such meetings involves an affront to the House as such. Your committee consider that an unjustified allegation that members regularly betray the confidence of private party meetings either for payment or whilst their discretion has been undermined by drink, is a serious contempt.

I maintain that what the Prime Minister said against us is such a statement as to bring the proceedings of the whole House into disrepute. In reverse, if the Prime Minister is allowed to make a statement of that kind, I would be perfectly justified in saying what millions of people may believe—I am putting it forward hypothetically—that it may well be that the government instituted the irregular proceedings which were complained of many years ago, knew about them immediately afterward, and has covered them up ever since. If the Prime Minister is allowed to make the kind of statement he has made, then I am entitled to make such a statement; one which, for the present at least, I have put forward hypothetically.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River has made my task considerably easier by the conclusion he has just reached. If I were able to make that general statement last Thursday, then surely that side of the House would be able, without breaking the rules of the House, to make general statements about this side having covered up an illegal act. Mr. Speaker, they have been saying nothing else for the past week.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Shame.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member may say "Shame", but to demonstrate the reality of the case put forward by the hon. member for Peace River, all I had to do was read one day's Hansard of last week. I chose Monday because members opposite made a lot of speeches that day. But Your Honour will note that during the whole of the week, if one accusation was made about a cover-up, there were 100. I shall refer to some of them—not to the entire 100, of course. Stop me when you have heard enough. I intend to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Tory party is a bunch of cry babies.

• (1512)

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They have been accusing the government, and not only the government but named ministers, myself and the Solicitor General, of an incredible number of illegal acts, not only by innuendo but by direct accusation. "Cover-up" is the phrase which is used all the time. They say there has been a cover-up of illegal acts, making the government an accomplice to illegalities committed by the RCMP, and so on.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in this House, Speakers have frequently ruled that when the accusation is general, when it does not relate to a particular member, it is translated by a form of argument or suspicion. I was faced with the hon. member for Central Nova who, after having discovered a listening device in his office, accused the RCMP, said that he suspected them, and then went on to say—

Mr. Stevens: You are wrong.

Mr. Paproski: Read Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: They ask me to read it, Mr. Speaker, and I will; but first let me outline my argument. I am faced with a member who impugns the RCMP and the services with having bugged him. I reverse the charges, Mr. Speaker. I say that if the hon. member for Central Nova has cause to suspect the RCMP, and I suggest he does not, then we might have cause to suspect the Tory party. After all, this bug was discovered on Monday afternoon of last week by an investigation officer who happened to be in town on that particular day.

Mr. Chrétien: With the proper instrument.

Mr. Trudeau: With the proper instruments for debugging. He found a bug that could only have been placed, if the timing is correct, on Friday afternoon after the Solicitor General had made a statement on security. It all looked very suspicious, Mr. Speaker, but I told the House that I did not have anything more than suspicion. Your Honour can judge whether the kind of suspicion that I direct toward the Tory party is any different, not from suspicion but from the dozens and hundreds of direct accusations which they make in this House all the time about the government being dishonest, crooked, covering up and everything else. Let me read a few quotations, Mr. Speaker, from the hon. member for Central Nova, since I am asked by the opposition to do so. I read from several newspapers. If it were only one, perhaps we could wonder what the member had—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not going to be allowed to read excerpts from the press. This was said in the House.

Mr. Clark: And I have Hansard here, sir.

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition does not rely on the press gallery, Mr. Speaker. It does not believe that one newspaper can be relied on to report correctly the hon. member for Central Nova.

Mr. Clark: Your statement was made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Trudeau: Here is a quotation from the London Free Press for November 1, 1977:

—MacKay indicated "right off the top, I would have to say that those who would have motivations to put it there—"

That is, the bug.

"—would be some of the people in the security services."

Then the Toronto Star for November 1:

"Among the people who would have a motivation to do this would be some people in the (RCMP) security service or possibly Robin Bourne's group".

The Globe and Mail, November 1:

However, he said it was obviously planted by someone who had "some expertise". While he acknowledged that it could have been planted by a private detective, he said it seemed more like—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, do you realize the precedent you are setting?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In respect to the point about the accusations previously made by the hon. member for Central Nova, it seems to me that the introduction of quotations of that hon. member in respect to that event are relevant to the argument. Two or three quotations have been given, but I do not think it is necessary to go on at any greater length. The point is well taken. Perhaps we could move on to another point.

Mr. Trudeau: All right, Mr. Speaker, I will not go on, but I can assure you that the next day, in different newspapers, the same kind of accusation was made by the hon. member for Central Nova. Whether it was made in the House or outside the House, the fact is that the RCMP was dragged in the dirt by the hon. member for Central Nova.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition suspect the RCMP. I suspect the Tory party. If Your Honour rules that that kind of suspicion is not becoming of the House of Commons, I will withdraw it. I would just suggest—and I am completely in accord with the hon. member for Peace River—that if I cannot make that kind of general statement in the heat of debate, when I have been constantly interrupted and heckled by the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Cry baby.

Mr. Hees: Get out your crying towel, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: Now it turns out that I am the cry baby, Mr. Speaker. I did not raise a question of privilege when in this House the leader of the NDP and Tory members one after the other stood and accused the government of cover-up and worse. I was not crying about that. I simply said that if they wanted to suspect us, go ahead and say so; but let us hear what they think about government policy in regard to the RCMP. Let us hear them state it. Let me read once again what they said, Mr. Speaker, though I do not know whether I should start at the beginning or at the end.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps I will start with the leader of the New Democratic Party. As reported at page 415 of Hansard, he moved a motion condemning the government, and most specifically the Prime Minister for his implication in the cover-up. I will skip over the members of the Creditiste party because they had a lot to say. Let me read what the hon. member for Peace River had to say. He moved a motion, but he had other things to say, and I will join him a little later, Mr. Speaker. Then the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot had this to say, as reported at page 417 of Hansard:

My motion relates to statements by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) condoning illegal activities—

I turn now to the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River, on the same page:

Having regard to serious allegations of a cover-up by the government and especially the Solicitor General of Canada—

Again the phrase "cover-up", Mr. Speaker. I now quote the Leader of the Opposition, page 419 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, in the interests of the continuing cover-up—

That is, by hon. members opposite. Who, Mr. Speaker? Us? We are covering up? Is the Leader of the Opposition accusing us of something? Are we crying and asking him to withdraw each time he says something like that?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You should have; it would have shown your bona fides.

● (1522)

Mr. Trudeau: I should have? I will do it now.

An hon. Member: It's too late.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar says I should have raised a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If you were really bona fide, you would have.

Mr. Trudeau: If I were really bona fide, you say. I am just following the invitation of the hon. member for Peace River who suggested that if I could say that, then they should be allowed to say it too. They have been saying it all along. Let me continue my quotations. Again we hear from the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who said:

I do not use the word lightly and I use it carefully.

That is a bit of drama, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: He went on:

I think we are clearly involved in a cover-up in this matter involving the cabinet.

Another accusation, Mr. Speaker, in pretty specific terms.

An hon. Member: Pure corn.

Mr. Trudeau: I said I was going to quote the hon. member for Peace River. He said:

—it being quite clear that under the doubtful use of security and for probably illegal methods this government and its agencies have had no compunctions about making improper inquiries into political parties and politicians—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: The gentleman from the west.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Order; Mr. Speaker has risen.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Prime Minister began by indicating the purpose for the quotations, and the purpose is relevant to the argument; there can be no question about that. He also extended to the Chair the invitation to stop him when I heard otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The point is, indeed, serious and relevant, but I think it has been documented in respect of the general accusations by members on one side or the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I accept your invitation, and I will skip about 100 pages of Hansard and go to page 496—which was rather late, I guess, in the debate—when the hon. member for St. John's wound up the debate, or just about did, for his party by summing up what I think has been their attitude as perceived by the country in this whole debate.

An hon. Member: Which hon. member?

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for St. John's West. He said, in reference to the RCMP:

They have to be brought to heel, and their political masters who encouraged them, or who are hiding them, or who directed them or who condoned those acts, have to be brought to heel also.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I think the defence is not very difficult to make, and I accept Your Honour's ruling in advance. I know you will have a difficult job to arbitrate in these debates. If you think my words went beyond the bounds of propriety, you will just have to say so, Mr. Speaker, and you will hear my comments.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Is that a threat?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Trudeau.]

An hon. Member: Take heed; another accusation.

Mr. Trudeau: Surely that is a proper statement, Mr. Speaker. If you make such a ruling, I will be called upon to do something; is that not right?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: That sounds sort of like a threat, Pierre.

Mr. Trudeau: What is the hon. member for Hamilton West getting so worried about?

Mr. Alexander: I always get worried when you get up.

Mr. Trudeau: Why is he so worried, sitting in his seat? Does he share the views of his colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West, who suggests we have to bring the RCMP to heel?

Mr. Alexander: I always worry when I see you stand up.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member is speaking for his party, but I think that is a very nice compliment he has just uttered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: He means he is worried for the country.

