At the outset I must declare, as seems to be the appropriate thing to do in parliamentary terms, a potential conflict of interest in addressing myself to this bill. At one time I served as an executive assistant, in what we call the good old days, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister. I was executive assistant to the government leader in the Senate. The distinction of that office was enhanced by the fact that our present Clerk of the House, Mr. Alistair Fraser, was at that time executive assistant to the leader of the opposition in the Senate, so I had good company in that august chamber.

I should also mention that my father was a member of the Senate. Therefore in addressing myself to this bill I must declare a potential conflict of interest in the sense that I have that particular background, that particular vantage point, with respect to the Senate.

I want to make two or three observations about the Senate which are based upon my experience of observing that particular body. Apparently the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre desires to take a black or white approach to the Senate of Canada. In other words, if he is critical of the operation of that body then his facile answer is simply to abolish the institution. Before we do that I think we should look at this institution in the context of modern times and current political situations to see whether it in fact could perform some reasonable function, by way of examples, in the performance of preserving Confederation, possibly, or for the purpose of serving and representing more adequately than it now does the regional aspirations and interests of the country.

I think now, when we are talking in terms of national unity, keeping our country together and upholding the regional aspirations of different sections of the land, it may be time for us, prior to any consideration of abolishing that institution, to consider amendments to the existing constitution, or changes in existing constitutional legislation which would have the effect of improving that institution, making it more responsive to the purpose for which it was first created, and in fact making the Senate of Canada a part of the over-all plan of helping the people in the different regions in Canada feel that they are participating in a Confederation worth saving. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has already suggested, provision might be made to allow for participation by the provinces in the appointments to the Senate.

I say to the hon. member, when he makes the point that the Senate of Canada in fact has the official right to change legislation that comes from this House, that we should look seriously at changing those provisions by making it quite clear, through constitutional provision or otherwise, that the supreme body in the Parliament of Canada in respect of legislation should be, is, and will continue to be the House of Commons.

We should surely make it clear that, if there is a dispute between the two Houses, the decision taken ultimately by the House of Commons is the decision to be entered into the law, and that the position of the Senate is only an advisory position as opposed to a position carrying a constitutional right to hold up legislation that represents the will of the House of Commons.

The second point I wanted to make is that we may indeed have to look at the situation in terms of having a different method of appointing members to the Senate. I concur with the remarks and observations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I agree there are very strong and appropriate criticisms to be made of the Senate by virtue of its present composition and the use being made by the government of appointments to that place. I refer, of course, to the fact, and it is no secret, that the Liberal party and government are populating that particular chamber with their party organizers, bagmen, political advisers and others. Those people are now being supported by the Canadian taxpayer. I join with that hon. member in criticizing the particular way in which the Government of Canada has regarded the Senate, and that is with the same sort of contempt with which it regards this part of the Parliament of Canada, the House of Commons. I join with the hon. member in his criticism of this particular tendency of the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Scandalous!

M. Hnatyshyn: There may be ways in which to deal with that particular tendency. Whether we like it or not, the preponderance of government in the past 50 years has been that of the Liberal party. It has not taken upon itself to make sure that all areas and all points of view are represented. But it does make sure that all areas of the Liberal party are represented, and in this way brings the whole institution into disrespect.

It is my suggestion that we might consider an amendment or constitutional revision to limit the duration of a senator's tenure to possibly eight or ten years. In this way we would ensure a greater turnover, with more and differing points of view. An amendment should be made in such a way that the provinces might have more input in the appointments made to the Senate so that their points of view and perspectives could be brought to the Parliament of Canada in an unique way, strengthening our Confederation as opposed to weakening it. In that way the provinces would have a forum in which to discuss their points of view.

I do not wish to take much more time, because I know other members wish to speak. I simply make the point that whatever we say about the Senate, and we could talk for hours and hours about the relative merits, drawbacks, and even some of the abuses that have taken place, the fact of the matter is that the Senate is a legislative forum which would provide us with an opportunity, if we operate the institution properly by making sure appointments are based on reasonable and equitable rules, of having available to us in parliament the points of view of a wide variety of people who might not otherwise be involved in politics. It would give those people an opportunity to bring their expertise to parliament.

When we are considering this particular body one should realize that, while there may be abuses in respect of appointments, in other jurisdictions and in other countries political patronage often operates by way of appointments to the foreign service or important jobs within the public service.

I would ask this rhetorical question: are we not better off, aside from the question of abuses, in having failed politicians appointed to the other place, in that forum in which they can participate in debates, and in a setting in which they are more suited, rather than having them appointed to important public positions in which they could perhaps do a greater disservice to the country through incompetence or abuse? Are we not better off having them in a forum in which they can participate in debates, but in a place where they cannot by themselves cause a great deal of damage or cost the country an amount of money, such as might be the case were they put into positions holding great power?

Rather than populating our public service with failed politicians, or politicians who have not been successful, to put it more graciously, is there not some advantage in a continuation of the Senate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought I was unkind to the Senate, but what the hon. member is saying is a lot worse.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am not being unkind. I am trying to be as reasonable and equitable to that institution as possible.

I want to conclude by underlining my support for the hon. member's point of view in respect of the way in which the government has operated the Senate. I feel the hon. member has made some valid observations about some of the abuses that have taken place, but the answer should not necessarily be abolition of that institution.

Let us make sure our conflict of interest rules in parliament are brought forward, applied, promulgated and enforced. We cannot have the senators operating by some unwritten rules unless we in parliament ourselves set down precisely what we want as far as conflict of interest rules are concerned. I have in mind the potential conflict of interest which could exist on the part of a member of the Senate who was a principal adviser to the Liberal party or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and was involved in any sort of business transaction with the Government of Canada. I see that as a potential conflict of interest. That senator, or a prime minister, might shrug it off by suggesting they are good guys and would never do anything wrong or give any appearance of preferential treatment or things of that sort.

The fact of the matter is that when people become involved in the Parliament of Canada they should be subject to rules that all of us understand, specifically those which involve the possibility of a conflict of interest, so that not only is justice done but it will appear to be done. In this way there would be no perception on the part of the average person in the country that some special attention is being paid to a proposal by virtue of the fact that a senator was acting as an agent in communicating with the government.

What I am saying is that there are many reasons for criticizing the Senate, but I would prefer to change some of the constitutional aspects, making the Senate a more responsible body, utilizing it in many ways of value to the country including to assist in providing a solution to the unity question with which we are faced today.

For those reasons, and not because I am without sympathy for some of the points raised by the hon. member, I cannot support his position in suggesting the abolition of the Senate.

• (1752)

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, from time to time one wonders how constructive members are in their approach to the private members' hour.

I want to take the opportunity to compliment the sponsor of Bill C-203 which is before us this afternoon. I have gained even a greater respect for this man than I had before arriving in this Chamber. Without being too facetious, I was wondering to whom he was referring when he attempted the humorous remarks about the House of Wax and people who appear to be of a certain vintage. We have heard it said many times that probably he should accept an invitation to go to the other place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought you had some respect for him.

Mr. Harquail: He has mentioned that he has attempted this motion many times over the last 10 or 15 years. He has boasted the fact that he has outlived most of the members of the Senate, save three or four.

Some years ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated "I think this whole idea of a body of non-elected elder statesmen . . .". Certainly I would not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have anything against elder statesmen, because I place him in that category. I place him there with more than due respect. It has to be said that all hon. members in this Chamber have expressed the great respect which we have for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Therefore I do not have much to say about what he said this afternoon, but I would like to comment upon what he failed to say. He did not refer to the position of the government as it was stated in the previous Speech from the Throne, where the government's position was made very clear, that in part there is some agreement with the hon. member's sentiments in regard to the existing Senate structure. He did not talk about the desire of today's government with respect to reform of the Senate. Indeed, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made his position very clear on more than one occasion, both inside and outside the House, with respect to his desire to see reform in the Senate.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not take the opportunity this afternoon to make the position of his party clear with regard to the whole discussion on bringing back the constitution to Canada, or the repatriation of the constitution, which would enable us to proceed with the much talked about and desired reform. This would be one area which would permit us to act in that direction, which the hon. member has indicated he would like to see done. I do not agree with his over-all request for the abolition of the Senate.

Some of the excellent work carried out by the Senate has been referred to this afternoon, such as the excellent work by Senator Croll in the poverty committee; Senator Hastings in the penitentiaries studies; Senator Michaud in the agricultural studies, as well as Senator McElman in the communications inquiry. All the reports and committee work which have been undertaken by the Senate must be highly commended.

In so far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is concerned, he is well aware of the present structure of the Senate. It is a creation of the British North America Act, and as such plays a role in the making of laws. It acts as a protection for the provinces in terms of legislation which flows from this parliament to the other place.

I would have thought the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would have stuck to the subject of the bill. He mentioned that from time to time some mistakes are made in this House. I would have to agree with him in this regard: we have seen mistakes made in the last week or so by the Conservative party and the New Democratic Party with respect to the innuendoes and accusations which have been made. He did not talk about the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) bringing in a document which he did not bother to verify and correctly substantiate, and yet took it upon himself to take that one further step with respect to false accusations and innuendoes.

It surprises me that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would refer to the fact that from time to time mistakes can be made. It was not the intention of the creators of this parliament to witness the type of errors and disrespect which has been expressed and shown by quite a few members opposite in recent days. I mention this only by virtue of the fact that the two previous speakers took it upon themselves to attempt to bring in some form of petty politics when we were discussing Bill C-203.

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, because it is three minutes to six o'clock, because I appreciate even these three minutes to speak on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and because my colleague has been here for more years than I am old, I hope I will be able to teach an old dog new tricks.

I have read the speeches of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which he has presented in his Chamber before. He is singing the same old tune. I thought along the way he would have picked up something more concrete than simply to abolish the other place. I hope to hear that elder statesman say that perhaps the Senate ought not to be abolished but reformed to make it meaningful.

It is equally astounding that my hon. colleague, who is well known in the country as a defender of the democratic system, would suggest that we ought to abolish the Senate and only have an elected House of Commons based on representation by population. That would leave regions of this country, especially the smaller provinces, without any system of checks or balances and without any equalized power to the central provinces, namely, Ontario and Quebec. I find it absolutely astounding he did not somehow suggest that the Senate would be that kind of compromise.

I wanted to trace the constitutional convention of 1789 in Philadelphia in order to demonstrate the problems they had with the same kind of dilemma, how to balance the power in a federal system between the larger provinces and the smaller provinces. I was disappointed that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did not suggest that the Senate should consist of equal representation from each province, comprised of nine Senators appointed by provincial legislatures for a six-year term on a rotating one-third basis, and three Senators each for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and that this Senate would indeed be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time for private members' business has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—POWERS OF McDONALD COMMISSION INVESTIGATING ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as Your Honour is aware, and as the House is aware, it is not the normal practice of the Leader of the Opposition to take part in the adjournment debate; but I am doing so today because, in my view, there is a fundamental principle of the parliamentary system which is at stake here and which is being violated by the Government of Canada. The principle is that ministers of the government must take responsibility for the acts of civil servants under their general direction. That is well established in all the writing about the parliamentary system in this country and elsewhere.

● (1802)

I quote briefly from McGregor Dawson's basic textbook "The Government of Canada" where Professor Dawson says:

> The Minister at the head of every department is responsible for everything that is done within that department.

From "Constitutional Law" by Wade and Phillips, as reproduced in H. V. Wiseman's book, "Parliament and the Executive", we find the following:

> For what an unnamed official does or does not do, his Minister alone must answer in Parliament and the official, who cannot be heard in his own defence, is therefore protected from attack. The positive liability of a Minister is essential to the performance by Parliament and, more particularly, by the House of Commons of its role of critic of the Executive.

That authority goes on to make a fundamental point in this case, and that is that no minister can shield himself by blaming his official.

What we have seen far too frequently in the practices of this government is precisely the practice of blaming officials where the ministers themselves should take responsibility. We saw that in the case of Larry Stopforth, in the case of the executive assistant to the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and now in this case we are seeing it in the case of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

The House and the country know that there were illegal acts, but what we have to determine is by whom were those illegal acts committed and at whose direction. Let me come to the question of "by whom". They were committed, so far as is known, by members of the security services, and here I make the distinction between members of the security service and members of the regular force of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As the minister well knows—even though he has tried to keep this from the House—and as the House should know, the security service reports, in theory, to the Commissioner of the RCMP. Actually, it is under the direction of a director-general who is not a member of the force. General Dare came from outside the force, as did his predecessor. The director-general reports directly to the Solicitor General of Canada and to the Prime Minister as well as to the Commissioner. So in the case of the security service, whose people stand accused of illegal acts, there is a very real question as to whether the activities of the security service are under the control of the Commissioner of the RCMP. There is a very real question as to that, and that is an important distinction for the government to begin to make clear to the people of Canada.

The more broad, fundamental question is: "at whose direction did the members of the security service act?" The answer to that at this stage of our knowledge in the House of Commons is that we do not know. We do not know what the Prime Minister or solicitors general said to the director-general of the security service. We do not know if the instructions which were given regarding the FLQ were so broad that any reasonable member of the security service would believe that he simply was doing what his master had directed him to do when he was in breach of the law of Canada. We do not know those things because we have not been told by the Government of Canada just what is going on here, and, indeed, we may never know because ministers refuse to give information here on the floor of the House.

Today in answer to a question of mine, the Prime Minister said that the government may put limits upon the testimony it gives to the McDonald inquiry regarding precisely what was the role of the Prime Minister and what was the role of the then solicitor general in the actions which occurred. Again the Prime Minister is setting himself up to blame another civil servant, because what he said in his answer to me today was that if they do not tell the whole truth to the McDonald inquiry the people they will blame are the law officers of the Crown, rather than accepting the responsibility themselves.

What we have been concerned with throughout this piece is that ministers have tried not to know what they should have known. That was the case with the Minister of Supply and Services when he was solicitor general and deliberately did not raise questions as to what had been done. Even though he received correspondence which should have caused any reasonable minister to ask questions, he did not. Now, of course, we have the Prime Minister making it clear that in the occasional briefings—in the regular briefings held by the government in these matters, the attitude of the government is, by and large, a passive one, receiving information, not asking questions as to how the security services are carrying out the general direction of the Government of Canada. What disturbs us—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that in this kind of debate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Clark) has seven minutes speech time and the government has only four minutes to reply, I will have to stick rather tightly to what has already been said by the hon. leader of the opposition. Briefly put, Mr. Speaker, having listened to the leader of the opposition and having noted that his presence in the House at this time of day is rather extraordinary, we can wonder about the purpose of his motion. I for one thought that he was referring to the exchange of questions that occurred yesterday in the House relating to the powers that have been vested in the royal commission of inquiry.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that it seems time and time again people in the House are refusing to read the terms of reference that have been given to the Royal Commission of Inquiry. I believe that any fair observer would say the terms of reference that have been given to the Royal Commission are extremely wide.

Why did we set up a Royal Commission of Inquiry? A Royal Commission of Inquiry was set up last July in response to a number of allegations that were made known to the government at that time. Prior to that the Leader of the Opposition was pressing for a royal commission. He then asks the following question during this debate: by whom were these acts committed and at whose direction? I would venture to suggest that the basic purpose of the Royal Commission of Inquiry is to get at the bottom of exactly who committed the acts and at whose direction. I think if you look at the terms of reference—

Mr. Speaker, an hon. member on the other side says change the terms of reference. If you look at the terms of reference—

Mr. Clark: We have.

Mr. Fox: If you have, I suggest you re-read them. They are extremely wide. I should like to make one point very clear once again, a point that has been made time and time again in the course of debate in the House, that is, that the chairman and members of that commission have all the powers required under the terms of reference to look at an illegal act, if there is one, and to follow the nexus all the way up to wherever it leads.

I see that the Leader of the Opposition is nodding, and I trust he is nodding in agreement. He is nodding in disagreement. I wish he would point out to me—I believe I have read the terms of reference in as impartial a manner as I possibly can and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition has done the same thing. I am personally convinced that the Commission of Inquiry has all the powers necessary to do that. And I would suggest that if it does not, if the Leader of the Opposition feels that it does not, I would imagine that the chairman of the commission would also have that feeling and would come back to us and say, "We really feel that you just have not gone as far as you wanted to go. We need additional powers to be able to complete an investigation." I for one believe it is necessary that the Commission of Inquiry have the powers necessary—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the minister that his time has expired.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to a different matter but it is equally serious. The reason I say it is equally serious is because it involves good faith.

May I say at the outset that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) explained to me satisfactorily why it is not possible for him to be here at this time, but I trust that the message I shall try to get to him through his parlamentary secretary will be very seriously considered.

My question arises from answers that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has given both to my friend, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall), and me, regarding the basic rate of the war disability pension. The history is long, but it can be put in a nutshell.

Originally the war disability pension, which was established shortly after World War I, was related to a certain level of pay in the then civil service. Over the years it got way behind that. As a result of the Woods commission study, the matter was reviewed and in 1973, following a study by a special tripartite committee, the 100 per cent disability pension was geared to the average income of five designated levels in the public service. Therefore in 1973 we got back to where we were in the early twenties.

When that new basis was established in 1973, the urging of the tripartite committee and of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs was that that level be maintained, that as the wages of those five categories of public servants went up, the basic pension should go up accordingly. The government refused to accept that part of the recommendation, and said instead that from 1973 on the basic rate would go up in accordance with the rise in the cost of living. That, Mr. Speaker, we regarded as unfair, breaking faith with the veterans of several decades, but the government put it through.

Between 1973 and now, even with the raising of the pension according to the rise in the cost of living, there has developed a $500 a year gap between what the veterans are receiving and the average wage of those five designated groups. In other words, what we predicted in 1973, because the government refused to accept our recommendation at that time, has come true, and come true with vengeance. Our veterans today are close to $540 a year behind the counterpart average in the public service.

A year or so after the 1973 change, because of representations members like my friend and some of the rest of us were making, the government began to show interest. We had so many favourable answers to our questions last year that the veterans of Canada thought it was going to be done. I certainly thought so. It looked to me as though we had made the point, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs would not let the veterans down.

Last Wednesday and Thursday the minister answered the two of us by saying the government haddecided not to increase the basic rate, in other words not to put it back to the standard that was accepted in 1973. As if that were not enough, refusing to make an increase, the minister made a statement which veterans across Canada feel is insulting. He said he was sure that, as good Canadians, they would accept the decision of the government and not ask for this increase in this time of restraint.

My experience with veterans' organizations is that, although they press their point, they do it with care and dignity. They refrain from using strong language. However, the word I am getting now from veterans' organizations through letters and their publications is to the effect that they have to take the gloves off. Good faith has not been kept with the veterans by the government in refusing to keep the proposal that the basic pension should be geared to the standard in those five designated groups and kept at that level.

I have every reason to believe that the minister agrees with this proposition. Last spring he told us, time and again, that it was being considered, that he was hopeful he would be able to do it. It is his colleagues in cabinet who have turned him down. I hope he has fought his level best with the cabinet. They have done a disservice to him and a disservice to the veterans by this decision.

I know the government is in economic trouble. However, the last people the government should take its economic troubles out on are the veterans of this country. But it is doing it on the veterans, it is doing it on the senior citizens, and to my mind this is extremely serious. I am glad the veterans organizations are saying the time has come to take the gloves off. I put it to the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, that the answer he gave the week before last cannot stand.

• (1817)

I see some of the members on the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, including the chairman, sitting over there during this adjournment debate. I hope there will be support from all sides of the House, and that the answer the minister gave will not be allowed to stand. The veterans long ago have shown that they are good Canadians and that they deserve to have the promises made to them kept. I therefore call upon the parliamentary secretary not to try to defend what has happened but to assure the House he will put the case to the minister as strongly as he can. This battle must be won.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the intercession of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). There is no question that these veterans are good Canadians. We know that. They have proven it over the years.

The hon. member has raised the question of the government's intended action with respect to increasing the basic rate of pension for veterans who suffer disability because of their military service, or for their surviving dependants.

The problems of these pensions have been before the government on numerous occasions in recent months. The hon. member will, I am sure, agree with this statement on the basis of the consultation he himself has had with the minister in this regard. Recently, as the hon. member pointed out, the minister stated that the government had decided it was not possible at this time to increase the basic rate of pension for death or disability related to military service. The normal increase of 7.2 per cent related to consumer price index changes will, however, come into effect on January 1, 1978. Additional funds over and above the amount needed for this purpose are just not available at the present time. This does not mean the minister is in disagreement with what the hon. member has said.

Although it cannot provide an additional increase, I would remind the House that the government has had the well-being of veterans very much in mind over the years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Prove it!

Mr. Parent: I will. In January, 1971, for example, the rate of pension for a veteran whose disability was assessed at 100 per cent and who was unmarried with no dependants, was $255. Increases granted since then, together with annual consumer price index changes, have resulted in a substantial increase. As of January 1, 1978, the basic rate for an unmarried 100 per cent pensioner will be $596.70 a month—an increase of 125 per cent in the period mentioned.

I might point out, also, that a married 100 per cent pensioner will receive a basic rate of $745.88; if he and his wife have two dependent children, the rate will increase to $880.15 a month. A widow without children will receive $447.53, and if she has two dependent children her pension will be $716.06. These are not the actions of a government which has no heart and which does not care.

Yes, there is still a great deal to be done but it is no use throwing up our hands and saying that everything which has gone on so far has been of no avail.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Still $500 behind.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary, but the time allotted to him has expired.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF $150 MILLION JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, on October 27 I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for an assurance that the new funds allocated by the minister's mini-budget for the Federal Labour Intensive Program would not be allocated on the basis of patronage. I almost made a slip of the tongue there; I nearly said Federal Liberal Intensive Program. We do not want a federal Liberal intensive program; we want a fair distribution of these make work funds.

My question was prompted by the fact that under Phase II of Canada Works the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) changed the rules. Up until Phase I of the program, and under the previous Local Initiatives Program, funds had been fairly distributed on the basis of Statistics Canada unemployment figures and projections of unemployment by Statistics Canada.

Then on July 9, Mr. Speaker, we were informed in a letter from the minister, and I quote:

> I am sure you will be pleased to learn that my department has, for Phase II, produced a new data base for use in the allocations of funds—

Mr. Speaker, we are not pleased. Nobody who examines the record can be pleased. An examination of the record will convince any objective observer that the government is using the old pork barrel technique, that, in the words of one of my colleagues, there is hanky-panky at work. The formula used for determining allocations for Canada Works Phase II uses as a data base the number of unemployment insurance beneficiaries within a given constituency. This does not reflect the true unemployment rate in the constituency. For example, it does not take into account people who have never had a job but who are looking for work, such as our youth.

As evidenced by the figures released today by StatCan, the formula does not and cannot take into account people in the Atlantic provinces, for example, who represent 40 per cent of the figures, people who have been unemployed for more than three months and hence whose benefits are expiring. These people will no longer be reported for the allocation of funds under this program.

The formula also does not take into account pockets of unemployment within a riding. For example, a rural-urban riding, with an over-all unemployment rate of under 7 per cent, would qualify for only the basic $100,000 allocation, but there might well be areas in the riding where the unemployment rate is well above 7 per cent, as is the case in my own constituency.

Here is what my examination of the allocation of funds has shown, and this is just a very brief examination of the experience we have had to date. The grant for the Newfoundland Liberal riding of Bonavista-Trinity-Conception jumped from $1.6 million to $5.5 million. Next door, the funds for the neighbouring Conservative riding, my own constituency of St. John's East, were cut from $1.9 million to $1.8 million.

Cardigan, the one P.E.I. riding that went Liberal in 1974, had the largest increase of any P.E.I. riding, jumping from $0.3 million to $1.8 million. That riding is held by the Liberal cabinet minister from P.E.I., the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

Allocations to the Nova Scotia Liberal riding of South Western Nova jumped to $2.8 million from $0.3 million, an 800 per cent increase, an increase grossly disproportionate to the two neighbouring Conservative ridings. Grants to the PC ridings of Annapolis Valley and South Shore were less than half of this.

Further, allocations to the riding of the government House leader, Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, jumped from $0.7 million to $3 million, an increase of 435 per cent. While allocations to Nova Scotia Liberal ridings jumped by over 500 per cent, two Conservative ridings actually had their allocations cut in that province. Allocations to the riding of the independent member for Moncton were cut by $130,000, while allocations to surrounding ridings were actually increased.

On the west coast of the country, allocations to the Liberal riding of Vancouver East, won by only 66 votes, I might add, in the 1974 election, were increased by $350,000, while all surrounding ridings held by other than government suporters had their allocations cut. Allocations to this riding, for example, are grossly disproportionate to the surrounding ridings, most of which received only the bare minimum allocation of $100,000. Nine ridings in British Columbia received the $100,000 minimum allocation. Eight of those ridings happen to be held by Conservative members of parliament, which I suggest is more than a coincidence.

If this program of job creation, which has assumed a new importance because of the growing rate of unemployment and because this is the only positive response we have had from the government to this growing rate of unemployment, is to be fairly and impartially administered, then I suggest the new method of allocating funds cannot stand up to the scrutiny of the light of day. Therefore I suggest to the minister that he should resort to the old allocation system.

Further, it is our intention to pursue this matter when the minister comes before the committee, and I would urge the minister to examine what he has done in this regard because it is indefensible. This is the only response we have had thus far to the rising unemployment situation. Not only to be fair, but in order to be credible, this program must be seen to be fair by all Canadians.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has indeed brought forward a subject which interests all active members in this House, especially those of us who represent ridings where we are always seeking opportunities for our constituents to be employed. Both of us represent areas which are in great need of funds such as those he has mentioned.

I was under the impression the hon. member was going to deal with the topic of FLIP. As he is aware, a new FLIP program has recently been announced. Without any commitments having been made to it, I understand over $500 million worth of applications by various government departments have already come to the attention of the Treasury Boad, and others are being submitted.

I should like to refer to last year's FLIP program, which was much less than this year's program. Out of the $40,949,000 spent, Newfoundland received $4,082,000 for 2,995 man months; Prince Edward Island received $559,000 for 527 man months; Nova Scotia received $4,377,000; New Brunswick received $2,812,000; Quebec received $9,353,000; Ontario received $7,634,000; Manitoba received $1,697,000; Saskatchewan received $2,242,000; Alberta received $1,736,000; British Columbia received $5,909,000; the Northwest Territories received $196,000; and the Yukon received $352,000. Based on those figures, the FLIP program was very well administered.

Dealing with the subject he raised in regard to certain ridings receiving vast amounts and others receiving a bare minimum under Canada Works, if we had had the time to go through the 264 constituencies I am sure we would have noted that there are a great many ridings held by Liberal members of parliament which also received the very basic minimum.

My own riding received an increase to $2½ million this year, but the great need for this program is evidenced by the more than $6 million in applications which were made by the people. I am sure I will never be satisfied, nor will my constituents, with the budget announced for my riding. The fact is that there is a great interest, and indeed $2½ million may seem like a great amount to a riding not too far away from mine which received $100,000. If you compare the applications, the unemployment, and the needs in these ridings, perhaps that would be a more fair way of making a comparison.

The hon. member is to be congratulated. I think we are both in agreement that government funds must be spent where they are needed to create jobs. No one argues that point.

● (1832)

It is unfair to mention two or three Conservative ridings when we both know who got the barest minimum. If we want to put it on the record, there are a great many Liberal ridings on the very—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.32 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, when five o'clock was called, I was saying that the farmer's income declined again this year. That has to change. In that respect, I would like to quote a letter I just received which reads as follows:

> In this matter which has been going on for too long, the Federation always maintained a positive attitude and met its commitments so that this week the trustee again informed the Canadian Dairy Commission that an amount of over $2 million was available to it as soon as it can prove it is entitled to it and met its obligations by sending the subsidy cheques to the producers.
> Contrary to rumours you might have heard the Federation has in trust all the monies withheld and so informs the Commission, asking it to provide in writing a legal opinion concerning its right to withhold 25 cents on every class 1 hundredweight. We are still waiting for the written legal opinion. Is the Commission trying to use blackmail to withhold an amount without having jurisdiction to do so?
> The stratagem used by the Canadian Dairy Commission is as old as the world. "If you want to defeat your enemy, cut off his supplies."
> So we were mistaken because we thought we were partners in the provisional comprehensive milk marketing plan, not enemies.
> However, Quebec fluid milk producers do not give in to blackmail wherever it comes from.
> The Minister of Agriculture, the Canadian Dairy Commission and all Quebec members of Parliament in Ottawa must be made aware of this situation. Therefore, all Quebec consumer milk producers will show their solidarity and voice clearly and loudly their intention not to give up to this kind of blackmail. They are respectable businessmen who meet their obligations and who expect the same from those with whom they deal.

In this regard, why does the Treasury Board not make the necessary funds available to the Minister of Agriculture to enable him to pay a part of the cost of the milk distribution program in schools put forward by the province of Quebec? Surely such a program can only result in increasing the consumption of dairy products among our youth while improving their nutrition habits. Besides, it can be expected that the school milk program which I have referred to will reach 175,000 school boys and girls no later than next December. Is it not a real success, Mr. Speaker? Why should the federal government not do the same in other economic sectors?

A few weeks ago, I read the following in a paper:

> Quebec furniture industry, a victim of the federal government.

As a matter of fact, the article read as follows:

> The federal government is responsible for the decline of another Quebec industry which was supposed to be viable, namely the furniture industry.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Simply because of a lack of leadership by the federal government which resulted in the Canadian furniture market being flooded with foreign products, so that furniture imports have increased by 26.3 per cent last year. Needless to say, the situation is such that an estimated 3,000 Quebec workers in the industry have lost their jobs since the beginning of the year. And yet, does the Quebec furniture industry not have an interesting future? Because of its inaction, the present government is the big culprit. Indeed, the market continues to be flooded with imports at the expense of local businesses. The furniture industry is not the only one affected, just consider what has happened in the footwear industry. In both these industries, the federal government has failed to protect local producers and has allowed the market to be flooded with foreign products.

With regard to the changes made in the Income Tax Act concerning the individual, we see that Bill C-11 recommends an increase of $100 in the amount that can be deducted as employment expenses, raising the maximum to $250. In this regard, on March 28 last, I asked the House, pursuant to the terms of Standing Order 43, for unanimous consent to present a motion to that effect. In short, I was asking, no more and no less, that section 8(1)(a) of the Income Tax Act be amended to allow deduction of all travelling expenses incurred by working people to get to work and come back home using public transportation, for tax purposes, provided vouchers were filed. In my humble opinion, the $100 increase granted by the federal government is really not adequate.

Subject of course to some exemptions, most wage earners under the act as it stands can claim only up to $150, a deduction equal to 3 per cent of the income from a job, when in fact it costs them anywhere between $300 to $600 a year to get to work and come back. I sincerely feel that it would be more advantageous if most workers or wage earners generally were encouraged to use public transportation to shuttle back and forth from work because, on the one hand, it would save a whole lot of energy, and on the other, it would save hundreds of millions of dollars paid out in subsidies by the various levels of government. So, in short, with my motion of March 28 last, I was asking the government to allow for income tax purposes, certain tax benefits to those who have to get to work; I feel that would have had rewarding results first, as I said, by saving energy, and then, by benefitting the worker. As usual, unfortunately, the federal government did not see fit to give effect to my motion. They tend to brush aside with a flick of the hand everything that comes from the opposition.

Then, there is inflation about which I should like to say a few words. The crux of the inflation problem lies in prices. Any inquiry into the causes of the inflation in prices should start out with an in-depth study of the mechanisms of prices as they relate to our monetary system. In addition, as price setting is an integral part of the monetary system, such a survey should of necessity include a detailed examination of the operations of that system. That being recognized, one can easily wonder why the mechanism whereby prices are set is so sadly lacking in our society. It has never been updated by our own bankers.

The rigidity of the transaction pattern has revealed itself as one of the major obstacle to mankind's progress and often only a very serious crisis or an impending catastrophe succeeds in breaking up this deadlock. It is precisely a disaster of that sort which is facing the western world today. Prices in Canada have been going up steadily for the last 19 years. It was back in 1953 that we saw the consumer price index go down for the last time. Under the present pricing pattern, the public must assume all the production costs for a given period, while it should pay only for all the goods consumed during that same period. So, inflation is a legalized robbery which deprives elder people of their savings and an anticipated robbery of future generations since they will have to pay a price on capital which will have lost an equal value tomorrow. That is the situation which has to be changed as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of speaking on Bill C-11. I am pleased to speak on this bill because I did not have an opportunity to speak during the throne speech debate. That is one of the difficulties of this House. However, I share with all the constituency of Halton the joy we had in having the Queen here for our opening ceremonies.

Second, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on his new post.

Mr. Hees: Apple polishing.

Mr. Philbrook: Anyone who knows this minister will agree that he has brought valuable qualities to the federal government, qualities of reason, discipline, and dedication. From what I and my constituents saw during his recent visit to my riding in Oakville and the nearby suburb of Toronto, he comes across to the public as not only a very popular but a very promising minister. I do not mean he just makes promises but shows promise.

I wish to consider this an economic statement, not a statement on the budget because this is what the minister did. In addition, it gives an opportunity to speak a little more broadly, rather than just on the budget. I wish to talk about what is important in the financing of this country, on the economic arrangements.

Mr. Hees: You have finished the first apple, now start on the second.

Mr. Philbrook: I hear a little noise coming from the other side. It is a little difficult to see who it is behind the gangster glasses.

I wish to begin with a few general and long-term comments. They are important in terms of orientation. If they are repetitious, it is because they need repeating.

A lot of people, businessmen in particular, feel that with this economic statement the minister is moving in the right direction. He is doing as much as is presently possible, given the very difficult circumstances under which he is operating. There is very little room to manoeuvre.

The present position could be characterized as tax relief and incentives for both business and consumers. The important part is not what is being offered at present, but the fact that if the response is good and the economy begins to grow, as many are predicting, we should be following up with more of the same. This may seem a small step. However, it is the greatest step this minister could take for this country at the present time. Over a long period of time we have had one very clear inclination, that is, toward the social policies of this country during a period of very easy economic times. It now takes strong leadership to change that emphasis back to free enterprise, the private sector, making very difficult decisions and running a tight ship.

I think it was Tolstoy who said the longest journey starts with one small step. At least we are seeing that now. I think those in the official opposition will agree that this is the right emphasis; however, those in the other parties may not agree.

The emphasis for some time to come will be on working through the private sector, through free enterprise, not with the government running so many activities in this country. This was signalled in the white paper "The Way Ahead" of a few months ago. It started in the March, 1977, budget and is being confirmed by the removal of controls.

Many people, including myself, would like to have seen controls removed sooner. I am prepared to accept the argument that this may be a very difficult winter in many ways and we might have regretted taking off controls now. However, in terms of getting the economy rolling, it would have been preferable if they could have been removed this fall.

There is another problem that is as difficult as running the country. I refer to the old problem of communicating with the people. We do not seem to be able to share the facts and our mutual experiences with the people back home. We must work as hard at that as running this country. I say that, in spite of televising the proceedings in this House, although that is capable of being edited just like the newspapers. Even though we find we are able to conduct our business well, we still cannot seem to get this across. There are people who still wonder.

This morning I noticed an announcement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on a subject which is due to be raised again shortly, namely, a guaranteed annual income with accompanying tax credits, the so-called negative taxation and so on.

I suggest to the minister that we should at least make a start in three needy areas. There are the low-income workers, the one-parent families, and unemployed workers between 60 and 65. We know these are serious problems. We should be looking for some better way to support these people and give them reassurance. But if this is to be the main social plan in this country, many of us are worried about it being the main disincentive. We found we had trouble with all our programs, getting the wrong effect through disincentives and so on. I hope we can work this out before getting into a general social support program.

I mentioned the business of communicating with constituents. I find when I get back home and talk to constituents there that there are certain things they want to know in the financial and economic area. They can be divided into two groups, the negative things, the things they really do not want, and the positive things, the things they want and are not getting. First the negative things. Why do we have to have them? Near the top of the list is the very complicated tax system. Somehow or other we must do something about this sooner or later, or we shall bog down beneath the weight of our own figures and paperwork.

I wonder how many people are able to fill out their own tax forms these days, the way they used to. The way things are now, it may be a haven for tax accountants, but the average citizen gets very little satisfaction. It is a hard nut to crack, now we have got this monster with us, but I feel it is a top priority.

Next, there seem to be a number of nuisance moves coming along. People are wondering why we must have them since there are more important things on which to work. The minister is obviously trying to do something about this. He issued a statement recently about life insurance tax. He has frozen that and put it on the shelf for now. I am talking about the business of collecting from beneficiaries after the death of the policyholder. But we still have the problem of the effect of any new tax law on those who use insurance policies as collateral for loans. What can we do about this? That practice is very popular, but such a provision is something which people are not accepting well.

I should like to read part of a letter I received from someone I consider to be a very concerned if somewhat overwrought constituent. He wrote:

> Sorry, but perhaps there is a misunderstanding with regard to the October 25 budget. It appears that for the time being the "death tax" on life insurance is being withheld. However, there will still be tax changes affecting individuals borrowing on their policies. This is a most controversial issue since it changes the whole attitude toward the individual life insurance policy as compared with the practice which has emerged after years of study by the federal Department of Insurance as well as previous studies on life insurance. At no time did any investigation group ever recommend such a change in attitude with regard to borrowing against one's policy. Here, we have an issue which has been raised for some obscure reason and, as you can understand, Frank, there is only peanuts in tax revenue involved. But think of the extra administrative costs to insurance companies and policy holders as well as to the federal government. In other words, the "bucks" are not in it, so why go to this trouble to inconvenience and annoy the individual Canadian? Obviously, no civil servant will ever have to borrow on his own life insurance, so consequently they do not understand the problem. By the same token, it is in the interests of the financial institutions that this tax should go through. After all, if an individual wants to borrow a thousand dollars it is far better to charge him 13 per cent or 14 per cent or 15 per cent rather than, say, 6 per cent on the older policies. Again, Frank, there are no other words for it than "this concept of taxation is stupid". Here we are in a time when we are trying to simplify tax legislation and reduce costs of doing business, and this is an example of the way in which we have lost our ability to increase productivity and reduce costs—a beautiful example of additional costs being created by the very people who are preaching restraint. The federal government is snowballing more and more legislation. We need less legislation, less complicated forms, fewer delays.

A similar problem seems to have come up in terms of low interest loans from one's own employers, from one's own company. Again, I do not understand this. I have heard the arguments against it and they make sense. Everybody benefits in some ways from their own companies. Airline employees, for example, get free trips around the world, and so on. Why should a person not get a low interest loan from his own company if he can, without being taxed extra by the government? This is another nuisance thing, a way of irritating the public at a time when we ought to be concentrating on other areas.

Excessive paperwork is a complaint which seems to be levelled against Statistics Canada and our tax system. Then, of course, there are the big general complaints about the excess of size and the inefficiency of the government and the civil service, government spending and budgets. People want absolute cuts, not just a scaling down of the increase in growth of the bureaucracy but an absolute reduction, perhaps one per cent per year in the size of the civil service and in the size of government budgets for a period of five years until we can get them back to something sensible, for example, all governments taking 35 per cent of the gross national product instead of 45 per cent.

There is the issue of abuses and disincentives. There is a great deal of concern among the Canadian people about this problem, particularly in areas like unemployment insurance. However, that seems to have improved a bit. In short, what people seem to want is small, clean, efficient government—streamlined government. And who is to make those decisions? Nobody except the cabinet, the ministers themselves. We have pretty well proven it is not possible for any of the rest of us to make those changes.

Mr. Benjamin: That's your side!

Mr. Philbrook: Well, have you made any? I have not noticed the government implementing any of your suggestions.

Those are the sort of clean-up things that people seem to want.

There are also some positive things they want. They say, "Why don't we do these things, because we obviously need to get cracking in some areas and there are some suggestions?" Of course, tax cuts for all sectors—the minister has made a start on this—especially in the area of sales taxes. But that is both a federal and provincial concern and we need more co-operation between those two levels of government. If we do this, the suggestion is that it will stimulate domestic buying and also stimulate our ability to sell export goods because prices will be lower. Why cannot this be brought in, at least with application to Canadian-made goods? Discrimination, yes, but it is discriminatory on Canada's behalf in an extremely competitive world.

Why can we not have tax exemptions to buy Canadian stocks, bonds, and so on, to invest in Canadian capital formation? They say savings are high at the moment, that too much money is locked up, but people are asking, "Why is that money not being put into Canadian capital investment by the big institutions, the insurance companies, the banks and so on?" Why cannot we do something about that?

Why cannot we have more federal-provincial co-operation in planning, programs, budgets, restraint, and even foreign borrowing? This is what the people want to know. In another area another plea we hear is that more breaks and more money should be given to small business as opposed to big business. We have talked about it ourselves and we hear about it in certain ridings such as my own, in Halton, where there is a lot of small business.

This morning there was an article in the Toronto paper by Andrew Kniewasser, the President of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada. He had this to say:

● (2032)

Too little has been committed to new equity financing, permanent ownership capital to build new businesses or expand existing ones, and too little of this flow of capital has been directed to financing small and medium firms or regional firms.

I think a lot of us will certainly agree with that.

As for better industrial relations, we have talked a lot about this matter, but do not seem to be able to get very far, certainly not without the co-operation of big business and labour. However, it is the key, and people are hungering for better industrial relations very much. They are fed up with the squabbling that goes on in the market place between these two giants.

An hon. Member: Are you hungering to get to cabinet?

Mr. Philbrook: There are more important things than getting to cabinet, my friend. If there is anyone who should appreciate that, it is you folks on the other side, because your chances are not very good.

Mr. Benjamin: Just have patience.

Mr. Philbrook: With a caucus like yours it will need patience.

There is another area which is quite sensitive but we will have to address ourselves to it because the people are doing so. I refer to crippling strikes in what are called essential services. Some people say we cannot define what are essential services. I do not believe that. I think the people can define that for us. I think they would probably say they include all areas of transportation and communication, the public service, and all security services such as the police and firemen.

An hon. Member: What about health services?

Mr. Philbrook: Health is included in security. We must find a better way to solve our differences than having strikes, because I think the people are fed up with losing essential services.

Our businessmen also worry about what is going on in GATT and they want more information about it. They do not want to be shut out of this crucial area, because some of our businesses may have to close down. There is also still a little concern about foreign ownership, although the situation is quiet at the moment.

Along with all this there is another painful area which we shall have to examine. I refer to long range planning. We have heard the arguments on this matter. We have heard it said that we do not need long range strategies because we have a multitude of policies, and I guess we do. The only trouble is that it is like looking at thousands of small things at the same time; the people cannot see any direction. They cannot see any direction from the leadership, from the government of this country, and they wonder where on earth we are going. So as difficult as it is, Mr. Speaker, it is essential that we get down to examining this, and I cannot think of any better government to do this than the present Liberal government.

If we are going to cope with shortages and competition and let this country reach its potential, we will need some more effective, more impressive, long range policies than the public has seen until now. And this despite short range politics. Indeed, I think we can assume a fair degree of stable government. I am not sure why we worry about forming these long range policies and carrying them out because I do not see much chance of a change of government.

I also think it is very important that we work with the provincial governments and the private sector. This is easier said than done, but again worth underlining. What are the main areas here? Certainly public transportation is one. My constituents as well as this House know where I stand on that matter, particularly in terms of commuter transit and the disappointment we have had in not financing that more than we have. We have discussed it quite a lot, and we will be talking about it again some time.

Another area which should be examined is science technology and research; I think my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Maine) would support that. This field has been badly short-changed in recent years. It is the basis of all our industry, all our manufacturing, and along with the private sector we must do a better job in this regard. Energy is another area requiring attention.

If I may be permitted a brief aside, one of the questions we will have to solve, a matter some of us are working on now, is this question of world population. We really have a time bomb ticking away, whether we realize it or not from our comfortable position here in Canada.

However, the big question is industrial strategy. Here I would like to give credit to my own colleagues who have worked hard on this question for several months, and perhaps do not yet have the final answers though they do have a great deal more insight. I refer in particular to my colleague from Scarborough East who has recently published a paper of which I think the government is well aware.

Before I wrap up my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record a short statement published by the Science Council of Canada. It is a statement of concern which is based on a larger background paper called "Uncertain Prospects: Canadian Manufacturing Industry, 1971-1977". If the House will bear with me, I should like to put this excerpt on the record, because I really think it says it all.

Canadian manufacturing industry is at risk and its future is uncertain. This uncertainty obviously extends into a distinct and pressing concern about our ability to employ the wide range of talents and skills that make the Canadian labour force such an exceptional national resource. Last year, Canada's deficit on manufactured goods was more than $10 billion. Nearly every branch of Canadian manufacturing displays weakness. Textiles, clothing, leather goods, consumer electronics—all are succumbing to fierce foreign competition. Many of our high technology industries have, since 1971, developed increasingly large deficits in balances of payment. The problems are long term and reflect fundamental structural deficiences.

Contrary to popular opinion, the 1960's were a period of relative decline in Canadian manufacturing. Canada did not progress by comparison with other industrial and semi-industrial countries. The seeds of our current distress were being sown in the so-called "golden era". In the past two decades, the various policies bearing on industrial growth in Canada, while partially successful as short-term palliatives, have not helped to create a strong technological base. A superficial, stunted form of industrialization was produced by policies that created growth through import substitution.

Too many Canadian exports are actually a reflection of intracorporate transfers. Without the Auto-Pact, for instance, Canada would have practically no exports of manufactured goods. Between 1965 and 1970, the proportion of finished manufactures in total exports—a sector that provides productive employment and creates an indigenous base of engineering and scientific expertise—grew by 3.22 per cent (autos excluded). Denmark increased its proportion by 11.3 per cent, France by 5.5 per cent, Mexico by 16.8 per cent, and Sweden by 10.8 per cent. In relative terms, Canada fell seriously behind.

The responses of many businessmen to the current economic situation are indicative of current problems. Too much government control through regulation and interference in private entreprise; profit controls put forward by the Anti-Inflation Board; high taxes; uncertainty about nationalist sentiment and its possible policy implications; loss of competitively advantageous wage-rates relative to our major market area; stress on the part of government on the provision of social benefits as opposed to emphasis upon productivity—these are the elements that businessmen complain of as part of the poor business climate in Canada.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Ha, ha!

Mr. Philbrook: I wonder why such a responsible member on the opposite side considers that funny, because I doubt that Canadians do.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Did the hon. member have a question for me? He said something to me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Halton. (Mr. Philbrook).

Mr. Philbrook: I find it a most unusual piece of behaviour, Mr. Speaker, but we will let it go because we are used to it.

To continue my quotation:

● (2042)

These problems are not only grave in themselves, they also reflect an even deeper malaise that has to be exposed and diagnosed. The Science Council background paper, "Uncertain Prospects Canadian Manufacturing Industry, 1971-1977" describes the difficulties of Canada's manufacturing sector. It shows that the central problem has to do with a failure to create and agree on coherent national policies aimed at restoring and enhancing our industrial base. Such policies are needed urgently and should address specialization, ownership, government procurement, major programs, domestic market aggregation, international science and technology, agreements, and other areas where there is significant potential for promoting existing strengths and opportunities. Brilliant examples of Canadian industrial and innovative successes already exist. They must be built upon and multiplied.

It goes without saying that is the responsibility of government and of government economic and financing policies, and therefore of the Minister of Finance to set the proper climate to make sure those things are realized. It is forecast that 1978 will be a better year, a year of much improved economic growth, and perhaps the start of a more clearcut long term growth.

Mr. Orlikow: Who said that? It was not the Economic Council of Canada. They said it was going to be worse.

Mr. Philbrook: I think if the hon. member does some reading he will discover that most groups say that.

In summary, what the Canadian people want to know and need to know is where we are going and how we can get Canada moving. The position taken by the new Minister of Finance is a very encouraging sign that we will get that kind of leadership in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. Before the hon. member has used up all his time, I wonder if he would permit a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) accept a question from the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin)?

Mr. Philbrook: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman cited four of five countries where exporting of manufactured goods has assumed marked improvement over that of Canada's. On the one hand he has indicated that there has been too much regulation and government interference. On the other hand, these countries which were referred to as having a better record than Canada all have socialist or national economic planning and have now, or have had, socialist governments which interfere in the private sector. How does he reconcile the differences between the two?

Mr. Philbrook: Mr. Speaker, the countries I mentioned were Denmark, France, Sweden and Mexico. I really have to wonder what Denmark and France would think about the hon. member's remarks concerning their socialist societies with a great deal of government interference. I think they would differ entirely on that. It simply proves that under various forms of government there can be good government. It depends on what the people of those countries want, but in the short term they can do a good job.

Mr. Benjamin: They have more interference than we do.

Mr. Philbrook: I do not see any contradiction there at all.

Income Tax

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, tonight I would like to discuss the need for this country to process more of our raw materials to their finished state, and the use of tax incentives to bring this about.

For far too long we have been shipping out of this country a far too large proportion of our primary products to be processed to their final stages of production in other countries, which thereby gain the many advantages of employment, taxes and profits which accrue from this further processing.

We have in Canada the skilled manpower, managerial skill, cheap power, and excellent transportation facilities which are needed for this further processing, and it is about time we started doing something about getting more of this work for Canada. Now, what should and can be done?

Thirty years ago the government of Ontario introduced a plan which has been largely responsible for the spectacular expansion of the pulp and paper industry in that province during the intervening years. It required companies to process in the province a far higher proportion of the logs which they cut, a large proportion of which they had been shipping in the raw state to paper mills in the United States.

What has worked so well in the case of the pulp and paper industry in Ontario can work equally well in other primary industries right across the country. It should apply to all raw materials which we ship to other countries for further processing, and can succeed equally well because of the great dependence of other countries on our primary products to feed their manufacturing processes.

It is obvious that a certain proportion of the raw materials we produce must be exported in the raw state, but not nearly the proportion that is the case today. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should now undertake an intensive study of our primary industries to determine what proportion of the primary products we produce can reasonably be required to be processed to their finished state in this country.

Having decided what proportions of our various primary products should be further processed in Canada, we must produce an incentive which will be sufficiently attractive to persuade those who normally export our raw materials that it will be profitable for them to build the plants which will be necessary to carry out this additional processing in Canada.

It has become painfully obvious that the grants now provided by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, although useful, have not proved sufficiently attractive to bring to our areas of slow growth sufficient new industry to reverse the dangerously high rates of unemployment that have persisted in those areas for many years.

I believe that in addition to the DREE grants, which are now available to areas of slow growth, we must also make available an additional incentive in the form of a graduated scale of federal taxation which will permit a new plant processing primary products in an area of slow growth to pay no federal taxes in the first full year of profitable operation, and gradually increase its tax payments until it is paying full taxation in the fifteenth year. My conversations with leading businessmen across the country have convinced me that this incentive, added to the present DREE grants for slow growth areas, will prove sufficiently attractive to accomplish what has to be done.

The incentive which I have outlined will pay for itself many times over in the years ahead in the following ways: it will reduce the present far too high expenditure on unemployment insurance by stimulating the economy and enabling more people to find work. And we can increase tax revenues because (a), more people will be working and paying income taxes; (b) more commodities will be sold and will be raising additional commodity taxes; and (c), the increased volume of business will lower unit costs of production and make available more profits to tax.

In conclusion, the time is long overdue for us to stop shipping such a large proportion of our raw materials out of the country to provide jobs for other people. We must process a far higher proportion of them here in Canada for the benefit of Canadian production and employment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) will have a chance to speak, because we will be very anxious to hear his remarks.

I want to add my congratulations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for his excellent presentation the other night and for the great skill, frankness, and ability which he has brought to his post in these difficult times.

An hon. Member: Why are you smiling?

Mr. Abbott: I am smiling because I am speaking the truth, and because a lot of other Canadians are smiling with the knowledge that the Minister of Finance has the courage and the ability to make decisions.

We are facing difficult times now, and we are facing great problems. These problems are not simply those of Canada, but are shared by other countries, notably our great neighbour to the south.

I was interested to see the other day that the Bethlehem Steel Corporation was showing a loss of $450 million for the first nine months, the largest loss in the history of the United States by any single corporation. It even exceeds the loss the Pennyslvania Railroad faced when it went into bankruptcy. Therefore it is evident that great problems are facing the major corporations here and in the United States. These have been highlighted by the recent lay-offs which have taken place in our mining industry and in other industries in Canada. About these we are deeply concerned.

I have been struck—and that is why I wanted to cite the mining problem—as I think many hon. members have been, by the enormous publicity and the extraordinary concern shown,

understandably, by everybody involved with the lay-offs at the International Nickel Company. Why I raise this is that I think there seems to be a singular contrast in the kind of reaction to the problems of the smaller business community and to the fact that all across the country there are many small businesses which are finding it perhaps even more difficult, particularly in the face of situations such as that suffered by INCO. I think it emphasizes that while the major industries in this country are having difficult times, we have paid frequently, and throughout our economic history in this country, too high a tribute to the great industries and perhaps too little attention to the hundreds of thousands of small business which exist here.

Mr. Darling: Right on!

Mr. Abbott: We speak of our small businesses, and we seem to brush them off as not worthy of nearly as much attention as the great industries; whereas, as some of my colleagues and others have said, the future of the Canadian economic community largely depends on whether the small business community is able to grow and thrive. We have in Canada today something over a million enterprises ranging, I suppose, from momma and poppa milk stores right up to highly technologically oriented businesses with millions of dollars invested, which turn over millions of dollars a year. Of these some one million enterprises there are some 350,000 incorporated small businesses, accounting for over 65 per cent of the work force of this country.

Since my recent elevation to the post of Minister of State (Small Business) I have been studying the question of what it is that small businesses want and what governments can do to respond to those wants. Naturally, any of us who have been associated with small businesses, operated small businesses or known people who have, recognize that what they really want is to run profitably and to earn a comfortable living for their proprietors so that they do not have to work night and day seven days a week, and possibly so that they can transfer such businesses ultimately to members of the family who might have worked with the proprietors.

Mr. Darling: They need less government red tape.

Mr. Abbott: I would like to come to that. The essential character of small business, I think, is the fact that it normally is under the control and operation of a single human being. That man or woman may be the proprietor of a very small business or of a larger one, but that person faces the same basic problem. Every morning he or she has to get up, go to work, and try to keep the business going. Frequently some of those people in the community may be regarded, deservedly, as people of real substance and success, but on a day-to-day basis they are facing the possibility that their businesses will be submerged by problems and that they will not be able to meet the challenges of every day.

My hon. friend opposite said that we should eliminate some of the red tape. I sincerely share that view. I think that governments have inflicted in increasing volumes a heavy degree of paper work. Much of it has been the result of the voracious appetite for information which such organizations as Statistics Canada feel they must gain from the business community. Through the introduction recently of the CALURA amendments which I hope we can pass quickly, we can eliminate some 70,000 small firms from responding to questionnaires from Statistics Canada.

I am advised that some 25 per cent of the paper work burden emanates from Statistics Canada, whereas almost 75 per cent emanates from the normal paper work burdens imposed by governments through various agencies and departments such as the UIC and the Customs Tariff. There is a vast and complicated apparatus that makes up modern government. Too often there is an unchecked zeal on the part of governments at all levels and in all departments to arm themselves with the most complex possible forms and to impose them on the business community willy-nilly, whether they need them or not, and whether or not they have done analyses to see if there is an element of over-kill. If I can do anything, I want to attack this problem, though I have found that it is easier to make speeches than actually come to grips with this problem.

Mr. Darling: Good for you.

Mr. Abbott: However, I hope that we can find it possible to set up some sort of check by which new legislation and new departments will not create programs without first measuring the efficacy of what they are trying to do against the paper work they are proposing to impose on the community.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Abbott: I would like to see a greater willingness on the part of governments to look at the existing paper work burden and to demand of each of my colleagues that they ask their responsible officers to examine carefully the kind of burden that they feel is essential or necessary, and take away the necessity of the kind of material they know has become complex, irrelevant, and probably unnecessary for the carrying out of their responsibilities.

When one talks to businessmen one finds that a major problem which is always with them is the problem of money. There is no question that this is an equally difficult problem. It is perhaps even more difficult to meet than trying to lift the paper work burden. However, it is clear that Canadians are great savers. There are large pools of existing capital in this country. There are men and women who, presented with possibilities of attractive and potentially rewarding ventures, do want to get into the action, as the saying goes, and I think one of our problems is that we have not set up a satisfactory apparatus, a satisfactory governmental clearing house, incentives, a tax system or what have you, to encourage people to venture their capital in the kind of smaller businesses that create high levels of employment.

There are those who are already in business who are finding it increasingly difficult to stay in business. Statistics show that bankruptcies are some 35 per cent over what they were in the first six months of last year. This is true particularly in the building industry.

I think we have to recognize that the working capital requirements and the cash flow problems of businesses are very critical, and I hope that in the weeks to come I will be able to talk to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and encourage him to look at even more good works, beyond those he has been able to create for us through Bill C-11.

I would like to spend a few moments talking about the actual contributions the Minister of Finance and his predecessor have been able to make to the small business community because I think that there are a number of aspects of the bill which go a long way to helping that sector.

The 5 per cent investment tax credit which was to have expired this year will be subject to a three-year exemption. Also, there is the concept of recognizing regional disparities by providing in some areas 7½ per cent instead of 5 per cent, and 10 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé regions of Quebec.

In attempting to reduce the effects of inflation, all businesses, but particularly small businesses, face a cash flow problem, in part because of inflation. The tax system, to a certain extent, helps meet the problem in the area of capital equipment by special concessions such as fast write-offs and the investment tax credit. The proposal to allow a special deduction of 3 per cent of the cost of inventories will ease the cash flow problem by some $300 million annually.

The bill expands the $1,000 dividend and interest exemption to include capital gains. By introducing special rules for replacement of businesses and farm properties, and increasing the offset for capital losses, as well as guaranteeing a capital gains treatment on disposal of Canadian securities, businesses will be substantially assisted. I welcome them as being particularly helpful to the small business sector.

Of all the items in the bill of special value to small business are those measures to stimulate investment. These include the increase in the dividend tax credit from 33⅓ per cent to 50 per cent beginning next year, the special inventory allowance of 3 per cent, and the extension of the investment tax credit.

The bill will also contribute to the small business sector by facilitating the expansion by Canadian-controlled private companies through joint ventures, business acquisitions, and plant replacement. Special provisions are contained for employee stock options and share purchase loans. These are designed to permit smaller companies to compete better in attracting managerial expertise. The Minister of Finance has further provided encouragement of funds for small business by the guarantee of capital gains treatment for investors and the special accommodation of provincial venture investment corporations.

These are steps taken by the minister and I know that they enjoy support from those opposite who have taken the trouble to acquaint themselves with these measures and their benefits.

[Mr. Abbott.]

I suppose I get even greater support for these measures from my friends opposite when I say this, and I know my colleague, the minister, would agree, that we must do more. I think as we go into this difficult year I want to try to convince my colleagues and other people in the community of the great importance of the creation of small business enterprises, particularly those of a high technology nature. I think it is clearly evidenced by the experience of the past that it is in these areas that enormous increases in employment can take place.

A study done in the United States some time ago contrasted the mature corporations, resource-oriented corporations, and high technology innovative corporations. For very heavy investment in the mature or resource based industries there was a very modest increase in hiring and employment. It showed what a dramatic effect can take place in a successful, innovative high technology type of company. Thousands were employed for a fraction of the investment in the other. I think the case can readily be made that the former minister of finance, given the circumstances he found himself in last spring and the circumstances his successor found himself in this fall, did the maximum possible to achieve the results we have.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we must look with new eyes, new sympathy, new enthusiasm on the small business sector. We must recognize that it is in this area that perhaps the greatest opportunities for the future and of Canada and its citizens lie.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured—I think I am honoured—to follow the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) in his first speech in that portfolio. I want to congratulate him on ascending to the portfolio, but that really depends on which direction he was pointed at the outset, whether he is ascending or descending. The proof of the pudding will be his performance in the portfolio. That will best be judged by the small businessmen of Canada whom he is now equipped to serve, at least in terms of jurisdiction. I hope for his sake, but more for their sake, that they do not have a repeat by the minister of the unfortunate handling of the consumer and corporate affairs portfolio under his jurisdiction. I am thinking particularly of the competition policy which was so complicated, so out of touch that it had to be withdrawn and the department had to go back to the drawing board in order to deal with it again.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I feel certain the hon. member would not want to mislead the House even unintentionally. I wonder if, in his very profound study of the competition bill—although I do not recall his being in the committee but he speaks of its great complexity—he was aware that the bill was introduced last year with the clearly announced purpose of withdrawing it after the session for the particular reason of enjoying the comments of the committee. I hope it will re-introduced, but I just wanted to take issue with that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was a dead duck from the time it started.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) put his finger on the issue. It may well have been initiated for that purpose. I do not want to make a great issue of it because we will deal with it as time goes on, and history will also deal with it. It was introduced very hurriedly shortly after the minister took the portfolio. It was condemned out of hand by most of the business community.

I make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, because there is no one in this House who does not wish the minister success in his new portfolio, not as a minister but in terms of the segment of the economy which he is going to serve. I think it is important at the outset that he does not mislead the House, even though I think he did it in good fun. He had to be doing it in good fun, otherwise it would be deliberately misleading the House to say that Canadians are smiling because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is doing such a fine job. It may well be, as Canadians look upon this minister and the situation he inherited from another minister who is equally troubled in violent travail, that the facial expression he calls a smile is the result of a digestive upset when they contemplate the extent of the damage done to the economy.

It is not proper or right for the minister to say that other countries are in the same position. In his speech he relied heavily on the fact that the situation was equally confusing, difficult, and foreboding for the future of the United States as Canada, as if that were some solace to Canadians. More important, it is not in accordance with the facts, and the minister should know that.

In the United States there is less unemployment, less inflation, and twice the real growth rate of Canada. There is a trade surplus on current account in the United States compared to a trade deficit on current account in Canada. Not only do the words give no comfort to Canadians, they are not factual.

A minister embarking on his first speech should not delude himself. He should ask what small business wants. I can tell him some of the things I would like to see.

I talk to a lot of small businessmen in my constituency. They would like certain stability with respect to government policy, whether it is this minister's policy, that of the Minister of Finance, or of any other ministerial portfolio in the Government of Canada. They want to know there is a government in Ottawa which is concerned with small business. They want to know what is going to happen from one day to the next. The right hand should know what the left is doing. It has become painfully evident to me in the five years I have been here that this government does not know what it is doing.

The government's attack on problems is uncoordinated. Perhaps that is the reason why we find ourselves in this situation. Businessmen want a commitment from government. They want a simple, ordinary, everyday service that is also provided to those who are not in business, namely, the operation of the mails.

I know solicitors, accountants, and many others who depend upon the mail for business. Today they cannot rely on Her Majesty's mail for the purpose of affecting a contract in the legal sense. As a result, this important service to business is being by-passed. They would like something of that nature.

They would like some co-ordination between provincial and federal business development programs. There is not very much at the moment. It is developing, but we have a long way to go in that regard.

These people want to be assured that when parliament debates small loans legislation or the new Federal Business Development Bank, as we did some time ago, that those agencies of government answer the needs of small business. They do not today. Government policy with regard to business is not related to the small business sector. It may come to be that way, but it is not that way now.

The minister issues press statements and uses brave words with regard to what he hopes for small business. However, there has to be some meat put on that skeleton. The minister must deal with his colleagues, which he has indicated will take some time. They do not quite understand him. I can understand why. It is not because the minister will not speak about it but because of the nature of the ministry. The problems of small business in this country must be addressed.

We do nothing but give lip service to the importance of small business as a place of employment. We owe more to the small businessman and the thousands of people looking for jobs in that sector which provides 50 per cent of the employment capacity in Canada. We must do more for them than merely utter small words.

I am honoured to follow in this debate the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) who, during his tenure of office as minister of trade and commerce, became the most energetic and productive member of any ministry in that period in that important portfolio.

What is left of our markets abroad? They have been affected in many ways by the policies of the government. What is left are the vestiges of those areas which were the beneficiaries of that hon. member's knowledge and ability.

I listened in absolute dismay to the speech by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook). I heard him say that small business needs more breaks, and that there is too little commitment to investment in Canada. A Liberal member of parliament said that tonight in this House. He sits on the back bench of the Liberal party. He said we need better industrial relations, that there is too much squabbling. Of course he is right.

What initiative did the government bring forward in the last session with regard to labour relations and an improvement in relations between employers and employees? There were none. The hon. member for Halton is absolutely right.

We have to find a better way than strikes. If there were a better way to deal with economic problems and problems between employers and employees, there is not a working man or woman in Canada who would not move in that direction, whether it be through labour courts, binding arbitration, or a host of other remedies that are available.

For the ten years that the government has been in power in Canada, more people have suffered from strikes. More have been engaged in strikes. This government sat on its butt and did absolutely nothing to meet with business and labour to find a way to bring the two sides together on some common ground. In that sense Ministers failed. They failed because they are tired, irritable, and more concerned about their own position than about those elements of society which cry out for some form of leadership. I am talking about the men and women who carry the lunch pails, the members of the work force in Canada. There is not a working person anywhere who wants to strike.

Government members have made great speeches about what they are going to do, about the great conferences they will hold and the seminars they will fund. However, we have a strike record in Canada that is second only to Italy. Of course, we need a better way.

The Liberal member for Halton pointed out that businessmen are worried about GATT. Of course they are worried about it. What is the position of this government? Is it to go out in the world as a Boy Scout and fight for absolute free trade? What is it going to do for the shoe manufacturer or the textile worker? What is its position with respect to GATT?

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) says one thing, the Minister of Finance says another, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), like a philosopher king, presides over that kind of disorder. Businessmen in Canada are asking the government where they stand. They want to know what position the government is taking in the world. They ask how the government is meeting opposition from other countries whose businesses and industries are subsidized or supported by government in a way that affects their basic ability to compete. These are some questions to which the ministry should address itself.

The hon. member for Halton talked about the necessity of long-range planning. I did not know that Liberal member is a closet socialist, but I guess he is. We in Canada would be satisfied with some short-range planning. At present we have no planning at all. Even some short-range policy-making would be of assistance.

Whether it is with regard to energy, industry or what have you, we talk about strategies. We do not talk about plans to develop. We move from band-aid to band-aid, while the country jolts from difficulty to difficulty. The government of the day, which asked for and received a mandate from the people in 1974, produced this so-called mini-budget, and now Bill C-11. It is inadequate to meet the difficulties that face the country.

The hon. member went on to talk about science and technology. We in Canada have really stripped ourselves bare. The science and research community in Canada do not really ask for very much. They have asked the government to give them something so that we can develop our own technology rather than continue to be borrowers of technology as we have done over the past few years. They ask that the grants be stable so that they can count on them, because they must priorize their projects. There has been no stability in this very fundamental area.

No one knows me as a pessimist but let us get to what the Minister of State (Small Business) said about his Minister of Finance and his predecessor. By the end of 1977 Canadians will have experienced four years of inflation higher than 7 per cent, three years of unemployment at or higher than 7 per cent, four years of economic ruin below our 5 per cent growth potential, three years of trade deficits higher than $4 billion, and five years in which the federal budgetary deficit has increased. That is what we shall have experienced by the end of this year.

The hon. member for Halton said we wanted small, clean, streamlined government. I think Canadians would be prepared to settle for a government perhaps not quite so clean and perhaps not so streamlined, but reasonably responsive to the conditions we face today.

What does the minister offer us? After all the euphemisms used by speakers on the other side, all he can offer Canadians in 1978 is an inflation rate of 6 per cent, real economic growth of 5 per cent, and even larger federal debts. The Minister of Finance refuses to give us any forecasts, but that, in essence, is what we are offered.

We have a lot of things to concern ourselves about in this country in economic terms, but I am convinced, now, and I do not like to say it, that this government has proven itself so inept that we can expect nothing from it. It has lost its fighting spirit. The ministers have ceased to be responsive in a political sense to the needs of the country. They behave more like a board of directors, insensitive to the shareholders. That is the situation in which we find ourselves and, over-all, that is the economic situation in which we find ourselves.

I am concerned that we have young men and women in Canada crying out for work, men and women who have qualified themselves because we as a nation have said to them, "Go and get an education because the world will then be your oyster." We find them today up against the reality of a situation where their skills and learning cannot be used; they not only waste their lives but they cannot and do not make a contribution to their country.

I refuse to believe that this country, properly led, with the tremendous resources in human and material terms at its disposal, with an educational system that we tout as being the second-best in the world, sitting beside a large market, and with a tradition of exporting our goods, must look forward to the stagnation and gloom which the minister has predicted. If the government continues to adopt the attitude that only it can do things, that its job is to do things for people, rather than create an atmosphere in which people can do things for themselves, then should it continue in office the Minister of Finance is absolutely right. That is precisely what we face—a bleak future.

Mr. Lumley: He never said that!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member says he never said that. I think the parliamentary secretary had better re-read the minister's statement. He had better read between the lines of the statement the minister made in the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: Between the lines, eh?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I hear interruptions from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley), the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young), and one of the Toronto members who is probably getting ready to speak. When they are given an opportunity they can make what comments they wish in the course of their remarks. If they go to their constituencies and ask what their constituents really think of this government in terms of economic leadership, or if they go to the small business community and ask what businessmen think of this government as the great helper of small business, I think they will find that the euphemisms about Canadians smiling because they have the Minister of Finance at the controls are not true at all.

I have always found that when I am getting pretty close to the truth members on the other side begin to wake up and shift in their seats as they are doing now. I can understand them. If I were over on the other side tonight, if I had to answer for the economic policies of the government, I would feel the same sense of discomfort as members obviously do on the other side.

The government is not completely unresponsive, though, I must say that. I recall reading the defence the minister put out of the new government policy to change the rules in midstream with respect to the taxation of benefits from insurance policies, a proposal which created such a hue and cry among the 12 million life insurance policy holders in Canada. Those life insurance policies represent, in many respects, aside from the home, perhaps, the most important form of saving for the future in which a family engages.

When the ministry dealt with this matter it decided to withdraw the death tax. I could not believe it. I could not believe they were at last retreating from the position which successive governments had taken, namely, that of imposing a death tax, increasing death duties whether upon insurance policies or by way of estate duties or otherwise. But the government tried it. There was a hue and cry. The issue was raised in the House, and I am sure it was raised in the Liberal caucus. The government decided it would be wise to back off.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) wrote to the Minister of Finance on September 21, 1977, putting forward the position of the official opposition with respect to the matter. As a result, the government decided to withdraw, pending further study, the proposals which would have made taxable a portion of the investment income from certain life insurance policies realized on death. The remaining proposals, announced in the minister's statement, relate to the taxation of policy holders other than on the death of the insured, and these are now included in the measure which we are being asked to pass. What they have done with respect to the 12 million life insurance policy holders in Canada is this: they have changed in midstream the rules with respect to their rights and benefits in respect to these policies. The government has brought in a new form of taxation.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling), who is experienced in the field of insurance, indicated last night what it means to the average person who may decide to use proceeds from an insurance policy to finance a business or suchlike. For years and years members of the Canadian public who were holders of insurance policies have had certain rights. The government has now decided, without notice, to take those rights and benefits away from them. If a policy holder takes a loan on his policy and then has to pay a capital gains tax on that loan, if he then pays the loan back he does not regain the capital gains tax paid. In addition, he cannot use the interest charged by the company as a deduction against his income tax when that loan is used for financial purposes. For some reason or other, a man who takes a loan from an insurance company rather than a bank loses that deduction. This means that policy holders will have to go to the bank to borrow money, using the policy as collateral. It means, in effect, that policy holders will pay higher rates of interest at the bank, losing their advantageous interest rate from the insurance company.

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka put it very well last night. He said that policy holders with long standing policies could borrow money against their policies at a rate not exceeding 7 per cent, whereas if they went to the bank today they would have to pay 12 per cent. The government should think about this. Liberal members do not speak up in the House, but they should certainly raise this matter in caucus.

An hon. Member: We do speak up in our caucus.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am glad to hear that. If the hon. member will continue to do it, perhaps the government will change its position. We have been asking the government, year after year, to consider the urgent need to ease the great burden on Canadian taxpayers so far as residential taxes are concerned. They are not allowed to deduct at least part of these taxes, and this creates a kind of double taxation. Not only are taxpayers taxed heavily, as I have said, but they are the victims of double taxation.

It is my view, which I believe is shared by many people in this country, that those who dwell in owner-occupied homes, and tenants of rooming houses and apartment houses, deserve favourable consideration in this regard on the part of the Minister of Finance. I thought that when the minister brought forward his mini-budget he would have thought of these people, but he did not. The federal government has a stake in the provision of adequate housing for its citizens, the creation of incentives to increase employment, and the lending of money to municipalities which must provide many services to their residents. Since federal government involvement in our cities is limited by the constitution, provincial governments are mostly responsible for land use planning, regional economic planning, and education.

In Canada, use of federal taxation power lays into the hands of the federal government an opportunity to help the property owner. As I have said, the person who pays property taxes in effect pays a double tax. The hard earned money with which Canadians pay their property taxes has already been taxed to death by the provincial and federal governments, not to mention the municipal governments. Many tax experts have described municipal residential taxes as inequitable and regressive, and I rather think they are right. They bear heavily on those who can least afford them.

At the present time property taxes paid by businessmen are deductible. Property taxes paid by apartment owners are deductible. Property taxes on single family homes rented to tenants are also deductible by the owners. Furthermore, an apartment building owner can take advantage of the corporate tax law and deduct his operating expenses, whereas dwellers in owner-occupied homes, tenants in boarding houses and apartment buildings, do not get any such relief in computing their federal income tax.

Not only are cities plagued with rising costs to meet the demands for more services, increased welfare payments and public works to provide jobs, but the ordinary citizen has been hard pressed with rising taxes at the federal, provincial, and especially the municipal level.

I have been quoting Hansard for February 26, 1971, Mr. Speaker, a proposition advanced by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). This is a proposition which has been supported in this House by Progressive Conservative members. Again in 1973 I joined in the debate and asked the government if it would consider this form of tax relief—because that is what is needed. To date, Mr. Speaker, even in what has been described as the mini-budget, the government has failed to act. It has failed to grant this tax relief to a segment of society for whom relief should be granted in order to assist in stimulating Canada's construction industry. I cannot understand why the government has refused this request.

What has the government done to assist in this matter? It has announced a $350 grant in Ontario, I think $500 in other parts of Canada, to upgrade insulation in houses. It has told Canadians to insulate their homes and has offered them $350. But what it has forgotten to tell Canadians, though it did put it in small print, is that they are going to be taxed on that grant. The grant becomes part of their taxable incomes.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): More than that, the assessment provisions are such that every time a person spends $350 on his house to improve it he is reassessed. When I improve my property the assessor comes around and raises my municipal taxes.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): That is a provincal matter, not federal.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I do not care. It makes no difference at all. I am saying that here is an opportunity for the federal government of which it has not taken advantage to grant relief to these people. If the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), who has just roused himself from his sleep, cannot understand that, then I do not think there is very much hope for him.

That is the situation, Mr. Speaker. There are a host of other areas where the government has taken this kind of midstream approach. Is it any wonder that I said at the outset of my speech, through you to the Minister of State (Small Business) that what Canadian businessmen want in order to provide jobs is a better business and investment climate. Part of this climate is stability. But the business communities and other communities in Canada who depend upon the government for leadership do not have confidence that there is stability in government. In fact what is happening is that Canadians in all walks of life are looking at the government and asking themselves: by what right can it be said that it still has a mandate to lead?

The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) announced the other day that he had come to the realization that the key to saving Canada was a sound economic climate. Yet when the government had an opportunity, at the beginning of this session, to bring in a budget, what did it do? It brought in a band-aid, instead of looking to the structures of our economic society to see where they could be changed, improved, and enhanced. We had this government giving with one hand and taking away with another. There is not a member on the other side of the House of Commons who is not ashamed of what the Minister of Finance did in this House of Commons.

The government has indicated that it wants this taxation bill passed quickly. It is important for members to know, and for the country to know, that we are not just debating the ministerial statement made a few nights ago in the House of Commons. We are only on the second day of the bill arising out of that. We are debating the budget of March 31, 1977, which announced all kinds of legislation that the government never saw fit to bring in, even though parliament was sitting for most of the summer.

When ministers stand in their places and state that members of parliament, who have been denied an opportunity for a general discussion of the government's economic program which a budget would allow, are under an obligation to pass quickly this piece of legislation, which is actually half a loaf, then I think the government had better think twice. Members of parliament were denied the rights and privileges of a budget debate, and that is well known in the country. They were legally denied it, but slickly or politically denied it. Members of parliament are entitled to the opportunity for comment on the economic posture of the country and the government as it affects their constituencies.

It is our intention to use this debate to examine, hopefully for the benefit of the minister and hopefully for the benefit of the economic growth and welfare of the country, what Bill C-11 means; what the government's programs mean in terms of the country; and how they have failed. This is in the hope that the government will change its mind and realize that granting only three of the matters raised by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and not the six major items proposed, is not satisfactory to us, nor is it satisfactory to the country, and I suspect it is not satisfactory to a good number of government backbenchers.

I am glad the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) is present in the Chamber. Perhaps he will understand the course this debate is taking. While we would not for one moment put any unnecessary impediment in the way of the passage of the bill, it is our intention to allow parliament the opportunity to debate this bill fully.

I am delighted that some Liberal members are standing up and debating this bill as well and are, indeed, criticizing the government. I believe the government is worthy of criticism.

I thought I should make that point clear, and I want to thank my friends for the attention they have given to my very short speech tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) would permit a question in his time remaining?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Due to the fact that the hon. member's allotted time has expired, I have to ask for the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) wrote his letter to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) regarding the death benefit tax, did he take into consideration that the real beneficiaries of that proposal would be the low and middle income people and it would be an expense to the high income people?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) has seen the letter which the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) sent to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I am sure the Leader of the Official Opposition took into consideration all of the ramifications which flowed from the original proposal of the government. The proposal was admitted by the government to be so silly that it found itself bound to withdraw a third of the proposal put forward.