Mr. Trudeau: His party should be worried, after the performance its hon. members went through in this House last week. They are afraid to return to it now without shame. I think his party should be afraid when we stand up and defend the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): It is clear that the Prime Minister is in fine performing form.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I might be permitted to listen to the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: This shows, sir, that given four days' rest in preparation for participation in the House of Commons, he can from time to time rise to the occasion.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Government members, sir, are trying to shout me down. They may continue to do that, as I have a great deal of patience and I will speak over their shouting if they want to continue. The people of Canada have the right, as does the House of Commons, to know what is going on here and what precisely it was that the Prime Minister, by this little act just put on by him, was trying to divert attention away from.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister has quoted from a variety of sources, parliamentary and others, claiming some kind of grievance on the part of the government and claiming there was a question of privilege that could be raised. The Prime Minister, although he does not have much regard for this place, it seems, from time to time, must know the rules. He must know those rules. The rule is that if he had a legitimate grievance, or if he had a legitimate question of privilege or breach thereof which he has just been claiming, then he should have raised it at the time he was seized of that breach of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Putting aside the theatrics, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that the Prime Minister did not raise a question of privilege in relation to the matters he has just cited. I notice that in the absence of the hon. member for St. John's West, the Prime Minister attacks him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where is he?

Mr. Clark: That does not bother me so much as the fact that is was a very partial citation the Prime Minister gave. He did not read into the record everything said by my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West. He did not quote the hon. member in the immediately preceding section, where he said:

The RCMP is a fine police force, but I look at all police forces with a healthy skepticism and I am not afraid to say it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister did not, in his reference to "bringing to heel", quote the further words—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We hear from the Minister of National Revenue, from whom we always hear from his seat.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I did not read it all.

Mr. Clark: The hon. member for St. John's West went on to say, and this very important, sir:

—their political masters who encouraged them, or who are hiding them, or who directed them or who condoned those acts, have to be brought to heel also.

Mr. Trudeau: That is what I said.

Mr. Clark: That, sir, is precisely what is at issue here, because the issue here is one of ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The issue throughout this debate has related to what kind of order or general direction was given by the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General of Canada that caused members of the security force to engage in illegal acts, and what offends us on this side of the House is that the government of Canada has tried consistently to make the Royal Canadian Mounted Police carry the can for the decisions it makes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1532)

Mr. Trudeau: That is a new point of order.

Mr. Clark: At this moment I do not want to detain the House at length on the question of ministerial responsibility. In this affair, as in so many others, the government has seen fit to try to blame public servants for actions which have been taken by the government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me deal with some of the matters to which the Prime Minister referred. The Prime Minister quoted the hon. member for Central Nova, but the nature of the observations by the hon. member were different from the accusation made by the Prime Minister. Also, they differed significantly in location. The Prime Minister could not find anything said by the hon. member for Central Nova in the record of Hansard which was at all similar to the accusation made by the Prime Minister against the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: He could not find it because it was not there. It is for that reason he then went well beyond the practices of the House of Commons and began to quote from newspapers. That was because he could not build his case upon what was said in this chamber.

Mr. Trudeau: So what?

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister says, "So what?" That indicates his understanding of the rules of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister has said other things about the House of Commons in the past, and today he says, "So what?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Apologize to the RCMP.

Mr. Baldwin: That is the man who said, "Just watch me".

Mr. Clark: Let me come to what the Prime Minister quoted the hon. member for Central Nova as having said. He quoted that hon. member as having said, "Among those who would have motivations would be . . ." Now, that is not an accusation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: "Among those who would have motivations . . ." was said outside the House. What the Prime Minister of Canada said in the House of Commons, in a direct accusation, can be found in Hansard. I am not quoting from some newspaper, because the record of what the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons can be found in Hansard. At page 600 of Hansard dated November 3, 1977, the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

—but I would suggest that the way to do it is not by hiring private detectives, as that party does—

He went on to say the following, and this is the matter Your Honour has to rule on:

—and not by having some phony bugs planted in their office, which is the way they do it.

That was a direct accusation against members of the Conservative party and, as the hon. member for Peace River has said, a direct breach of the privileges of this House. The Prime Minister has tried everything he can—going outside the House of Commons, gathering quotations from newspapers which he cannot find in the record of this House, coming back to parliament and trying to pretend that what he has done is something that other people have done. The fact is that there has not been a prime minister in the history of this country who has treated parliament with the same grimaces and disdain as this Prime Minister has done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: To my knowledge of this place, certainly there has not been any prime minister who has stood in his place, as this Prime Minister has, made a direct accusation against another political party and then not had the courage or the courtesy either to bring forward proof or to withdraw the accusation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Notice how glum they look now.

Mr. Clark: The courtesies are well known. From time to time in the heat of debate, members may say something they do not intend, or they may say something which is extravagant. But most members, when they are caught in that type of extravagance, have the courtesy or the courage to come back to their colleagues in the House of Commons, if they respect this place, and withdraw the statement.

The Prime Minister has been given an opportunity to do that today, and he was given an opportunity to do it on the day the matter arose. Before the hon. member for Peace River raised the question of privilege, he was told that a question of privilege relating to his behaviour would be raised. Instead of staying to hear it, he went out, and what he said to me across the floor of the House was, "I can't stay here for the proceedings of parliament. I have a press conference to go to". So he turned his back on the House of Commons in order to go to a press conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The courtesies are well known. Having made that accusation—

Mr. Harquail: Apologize to the RCMP.

An hon. Member: Say something.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would prefer the opportunity of trying to decide this question on what I hear from the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. Having made an accusation which is unlike any other accusation that he has been able to find—because if he had found one, he would have cited it—he did not have the courtesy to stand up and withdraw it. Because he knew it was an unfounded accusation when he made it, which was admitted later at the press conference to which he went, he did not have the ability to come here and lay evidence upon the table of the House of Commons.

The responsibility facing Your Honour at this stage is to decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege here. If there is, the hon. member for Peace River will take the action which follows in that kind of case. I had no intention of getting involved in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I rose because—

Mr. Trudeau: You should have followed your instincts.

Mr. Alexander: Notice how effective he is.

Mr. Clark: I rose because the Prime Minister of Canada stood in his place today, after four days of preparation in the Bahamas, and attempted deliberately to confuse the issue in an attempt to escape having to exercise toward the House of Commons the kind of courtesy which normal members of parliament and the people of Canada show toward this institution. That is why I wanted to rise. I think it is particularly important to note that the Prime Minister of Canada is prepared to make charges against a party in this House which he knows he cannot substantiate, then walks out of this chamber knowing the matter will be raised as a question of privilege.

Then, when given the opportunity honourably to withdraw his statements, he refuses honourably to withdraw those statements and instead establishes a smoke screen. When that kind of disrespect for the House is shown, I think the record has to be made very clear. The job is Your Honour's, and it is to decide whether, on the record, there is a clear accusation, without proof and without withdrawal, by the Prime Minister of Canada, and whether there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, had no intention of getting into this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: But television being what it is . . . !

Mr. Broadbent: I think the Prime Minister—

Mr. Harquail: Apologize to the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Shut up.

Mr. Alexander: You do not make any speeches. You like to talk from your seat.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I had no intention of getting into the debate on what I regarded initially as a very serious question of privilege raised by the official opposition, until the Prime Minister, with his all too characteristic buffoonery, decided to rise on this issue. Historians and serious political journalists 5, 10 or 15 years down the road, will look at this as one of the most important events in Canadian history.

I want to deal with the substance of the Prime Minister's argument, because he said that the logic of the official opposition's position was somehow connected with unwarranted charges and that there was some kind of cover-up by this side of the House. The Prime Minister made the accusation that the Conservative party somehow planted a bug in its own offices. If one was vitiated, the other was: that was the logic of his argument.

I would like to deal with that matter. However, before I do I would like to deal with the substance, because my own reaction, as a Canadian and as a member of the opposition, when the accusation was made was one of serious disgust because it was made by the Prime Minister in the context of serious points which were being raised on this issue, an issue which brought down a government in the United States, I might add—and it was no frivolous matter there. A very serious accusation was being made by hon. members in this House about government involvement in a cover-up, and there are reasons to believe that, reasons with which I will deal.

In response, the Prime Minister one day throws off—off the top of his head—the idea of a referendum. Next he hurls a silly and frivolous accusation at the Leader of the Opposition and members of the opposition, that somehow they were planting bugs in their own offices. I do not know how anyone, when looking back on this period, will take this Prime Minister as anything but an uncaring buffoon for some ten years. I want to deal with the logic of his argument. With reference to me and other members of the opposition, he said that we were hurling serious accusations of a cover-up, presumably unsubstantiated.

I want to quote something for the Prime Minister. This was not said by a member on this side and not by a backbencher on his side of the House, but by one of his fellow cabinet ministers who is quoted in the press as saying she thinks the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General are dead wrong. She is quoted as saying they misrepresented reality, that they did not tell the truth about the RCMP, and that she, for one, flatly disagrees. The logic of her argument was that there was a cover-up involved. I mentioned a cover-up, and the Prime Minister mocked me; he said, "With seriousness the hon. leader of the NDP moved his motion". I did so with seriousness because it is a serious matter.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Alexander: He hasn't said anything yet.

Mr. Broadbent: On the issue of the cover-up, I want to quote this minister because I want to say something about the legitimacy of that accusation. She said, and I quote from the Carleton University press of a few days ago—

An hon. Member: Identify her.

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister of National Health and Welfare said she disagreed with the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General. She said:

> As a Quebecer, there is no way anyone is going to tell me there was a threat to national unity in 1973—

So much for the red herring of both the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General. The article continues:

> Bégin attacked Fox for not being honest with the Canadian public. "He should tell Canada he disagrees with the RCMP," she said.

Later on she is quoted as saying that the RCMP has grown so strong that the Trudeau government no longer has control.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: With reference to the RCMP, the minister said:

> They're so big that if the ministers start trying to control them they wouldn't be able to.

My point is that what the Minister of National Health and Welfare is saying is that the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General have failed to control the RCMP. There was no lower level criticism here of junior members of the RCMP. There is, in fact, documentation to support the charge made by the official opposition and by ourselves over the past ten days that this government failed to exercise its ministerial responsibility. That is what is involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is why, Mr. Speaker, if I may just conclude—

Mr. Speaker: I want to follow the hon. member's argument. I understand he is making the argument that if a general allegation is substantiated, it is permitted; but if it is unsubstantiated, it is not. I am not following the relevance of the hon. member's argument on the question of privilege.

Mr. Harquail: It is pretty difficult.

Mr. Broadbent: We listened to curious twists of tortuous logic from the Prime Minister for 20 minutes. I will try to make my case very briefly and then sit down. The point I am making is that when the accusation of cover-up came from this side, it related very substantially to the point that these ministers, including the Prime Minister, tried to obscure. They did not ask relevant questions when they should have, because if they had received the answers they might have been forced into assuming ministerial responsibility, which they never have done. Then they came back to the House and never acknowledged that the real fault lies, not with the RCMP, but the real problem is the government on the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We on this side of the House could document the allegation of a cover-up, and apart from points we on this side of the House would make, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has provided the best possible argument by saying, as a member of the cabinet, that she thinks they were ignoring their responsibility. I would say that she thinks they were involved in a cover-up in burying their own essential role in this whole mess.

MISS BÉGIN—REMARKS IN NEWSPAPER ARTICLES

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, a while ago I got up quickly and realized that, since two women ministers are present in the House at this time, it was not quite clear which of the two was being unfairly accused. It became clear that I was the person concerned—my name was mentioned—and I therefore rise on the question of privilege.

The leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) should have had the decency to check with me about the unfounded serious allegations he has just made. He has just quoted an excerpt from the Toronto Sun, which I saw for the first time around ten minutes to two this afternoon and which seems to repeat word for word without giving any journalist's name, the text written by a student at Carleton University and published in the students' newspaper called The Charlatan.

In this regard, I need only add that I have always supported the work and actions—particularly with regard to the current parliamentary crisis which resembles more a media event than anything else—of my colleague the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and, naturally, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). Even now, in my office, I am in the process of writing a telegram to the newspapers the Toronto Sun and The Charlatan setting the record straight.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wish I could join in the love-in we have just witnessed from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and I hope that when the Prime Minister gets his subpoena from the McDonald commission he will be as forthcoming with that commission as he tried to be with respect to the House of Commons this afternoon. I think this is very important because of all that has gone on here today, particularly the Prime Minister's accusation.

The Prime Minister has not withdrawn the accusation he made the other day in the House which affects all members of this House and one member very particularly. The Prime Minister has ignored the Standing Orders of the House and, indeed, the admonition in citation 157 of the fourth edition of Beauchesne's with respect to what is appropriate to be read into the record of the House of Commons with respect to a matter. The citation is on page 133 of Beauchesne's. He has done all those things.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Let me clarify this point because there seems to be considerable concern about the use of a quotation from a newspaper, which is not a strange occurrence in the House. Before we go any further, if there is any argument about the use in the House of a quotation from a newspaper, I would want to make sure I was clear, because there seems to be some suggestion that I was establishing a precedent by allowing that to be done. I would be quite happy to prohibit, at any time, quotations from newspapers being used by hon. members. It would cut out a great deal of verbiage. However, it seems to me to be a well-established practice of the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not the point, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The point is, sir, that matters which are quoted from newspapers—whether correctly or incorrectly; and in the context in which the Prime Minister did so, even if they are correct—are not the subject of privilege in the House of Commons. That is the point. The hon. member for Central Nova was accused here in this House on a question of privilege.

● (1552)

Mr. Trudeau: He was not. It was your question of privilege, not mine.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Central Nova and the hon. member for Peace River raised a question of privilege with respect to things that were said to have been said, I assume, in this House of Commons. There is no record that the things the Prime Minister has said were said, and reported to have been said, in the House of Commons. That is the point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: I am not claiming privilege.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr.Speaker, there is one other thing that bothers me very much as a member of the House. The Prime Minister put a question, in the course of his discourse, as to what was our view with respect to the question of ministerial responsibility; what was our view with respect to what ought to be done. He, having put that question, I think is entitled to an answer. It is the view of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition that there is no agency of government—no agency of government anywhere, whether it is the National Capital Commission or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—that is not ultimately answerable to the civil authority in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): In matters of security, when matters are given to a government, discretion is given to a government with respect to security, the people of the country and the parliament of the country entrust that government with the greatest responsibility that it can place upon a government. That responsibility and its operation will go unquestioned by parliament and by the people of Canada until something occurs which indicates that that trust has either been set aside or ignored, or has been betrayed—one or the other. Then certain questions arise, and that has been the purpose of the questions, the emergency debate, over how this government—I repeat, this government, sir—discharged its trusteeship for the security and intelligence protection of this country. That is the question.

Now, sir, the Prime Minister asks, as he puts it, what would we want to have done about it? I am going to say categorically that I do not want done about it what was done before. Mr. Speaker, I see you rising. I think it is important, since the Prime Minister has asked what our views are, that he should have our views.

Mr. Speaker: That may be so. However, I have allowed the hon. member some latitude already in establishing an answer to that question. The matter that is at issue is a question of privilege, and it has been contributed to rather substantially by both sides. I should like to hear the hon. member's argument in respect of the merits of the question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am trying to do so. I apologize to your Honour if I offend your sensibilities with respect to what ought to be heard in this House. There has been a very serious accusation made involving security; an allegation made by the Prime Minister that the hon. member for Central Nova has accused the security forces of this House of something. If, in reply to that, reserving the right of the hon. member for Central Nova when he comes, I cannot in the course of it deal with the questions raised by the Prime Minister, then I think I am not being allowed—and I say this with great respect—to express the view that I think is important and involves the security service.

I have indicated to you, sir, what I feel is the responsibility of the elected civic authority and the position of every other agency of government. Now, sir, with respect to what we do in the future here, surely we cannot have a repetition of that. Surely we cannot have a repetition of the position where the government of the day says that in the first place it turned its back on any service and allowed it to operate. We cannot have that; or, after the guidelines of 1975 were issued to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, after those guidelines were given to the security service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, they then turned their backs on the operation of that security and intelligence service. We just cannot have that.

If the Prime Minister wants to be constructive, two things will have to happen here with respect to the motion that is before Your Honour. The first thing is that Your Honour will have to decide the question of privilege on the accusation made by the Prime Minister, certainly, and I put it to you that there is a prima facie case for that. The second thing that will have to happen when that matter goes to the committee, when the motion which I hope Your Honour will find that the hon. member for Peace River can make with respect to the matter, goes to the committee of this House, that committee will have the opportunity—and I hope it will take the opportunity—to examine the whole question of parliamentary control and government control over the security services of this country. If that is the outcome of such an investigation, then this last week will have been worth while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): But if the outcome is a continual refusal to answer questions in this House, which the government has every right to do, and if the outcome is to rely on a commission of inquiry which may not be reporting for years, then the people of Canada and this House have no guarantee that the same slipshod exercise of the civil authority that is vested in this government will not continue. That is the point, sir, and on that point I think the motion by the hon. member for Peace River will provide an admirable opportunity for the House to get to the heart of this problem immediately.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to prolong this debate, but I have a couple of points to make with respect to the question of privilege. It seems to me to be quite clear that the opposition is trying to have it both ways. When the government says something with respect to the opposition, they seem to take great exception, but as the Prime Minister pointed out in his remarks, they seem to want to have a free wheel to say anything, regardless of how irresponsible it may be. I know the Prime Minister offered a couple of quotations from the record of Hansard. I will only deal with two. They seem to be very, very specific. As reported at page 493 of Hansard, the hon. member for St. John's West said:

> I say that the government was manipulating the RCMP, because I have heard nothing to persuade me otherwise.

That seems to imply not only a direct charge but, as well, justification for the charge. It seems to me that the opposition seem to believe that providing they have not heard anything to the contrary, they are entitled to say whatever they want in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Cafik: I do not think they ought to be entitled to make that kind of irresponsible and scandalous statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: Now to the second point, Mr. Speaker. As reported at page 489 of Hansard, another hon. member said:

> We are trying to protect them—
> Meaning the RCMP.
> —from the machinations and manipulations of a vested interest within the Liberal government to use them for private interests within that government. That police force has been manipulated by this government in order to shore up and create a scaffolding for a doddering, decadent Bourassa government.

That is directly from Hansard. It is an absolutely clear and specific charge. In both cases, a very important point has been made as to why we did not stand up. I stood up in the case of the hon. member for St. John's West immediately following that statement and asked him to lay a specific charge. He indicated he was going to make a number of specific charges later in his speech, but from my reading of it he became less specific rather than more specific because he felt his seat might be on the line if he went any further.

I would simply say that if, in the mind of the hon. member for St. John's West, he made the statement he did because he had heard nothing to persuade him otherwise, and if that is good enough for the opposition, it certainly ought to be good enough for any hon. member on this side of the House. In my view, Mr. Speaker, if a question of privilege is found, with respect, to be consistent, we ought to ask all members to withdraw that kind of absolutely irresponsible allegation of a very specific nature.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I thank all hon. members who have made such spirited and vigorous contributions to this interesting and very challenging question.