I hope the government, in the course of committee hearings and the committee of the whole on this taxation bill, will consider looking at the insurance provisions and withdrawing the balance of them. In terms of revenue raising for the government, they mean nothing; but in terms of 12 million Canadians who rely on their insurance policies as a reasonable way to create investment capital and to borrow funds which can be used for legitimate purposes, the proposals really damage Canadians from that point of view.

I hope the government will consider those things. That is precisely the reason why the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition wrote the Minister of Finance.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, with consent of the House, would the hon. House leader of the opposition allow me a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member's allotted time has expired, and the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) wants to speak tonight.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, as the previous hon. member for York South used to say in opening up his remarks, with the greatest respect to the two previous speakers, and with the utmost humility and deference, I think it is time for an expert to wade into this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: One of the problems with formulating a policy for small business in this country is that the policy inevitably gets formulated by people with outstanding qualities in the field of law who have never met a payroll.

Having listened to the two very distinguished hon. members who preceded me, the hon. Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), it is no wonder that small business is in trouble.

I have some qualifications in this area, and therefore I feel I should say something about the state of small business and who are the real friends of small business.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: I see hon. members opposite are anticipating the truth which I propose to place before the House. I am delighted to see their powers of perception are as sharp as they are. There is no doubt in my mind the best friends small business ever had were the socialists of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Also it is true that this is not always recognized by small business. I have to admit to that. I sometimes wonder why that is. I can only come to the conclusion, while the training of law may not give people experience in small business, it certainly gives them the oratorical qualities of persuasion and illusion.

We have heard great flag-waving speeches about free enterprise, how to go about doing things for small business, and how small business is the backbone of the country. Yet if small businesses were to listen to the kind of advice which comes from both these advisors, they would continue to be in the difficulty they are in now. I want to go beyond simply making this assertion and try to demonstrate some of the things I am saying.

The Minister of State (Small Business) said that the big problem small businesses face is that they have to fill out too many government forms, and as a way of saving small businesses he is going to make sure they do not have to fill out as many forms. If that were all that was necessary to save small businesses, the solution would be very simple; you would simply cancel all forms, and everybody would be prosperous. Surely the patent falsehood of that kind of proposition is clear.

The prescription of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton does not strike me as being any more appetizing. His solution is that we have to do something about the Post Office. He says that the real problem of small business in this country is the way the Post Office is being run, and if only we could improve the Post Office, everything would be all right. I presume the bills would all go out a little faster and people would pay a little faster, if they have the money with which to pay. Unfortunately this is the kind of advice and speeches small businesses hear at annual conventions and chamber of commerce meetings, and this is the kind of thing they start to believe in, to their own detriment.

Small businesses are willing to pay $2 and $3 to couriers to deliver letters. Yet they are not willing to give the Post Office two cents more in order to get adequate postal service. They pay 12 cents to send a letter, and they complain. They compare a 12-cent letter with service for which they are paying a courier $3. If they pay the Post Office two or three cents more, 15 cents a letter, they could get better service than any courier service could provide. But that is not a government enterprise, and one must not have a successful government enterprise!

Neither the Liberals nor the official opposition want a successful government enterprise because that would give the lie to the cry that private enterprise does everything better. Yet whenever a bill comes into this House—and I have been somewhat critical of my own party in this regard—to increase postal rates, and despite the plea of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), who says that virtually all mail that moves in Canada is business mail and who asks for two or three cents more, the official opposition vote against it. Then they have the nerve to say, "If only we could improve postal service, small business would be all right."

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: I see that the distinguished hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) agrees that that is the way to solve the small business problem in Canada. On the one hand we have a government which says that the solution to small business problems is to get rid of forms. On the other hand, the official opposition says that the real way to make small business prosperous is to improve the Post Office. How simple these problems are, and how simple are their solutions! There are no simple solutions.

I started off by saying that the best friend the small businessman has, or ever had, in this country are the socialists, the people who are members of the NDP or who were members of the CCF before us. I have been involved in small business, as have others in the House—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) would be willing to accept a question.

Mr. Saltsman: I am always willing to accept a question from my hon. friend, and if he feels that his question cannot wait until the end of my speech and if he wants so terribly to put it at this time, I would be very glad to answer it.

Mr. Stevens: Would the hon. member indicate why the Post Office was able to operate at a marginal profit in 1970 when postage rates were 50 per cent less than they are today, yet the Post Office now runs up a $700 million deficit with twice the postal rates?

Mr. Benjamin: Other rates have gone up more than twice.

Mr. Saltsman: I do not know exactly, but perhaps if the hon. member would help me out in my answer, he could explain why I was able to buy coffee for $1.25 at that time and I now have to pay $7.

Mr. Forrestall: You don't pay $7 for it. Don't exaggerate.

Mr. Saltsman: I want only to hint at this because I am not certain, but it seems to me that since that period of time there was a little thing called inflation, and while I do not use this as any justification, I feel quite confident about it. I get somewhat sick and tired of people running down our government services. We must consider the problems in the Post Office. We must consider the problem of logistics in moving quantities of mail.

There is business mail, junk mail, dunning letters, credit cards and other very important stuff. What can you buy for 12 cents? Can you send a letter from Vancouver to Halifax for that kind of money and then say that the Post Office is a terrible institution because it does not always deliver the mail on time? The mail should be delivered on time, but it is not going to be delivered on time until we stop running down our

Post Office and start giving it more money, and perhaps paying the employees more money.

Mr. Stevens: More money?

Mr. Saltsman: That's right. We must stop subsidizing junk mail, newspapers, and everything under the sun, because when the Post Office shut down during the last strike, as it turned out it was not the average citizen who called me telling me we must get the Post Office going again; the businessmen of my community were the ones who suddenly discovered that without the Post Office they could not even survive. Yet they are the ones who have done the most toward destroying the Post Office under the guise that it is a government operation and not free enterprise. They are willing to pay free enterprise ten or 15 times as much as they pay the Post Office for almost identical service.

However, that is an aside. I simply use it as an example to show how people get caught up in simplistic solutions which really do not relate to the problems.

Let me talk about the situation in Sudbury. Again the assumption is that you must stimulate small business in some direct way and that that is the answer. The truth of the matter is that while small businesses deserve to be helped, as do other elements of society, small businesses cannot be prosperous when there are almost a million people unemployed. You do not set out just to save small businesses; you set out to do something about the economy and to get people back to work, because if people are not working small businesses will not be prosperous, no matter what this government does and no matter what the official opposition might do if it were the government.

Let us take a look at the Sudbury situation where INCO laid off a number of people, at the Falconbridge lay-offs, and the lay-offs in other places. How are we going to help small business in Sudbury? The best way is to get those who are being laid off back to work. Otherwise, the whole downtown and most of the firms there are going to be in serious trouble. I am not talking just about retailers; I am talking about welders, electricians, maintenance people, and all the people who are associated with small companies which provide services. That is really what small businesses do; they provide specialized and highly personal services to some of the larger corporations. You cannot save small businesses in isolation. You cannot bring in policies for small businesses in isolation, without doing something about the economy generally.

Let us go back a number of years. It is unfortunate that small businesses have not seen the importance and value of what democratic socialists have done in this country. I remember years and years ago talking to many of my colleagues in small businesses, and they were complaining and unhappy because they had people working for them but their businesses were too small to have their own pension schemes. They knew that some of the loyal people who had been with them years and years would not have pensions, and one of the great things that saved them, and one of the great joys small employers experienced, was the beginning of the Canada Pension Plan.

Sure, a large company can put in a pension scheme, but how does a small company do that? They have to depend on a government scheme in order to do something decent for their employees. Most small businessmen are decent people who want to do it. Old age pensions were the same. They could not make provision for them by paying the premiums the insurance companies wanted in order to provide a decent retirement pension. And what happens with the labour code and minimum wages is Gresham's law—the bad employer drives out the good employer. A decent employer welcomes labour codes and minimum wages because it means that his competitors have to be as decent as he is himself.

If you talk to small businessmen they complain about government interference, but ask a man who has seriously thought about it if he wants to go back to the days when he did not have old age pension, Canada Pension Plan, medical services and hospital insurance programs for his employees. Even with all the complaints about unemployment insurance, do they want to go back to a time when they laid a man off and he had to go on welfare rather than being able to collect unemployment insurance? It is the conventional wisdom to be critical of all these things as an imposition on small business, yet the intelligent, decent, small businessman would not do without them.

Let us look at unemployment insurance in another way. Aside from the personal benefits that accrue to the person being laid off, many small businessmen could not maintain a labour force without unemployment insurance. Very often unemployment insurance is a greater boon to the business than it is to the employees who are laid off.

If we take what is happening in the economy at the moment, this serious recession, the terrible mismanagement, the perversity of government policies, and if that $4 billion that is coming out of the unemployment insurance were not being pumped back into the economy, what would happen to small business? Suppose the unemployment insurance payments were not being made in the depressed areas of Canada where unemployment is reaching close to 16 and 17 per cent, you would have a wave of bankruptcies in small business. It is the only thing that is sustaining those areas at the moment, this terrible socialistic policy.

It is the conventional wisdom to be against these things. There are abuses in all systems; nothing is perfect. I would be the last to claim we should not be trying to improve these measures, but the truth of the matter, from my observation, is that were it not for the so-called socialist measures we would be undergoing a depression that would make that of the thirties look pale. The chief victims would be the small businessmen of Canada who depend on the immediate purchasing power of the people.

It seems to me that whether or not hon. members agree with my general statement, if you place the arguments that I am putting forward against the solutions being offered by the government side—let us get rid of forms and we would have prosperity, and then improve the Post Office according to the official opposition, as the second way of getting prosperity for small business—then there have to be questions about the judgment of such well intentioned spokesmen.

I am not normally a believer in the Adam Smith, "invisible hand" theory except when I see the actions of this government. Then I am almost converted to it. Sometimes I suspect no hand on the rudder of the ship of state could have done as much damage as the perverse policies of this government have done in the kind of crisis we face today.

When I look at the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I am reluctant to be rough with him. He is a very decent chap. Everybody likes him. I am sure he means well. I feel for him as I felt for his predecessor. What a rotten thing to do to a nice guy, make him Minister of Finance and saddle him with the insanities of the preceding policies of that government, expecting him to put a good face on it. At the moment, he is carrying it off.

He is a new minister. There is a sort of will on the part of the public to want to believe that perhaps this man will be able to do something the others were not able to do. It has driven more than one minister into exile. One got out completely. The other decided that he needed to go back to his family. I do not blame him for that.

I do not know where this minister will go. He has turned down the leadership of the Quebec Liberals. After a few months in the office of Minister of Finance, being leader of the Quebec Liberals might look very attractive. In any event, we wish him well. We are not saying things about the minister with malice. We know these are difficult times, not only in Canada but in other countries of the western world. We do not want to say they and they alone did it.

What I can be critical about is not that a miracle has not taken place in that the old budget plus the new mini-budget are just perverse and will do no good. In fact they may do a lot of harm. Therefore, whether we pass this measure or not is of no concern to me. In fact I think the greatest mercy we could show the country would be to make sure it does not pass. However, it will pass. But it is not worth passing because it is dangerous and damaging.

What is disturbing is that this kind of realization is not sinking in. Every once in a while the minister comes upon a piece of truth. The other day he said we may be saving too much, and just left it hanging in the air. We are saving too much, but whose fault is it? It is the fault of the government.

Who brought in registered retirement plans, incentives for savings, depreciation allowances, and the 5 per cent forgiveness of one kind or another? Who is continuing this policy? These are policies designed to increase savings. However, the minister says we are saving too much. I agree. We are saving ourselves right into a depression.

Does the minister do anything about it? Is he doing anything about it through the budget? The people who receive the benefits of the registered retirement savings plans are not the poor. It is the better off, middle class and upper class, who are getting the chief benefits.

Businesses have more savings than they need. They do not know what to do in terms of investment. Why not save? They cannot spend it. There is a limit to how much a person can eat, how many cars he can drive, and how many washing machines he can own. But those who need it have not got it. Even the tax saving being proposed is for people with taxable incomes.

What about those who do not have taxable incomes? This is the great dichotomy, the reason we cannot get out of this terrible situation. Those who do not need to spend any more are getting the benefits of savings. Those who have great needs and would spend if they had it, are getting no benefit at all.

Unless we get a redistribution of income from those who have the money to those who do not, so that there will be more spending as a result of these tax cuts, it will simply result in it being socked away in the bank. The banks cannot even get more of their money out.

What is the consequence? Who is going to invest? Why give business more money? In what will they invest? They are only using 80, 82 or 83 per cent of their plant capacity now.

An hon. Member: Modernize.

Mr. Saltsman: We have modern plants. The problem is not modernization. The problem is, we do not have people to buy goods. It is the same problem that the world experienced to some extent following the second world war.

What we need, in blunt terms, is another Marshall Plan, or, rather, a Marshall Plan for our own poor and a Marshall Plan for the rest of the world. Western civilization has become satiated and self-centred, and unless we are prepared to redistribute income both to our own people and to other people in the world, Western civilization is in serious trouble. This does not affect Canada alone. Others are finding themselves in similar positions. Europeans are beginning to recognize this problem to a greater extent than we are doing, and they are already increasing foreign aid because they recognize that unless there is a redistribution of income they will find themselves in a serious situation.

The kind of budget we are being asked to pass as quickly as possible for the sake of the country does not even hint at these problems. Instead, we have a minister who, in a moment of truth and insight, recognized that we were saving too much but insisted on bringing in a budget which will increase the savings of business and of people who already have lots of money. Not only that, he reintroduced the Big Mac budget with its mayonnaise. I do not like mayonnaise on hamburger. Whether you put mayonnaise on hamburger or not, it is still hamburger, and unfortunately it is debilitating.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I never touch it!

Mr. Saltsman: That budget contained provision for $1.2 billion in savings and tax benefits for large business. This is at a time when the minister says we are saving too much. This is at a time when business does not want to invest because there is no point in investing.

We may have to go back to a national plan, something like that of Sir John A. Macdonald—a kind of fortress Canada. It is not something any of us like, but the economy has been so mismanaged that we may have to retreat before we can go out again as good citizens. Either that, or we must really go out as good citizens and start redistributing income. These are our choices. We can redistribute income in this country and take a chance, redistribute it to our own poor and to the world's poor, or retreat into fortress Canada and build up our own economy.

The foreign ownership chickens are coming home to roost. I listened with a good deal of interest to the speeches made by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) and the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). They both made a number of points which were well worth noting. The hon. member for Halton raised the question of what happens as a consequence of foreign ownership.

The great benefits of foreign ownership are felt in the early stages. There is a lot of investment to begin with, but as soon as things get tough in the home country the gears are thrown into reverse. I am not condemning foreign ownership for taking this approach. That is the way things operate. We would do it ourselves. In fact we do have a Canadian company which is mining for nickel in Asia. Because miners are being laid off in this country, we say, "Stop mining for nickel in Asia and mine it in our own country because there is unemployment here." It is a natural tendency for any governing body to say in such circumstances, "Come home. Bring your jobs home."

It is natural in the United States, which is also faced with large scale unemployment, to say to its multinational corporations, "We do not want you investing your money around the world. That is fine so long as we do not need jobs here. But we do need jobs at home now and we want you to invest back here". This is precisely what is happening, Mr. Speaker. You see it happening with the Canada-U.S. auto agreement. In the initial stages Canada was reaping considerable benefit in terms of the number of jobs created in this country versus the number of automobiles purchased in this country. But in the last number of years the situation has been reversing itself and we are now running a serious deficit with the United States, if you include parts and finished cars.

If you look at the figures in the Auditor General's report showing what is happening to skilled jobs in the automobile industry, the same pattern emerges. The hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) should be grateful for this: we are becoming the hewers of wood and drawers of water when it comes to making automobiles. The skilled jobs are going to the United States. We will be facing a serious situation unless something is done about it.

What we need is an industrial strategy. Today my leader issued a press release in which he said that we have to come to grips with an industrial strategy in the field of textiles, shoes, and the auto industry. If these limited free trade arrangements do not do the job, we will have to do more than that; we will have to protect our own industry. This is of particular importance in view of the delicate situation in Confederation. I use the word "delicate"; I presume I could use other words. Many people think that Quebec cannot do it alone. Many people labour under the illusion that the advantages of Confederation are so great that the people of Quebec would never try it on their own. The advantages of Confederation, when one looks at the state of the Canadian economy today, are not that great that the people of Quebec would say they dare not try something else.

I predict that within a short time you will see what is the strategy of the Parti Québécois. They will opt for an economically buoyant Québec. They will say to the people of Québec, "The Canadian government in Ottawa, which is supposed to represent all of us, is unable to solve the economic problems of this country, particularly unemployment; we will show you that in Quebec, even with our limited authority, we will do better than the federal government." When they find they cannot do better and they fail in some areas because a province does not have the power that the federal government has, they will tell Quebecers, "If we had federal powers this is what we could do for you".

I do not want to see Quebec separate, and I do not think any member of the House does. I hesitate even to talk about it for fear the talk itself may hurt. The reason I do talk about it is that I think silence may hurt more. If we do not face the reality of the bankruptcy of federal economic policies, then we will lose this country. When the country is strong and not under stress, we can put up with all kinds of inane solutions to solve the problems of small business and of the economy. But under the circumstances we need far more from the government than the kind of perverse and misguided policies which it has introduced.

I would settle, and I am sure many of my colleagues would too, not for the government solving our problems overnight; not for the government saying it has pulled a great big lever and created 100,000 jobs. I would settle for less than that. I would settle for a statement from the government that it understood the serious difficulties that we are facing. I would settle for a statement from the government which indicated that it understood the serious difficulties it is facing; that it understands the policies it has been bringing in for the last number of years have been working to the disadvantage of the country, and it is now prepared to move in a new direction and say, "We will swallow a bit of our pride." I do not want it to make an abject confession.

Mr. Blackburn: You are expecting too much.

Mr. Saltsman: Perhaps that is so, but that is the trouble with socialists; we are always too optimistic about human nature and we always think everyone is capable of being reformed, including Liberals. Perhaps that is too optimistic, though there are some good fellows over there.

An hon. Member: Two or three.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes. They just strayed a little bit. They are just "poor little lambs who have lost their way." I am sure my colleagues will joint in the chorus—"baa, baa, baa."

In conclusion, I appreciate the attention the House has given to my remarks, but this is a serious matter. It is not just playing games and bashing the government for the sake of bashing the government. We need some indication from that side of the House that it is prepared to change its policies and move in new directions.

As far as the benefits in this budget are concerned, I realize most people have already made arrangements to take the benefits; but somewhere down the line we must hear the government say, "We understand what the problem is. We understand we have to move in these new directions, as difficult as they may be". At least the government would then provide some encouragement.

Whether this budget is passed or not, as things now stand, for the ordinary person it would be of little consequence. It would do the government a great deal of good if it ran into a real debate on this issue. Also it would do the government good if, during the course of that debate, it had a chance to think better about what it has been doing, and it brought in positive rather than perverse policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, this is an important period of time in the history of our country, and especially in the matter of our economic future.

Despite the seriousness of the situation all Canadians face, I must admit there is a certain amount of humour which can creep into the debate and into this House of Commons. Possibly the position the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) put forward, that the greatest friend of small business in this country had been the CCF, the NDP, or what he preferred to call democratic socialists, is not correct. If members of this House left the Chamber this evening and took a poll of small businessmen, asking them whether the NDP was their best friend, the results would be somewhat less than that mentioned by the hon. member. In fact the natural alliance of the NDP in Manitoba, for example, was not with small business.

It was the small businessmen and their employees who got together on October 11 and turfed out the provincial NDP government. It was the small business community which saw business investment was down in the province, and employment was down. It was the small businessmen, along with their employees, who wanted security and realized that the NDP government of Manitoba had gone beyond the pale of taxation and had gone into the area of confiscation. Not only did the NDP government of Manitoba do this, but I suggest the government opposite has as well.

It is a commonly held opinion by many Canadians that in fact this country has been governed by a socialist prime minister for the last number of years. The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge says that the best friend of small business is a social democrat. I do not know how he can say that, because a social democrat has been the leader of this Liberal government. Liberals who have been members of that party for many years have left the party simply because they cannot accept the Liberal-left association that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has allowed. Nor can they accept his economic policies.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Epp: The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge expressed some rather interesting economic theories. He slipped them in as if they were new, but I believe they go back to a man named Karl Marx and his writings, and hon. members know what he was the forerunner of, Mr. Speaker. I have to paraphrase the hon. member because I cannot get Hansard at this moment, but he said we should redistribute income on the basis that those who have money should distribute their income among those who do not. I believe if we look to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and their sixtieth anniversary, we will find that that is pretty close to what Karl Marx said, and that it is on that they have based their economy.

Despite the fact that the former minister of state for small business went to the USSR to see what he could learn about small business there—and I hope the present minister does not follow that example—the fact remains that I do not think a lot of small businesses can be found in the USSR, and the reason is very simple. The natural extension of the philosophy of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, of the NDP and of the socialist democratic Prime Minister of this country would simply destroy business.

Mr. Gillespie: The Tory philosophy is take it from people who haven't got it and give it to people who have.

Mr. Epp: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) is trying to intervene. He has so many problems in his department he should stick with them and try to solve a few. He should not try to get into economics. He has made enough of a mess already.

Mr. Gillespie: Why don't you go back to the philosophy you were talking about? Tell us what is the Tory philosophy.

Mr. Epp: Bill C-11 is known to everyone as a mini-budget. In fact in question period the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said it was a budget. Very surreptitiously the government plays its games. It decided to have a mini-budget slipped into the throne speech debate. Therefore, as our House leader has already stated, we will use this debate to bring forward the position of this party on economic affairs and to show to Canadians once again that the great failure of this country is the economic leadership, or lack of it, that the government has displayed throughout its tenure of office. This government and this Prime Minister have been abject failures, and the unity question upon us today is upon us for one simple reason, and that is that the Prime Minister has literally destroyed the hopes of Canadians, especially those Canadians in depressed regions. For this reason the unity question is upon us to a greater degree than it would otherwise have been. Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10.30 p.m., pursuant to the order previously adopted, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ALLEGEDLY ILLEGAL INTERCEPTION OF MAIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having regard to the serious doubts now raised publicly about the integrity, or lack thereof, in the Solicitor General's annual report to parliament dated February 11, 1977 wherein it was asserted that only one warrant authorizing postal communication interception was issued in 1976, which warrant allegedly could not be executed, and since it is now alleged in media reports that mail interception with or without warrant may have been, and may be, a common occurrence, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That a reference be made to the standing committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to permit that committee to investigate in its entirety the matter of illegal and unauthorized interceptions of mail.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43 such a motion can be put to the House only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

TRADE

SUGGESTED DELAY OF TARIFF REDUCTIONS PENDING INTRODUCTION OF INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that the Economic Council has pointed out that the government has no plan to deal with the problems which will arise from its announcement and studied intention to reduce tariffs and considering that the results of such reductions could be disastrous for Canadian workers in textiles, plastics, shoes and electronics, as well as in other sectors, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government not to proceed with such tariff reductions until it presents to the House an industrial strategy designed to ensure continuing employment in these crucial sectors.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is presented under the terms of Standing Order 43 and consequently unanimous consent is required before it can be put to the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

FINANCE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE POSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the dollar continues to be under pressure having broken the 90 cent level once again today, and as there has been a further $100 million dollar drain on our U.S. dollar reserves so far this month with $50 million dollars going out this morning, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That there be an immediate reference to the appropriate standing committee of this House with respect to our foreign exchange position and the government's handling of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required before the motion can be put. Is there such consent?

SUGGESTION CANADIANS HOLIDAY AT HOME TO REMEDY TRAVEL DEFICIT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion under Standing Order 43 concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Having regard to the growing Canadian travel and tourist deficit, which now stands at $1.7 billion and in view of the serious consequences of this huge deficit for the Canadian balance of payments position and much needed jobs in the Canadian tourist industry, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House agrees with the recent statements of the Minister of Finance that Canadians should holiday at home to remedy the country's travel deficit and furthermore urges all members, particularly the Prime Minister, to vacation right here in our beautiful country.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be put forward only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

MANPOWER

PERSONS SEEKING EMPLOYMENT IN ALBERTA SHOULD HAVE CONFIRMATION OF JOB—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of reports about the low unemployment rate in Alberta and in view of the continuing influx of unemployed to that province, many of whom arrive without funds, without a job, and without technical training to fit into the labour force or return tickets to their places of origin, thus creating discomfiture and social problems associated with a higher cost of accommodation and food, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration publicize through Manpower offices throughout Canada that such persons would be well advised not to travel to Alberta in the expectation of finding work unless they have confirmation of a job.

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be put forward for discussion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 only by unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO REDUCE LAY-OFFS IN ATLANTIC REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I rise to put forward a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The callous attitude of the Canadian National toward employment and service in Nova Scotia is causing severe hardship and increased unemployment. CN Express offices have been closed across the province and the latest target is the CN Express operation at Sydney. Because we cannot tolerate any further loss of employment or reduction in service, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates):

That the Minister of Transport take immediate action on the request of the national president of the CBR of T and GW for a special commission of inquiry to halt the rash of cutbacks, lay-offs, transfers and reductions by the CN in Quebec and the Atlantic region and that CN be instructed to concentrate on more employment and better service rather than on profit-making just for the sake of profit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The motion, having been proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43, can be presented only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED EARLY ACTION TO BROADCAST COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Balfour (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the success of the broadcasting of the proceedings of this chamber and in view of the importance of committees in the work of this House, I ask to move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

● (1412)

That this House urges the Special Committee on Television and Radio Broadcasting to make a report on the means by which broadcasting, by private or in-House facilities, could commence from the committees of this House as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think hon. members on both sides of the House will agree that the committee already has this question under active consideration.

MISS BÉGIN—REFERENCE TO ALLEGED TAPE PLAYED ON CBC NEWS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same standing order. In view of the statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) yesterday as reported in Hansard on page 692, that "The leader of the New Democratic Party should have had the decency of checking with me about the unfounded serious allegations he has just made.", and in view of the telegram which the minister says she is sending to the Toronto Sun and the Charlatan newspaper, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the minister table the telegram that she proposes to send, and that she be given a chance at the first opportunity to advise this House if it was her voice that was taped at eight o'clock on the CBC news this morning which repeated these alleged unfounded allegations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before presenting the motion for the consideration of the House in terms of unanimous consent, I should indicate that the minister who is the subject of the motion has given the Chair notice of a question of privilege with respect to the matter and sought leave of the House to proceed before 2.15. I have indicated that it should be done at three o'clock. The introduction of the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INQUIRY INTO MINING SECTOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that there have recently been close to 4,000 lay-offs in the mining sector and mining officials are predicting there may be as many as another 3,000 over the next six months, and in view of the fact that many of these lay-offs are attributable to poor planning in the mining sector, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House call on the government to immediately establish a parliamentary commission of inquiry into the mining sector of the economy with a view to development of an industrial strategy to ensure that Canadians receive the maximum possible benefit from the exploitation of their resources.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ALLEGED ILLEGAL INTERCEPTION OF MAIL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the inexcusable absence of the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and in face of two major questions concerning the unity and the competence of his cabinet, I should like to direct a question either to the Postmaster General or to the Acting Prime Minister, whoever that is today. My question is this: Have security officials been intercepting, opening, inspecting or copying mail of private Canadian citizens in any circumstances other than undeliverable mail or customs inquiries?

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the House to a letter the Prime Minister wrote to the Leader of the Opposition this morning stating in some considerable detail the justifiable reasons for his absence. I quote:

The Prime Minister has asked me to inform you that he feels that he must proceed to the Maritimes to keep his previous commitments to hold important discussions with Premier Regan and Premier Hatfield.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): These are in line with meetings already arranged by the Prime Minister with Premiers Lougheed and Bennett in western Canada some time ago to discuss the very questions that members of the opposition claim are of such importance to Canada, namely the questions of the economy and national unity.

• (1417)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I continue to be amazed by the tactics used by this government to avoid answering questions. This House and the country know that the Prime Minister had Monday in the Bahamas and is on a Jetstar today—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to ask hon. members on both sides of the House to permit, if possible, those putting questions and those answering, some quiet in which we can hear them.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in his defence of the indefensible the minister debated—

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the Acting Prime Minister for an answer to my question?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think my colleagues the Postmaster General and the Solicitor General are well able to answer any questions of the Leader of the Official Opposition.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question, if not his comment, I might indicate that following the program last evening, and, like the gentleman, I followed it with a great deal of interest, I obtained a report from my security and investigation officials. I have been advised that there is no change and has not been any in the policy of the Post Office. I refer to the policy that was made in this House by Bryce Mackasey two years ago, and the one I adopted and have enforced, namely, that there is not to be any intervention in respect of first class mail or, indeed, in respect of any regular mail unless it is authorized by the Post Office Act. This means there is no interference and no removal of the mail, save and except in certain instances where co-operation is sought by the RCMP. There is co-operation provided by the Post Office relating to the covers and the information contained on said covers. At no time is the mail taken from the custody of the Post Office or diverted from the ordinary mail channels.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister has told us what is the policy of the government. Can he tell us as a result of his inquiry what the practice has been, whether in fact there has been any departure from the policy, and whether in fact there has been any kind of interception of or dealing with mail by security officers in violation of the Post Office Act, which I remind the minister allows intervention only in two cases; one, where the mail is undeliverable, and the other relating to customs questions? Can he give us the unequivocal assurance now that there have been no instances of intervention with the mail of a private citizen in any way other than that authorized by law?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, following the investigation I have conducted with my own security investigation personnel I stand by my statement. There was one instance I was made aware of last year in late October or early November in respect of which I caused an investigation to be conducted. It came to my attention that, indeed, the policy had been somewhat stretched. I directed my security investigation personnel to direct all field officers to abide by the policy I have described, and I am advised that is being done. I have no information from my security and investigation people to date that would indicate anything to the contrary has taken place.

GUIDELINES FOR INTERCEPTION OF MAIL BY SECURITY SERVICE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I understood what the Postmaster General said earlier, he indicated to us there were exceptions and those exceptions had to do with requests by security services to look at mail. Will he tell us what guidelines exist, and would he care to table those guidelines regarding the conditions under which security services of the government of Canada, under whatever heading, have the right to look at the mail or deal with the mail of a private citizen?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there are no specific guidelines. What takes place is that the RCMP makes a request of the field officers of security and investigation. That request is then channeled to my head of security and investigation in Ottawa. He studies the particular request and authorizes co-operation between the RCMP and postal officials. That co-operation relates to investigations being carried on by the RCMP. Again I suggest to the hon. gentleman, the fact is that the investigation is conducted at the Post Office premises and it is only with reference to the cover information on the envelope.

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SECURITY SERVICE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a further question for the Acting Prime Minister on this fundamental issue of ministerial responsibility in the field of national security. I should like to refer to a statement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday when she referred to unfounded serious allegations. She was describing statements attributed to her in the Charlatan newspaper at Carleton University. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister with regard to this part of the transcript, "there is no way somebody is going to tell me that as a Quebecer there was a state of national emergency somewhere in Quebec and some threats to God knows what"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In fairness, it would take a great stretch of the rules of the House to see that as a supplementary. I will see the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands in one moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The fact of the matter is that it is clear the questions posed by the hon. Leader of the Opposition at the outset and those following by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, dealt specifically with the role of security services under the government, the position the cabinet takes with respect to same, and the question by the Leader of the Opposition dealt with the mechanisms used in surveillance. There was an answer with respect to that particular aspect. It seems to me that the question of ministerial responsibility has been brought into focus by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, and it is only appropriate that we are able to carry on at this juncture with questions with respect to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In every case on every day I have recognized that the hon. Leader of the Opposition ought to be followed by one of his own members in respect of a supplementary, and very rarely have I interfered. However, today the hon. Leader of the Opposition exposed a subject which relates to interference by the RCMP or others with the mail. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands raised a subject which relates to statements made yesterday by a minister in a question of privilege, which have to do with an apprehended situation some time ago in the province of Quebec. With due respect, I indicated that I would see the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands shortly to expose that subject; but the subject is in no way directly connected as a supplementary.

POSSIBILITY FOUR MORE CASES OF ILLEGAL ACTIVITY REFERRED TO COMMISSION—REFERENCE TO PROVINCIAL PROSECUTORS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Would the Solicitor General confirm that either he, officials in his department or members of the RCMP have referred four additional allegations of RCMP wrongdoings. These would be in addition to the APLQ break-in, the barn burning, the dynamite stealing and the breaking into the office of a legal political party. Has he, his officials or the RCMP referred four more allegations of criminal wrongdoings involving the RCMP to the federal royal commission?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the number four comes from. I have given very explicit directions that any complaint or any allegation coming in concerning any possible impropriety by the RCMP, be referred directly to the royal commission of inquiry into the practices and the procedures of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will put the question in a different way. Can he tell us how many further allegations he or his officials have referred to the royal commission? Or is he saying that he left instructions with his department to go ahead and do this on its own, and that he does not want to be informed about what is going on? Is he aware of the number that have been referred in addition to those which have already been referred? At the same time, can he tell us if the provincial authorities in the appropriate provinces who are responsible for prosecuting under the Criminal Code have been informed of all such cases?

● (1427)

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, any complaints which have been brought to my attention have been referred in part to the force. They can have a look at them. They have also been referred to the McDonald inquiry. They have not at the same time been automatically referred to the provincial attorneys general where the alleged events may have occurred. There have been a number of allegations.

Hon. members will recall that a whole series of complaints were made during the months of June and July. We set up the commission of inquiry so that we could have an independent, impartial, outside body examining witnesses under oath and coming to conclusions as to whether evidence should be referred subsequently to attorneys general. I have consulted the law officers of the Crown, and they tell me that the proper course to follow at the moment is to refer such allegations to the royal commission set up by the government last July.

Mr. Broadbent: With respect, Mr. Speaker, the minister cannot have it both ways. In the speech he made in this House on a nice, quiet Friday afternoon in which he announced that a break-in had taken place involving a legally constituted political party, the Solicitor General at least in that instance saw it as his obligation to inform hon. members of this House about some of these activities. In light of his own precedent in this regard, is the minister now saying that any other allegations made involving criminal wrongdoing by the RCMP will not be brought before members of this House but simply referred to the royal commission in the normal course of business as he sees it?

Mr. Fox: For an hon. member who is alleged to be leading a party which is very concerned about civil liberties of Canadians I find it amazing that he believes that every time a complaint comes forward—

Mr. Broadbent: No one is saying that.

Mr. Fox: —I should immediately bring to the floor of this House the nature of the complaint, the names of the people involved and the names of those against whom the complaint is directed. A number of questions have been raised in the course of former royal commissions of inquiry. Facts have been brought to the attention of those federal royal commissions, and those commissions have made suggestions and recommendations that the evidence be brought to the attorneys general of the provinces in which events occurred, and that is the procedure we intend to follow.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE CONCERNING ACTIVITIES IN QUEBEC—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister, and it has to do with the subject raised initially by the Leader of the Opposition about the very fundamental issue of ministerial responsibility in the field of national security. I would like to refer to the statement yesterday by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. She said that unfounded serious allegations—

Miss Bégin: Where did I say that?

Miss MacDonald: It is recorded at page 692 of Hansard, and it was in reference to excerpts from the Charlatan newspaper. In a transcript of her remarks the minister is recorded as saying, "There is no way somebody is going to tell me that as a Quebecer there was a state of national emergency somewhere in Quebec and some threats to God knows what". I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare was stating government policy when she made that statement?

Miss Bégin: I never said that.

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have assumed that an hon. member who usually behaves fairly in this House would have noticed that Your Honour mentioned that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had a question of privilege to raise with respect to this matter. That was her notice to indicate to the House that she has—

Mr. Clark: Another evasion.

Mr. Stevens: Answer the question.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Let me finish, if you don't mind. That was her notice to indicate to the House that she has a question of privilege. The rules, which have been agreed to by all parties in this House, say that a question of privilege of this nature is usually to be taken up at three o'clock. At that time the minister will have an opportunity to explain her grievance, which is legitimate in my opinion. The hon. member who has just risen will have ample opportunity to comment on that question of privilege at that time. Those are the dictates of fairness as I perceive them.

● (1432)

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, my question was to the Acting Prime Minister. I was not asking him what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said but whether it was—and I ask him this in his position of Acting Prime Minister—whether or not it was government policy which she stated. That is the question I wanted him to answer. Will he answer that question?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is drawing conclusions based on content which my colleague the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare questions through a question of privilege. I think before drawing her unjustifiable conclusions she should at least hear what the hon. minister has to say.

Mr. Clark: Cover-up.

Miss MacDonald: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would look at that statement and then tell the House how he would reconcile it with this statement by the Solicitor General with reference to the seizure of lists of the Parti Québécois:

[Miss Bégin.]

It was authorized and carried out in the absolute conviction that its sole object was to promote the security of Canada given the political and social climate prevailing in 1973.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member seems to be ready to draw conclusions before she has even heard from the hon. minister I will draw my own. I have a very high regard for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I do not believe she has breached the tenets of ministerial responsibility.

Mr. Clark: You don't know what they are.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY INTO VIOLATIONS OF POST OFFICE ACT—MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF VIOLATIONS OF ACT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question follows the question that was opened up by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that Section 48(3) of the Post Office Act gives the Postmaster General the authority to appoint officers employed in the post office to conduct an inquiry similar to one conducted under the Inquiries Act into the violations of the post office under Section 48, could the Postmaster General inform the House if he has authorized such personnel in his office to carry out this responsibility, if they are having liaison with the security forces and whether they report regularly to the hon. gentleman?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet acted under Section 48(3). There is not as yet any evidence upon which I could do so.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of complaints that come from members of parliament, and I am sure these will be specifically mentioned here from time to time, and in view of the vital importance of the privacy of the mails with respect to civil liberties and the Postmaster General's exclusive privilege under Section 8 of the Post Office Act for "collecting, conveying and delivering letters in Canada," can the hon. gentleman inform the House how the mail could be "liable to demand seizure or detention" in the words of Section 43 of the act without his knowledge, particularly when questions of security are involved?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had listened to my first reply he would have noted that I indicated my own security and investigation services have reported to me this morning that they have not participated as has been alleged in yesterday's program.

INQUIRY WHETHER HEALTH MINISTER MADE CERTAIN STATEMENTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

I am not referring to the question of privilege, but in fact to the statement she is reported to have made before students. My question is quite clear. Could the minister advise the House whether she has actually said that the security services had acted stupidly in connection with the stolen list, unrealistically in connection with the fire, adding that these services are so powerful that they can do as they please at any time?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As I have indicated, Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal more specifically with this matter when I rise on a question of privilege at three o'clock. The hon. member is inquiring about a discussion which took place during a lunch break at Carleton University some eight days ago, which lasted for an hour and a half, and of which the recorded tape I do not have. I shall deal more fully and completely with this issue in a little while.

ALLEGATION BY MEMBER OF TAMPERING WITH HIS MAIL

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of his replies to the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris I should like to ask one simple question. Why is he permitting the security service to tamper with my mail?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the hon. gentleman, I understand that he was in communication with the press this morning and he gave some background details of that particular intervention. As I understand it his letter was addressed to—or a letter was addressed to the hon. gentleman at his House of Commons address. Unfortunately, through some error—undoubtedly not an error in the post office—it was misdirected to Government House. At that point, as I understand it, the hon. gentleman has said it was opened at Government House. This is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, but if that is not the case I stand to be corrected. In any event, it is a particular instance. I would need, evidently, some additional information from the hon. member if he is to expect an adequate reply.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. At no time did I indicate the letter was opened at Government House. For the information of this House the letter was clearly addressed to me as a member of parliament and stamped by Government House as well as by the technical unit of the RCMP. I should like to ask the Postmaster General, in view of the fact that under the Post Office Act every person is guilty of an indictable offence who unlawfully opens letters or articles of mail, why was a letter, if the first answer was correct that it was done in error—why was a letter containing a simple request opened and inspected as stamped August 9, 1977 and August 10, 1977, a process which, I am told, is in effect since 1972? Why was this course followed?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, again it is a specific instance—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: Surely the hon. members cannot expect me to provide them with a reply on something that it has taken him two shots at posing a question to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: There are things I cannot be expected to know. Evidently the question asked indicates there are details that need further investigation. I undertook to the hon. gentleman to provide that additional investigation and provide him as well as other members with a complete explanation of the incident.

ALLEGATION BY MEMBER OF TAMPERING WITH HIS MAIL

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a question to the Postmaster General. They may think this very amusing on the other side, but I, too, have a letter that was addressed to my office and was inspected by the RCMP on August 18, 1977. I want to know why my mail was tampered with?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think there is a temptation here to relate specific incidents. I have given some latitude to raising these in the general context. However, we have to carefully avoid the use of the question period to explore specific questions of this sort particularly if they have been outstanding for sometime as they appear to be.

An hon. Member: He is a slow reader.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING FAMILY ALLOWANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

Yesterday I asked him, as reported in Hansard on page 632, if the minister could enlarge on the statement he made in September 1977 to the effect that he was going to decrease family allowances but he replied that he had made no such statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the daily La Presse of September 22, 1977, the following is clearly stated and I quote:

Treasury Board President Robert Andras has suggested that family allowances might be reduced next year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, could the minister give a few details on the matter?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question as translated to me the day before yesterday appeared to indicate he was asking me if I was relating some hypothetical action with regard to family allowances to the servicing of the public debt. I made no such statement. I am not quite sure what variation on that question the hon. member is implying now.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, I will merely say to the minister that if he would like me to do so, I could send him a copy of that article published in La Presse concerning his statement.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE MAIL FOR LAYCRAFT COMMISSION AND OTHER INDIVIDUALS NOT INTERCEPTED

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It is further to one I asked of him on October 31 when I inquired about the possible means of surveillance, including mail interception, with respect to the Laycraft commission of inquiry. I think the Solicitor General will remember this. With reference to the latest number of reports that have been dealt with, has he anything further to add to his answer or has he made any further inquiries?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure what the hon. member referred to in the question he previously asked me concerning the Laycraft inquiry. Perhaps he could refresh my memory.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that. It was on October 31, page 424 of Hansard. It was further to a question raised by the hon. member for New Westminster. I asked the Solicitor General at that time whether he could give us an unequivocal assurance that among any other possible methods of surveillance of the Laycraft commission that mail interception was not used. At that time he gave me a very substantial answer to the effect that to the best of his knowledge this was not the case. I was wondering now in view of some of the other matters that have been raised if he could expand his answer and give us the same kind of assurance, particularly to the rest of Canadians, and not restrict it only to the members of the Laycraft commission of inquiry. Has he asked about this?

[Mr. Allard.]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the Laycraft inquiry, I do not recall the hon. member's reference to the mail being intercepted in connection with the attorney general, the solicitor general of Alberta or the Laycraft inquiry itself. In that regard, my answer would remain the same. However, on the more general question, I assume he is referring to the CBC news report last night concerning possible interception of the mail by the RCMP security service, I understand under the code name "cathedral". I had the opportunity of checking into the matter with senior officers of the force this morning and asked questions concerning the code name "cathedral". The code name "cathedral" goes back to 1954. In some instances, after my examination of the files with senior officers of the Crown, it clearly happened that the mail has actually been opened by the RCMP security service. Because of that, I referred the whole matter to the Attorney General of Canada and also to the McDonald royal commission of inquiry.

POSSIBILITY NDP WAS OBJECT OF SECURITY CHECK

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer and assure him that if he checks in Hansard, my question indeed was specific on mail surveillance. I want to ask a related question on the matter of surveillance in general. Further to reports that Daniel Celovosky was perhaps the victim of security considerations when he was discharged from a militia unit and further to current reports in the Globe and Mail that this may have been as a result of the surveillance that was alleged on behalf of or toward the NDP, the federal members and staff, of which one was his father, can the Solicitor General give us any assurance, or if not will he look into this case to make certain that the NDP was not targeted by the RCMP or the security service in any way that would smack of interference with a legitimate political party.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as the question of security clearance of an individual is concerned, if he was dismissed from a militia unit, I assume that the proper person to ask a question of would be the Minister of National Defence. We have always stated in connection with the surveillance of political parties the security service does not have a mandate to systematically survey any legitimate political party.

MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE OF PRACTICE OF INTERCEPTING MAIL

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It is with reference to the answer he gave my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova. I believe the Solicitor General said the matter of postal mail interception has been referred to the royal commission. In all the briefings he has bragged about so eloquently, did he never know that the RCMP may have infiltrated the post office? If that is not the case, did he never ask the security officers briefing him, are you or are you not contrary to the law intercepting and reading mail? Did it never occur to him to ask that question?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I repeatedly asked the RCMP, particularly during the course of the preparation of my statement concerning the APLQ break-in, whether there were any other illegal incidents that ought to be brought to my attention and the answer was no.

Mr. Jarvis: Will the minister please answer the question. Did he ever ask specifically whether security officers were intercepting mail? That is not a general question.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, during the course of my mandate, I gave specific instructions to the RCMP when I came across the APLQ file. As far as I am concerned, all operations of the force were to be carried out within the framework of the law.

RESOURCES

PROPOSED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF MINING SECTOR

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, keeping in mind that recent lay-offs at INCO, Noranda, Alcan, Falconbridge and so on indicate a total lack by those elected to govern this country of any kind of planning and developing the non-renewable mineral resources in Canada, and in view of the fact that weaker nickel markets, investment abroad and a lack of planning of the mining companies and the government have resulted in some 3,000 to 4,000 people being laid off with another 3,000 in six months time, can the Acting Prime Minister advise if this government is now prepared to order a parliamentary investigation into the mineral resource sector of this country with a view to developing an industrial strategy so that Canadians can be assured that their resources will develop with their interest uppermost?

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the preamble of the hon. member's question, he should be aware that the government is endeavouring to stimulate the economy so that situations such as INCO will not repeat themselves. I remind hon. members of tax reductions costing in the area of $500 million to $700 million. Add to that in the full year next year about $1,200 million. Add the $450 million now in direct job creation plus another $150 million, plus $100 million going to an employment incentives scheme of the Minister of Finance. This will have considerable impact in stimulating consumer purchasing which will help avoid some of the situations the hon. member is referring to and I believe exaggerating.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTED WITHDRAWAL OF TAX CONCESSIONS FROM NICKEL AND COPPER MINING INDUSTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): On October 24, page 157 of Hansard the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour, told this House that the Canadian government would not agree to stockpiling nickel because, and I quote:

> Increased expenditures or incentives to further increase those stockpiles seem to be putting off the day when we can get this industry back into a healthy condition to guarantee jobs for people who are unemployed.

In view of the Acting Prime Minister's comments that any such assistance would be of no value, can he now tell this House if he would be prepared to withdraw all federal tax concessions from the nickel and copper mining industries, including the $10 million in the most recent budget? Is he prepared to withdraw all those tax concessions at this point?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The representation is clearly that, not a question. In any case, the answer I am sure will be the usual one related to budgetary disclosures.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REASON FOR DELAY IN PUTTING SECURITY SERVICE UNDER CIVILIAN CONTROL

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. Considering action by both the United States Congress and administration to bring United States security surveillance under proper—I underline the word proper—civilian control, considering the open forthrightness displayed by these two wings of government south of the border in relation to the problem, can the minister explain his government's reluctance at the present time, in view of what is going on, to be equally as forthright with the Canadian people and to give the whole problem similar leadership.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): It seems to me that that is precisely what the inquiry under the chairmanship of Judge McDonald is all about. Apart from having the power to inquire into specific instances of acts committed by officers in the course of investigations which are contrary to the law, the commission is specifically authorized to recommend policies and procedures which should govern the operation of the security services. It would seem to me that the RCMP and its officers are entitled to have that kind of impartial and judicious hearing which will be a matter of public record and which will result in recommendation to the government and to parliament as to what the policy and the law should be.

Mr. Grafftey: My supplementary is this: How many times must the civil liberties of individual Canadians be put down, so to speak, before the government gets a lever on this thing by taking action comparable to what is going on under the United States committee system or with what is being done by the administration and by Congress? Does the minister not agree that what is going on under the government in terms of getting a lever on this situation is too little and too late—that it will be too long before action will be forthcoming?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

INQUIRIES BY MINISTER CONCERNING TAMPERING WITH MAIL BY SECURITY SERVICE—TYPES OF CASES INVOLVED

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. I am addressing it to him in order to give him an opportunity to clarify what he said a little while ago. Regardless of what he has referred to the McDonald Commission, or when he referred to the McDonald Commission, both of which questions are very vague, in view of the serious allegations, allegations which if true are intolerable in this nation, made last night on national television and again this morning in the national media, can the minister please tell me whether he asked his officials this morning whether they knew of any circumstances whatever involving tampering with Her Majesty's mails in Canada.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lawrence: My supplementary, in the light of that very full answer, is this: Just what was the reply the Solicitor General received from his officials when I suspect he knows and certainly his officials know, that there have been previous instances brought to the floor of this House by members at which time his predecessors simply evaded the same type of question as he is answering here today.

Mr. Fox: I find it difficult to accept the hon. member's conclusion that I evaded the question put to me by the hon. member for Central Nova. I indicated clearly that I sat down with senior officials of the force this morning, asked them to produce their files, asked them a number of questions on procedural operations and it became very clear to me during the course of that meeting that there had been indeed a number of instances in which the security service of the RCMP in particular areas of counterespionage, terrorism and countersubversion opened a number of pieces of mail. I also told the hon. member that as far as the RCMP files show, this type of procedure goes back to 1954.

Mr. Lawrence: Bearing in mind that the RCMP themselves have publicly admitted that they have absolutely no authority to do that at all, is the minister telling us now that as the minister responsible he is assuring the House that this has only been done in cases of alleged terrorism or alleged bombing or counterespionage. Is he saying that these four types of cases are the only ones which have been reported to him.

Mr. Fox: As the hon. member knows, this matter came to light only last night. I do not think our examination of the whole matter is complete. The initial response I have had from the force, the initial breakdown of the cases which have occurred, is to the effect that they all come under the classification of counterespionage, countersubversion and terrorism. As far as the government is concerned, no matter what heading it comes under it is not authorized either by the Official Secrets Act or the Post Office Act and in these circumstances we feel the matter has to be referred to the commission of inquiry set up by the federal government in view of the fact that mail has been opened and we wish to apprise the royal commission of the circumstances in which the mail was opened. Hopefully, the royal commission will have some suggestions to make as a result of that very serious presentation.

An hon. Member: Another illegality.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO AID EMPLOYEES AFFECTED BY CHANGE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What steps if any, other than prayer, has the government taken to help Canadians serving abroad in the employment of Canada who are affected by the changes in the fortunes of the Canadian dollar.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be the last to question the efficacy of prayer, but apart from that we are examining each individual case; we do have certain formulas in place on a continuing basis to deal with fluctuations in currency values. Just last week, for instance, there were quite substantial changes in Israel. We look at these cases individually as they come along and do our best to accommodate our people to them. I should point out that they also, on occasion, benefit when currency values move in the opposite direction.

Mr. McCleave: I think I shall have to make a late show appointment. I really have in mind the situation in Washington.

MANPOWER

REASON APPROVAL OF CERTAIN CANADA WORKS PROJECTS DELAYED

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Since most Canada Works projects in provinces other than Quebec have already been accepted in more than 85 per cent of cases, could the minister tell the House why such a long delay is required this year to consider projects submitted to the Quebec government?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, last week several members asked me the reason for this situation and I decided that the approval procedure had to be hastened. I think that 80 to 90 per cent of the projects have already been accepted.

GRAIN

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF WHEAT SOLD FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question, if I can wake him up, is for the Minister of Agriculture.

An hon. Member: Cheap!

Mr. Nystrom: It goes to him in the absence of his friend, the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. It is now four years since the minimum price for wheat sold for domestic consumption was set at $3.25 a bushel and it is several months since his friend the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board said this price was being reviewed by the cabinet with a view to its upward adjustment. Can the hon. gentleman now assure us that the hard-pressed farmers will receive an increase in the price of the wheat they sell for domestic consumption?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am not in a position to give the hon. member the assurance he seeks because no decision has yet been taken. I want to assure him however, that even asleep I am as bright as he is, wide awake.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister assure that any increase in the price of wheat in this country will reflect at least the cost of production which the farmers have encountered in the last four years? Further, can he tell us when an announcement will be forthcoming?

Mr. Whelan: With the Western Grain Stabilization Act, crop insurance and so on, the grain producers of western Canada are better taken care of than any group of cereal producers I know of anywhere. I work very closely with the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and I know he is as concerned as we are to look after the interests of western Canadian farmers as well as of Canadian consumers.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SURVEILLANCE OF MAIL NOT PERMITTED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General who in response earlier to questions by the Leader of the Opposition and by my hon. friend from Brandon-Souris left the distinct impression that there had been no interference, legal or otherwise, with the mail except in one particular case which had been disclosed. We look to the minister for very little, but we do look to him to protect the mail and I ask him whether he will check to satisfy himself that there has been no interference by any security service, including his own staff. We have all these revelations by the Solicitor General that there has been illegal interference. I ask the minister to satisfy himself and report to the House so that we may know in this country that there is not going to be government surveillance of the mail.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I hasten to give the hon. gentleman that assurance. I take my responsibilities very seriously and section 43 of the Post Office Act is very clear. The information the hon. gentleman brought to my attention through his leader arose out of a program which was broadcast last night. I have conducted an investigation with my head of security and investigation at this time, and I have received the reply that there has been no departure from the policy I have described. I am not responsible for the RCMP.

• (1502)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I have said quite clearly that I have conducted an investigation in my department with my officials, and I have been advised as I stated earlier in the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is an incredible proposition that the Postmaster General puts before us today. Is he telling the House that the Solicitor General did not have the courtesy to tell him about the illegal interceptions of mail on the part of the RCM Police; and is he also saying that he has no responsibility to deal with other security services as the protector of the public mails? Is he saying that he has no responsibility in this regard?

Mr. Blais: I have the responsibility, Mr. Speaker, of making sure that the provisions of the Post Office Act are honoured. I am taking that responsibility. I have indicated to the hon. gentleman that I have conducted a preliminary investigation with the head of my security and investigation department this morning. I have also undertaken to the hon. gentleman to pursue these investigations and to provide to the House any information that might come to my attention in the normal course.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I put a very simple question to the Postmaster General. I want to know whether he will first undertake to speak to his cabinet colleagues to ensure that there is no unlawful interference with the mails; and will he not now undertake to make a statement on motions at the earliest possible date on his findings in regard to interference with the mails of this country?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the hon. gentleman that I will be pursuing the matter, that indeed I have had a preliminary investigation conducted by the head of security. I have told him that there is no information other than what I have provided to the House at this time. I have also indicated to the hon. gentleman that I will be pursuing the investigations and that I am conscious of my responsibilities under the Post Office Act. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind—and the hon. gentleman has stated this quite clearly—that in my investigations there will, of course, have to be a great deal of interplay as between the Solicitor General and myself. This is exactly the course of action which I propose to pursue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday on a point of order respecting the tabling of documents we dealt with a point concerning a document which was referred to by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during an intervention a few days ago. He indicated that he had quoted from a document which, in his view, was a public document and that he was prepared to table it if the chair saw no objection. I have, on reflection, concluded that ought not to be an impediment to tabling a public document in the House. I see no impediment, and if the Prime Minister is prepared to table it, the tabling will take place at the earliest possible opportunity.

PRIVILEGE

MISS BÉGIN—REMARKS MADE AT CARLETON UNIVERSITY

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in view of the comments I made in this House yesterday on a question of privilege, and reports in the media of remarks I made at a luncheon discussion with students at Carleton University last Wednesday, November 2, I should like to clarify my position in the debate which has occupied the attention of members.

I was the guest of Carleton University students at the Roosters, at lunch time on Wednesday last, November 2. Two months ago, I had accepted this invitation to talk about national unity and discuss this subject with the students.

The first questions asked were about the RCMP. I answered them as honestly as possible, as indeed I did all other questions.

[English]

In particular today I should like to take the strongest exception to remarks made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) yesterday, as reported at page 692 of Hansard. I regret just having received a note from him, to my extreme surprise since he does not usually consult or inform me, saying that he had to leave to catch a flight. He had this to say:

> We on this side of the House could document the allegation of a cover-up, and apart from points we on this side of the House would make, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has provided the best possible argument by saying, as a member of the cabinet, that she thinks they were ignoring their responsibility. I would say that she thinks they were involved in a cover-up in burying their own essential role in this whole mess.

First of all, I wish to restate with as much emphasis as I command that I fully support the action of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in dealing with allegations of illegal activities by some members of the RCMP. They have clearly stated that this government does not condone illegal acts on the part of citizens or the police. When such acts came to light, not only were they reported to this House by the Solicitor General, but the cases were referred to the proper provincial authorities, and also to the royal commission which was appointed for the purpose of such investigations.

Some of the university students themselves have suggested on the radio this morning that the comments made by myself, which have appeared in the media, have been taken out of the context of the meeting and have become, in their words, a tempest in a teapot. Indeed, the organizers of the meeting have dissociated themselves from the report which appeared in the university newspaper, The Charlatan, and have sent me a telegram to that effect.

The occasion was a very informal exchange of views, and there was certainly no question of my "lashing out" at either the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister. Indeed, the very comment I made concerning illegal acts is one that has been made repeatedly in recent days by the Solicitor General, and I support him.

On the other hand, to abstain from criticizing a fellow-member of the cabinet is so elementary one need not dwell on the point.

I therefore want to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I support wholeheartedly the work and the stands of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) whose competence, everyone knows, is undeniable.

[English]

In trying to put questions in my own personal perspective during the Carleton luncheon, I turned my mind back to the context of 1973 as I saw it when I was a private member. Perhaps such recollections are denied cabinet minister. If I have overstepped practices either for a cabinet member or for this House, I of course do not hesitate to express my regrets. I have no intention of misleading the House, but rather wished to place the correct interpretation on the thoughts I expressed at Carleton a week ago and in press interviews yesterday. I was speaking from recollection of an informal meeting of some length. Unfortunately, I was not allowed by a commentator of Carleton Radio-News to confirm my recollection with a tape of my remarks. The tape, I understand, has been made available to the media.

Since a member opposite asked me a few minutes ago a question based on the supposed transcript of my remarks, which the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) has just given me, a short text which I have seen for the first time, an unidentified object consisting of five pages even though I talked for an hour and a half, I should like to put the record straight.

As soon as I learned last Monday that what I had said was controversial, my office phoned the students at Carleton for a copy of the tapes made in front of me. The students informed us that one of those tapes had been erased and that, in the case of the other, the recorder had not worked. I therefore pursued the matter as best I could remember until I learned late yesterday that the commentator in question had tapes which he had given the media. We then asked the commentator if he would agree to letting me hear copy of the tape, which he refused to do.

I should add that this morning, following the many statements made by Carleton students over the station Radio-Carleton, the commentator called my office offering the tape which he said was not complete. It reached us barely a few hours ago and I have yet to hear it.

[English]

Further, Mr. Speaker, it is rather surprising that the tape, made eight days ago, would be used only now for three quotes out of context heavily biased by commentary, and reproduced for the first time, I think, by the CBC with only one excerpt. It is easy to see how such techniques make a mouse look like an elephant, and no professional journalist would do that.

This whole operation tended to discredit the judgment of the students present at the Roosters discussions who did not interpret my opinions and my remarks in any such distorted way.

The shame of the matter, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, is that none of the participants in that operation dealt with the problem I was discussing, namely the relations that must exist between the government and the police in charge of national security in democratic countries. Instead, the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) tried to stir up trouble between friends and colleagues of the cabinet. He should know that this old trick does not work.

There was a time when many of us who do not share the philosophy of the New Democratic Party still recognized that the leaders of that party—the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) or their former leader, Mr. Lewis—had accustomed this House and this country to a standard of honesty which won them votes if not personal admiration. If this feeling remains true for some hon. members, unfortunately I cannot say so for their present leader.

[English]

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take a great deal of time intervening in this debate on the question of privilege raised by the minister. I must say that I very much regret having to be involved in the debate at all, but I think there have been some statements by the minister which raise very real questions about the policy of the Government of Canada, who speaks for the government, and what is the precise attitude of the government.

It would be perhaps helpful, sir, to read into the record briefly some of the things in the transcript of the recording of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). She said at one point, referring to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox):

—I think Francis Fox should clearly state—give the message—that he disagrees with what the police did. More than defending them or explaining that they might have had good reason.

Sir, I leave it to readers of the records as to whether or not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am asked by one of the defenders on the other side whether I can prove that this is precisely what the minister said. If the minister believes it is not what she said, then of course it is within her rights to stand up and let that be known. Until the minister does take that position we must assume that the words are her words.

An hon. Member: You should have listened to her.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I would like to leave to the readers of the record the final conclusion, Sir, as to whether these statements by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, indicating that the Solicitor General should follow a course other than the course he followed, constitutes a disagreement that is serious between ministers.

Perhaps of greater consequence to me are other aspects in the statements by the minister, a member of the cabinet. One of these relates to the RCMP and the relation of that force to the Government of Canada, and the other relates to a question of the climate that prevailed in Canada at the time of certain acts which we now know to be illegal.

Let me deal first with the question relating to the relationship of the RCMP to the government. Perhaps the best way I can deal with this, and it raises the question I tried to put to the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Munro) earlier, as to whether he was speaking on behalf of the government, as did my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), is to quote the minister.

In relation to the RCMP the minister said, and I will read the entirety of the quotation, and perhaps I should say it will be clear from the quotation that the minister was speaking without notes and was not reading from a direct text:

—they have gadgets of national security, of surveillance, so big that they, if you, the government, start trying to control them or master what goes on or look into the files—you know, say you, the Minister sets a meeting of the directors and wants to see files and all that he doesn't know—and none of us know—what's the next step because they can be using—that's my feeling—they can be using gadgets the way they want.

At this point I would emphasize that the word "they" refers to the RCMP. The minister said:

—that's my feeling—they can be using gadgets the way they want. They can be bugging you.

In other words, the minister is accusing the RCMP of potentially bugging ministers of the Crown. She continued:

First thing you know, there's a leak, in newspapers, and then its members of parliament on both sides of the House whose private lives are going to be questioned. That approach I don't think is the job of the RCMP, or of any police. Eh, bon. That's all for the RCMP.

The matter we want to know about, Mr. Speaker, and I think this is a legitimate question for this House of Commons, is whether, when expressing such opinions about the RCMP, saying they can be using gadgets where they want and can be bugging you, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as a member of the cabinet of the Government of Canada, was expressing the view of the government as to the power of the RCMP and the degree to which the RCMP operates free from control by the Government of Canada. This is a very important matter to the House, particularly in relation to the debate which has been occupying this place for the last several days.

The other matter which is of very real concern to us, and has reference also to the question of the policy of the government and what has lead the government to take positions it has taken, and I would quote again from the minister who says—

An hon. Member: From what are you quoting?

Mr. Clark: I quote again from the transcript of the recording of a speech the minister made to the students at Carleton University.

An hon. Member: That's not true. It is a phony one.

Mr. Clark: As I have said, if the minister believes that these statements do not correctly reflect her words, she has the right to get up—

An hon. Member: She has already done so.

Mr. Clark: She has the right to get up and say it is wrong.

Mr. Ouellet: You should just listen.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal from the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who usually communicates by telephone, but who is instead now heckling from across the floor of the House.

Let me just read this portion of what was said by a minister of the Crown for Canada, involving a matter which raises a question regarding the policy of the government, and I put it in context with something said by her on the subject. The minister said:

Of course, as a Quebecer, I must say as a lay person—

She made that distinction. She said:

—I must say as a lay person—I was not a member of the cabinet at that time—that when they did that—these various actions in early 1975—there is no way somebody is going to tell me that as a Quebecer there was a state of national emergency somewhere in Quebec and some threats to God-knows-what. I never perceived anything like that.

My colleagues suggest I should carry on. It continues:

If that was the threats, the mentality of the beginning of 1973, what they would have done since the 15th of November last year, they might have bugged the complete province of Quebec. So that's all for the RCMP.

What is important is that we have the words of one minister of the Crown regarding the climate at the time of the illegal acts. We have also the careful, deliberate, prepared statement by the Solicitor General in this House of Commons on the afternoon of October 28, 1977. On that occasion the Solicitor General said that the illegal activities were carried out in the absolute conviction that its sole object was to promote the security of Canada, given the political and social climate prevailing in 1973.

On the one hand we have the Solicitor General saying that the political and social climate prevailing in 1973 was of a nature which would cause illegal acts to be performed. On the other hand, within a matter of two weeks, we have another minister, the Solicitor General's seatmate, saying that as far as she is concerned, as a member of the cabinet and as a member of the House of Commons who presumably knew what her colleague said on behalf of the government when he made his speech on October 28, she disagrees completely with the question as to the climate in Quebec at that time.

This is important because it has to do with the atmosphere within which members of the security service would have interpreted and acted upon directions from the Government of Canada that led to the accomplishment of illegal acts. That is particularly important because one of the matters we want to determine in this House is just what the roles of the ministers were, and the degree of direction which was given by ministers of the Crown that caused members of the security service to commit illegal acts.

Frequently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has intervened in this matter. We have the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister saying that these illegal acts occurred because there was an unusual climate in Quebec during that period, and we have another minister saying that there was no such unusual climate in Quebec during that period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I extend to the House his apologies. He had an engagement outside of the House which made it necessary for him to leave about 2.30 p.m. However, since the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has based her question of privilege on remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I think I should say at least a few words in reply.

The minister's complaint against the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby yesterday was that his allegations were without any foundation. May I point out that, when my leader raised the matter yesterday, he had before him a copy of an article which appeared in The Charlatan, the newspaper of the students of Carleton University, and his remarks were based on what appeared in that article.

In addition to that, we now have the tapes which were played on the CBC this morning, and we have a transcript of those remarks. I have a transcript in my hand, as did the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I think one or two of the sentences he referred to can be quoted again, just to support the position taken yesterday by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had demonstrated a difference of opinion between herself and the Solicitor General on the issues that are at stake.

For example, according to the transcript of her words that we heard on the radio this morning, she said:

> ... I think Francis Fox should clearly state—give the message—that he disagrees with what the police did, more than defending them or explaining that they might have had good reason.

Sir, if that is not differing with the Solicitor General, I do not know what the word "difference" means. At the conclusion of the comments by the Leader of the Opposition, he referred to the mentality or the state of opinion in Quebec in 1973. We were asked by the Solicitor General to be generous and forgiving to the RCMP because of the state which existed at that time. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, in her remarks at Carleton University, indicated that as a Quebecer she disagrees with what was said to be the state at that time, and if they had carried that on, "they might have bugged the complete province of Quebec".

I should like to return to the earlier remarks of the minister in the transcript of what was given over the radio this morning. The minister said this:

> I think it is absolutely stupid that they would go and steal lists of memberships of political parties, in this case the Parti Québécois. And I find unreal that they would put fire to a barn.

Surely that is an opinion totally different than that expressed by the Solicitor General, who has argued that we should understand the situation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute! The Solicitor General said that we should realize that the things done by the RCMP special unit were done from the highest of motives because of the situation. But the Minister of National Health and Welfare said the following:

> This being said, they have gadgets of national security, of surveillance, so big that they, if you, the government, start trying to control them or master what goes on or look into the files—you know, say you, the Minister sets a meeting of the directors and wants to see files and all that he doesn't know—and none of us know—what's the next step because they can be using—that's my feeling—they can be using gadgets the way they want.

We happen to agree with the sentiments expressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My point in rising—and I think it is my duty, as well as my right to do so—is to say that it is unfair to charge the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in his remarks yesterday of making statements for which there was no foundation.

Yesterday my hon. friend said that the logic of all this was that there was a cover-up—he did not accuse the hon. minister of alleging that there was a cover-up—but, I submit that the very sentences I have read from the transcript of what we heard over the radio this morning suggest that the minister felt, when she was making these remarks, that the Solicitor General was not really doing his job; he was just being a messenger boy; and instead of defending the police, and instead of saying what they had done had good reason and good purpose, he should have told them that it was stupid and that it was wrong.

I feel my leader was quite justified in the remarks he made yesterday and that the minister's charge against him is unwarranted. In conclusion, I should like to refer to the last words in the transcript which I have, where the minister said, "Eh, bon. That's all for the RCMP."

I am sure Your Honour noted, because Your Honour always does when a member raises a question of privilege, that the hon. minister offered no motion. If she has a question of privilege, she should be prepared to carry it through. If she is prepared to ask leave to present a motion to refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that the tapes can be produced and the entire matter can be gone into, we in this party would be happy to agree to such a motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) was quoted by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). The argument which was established yesterday by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby was itself incidental to an argument which many members claimed in the first instance was an incidental argument by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

● (1532)

When the Prime Minister was replying to a question of privilege, he in turn expressed an opinion in the House which was similar to other opinions expressed by other hon. members. That was referred to by many and described as an argument which was really incidental to the main question of privilege. In turn the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby said that those opinions were not being expressed by the opposition solely on the basis of their own views, but in fact on the basis of some views expressed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). Therefore the question was twice removed from the main question of privilege under argument yesterday.

In this case, because of that, the Minister of National Health and Welfare was given the floor today on a question of privilege, as is always the case when remarks made by a minister or by a member of the House have been quoted in the press and misinterpreted. The minister or the member is always given the opportunity to make an application to make the difference of opinion or difference of interpretation involved, known. When that is put forward it seems only just that equal contributions ought to be made from the other side. That has been done.

It is not essentially a question of privilege; it is a question of disagreement and interpretation. Furthermore, it has been contributed to by two members of the opposition at considerable length, and it seems to me that the matter, which does not in the first instance constitute a question of privilege, ought to close.

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—TAPE RECORDINGS OF MINISTER'S REMARKS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am rising, then, on what I must say is a new question of privilege. I attempted to get to my feet just as Your Honour rose, and I did not want to interrupt you. Your Honour has now dealt with the matter in such a way that it has been passed off as a matter of dispute and difference between both sides. I cannot question Your Honour's ruling but, with respect, I think it goes much further than that. Therefore I rise on a new question of privilege with respect to what the minister said.

Your Honour has heard quoted—and I am going to quote again—what has been recorded in a transcript of a recording of the minister's speech which was obtained. The tapes are available. The minister has the transcript, and it is clear. I am sure the tapes will substantiate that the minister stated a certain opinion that has been laid before this House clearly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). However, the opposite is true in terms of her statement yesterday. I think we have to put this in the context of her statements here in the House as a member of parliament who, incidentally, is a minister of the Crown.

The minister yesterday stated the following:

> . . . I need only add that I have always supported the work and actions—particularly with regard to the current parliamentary crisist . . .

How can that possibly be squared with what the minister said at Carleton University? It is on the record. Then the minister said:

> . . . and, naturally, the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). Even now, in my office, I am in the process of writing a telegram to the newspapers the Toronto Sun and The Charlatan setting the record straight.

That is what the minister said she was in the process of doing. If Your Honour wishes, I can read the whole statement. I do not think I have to, but there is an absolute difference between the position the minister took at Carleton University, which has been recorded, and the position she took yesterday in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will let the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) go on in a minute. There are others who wish to contribute to the point. I will hear the acting Prime Minister, who is prepared to make a contribution as well. However, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton must be able to persuade me that a prima facie question of privilege exists. What he has just said may be true, upon which I would be prepared to hear argument; but supposing there is a direct contradiction between what the minister said at Carleton University and what she said in the House does that constitute a question of privilege?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I appreciate your intervention, Mr. Speaker, but what the minister said of the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) had to do with what he said regarding her statement at Carleton University. She said that the hon. member had made unfounded serious allegations. That is in the paragraph preceding what I have already read. I was just coming to that before Your Honour rose. It is at page 692 of Hansard. I do not know how that can be squared with what the minister said at Carleton University. I do not think this can be brushed off gently as an issue simply to be contributed to by both sides.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: This is an abuse of the House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot talk over the din from the other side.

I think this matter is important on another ground. The minister is a member of this parliament. If the minister has been wronged by The Charlatan at Carleton, which she claims she has been, then she and other members of parliament have the right to have the matter cleared. If the transcript of the statement, alleged to have been made from the taping of the voice of a minister of the Crown, is not a true record of what the minister said, or if the voice on the tape is not that of the minister, who is a member of this House, then that member ought to be given the benefit of the doubt and every opportunity to clear herself.

Therefore, in view of the failure of the minister to move a motion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

> That the question of privilege raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I do this so that the matter can be aired completely.

Mr. Speaker: At the outset I must indicate that I have made an adjudication on the merits of the question raised by the minister. I have previously indicated—and I will draw the precedents before finalizing—that it is not in keeping with the precedents of our House that one member can raise a question of privilege to be sent to a committee regarding the grievance of another member. That has never been done. In any case, I will reserve on the matter, examine the precedents, and rule on the present argument by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton.

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on this spurious question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). Even if there was a contradiction between what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said at Carleton University and what she said yesterday, which we do not acknowledge at all, that does not constitute a question of privilege. I would be prepared to elaborate at great length.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made no point at all. I thought the original point was that somehow there was a derogation of ministerial responsibility. He did not come to that conclusion even in the factual situation he laid before us, nor was that the conclusion of his remarks.

Your Honour indicated to the House leader of the Conservative party, who is supposed to have some experience with regard to the rules, that there was no question of privilege, but then the hon. member rose on another question of privilege, acknowledged the justification of Your Honour's ruling, and then proceeded to base the entire justification for his next question of privilege on the question of an alleged contradiction which was already ruled to be not a justification for a question of privilege at all.

The attempts of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton under the guise of a question of privilege have no justification whatsoever. He read from a transcript of tapes which he knows the Minister of National Health and Welfare has not had the opportunity to hear or to test their validity. He did that to dump it all on to the record under the guise of a question of privilege for which he knows there is no justification at all.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): How the hon. member can consider behaviour of that kind proper parliamentary conduct is frankly beyond me.

Mr. Speaker: With respect to the matter raised by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) I think it ought to be brought to a conclusion. I have made an adjudication on the question raised by the minister.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) raised a second question of privilege which, in a preliminary way, I have indicated is always proper. I have indicated that I felt initially that, even if the contradiction he refers to is in fact established—and it is in dispute—it does not constitute privilege. However, the hon. member raised an argument which I said I would examine.

It seems to me that it is not in keeping with our practices that a grievance raised by one member can become the subject of a motion of privilege by another, and I know there is a recent precedent which deals with that. I have indicated that I will reserve on the matter, bring that precedent into the House tomorrow, and finalize the matter with a ruling at that time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INTERIM REPORT ON MATTERS OF SECURITY

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, I should like to indicate to the House at this time a further interim report on the matters of security that have been raised in the House in the recent past.

As I indicated to the House yesterday in respect of the matter involving the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), I had communicated to that member the contents of our preliminary investigation and asked for his response to it. This morning the hon. member for Central Nova and I met. It was his desire that the matter be pursued further. He informed me of the contents of his own examination of the circumstances and indicated his desire that the matter be carried further. He felt that the choice of an investigative force, because I had indicated that if it is to be carried further some investigative force other than our own security staff of the House of Commons would have to be used, should be left to me.

I have pursued the matter in a preliminary way with the Ottawa Police investigative force and asked for their co-operation and assistance in carrying this forward. I shall keep the House informed of the progress of that investigation.

In respect of the matter involving the office of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the meeting that I reported to the House yesterday did in fact take place yesterday afternoon, and at the present time, as a result of the meetings that have taken place between our officials and officials of the office of the Leader of the Opposition and their advisers, the telephone has been taken to the Bell Telephone laboratory where tests will be conducted. I expect those reports by late tomorrow, but in any case I ought to be in a position to give the House a full report on those investigations when the House resumes on Monday, bearing in mind that the House is not sitting on Friday.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, during the oral question period, I willingly sat down after having asked a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). You will find that the question I wanted to ask is quite justified, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to know if in her statement the Minister of National Health and Welfare really said that the security service had become so strong that it could investigate in just about any field without government knowledge. If the statement was made in public, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a cabinet minister, has shown that the government has lost control over its security service. In these circumstances and in view of the concern this will create among all Canadians, a member of cabinet is involved. If the minister did not say this, it is important for her to stand up and say so in the House, and if she said this to make the students happy, this shows a serious lack of responsibility. I therefore think that the question I wanted to ask is important in view of the fact—my colleagues opposite may laugh, but I know that government members are not interested in this type of question. I believe that the minister is serious and honest enough—this is a question of privilege and I have the right to express my opinion—to tell the House whether she told the students that the government had lost control over its security service in view of the great means that they now have at their disposal to investigate nearly everything. If she made such a statement, we on this side of the House are perfectly entitled to be concerned and to ask, as did my colleague, that this matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is another contribution to the general question of privilege raised by the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). For the moment, I am reserving my judgment.

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thought it might be helpful to Your Honour, relative to Your Honour's interim report that you just gave on the matters relating to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), to say that, as your Honour knows, the Acting Prime Minister called upon you and asked you to investigate these matters a week ago Monday, and last Thursday I pointed out the seriousness of what may be going on in these buildings. Therefore, in so far as Your Honour wants any indication from the government as to your position, it is certainly agreeable to us, and we urge that in all the circumstances the Ottawa City Police are the proper group to be called in, and we would hope that they would be.

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, this is what I think is a question of privilege arising from the comments you have made in respect of the two alleged buggings here in the House of Commons, and more particularly relating to the alleged bugging device found in the offices of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). I want to raise one point that I think is quite substantive. At page 695 of Hansard yesterday Your Honour is reported as stating:

> I should advise the House it is our understanding that Bell Canada will be provided with this piece of equipment to examine in their laboratories.

Yesterday I was left with the impression that they were still in the hands of some other group, whether it be the opposition, or left in the office still intact, I do not know. I think the point is very important in this sense, that if that alleged bugging device, which Bell Telephone at one time indicated was a piece of standard equipment, if in fact that diode or whatever it is technically called, has been removed from that telephone at the present time and is in the hands of someone other than the security forces of the House of Commons, it seems to me that is a very serious problem.