The question remains one of whether, in the totality of his remarks complained of, the Prime Minister had in fact gone beyond the privileges of the House. I will have to examine the details of the arguments and examine, again, the precedents. I have tried to develop some precedents with regard to accusations of a general, as opposed to a specific, nature. The bulk of the precedents, I must say, relate more to the insistence of a member who is under accusation having the right to be specifically charged before the matter is drawn off to some committee for an expedition and research on whether or not guilt or innocence prevails. Those precedents are not at all helpful in the situation.

The reverse is complained of here. A charge of a general nature is, in fact, the equivalent of a charge of a specific nature. I have to decide whether there is any precedent that can assist me in that question, and they are difficult to find. In any case, I will take under consideration and careful advisement the arguments that were made today, and examine the precedents carefully in an attempt to rule tomorrow, if I can, or at the earliest possible opportunity after proper study.

I indicated that there was another matter outstanding. The hon. member for St. John's East raised earlier two questions of order relating to references allegedly made in this argument by the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister in earlier discussions concerning documents, in which he was establishing the point that according to the practices of the House, the documents had in fact been cited within the terms of the precedents and therefore ought to have been laid upon the table by both those ministers. Does the hon. member for St. John's East have anything further to add?

Mr. McGrath: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what you want to do on this, but I understand the documents are public documents. They have been tabled in the commission holding hearings in Montreal. Since they are public documents, I would have no objection to tabling them. However, I wonder if the rule calls for tabling documents which are already in the public domain.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, it was never identified. I do not know what the Prime Minister was quoting from. It was setting a very dangerous precedent which I did not want the House to follow. Therefore, I think we should stick to the practices of the House.

Mr. Trudeau: With respect, Mr. Speaker, that is not correct. I was quoting a document which was mentioned in a question by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I just said I would ask a question about it.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): How would we know it?

Mr. Trudeau: You just have to listen to the question and you will know it.

Mr. Speaker: I had examined briefly, in preparation for this discussion today, the two incidents referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East. Without further argument, it was my impression that within the terms of our precedents the reference to documents by the Solicitor General fell short of a citation of the document and, therefore, no ruling of the Chair would apply.

With regard to the reference made by the Prime Minister, it seemed to me from reading his remarks that he had, in fact, made either sufficient reference to the contents of the document or a quotation from it. It was not clear from Hansard whether he was in fact quoting from a document. The Prime Minister has now confirmed that he was quoting from a document, or referring to it, and in fact it is a public document.

Obviously, if it is a public document it is available to be tabled and available to members without prejudice to the public good. Perhaps I might be permitted in the circumstances, since it is a public document, to take some time to examine the propriety of ordering a document like that tabled, and perhaps report to the House tomorrow.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the document which you and the Prime Minister just referred to, I understand it is the affidavit that is signed by the Solicitor General. That is certainly the one from which I was quoting. It was written earlier this month. I would like to find out from the Prime Minister, when he tables it, whether it will have the two errors that were in it originally, or have they been removed and are there any further errors in it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point with respect to the comments of the Prime Minister and the document already being available to the commission that is now sitting. I believe the purpose of the rule requiring the tabling of documents, to which reference has been made, is to make them part of the record of the House. I make that submission in reply to the Prime Minister's urging that it is not necessary, since it is already public. It should be part of the record.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that the commission in the city of Montreal is operating under certain specific rules received from the legislature of Quebec. Documents in its possession may or may not be available to us. We do not know what the rules are. It is not necessarily in the public domain. We in this House are interested in having it in our domain, and that is done by tabling it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have already undertaken to examine whether there is any conflict, in fact, in tabling a public document. If there is none, it will be done.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I understand from what the Prime Minister said, and from a conversation he and I have had sotto voce across the floor, that he is quite willing to table the document. I take it that by shaking his head in the affirmative he is undertaking to table the document referred to.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat what I said, Mr. Speaker. If you order me to table it, I will table it.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, are you carrying on with the investigation of the House? We have not heard anything about it.

Mr. Speaker: I had intended to say something very briefly to the House at three o'clock—and that has now become a little after four o'clock—with regard to the two incidents brought to my attention by hon. members, one relating to the office of the hon. member for Central Nova and the other relating to the office of the Leader of the Opposition.

I indicated last week that with regard to the hon. member for Central Nova, I had advised him of the content of our preliminary investigation and asked his advice on whether the matter should go further. The hon. member for Central Nova has indicated to me that there is some information which he wishes to convey to me, and he wants to do that in response to my request tomorrow.

With regard to the office of the Leader of the Opposition, last Thursday it was understood that officials of Bell Canada and of our security staff would be able to meet with the advisers of the Leader of the Opposition. There were some meetings on Thursday evening, and others on Friday. A further meeting was arranged for today.

I hope to be able to advise the House further if there are any significant developments as a result of the meeting that is taking place today. I should advise the House it is our understanding that Bell Canada will be provided with this piece of equipment to examine in their laboratories. I am unable to tell the House at this moment how long it will take the Bell Canada people to give me a report on that examination. As soon as I know, I will communicate it to the House.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, November 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Income Tax

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking last night at 10.30 I was discussing the $350 insulation grant for homes built prior to 1921. I also emphasized that the $350 was not a great deal and that some homes might cost as much as $1,000 to insulate. Housing is a very important part of our economy. As the construction industry goes, so goes the country. Housing today is beyond the means of the great majority of Canadians—and this is a tragedy, to say the least. The cost of mortgages is too high.

My party's housing committee has suggested a number of alternatives to assist the housing situation and to provide housing for those who need it most, that is, people in the low and medium-income brackets. We have suggested that mortgage interest should be deductible, and that property taxes should be deductible in an amount up to, possibly, $500 because property taxes and municipal taxes are a form of double-taxation and they should be deductible from income tax paid by homeowners. The committee also suggested the establishment of a federal mortgage exchange. The government has made no attempt to tighten up the inspection process under the National Housing Act. The National Housing Act should be amended to provide greater control over taxpayers' funds.

The success of the housing market in Canada depends to a very large extent on the economic environment the federal government provides. The economic outlook for Canada is bleak, at best, today. Single family home ownership is on the decline. Over 50 per cent of the people own their own homes. Many are not paid for. There are a great many homes occupied by only one or two persons. In 1951 it was 28 per cent, in 1961 it was 32 per cent, in 1971 it was 39 per cent, and the projection for 1981 is 45 per cent. These figures show we have a long way to go to provide housing for our younger people with growing families.

We have heard a great deal about solar heat and its importance in energy conservation. I feel the government should give serious consideration to some form of financial assistance or grants to those building homes and installing solar heat, in order to make it attractive, as it is a very expensive installation at the present time. This could be extended to cover existing homes whose owners might consider converting to solar heat.

I had the privilege this summer of visiting a model solar-heated home in my riding. The cost of the installation was in the neighbourhood of $10,000. The owner inquired whether there was any financial assistance available from the federal government. He was informed there was not. I am sure the minister would agree it would be common sense and good business to make it attractive for new homeowners to install solar heat equipment whether on a 100 per cent basis or on a partial basis.

As I mentioned before, the minister's budget provided some relief for the taxpayer. I think he is aware it will be necessary to generate revenue to pay for this. The tax cuts are very necessary, especially for those in the lower income brackets. The consumer price index has risen to 183 points, having doubled in the last decade. The cost of food is higher. Those in the lower income group spend 26 per cent of their total income on food, whereas those in the middle and higher income groups spend about 19 per cent.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Unemployment has created a special problem for the young. By 1985 there will be two million people with university degrees, and jobs must be found for them. The unemployment rate for the last month remains about the same, but the Liberals should not take heart from this because although there has not been an over-all increase, the figure for the number of unemployed under the age of 24 rose. At present, only 38 out of every 100 young people entering the labour force can hope to find jobs. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has suggested they should emigrate. Must we export the most valuable of all our resources to support this incompetent and irresponsible administration? The Prime Minister may lightly dismiss our youth and their problems in finding employment, but I cannot. Our youth deserves more than that. They have ambitions, they have hopes for their country, they want to work. It is a disgrace and an embarrassment to all of us that the Prime Minister and the government should behave so callously.

I was surprised to hear what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said yesterday. I shall quote from Hansard. At page 646, toward the end of his address, he is reported as saying:

> Members of this House will appreciate the importance of the bill to a large segment of Canadian society. It is vital to avoid any unnecessary delay in proceeding with it. The implementing legislation for the tax changes in the budget of May 25, 1976, was not finally passed until late February of 1977.

He then went on to say:

> The delay caused very serious inconvenience and disruption for the thousands of taxpayers affected by those changes. I therefore urge members——to pass the bill with dispatch. Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced last night, and already he is telling us to ram the measure through. He seems unwilling that we should have sufficient time to debate it. It certainly should be debated, though, because it is a very important piece of legislation. He also put out a press release dated yesterday, November 7, stating that members should not fail to appreciate the importance of the bill and the importance of getting it through with as much dispatch as possible. He also inferred that the opposition had held up the previous income tax bill last year, Bill C-22. He went on to say that the measures in the bill, which took effect on May 25, 1976, did not pass into law until February 24, 1977. This would infer that the opposition had been holding up the bill from May, 1976, until February, 1977.

● (1622)

I took the opportunity to check Hansard, Mr. Speaker, and I found that this bill was debated for a total of ten days only. Of those ten days, four were short days. It seems the government is making a very strong statement, one that is incorrect. Debate on the bill started on November 19 and was resumed on December 2. It was hauled out again and debated on December 15, December 17 and December 20. The Christmas recess then intervened, and it did not come back until January

31. The bill was debated on that day, and on February 3, 4, 7 and 10. I bring that to the minister's attention so that he cannot accuse the opposition parties of holding the bill up for any great length of time.

Another matter I want to mention is the 10-cent federal gasoline tax imposed by the government a little over two years ago, supposedly to conserve energy and provide funds to control the price of oil within Canada. That did have some merit, but this tax has hit hardest workers from rural areas and many other people who have to drive long distances between their homes and their places of business. This extra 10 cents amounts to a considerable sum over the course of a month.

A good many persons drive to work in my constituency of Parry Sound-Muskoka, as I have mentioned on several occasions. Some drive as much as 100 miles to and from work each day, five days a week. With the price of gasoline today, this extra 10 cents creates a real hardship for them. I am well aware that many business people, truckers and those engaged in commercial operations, have to pay the 10 cents, but they can deduct it as a legitimate business expense. But not the poor man who has to drive daily to work. If this kind of person did not drive a considerable distance to work, he would probably be on unemployment insurance or, even worse, some form of welfare. This is why I feel this particular tax creates hardship for people who can least afford to pay the tax. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister and I hope something will be done about it.

I should also like to point out that the tourist industry has suffered greatly this year. To some extent, this can be blamed on the high cost of travel due to current gasoline prices. Since this tax was imposed, the government has been requested on many occasions to reduce it. In fact, I believe at one tourist convention in the past few weeks it was recommended that the government reduce the tax from 10 cents to 3 cents, and I am hoping that the government will look with a sympathetic eye on that recommendation. After all, the tourist industry is very important.

I will concede to the Minister of Finance that if he should reduce the 10 cents tax to 3 cents, he would lose a lot of money. Within the year a staggering amount of money is collected through this 10 cents tax. But I am sure the minister will agree that it is like casting your bread upon the waters; although you might lose money by reducing the tax, a great number of additional tourists would come to this country, and those who save 10 cents on a gallon of gasoline will spend the money and help the economy anyway. In other words, the minister will get this sales tax back in additional revenue. As I say, it might bring additional American tourists to Canada, and heaven knows, we certainly need them. Tourism has been down drastically this year.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question? I like listening to him because he offers some concrete proposals. The only question I should like to bring to his attention is this: If we reduce the tax on gasoline, what effect would this have on the conservation of energy in Canada?

Mr. Darling: So far as energy conservation is concerned, I am sure—and I bet the minister is sure—that probably not 100 gallons of gasoline less have been sold. People are still using their cars. There could be the odd Sunday driver who stays at home, and that is fine because it will make the highways a little safer. But I point out to the minister that this extra 10 cents tax is a real drain on the resources of a lot of people.

The minister represents a rural riding, one that does not have a buoyant economy. I am well aware that the minister has serious problems in his riding, and in this respect that is good because he may be a little more sympathetic than if he represented a riding composed of blue-eyed Arabs in Alberta or one of the Toronto ridings. I say it would be a wonderful idea to reduce this tax to 3 cents or to cut it out entirely. There is not a hell of a lot of gasoline saved, anyway. People are still driving their cars on journeys, the great majority of which are necessary.

Because Canada is such a vast country, many people have to drive great distances to work. We are not a country like Holland or Belgium, countries with 1,200 people or more to the square mile. As I have already said, in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka over half the people drive a considerable distance. I see the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) across the way. He originally came from North Bay and is familiar with the city. A great many people who live 35 or 40 miles south of North Bay drive into North Bay five days a week to their jobs, and they are fortunate to have jobs there. But 80 miles a day amounts to quite a gasoline bill at the end of the month. Therefore, I hope the minister will give serious consideration to this point.

High taxes and non-competitive wage rates in Canada are also having a serious effect on our communities and on companies which are competing directly with United States manufacturers. The situation has become very critical in the past year, so serious in fact that many small manufacturers of automobile parts have either gone out of business or have moved their operations to the United States. I am hoping that the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is taking steps to rescue this particular industry before it ceases to exist in Canada or almost fades away. I was pleased and relieved to hear him say during an interview, or it could have been during a speech, a few days ago that he was aware of the serious situation and was hopeful that something could be done. I hope he will come up with some concrete solutions instead of vague and non-committal statements.

In my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka, 122 jobs have been lost at a plant just south of Parry Sound in the township of Foley. This plant had a total of 222 jobs, 122 of which are being phased out. Some members may have seen reference to this on a television program last night and again this morning on the "Canada A.M." show. This points out the seriousness of the situation. These are jobs which are permanently lost.

● (1632)

As I mentioned during my speech in the throne speech debate, we are competing against the very tough competition of the United States, particularly the southern states. I understand our immediate neighbour, New York state, is in a serious position as well. If I can use the term, their industries are being raided by industries in the south which are offering very attractive bonuses. Some of these facts we must assume, rather than have them supported with proof. We are also aware of the fact that these industries do not contribute to the same social benefits provided in Canada for our people—benefits paid for by contributions from both employees and employers through unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, and so on.

I hope something can be done to save these very necessary jobs and to help offset the imbalance of the auto pact. I understand there is a $1 billion deficit in this regard, and I heard it suggested in the news media not long ago that if the present projection continues in the future, the $1 billion will increase to as high as $2 billion.

I wonder whether the Minister of Finance—or, indeed, the government—is aware of the fact that by the end of this year Canadians will have experienced four years of inflation at a rate higher than 7 per cent. Although ministers of finance are notorious for their incredible lack of grasp of economic affairs, even they must be aware that Canadians have suffered unduly in the past decade. They have seen three years of unemployment at a rate higher than 7 per cent, four years with an economic growth below our 5 per cent growth potential, three years of trade deficits higher than $4 billion, and five years during which federal budget deficits have steadily increased.

The Minister of Finance has indicated that Canadians may have to face a lower standard of living. This will not be the result of a lack of hard work or initiative on the part of Canadians who are now told they will have to discipline themselves. The writing is on the wall. The Liberal government, through its incompetence, has lowered the living standard expectation of Canadians. The minister predicts a 6 per cent inflation rate for next year. I suggest it will be nothing short of a miracle if there is only a 6 per cent inflation rate in 1978. Indeed, that is probably what the Liberals are praying for, because on the basis of their past record they certainly will not attain such a rate by themselves. I am sure inflation will exceed 8 per cent this year. I do not say that because I am pessimistic by nature but, rather, because the government across the floor has forced me to be that way. The government has also forced Canadians to be pessimistic. In 1976 the inflation rate was 6.2 per cent, and it is now over 8 per cent. This government, by allowing inflation and everything else, with the exception of wages and expectations, to rise has demonstrated its incredible incompetence.

As to the minister's personal income tax cuts to lower and middle-income taxpayers, the benefits are not great. They will amount to $1.92 a week. That is of little comfort to Canadians who face soaring prices, or to those who face the prospect of joining the burgeoning ranks of the unemployed. This government has stifled the economy. The word "deficit" seems to be a catch-all for Liberal actions during the last decade. If there had to be one word used in summation of the past nine or ten years, that would be it. We have a federal deficit, a trade deficit, a deficit in tourism, and we have been sorry witnesses to a continuing climb in our current accounts deficit. The Liberal government is long on speeches of restraint, but short on solutions.

Let me conclude by saying I am distressed to see the state of affairs in this nation. The economy, as I have indicated, is in an intolerable mess. The effect the economy has had on national unity is undeniable. It has compounded separatist sentiments and I want the government to know that, along with most other Canadians, I hold this government responsible for the precarious position into which it has brought this great nation of ours.

The government cannot pretend any longer that the two issues, the economy and national unity, are separate and distinct. They are not distinct. The government, by its negligence in one area and its misguidance in another, has fused the issues into one and brought this country to a danger of dismantlement it has never known.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, on April 11 last, a few days only after the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had delivered the budget speech on March 30 last, the following could be read in a paper entitled On Target:

> The federal budget of Mr. Macdonald will literally put some restraint on the Canadian economy during the coming year—no appreciable tax reduction, no considerable cut of government expenditures, no apparent slowdown in public building construction (indeed we note an increase), finally no realistic endeavour to cope with the constant increase in the public debt and interests and to solve the famous unemployment problem. In short, the country is experiencing a most serious financial crisis, what with growing unemployment on one hand and demoralizing inflation on the other. As for the government, we are led to believe that it does not intend to alter its course and that the friends of the government in power will continue to enjoy its favours for still another year.

● (1642)

On March 21, 1977, Globe and Mail editor Richard S. Malone stated, and I quote:

> Canada is now running the largest foreign debt in the western world.
> Our average wages in manufacturing are now the highest in the world and our exports are dropping.
> We hold the world's record for hours lost per thousand workers due to labour disputes and strikes, losing five times as many man-days per thousand workers as Britain.
> Average wages in Canada last year increased by 14 per cent, nearly double the rates in the United States.
> Since 1972 our labour cost per unit of output has increased more than 50 per cent compared to only 20 per cent in the United States and our productivity also suffers in comparison.
> Our trade deficit on manufacturing last year was $10 billion.
> Our money supply, a chief cause of inflation, was up 22.8 per cent of the annual rate last month.