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The matter is under my responsibility for investigation. There may be questions that might arise when the investigation is completed. The question which the hon. member raises at the present time may be very valid. I think it would be very dangerous, however, if on a day-to-day basis we attempt to deal with interim questions.

I have attempted to make the interim reports very brief. I could expand on them, but until the investigation is completed and I am making a final report to the House, it seems to me that we have to let the matter take its course. If I were to entertain different questions of interpretation along the way, it seems to me it would simply get too complicated to handle. I really think the right course is to follow it through. I know of a number of concerns by hon. members. I am attempting to take those into account and manage them as best I can. I really do not think, however, that we have to get into interim comments.

If, after the investigation is concluded and a report has to be made to the House, and some suggested action has to be taken, it seems to me that all phases of the investigation would then be open to comment in some way at that time. I really think it would be most complicated to attempt to open it for comment as we go along in each step. I would prefer to hold off any comments of privilege or order or anything else in that regard, until we finalize the investigation.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I would just say I agree with that procedure. I wanted to enter a reservation of a concern that has only come to my attention from reading Hansard, so that I would not be prohibited from raising that question at the appropriate time following the tabling of your report on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin) on a point of order.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, reluctantly it is on the matter you have just addressed yourself to, a matter which I, following the Attorney General (Mr. Basford), addressed to you last week. I felt at that time that at the soonest possible moment proper professional police authorities should be brought in to investigate this matter. I mentioned the Ottawa City Police at that time, also the Ontario Provincial Police, as well as possibly the RCMP.

Your Honour has conducted this matter in a most appropriate way, for which I for one commend you, in a most difficult situation. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe, however, that the rights and immunities and privileges of members of this House of Commons, on whatever side they sit, extend to a breach of the Criminal Code, by the commission of an offence under the Criminal Code, an indictable offence, of which a member has knowledge.

I would point out that it was ten days ago, on October 31, that this alleged breach of the criminal law was brought to the attention of this House in a very dramatic way—and I noted Your Honour's words that after discussing it with the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) today, it was his desire expressed to you today, not earlier, that it be—

● (1552)

Mr. Speaker: Order. Once again the hon. member seems to be attempting to make a comment during the course of the investigation. In any case, as I indicated to the House earlier, I have had the matter referred to me by the House. I took steps immediately following the disclosure by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). After the completion of the parliamentary investigation under my authority, that is to say, by the security forces here in the House, I communicated those results to the hon. member for Central Nova. It seems to me he would not reasonably have been in a position to reply to that any earlier than yesterday. In fact, he replied to me this morning.

In any case it should be clear we are getting into very dangerous ground if we attempt to make comment during the course of the investigation. I prefer to conclude that investigation before entertaining any further comment.

SMALL BUSINESS—MANAGEMENT STRUCTURE

Question No. 116—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government publication Small Business In Canada: Perspectives intend to imply on page 2 that a manufacturing business employing fewer than 100 workers has probably not developed a mature management structure?

2. Is it believed that a company must have grown out of the category of a small business, as defined in the publication, before its management structure can have matured?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): 1. In the sense in which mature is employed in "Small Business in Canada: Perspectives", the statement on page two to which the hon. member refers does indicate that it is probable that a firm employing fewer than 100 workers will not have developed a management structure of the kind characteristic of large enterprises. A mature management structure, in this statement, implies a high division of tasks among personnel, and the use of fairly sophisticated control and communication methods. Typically, the retention of a significant number of staff personnel, devoted to such matters as financial accounting, public relations, research, etc., is another indicator of large-firm size. Small firms on the other hand simply do not have the resources and, indeed, often not the need for a complex management structure. Typically, in the small firm, the owner/manager is in frequent and direct contact with most of his staff and he finds this a most effective way to control his enterprise and to communicate with personnel. We have found that—while there is no hard and fast rule about it—there was correlation between the number of employees and the style of management structure in a firm, and that the so-called mature characteristics were prevalent in firms above 100 employees, in the case of manufacturing enterprises.

2. No. As noted in the previous reply, there can indeed be firms employing fewer than 100 employees which do have a so-called mature management structure, although these are not considered to be the majority situation.

ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT PANEL—PERSONS UNDER CONTRACT

Question No. 388—Mr. McKenzie:

1. What is the total number of persons under contract to the Environmental Assessment Panel and how many are retired public servants?

2. What was the total amount in (a) 1975 (b) 1976 paid to those under contract and how much of this was to retired public servants?

Mr. Mike Landers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Environment)): 1. There are three persons under contract to the Environmental Assessment Panel. None of these are retired public servants.

2. Total amount paid to those under contract in (a) 1975: 0; (b) 1976: $25,000, all of which was to a retired public servant.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I want to continue this afternoon the remarks I began last night. Frankly, it is with a heavy heart that I rise to speak at this time. The reason is because we are dealing with a bill that includes some measures which, it is to be hoped, will ease the economic malaise in which Canadians find themselves. However, after only an hour and a half in this House we find that we, not only the opposition but the people of Canada, are faced with a government that has lost the will to govern.

There has to be a relationship between the people and those who govern. That relationship and that trust have been destroyed by the government. That is part of the malaise, namely, that this government cannot be trusted. That is borne out day after day in this House during question period. If one looks at the economic situation that Canada faces, it is borne out there in very grim terms.

It is not my words that are important on this subject. Let us look at what the Economic Council of Canada said in its fourteenth annual report entitled "Into the 1980's". I quote from page 75 of that report:

—there is little hope of achieving simultaneously a low unemployment rate, a low inflation rate, and sound equilibrium of the current account balance over the next five years.

That means at the present time young Canadians under the age of 25 have already doubled the unemployment rate of the working public. It means that young Canadians coming into the labour force for the next five years will be faced by the same considerations of high inflation, and lack of opportunity which is surely the responsibility of Canada to give to its young people.

While I concede that one cannot put the entire blame on any one government—federal, provincial or municipal—the fact is that this country has been governed by the Liberal party since 1963.

Mr. Lumley: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: While the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lumley) says "hear, hear!" I believe that, as an honourable gentleman, he will admit that the record today is dismal and we can take no pride in the economic leadership of this government.

Mr. Lumley: Never!

Mr. Epp: If he cannot accept that, then he is probably the only such Canadian.

I have a further article entitled "A Walk Through the Wonderland of Deductions". Referring to inflation and the economy generally, it reads:

The key problem however, is that many of the big spending decisions of the past decade were made with little consideration of the longer range demands these programs would make on government revenues. Governments introduced a series of programs that are individually desirable, and that have clearly enriched the lives of many Canadians. But the result is that, as the federal government admitted in 1975, it has lost control of 80 per cent of its expenditures and has been unable to adapt its spending to the changing circumstances of Canadian economic growth.

In conclusion, it reads:

It is, after all, still our money which provides governments with their income. Many Canadians have reached the conclusion that the whole country would be better off if the individuals who make the money have a greater opportunity to say how it should be spent. It may be too much to hope for our deductions to go down. But it will be a major accomplishment if we can prevent them from going up.

Reference has already been made to the unemployment rate. Despite controls, inflation has risen to levels higher than government targets. Whether the government admits it or not, it is locked in to a great extent because of increases in energy costs and the fall in value of the Canadian dollar. There are factors in the inflation picture which the government cannot control. Trade imbalance and the flight of capital have also been referred to, and I do not intend to deal with those subjects at the moment.

Going directly to Bill C-11, I call the attention of the House to the fact that today, again, supplementary estimates were tabled. I do not know how much more expenditure we are contemplating now because I have not yet seen those estimates. But we are already facing a deficit of $9.2 billion in one year. As the minister knows, deficits will not occur only as a result of excessive spending. They also occur when there is a fall in the amount of revenue expected, and revenues are down tremendously because Canadians lack confidence in the economy and in the leadership of the government.

It is one thing for this generation to have to foot the bill for our spending. What concerns me a great deal more is that we are asking future generations of Canadians to bear the consequences of the lack of leadership shown by the government.

We are asking them to service these debts and to repay them. How can we rise in our places with a good conscience and say to young Canadians that we are asking them to meet the expenditures we intend to make? The ghost of this legislation will come back to haunt us. It is with us right now. I want to speak for those who will sit in this House in the years to come. They are the ones who will be penalized as a result of this government's actions.

Consider the effect of the decline in the value of the dollar. Bill C-11 provides for a further line of credit in the amount of $1.5 billion to shore up the Canadian dollar. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated he would need an additional $8.8 billion, which included some $323 million, according to his calculation, which would be needed in the present fiscal year in connection with foreign exchange transactions. The harsh reality is this: in the last month our foreign exchange reserves have been depleted by $605 million, and over the year as a whole they have been depleted by $1.67 billion. In fact we have already spent double the estimated figure in shoring up our dollar during the past month than the minister had forecast for the whole year. If that does not amount to an economic mess, the government is able to explain the inexplicable.

What will be the cost of this line of credit? Our dollar has sunk roughly 13 cents against the American dollar. To what level has it sunk as against the German mark or the Japanese yen? It is a minimum of 20 per cent and it is as high as 30 per cent. That is the legacy of the government, not for today alone but for the future. That is the outlook which tomorrow's Canadians will have to face, in addition to the bleak economic outlook foreshadowed by the Economic Council.

There are provisions in Bill C-11 which I commend. First, there is the general tax cut of $100 for every taxpayer. I am pleased that the government should at last have followed the advice put forward by the official opposition in this regard. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) chuckles when I say that. But I well remember spokesmen for this side advising the government constantly to that effect.

In its second recommendation, on page 87, the Economic Council said:

> We recommend that over the next two fiscal years the federal and provincial governments implement permanent personal income tax cuts which would increase the annual disposable incomes of consumers by a total of $2 billion in addition to reductions resulting from indexation.

The council goes on to say that this would result in a reduction of approximately 8 to 10 per cent in personal income tax. Mr. Speaker, we cannot think of tax cuts in isolation. We must also think in terms of reducing expenditure. When I took part in the debate on the address I drew the attention of the government to a number of areas in which I believed significant savings could be achieved. I pointed out at that time that the government's advertising budget, telling Canadians about all the good things it was doing, might well be trimmed considerably. Today, the government is the largest single spender of advertising dollars in Canada.

[Mr. Epp.]

If the government and, indeed, the opposition are serious about the need for savings, let us organize a write-in campaign inviting Canadians to get in touch with the government and suggest areas in which expenditure can be reduced. They could draw attention to evidence of waste in the public sector and we could ask the government to follow up their suggestions. As I travel to and from my riding—I am sure other members have the same experience—members of the public constantly call my attention to examples of waste and needless expenditure. They ask, "Why can't you people cut this out?" I have no doubt a great many helpful suggestions would be made if we were to introduce a program of the kind I have mentioned, suggestions which would lead to the elimination of a great deal of the waste which is now taking place on a daily basis. I think we would be surprised at the amount of saving which could be produced. I have only one misgiving: it is the fear that the government would create yet another bureaucracy to administer such a scheme and succeed in spending more money than was saved!

As I say, the tax cuts are commendable. As to the tax cuts proposed for the corporate sector, no matter how we cut economic pie permanent productive jobs are created by the private sector, not by the government. No doubt many of the jobs in the government sector are necessary, but they take from the public rather than produce. So the tax cuts for the corporate sector which the bill proposes should remain.

There has been a lot of argument about the capital gains tax, both in favour and against. The government went half way in the assessment of capital gains and a rollover can now occur in a family farm or small business. The principal owner or owners can sell the farm or small business and buy a larger unit without its being assessed as a capital gain. In other words, it is a deferred capital gain.

In view of the situation existing in farming areas, where the average age of Canadian farmers is between 58 and 60 years of age, and since sons or daughters or known kin have difficulty in taking over a farm, I suggest that the government should give a farmer, or for that matter the owner of a small business, the right to transfer once during his lifetime the assets of a farm or corporation to close family members. I believe that in that way we can keep small businesses in the hands of families and keep farms in the hands of young farmers who want to continue to farm. I think those of us who come from farming areas have met young farmers who would like to see this happen.

Because of the government's voracious appetite in the past for money to meet its expenditures, it has now gone beyond the point of fair taxation to the level of confiscation. The government is now confiscating what is rightfully the property of private Canadian citizens. This confiscation takes place at the farm, it takes place in business, and especially in small business with the plethora of regulations which have to be followed. But I believe confiscation also takes place among people of minimum income, and I should like to state a case to prove this point.

Canadians serving abroad for service organizations who do not receive an income from those service organizations but only an allowance—I am glad to see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) in the House because this pertains to his department—are assessed 25 per cent of all income received from Canadian sources. I have before me the tax file of a certain person who served abroad for two years. He was a Canadian who received an allowance for living expenses and shelter, but very little beyond that. He had a little money in a bank in Canada, and his earnings were under $1,000. Guess what the government took out of that $1,000, Mr. Speaker? It deducted 25 per cent, almost $250, of his earnings for the year.

I know what the government's reaction to that will be. It will simply say that beyond a certain level there are people trying to get tax shelters, hence the 25 per cent. I understand that, but surely there is a limit, especially when Canadians are working abroad and, I suggest, contributing to our foreign aid commitment to the developing world. I submit this section of the Income Tax Act should be re-examined and amended. The fact of the matter is that there is no way any member of the House can justify confiscation of this kind.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): He was earning a salary over there, was he not?

Mr. Epp: The Minister of National Revenue says, "He was earning a salary over there, was he not?" The fact is that he was not. It is because these people are not earning a salary that the 25 per cent is deducted. If they were earning a salary, then the deduction would be based on the salary they received.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I just wanted to clarify that.

M. Epp: Since the government is so keen to generate new enterprise in the economy, I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is in the House, will take note of a suggestion I wish to make, and that before too long we will see some positive results. I believe there is a tremendous future in a specific industry in this country. I refer to the mining in Canada of cesium, lithium and tantalum.

Tantalum Mining, which is owned by Chemalloy of Toronto, has laid claim to cesium deposits in northeastern Manitoba. It is generally recognized that in that part of Manitoba, which is in my riding in the area of Lac du Bonnet and Lake Bernic, approximately two thirds of the world's known cesium deposits are located. Roughly 30 per cent are located in Rhodesia, and in view of what is happening in that country I think we can say that that supply of cesium is at best doubtful at this moment. The remaining portion is located in other countries, but roughly two thirds lies in northeast Manitoba.

About the only country which has been buying cesium has been the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This government placed cesium on the export control list and it is not being exported any more. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not questioning the rightness or wrongness of that decision, but I would point out that this has been a body blow to this mining operation in my riding and to any attempt to create jobs, especially in the base metal industry.

Why I say to the government that I am not questioning the decision to place cesium on the export control list is that it is believed that the Soviet Union is using it for aerospace propulsion purposes. I do not argue that point. What I am arguing is this, that cesium is known to have qualities that make it suitable for use in high technology industries, and frankly we have not researched this area at all. I would ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to take a look at the situation because I believe that this is an area where Canadians could become leaders, particularly since we have the advantage of substantial cesium deposits.

I am not an expert on cesium and I doubt whether any member of the House is, but experts tell me that potential uses of cesium lie in the fields of electronics, ceramics, aerospace propulsion, as I have already mentioned, and power generation. Further, it can be used in the manufacture of photomultiplier tubes, vacuum tubes, scintillation counters, magnetometers, infra-red lamps, and pharmaceutical goods.

The point I want to make is that a lot of research is needed in this area. But instead of putting research money into this industry, what we have done is simply to clamp export controls on the product. One hon. member made the point the other night that there is a greater potential for job creation not in the development of resource metals but rather in high technology fields. Here, Mr. Speaker, is an opportunity. But I offer one caution which is based on long experience of disappointment as a western Canadian. Although we want to see research and development in this area, I would tell the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who comes from the same general area of the country as I, that we would like to see jobs created in this particular industry in our area. If there is a manufacturing opportunity here, we would like to see it encouraged in our area.

I am not being selfish, Mr. Speaker. I base my argument on the fact that although in western Canada we have agricultural commodities and natural resource based industries, we must now move toward a more mature secondary economy. There is a possibility right here which I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will investigate. Certainly I would be willing to co-operate with him in any way I can.

In this day and age of shortages of energy, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is at the present time developing a pilot plant using cesium which, as I understand it, produces greater efficiency in the burning of coal. Statistics indicate they have gone from a 40 per cent efficiency rate to a 60 per cent efficiency rate, and this is still in the format stage. I suggest to the government that if it is necessary to put this under export controls or on the controls list, and the reasons are valid, I accept that. On the other hand, let us move forward and be the leaders in this area.

There is one other matter I want to mention regarding Bill C-11 which concerns itself primarily with Section 143, identified with communal organizations. For some time in this House there has been a debate raging back and forth regarding how best and how fairly we should tax a communal organization, and I have especially in mind the Hutterites of Canada.

Having spoken to them I simply want to state they generally find Section 143 acceptable and fair. They have questions specifically regarding the age of 18 being used for calculating the time an individual enters the work force. The Income Tax Act in respect of all other Canadians relates to the time they actually enter the work force rather than a chronological age. However, I believe that matter is of relatively insignificant importance.

The other matter the Minister of Finance should look at in some detail in the future is that of distribution of wages and whether or not these communal people should be allowed, as are other farmers, to stipulate a certain amount of wages as having been paid to family members. As I understand the situation, that is not possible under Section 143.

In conclusion I want to say that this country has great potential, and I have mentioned one in my own area, but two things must happen. We must have economic leadership and a total turn-around of the kind of spending the government has been doing. That is the first thing that must happen. We must leave more money in the pockets of Canadian taxpayers, whether they be the wage earners or those in corporations, in order to generate enthusiasm and confidence in our economy. Frankly, the government is not able to do that. This government has frittered away the potential of Canadians and, particularly, the future of our young people. The potential is there and hope can be restored. But the government is bereft of hope and has shown a complete lack of leadership. For that reason it should be condemned, and condemned also for its economic policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the presentation of tax bill C-11 because of its many good qualities. I suggest it will help the people on low incomes and will encourage further development on the part of the resource industries. It will help people in regard to life insurance, foreign investment, and capital gains.

I have listened with great interest and have read a number of the speeches by my former colleagues in the House during this debate, and I can say that some were good and some were bad. Those that were good were more concerned about the country, while the bad ones were more concerned about the political fate of the members making them.

It was interesting to note that at the very recent convention in Quebec City members opposite were so afraid in respect of leadership that they were not allowed to discuss anything but support for their leader. No policy discussions took place or were voted upon. It was a unique experience, I am sure, for the Conservative party. I am certain that I was missed only by a number of members of the press, but my attendance at that kind of a convention would have been completely out of place because my concern has always rested with the country.

An hon. Member: They never asked for you once, Jack.

Mr. Horner: I appreciate that, but I want to make it abundantly clear that my concerns have always been directed in respect of the good of the country and not the question of whether the leadership was strong enough to withstand some diversity of opinion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I was rather shocked during the debate this afternoon on the question of privilege that arose, as I have been shocked by the debate that has taken place in the House of Commons this week and last. The only conclusion I can draw is that in the absence of that right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Conservative party has attempted to ride to power on the backs of the Mounties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: That is shameful.

Mr. Horner: I would point out particularly that they have been doing this when that right hon. gentleman, who has always been a great defender of the RCMP, was absent from the House. He would not condone that sort of action.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should just like to bring to the attention of the House that the right hon. gentleman has not been feeling well, with the result he has not been in the House for the last two or three days. Otherwise he would have been here.

Mr. Horner: I never implied for a moment that the right hon. gentleman was absent because he was asked to stay away by the whip of that party or anyone else. I just said that had he been here hon. members over there would have been given better advice. They would not have been attacking the RCMP and we would not have heard members from that side hollering, "Lay charges against the RCMP".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like you to have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) tell us the clause of Bill C-11 to which he is addressing his remarks.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) commenced his remarks with his thoughts about the question of order raised after the question period. I felt that I should enjoy the same privilege, and it is in that vein I made my comments.

I should also like to say, in equating the good with the bad, that I could not help but note hon. members' love affair with René Lévesque as displayed at the convention in Quebec City. I for one do not think this will gain them much support in the province of Quebec. I would suggest again that, if the right hon. gentleman had been at that convention, hon. members opposite would have received better advice on that occasion too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I was also interested in the remarks regarding our competitive position in the world. There is no question about the fact that Canada faces some severe economic problems. We are having difficult economic times, there is no doubt about that. We are having these problems partially as a result of the maturing of Third World countries. Many of them have more money today than ever before. They are purchasing the results of many technological advances in the developed countries. They are putting those technological advances to work in such a way—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The minister has the floor and we are here to listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: As a result of these advances by Third World countries severe pressure has been placed on the mineral industries of the North American continent. This has also placed severe pressure in respect of commodities which can be manufactured in low wage countries, and I am thinking particularly of the textile industry. This new-found wealth of the Third World countries is coming to the fore and we are entering a period of new maturity in the world.

This can be coupled with severe pressure in Canada and the United States resulting from the high inflationary period we have just experienced. This high inflationary period was certainly not the fault of this government or the result of its policies.

The question of the OPEC nations and their ganging together to bring about higher world energy costs is a problem which is giving Canada some difficulty in its ability to compete abroad.

The hon. member for Provencher referred to the fact that somehow or another he wanted further tax cuts. When reading a column from Dian Cohen, he acknowledged that something like 80 per cent of the federal government's revenue was already allocated, and that something like a little over 70 per cent is already allocated to paying for the debt and that portion which has been divided up and sent out to provinces as statutory payments of one form or another for commitments to which this country and this government have been long pledged. The 80 per cent figure is quite right. The hon. member deplored the national debt. He did not offer any real solution, but he suggested that the over expenditures of the government have placed Canadian individuals in a pretty severe position.

I should like to refer to some OECD figures from 1968 to 1976. Personal consumption expenditures have increased by 56 per cent. In other words, Canadian taxpayers or wage earners have 56 per cent more to spend today than they had in 1968. That might be considered as their disposable income—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is that constant dollars?

Mr. Horner: Yes, it is 1971 constant dollars. Referring to the same set of figures for the same period, government expenditures for goods and services have risen 41 per cent. So, personal income has actually risen higher than government expenditures.

Mr. Clarke: Do you like it over there now?

Mr. Horner: Well, I certainly do. Thank you for asking the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I will tell you why.

I listened to the hon. member for Provencher talk about our poor competitive position. He referred to all of the wasteful things the government has done over the past years to put us in that poor competitive position. Let me list a few of them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: I should like to start off with the item allowing public servants the right to strike. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) spoke in this debate, and he suggested that some new method must be found to take away the right to strike. When I was on the other side of the House, I spoke on that and I said it was wrong. But I could not convince the members of the Conservative party that it was a wrong way to be going in 1967. The hon. member for Provencher and this party supported that idea. That put us in a difficult competitive position with the United States.

Mr. Epp: Who proposed it?

Mr. Horner: Let me talk about the guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Epp: Who proposed that?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Provencher has had his say. It is my turn now. In 1969 I fought the guaranteed annual income, when the now leader was a speech writer for the former leader. At that time they both advocated it was absolutely necessary for Canada. They were big promoters of the idea.

Take a look at unemployment insurance in 1971 when the government of the day brought it in. It felt that it was necessary to bring it in for those people who could not find work. I urged the then Conservative party to vote against it. They did not have the guts to stand up and vote against it in 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I am perfectly happy to have left such a party. In 1972 the Conservative party campaigned across the country, but that party did not have the guts to assess anything. It was the same situation when the Conservative convention was held in Quebec City. The Conservatives did not have the guts to assess anything that was real.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member talked about indexing pensions and salaries. That puts us in a difficult competitive position with the United States. What party advocated it to begin with?

Mr. Kempling: Who indexed them? You indexed them.

Mr. Horner: That party over there.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This party.

Mr. Horner: Let us talk about the capital gains tax. I spoke out against indexing, against the increase in unemployment—

Mr. Kempling: Who did in the Liberal government?

Mr. Horner: Was that great leadership on your side when your party did not have the brains to advise the government that it was wrong?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Provencher spoke out against capital gains tax. What party did not have the guts to speak out about capital gains tax at that time? His party.

Mr. Epp: Are you going to oppose it now?

Mr. Horner: I spoke out against it. I spoke out against capital gains tax. I said it was wrong.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It appears as if this is going to be a long debate. We will all have our turn. The hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has the floor.

Mr. Paproski: Keep your cool, Jack.

Mr. Horner: Hon. members opposite talk about the excessive wage increases which have been made. I remember one in particular which occurred a few years ago in regard to the grain handlers and the grain companies of western Canada. It was indicated that they were going to receive a 60 per cent wage increase, and the grain handlers indicated that it was 49 per cent, or something like that. I nearly begged the Conservative party to bring in an amendment—

Mr. Clarke: We can hear the tears flowing now.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Paproski: Calm down.

Mr. Horner: Hon. members opposite asked me why I am happy over here. I have decided to tell them why. I begged that party to stand up and move an amendment, but they did not have the guts. When one looks at their convention in Quebec City, it is evident that they have not acquired the guts since.

Mr. Clarke: They didn't ask for you once, Jack.

Mr. Horner: At no time did Conservative members advocate that any of the social benefits, which the government brought in and which increased the costs, should be curtailed. In one speech an hon. member mentioned the minimum wage and how high it was in comparison to the United States. When I was in the Conservative party, I spoke in the House of Commons and asked the government not to raise the minimum wage.

Mr. Paproski: What did they do?

Mr. Horner: They followed the advice of the gutless Conservative party which moved amendments to raise the tariff.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: A gutless government.

Mr. Horner: Well, the government did not take all the advice of the Conservative party at that time. They did not accept your amendments.

Mr. Kempling: You have crossed the floor, Jack. Don't make any more excuses.

Mr. Horner: I am not making excuses. I want to state the facts correctly and not leave false impressions.

Mr. Kempling: Tell us about the dollar.

Mr. Horner: Hon. members opposite are asking me to tell them about the dollar. The hon. member for Provencher referred to the dollar in his speech.

Mr. Kempling: What about the balance of trade?

Mr. Clarke: What about the deficit?

Mr. Horner: There are Canadian citizens on the other side of the House betting that the Canadian dollar will go down more. They are buying American dollars, Canadians sitting on the other side of the House.

Mr. Kempling: Name them, Jack.

Mr. Clarke: Name them!

Mr. Horner: Yes, I can name some.

Mr. Paproski: Then, name them.

Mr. Horner: Naturally the government has to act in defence of that.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. minister has made a sweeping generalization. If I heard him correctly, he said that there are members on this side of the House who are making money on the falling Canadian dollar.

Mr. Clarke: That is what he said.

Mr. Blackburn: Unless he names those hon. members, of whom I am not one, then he is impugning my privilege and honesty in this House. I think the hon. minister should either retract that statement or name the hon. members to whom he is referring.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I will do neither because that is not impugning. Everyone in this House can rise and speak on this debate.

Mr. Blackburn: I have.

Mr. Horner: Good. Everyone can rise and say that they are not buying any American dollars. That is fine with me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: But many financiers are, and some of the hon. members on that side of the House are.

An hon. Member: How many on the government side are?

Mr. Paproski: Name them.

Mr. Horner: I do not have to.

An hon. Member: How long will you be in your seat?

Mr. Horner: I should like to make a correction in regard to something said by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. It is not only the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who is purporting to use figures accurately. As reported at page 721 of Hansard of November 8, 1977, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said the following:

> In the United States there is less unemployment, less inflation, and twice the real growth rate of Canada. There is a trade surplus on current account in the United States compared to a trade deficit on current account in Canada.

I am sure hon. members from this side of the House cannot run after Conservative members all the time in order to correct what they have said. In reading over the debate, I felt I should make that correction.

We have a commodity trade surplus in Canada in 1977, which will be in the neighbourhood of $2.6 billion.

Mr. Kempling: You said "current account".

Mr. Horner: Yes. We have a current account deficit of between $4 billion and $5 billion.

Mr. Kempling: It is $6 billion.

Income Tax

Mr. Horner: I should like to give the hon. member the facts about the American current account deficit. In 1976 they had a $14 billion current account deficit. In the first half of this year they had an $8 billion current account deficit. That is current account. Their commodity trade account is much worse than that. They do have some money coming in from various countries in the world.

• (1642)

Mr. Orlikow: Some?

Mr. Horner: Some, yes.

Mr. Orlikow: A great deal.

Mr. Horner: A great deal; well, I am not going to get into the relativity of a great deal and some. It is true that they have more than Canada has, but they have a great deal worse commodity trade than we have. We have a trade surplus. They have minus something in the neighbourhood of over $20 billion for the full year of 1976, and their current account deficit, including revenue coming in from servicing of loans abroad, is over $8 billion for this year alone. Where the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton got his figures or that idea in his head is beyond my imagination.

The hon. member for Provencher wanted to hold out a little bit of hope after squandering all his with his party. Let me hold out a little hope.

Mr. Epp: You squandered it for me.

Mr. Horner: We are major exporters of energy. We have a great capability of becoming energy self-sufficient.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): We are net importers of energy.

Mr. Horner: That is what we are now. I said we have a great capability of becoming energy sufficient. I am glad I cleared that up in the hon. member's mind. We have a far greater capability of becoming self-sufficient in energy than the United States has. That should give any Canadian a great deal of hope and confidence. We are slow in developing some of our coal mines. That is one aspect which could be improved.

Mr. Blackburn: Especially in Cape Breton.

Mr. Horner: Especially in Cape Breton because of the costs, and I think I should say perhaps because of the "inappreciability" of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job. That is a serious accusation.

Mr. Blackburn: What's that?

Mr. Horner: Read it in Hansard.

The coal mining industry has suffered severely in Cape Breton. It has not suffered quite as badly as the fluorospar industry in the southern part of Newfoundland. However, we can expand our coal markets considerably.

I note that the hon. member from Hamilton has left, but he has been deeply concerned about STELCO's ability to bid on the pipeline. STELCO uses about 9 million tons of coal a year. We would like to see it moved from western Canada if necessary, or from the maritimes, if possible. Ontario Hydro uses about 10 million tons of coal. We would like to see that coming from either western sources or maritime sources. Nine million tons plus ten million tons make 19 million tons. About 28 million tons are mined today, so that gives us some appreciation of the hope for growth in the mining industry and the coal mining industry in Canada if we could service our own markets.

I readily admit that we are too dependent upon the Japanese market with regard to coal. The Japanese can turn our coal mines on or off at will, depending upon their steel industry and their supply. We are going to meet severe competition from Australia as well. In 1976 we exported to Japan $624 million worth of coal, more coal than grain in dollar value. Not many Canadians are aware of that. So we are not without hope with regard to the mining industry and the coal mining industry.

We have the capability to export some uranium. We have the capability to build a huge pipeline over the next few years, and I disagree with the Economic Council's report at page 75. I do not think the Council knew of all the projects which are on the books to go ahead within the next four or five years. That $10 billion pipeline project will create over 125,000 man-year jobs in Canada alone. Naturally I would like to see much of the steel developed here in Canada. Naturally I would like to see many of the turbines used to move the gas through that pipeline developed and built here in Canada. We have that capability, and my department will certainly be making every effort to make sure that there is a huge Canadian content. However, let us not fool ourselves. We must remain competitive, because it is to our advantage to keep the overruns below 135 per cent.

There is a major dam going ahead in British Columbia. Within the next five years it is going to cost in the neighbourhood of $1.2 billion. These are tremendous projects. Personally, I think the Alberta government should go ahead with some major dams in that province. There is the capability to do so, and there is a need for water. I often say that in Canada we have one third of the fresh water supply in the world. I have often said that; I hope we have.

However, when I consider that the United States has 48 million acres under irrigation and we have less than one million acres under irrigation, I cannot say to myself that we are using our water wisely. It comes under the jurisdiction of provincial governments, not that of the federal government, to initiate dam construction. However, that contributes considerably to the hope all Canadians can have.

There is a $600 million Husky heavy oil production plant on the drawing boards, and we hope the difficulties can be ironed out. This plant is to be located near Lloydminster, if the two provinces can get together.

A $600 million heavy oil plant is to be built by Pacific Petroleum near Hardisty. A third tar sands plant is to go ahead as soon as the necessary deals can be drawn up. I will be surprised if it costs less than the one just completed. The one just completed is on schedule and within budget, but its estimated cost is $2 billion. Tremendous expenditures are going to be made in the near future. Added to that the James Bay project is to be completed. We have a 200-mile fishing limit which gives to—

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, would the minister entertain a question?

Mr. Horner: I would rather do so after I am through, but if the hon. member wants to, he can go ahead.

Mr. McKinnon: Do I take it from the minister's remarks that he has moved away from the position he adumbrated two years ago, that our problems with the OPEC countries would be over if we withdrew our support from Israel?

Mr. Horner: If we withdrew our support from Israel our problems would be over? Is the hon. member suggesting that I advocated that two years ago?

Mr. McKinnon: I am saying that.

Mr. Horner: Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Martin: Yes.

Mr. Horner: That is news to me and to many other people, but if the hon. member can come up with a bug which was on my telephone or on his, or if he can find that information from a tape recording or from Hansard, I would be glad to look at the authenticity of his remarks.

To get back to where I was, we have just acquired rights to a 200-mile fishing limit on the east and west coasts. The harvesting of that 200-mile fishing limit will be a tremendous challenge to our shipbuiding resources and our processing industry. I would like to see that challenge met as soon as possible. We have the capability to harvest that tremendous yield. This has great potential and raises great hope in the maritimes and on the west coast. There will no doubt be difficulties, but Canada is becoming the world's largest exporter of fish. With that 200-mile fishing limit we can hold that position and better it substantially.

There are great challenges for Canadians in the pulp and paper industry. If we are to hold our present percentage of world production of pulp and paper, we will have to spend $15 billion in the next 20 years. There is tremendous growth potential in that industry, and to take advantage of that potential we will have to spend a lot of money. I like to think that we could facilitate further growth of that industry on both coasts and in the north.

I look at the petrochemical development in Alberta, in Sarnia and Montreal, and I see a great potential for industrial growth in Alberta in by products arising out of the petrochemical industry. I am fully confident that markets can be found for the growth in the petrochemical industry.

I think too of the tremendous potential in South America, of Canaven, the railroad for which Canada and Spain are forming a consortium. It is a tremendous venture which will create many manufacturing jobs in Canada. There are requirements for Canadian steel which can only lend hope to the Canadian steel industry and the manufacturing industries.

I look upon the potential, great hydro projects in Brazil on which Canadian companies are bidding. These are the largest projects in the world outside the Soviet Union. Four gigantic hydro electric projects are on the drafting boards and Canadian engineering technique is in the bidding.

Mr. Paproski: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not know that Canada has four of the largest multinational companies in Brazil today. In fact, we are big in Brazil—bigger than the hon. member is in Edmonton.

Mr. Paproski: What is the price of coffee in Brazil?

Mr. Horner: I think of the potential at Canada's door today in world trade. In Algeria, a small country which is coming into wealth because of oil and gas, we have just signed an agreement to export $400 million worth of credit—to export Canadian goods to Algeria, a $400 million revolving fund over three years. What I am saying is that $1.2 billion over the next three years of commodities to Algeria is tremendous growth. That alone will create 50,000 man-year jobs in Canada through our commitment to supply that one country in the Middle East.

An hon. Member: It is all hypothetical.

Mr. Horner: We have just signed the agreement. It is not hypothetical. It may be hypothetical in the hon. member's mind, but maybe in a couple of months we will send him over there to see it. Then he will believe it.

Canada has great potential indeed. We have been discouraged by Canadian businessmen—

An hon. Member: Yes.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member says yes, and laughs. I do not think it is anything to laugh about.

Mr. Paproski: There is no incentive to be successful in Canada and you know that.

Mr. Horner: I do not know that. There is no incentive to be successful in Canada? There is no incentive to be successful in Canada because many, many things are not in tune. Would hon. members like—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we look at Standing Order 12(3) which reads as follows:

When a Member is speaking, no Member shall pass between him and the Chair, nor interrupt him, except to raise a point of order.

I suggest we observe the rule.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, these people are not particularly bothering me. I want to put the figures for real investment in Canada on the record. In 1976 it was minus 3.2 per cent in relation to 1975. This year we are regaining what we lost in 1976 and increasing it. It will be over 4 per cent real investment in Canada this year. That is coupled with some pretty difficult situations. I am referring here to the question of national unity. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken for something like 40 minutes about the economy, and I hope that hon. members opposite will let me speak for a few minutes on national unity and the part it plays in our economy.

Yesterday morning in the Chateau Laurier I spoke to a group of international businessmen. I was quite interested in their remarks. They asked me a number of questions and gave me the rare privilege of asking them a couple of questions. I asked them if they really think that Canada's political instability has any effect on their desire to invest in Canada. Some said it did and some said it did not. The chairman of the meeting, an American, asked for a show of hands on that question.

Mr. Clarke: So you showed him yours.

Mr. Horner: The hon. member is getting smarter.

Mr. Clarke: Why don't you?

Mr. Horner: There is hope for him, even in Vancouver, and I hope he returns there soon. If he wants a ride I am going there on the 18th.

The chairman then asked for a show of hands of people who believed that the insecurity or instability due to Canada's political problems today does not threaten their desire to invest here. Five companies held up their hands. I recognized two of them but I did not see all five. I do not think it is fair to name the two I recognized, but they are big international companies. Then the chairman asked how many people in the room believed that Canada's political difficulties today, brought about by the desire of the government of one province to separate, affects their desire to invest in Canada. Mr Speaker, 120 or 130 international businessmen, everybody in that room, held up their hands. I then thanked the five businessmen who had confidence in their product and their ability to market it, for expressing their confidence, and said I recognized the problem of national unity affects our economy.

Some people parade around this country talking about decentralization in order to satisfy some who think it should be decentralized yet do not know how they want it done.

An hon. Member: Send it to P.E.I.

Mr. Horner: They do not know how they want it to be decentralized and so are not very helpful.

I know that my former colleagues on the other side of the House have probably read a lot of my speeches, and I am not afraid if they have. Never in this House of Commons have I made a speech that did not offer hope or did not offer some corrective advice to the government. In this case, Mr. Speaker, I think I should apologize because I offered more corrective advice to the official opposition than I did to the government. I offered a lot of hope, however. To my mind Canada is still the best country in which to invest. Canadians have to take more pride in their country. Canadian businessmen have to take more pride in their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Foreign investors have shown considerable pride in this country. I believe our current account deficit can be turned around. I believe we can turn around the net deficit on tourism alone within a year. In that instance I believe the 90-cent dollar helps. I believe in the manufacturing world the 90-cent dollar helps. I believe that in the export of much of our produce, whether it be coal, oil, lumber, fish, wheat or anything else, the 90-cent dollar helps. If it helps in manufacturing, it helps in jobs.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): No, you have been exporting jobs.

Mr. Horner: No, I have not.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): One of our biggest exports is jobs.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I was going to end my remarks, but I still have some time so I will deal with that question. Let me talk about the auto pact and about the mines INCO is starting in Guatemala and Indonesia.