Mr. Speaker, one will have to admit that we are dealing with an administration which is leading us to ponder over the coming years.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, on March 29, 1977, the same daily newspaper revealed in an editorial some figures which are very enlightening about Canada's public debt. In fact, it was said and I quote again:

As to any pump priming of the economy, it cannot be said that our government has made things easier for us. Expenses connected to public debt direct servicing have increased by 120 per cent during the last five years, that is 135 per cent at the federal level and 100 per cent at the provincial and municipal levels. The annual burden for each Canadian worked has risen from $444.44 for fiscal year 1971-72 to $822.92 for the fiscal year ending this month. The total cost for last year was $7.9 billion; what an amount of money for just servicing the debt. The direct public debt reached $96 billion by the end of 1976, that is $60 billion for the federal government, $25 billion for provincial governments and finally $11 billion for municipal governments yet these astronomical figures do not include the $24 billion guaranteed by the various governments on behalf of Crown corporations. This debt has been contracted in order to make up those deficits. Governments pay off only a small fraction of their debts. When a given debt is due, most governments will simply borrow again to pay it off. It is easier to do things this way than having to increase taxation or reduce government spendings.

Mr. Speaker, also in that same document entitled On Target and dated April 11, 1977, the following could be read, and I quote:

Were the federal government to exercise its sovereign right to create money (through the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks which are its agents), the interests or the expenses stemming from servicing the debt would disappear and there would be nothing left to pay other than minimal administrative expenses totalling up to probably less than 3 per cent. If the totality or at least a good part of the newly created money were circulated through consumer price subsidies aiming effectively at reducing wholesale prices for the consumer, the increase in the money supply or credit, far from causing any inflationary pressure, would have deflationary effects on consumer prices. This principle, even associated with financing through the budgetary deficit, served well the interests of Canada and other countries during the Second World War, and nowadays it is very usefully put to use by the Queensland state in Australia (the Petersen Plan).

Mr. Speaker, in view of this passage, could we not consider that this approach to the problems of debt and inflation deserve serious study and examination on the part of the Canadian government?

The article goes on to say:

Nevertheless, if inflation is now haunting governments, the spectre of unemployment is also becoming an obsession. All those who are at the controls in the government, the media, the business world or trade unions, warn us against the risks of disaster represented by growing unemployment. Paradoxically, people are now trying to obtain longer vacations, shorter work weeks and more time for recreation.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I heard on the CBC news that the Minister of Employment and Immigration had gone to Toronto to suggest a four-day work week even if it meant that the Unemployment Insurance Commission would have to pay the workers involved for the fifth day which should normally have been a working day.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue reading from the previously mentioned article:

We should make up our minds about what we expect from our industrial machine. More "work" (jobs) or increased production (goods and services). If what we really want is more work, more jobs, we should be logical and reject all modern commodities, tools for the garden and the farm, sophisticated machines which reduce manpower requirements in plants, and go back to the pick, shovel and wheelbarrow, the washboard as well as the means of production used before the industrial revolution. That is how we will achieve full employment and a lower standard of living.

If the seriousness of the economic and financial situation escapes anyone's attention, I would strongly urge them to consider the large number of young people between 15 and 25 years old who are now unemployed, while their parents, the workers, who are between 40 and 65, make our huge production system work and pay taxes in order to support all those young people. It would be time to change that system which is quite inadequate and to implement the measures the Social Credit has been advocating for so many years.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, no wonder Canadian workers are increasingly demanding higher gross wages than those of their neighbours to the south. That is because their tax burden is much heavier. True, the government, of course, has the right to tax the workers' income, since it must indeed to find the money needed to finance its programs. A wide range of taxes are collected for that purpose, but the most significant in terms of money is, of course, personal income tax.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would say that personal income tax has increased so much that for the average Canadian family it now represents a bigger expense than all others. Yet that income tax system is based on the principle that the proportion of income paid in the form of taxes increases with a person's income. That is commonly called the "ability to pay". You will agree with me that a poor head of family with a very low income needs all or nearly all his income to survive. In other words, to be more specific, he is practically unable to pay taxes and consequently should not be expected to pay any. On the other hand, it goes without saying that a person earning a higher income can, or is at least in a better position to pay part of it in the form of taxes. It seems to me that the higher a person's income the greater his ability to pay and the greater tax weight he should carry.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, when income tax systems based on the ability to pay were introduced, as I suggested earlier, in 1916, 61 years ago, they gave rise to very heated discussions. In any event, personal income tax now eats up nearly 20 per cent of the average Canadian family's income. Indeed, if one looks at the statistics one realizes the tax department's share is only 14 per cent. Let us not kid ourselves, Mr. Speaker, the gap comes from the fact that government now takes 43 per cent of the gross national product in Canada as compared with 35 per cent in the United States.

With respect to the deficit the federal government anticipates a deficit of $7.2 billion for this year, maybe $8 billion, and $12 billion for next year.

Mr. Speaker, the anticipated deficit for this year will cost every Canadian taxpayer about $60 more to make up, and do you think it will be made up? If you want to know right away, I will tell you. It will never be made up. Why? Our monetary system is wrong. Look at the national debt, and I will give you a few figures.

Indeed, in the seven seconds it takes to read this sentence the federal government went $1,600 deeper into debt. In the last minute the national debt increased by $13,700. It has gone up by $820,000 in the last hour, and by almost $25 million since yesterday at this time. You will doubtless understand what a budget deficit of over $8 billion means. Some will say that the figure is so high that the average citizen cannot visualize its magnitude.

There is another way of looking at the national debt, and that is to compare it with past deficits. Indeed, between the end of World War II and 1975, the federal government has had 17 yearly deficits. If all those deficits were added, excluding the years where there was a surplus, they would total about the same as the deficit for 1977-78 alone. While we are supposed to be the best administrators in the land, the administration of the country leads to an $8 billion annual deficit.

In his economic and fiscal statement, the Minister of Finance said this, and I quote:

The government has decided to withdraw for further consideration the proposal whereby part of the investment income earned by a policyholder on the death of the person insured would be taxable.

On reading that, one suspects immediately that the measures announced in the last budget, that is on March 31 last, on the taxing of the income earned on life insurance policies are withdrawn only temporarily since the minister says:

The government has decided to withdraw for further consideration . . .

One may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that following the next federal election, they will come back with the same proposals. I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents who are against such budgetary pollution. And I have risen several times on that subject since last March 31. In fact, on May 4 last, pursuant to the provision of Standing Order 43, I asked that the Minister of Finance withdraw his proposals to that effect, since I felt they were unfair to those who provide for the financial security of their family by taking out life insurance instead of leaving it to the government to provide for their needs. And should the estate constituted by life insurance not serve exclusively the purpose intended by the insured, that is to ensure a minimum degree of well-being?

In a speech made on April 26 last in Quebec City, the former Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development commented on the difficulty of surviving in the business world. He mentioned that the percentage of Canadian businesses which went bankrupt within the last five years ranged from 60 to 80 per cent. Most businesses included in those statistics are small and medium firms. They are hard put to it to get in the market already saturated with products and distributors. Usually to set up a small business requires all the financial resources of the entrepreneur, and then the slightest setback forces him out of business.

So, Canadians are deprived of benefits that could be provided to them by thousands of businessmen who are service-oriented and of thousands of good ideas that are lost due to financial problems. Banks are responsible for the credit system which causes such problems. After all, why should banks be concerned about that situation, since their own bankruptcy rate is nil under the present government? In fact, the eleven chartered banks in Canada have increased their assets during the five first months of the present year by $12 billion, from $121 to $133 billion, and their assets had increased by $16 billion during the previous year. At that rate, we may expect that within twelve months our banks will increase their assets by more than $25 billion.

Recently, in a booklet on the national dairy program for 1977-78, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made this statement, and I quote this because it directly concerns the budget:

I believe that the 1977-78 dairy program is one of the best we have ever had. Your income as a milk producer has been increased over last year. As Minister of Agriculture I am sure that you will agree with me that your federal government has provided you with a very positive dairy program.

Well, no, Mr. Speaker, dairy producers do not think so. Be assured that I have full knowledge of the matter. As a matter of fact, as recently as last week I received from one of my fellow countrymen a letter which reads as follows: "You are probably aware that the Canadian Dairy Commission has not sent us our subsidy cheques since the month of April 1977. We ask you to join us in protesting before the Department of Agriculture. You probably know that farming incomes still decreased this year, which demonstrates that things must change." I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills.

Is motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Stand at the request of the government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

MEASURE TO ABOLISH THE SENATE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-203, to amend the British North America Act, 1867 (abolition of the Senate) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I suppose I should have remained in my seat in case hon. members were ready to vote on my motion without further debate. After all, that is an admission that this is not the first time I have brought in this bill, the purpose of which is to abolish the Senate and to establish the Parliament of Canada on the basis of democracy, namely, that it consist only of persons, men and women, elected by the people of this country and responsible back to them.

During the last few weeks I have had the privilege on at least two occasions of participating in debates on the Senate with prominent members of the other place—these debates took place on radio and television—so I think I am reasonably familiar with the kinds of arguments that are advanced by those who really believe in the Senate. I cannot imagine any persons who believe in the Senate more than those who are in it, except some of those around here who would like to get in it.

An hon. Member: Does that include you?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In case that question is on the record, I am sure my hon. friend knows that the answer is absolutely no. The arguments that have been advanced in the debates in which I have participated lately centre mainly around the proposition that the men and women in the Senate are good persons, that they are hardworking and that they do a good job for the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, that argument completely misses the point. I readily concede that there are good Canadians in the other place. I readily concede that somewhere between 20 and 25 of them work hard at the job, but I think that is about all. The rest are just there when they need to be. The number who really work at the job is probably not greater than 20 or 25.