● (1702)

First, we have not been exporting nearly the number of jobs which the leader of the New Democratic Party suggests. We have a net surplus of end products of $1.5 billion.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And a deficit on parts.

Mr. Horner: That is right, but a lot more jobs are involved in putting the car together than in making the parts. We in fact have a balance on jobs in the automotive industry but a loss on revenue. Let there be no doubt about it. If anything, we have a balance on jobs in the automotive industry. One machine can stamp out a million parts in five days. However, those parts have to be assembled.

While we have a surplus of $1.5 billion in assembled automobiles, our deficit in parts is $2.6 billion. I am not denying that. I have stated it in the House. However, on the job factor, we are not a loser in the automotive industry.

There is a possibility of gaining in the neighbourhood of 5,000 additional jobs in parts manufacturing without losing in the end product. We are trying to gain those jobs. If we were, as the leader of the NDP says, to equalize the parts, we might lose the surplus in end products. In that event, we would not gain anything in jobs. That is one area in which there has been a misunderstanding. Let me now talk about the other one.

Mr. Blackburn: What about research and development?

Mr. Horner: Research and development is a very important part of Canadian manufacturing life. While it is not as great as it should be, that is because the size of our market is not as much as it should be. We have only 23 million in relation to 230 million people.

Let me get to INCO and the nickel industry. It has been alleged that the Export Development Corporation exported jobs because it loaned money to INCO to build a nickel mine in Guatemala. Recalling from memory, I believe the total expenditure involved in opening that mine was $224 million. EDC loaned $20 million for the purchase of equipment in Canada, less than 10 per cent of the total expenditure of opening that mine. It would have been opened had we loaned the money or not. That $20 million loan created 1,200 man-year jobs, 90 per cent of them in Ontario.

The building of the mine in Indonesia was an attempt by INCO to get into the Japanese Market, something they have not been able to do. The total expenditure in Indonesia was over $800 million. EDC and my department loaned $57 million for the procurement of equipment in Canada, again less than 10 per cent. That mine would have gone ahead whether EDC got into it or not. The loan of $57 million created 3,400 man-year jobs in Canada, mainly in Ontario.

My friend opposite suggests we are exporting jobs when in fact we are creating jobs by the purchase of equipment in Canada and establishing confidence that the buyer will be able to pay for that equipment.

An hon. Member: Tell that to the unemployed.

Mr. Horner: I will tell it to the employed and the unemployed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say I will tell it to the employed and the unemployed, and I know the hon. member will be joining the ranks of the unemployed very soon.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to devote my time to the bill; however, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has raised several issues. He referred to wiretapping and interference with the RCMP. If the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) were here, he would have a different approach. He would have plenty to say about wiretapping and interference with the mail. Contrary to what the minister said, our attack has been mostly on the government security group, not the RCMP.

The minister also talked about the right to strike. I hope this government will bring in—

Mr. Horner: You would not be brave enough to support it.

Mr. McKenzie: Every time we speak, he clears out. I hope he reads Hansard tomorrow. The minister referred to indexing of pensions. That was not meant as a permanent cure-all for all of Canada's problems. We recommended indexing of income tax because the Liberal government is taking far too much money from the Canadian people. That is something that has to be reviewed. Once again the minister was misleading the House.

The minister made a strong point about the fact he could not always get his way in the Conservative caucus. Nobody gets their way all the time in any caucus.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I said I was glad I left.

Mr. McKenzie: I will say what I have to say whether you are here or not. The minister got across a lot of his issues when he was here. We supported him on many of them. However, he certainly did not convince the Liberals to implement any of his recommendations. I never saw him voting with the Liberals at any time while he was on this side. I hope he can convince them now on some of these issues.

The minister does not have to give us a lecture on how great this country is. We know how great it is. It is this government that is bad. I challenge him to produce any newspaper, report or document that supports this government. I have not found a single one.

I understand that at the business conference the minister attended in Toronto, he asked a group of businessmen for a show of hands on whether they had faith in this country or would move out of the country. Very few businessmen or investment people will advertise they are leaving. They just go away quietly. You only find out later.

When you read some of the minister's comments, you find that he does not have too much credibility. One comment in particular was made on January 8, 1976, referring to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I quote:

> Stopping him is the duty of every Conservative in Canada. It is the task of every Canadian who cares about the freedom and prosperity of our land.

In another comment on March 10, 1977, he said:

> Do you really think I should lower myself to be in the same party as Transport Minister Otto Lang, who has ruined not only the nation's transport system but its grain industry too?

There are many other comments. I will get to them at another time. In every newspaper and business report across the country, the heading of a story starts off with such headlines as "The economy: a mess". I quote from one article:

> The Canadian economy is in very poor condition. If it continues to function along the same lines it will be in even worse condition in five years.

That is the gloomy finding of the Economic Council of Canada in its fourteenth annual review. It goes on to list all the failings of the government.

This afternoon I received a news release from the Information Division, Department of Finance. It was issued November 7, but just reached my office this afternoon. Apparently the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is concerned about this bill. He says that it is a complex bill and he wants us to pass it with despatch, having regard to its importance. There is one sentence here I do not understand. The minister stated:

> To a considerable extent, the economy depends on business confidence.

We are not concerned about business confidence in the country but confidence in this government. That is our problem. The business community and Canadians in general do not have any confidence in this government. I intend to go into that in detail.

We fully support the personal income tax provision in this bill. We have been calling for that for many years. As usual, it takes the Liberal government five to ten years to start taking action on most issues.

● (1712)

The minister, in his release, also referred to investment incentives. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that these incentives no longer mean anything in this country. Businessmen do not trust the government and are not taking advantage of the incentives—I shall refer to that subject in some detail in a few moments.

There is one paragraph I should like to read from the latest report of the Economic Council. It is in section 4 with reference to savings, investment and capital flows. It states:

> The main source of economic expansion, employment growth, and improvement in the quality of life is investment, not only in the manufacturing sector, but also in such areas as education and training, health, protection of the environment, and basic research. Investment also promotes technological advances without which expectations of an ever-rising standard of living would falter. Traditionally, Canadian industry has counted heavily on infusions of new capital to enlarge its productive capacity and to create the potential for a greater supply of output.

Unfortunately, Canadians have now become the largest investors in the United States and investment in Canada has been falling off by the hundreds of millions of dollars, a clear indication that both Canadians and foreigners have no faith in this country or in this government. There is evidence to support that statement fully.

On page 79 of the report in a section headed "Structural Problems", there is a sentence which reads: "The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has for some years been working on an over-all industrial and investment strategy for Canada but this plan has not been fully articulated."

I wish the minister were here now to explain the delay in implementing this plan. There will not be anything left to implement in this country if he does not get busy and start talking to the business community and the investors in order to find out what needs to be done to keep them in this country. Maybe the minister is not aware of this plan. I do not know. He and the Prime Minister have informed the House that they are free enterprisers and will not be standing in the way of business and investment money leaving Canada. It is little consolation for the taxpayers who must suffer the consequences of this readiness to allow the flow to continue, this disposition to do nothing about it. I want to ask the minister when he proposes to begin having regular meetings with people in the business and investment community to get to the root of this problem.

Today I cannot pick up a newspaper without finding in it a devastating attack upon the government. Here is one example: "Canadian investment in the U.S. Up Again—Trend May be Irreversible". I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce gets busy with this great plan of his. He should see what he can do to keep this investment money in Canada.

As for the Minister for DREE (Mr. Lessard) and the Minister of Employment (Mr. Cullen), who is becoming better known as the minister of unemployment, their hands are tied. How can they cope with unemployment and get businesses developed in various parts of Canada while this massive outflow of enterprise and investment continues? There is no way in which job creation programs or short term make-work programs can take up the slack in the face of this massive exodus of business and investment money. I certainly hope that the two ministers I have mentioned will speak out in cabinet in an effort to get the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce off his butt and taking constructive action with regard to this serious problem.

Here is another news story which came to my attention. The headline reads: "Failing Canada in Economy Was Once an Object of Envy". In this article, provided by the New York Times service, we read:

The Canadian economy was once envied for its glowing health. No longer. Nearly a million Canadians are out of jobs and those who are working find their pay cheques buying less and less. Even Canadian industrialists, let alone foreign investors, are finding this country an unattractive place to keep their money. A leading Japanese businessman relates that when he suggested a joint venture here his prospective Canadian partner proposed they locate the enterprise in the United States instead.

We in this country are the largest boosters of the United States economy. To show the seriousness of this flight of investment money may I go into a little more detail? It is very difficult to track it down. We hear about some of these businesses which are leaving, but we do not hear about all of them.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on Monday, October 3. It is prepared by a financial expert in Winnipeg who took the time to compile detailed information on the businesses he was assisting to leave the country. Imagine the picture which would result, Mr. Speaker, if we consulted half a dozen investment counsellors in each province to get detailed information about the number of businesses contemplating leaving for the United States. This article drew attention to the fact that 19 of his clients intended to invest about $40 million outside Manitoba over the next five years and that the loss of this investment would cost the province about 4,000 jobs. Mr. Speaker, there is no way in which the minister will be able to stop this trend.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

The financial expert who compiled these figures points out that even if these clients received tax deductions and the like, they still would not remain in this country because they did not trust the government and did not like the political climate. For these reasons they would not make any long term investments here. This is why it is of great importance that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce get on with his plan before it is too late.

The name of the financial expert to whom I have referred is Peter Jerch of Peter Henry Jerch and Associates. He says the trend has been going on for some time. Mr. Speaker it is not possible to stop such a trend overnight. Mr. Jerch says that countries, or, for that matter, provinces which have nationalistic, leftist, or extremely strong bureaucratic tendencies make striving and successful entrepreneurs feel uncomfortable. Well, they feel very uncomfortable in Canada today and that is why so many of them are leaving for the United States. Even the tax incentives which we will be asked to approve in the bill before us will have very little effect.

Mr. Jerch goes on to say that Canadians are amongst the most aggressive foreigners in the U.S. acquisitions market. In fact Canada rated as the most active foreigner investor last year. He also points out that the vast majority of such investments or acquisitions are never reported officially. They do not put advertisements in the papers when they close down their businesses and move out. The ordinary successful businessman is shy of publicity and does not wish to disclose his business affairs prematurely.

He goes on to say:

The best climate for orderly and normal business growth is economic and social stability—

Something which is completely lacking in Canada today. He goes on—

That, together with revolutionary musings of what is to come, new regulatory boards and agencies with arbitrary powers all over the place and inability of governments to cope with the management of the economy as a whole is producing too much uncertainty about the future—and there is very little that investment money is more afraid of than uncertainty.

Canada is certainly noted for its uncertainty today. Think of the Quebec issue and separation. This is why we as a party were concerned and wanted the government to challenge the different bills being introduced by the Lévesque government, and to challenge them immediately before it was too late. But nothing has been done. All the Prime Minister talks about is a referendum, a referendum which will do absolutely nothing except chase more businesses and investment out of the country.

This financial expert goes on to say this:

To those people, government make-work projects and free-lunch programs reduce motivation and destroy the work ethic, and are a definite factor leading, among other things, to lower productivity. Investments by Canadian citizens or Canadian-owned companies into Canadian-owned active manufacturing or service companies located in Canada, if such investment is tax deductible, would, according to the smaller business, eliminate unnecessary unemployment, create a healthy economy, and lead to elimination of the dreaded four-letter government monsters (FIRA, DREE, etc.), which tend to increase inflation and create a drag on the economy through their sheer size, power, and obligatory paper work created (three letter monsters are equally at fault—AIB and GAI, to name just two).

And so on it goes in great detail, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Peter Jerch has prepared a second report which has been forwarded to me. It is based on a factual survey of 42 Canadian small and medium-sized active manufacturing and service enterprises which he has researched. Only 12 of these are looking for acquisitions in Canada only. Fifteen thought they would consider a further acquisition or investment in Canada as a second alternative, which suggests that reason tells them to go elsewhere.

Without going into all the gory details, it is hard to find the exact number of jobs this situation will cost, but the number lies between 4,300 and 13,000. So the House can see the impossible task that the minister of unemployment, or I should say employment, has, as well as the minister in charge of DREE, in trying to cope with this mass exodus of business and investment money.

In the eastern United States business complexes are being built to assist businessmen to move across the line. In the Grand Forks area of North Dakota the economic situation in Canada is being taken advantage of by making it more and more attractive for Canadians to go across the line to do their shopping. The latest press release that I have received has this to say. A $20 million shopping centre is to be built in Grand Forks and they are plotting to tap the flow of Canadian cash. This report is datelined Grand Forks, and reads:

There's a river flowing southward from Manitoba along U.S. Interstate Highway 29 that isn't controlled by the provisions of the Boundary Waters Treaty. It's a river of money.

Canadian dollars, devalued and weaker than a year ago, are still flowing south, where goods and services can be had at prices far lower than any the domestic market can offer.

People in British Columbia are also flowing across the border to do their grocery shopping. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, how bad is the situation in Canada.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had something to say about tourism. He feels it can be revived. I do not know how it can be revived. He was very critical recently of the hotel industry and he put all the blame for the falling off of tourism on the hotel industry. I have written to the people involved in the hotel and tourism industry asking for information as to whether they agree with everything the minister from Crowfoot said, and I would certainly challenge his statement. There is a little tourism in Winnipeg because we have a racetrack there. People come from Minnesota and North Dakota to visit the racetrack. If the states of Minnesota and North Dakota ever went into pari-mutuel betting, Winnipeg and Manitoba would find their tourism industry in serious difficulty. There are at least two hotels I know of in the area which would have to close down.

The government is still having difficulty controlling its own expenditure. This was highlighted at one of the committee meetings held this week. Another devastating headline in a newspaper reads "Ottawa Drags Feet on Correcting Examples of Financial Mismanagement". This is what the Secretary of State's department was accused of by a committee of MP's yesterday.

What amazes me, Mr. Speaker, is that some backbenchers in the Liberal party are asking us what we would cut. I wish they would start putting a little pressure on their own cabinet in caucus for proper accountability on the part of each government department. They could do a real job there because they are on the inside. There is no way that I can march into the Department of Supply and Services and start conducting an investigation, but members of the government party can. That would be a real challenge for them, so let them get busy and start questioning deputy ministers and see whether they can reduce their budgets by 5 per cent this year and 5 per cent next year. They would then be doing something useful instead of yelling over at us and asking us what we would cut. You cannot cut what you cannot see. I have looked at a lot of estimates of different departments and they list a lot of items under "others" and "miscellaneous". If I were asked what I would cut, Mr. Speaker, I would cut out "others" and "miscellaneous" if I were a member of the government.

It was also pointed out in committee this week that the recommendations made by the Auditor General in 1975 to improve the financial accountability of departments have not been acted upon. The members of the Public Accounts Committee complained about this, and the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), a former committee chairman, accused department officials of trying to pull the wool over our eyes by pretending to have improved financial reporting procedures.

This question was debated at great length in the House in 1975 and 1976, and we heard glowing statements from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and the then minister of finance that departments would have proper accounting procedures. I do not believe one word they say, Mr. Speaker.

According to the report I have, a senior official in the Auditor General's office responsible for monitoring the Secretary of State's department said it appears the department gave an inadequate sense of importance to its financial accountability. I would ask some of the Liberal backbenchers opposite to check that one out. This would be a good point to raise in caucus next Wednesday, and then they can tell the government what to cut.

The Economic Council has recommended a $2 billion tax break, and I am sure that if we started to have proper accounting and started to trim off the fat this recommendation could be implemented. The Economic Council also pointed out that it costs so much to produce goods in Canada that most of our industries cannot compete in world markets. Our foreign debts have grown so astronomically in recent years that foreign investors are beginning to feel uneasy about investing here. We know all about that, Mr. Speaker. Unemployment is concentrated disproportionately among Canada's young people; and the Economic Council concludes that Canada is one of the most wasteful energy consuming nations in the world.

When I hear Liberal backbenchers standing up and praising the Minister of Finance with a record like this, I know they are certainly trying to pull the wool over our eyes. The government has been in office since 1963. If hon. members opposite are so brilliant, so much on the ball, how did we ever end up in a mess like this, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister has a great habit now of blaming the people. The people are not the government. The people are not running these departments.

Let me refer to another newspaper article, although I get sick looking at them, Mr. Speaker. This one is headlined "Layoffs an Epidemic in the Land". We find press statements from all across the country about this government and its record. These are endless, Mr. Speaker.

● (1732)

I do not wish to take up any more time as I know there are others who wish to speak on this before we close at six, but I would put a challenge to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) once again. He should start immediately holding seminars and meetings with the business community. He must conduct some research and do some very detailed work in order to find out what has to be done to keep this investment in the country. Perhaps he can find out from investment counsellors. Maybe they can provide the minister with detailed information regarding investment money leaving the country. Once this trend starts there is no stopping it. My prediction is that within four years we will have between 2.5 million and 3 million unemployed in Canada.

I have put this challenge to the minister on two other occasions. He has given me no information and no answer. I hope he will take up this third challenge and will take some action which will encourage this investment money to remain in Canada.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, in the government's 1974 budget, then finance minister John Turner promised the people of Canada that tax concessions for corporations would work to solve the country's economic problems, as well as unemployment. Canadians were told that corporations would invest these windfalls to create jobs and stimulate a recession-ridden economy.

Three years and three finance ministers later, we are faced with a staggering 8.2 per cent unemployment rate and a steady decrease in the growth of our gross national product. Economic forecasters predict that Canadians are in for the longest and coldest winter since the great depression.

Yet despite overwhelming evidence that corporate tax concessions have provided neither the jobs nor the much needed stimulus our economy lacks, the government refuses to seek a new remedy for our economic woes. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the government is aware that even though the largest tax incentives have gone to manufacturing firms, manufacturing jobs have actually decreased. In the first nine months of last year manufacturers employed an average of 1,945,000 workers. This year that figure has dropped to 1,915,000. That is an actual loss of 30,000 jobs; a poor testimony to the effectiveness of tax concessions. Yet the government persists in re-introducing a bill from last March's budget that will grant the corporate sector another $1.2 billion in tax cuts, and continue to do so for another three years.

Tax concessions to large corporations have failed, and the reasons are obvious. Our economy is operating at slightly above 80 per cent of its capacity. It is only common sense to realize that corporations are not going to invest in expansion when their existing plants are already operating at 20 per cent below capacity.

Indeed there is very little guarantee that corporations will invest their tax breaks in the manner the government intends at all. In fact the evidence would suggest just the opposite. It would appear many of the beneficiaries of the government's generosity are more interested in profits than in good corporate citizenship.

I have before me, Mr. Speaker, a page from the August shareholders' report of Northern Telecom, a subsidiary of Bell Canada. It thanks the March tax incentives for "reducing our effective income tax rate to 40.6 per cent for the period in 1977 from 42.8 per cent for the first half of 1976". This company thanked its employees, whose tax dollars have contributed to their employer's profit margins, by announcing the layoff of over 1,000 workers in plants throughout Ontario and Quebec. Northern Telecom will receive over $3 million this year from the finance minister's scheme to promote job creation. I just cannot understand the logic behind this kind of financial manoeuvring.

Perhaps the most familiar example of the abysmal failure of tax concessions to provide jobs is that of INCO. INCO will have an estimated profit this year of $100 million. It will receive a tax concession amounting to $10 million, and also has deferred taxes of $378 million. These deferred taxes are, in effect, interest free loans. In addition, the Export and Development Corporation has loaned INCO $70 million at discounted interest rates to develop mines in Indonesia and Guatemala. The government expected INCO to express its gratitude by expanding its Canadian operations and hiring more Canadian workers. What INCO has done is lay off close to 4,000 workers in Thompson, Manitoba, Sudbury, and Port Colborne. The EDC loan, which has in fact aided the exportation of jobs, only adds insult to injury. Clearly, the government's policy of corporate tax concessions is not producing the desired results.

ALCAN recently laid off 400 workers in their fluorspar mining operation in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland. Company executives admitted the corporation was not losing money, it just was not making enough. This act of corporate social irresponsibility issued from a firm which stands to receive an estimated $11 million in tax concessions this year, and which has already been granted deferred taxes amounting to $180 million. ALCAN profits this year, bolstered by government tax concessions, will likely be $138.8 million. That profit is up 560 per cent from last year's $21 million.

The list of corporate abuses of tax concessions is endless, but perhaps one more example will suffice to make my point. Noranda more than doubled its assets of $871 million in 1970 to $2.093 billion in 1976. It has already received $86 million in deferred income taxes, and banked an additional gift of $5 million, courtesy of the finance minister and his predecessor's so-called job creation policies. Shortly after the tax break was announced last March, Noranda laid off 500 workers. Now it is threatening to lay off another 1,700 employees in the Gaspé.

It is clear that the government's prescription is not curing unemployment. Tax concessions are only making a bad situation worse. The government has admitted its policies are not working. As my colleague and leader of my party has noted, last summer the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was reported to have muttered that the private sector "has not taken up the slack which was provided for it in the budget". Yet, the government does not move to expand the public sector. Instead, it doggedly intends to channel $1.2 billion into a program of tax concessions that have proven completely unproductive over the past several years.

The government seems to have great difficulty pinpointing the cause of Canada's economic malaise. Perhaps that is because it has insisted on looking beyond its own doorstep, and beyond that of the multinationals like INCO, ALCAN, Noranda and Northern Telecom. Casting about for a scapegoat, it has settled on the Canadian worker. The Prime Minister has in all seriousness suggested that the problem with the Canadian economy is the lack of productivity of the Canadian people. He says that we are outpricing ourselves on world markets.

Two weeks ago in the House the Prime Minister quoted statistics designed to show that wage rates in Canada have outrun productivity, that Canada cannot compete with its main competitor, the United States. He said that Canadian workers are only 80 per cent as productive as their American counterparts in manufacturing. He also said the Canadian wage rate is 7 per cent higher than the American wage rate.

Don McGillivray pointed out in an article in the Financial Times that those statistics are seriously out of date. Statistics issued by the United States and Canadian governments in 1976 make it possible to calculate that output per employee in Canada last year was 87 per cent of the United States output, a figure which is significantly higher than the Prime Minister's 80 per cent. These figures were available to the Prime Minister, but in his eagerness to indict the Canadian workers, it would appear he has overlooked them.

On the question of wage rates the gap is even less apparent than the Prime Minister would have us believe. In May of this year the average American worker was earning $5.57 an hour in U.S. funds. The average Canadian hourly wage was $6.42 in Canadian funds. While workers are paid in Canadian dollars, exports are sold to the U.S. for U.S. dollars. So, to make a fair comparison of U.S. and Canadian wage rates, the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar must be taken into account. In comparing the Canadian wage to the U.S. dollar, the Canadian wage is reduced to $5.78 an hour. That makes the wage rate gap 3.8 per cent, and not the 7 per cent quoted by our very academic Prime Minister.

Wage rates alone are not completely indicative of an employee's cost to a manufacturer. The cost of compensation, including fringe benefits, must also be considered. In 1976 the National City Bank of New York calculated that compensation per employee costs manufacturers $7.91 an hour in the United States and $7.05 in Canada. Both of those figures are in United States funds. That puts the Canadian worker 12.2 per cent behind in compensation. When we consider the 12 per cent drop in the Canadian dollar since that time, we discover that Canadian workers are costing their employers 25 per cent less than American workers. As the McGillivray article points out, this is more than enough to counterbalance the fact that the average Canadian worker is producing about 13 per cent less than his American counterpart.

The Prime Minister made a lot of noise about the fact that we are outpricing raises and demanding higher wages, and, because wages are going up, we are not able to be competitive in foreign markets. I think the article and the statistics I have referred to will set the record straight. The Prime Minister could have used those up-to-date figures, but obviously he chose for political purposes not to use them.

The government can no longer hide behind the excuse that wage rates and low productivity are responsible for the Canadian failure to sell competitively in the United States. It must accept the failure of its economic policies, and particularly the failure of tax concessions to stimulate the economy and provide jobs.

In my home riding of Brant we have an 11 per cent unemployment rate. Last month Abex Inc. closed and Spalding announced its intention to do the same. As a result, over 500 of my constituents are now looking for jobs. I would suggest, as the New Democratic Party suggests, that the government use the $1.2 billion it presently intends to throw away on corporate tax concessions to provide jobs for these men and women. A direct job creation program could provide work and wages for thousands of the unemployed across this country.

It would be more useful if a portion of the $1.2 billion the government has earmarked for corporate coffers could be directed to socially useful capital works projects. Admittedly, such projects provide only temporary work and are not the answer to our long term needs for job creation, but with over 800,000 Canadians officially unemployed, and more than a million actually out of work, our situation is critical. Some form of positive action must be taken immediately. Job creation programs could put money in the hands of those who need it and, just as important, in the hands of those who will spend it and not save it.

Increased consumer spending is one of the keys to putting the country's economy back on its feet. The Minister of Finance recognized this in his mini-budget when he provided the average Canadian taxpayer with a $100 tax cut for 1978. But surely the Minister of Finance cannot believe that an increase in consumer purchasing power, which amounts to slightly over $2 per week per taxpayer, is adequate to provide the stimulus our business community so badly needs.

If the corporate tax concession were removed from Bill C-11, it would mean an added $1.2 billion could be channelled into a more extensive, more equitable scheme of tax cuts for the middle and low income earner. The government should note that there are four million Canadians who live below the poverty line. These people have little or no taxable income, so they are unable to benefit from the present proposals for tax cuts. Yet these are the people who most need the goods and services our business community is so anxious to supply, and who would be most likely to spend the added income they receive. For that reason, tax cuts must be made in the form of tax credits, payable whether or not a Canadian has a taxable income.

By directing most of the tax cut to those at the lower end of the income scale, the government would not only be compensating those families most affected by continuing increases in the cost of food, clothing and fuel, it would also be ensuring that the value of the tax cut would be transferred directly into the economy through increased consumer spending.

The Economic Council of Canada, in its annual report tabled this week, proposed that the government implement a more extensive program of tax cuts to stimulate consumer spending and economic growth without incurring inflation. This is the same suggestion the New Democratic Party has been making for months. The Council, which is a federally established advisory agency, made their unprecedented recommendation after predicting another five years of high unemployment, persistent inflation, large trade deficits and slow economic growth. It said that personal income tax cuts contained in the minister's mini-budget were not enough, and the situation called for an added $2 billion cut at the provincial and federal level. Yet yesterday in the House the Minister of Finance dismissed this report, a report from the government's own advisory agency, as "not responsible".

I would submit that it is the government that is not responsible. It is not responsible in continuing a $1.2 billion program of tax concessions to corporations, which is an admitted failure to begin with. It is particularly not responsible in failing to provide the kind of economic leadership this country requires, if the prediction of the Economic Council of Canada is not to become a reality.

The government must act to implement a positive recovery program in the private industrial sector. It must correct trade inequities which have been allowed to develop unchecked for far too long. Too often Canadian industries have been shortchanged in terms of distribution of jobs, investment and research and development expenditures. Only after the government acts to protect Canadian jobs can there be any assurance of a permanent increase in the manufacturing sectors, which have been hardest hit by our prolonged economic slumps. I am thinking specifically of the auto industry, but action is also needed in our long-suffering shipbuilding, textile, electrical and footwear industries.

In the auto industry alone this year Canada faces a $3 billion deficit in its parts trade. Because of inequities in the trading relationship between Canada and the United States, Canadian parts manufacturers are producing only half as many parts as there are consumed in the manufacturing of vehicles in Canada. If this situation were remedied and Canada were to obtain its fair share of North American parts production, over 20,000 new jobs could be created for Canadians.

Disappointingly, the government has failed to take any initiatives in the sectors where it is needed most. Instead, it prefers to subsidize corporations to the tune of $1.2 billion, corporations which express their gratitude by laying off thousands of Canadian workers. Failing that the government has preferred to do nothing at all. It stands idly by as thousands of auto workers, shipbuilders and textile workers lose their jobs, and then it scratches its head and wonders why.

We know why more Canadians have lost or are in danger of losing their jobs than at any other time since the great depression. It is because the government stubbornly insists on pursuing its misguided programs and rejects out of hand the alternatives which could restore the country's economic vitality.

What I have been addressing myself to in the last 20 minutes or so relates really to the same old Liberal government approach to hard times. We have been talking a lot in the past few years about injecting cash flow into the economy, and we have been suggesting that we should not put the money in at the top in an economic crisis—and, indeed, we are in a very serious economic crisis—because it does not trickle down or, if it does, it trickles down very slowly.

What we have always suggested is that the money should be injected at the bottom where it is most needed. It should be given to the 25 per cent or 20 per cent of the people of Canada, 4 million Canadians, who are below the poverty line. These people will spend the money. This will generate demand and put people back to work. Indeed, as my friends to my right argued earlier this afternoon, it will also stimulate investment. However, we cannot argue that we should stimulate investment by giving corporations huge amounts of tax concessions which in turn they use for the purpose of saving, and not re-investing to expand their facilities.

The Hon. John Turner sent out a questionnaire a couple of years ago to industries which had received tax concessions and rapid write-offs. The replies he received must have been embarrassing and disconcerting to Mr. Turner, because in fact most of the industries, or certainly a majority of them, stated that those tax concessions did not at that time result in the creation of more jobs. When plants operate at 80 per cent of 83 per cent capacity, they are not going to use that money to expand unless there is demand. That demand must come from the consumers, and if the consumers do not have sufficient cash with which to purchase goods, obviously there is not going to be demand, and there is not going to be the creation of new jobs or the putting back to work of those who are unemployed.

I do not know how much simpler it can be stated. I do not know how we can get this across to the cabinet and to the new Minister of Finance. He has inherited a mess, yet he seems also to have inherited some, if not all, of those archaic philosophies of a rather tired and worn out administration. I am not opposed, for example, to the Registered Home Ownership Plan, the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and so forth. These are plans in which people can invest money for tax deferment purposes, but who invests in those plans? They are the people making $15,000, $16,000, $18,000, $20,000, $30,000 or $40,000 a year. They are not the people whose total family incomes are $6,000 $7,000 or $8,000 a year. Those people cannot afford to take advantage of those plans. In that kind of situation we are not really helping the economy with the programs we are using.

As the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) said last evening, these plans are in effect aiding and abetting some Canadians to "save this country into a recession". Those who can afford to save are putting their money away for some rainy day. It is not going to circulate at the consumer level, at the manufacturing level or at the retail level. As much as I supported those two programs originally, I think they are coming back to haunt us now and to haunt the government, because they are drying up money. They are not putting money into the community.

My time is nearly up. I simply wish to reiterate that as far as I am concerned personally—and I am sure I speak for my party—the tax proposal to extend concessions to industry to the tune of $1.2 billion will not create the jobs we will need this winter. It is going to be a cold and gloomy winter. I do not have to say it; the economic experts have already said it.

I know that government policy as introduced in the mini-budget or the economic statement of the Minister of Finance a couple of weeks ago is not going to alleviate the major problem in this country today. That major problem is unemployment, and if it were not for unemployment insurance we would be in a revolution at this time. That is how serious is the situation.

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to say a few words in this debate this afternoon to underscore the remarks made at the outset on Monday of this week, November 7, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when he opened the second reading debate on Bill C-11 and made a strong plea for the prompt attention of this House to that bill and for its expeditious passage.

Contrary to a good deal of the rhetoric we have heard from across the way today and on other days in this debate, this legislation is important to Canadians, and particularly to farmers, small businessmen, and others in the constituency of Assiniboia. Indeed many have been in touch with me in recent days to inquiry about the progress of this bill and to urge this House to deal with it as quickly as possible.

Earlier this year, after the presentation of the budget in March, I had the opportunity to conduct a series of public meetings across a rather broad stretch of southern Saskatchewan and to talk with people in communities in very many places in southern Saskatchewan about provisions in the federal budget which specifically related to them, and about their views on the economic conditions in the country as they saw them. Those meetings were held in 11 different places at Oungre, Creelman, Estevan, Lewvan, Odessa, Avonlea, Yellow Grass, Mazenod, Crane Valley, Meyronne and Minton. They were well attended, by and large, and people were anxious to hear what the fiscal policy of the government was after the budget speech of last March.

As I explained to the House a moment ago, I took the time to outline the specific provisions of the budget that related to people living in those areas in southern Saskatchewan. The reception for the provisions in the budget was, by and large, very positive. During the spring, summer and fall I received inquiries about where those specific provisions stood as people were anxious to see them passed into law. They were disappointed that the House was not able to deal with the previous budget bills before the adjournment of the last session of parliament and they were anxious to have the assurance that the provisions detailed in March would be coming back in legislative form as quickly as the House could get to them, and would likely receive the expeditious attention of parliament.

I am anxious to see this bill dealt with as quickly as possible in the House, go through committee and be passed into law. A great many people in Assiniboia are anxious to have the tax changes proposed in the legislation put on the statute books so that they can take advantage of them.

Bill C-11 is a complicated measure, as most fiscal laws are. The essential details have been adequately outlined to the House by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), and others. I am not going to take the time of the House to go into the details, but there are a number of specifics which particularly related to my part of the country and I should like to highlight those.

First are the measures relating to small business. Small and independent business entrepreneurs are crucial in an area like Assiniboia. In that part of the country we have none of the great industrial giants or multinationals but we have a great many small independent businessmen who form, with farmers, the economic lifeblood of the villages, towns, cities and rural communities of Assiniboia and a great portion of the prairie west.

That is why I am glad to see this bill put forward a series of tax changes in at least ten different areas which will be of direct benefit to small business operators. It is not a complete package. It will have to be complemented by such measures as the CALURA amendments to ease the paper work for small businessmen and a variety of measures which the government has outlined not only in this debate but on past occasions. This legislation will require a good deal of complementary legislation.

But this bill will materially assist small businesses in the constituency of Assiniboia by improving the fundamental financial environment in which they operate. It represents a very sound and good beginning on a variety of changes with respect to small business. As the work follows this beginning, as it must and will, I expect businessmen in my constituency will have a great deal of good advice to offer on where the small business policy for Canada should lead us. In that connection I think there are a number of ways in which they can offer advice and have input into the policy formulation process.

The establishment of a special ministry with responsibility for small business is a great development, but there are two other ways in which small business operators in my part of the country will have the opportunity to present ideas and opinions and have an influence on the direction of Canadian small business policy.

The first way they will have that input is through the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. A great many business entrepreneurs in Assiniboia are members of that organization. I believe that it is largely a representative group. It is the first nationally organized voice of small and independent business operators in this country. They have done a great deal of work to prepare themselves and prepare the cases they want to make to government as a group of businessmen with particular problems and particular opportunities. I believe, by and large, they have approached their task in a constructive and positive way. That organization has a great role to play in the future in helping government develop the appropriate kinds of rules and policies with regard to small business operations.

In this regard, I was attracted the other day by a comment on a news broadcast by the president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, Mr. John Bulloch. He was commenting shortly after the speech delivered in this House on October 20 by the Minister of Finance on the economy which, of course, is embodied to a certain extent in the legislation before us.

Probably more important than the opposition's rather political commentaries on the economy are the reactions of those Canadians who actually have to make the economy go. In this connection a significant statement was made just a few days ago by Mr. Bulloch.

In reacting to the Finance Minister's October 20 statement, Mr. Bulloch had a rather extensive comment to make. He talked about the statement in the House of Commons on October 20 as being a realistic statement. He called it an honest statement. He talked about the will of Canadians to tighten their belts and get back to work. He predicted confidently in the course of the coming year that economic conditions in this country, as a result of this economic statement and other measures, are likely to show considerable improvement. In contrast to what we hear from the opposition, Mr. Bulloch's comments were sound, practical and constructive. They will do a lot more to help than the kind of ranting we hear from across the way.

[Mr. Goodale.]

Second, in addition to their involvement in organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, which is a very useful and constructive group, for the business operators of Assiniboia constituency, I have another method in which businessmen in that part of Canada will have a direct way to have an input into the development of government policy in so far as it relates to small business.

Over the course of this past summer and fall I have been exploring the idea of developing within the constituency a working committee of businessmen who would be in a position to review in an ongoing way the laws, rules, and regulations which relate to their operations. In a practical and specific way they could point out to me, and through me to the government, the ways in which they think those laws and rules and regulations could or should be changed in order to meet more practicably the particular needs of their small business enterprises.

I think, with a working group of businessmen operating in such a specific and constructive way, passing their views along to the government, we will have a very basic expression of opinion about what our policy ought to be. Such an exercise would have a rather significant impact on helping to direct government policy in that direction. I have had the opportunity to discuss that idea with both the present and the previous minister responsible for small business in the government. I believe both ministers are prepared and are indeed anxious to co-operate in an effort of that kind. When circumstances present themselves in this regard, the Minister will hear in a first-hand manner their ideas and suggestions for government policy.

As far as the present bill is concerned, there are two specific elements relating to small business, and as well to farmers, which I want to highlight in particular. First, there is the extension and the expansion of the investment tax credit. We saw in the March budget, and it is repeated in the legislation before us, the extension of that tax credit on investment provision for another three years. We have seen an increase from 5 per cent to 7½ per cent on investments in my part of the country. We have seen the percentage adjusted to take into account the regional sensitivities of the country. It is an example of how federal policy takes regional disparities into account so the available tax credit can be at different percentages in different parts of the country, depending upon the regional developmental opportunities and challenges which exist.

This example of tailoring or finetuning this legislation to take into account the differences between different regions is a very useful and positive development. It is one which I hope will be repeated in a whole variety of federal programs which require sensitivity to differences between one region and the next.

We saw another example of this not long ago in the unemployment insurance legislation which was before the House earlier this year. A number of changes were made in the unemployment insurance program, one of which was to fine-tune the national program to correspond to regional variations across the country. That was a positive thing to do in terms of making the unemployment insurance program more sensitive to regional differences, and in that sense a program with more practical effect.

We have seen as well, in the course of the last few months, a substantial upgrading of the unemployment insurance program in administrative terms. We have seen the law itself strengthened. The program has been tied more closely to a person's work record, and the whole impact of this kind of development has saved hundreds of millions of dollars for taxpayers across the country. The regional sensitivity of the program, or the effort in law to make it more sensitive was a part of that whole approach.

Bearing in mind the importance of the regionally sensitive tax credit, which is contained in this legislation, I think the House would be well advised to deal with it quickly. I say this because the legislation is of importance to a great many Canadians who want to see it on the books as quickly as possible. I, for one, have received many calls and inquiries about it from people who urge the House of Commons, through me, to get on with the bill. I applaud that measure, as do my constituents. We want to see it passed as quickly as possible.

From a personal point of view I would like to see the investment tax credits go further than is proposed in the legislation. This is an idea I should like the Minister of Finance to consider. I should like him to extend the coverage of the investment tax credits beyond the purchase of new productive facilities so as to apply not just to new investment but also to investment in such items as used farm machinery. I realize this would broaden the principle, but I believe it would constitute a worth-while change to make at this time. It would be especially timely in light of the western Canadian farm situations, because farm costs are particularly high at present and they continue to rise. Used equipment is now more attractive than it has been in the last two or three years. Moreover, many farm machinery dealers have growing inventories of used farm machinery on hand and they see the provision of an investment tax credit on used equipment, as well as on new equipment, as a means of balancing their inventories and enabling them to take greater advantage of the business opportunities presented to them.

In this regard there is a parallel if not identical precedent in the United States which we might consider following. In that country a provision of the kind I have suggested does apply to purchases of used machinery and equipment, as well as to new purchases. This is an extension of the principle which I believe we could usefully apply to Canadian law.

The second item before us in this bill which I should like to stress as being of key importance to small businessmen and farmers is the provision relating to capital gains tax. Up to the present the law has tended to stymie business or farm consolidation or reorganization. Take the case of a farmer who has all his land holdings in one particular area, except perhaps a quarter section which is located some distance from his main operation. If he were to want to sell that far quarter in order to reinvest in a quarter of land closer to his main operation he would find difficulty in doing so because on selling the far quarter the money from that sale would become subject to capital gains tax and he might not then have the cash necessary to invest in the land he wanted to buy nearer to his operation. Therefore that kind of consolidation of farm holdings was made very difficult. The same principle would apply to a small businessman who wanted to reorganize or consolidate some of his business holdings.

The provision contained in the March budget and repeated in the bill now before us takes that situation very clearly into account. It allows a farmer or small businessman to avoid payment of tax on the first sale, so long as the proceeds of the sale, to use my example of the quarter of land, are reinvested in the farming or business enterprise. That seems to be a very useful development so far as our capital gains tax law is concerned. The principles apply equally to small business. I think it represents an important improvement in the way our capital gains tax law has impacted unfavourably upon people who are engaged in this kind of enterprise.

It seems to me we have made progress in recent years in modifying the impact of capital gains tax law in certain specific cases. We have the rollover provision to protect against capital gains tax on family farms, which is certainly a desirable provision in our law. We now also have the provision I have just described, the proposed change to ease the burden on farm and small business reorganization and consolidation.

There are three other ideas into which I will not go into detail at this stage for lack of time but which I should like to mention briefly. They are ideas which I hope the government will consider as it gives continuing attention to the impact of our capital gains tax law in Canada. Again they have particular reference to small business operations and farming operations, and I hope they will be rather carefully analysed.

The first proposal that might be considered to ease the burden of capital gains tax on these two groups of Canadians is the possibility of indexing the valuation day value in cases where the capital asset involved on valuation day, which was seven or eight years ago, was at an artificially depressed value. Certainly that is the case with farmland in western Canada and with a great many of the small businesses in western Canada which rely very much on the farm economy to determine the health of their own enterprise. If the farm economy is depressed, it is likely that values and the business strength of small business operators are likely to be depressed at the same time.

Therefore I think you can make the argument that at the time of valuation day seven or eight years ago the capital assets of small businessmen and farmers in Canada could have been at an artificially depressed level. I think there is some argument to be made for indexing that value so as to bring it up to a more realistic level, thereby reducing the capital gains tax liability of farmers and small businessmen.

The second idea I have would be the possibility, which has been discussed in this House on other occasions, of a once-in-a-lifetime transfer free of capital gains tax, or at least with a reduced capital gains tax, for farmers and small businessmen. I think their enterprises are sufficiently unique and different from other enterprises in this country—certainly they are sufficiently important—to warrant the serious consideration by the government of a proposal of this kind. It would not encourage speculation or any of the other evils which the capital gains tax law is attempting to deal with if such a tax free once-in-a-lifetime provision were made. I hope that this is an idea that will receive careful consideration.

My third idea is the possibility of treating the capital investments of farmers and small businessmen just like investments which individuals can now make in such things as registered retirement savings plans. There is a serious argument to be made for the proposition that farmers or small businessmen who invest in their farm or business are making an essential capital investment, and therefore they do not have the same liquid cash to consider investing for their retirement years. Bearing in mind the unique positions of farmers and small businessmen, their investment in capital assets to make their farming enterprise or small business succeed should be treated in a similar way as investments in registered retirement savings plans are treated, and thereby, to some extent, they would be able to avoid the impact of capital gains tax.

These ideas obviously require greater elaboration and discussion. I present them as suggestions which I hope will receive careful attention. They are justifiable cases which can be made with respect to farmers and small businessmen. I hope the government will give them careful attention in the future.

The thrust of this bill is positive and constructive. It will assist Canadian economic performances in relation to small businesses, farms, and a variety of other areas about which I do not have the time to go into in detail at the moment. The examples I have cited in detail are adequate to justify the expeditious passage of this legislation through the House of Commons.

I should like to conclude with a word or two on government spending restraint and federal government spending priorities. All of us in the House support the principle of restraint in federal government spending. It is an easy principle to espouse, but it is a far more difficult principle to implement. It is a very crucial principle, and I believe the federal government will continue to make substantial progress in the implementation of it. The federal commitment to spending restraint is real and it is working. There are examples which could be cited for hours on end. The supplementary estimates tabled in the House of Commons today corroborate that the federal effort in spending restraint is a real effort and is working.

When a commitment is made to spending restraint, there has to be a selection of priorities as to where the limited number of federal dollars will be spent. That makes the selection of priorities a very tough and delicate job. I am pleased to see numbered among the highest of our priorities in this government some crucial western projects. The list is a rather extensive one, and at this stage I should like to refer to four of them. The ones I will refer to have a direct impact upon the constituency of Assiniboia. In the context of spending restraint at the federal level, they represent a continuing and important commitment to the economic interests of the western part of this country.

I am thinking, first of all, of the purchase of grain hopper cars. That was completed just this fall, to the tune of some $255 million. It was a very major undertaking by the government and a substantial investment in that type of activity, namely, the movement of prairie grain, which is fundamental to the west. That commitment has been made by the federal treasury in the context of the restraint program.

Second, I should like to mention the maintenance of the Canadian Wheat Board's initial payments on grain at largely the same levels as those existing in the last crop year. It was done despite this year's somewhat uncertain market circumstances, when some were arguing that the initial payments ought to have been lower. The government did not agree to those suggestions, and the initial payments for the current year were maintained at the previous levels. This is an important commitment of federal dollars to support grain incomes in western Canada.

The third measure I should like to mention, which runs parallel to the issue about initial payments, is the fundamental western commitment by this government in the form of the western grain stabilization plan. This plan is an enormous cash undertaking to farmers as individuals, and also to the over-all western economy. It has been said many times that a pay-out is a distinct probability for the current calendar year of 1977. A pay-out in this particular calendar year and in future calendar years in very major proportions at just those moments in time when the western grains economy needs that kind of cash injection, is a very significant kind of financial and fiscal commitment the Government of Canada has made with respect to western Canada. It has made it even in the context of an over-all restraint program, and that makes the commitment much more significant.

Finally, I would like to mention a program which began just this fall in western Canada, but it will accelerate more and more next year as we see it going forward. I am particularly referring to the major federal program of rail rehabilitation all across western Canada. There is not a more fundamental aspect to the economic welfare of the west than the issue of transport, and the question of grain transport in particular. In the past we have had a very difficult grain transportation situation as rail equipment and roadbeds themselves were deteriorating year after year.

The Government of Canada has recognized a very fundamental commitment to inject federal dollars in investments to upgrade the rail system across the prairie west. In the first 18 months or so, beginning a couple of months ago, and continuing until the beginning of 1979, the federal treasury, again in the context of the restraint program, will contribute something in the order of $100 million to that rail rehabilitation program in order to develop our transportation spines into first class condition all across the prairies. That, of course, is coupled with the ongoing operating subsidies which the federal treasury has paid in the past and will continue to pay into the future.

When we consider the total cost of specific rail rehabilitation and development on the one side, plus the operating subsidies on the other, during this period of restraint, there is a federal commitment to rail rehabilitation and operation in western Canada of something well over $200 million. This is a very important commitment to be made to a fundamental part of our economic well-being in the western part of Canada.

Those are four priorities which I am glad to see high on the federal government's priority list in terms of the spending initiatives we will have to take. In the context of restraint the selection of priorities is a very tough, delicate and difficult job, and in that context particularly I am pleased to see those kinds of important western projects going forward, to the advantage of the grains industry and the entire economy of western Canada.

Those are some thoughts and ideas I as a western representative have had about the thrust of government financial policy generally and with relation to this bill specifically. I simply repeat once again what I said at the outset: it is important to Canadians that this legislation be passed as early as possible.

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, may I call it 6.30?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 6.30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

REFLECTIONS ON FIFTY-NINTH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Speaker: Order. By virtue of the special order of the House made earlier this month, the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald).

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I remind hon. members and all Canadians that tomorrow, November 11, is Remembrance Day. Tomorrow will mark the fifty-ninth anniversary of the ceasefire of the first World War. I suggest that we pause a moment to reflect on the bravery and sacrifices made by Canadian men and women in that holocaust, and in the second world war and the Korean conflict. Our feeling for them is deep and humble.

More than 100,000 Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen and women served together and died for that ultimate goal, the goal of preserving our democracy and our country. In these days, when many Canadians are concerned about the unity of our country, it is well to remind ourselves of those who gave their lives for its survival. These men and women fought, not for personal gain, nor for glory or for conquest. They fought for their homeland. This was their love. Duty was their creed. Truly they are Canada's heroes.

I would like to remind hon. members of the biblical reference engraved on the memorial arch which connects the Veterans Memorial Buildings here in Ottawa:

All these were honoured in their generations and were the glory of their times.

We, as Canadians, have a special obligation to perpetuate the memory of those who gave their lives for Canada. Let us, in our time and in our way, be worthy of them.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks this afternoon I would like to read something that was sent to my office a few days ago by a young Canadian friend. It is entitled "A Prayer for Today", and was found among the effects of a Canadian infantry sergeant who perished outside Ortona in Italy on a day in December, 1943. It reads:

Today a bird sang for me. Today I leaned against the strong trunk of a living tree. Today a little lizard ran across my hand. So I am not alone. When I get back to Canada I'll remember this. I will cherish all of life, for all life is really one. I will never again be a destroyer, though that is what man is. This is my dream, that we will learn to live in harmony, not between man alone, but with the whole living world.

Let us, the living, keep the faith of this Canadian sergeant, so that the incentive of this day may speed us onward and toward a better world of peace, freedom and justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party and my leader I join with the minister and all colleagues in the House of Commons in paying tribute to our fallen comrades today, prior to the Remembrance Day ceremony which will take place tomorrow at our national memorial in our proud capital city.

In this time of uncertainty, it should be remembered that some 63 years ago thousands of young Canadian citizens answered the call of the then government of the day to volunteer to go to far off lands, to offer their lives, and in too many cases to give those lives, to preserve peace and freedom, not for Canada alone, but to help protect our allies, whose problems must have been difficult to comprehend.

But it is obvious that their efforts were in vain, for on two future occasions, during the second world war and the Korean War, more of our young men and women again answered the call because our world leaders could not preserve that peace and freedom which we as Canadians treasure so dearly.

However, the passage of time has now brought about a generation for whom World War I has become very remote, and for whom even the other conflicts have no meaningful place in their experience. It is incumbent upon us, we who sit in this hallowed House of Commons, many of us veterans ourselves who experienced the bitter taste of war, to remind ourselves that we are charged with the responsibility of ensuring that some 100,000 veterans who died did not die in vain. And we must continue in our efforts to preserve peace, a measure of prosperity, and above all national unity, because of our commitment to the veterans of Canada.

It is tragic, however, Mr. Speaker, that in this year 1977, while hundreds of thousands of our citizens will attend ceremonies across this land to honour and to pay homage to those who made the supreme sacrifice to preserve Canadian unity, we are threatened with national disunity from within our great country, a threat to our freedom that breaks faith not only with those who fell, but with those who remain, the maimed, the disabled, and those dependents who must wonder today, was their sacrifice in vain.

We can only hope that Remembrance Day, 1977, will instill in the hearts of those minorities, those who are taking this country for granted, those who attempt to fracture a way of opportunity and a quality of life brought about by the suffering and sacrifice of Canadians regardless of race, creed or colour, a reminder of the fact that these men fought together for unity in our nation, not as English or French or any other race but as proud Canadians.

To this end, we must dedicate ourselves today because we must continue to believe in peace and freedom and because we will continue to remember them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I join with the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) and with the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) in noting that tomorrow is Remembrance Day and that we do well to pause and reflect on its meaning.

I should like to emphasize that what we do on a day such as tomorrow is to remember actual persons who paid the supreme sacrifice or who willingly gave everything they had. In that connection I am sure all members of the House will join with me in paying special tribute to the services rendered by the two previous speakers, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In recognizing their service in World War II we are recognizing the service of all those in all the wars in which this country has been involved, and we pay tribute to that service.

I may say that the minister also brought this matter home to me in a rather personal way when he read a message left by a Canadian infantry sergeant who perished outside Ortona in the latter part of 1943. I say that because it so happens that a close relative of mine, a Canadian infantry private, perished in that same area in the same year. These are the people we are thinking of today, not some vague unknown mass, but actual humans who gave their lives and who served, and it is appropriate that we remember them.

Sir, I am very conscious of the traditions that apply to statements on ceremonial occasions. I am conscious of the niceties that we observe, and, while this is not an occasion for argument or for making points, like the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, I wish we were remembering those who died and accordingly their survivors more concretely. I wish we were remembering those who lived and paying tribute to their service by something more than the words we are uttering today and the ceremonies in which we shall participate tomorrow.

There is a need to deal with certain matters respecting our veterans, such as the amount of the disability pension and what we do for their widows as well as others who have been forgotten. I would have felt much happier participating in these remarks today had the agenda for this session included a commitment by the government to deal with some of these matters that are unfinished business so far as our veterans are concerned. I hope by saying that on this occasion, whether or not it is appropriate, will help to convince the government that something ought to be done about these matters in this session of parliament. In any case, we welcome the fact that we have these few moments in which to remember those who died, and those who served and are still with us. In the tradition of Remembrance Day, we say from our hearts, we shall remember them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I am quite pleased to join the members who have so eloquently spoken about the bravery of those who fought during the wars which caused deep concern throughout Canada and created gaps in many families. I know that November 11 evokes the memory of a painful past, of Canadians of all ethnic origins who fought side by side and died together. They are resting together in the cemeteries of the various countries which they helped to liberate. Canadians in every region of the country should pay tribute to their memory by trying to improve living conditions in Canada.

We need understanding and mutual respect as we need to feel united. The poppy which we are wearing reminds us of that feeling of fellowship experienced during the war. It also suggests to us the grand task to be performed in close co-operation—to build a united and strong Canada. The Canadians who died believed in a better future. It rests with each of us to direct our efforts in that sense. We all tend to forget that in 1914 and 1939 two world wars covered Europe and Asia with blood and millions of lives were lost. Thank God, each time our country was spared, but some of our relatives and friends did get killed on the various battlefields. Indeed, each time the Canadians crossed the Atlantic and displayed bravery and courage. Some of them were even great heroes.

But those heroes and their feats of arms are a thing of the past. Somehow, we tend to forget too readily the sacrifices made during that period of our history.

On November 11, let us at least have a thought for those who were killed in action, for those who were massacred senselessly, for the innocent victims of bombings. Remembrance Day should make us aware that those victims gave all Canadians who would follow them a further cause for pride.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the endless series of allegations of illegal acts and the difficulty which the McDonald Commission will have in meeting those quickly and swiftly, and because of the crucial importance of the evaluation of the government's mandate and the terms of its mandate with respect to security services, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies):

That a special committee of this House be established to consider the violations of the law by the security forces of Canada, the question of ministerial responsibility in relation thereto, and the suggestion by members of the government that the law should be changed to give wider latitude to security forces;

That 20 members, to be named at a later date, act as members of the said committee, with a member from one of the opposition parties as chairman;

That the said committee have the powers to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses; to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House; to report from time to time; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; and to engage such legal counsel and other staff as may be considered necessary; and

That the committee report by March 31, 1978.

● (1422)

Mr. Speaker: According to the provisions of Standing Order 43 such a motion can be presented at this time for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION McDONALD COMMISSION MAKE INTERIM REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, considering that revelations occurring now, unfortunately almost on a daily basis, indicate that more alleged illegal activity by the RCMP is being undertaken than was originally thought possible, considering that the same revelations clearly indicate political accountability for these activities is required and considering that members of the House of Commons have a serious obligation to deal with other pressing matters in Canada, particularly the state of the economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to request formally the royal commission investigating the RCMP and its criminal wrongdoing to make an interim report not later than January 31, 1978, and second, that the terms of reference of the royal commission be changed to include an additional clause (d) which would read:

"To investigate and report on the adequacy of accountability procedures designed to ensure effective authority over the RCMP and the adequacy of recent solicitors general in exercising their constitutional obligation in terms of the operation of their department."

Mr. Speaker: According to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF LAND EXPROPRIATION FOR PROPOSED PICKERING FACILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Three families at Pickering have been served eviction notices effective November 16 unless they surrender their leases to the federal government. They are willing to do this, plus payback rent owed from May, 1975, on the condition that the federal government advise them of the exact amount of government court costs they owe resulting from a court order. In light of this and other inequities which have arisen in connection with the expropriation of lands in the Pickering area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the matter of the Pickering expropriation be referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in order that the minister may appear and clarify all outstanding issues, and further that the Minister intervene immediately to ensure that a fair settlement is negotiated on behalf of those families directly affected by this eviction notice.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED TABLING OF ALL DOCUMENTS CONCERNING ALLEGED SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES OF FLQ—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

Since the revelations of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) concerning illegal activities of the RCMP in 1972 and 1973 seem to result from the Keable commission; since those revelations prove the urgency of cleaning up police activities; since the situation is such that the people no longer know on which side there was subversion in 1970 and even wonder what kind of protection the country is giving itself under the pretext of state security; since it would be preferable for the government itself to set up a revealing inquiry rather than waiting for journalists and the people to act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That the Solicitor General table in the House all documents pertaining to the activity of the special RCMP committee entrusted with detecting the subversive activities of the FLQ before, during and after the October 1970 crisis.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION BY SOLICITOR GENERAL CORPORATION BUDGET BE CUT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State of Canada, who is responsible in this House of Commons for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I would like to ask the Secretary of State whether his colleague the Solicitor General was speaking for the government and stating government policy when he said last night in Greenfield Park the CBC, and I quote:

[Translation]

. . . has so much money it does not know what to do with it and that at some point its budget should be reduced.

● (1427)

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Leader of the Opposition for his courtesy in indicating to me that he would raise this matter in the House. I think I can reply quite clearly to the hon. gentleman, that in speaking, the Solicitor General may very well have given his personal assessment or comments on the CBC coverage, which is the right of every Canadian. There was not, in my opinion, any indication of a possible threat in the Solicitor General's words. In any case, I can assure the hon. gentleman it is not a question of the policy of the federal government in relation to the way in which the CBC performs its news covering activities, since the CBC is responsible through the Broadcasting Act to the indications which the House of Commons itself has proclaimed for the way in which it will undertake its activities. It is not the activity of the federal government to direct the CBC or lay down indications of how it can perform that duty.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The statement that I read into the record and the additional statement of the Solicitor General in relation to investigation into security matters, to wit:

[Translation]

. . . I feel that the CBC unduly exceeds its terms of reference . . .

[Mr. Speaker.]

are clear statements by the Solicitor General, who is not just an ordinary Canadian but a member of the Cabinet of Canada and responsible to this House. I think the minister will agree that it would be a reasonable interpretation of the remarks by that minister that they were a threat to cut the funds of the CBC if the CBC did not stop investigative reporting into allegations regarding the security service. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is correcting my French, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: That is quite possible, too.

Mr. Clark: Given that interpretation, will the Secretary of State now stand in his place, as the minister who reports to this House on behalf of the CBC, and repudiate the threat that was clear and implicit in the statement by the Solicitor General? Will he do that now?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to genuinely congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on his efforts to master French in which I think he has been successful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: Secondly, I hope I do him no disrespect in saying that I seem to recall a few months ago that his wife expressed some disapproval for the way in which the media were covering her husband. She thought their approach was excessive or not accurate. It did not occur to me to think she was in any way trying to intimidate the news media any more than I think the expression of personal opinion on the part of the Solicitor General was any kind of threat.

If I may say so, to be exactly precise in relation to the question of the Leader of the Opposition, it may be that the CBC, as indeed a variety of agencies that are under the wing, as it were, of the Secretary of State, may face budget cuts as a result of the government's restraint program. I do not say cuts in terms of what they received last year but cuts in relation to what they hoped to have for their activities. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this question has no relationship to any consideration or attempt to limit or affect or influence or determine the way they perform their duties.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I leave the minister to live with his words. He has now said there will be, or very well could be, cuts in the budget. He tells us they will not be related. The Solicitor General last night, in words whose accuracy have not been questioned apart from the hon. member for Crowfoot—

● (1432)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: —said that he believes when the CBC carries out what amounts to a parallel inquiry of what is carried on by the McDonald royal commission, then he as a minister of the Crown of Canada, not a spouse of a member, believes that their budget has to be cut. I personally am deeply concerned about the implications for free press. I wish the minister would rise in his place and completely repudiate that statement by his cabinet colleague and make it very clear that there will be no cuts.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to budget cuts and so on, when I was President of the Treasury Board I heard many times from members on the opposite side that the first organization we should look at with regard to cuts was the CBC.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: The Leader of the Opposition is wrong when he says that the Secretary of State indicated there will be some cuts. He said, and I want to confirm it, that at this time every department of the government is being reviewed. CBC is being reviewed. The government must decide with regard to CBC as with every other organization of government how much more money they will have next year. CBC will be subject to the same decision by cabinet as any other department or agency of this administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What we have here is an indication, now confirmed by the Acting Prime Minister, that there may very well be cuts in the budget of the CBC and those cuts are in the context of clear threats by the Solicitor General.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTION CORPORATION SHOULD NOT CONDUCT INVESTIGATION PARALLEL TO THAT OF McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My question to the Acting Prime Minister relates to another very clear implication from the statement last night by the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General implied very clearly that because there is a royal commission of inquiry into allegations regarding security services in this country, the free press of the country should stop its own investigation. Is that the policy of the government of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, we never mentioned cuts. I spoke about the increase in the budget of CBC next year over this year, like every other organization. I wish to tell the House that discussions are going on with the CBC and every other organization of government with regard to the budget for next year. This has been undertaken by the President of the Treasury Board and has been going on for many weeks. Since August there have been many meetings between the President of the Treasury Board and all these organizations. Therefore, there is absolutely no relation. If there is any relation, it is in the mind of the Leader of the Opposition who is just trying to ride to power on the back of the RCMP.

McDONALD COMMISSION—SUGGESTED ADDITION TO TERMS OF REFERENCE AND INTERIM REPORT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Serious allegations of criminal wrongdoing have reached almost veritable flood proportions. In the past 48 hours we have had Operation Cathedral, Operation 300, the very unwholesome spectacle of two ministers of the Crown not knowing 24 hours ago what was going on and the other spectacle of coming into the House and one minister having known about it yesterday and the other not. Considering the very serious matters facing the people of Canada which ought to be brought before the House of Commons, will the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of the government commit the government to request that the royal commission which is investigating the RCMP bring in an interim report not later than January 31, 1978? Second, will the terms of reference be expanded to include the question of political accountability specifically?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a positive suggestion by the leader of the New Democratic Party. We will be looking into that. If it is possible, I think it would be desirable to have an interim report as quickly as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I notice the Minister of Justice rushing over. I hope this will not be a case of the government changing its policy during this question period. I appreciate the Acting Prime Minister's serious response to the question. However, I want to be sure that the two aspects of the question are clearly understood. Not only will we get an interim report by the end of January next year but, secondly and crucially, if we want to get rid of the day to day concerns that we on this side of the House appropriately have when matters are presented every day in the press, that the issue of political accountability, essentially to the whole structure of parliamentary government, be specifically referred to in the amended terms of reference. I say that in a serious way because the Solicitor General in previous answers indicated he had no objection to that. If there are no objections, I would like the Acting Prime Minister to commit the government to include that as a specific amendment to the terms of reference.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the government feels that the terms of reference of the McDonald Commission are broad enough to cover every aspect of the problem which concerns the House at this time. If the commission wishes to report on the relationship which must exist between the RCMP, its security service and the minister responsible, it is free to do so, in my opinion. There is nothing in its present terms of reference which prevents it from doing so.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Does the Acting Prime Minister realize that, from our point of view, this completely undermines the earlier answer? If they do not include a specific amendment to the terms of reference covering political accountability, we will be bogged down day after day as the two inquiries are looking into the matter. The journalists are doing their job bringing these matters to the attention of the public. We on this side have an obligation to raise it in the House. Therefore, the important question of problems in the Canadian economy will be ignored. We will be tied up with the wrong kind of issue at the wrong time.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the interpretation of the hon. member. I have before me the terms of reference of the commission. Under (C) it states that the commission is authorized to look into matters regarding the policies and procedures governing the activities of the RCMP. In my opinion, that is enough for the commissions to report on an interim basis as quickly as possible on these problems. If the commission find that its powers are too limited, it can always get in touch with the government. So far, however, we feel there is enough power for this commission to bring about the result that all of us want to have in this matter.

NAME OF PERSON WHO STOPPED OPERATION CATHEDRAL—DATE MINISTER LEARNED OF MAIL INTERCEPTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Yesterday in the House the minister stated that the operation under the code name Cathedral involving mail interception had ended by June 1976 which, coincidentally, is about the same time the APLQ matter was exposed to the full light of day. Will the Solicitor General advise on whose authority it was that these illegal mail interceptions were discontinued?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in the answer I gave yesterday, I was referring of course to the opening of mail which actually came to an end in June 1976 following instructions issued to the security service by the assistant director general of operations of the security service.

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: The deputy director of the security service obviously knew that those mail interceptions were going on, otherwise he would not have had the knowledge to order them discontinued. If he knew about them in June 1976, is the minister telling us now that he did not learn of those mail interceptions at that time? If not, was the non-activity of the deputy director in not informing him of this mail interception to be considered as an obstruction of justice?

• (1442)

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I know that the opposition is always ready to pass judgment and bring in verdicts of guilt hastily. As for us, we feel that all those matters referred to the inquiry commission which was set up to give people the opportunity to explain why such or such an action was undertaken.

I would point out to the hon. member, as I said yesterday in the House, that those activities go back several years in the records of the RCMP, and an attempt is now being made to condemn publicly the person who, at a certain time, decided to put an end to that.

[English]

NAME OF PERSON ABOVE DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF SECURITY WHO KNEW OF MAIL INTERCEPTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): The minister knows, then, that the deputy director of the security services was aware in June, 1976 of the illegal interception of mail by the RCMP. Could he tell us who else, in rank above the deputy director, knew about this mail interception?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, regarding mail interception, we have not been able to determine yet whether any higher authority than the one I have mentioned was aware of these activities at the time.

It is also obvious, Mr. Speaker, following the rather brief study of this case which has been done during the last two days, there is no indication that these practices were known to any minister or any higher authority than the one I mentioned.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF CERTAIN FARMERS TO COLLECT CONTRIBUTIONS FROM SEASONAL WORKERS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Naticnal Revenue.

For some time now I have been receiving complaints to the effect that a number of farmers in southern Ontario refuse to deduct unemployment insurance contributions and income tax from the wages of Canadian farm workers. Could the minister tell the House whether he has been aware of this situation and whether he intends to take the necessary steps to protect these seasonal farm workers?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, it is the first time this situation is brought to my attention but if the hon. member for Abitibi would give me concrete facts about these complaints, I would undertake to investigate this matter with my officials and I will give him an answer as soon as possible.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Since those farmers are threatening to hire only Mexican workers if they have to comply with Canadian legislation, could the minister tell us whether foreign workers are bound by the same rules as Canadians or whether there are agreements between Canada and Mexico or Portugal providing that cheap seasonal labour can be imported?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I think the legislation concerning my department is very specific in that case. If there is anything else I might bring to the hon. member's attention, I would do so when I answer his question.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Aside from the difference of view with respect to the terms of reference of the commission, which I think could be settled by a willing Solicitor General enlarging them, does the hon. gentleman not agree that perhaps events have now overtaken the royal commission which, according to the chairman, cannot begin serious investigation work until January.

Some hon. Members: November!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps the Solicitor General owes the country the obligation of recommending the formation of a committee which could work quickly and properly and begin the process in this place. In these circumstances is the Solicitor General prepared to agree to the designation of a committee of this House as was suggested by me this morning and by one of his own hon. friends yesterday, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, albeit on different terms, to bring the issue into the House of Commons so that the investigation could proceed in a way which would not interfere with the business before us with respect to other matters?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the opinions of the hon. member and the leader of the New Democratic Party reflect, I suppose, a very strong desire on his side, indeed, on both sides of the House, to see the royal commission of inquiry begin its work as soon as possible. We are talking about matters which do, indeed, concern the national security of this country; we are talking about evidence which has to be taken under oath; we are talking about proceedings in the course of which witnesses have to be heard in detail with an opportunity provided for cross-examination, and I still believe that the proper forum is a royal commission of inquiry. However, in view of the strong expressions of opinion in the House today, I would wish to draw the attention of the chairman of the royal commission to what has been said in the hope that he will be able to get the inquiry under way earlier than has so far been indicated.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the question the Canadian people are really asking now, is: Who is in charge? Is it the government of the day which is in charge and which has neglected its responsibility with respect to the matter? Are these issues to go before a royal commission or is the place for the investigation not to be here where witnesses can be called, where evidence can be taken in camera, where witnesses can be cross-examined and the whole examination take place more quickly than anywhere else? Would the minister not reconsider his position with respect to his unwillingness to refer this matter to a special committee of this House, or, as his hon. friend has suggested, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs?

Mr. Fox: I listened to the hon. member and the leader of his party in the course of the month of June. On a number of occasions they made motions under Standing Order 43 recommending very strongly that a royal commission of inquiry be set up. We have heeded their argument to a certain extent. We were not convinced at that time that it was necessary, but later we became convinced it was necessary to establish some forum in which an impartial inquiry could take place into the practices and procedures of the security service. At the moment, the hon. member has reversed his stand completely. Three or four months ago he had complete confidence in a royal commission of inquiry. Today he says the matter cannot be properly handled by a royal commission. I wish he would make up his mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The minister is quite right. In June of 1977, when we were not aware of a whole series of events, a royal commission did seem appropriate. Circumstances have now changed, however; there has been a long series of allegations of illegalities and in view of this change in circumstances, in view of the doubt expressed as to the credibility of the government and of the RCMP, I would ask the Solicitor General to seriously reconsider the position the government is taking and to look to a quick, and, I would hope, a reasonable and proper settlement in what is, after all, the highest court in this country, namely, the Canadian Parliament, as the proper place for an examination by one of its committees of all the issues involved here, because the bottom line of all this is the political and ministerial accountability of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: The hon. member has just stated that when he knew nothing about the situation he wanted a royal commission of inquiry. I think the real bottom line of this thing is the national security of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: Don't you care about the people?

Mr. Stevens: Outrageous!

Mr. Gillies: You don't care about ministerial responsibility!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, there are a myriad of issues involved with this question which concerns the national security of our country. There are matters related to counter-espionage, there are matters relating to international activities within our borders and these are subjects which cannot be set out in a public forum without affecting unduly the security of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: I believe any reasonable Canadian would come to the conclusion that when you are dealing with matters of national security there has to be a degree of discretion which is not readily available in the House of Commons. We are not trying to hide anything at all. We have already stated we would place all the files of the RCMP at the disposal of the commission. I have also directed that all the practices and procedures of the RCMP be brought to the attention of the commission in a clear manner. I would think that is the proper way of handling matters which affect the national security of our country, and that is why I disagree with the hon. member.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGEDLY ILLEGAL OPENING OF MAIL—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Yesterday the Postmaster General revealed in the House that he does not know what is going on in the security branch of his department with respect to the opening of the mail. The Solicitor General seems to be a little more forthcoming in the information he has given concerning these and other matters. Because these actions are clearly illegal, the hon. gentleman promised to investigate the subject further. Would he now give an updated report on these illegalities and also inform the House and the people of Canada, who are increasingly concerned over Canada's drift to police state tactics, what action he is taking to deal with the offenders?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the comments of the hon. member which relate to police state tactics are surely not serious.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Are you kidding?

Mr. Blais: Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House that I conducted an investigation with my security and investigation personnel and I had obtained information from them that there had not been any interception of the mails, which would be contrary to the Post Office Act. I indicated that to the hon. gentleman. I know there have been statements made by the Solicitor General and I am aware of the statements that have been made.

Mr. Clark: You are also repudiating them.

Mr. Blais: I ask the hon. gentleman to look at those statements, and if he can give me any indication that personnel of the Post Office have been involved in opening the mail and he can specify some instance or incidents, I would be glad to look into them.

I would indicate to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that with the assistance of senior personnel within the Post Office I looked into every potential allegation, such as the one which was made on one radio station in Ottawa this morning, to ascertain whether there is any ground upon which the allegations relating to interception of the mails can be made, and I ascertained, in that particular instance and in other instances, that there are no grounds for those allegations, to the best of the information of my security and investigation services.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Solicitor General has information which is not available to his colleague, the Postmaster General, and I hope the two of them get together on this vital issue. The Postmaster General has indicated that there are 14 ex-RCMP officers on his security staff. Has the hon. gentleman assured himself that they are not part of Operation Cathedral, pursuing their illegal operations in the Post Office without reference to the Postmaster General; and does he not believe—

An hon. Member: We have one on this side too, if you really want to know.

Mr. Dinsdale: Just contain your patience over there. I am addressing this question to the Postmaster General, not to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Does the Postmaster General not believe that under our system of responsible parliamentary democracy he has responsibility for ensuring that all operations of this kind are within the law; and will he give the assurance to the House and to the people that this is the way affairs are being conducted by the government?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but I undertake my responsibility as a minister more seriously than the hon. gentleman takes his responsibility as critic of the Post Office for the loyal opposition. I conduct investigations into matters than can be investigated. I do not proceed by smearing the reputations of individuals and by imputing guilt by association, especially when that association arises out of the service of Canadian citizens with the RCMP, which is a federal police force which is indeed one that is worthy of our respect and is serious in the analysis of its procedures.

That is why I am conducting those investigations, and I will attempt to do so with every effort I can make, mindful of the role that the Post Office will have to play before the McDonald Commission when we are called upon to appear before that commission. It is fully my intention to do everything within my power to ascertain as many facts as possible in regard to procedures which the RCMP might have followed in connection with employees in the Post Office in order to be of assistance to that particular commission.

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is precisely for this reason, that the responsibility be placed where it lies, which under our system of government is with the government, that I am asking these questions. Will the Postmaster General accept his responsibility and acquaint himself with the facts, which he indicated he was utterly ignorant of yesterday, and assure the House that he will accept responsibility; and will he also assure the House that the affairs of the Post Office are not being conducted illegally? I am not talking about the responsibility of his security personnel but his responsibility. That is the point.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had cared to listen to my comments yesterday, I undertook that responsibility very seriously in replying to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, and I am fully intent, Mr. Speaker, on doing exactly that. Again the hon. gentleman refers to "facts". If the hon. gentleman has facts which might help me in my investigation—

Mr. Clark: Ask the Solicitor General.

Mr. Blais: —I would be pleased if he would make them available to me. I just wish the hon. gentleman would pay some attention. I also indicated yesterday that indeed I recognized that it will be difficult for me to conduct an investigation inside the Post Office unless I receive information from the RCMP. That information has been requested and I am still awaiting a reply from the RCMP.

METHOD USED TO INTERCEPT MAIL—DATE MINISTER LEARNED MAIL WAS OPENED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Yesterday the Postmaster General stated that there could be no interception of the mail without the authorization of the security and investigation branch of the Post Office. On the same day the Solicitor General admitted that under the RCMP code name, "Operation Cathedral" letters had been opened. What I want to ask the minister is, firstly, was Operation Cathedral carried on with the authorization of the postal authorities? If it was not, how was this interception carried on? Can the minister confirm whether or not the RCMP have paid informants in the Post Office who intercept mail and pass information on to the RCMP, or what other method is used to intercept mail without the authorization of the Postmaster General's department and in violation of the Post Office Act?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, what I indicated yesterday was that there was in fact some mail which had been intercepted and was opened by the RCMP on the security service side of the force. This is something that came to my attention—the opening of the mails as opposed to the monitoring of the covers or envelopes which has gone on. The question of the opening of the mail was brought to my attention yesterday and I have not been able to determine very clearly the exact nature of the people who are involved. That is one of the reasons I decided to refer the matter to the Attorney General of Canada for his opinion on the fact that there was indeed the opening of mail and, secondly, to the royal commission, in order that a complete investigation can be made.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister informed the House that there had been illegal actions on the part of the RCMP on several occasions, he said that his senior officials had assured him that there were no further illegal actions which had been perpetrated. Yesterday he told us that Operation Cathedral has opened mail, clearly illegally. I should like to ask the minister, in addition, when he first learned about Operation Cathedral, and if he did not know about it prior to the last few days is he then telling the House his senior officials lied to him when they told him there were no further illegal activities by the RCMP? Either the minister was misinformed by his officials or he is misinforming the House, and surely he owes this House an explanation of what disciplinary action he has taken if he has been lied to by those who advise him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I gave information to the House last June, as a matter of fact, when a question had been asked as to whether there had been any other illegal activities. It is quite clear that hon. members on the other side are willing to give very clear and very quick legal rulings on certain operations of the RCMP. Some of those operations I believe would require a very serious hearing before the courts to determine the legality or non-legality of them.

As to the question of the Cathedral Operation, the opening of mail, which is perhaps a more clear case than some of the others that have been brought to our attention, the first time I was advised of the actual opening of mail was yesterday during my conversation with the force. I was aware of other Cathedral operations which refer only to the question of examining the outside cover of an envelope. That is something I learned of on September 13 of this year. I believe that answers the question the hon. member has asked.

DISCIPLINARY ACTION AGAINST OFFICIALS WHO FAILED TO REVEAL ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES TO MINISTER

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question. The minister has stood before the House on several occasions stating that he had the categorical assurance of his officials that there were no other illegal activities carried on by the RCM Police. Now, he has to tell us that there have been illegal activities carried on. Surely, in terms of ministerial responsibility the Solicitor General has a responsibility to tell this House whether he was lied to by his officials, and, if he was, what disciplinary action he has taken. This is not a matter for a royal commission, it is a matter of a minister discharging his responsibilities as a minister of the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): What action has he taken? If these actions are not legal then the minister should make a case for their legality. If they are illegal, surely the minister ought first to take action against those responsible and, even more important, ascertain why his officials were not aware of these illegalities. If they were not aware they are incompetent, and if they were aware of them and did not tell the minister they ought to be discharged. What is the minister going to do to assure us that he is a responsible minister?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already indicated quite clearly in response to other questions, and in the course of my statements in June of this year, that I expect the RCMP in all cases to bring to my attention any matters of possible illegalities in a very clear and unequivocal manner. Since the establishment of the royal commission the RCMP has been in the process of preparing briefs on each one of its investigative practices and procedures, in order to bring them to my attention, first of all, and, secondly, to the royal commission of inquiry. I think in that regard they are being very candid, as other experiences indicate when, during the course of the month of September, the Commissioner of the RCMP retracted a statement by a former commissioner because of an error that had been made, an error that was subsequently brought to his attention by a former officer. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that I expect the RCMP to be very candid with me and to make sure I am aware of any potential illegal problems.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF OPERATIONS UNDER CODE NAME "SOURCE 300"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General who has apparently given the assurance that there are no further illegalities, yet we are getting these coming to light almost on a daily basis. I should like him to comment or tell the House whether he has investigated the latest revelations of alleged illegal activities by the security service, and can he say whether these allegations are substantially correct? Will he indicate to the house what is his information now as to the number of specific operations carried out under the code name "Source 300"?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, when I referred to no other illegalities I was, indeed, referring to my statement in the House on June 17. Since that time, as the hon. member knows, we set up the royal commission of inquiry because we had, subsequent to my statements in the House, information which seemed to have some basis in fact and which seemed to indicate that other possible acts of illegality had been committed by the force. That is, of course, why the royal commission was set up. If we had no indication then of possible further acts of illegality there probably would not be a royal commission set up today.