I readily concede that some of the reports that committees of the other place have prepared have been good reports. They have been very useful. But, Mr. Speaker, those arguments completely miss the point that in the Senate we have a House of Parliament made up of persons not elected at all who get there solely by being appointed or nominated by the Prime Minister—persons who are responsible back to no one, not even to the Prime Minister who nominated them and yet who constitutionally have all the authority that we, the elected people, have here in this House of Commons.

Sir, we can make mistakes, and this House certainly does make mistakes—many of them when we have Liberals in power. But we have to go back to the people of Canada every three, four or five years, for it is to them that we are responsible. That other House never has to go back to anyone. As I say, even if a lady or gentleman has been appointed to the Senate on the nomination of the Prime Minister, he or she is not even responsible back to the Prime Minister at all. That is why I think we should take a whole new look at the make-up of parliament.

Maybe there was something to the idea 110 years ago that democracy could not be fully trusted; that you had to have some people around to check on what the elected people were doing. Surely, in 110 years we have grown up and reached the point where we realize that democracy calls for the laws of this country to be made by elected persons and not by appointed persons. Maybe in a moment or two I will define them a little more precisely than just by calling them "persons." It is for these reasons, namely, that in 1977 as opposed to 1867 surely we believe in democracy, that I think we ought to have a parliament consisting only of those elected by the people of Canada.

I could point out that in the early years of the history of this country a number of provinces had an upper House. My own province of Manitoba had one, Nova Scotia had one and so did several other provinces. They got rid of them one by one, and the last province to get rid of an upper House was Quebec. I do not see the government of any of those provinces suffering because they have legislatures consisting of only one House. I therefore contend that we should take the same step and go all out for the democratic principle of the people being represented and governed only by those whom they have actually elected. I regard there being a non-elected part of this institution as a blot on the democratic idea. I regard it as utterly stupid for us to have persons in another place not elected who have the same constitutional authority we have in this House of Commons.

This is brought out very forcibly—and quite often, too—when a person who has been a member of this House as run for re-election and has been defeated. In being defeated he has been told by the people of the constituency or province where he lives that those people do not want him in parliament. A few months later in many cases that individual, if he is a Liberal, is appointed to the Senate and gets into the very parliament where the people of his constituency and province said they did not want him. As I said, it is not only undemocratic; I think it makes us, in so far as we believe in democracy, look utterly stupid. I hope we will take a new look at the whole proposition.

It is argued, of course, that in the other place they do some good committee work. That is true. I could name some of the reports such as that on land use, poverty, aging, and so on, that have been exceptionally good. That is no reason for us keeping on a very high payroll 104 persons so that a dozen or 15 of them can do certain committee work. That committee work could be done by royal commissions, academic people, persons pulled in from the universities, the labour movement or farm movements for a specific job. But keeping 104 people on a very high payroll, with expense allowances and staff running into several millions of dollars per year spent on the other place, I think makes no sense at all.

It is argued that there are times in the other place that they find things wrong with some of the bills that we pass and send them back to us. Many of those things that are found wrong are found by the officials in the departments and are simply corrected over there, although some time ago when their Honours amended a bill in something over 100 clauses and felt very proud of what they had done, the bill came back here and the government did not reintroduce it. That is what the government thinks of the fine tooth-comb job the Senate did on that particular bill. Even if what they did was good, to give them the right to set aside what we decide in this House of Commons, where we are responsible to the people, is in my view completely contrary to the principles of democracy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I make the plea again, and I have been making it for a long time, that we take a serious look at our parliamentary structure. I think if we do that we will realize it should be a democratic structure and that it is not democratic when we have one House made up of persons who are responsible to no one.

That is the picture as it developed out of the way the place was established. That was it from the beginning: a House of non-elected persons responsible to no one who, nevertheless, could set aside the legislation of the House of Commons. That carries with it, of course, the right to do so not just once, twice or several times but, as Eugene Forsey once said in an excellent paper calling for the abolition of the Senate, which he wrote before he went there—

An hon. Member: That was when he was still with the NDP.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right. That is when he was with the CCF, as our party was then called, and the Canadian Labour Congress, or Canadian Congress of Labour as it was when he wrote that paper. I still send out copies of his memorandum to students who want material on the Senate, because it is one of the best jobs that has ever been done. The only person who ever characterized the Senate more forcibly as a complete waste of time was Gratton O'Leary, and that was before he went to the Senate.

● (1712)

An hon. Member: What about the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan)?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hear some reference to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I wish he were here some time when we have a vote on the other place, because he has expressed himself in the past as being just as opposed to the Senate as I am.

I have been talking about the Senate in terms of the structure that was a natural outgrowth of its establishment by the constitution back in 1867. I would like to make the point that two things have developed in recent decades that are really a blot on the other place. The first is that it has become a place where conflict of interest is really at its height. I do not have with me today—I do not have any papers here—the list of the directorships and presidencies of corporations that are enjoyed by members of the other place. The banking and financial interests of this country are extremely well represented in that other place.

Sometimes the Senate is referred to as an institution that is to protect the minorities. The only minority it protects is the rich. Of course, there have been politicians in this country who have said that the rich are a minority and have the right to protection. That is what the Senate has become. They have people there representing banks, financial institutions and corporations. The conflict of interest, therefore, is literally outrageous. On that score, it was not something that was envisaged when the Senate was established, but it has developed. It has become a place that we ought to have the sense to abolish.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Something else has developed in the last few decades of a parallel nature which I think is a shame and disgrace. The Senate has become a place where the Liberal party arranges for its chief organizers and money collectors to be put on the public payroll. What is the number? How many presidents of the National Liberal Federation have been Senators? This means they are on full pay until age 75 and receive a generous pension after that. They are secure. They can do the work of the Liberal party. It has always been the case that people have been rewarded with positions in the Senate because they had served the party in power, or have made contributions to it. There are persons there today who do not need the money, but because they gave money to the party, they are there.

This business of having an institution paid for by the taxpayers of Canada as a place where the officers, organizers and bagmen of the Liberal party can be put on the public payroll is a disgrace. I go further: it is a scandal that the parliament of Canada is used in this way. This is an argument I know will appeal to my friends in the Progressive Conservative party. Maybe some of them, even though they would like to get over there some day, will feel so strongly with me on this point that they will support my bill. For all these reasons, the time has come for us to get rid of the other place.

Judging by former debates on this issue, there may be some who will agree with me about the basic principle which I am putting forward, namely, that non-elected persons should not have the authority that we have. The argument may be made that we ould change it and have an elected Senate. At least it would be better than a non-elected Senate in terms of the principles of democracy. I do not have a closed mind with respect to that idea, but it would have to be considered in the whole context of what is good for this country.

We now have the conflict between the government and parliament right here in the House of Commons. We have the conflicts and confrontations that exist between the federal government and the provincial governments. If in addition to that, we had an upper chamber with moral authority to challenge our decisions, nothing would ever get done. If you had to get the federal government and the provincial governments together, if you had to get the federal government and the House of Commons seeing eye to eye, if you had to get the Senate and the House of Commons, both with equal authority, seeing eye to eye, I suggest nothing would ever be done. Just as some other countries have done away with their upper chambers, and just as all of our provinces have done away with them, we would do far better if we simply had one House of Commons comprising the Parliament of Canada. In order to be correct in terms of the legislation and in terms of my bill, parliament would consist of the Crown and the House of Commons.

What would we do with that other chamber? It is a beautiful room. Possibly it could be used for an art gallery. My friend from Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) would probably suggest it would make an excellent gymnasium.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Or museum.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) suggests that it be a museum. That is what it is now. When I first came here, one of the current stories was that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands used to take guests into the gallery of the Senate when that place was in session. The story is that on one occasion he took some guests in and said to them, "This is our waxworks. That is what those figures are down there." The guests sat quietly for a moment, looking at the various figures. Finally, one of them turned to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and said, "I just saw one of them move." That is his story, not mine.

Another point that may be made is that I am coming at the question this time by means of an amendment to the British North America Act, and maybe I should wait until the constitution is brought home and redone. I accept that argument, in a sense. I have been waiting a long while to get rid of the Senate, so I could wait another year or two. But do not put that up as an argument against abolishing the Senate. If we believe in democracy in Canada, we must have it as soon as we can by having a parliament made up only of persons elected by and responsible to the people of Canada.

I admit this is not the first time I have brought in this measure. I have been at this ever since the day I came here, which was quite a while ago. Sometimes it is said to me that I am not making much progress because the Senate is still there. I do not accept that. I think I have done rather well. The other day I looked at the list of persons who were in the Senate when I came here about 35 years ago. There are only three of them left. Two of them are in their eighties and one is in his nineties. Therefore, I have pretty well got rid of the Senate as it was when I came here.

I hope this House will have enough sense to take a stand today for the complete abolition of the Senate, so that parliament and Canada can be a place of real democracy.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to take part for the second or perhaps the third time in a debate on the bill of my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) dealing with the abolition of the Senate. No personal interest can be imputed to me, Mr. Speaker. If I contribute to this debate it is not because I am interested in being appointed to the Senate; considering my young age, it will be obvious that the reason for my intervention is not based on personal interest. In my opinion, the comments of my learned colleague show that he has improved his position which seems much more comprehensive than it was in 1974, 1971 and 1968. He does not say that senators are old parliamentarians who do not serve their country as much as they should.

Mr. Speaker, it has often been said that the Senate is inadequately used, underpaid and undervalued and this for many reasons. One need only look at those who make up the Senate here in Canada. Personally, Mr. Speaker, as the majority of my colleagues, and certainly as my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre, I have a great deal of admiration and respect for the greatest majority of senators, and I have friends among senators on both sides of that House. Also, this admiration and respect are based on their contribution, not only to national unity, not only by the work they achieve, but also by the great quality of their contribution. Let us consider, for instance, the work done by Senator Lamontagne and his committee, the accomplishments of the committee on poverty, the committee on telecommunications, which have been a guide for the members of this House and a help in presenting and drafting bills that now serve the people of Canada.

Let us look also at those who make up the Senate. Of course, there are former politicians, but there are some elsewhere and I shall refer to them later. We find former members of the House of Commons as well as legislative assemblies across Canada. And then, we find former mayors who, let us face it, make a very important contribution because they proceed in a different way, having different views from the members of the House of Commons when drafting our legislation. There are university, academic and business people who have been successful and it is not yet a crime to be successful in Canada. And if the Canadian government institution can benefit from advantages and sound advice from those who have succeeded in business in Canada, I think we would be ill-advised indeed not to take advantage of those skills, those resources which are available to us. And that is what the Senate is doing when one considers its membership.

It also includes Canadians from all parts and all classes of the country. There are Indians, natives, Canadians from all provinces and we know that they are 102 members altogether. And what does it mean to the Canadian population? As for us, I will talk about it later on. But for some parts of the country such as Prince Edward Island for instance, one of the reasons which prompted that province to be part of the confederation was that it would be protected by the Canadian Senate. And it is stated in the Canadian constitution that no less than an equal number of members in the House of Commons, an equal number of members of the Senate will be in the House of Commons.

And this condition is very important to ensure national unity and guarantee rights. I notice that one of my hon. colleagues does not share my views. Perhaps he could rise after me and indicate where he feels what I have said does not reflect reality, and that Prince Edward Island joined the Canadian confederation because it felt protected by this provision of the constitution whereby an equal number of members of the House of Commons must come from this part of the country. This protection was due to the fact that it had a permanent number of members in the Senate.

I must also mention the quality of contributions by my hon. colleagues in the other place. That quality evolves naturally from their very high degree of independence. Our Canadian society is facing difficulties and there is a rush for greater and greater political power, not necessarily on the part of politicians. Therefore, it is very important that the upper chamber, with a lot more time at their disposal, deal not only with legislation but also with special enquiries on specific matters. Senators have much more time than we do because we have elective responsibilities, constituency responsibilities requiring that we keep in touch with our constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, reference is often made to the independence of senators and the Senate. I would like to draw a parallel between the independence of members of the legislative power and members of the judiciary. For the simple reason that senators are named for life, they do not have to justify themselves to provide for their retirement, they do not have to favour corporations. A senator is guaranteed employment until age 75, so his contribution is much more important and much more valuable then if he were not independent and did not have such security.

On the other hand, the Senate is the place for a second process of scrutiny of the legislation sent by this House. So as I said, we can rely on a number of experts from various areas, people recognized for their serious nature, experience, ability, independence and wisdom.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate is often accused of being some kind of haven or retirement for former MPs or party members. Was not Mr. MacDonald, the former president of the Canadian Labour Council, a former member of Parliament? How many former members of Parliament are now part of what I call the labour union senate? I could name some, Mr. Speaker, who went back to private life and joined the senate of labour unions, that is they have found employment there and it is very good for labour unions to benefit from those talents. I know some, as I was saying, who are making a very important contribution to labour union activities. And I am sure those unions can be glad to have among them former members of Parliament, people who have been with unions before and whose experience in the House of Commons in drafting legislation now contributes greatly to union activities.

Mr. Pinard: Age has nothing to do with competence.

Mr. Dupras: Age, no. My colleague from Drummond (Mr. Pinard) just said that age has nothing to do with competence. The only restriction, Mr. Speaker, is that people called to the Senate must be at least 35 years old.

Mr. Speaker, I think that my hon. colleagues are fairly familiar with the business of the Senate. However, in order to emphasize the Senate activities and its importance for Canadian government institutions, I should also mention the Committee on External Affairs composed of 20 members with a quorum of five. This committee is mainly responsible for the study of bills, messages, petitions, the interpretation of documents and other matters related to external relations and to relations with the Commonwealth in general, including, Mr. Speaker, the study of international treaties and agreements, foreign trade, foreign assistance, defence, immigration, territorial affairs and matters arising off our coasts.

There is also the very important Committee on Finance composed of 20 members which has a motion to this effect; once again, it is responsible for the study of bills, messages, petitions, and particularly for the study of national accounts and the report of the Auditor General, and God knows, Mr. Speaker, how essential it is to have the report of the Auditor General examined by as many experts as possible.

There is finally the Committee on Transport and Communications whose specific responsibilities are tourism, public vehicles, pipelines, transmission lines and energy transport, navigation, shipping and navigable waters. There is also the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, one on Banking, Trade and Commerce, one on Health, Welfare and Science, the Committee on Agriculture and so on.

Mr. Speaker, we have often heard that the senatorial office was of a special nature. In fact, it is of a judiciary nature. By reviewing our legislation, the senator must try to establish an equitable balance in the relations between men, between social classes and between various communities, without paying attention to the distribution of the votes. This is obvious because he is not accountable to Parliament.

I will say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that to make the Senate an elective body would amount to destroying its present judiciary character. Just like the American Senate, it would become a second House of Commons, and in that respect it would encroach upon the rights of the House of Commons. The division of the elected representatives of the people between two houses would bring about few advantages and a lot of inconveniences.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party are not the only ones who have questioned the very existence of the Senate. I now would like to conclude my remarks by giving a brief summary of the conclusions reached by Professor Konz of McGill University in his study on this part of the Canadian government system and I quote:

> The most obvious are linked to the continuous expansion of the studies of the Senate committee in the field of legislation, control and inquiry but most particularly in the last two fields. Greatly helped by the flexibility of its calendar and its impartial spirit, the Senate could develop important and efficient means with which to control certain aspects of the financial administration, especially as it relates to Crown corporations . . .

These remarks are quite pertinent, Mr. Speaker.

> . . . and investigate certain practices of the executive, particularly with regard to legislative delegation. The Senate could also increase the number of special inquiries that it carries through each year and enlarge both their purpose and scope. All of it requires little external impulsion and could be achieved through creative leadership and a few changes in the internal structure. In fact, the best practical means to "reform" the Senate seems to reside in taking advantage of the inherent possibilities within the structure of that very institution.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, I would like to say a few words and I know that my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will bear a grudge against me if I did not say a few words on his Bill C-203, and particularly with regard to clause 9 at page 2, for I am a little disappointed by this part of the bill which states and I quote:

● (1732)

"Use of English and French languages":

133. Either the English or the French language may be used by any Person in the Debates of the House of Commons of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any Person or in any Pleading or Process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec.

There must be a reason for this, Mr. Speaker. I wonder why the sponsor of the bill limited this aspect of the bill to the House of Commons and the province of Quebec. Perhaps before the end of this debate he would be permitted to tell me why clause 9 refers only to the House of Commons and the province of Quebec in regard to pleadings in the courts and to the legislature.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dupras: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member not realize that what I have done in drafting this clause is simply to repeat section 133 of the British North America Act as worded at the present time, simply leaving out the reference to the Senate? In other words, does he not realize that I am not touching the language issue? I am not altering it as it now stands but dealing only with the question of abolishing the Senate.

Mr. Dupras: I thank my distinguished colleague for telling me his position. I knew he was only repeating and more or less renewing section 133, and that is why I posed the question. I was not criticizing my hon. friend; I was just asking him why he did not take advantage of this bill to widen the scope of this section so as to include all of the courts and legislative assemblies of the country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then the debate would be on two issues.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my contribution will be brief so as to allow time for other colleagues who wish to participate in this debate. I should like to commence my remarks by congratulating the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his tenacity in regard to this particular issue. I know this matter is near and dear to his heart. He mentioned the fact that he has survived a number of Senators who were here when he first came here. I trust that reference in no way indicates his support for the proposition that any member of the House of Commons should be obliged to retire at the age of 75, because this might deprive the House of the very valuable services of that hon. member. I am sure he appreciates the fact, while he has led the good life, many of those Senators have gone from the other place by virtue of this new provision in the statute as opposed to being less durable than the hon. member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In that respect, Mr. Speaker, like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I plan to stay a long time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This puts me in mind of a story, Mr. Speaker. We all know that lists of applicants for the Senate are placed before the Prime Minister in great numbers. In fact, it is a very popular place to be appointed to.

Mr. Dupras: You are too young for that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I speak for the parliamentary secretary who appears to be a prime candidate on that side for the Senate, and who gave a very spirited defence of that institution.

This reminds me of a story concerning Sir John A. Macdonald who attended the funeral of a deceased Senator. He was standing beside the grave, and just as the coffin was being lowered into the ground one of the aspirants for the vacancy created by the death of the Senator approached Sir John and whispered in his ear, "Sir John, I want to take his place." Sir John is reported to have replied, "I am afraid it is too late."

I am afraid that we in Canada have to admit that we do have an institution which perhaps represents something of the spiritual nature of this country. I refer to the chamber regarding which it is said that, after a political death, there is indeed a heaven, and that heaven is the Senate of Canada.