As to operation 300 to which he referred today, I have had the opportunity of reviewing this matter once again with senior officials of the force, and the allegations, of course, are substantially correct. There is an operation called "Operation 300" which dates back to at least the mid-1950s—

Some hon. Members: Tell us about it.

Mr. Fox: This concerns the entering into premises by the RCMP on the security service side. This matter is being brought to the attention of the royal commission of inquiry. Once again, Mr. Speaker, there is, I believe, a fairly complex legal question involved which is definitely being underplayed by members of the opposition in their constant attempt to try to make a few partisan points out of a matter that is far too important to be left to partisan purposes, when it affects really—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Come clean.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I simply point out that we on this side of the House are becoming more and more concerned about the way in which the Solicitor General is failing in his responsibilities in respect of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, now that the minister has admitted that the allegations which appeared in the press in respect of "Source 300" are substantially correct, will he tell us whether this information is concurrently being turned over to the appropriate attorneys general for whatever action may be deemed appropriate by the provincial attorneys general involved? Could he also give an assurance to this House that this particular activity, allegedly illegal, has now been terminated and, if so, whether it has been terminated on his orders or, if not, by whom?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, on the question of turning over the Operation 300 files to the provincial attorneys general, as I indicated earlier, this matter goes back to at least the mid-1950s, and probably goes back earlier than that. Our intention at this stage is to turn over to the federal royal commission of inquiry not only the operation 300 files, but briefs on each and every one of the investigative practices of the RCMP.

ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—SUGGESTION FILES BE TURNED OVER TO PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in the interest of protecting the reputation of the RCMP, and not having this drag out day after day and month after month until the royal commission will end some two or three months down the road, will the Solicitor General not agree to turn over any information he does have also to the provincial attorneys general for the purpose of analysis as to whether the people who were breaking the law, whether they be in the police force or average citizens, will face prosecution according to the evidence before the attorneys general.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member on the other side is really serious when he says he does not want this matter to drag out in a piecemeal fashion day after day in this House, I suggest to him that he let the royal commission of inquiry do its job and let us get on with the business of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You should come clean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BOMBING AT CUBAN TRADE MISSION MONTREAL—ALLEGATION GOVERNMENT ACTED TO FREE FIVE MEN CHARGED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in a news story in the Toronto Sun today details of a bombing incident at the Cuban Trade Mission in 1972 are related. It states that two bombs were exploded, and that firemen and police were confronted with Cubans, many of whom were armed with machine guns. Will the minister confirm that the six Cubans who were initially charged with unlawfully having guns were freed of these charges by the Quebec authorities after the federal government intervened?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's story goes back to 1962, as I understand it.

Mr. Kempling: 1972.

Mr. Fox: 1972; that is five years ago, so perhaps he will allow me 25 hours to check it out.

• (1512)

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. In checking this out, and if the government is as concerned as it claims to be with terrorists and subversive elements, will the hon. Minister explain why the federal government intervened to have the charges dropped and why it subsequently apologized to the Cuban government for charging six nationals who were armed with machine guns and who had obviously violated our laws?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is making a point along the lines that I have been trying to make for a number of days in this House. If there are people going around with machine guns in this country, they ought to be the object of surveillance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: Why did you let them off?

Mr. Gillies: Why did you let them go?

Questions of Privilege

PRIVILEGE

DEFERRAL OF RULING BY MR. SPEAKER ON OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS

Mr. Speaker: There are two outstanding questions of privilege, one raised by the hon. member for Peace River which relates to some remarks made by the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the course to be followed, depending on the outcome of those arguments—which I have now considered very carefully—is that the member who is alleged to have made offensive remarks may have several courses of action to take, it is in keeping with the practices of the House always to ensure that the hon. member is present when the decision is made; therefore, I would prefer to withhold that decision until Monday.

There is another decision outstanding from yesterday. The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare raised, by way of a question of privilege, some disagreement with interpretations of the press and other members about remarks she made outside the House. That matter was disposed of by the Chair. However, a second question of privilege on the same general subject was raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. At the time, it seemed to me it had two difficulties which I indicated yesterday. The first was that disagreement between one minister and another, or contradictory statements made by a minister—or, in fact, by any member—does not give rise to a question of privilege. The second was that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton intended to propose a motion relating to the grievance of another member, which also posed a procedural difficulty.

I undertook to examine the precedents to see whether I was correct in those assessments. I do not propose to elaborate on them, but want to reaffirm my initial impression that alleged contradictory statements by one member or another, or by one minister or another, do not in any circumstance constitute a question of privilege. The most recent ruling on that matter appears in the Journals of November 16, 1971, at page 923. The second is in respect of an attempt by one member to move to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections that which has been raised by way of a grievance of another member. It is an extraordinary procedure which was attempted recently, on June 21, 1977, by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and I took occasion to disagree with that practice at that time. That can be found at page 6916 of Hansard. Therefore, I would reaffirm the disposition of yesterday and simply refer hon. members to those precedents.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on the question Your Honour raised concerning the question of privilege in which I was involved, I should like to point out that I will not be in this chamber on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I will be going around the country trying to tell Canadians what this government is doing. I remember the ruling Your Honour made just the other day. If it should be that Your Honour holds there is a prima facie case, and if the right hon. Prime Minister insists on his defiance and refuses to withdraw, it may well be that I will want to move a motion. Would the House and Your Honour agree that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, in my absence, if the occasion arises, might move that motion? Perhaps this is hypothetical, but I want to hold open that possibility. It will not drag on as long as some of the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Let me hasten to assure the hon. member for Peace River, as I am doing today, that in respect of any ruling I would make now, or in the event of any ruling I would make on some other decisions which might have to take place, I would always attempt to guard very carefully the position of all interested members.

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention since I have been sitting in the House today that derogatory remarks were made about my constituents by the hon. member for Crowfoot, now Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who used to be a Tory.

Mr. Paproski: That is the guy.

An hon. Member: He still is a Tory.

Mr. Hogan: Because of the time notice, I did not have a chance to let Your Honour know that I wanted to raise a question of privilege today, but I would ask Your Honour's indulgence to allow me to do so on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: I note the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not present in the House at this time. Perhaps the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond might want to raise that question the first time the minister is in the House.

DEPARTMENTAL MAGAZINES

Question No. 120—Mr. Herbert:

Are any limitations imposed on the frequency of publication, the number distributed or the unit or total cost of departmental magazines?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Revised policy and guidelines on the management of publications in the government of Canada were issued earlier this year. This document establishes the responsibilities of departments and DSS regarding the pricing, marketing, distribution of various types of publications. Fully-priced publications i.e. publications which DSS consider to be marketable, are expected to recover their costs. However, with respect to other publications, either free or subsidized, there are no specific guidelines which would have the effect of restricting costs resulting from quality or quantity. At the moment, the responsibility to impose such limits rests with departments. However, departmental expenditures for information activities are scrutinized by Treasury Board during the resource allocation process and are approved by parliament through annual estimates.

GUIDELINES ON USE OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Question No. 121—Mr. Herbert:

Has the government issued guidelines to departments on the hiring of outside consultants and, if so, what are the guidelines and what reporting procedure is established if the terms or limitations suggested in the guidelines are to be exceeded?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): The Treasury Board has issued guidelines on obtaining the services of management consultants in the following documents: 1966-2 Guidelines on obtaining the services of management consultants from outside the government. MI-9-66 Policy on the use of management consultants from outside the government. 1967-28 Reporting on the use of management consultants from outside the government. 1968-47 Submission of reports on the capabilities of outside management consultants. These guidelines are currently under review along with the development of more general guidelines for other types of consulting services. All consulting services contracts fall under the government contract regulations SOR/75-530 which establish limitations on departments. For contracts which exceed the limits defined in sections 23 and 24 of the regulations, departments must obtain Treasury Board approval to enter into a contract.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the deputy government House leader if he could advise us as to the business of the House for next week. Can he confirm that next Tuesday is designated as an opposition day?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, prior to indicating the order of business for the balance of today and next week, I should like to indicate it was the government's hope that arrangements could be made, on a co-operative basis with leaders of opposition parties, to deal rather expeditiously with four matters, namely, CALURA, the labour standards code, the petroleum corporations monitoring act and the comptroller general's act. We hope it will not be very controversial to refer those matters expeditiously to committee in the next week or so. I regret to inform the House that arrangements for that purpose have not been made, but I will continue to discuss the matter with House leaders.

[Mr. Pinard.]

As far as the specific business of the House for the balance of today and next week is concerned, with the exception of Tuesday being set aside as an allotted day for the opposition, we will continue with Bill C-11, the income tax amendments.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I hope we are not falling into the practice of breaching the confidence of House leaders' meetings in the way in which the deputy House leader has done. I want to assure him that I learned the lesson early, when the hon. member for Eglinton was House leader. As he kindly told me, I am kindly telling the deputy House leader that he should learn his job and keep his mouth shut, especially when he is wrong.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to hear those remarks. If the House leader of the opposition feels that I have breached the confidence in any way of the House leaders' meetings, I would be the first one to apologize.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We will talk about it later.

Mr. Cafik: The disposition of myself, on behalf of the government, in relation to the four items I have mentioned has been well known. It was well known to hon. members of this House, as far as I am concerned, prior to any formal discussion of this matter with the House leaders last evening. I am pleased to accept the admonition of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. If he feels there has been in any way a slight to that confidentiality, I can assure him that there was no attempt to do that in the statement I made to the House today, nor will there be an attempt to do so in the future.

A co-operative kind of arrangement is absolutely essential to the appropriate functioning of this House, and the hon. member can be assured that I would be the first one to recognize the importance of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

● (1522)

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some trepidation on this first speech of mine in the televised House. It surely will go down in history as the "shiskabob parliament", as we sit here each day skewered by the cameras and roasted by the lights. I trust that the committee which made the arrangements for this innovation in parliament will continue meeting, and meeting with some urgency, to see whether the level of illumination in this place cannot be reduced. We were told during the debate on televising this place that it would serve the purpose of keeping the seats full, but I know that very few members of parliament can bear sitting in their seat longer than an hour and a half without some shading or screen for their eyes. If anything, television has had the opposite effect and is emptying the seats in this place. However, one thing I can say is that the increased illumination has added no brilliance to the performance of the government opposite. It has thrown no light or clarity on its deliberations whatsoever, and has added no lustre to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet as the days have gone by.

I am concerned about some of the changes which have resulted already. One of those was the failure for any procedural wrangle to develop when it became apparent that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was going to add something to the rules of this House by running in, on top of the debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne, a budget without the usual warning and preparation and allotted days for a budget debate.

I believe very firmly that in the pre-televising days there would have been a group of members led by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who would have tied up the proceedings of this chamber for at least three days as a protest. One of the things we have yet to see in the televised House is a full-fledged procedural wrangle. I trust that the precedent set in the opening weeks will not be followed and that hon. members will have the courage, when the government breaches long-standing traditions of this chamber, to argue, to defend the rights of the opposition and to attack such actions by the government in the future.

I can understand the urgency on the part of the Minister of Finance in wanting to bring in a budget—which is not a budget—in order to undo some of the things done by his predecessor who could not stand it any longer and left the position. With the rate of unemployment across the country, and the shocking rate of unemployment in British Columbia, in the Okanagan Valley from where I come and in other parts of British Columbia as well, it is no wonder that the minister attempted to promise at least some further alleviation.

I know that some of the measures he proposed are supposed to provide some alleviation and that there are clauses in the income tax bill we are discussing today which were placed there to encourage business to expand. But I am sure anyone listening to that mini-budget had a sudden apprehension on learning that there would be an additional $150 million applied to job-creation. I am sure that I am not alone in feeling that the present job-creation programs through Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs are not the way to solve the unemployment problem in this country. We need something far more sophisticated than short-range projects which are put forward by groups of citizens who very often do not have a great deal of administrative experience but yet are being awarded fairly large sums of money.

The wonder is that the projects work as well as they do; but there are too many which cannot be undertaken, and there are too many organizations, including organizations at the municipal level of government, which are frustrated to see what, to them, would be significant sums of money bypassing them because they cannot manage to fit into the criteria laid out in the programs. I cite the example of the interior exhibition association at Armstrong, British Columbia, which would very much like to expand its facilities and to build a new and large exhibition complex to take care of the huge crowds which now show up for that great annual event. When they applied to the Department of Agriculture, they learned that grants for the construction of exhibition buildings were cut off in 1962, so there are no more. They were told that they could borrow at a reasonable rate of interest, but that does not prevent considerable frustration developing as they see grants that would be signficant to them utilized elsewhere, and very often for the short-term in the local area.

I realize that the Canada Works program is now inviting private participation, and I would hope that for that kind of project it would be possible for an association such as that to arrange this matter with the contractor—because the problem lies in the kind of supervisory effort that is needed for a building of that size—who in turn would be able to pick up some people from the ranks of the unemployed and use them at least on the preliminary work that would be necessary. I feel that there would be room for changing the nature of the Canada Works program to allow more direct use of the money and to allow for greater supervision over what is done with it.

We note, too, that at the municipal level great problems arise in terms of the conflicts with municipal unions and the Canada Works program, and those problems have not been sorted out. We know that the minimum wage and the beginning wage for municipal employees does not mesh with the standard for the works program. A great deal needs to be done there. We are in a difficult situation in this country. The economic climate of the country is affected in terms of the minimum wage here versus that in the United States. Even so, we are conscious of what unexamined acceptance of an ever-increasing minimum wage has done in terms of creating unemployables. One can find in a recent issue of Time magazine, for example, Riesman, the sociologist, being quoted as saying that the minimum wage is the product of—> —an alliance of the better situated labour unions with the liberals against the deprived and the elderly whom people would otherwise employ for household or city work that now doesn't get done.

In the most recent issue we learn that the U.S. Congress voted to boost the minimum wage from its present $2.30 an hour to $3.35 by 1981, and one notes with a bit of surprise that the minimum wage there will not surpass ours, assuming that the one in Canada will stay still until January of 1980. The other day, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) cited some figures to indicate how the devalued Canadian dollar changed all that, but we should remember that what was done in Canada was put into place at a time and during years when the Canadian dollar was at a premium, and that if the situation is as it was described by the hon. member, that is an accident.

What he did not do was give us an indication of the cost to the country and the ways that the low Canadian dollar contributes to extraordinary costs in other areas. As a member from British Columbia, I realize that the devalued Canadian dollar has made a great contribution to the export picture in that province, but that was only part of the problem. The devaluation of our dollar is a price that the government and Canadians must now pay for the full set of fiscal and financial policies which have been unwise and in use for too long a time.

● (1532)

If one considers the area of taxation—and we are dealing with an income tax bill—here again I have a quibble with my colleagues to the left from the NDP. The English language does not permit them to call a tax concession a gift. They do it all the time. A few years back, taxation was seen as being next to theft. If a government stops its thievery, that does not mean it is gifting anyone. We know that when the NDP were in power in British Columbia they robbed industry blind. They simply did not understand the narrow profit industry in that province. They assumed the boom would go on forever. In collusion with the federal government, they set up situations whereby industries could not possibly be profitable. That is particularly so in the mining industry, but they did untold damage to the forest industry as well.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Johnston: My friends can call and shout if they wish, but they know the fate of that unhappy government. Years ago we talked about robber barons. In British Columbia they had a "Robber Barrett." For three years they knew exactly where they were.

Mr. Rodriguez: What about INCO?

Mr. Johnston: I do not have time to go into the full implications of that matter. However, I never cease to be astonished as I watch the process whereby any hope of the new international economic order is left in shreds and tatters by the NDP as they talk about INCO. Any question of the transfer of technology is postponed into the distant future. If a corporation can be so much criticized for transferring both technology and operation, one wonders what kind of load would fall on a government which attempted to do the same thing on the same scale. I wish those great proponents of the new international economic order would seriously think about what they are doing the moment there is a crisis in any particular locality in Canada. It is something to which they should give considerable thought.

The worst aspect of calling a tax concession a gift is that the public expects too much from it. If the government says, "If you do a few certain things, we will take less taxation from you", that is quite different from the government saying to a company that it will give them a grant. Those two matters should be carefully and continually sorted out as we go along, because tax concessions are not the road to a quick economic recovery.

Plants in Canada are now operating at less than capacity. There is no incentive for them to expand with a tax concession. Why should they go out and borrow when they are not using all they have at the present time? The concession of income tax to individuals is a better route to take. It has been meeting some approval from the NDP. For a long time it has been suggested from this side of the House. It has been acted on, but in a way tinkering around the edges of the real problem. The promise of the $100 deduction around January or February will be haled by all who can receive it. However, I remind them that looking into the next year they can obtain almost as much by making a contribution to a registered political party.

I know if this thought comes home, a good many will contribute the $100 to the official opposition because they will very much want to remove this government from power. They will see a way of assisting in getting this country back on to a financial course that makes a lot more sense in difficult times than the one on which this government has been embarked for far too long.

I spoke earlier about exports. It is essential that we succeed in exporting to other countries. Part of the area I represent has some of the finest and largest, and a great many undeveloped, coal deposits that can be found anywhere in the world. We know that the coal market is extremely competitive. There are a great many other parts of the world that are blessed with coal. It is a credit to the miners and the companies that they had the courage and foresight to invest in that part of British Columbia which is in some ways remote even though it is not all that far from the American border. Therefore, it is not usually seen as being as remote as it is, even though it is a long haul from there to the coast. The competitive position in which these coal mines have been put has not been very good. They have been a little too dependent on the Japanese market, which at the moment is in a slump. Therefore, there is double jeopardy. The one useful thing the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) said in his speech yesterday was with reference to the hope of diverting some of that coal and sending it east to Canadian markets. I know there is very much concern in that area with the development of coal. The government and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce should give a great deal of thought to this question.

I fail to see any indication in the new budget that that area will be a target for the direction of research funds. As I read about research funds, it struck me that a blind eye was being turned toward western Canada. The areas singled out for concession to industries which do research in various parts of the country do not pay a great deal of attention to western Canada. This is a serious omission. For far too long there has been a tendency to see all of the western economy as booming. British Columbia is still a target for internal migration in Canada. We still have a great number of people coming there who expect to find work. In an economic turndown, it is difficult, indeed, to find jobs for those people.

I notice the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) is in the chamber, I hope he will not sit on the laurels he has gained in signing the present agreements with the British Columbia government which have been more beneficial for development in the north than in the southeast. When there are developed mines that are doubtful of markets in the future, it does not make much sense to proceed immediately to develop additional mines in the north with all the infrastructure necessary to put them in place.

I would remind the minister that the southeast corner and the south of the province will need a great deal of the kind of infrastructure development that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has undertaken in other places. Rail facilities and roads were built there many years ago, but it is a long time since they have been upgraded. The main rail line in the south was more or less abandoned years ago. I hope negotiations will continue between the government and the province of British Columbia. All members who come from there know that for years just the tiniest trickle came out of the end of the spout, over the Rockies.

Even if the present agreement is accepted and paid up in full every year, it will in no way begin to pay for those long years of neglect, for changes in the department and the kind of development of roads to resources infrastructure, for new towns and that sort of thing. There is a demand, and there will be a demand in the southeast Kootenay corner for at least two new towns even as the existing ones still find themselves scrambling to provide for the influx of population that has followed the development thus far. There is still an important job to be done in terms of reserves and development and adding jobs other than those supplied by taking up the raw resources and exporting them. There is, as well, the question of providing the transportation necessary to keep or expand that flow. Much is still to be done in that area.

I should like to say something about the controls program which has been particularly vexatious in British Columbia. Two groups of people feel particularly aggrieved. Certainly, British Columbia teachers were bound by legally binding arbitration and the laws of British Columbia to accept agreements from arbitration boards legally set up. The agreements were rolled back following the decision of the provincial government to place them under the purview of the Anti-Inflation Board. That could only be done by retroactive legislation, which in my opinion is always reprehensible. To me, the wisest course would have been for the Anti-Inflation Board, when confronted with the situation, to say there was nothing they could do and that the agreements were legally binding because they were made before the jurisdiction of the Anti-Inflation Board had been tested in the Supreme Court.

Of course, it is always easier to roll back wages and salaries than to do anything about prices, and the board could not resist the temptation. Now the teachers who felt they would have something closer to justice this year are concerned by the 6 per cent raise limit presented by the minister in the speech he made in this House recently. There is, as well, a 2 per cent plus or minus experience adjustment factor which I suspect will relate to the negotiations in the southeast Kootenay area between coal miners and companies. Here, again, I think it is incumbent upon the Minister of Finance and the government to explain very clearly, if that is the situation, that it is they who have broken their word. They changed the rules in the game, and they must accept responsibility for changing those rules as they affect the teachers and may affect the miners. I do not think that question has been sorted out yet, but I had a feeling of apprehension as I read the minister's budget speech. It holds out the possiblity of only 4 per cent to people who believed they had been promised 6 per cent in the third year.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer briefly to a speech made in Cranbrook, British Columbia, recently by Mr. Dennis F. Culver, president of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of British Columbia. Referring to this government and its taxation policies, he said:

> The ineffectiveness of the federal government in carrying through, logically and methodically, its fiscal proposals has created widespread uncertainty in business, hindered the mobility of capital, and contributed to the general lacklustre performance of the national economy.

A good many people would like to think all of that has been caused by the debate on national unity, yet here is someone, who should be in a position to know, who finds that the root cause is something more than concern, real as it is, about national unity. A report of this speech in the Daily Townsman, a newspaper of the east Kootenay area, reads in part as follows:

> Culver said that over the last five years federal government budget proposals—which affect every man, woman and child in this country—have been delayed, killed, amended, reintroduced or disposed of in some way other than what the federal finance minister had originally proposed.
> There have been so many changes to the Income Tax Act that the original concept of tax reform—introduced in 1971—has been abandoned.
> For example, Culver said, the concept of integration of corporate and personal income was laid down as a cornerstone of tax reform. Since then, many different tax rates and tax abatements applicable to both individuals and corporations have been implemented.

He is concerned about the confusion that this sort of thing causes. He has some good words to say about the bill before us, however. The newspaper report continues:

> The 1977 budget, brought down in the House of Commons on March 31, lapsed with the end of the session. It contained major changes to facilitate corporate reorganizations and ease taxes on corporate business income.

I should like to point out that the bill before us is an aberration on the part of this government. It is not the course upon which the Liberal government has embarked over the years. It is a backing, filling and shifting that has been forced on it by the realization it has brought this country to the brink of economic disaster. Some sort of remedial effort must be made immediately. We have this rather half-hearted attempt to do something about a situation that is virtually intolerable.

I am sure that as well as this parliament going down in history as the first to be televised, it will go down in history as the last of the parliaments led by this Prime Minister who has led the country not only to the brink of national disunity and total separation but also to the brink of economic disaster.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take part today in this debate on Bill C-11 introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I guess one could say it is a kind of omnibus bill because it deals with many sectors of the economy. This bill represents an additional effort by the federal government to participate with private entreprise and provincial governments in the revival of the economy which is now going through a difficult period.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I want to speak as the minister responsible for regional economic expansion, a department dedicated to the development of the economy but also interested in furthering unity in this country. This is a department which has been quite successful in several areas and provinces. At the same time, it is a department which comes under criticism and I will come back a little later to some of those criticisms. Finally, in this debate, most speakers mention what the department has done—very few in the opposition mentioned its accomplishments; they dealt mostly with its failures, and things it should not have done and should have done. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), for example, and also the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) both made certain criticisms, and in some cases, suggestions.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is a political compromise between local, regional, economic, ethnic, linguistic and religious interests, and one could even add that it is also a compromise between various ideologies. Historically, we have been united but at the same time some areas have been poorer than others at one time or another. What is important in all that is that we must be aware of the difficulties certain areas are experiencing and take all the means available to us, and create more if necessary, to correct those difficulties. However we must stop constantly blaming our ancestors, past discriminations we have all been victims of at various times from one standpoint or another. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was set up to try and iron out regional disparities. So our role is to try and distribute economic growth on a broad basis as fairly as possible, to bring as close together as possible the employment and income opportunities of the regions, particularly in slow growth areas, side by side with those of the rest of the country, without causing harm to the development of those other areas as a whole.

We do not want in any way by our action, Mr. Speaker, to jeopardize or delay the development of other regions which are more advantaged. Our purpose, to be more specific, is to create new growth centres in those regions where the growth potential has not been fully developed. Canada needs strong and big cities because they are necessary to its expansion but it also needs a strong economic base from one ocean to the other. It is not easy to eliminate inequities which have been created and have developed over almost two centuries of history, but in particular during the last century.

It is obvious that during a very short period only one department has not been able and will not be for a few more years to substantially correct these inequities. During the past seven years, we have made several experiments, tested several programs, either alone, unilaterally at the federal level, or in conjunction with provincial authorities and existing organizations. A large number of those experiments have proved to be a success. Others, for obvious reasons, have not been so successful and in some instances, of course, we have even failed. Unfortunately, failures are those which are most often heard of. Interesting events are considered as a normal thing, in other words success is something one must normally know. What is strongly criticized are failures or half successes. I was accused recently of not being able to answer specific questions, of not caring enough about the number of unemployed and their serious plight.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat in this House that the purpose of my department, my own personal purpose, as well as I am sure that of my two predecessors in this portfolio, is to control unemployment and bring about an improvement in the economic development of our disadvantaged regions. Surely this is the mandate which cabinet has given this department, a mandate recognized by everybody as being a difficult one. And our purpose, as I said a few days ago in an answer I gave in the House, our purpose and my own purpose, in a word the ideal to reach would be to have available jobs for all men, all women who are really willing and who need to work.

I am more concerned, Mr. Speaker, by Canada's future than by its past, even though the latter is full of so many extraordinary events, and I want to say that my department wants to and will play a valuable role in the development of this country as long as it will remain an instrument for timely interventions. And it is precisely that role which is particularly difficult and which certain people, certain regions, certain groups of people do not always understand the way we have set it. The department makes timely interventions; in other words, in cooperation with provinces, organizations, businesses, we identify operation areas, we jointly set up an action plan in relation to an objective to be reached, and we agree on a budget structure and a period over which the program will be spread. That is what I refer to as timely action. When the job is done we withdraw, as we should.

Mr. Speaker, as long as I have responsibility at the head of this department, I will always refuse to see it become a department which operates by the statute book because we would then only play the role that several other departments are very well entitled to play, and we would lose that nature the department has been given when established, that selective nature, indeed even discriminatory in some instances, having to make a choice among the options available to us and to accept some proposals and reject others, a certain amount of discrimination necessarily follows but I think that when the role of the department is well understood, which no doubt is the case most of the time, then it is accepted. Those who criticize the department and there are many, do it mostly because they would like to see it do much more. When that kind of criticism is made in a positive and constructive fashion, with suggestions, I accept it.

I even ask for it because we, in the department and those in charge of provincial governments with whom we negotiate and cooperate, recognize that we have no monopoly on the truth and that in our search for answers for the promotion and development of regions and in our battle against disparities we certainly need the help, cooperation and support from provincial and municipal governments, the people in general but particularly from groups interested in private enterprise, in the industry.

What I mean is that it is not the responsibility of the Federal government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion alone to fight against disparities. In my meetings with the premiers and the provincial ministers with whom I have regular consultations and negotiations I mentioned that when the Federal government decided to create a department to reduce regional disparities we were acknowledging their existence and that, through the establishment of that department and the budget allocated to it, we had directly contributed to the reduction of those disparities. Therefore I said to the Premiers that if they were satisfied, which was the case for all of them, with the action and decision of the Federal government by which we had recognized the need for urgent action, obviously the same need also existed at the provincial level—I mean the need to acknowledge their disparities and the fact that programs and monies spent by various provincial departments also had a major effect on the development of those areas.

This is why in the last twenty-four months of negotiations, ever since I became responsible for this department, I have always tried to find out what areas within the provinces needed our help most urgently whenever we could give it of course. And if you look at the agreements that have been signed during the last two years you can see that this point of view has been recognized to a large extent by almost every premier and provincial minister with whom I had to negotiate.

On this side of the House, we want to ensure a basic minimum of welfare and prosperity in all regions of the country. We cannot aspire to a strong and dynamic economy if our regions remain poor and underdeveloped. Our regional economy must be based on the image that we have of our country, of Canada's future. However, we must remember that our resources are not unlimited. This bill proves it. Even the other proposal of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) which finally asks us authorization to borrow $9 million this year should indicate above anything else how our actions and the expenditures possible to reach our objectives are limited.

Because of this situation, we must be even more selective, even more cautious in choosing projects that we can support to reduce regional disparities. If I were to accept all the suggestions that are made to me, I would obviously have to commit the federal government and the provinces to expenditures of much more than the $500 million now available to the department.

A while ago, we heard a Progressive Conservative member from British Columbia tell us about the progress made these last few months in our negotiations with the provincial government of British Columbia and about the agreements that we have signed and that I have signed personally, in fact, five subagreements which commit the federal government to make considerable expenditures in co-operation with the provincial government. The hon. member recognized that we have made some progress. At the same time, he insisted that we should continue our negotiations and said that certain areas of his province are in great need of our intervention. I thank him for his encouraging words as concerns our department and I can assure him that our negotiations with his provincial government are going on and that next week, during a visit and a conference to which I have been invited, I will go into his province and have the opportunity to talk with the provincial ministers and see what stage we have reached in the implementation of the agreements which we have signed.

Mr. Speaker, if I had a magic wand I would immediately formulate the wish that all those unemployed may find a job, that all depressed areas may flourish again and that all those who want and need to work can do so. But, as we all know, one must be realistic while bearing in mind this kind of tenacity shown by the generations which have preceeded us. They were foresighted people, who had faith and they succeeded in building a great country.

We who are prone to criticize and despair now and then should remind ourselves that those who preceded us and built this country had to face much greater difficulties with more limited means than those we have and we should not forget also that generally speaking the standard of living we now enjoy should make us a lot more optimistic and help us keep faith in the ideal of our forefathers.

There are challenges which we must take up, I am aware of that, and I know that Canadians trust their government to find the remedies which are necessary to improve the present situation as it exists not only in Canada but on the north American continent taking into account the difficult international economic situation. In order to meet the challenges facing our department, we have developed several programs. Canada is a big country, as we all know, and its needs as well as its potential may widely differ from one region to the other. The federal government grants billions of dollars each year to the provinces whose fiscal base is not wide enough to provide the necessary funds for their own development and to afford a satisfactory level of services to the population. In our department, Mr. Speaker, we do a bit more than that. We add to that fiscal base by the spendings which we make in these provinces for their development.

We also act unilaterally to promote industrial concerns. We also support businesses which are from time to time experiencing difficulties. We have provided funds and we have guaranteed loans. Mr. Speaker, I think I can see you smile, because you know what I am referring to. Lately again, as a result unfortunately of some difficult conditions experienced by a particular area in Quebec, we were able in co-operation with the Department of Industry Trade and Commerce, to join our efforts to those of some industrialists willing to carry on and assume the risk. Thus jobs were preserved and there might even be a substantial increase of jobs in the case I am referring to in the city of Valleyfield. This is not a unique case, there are several others, Mr. Speaker, of which my colleagues are also aware.

Some may argue that we do not publicize these facts enough. We should mention them more often. Perhaps we should issue weekly press releases to let the public know what we are doing. The reason might be that we are not that kind of people, for we are satisfied with doing our job the best way we can, trusting that the Canadian public which is aware of our efforts will recognize them, as I am sure it does.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we often act together with the provinces through development agreements. During the past three years, we have signed with them over 80 subagreements which involved more than $2 billion in expenditures. It is interesting to note that this is a federal department which, without making too much fuss, is constantly bargaining with the ten Canadian provinces. It is a fact that there are tensions, that the bargaining is tight, and that there are disagreements. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the 80 agreements which we have signed are conclusive evidence that the bargaining and consultation process is operating efficiently and succesfully.

We have had agreements signed with the ten provinces, Quebec, British Columbia, Newfoundland, Ontario and all the others. We are negotiating with them on a regular basis. This is a sincere attempt at co-operation. We cannot obviously fill all expectations. We cannot approve each and every proposal. It being a matter of priority, we have to make a choice between all proposals, and try to improve present conditions and that is what we are doing on a regular basis.

It is plain that the final disposition lies in the hands of the provincial governments concerned because they are the ones that have jurisdiction over the land and its resources as well as in most of the areas where we want to co-operate with the provinces. Mr. Speaker, this reminds me of an article that has been brought to my attention and it concerns a Quebec provincial minister. I can mention his name because it appears in the article. I quote:

The Quebec Minister, Claude Morin, is suggesting that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is unconstitutional. That it should not exist because it operates in an area under provincial jurisdiction.

He probably wants to imply that we should further increase our payment transfers to the provinces. I say, Mr. Speaker, that he is not the only one that has made such a suggestion. I heard about proposal which was made some time ago whereby we should transfer to the provinces the equivalent of the department's budget and allow them the freedom to spend this money as they see fit.

I looked at this proposal and dwelt at length on the effets it would have. I saw what would happen to the federal government's tax structure if such a transfer were made to provinces. Already, we have transferred to the provinces, within the framework of two programs, the shared cost program for the year 1976-77, the sum of $4,506 million, and that was for the year 1976-77.

Fiscal transfers amounted to $3,216 million, which means that federal transfers to the provinces, under two or three minor programs, amounted actually to some $8,130 million. I doubt that $500 million divided amongst the provinces will change anything much; they will disappear in the overall picture just as do now in the vast majority of cases the amounts we transfer to the provinces. Yet, the federal government is accused of doing nothing for the economic development of the provinces. One may wonder, if we are completely responsible for their development, whether we should not review those transfer programs, because after all, if we transfer all that money, it is precisely to enable them to develop their economy, strenghthen their structures, and I do not think that having a department allot those amounts to the provinces directly would solve the problems. Indeed not, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced people would still blame Ottawa for its inaction, for its lack of leadership, its lack of interest. This is why the department has been and still is in existence. And I feel that its scope should be increased substantially, because if we are to be blamed in this House and elsewhere for certain disparities between regions and provinces, let us at least have the authority to act. Our powers are not nearly as broad as would be desirable.

My time is almost up, so I conclude by referring to certain accomplishments, certain situations. In recent weeks and months, the department has been confronted with certain economic conditions such as unemployment, and because of this we have increased our interventions. In the case of the province of Quebec for instance—and I would like to bring this to the attention of my colleagues because there has been criticism in that respect from time to time—because of increasing unemployment in the province of Quebec and especially in the Montreal area, where a 50 per cent increase was experienced in 12 months, the department decided to designate greater Montreal a special area.

I would like to report to the House that in the course of some four months of operation, we have received over 170 applications for industrial aid projects and, assuming these were all acceptable and granted, this would entail investments of some $110 million, with the creation of over 4,300 jobs.

I also take pleasure in informing the House that offers were made to more than 17 of the firms involved. Some have already been accepted, with two announced at this point, and I hope that in the coming weeks other accepted projects can also be announced on a regular basis. These efforts are within our own jurisdiction, because we have had to act unilaterally to assist development. Our contribution will help alleviate unemployment that has increased at an excessive rate in the larger Montreal area.

A number of statistics could be quoted. I know that the House is practically submerged with statistics from various speakers, so I will abstain from bringing more, the purpose of my speech being to support this good piece of legislation brought forward by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

This is a bill for which I am personally grateful to him as a minister, because he pursues what had been announced by his predecessor, Mr. Macdonald, and the provisions of this bill will support the objectives of my own department. Take the investment tax credit—some feel it is not enough and I am inclined to agree, but I am pretty patient and systematic: I will proceed gradually—it went from 5 to 7.5 and now it is 10 per cent, and I hope we will succeed in increasing these figures in the next months or years.

I should like to conclude on a comment concerning the people of Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean whom I represent here. I wish to thank them for the confidence they place in me and to assure them that my department is now working on several projects. We are aware of the potential of this area which is now unfortunately hard hit by a high rate of unemployment, but I have faith in the people of my area and in their dynamism. Judging from past experience and considering the achievements of these people in many areas, such as cooperation, industry, finance, with economic mutual funds among other things, I feel that our area will come through, with the assistance of the federal and provincial governments, and I hope the hon. member will realize that it is in his interest to cooperate with us and with the local people in order to ensure the development of those areas and sub-areas. I hope that all those measures will succeed in reducing unemployment, in creating jobs and in keeping our young people in our areas. We must strive to create jobs in order to keep them at home. It is of concern to me as a Canadian and as a Quebecer and as a citizen of Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean. I ask the House to consider this bill with all the attention it deserves but not to unduly delay its passage, so that we may proceed with other pieces of legislation likely to help the Canadian economy and our fellow citizens.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Will the minister allow me a question?

Mr. Lessard: Of course, with your permission, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) may ask a question if the hon. member agrees.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I would like to thank the hon. minister for having agreed to hear my question which is very serious. I know what are the feelings of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who represents an area which, in many aspects, is similar to mine. Therefore, I would like to ask him if in his efforts and those of his department to eliminate regional disparities, his department is now doing something or some studies with regard to the mining development which is in progress in Îles-de-la-Madeleine—particularly the salt mine which is not in operation at the moment, but at the planning stage—I should also like to know if his department would eventually be interested in the bicarbonate of soda industry or plant which would be built once the salt mine in Îles-de-la-Madeleine is operational, and, this time, in the continental part of the constituency of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, that is in Port Daniel. Furthermore, I would like to know what are the plans of the department regarding the funding of these two industries.

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is interested in the development and the potential uses of the subsoil of that large area of the province of Quebec, that is the Gaspé region and Lower St. Lawrence and also Îles-de-la-Madeleine. It is not the largest part, but it is still important. That project relating to a salt deposit has been known now for several years, and its potential and profitability as well as market possibilities are still to be evaluated. It is a project conducted by a provincial Crown corporation, SOQUEM, that others and myself know quite well and follow very closely.

Now, about the other project, in Port Daniel, the potential of a deposit has also been identified, and, there again, it would seem that the project could be put in operation in a relatively reasonable time. Pursuant to an agreement between the government of Quebec and my department, work is now being carried out with regard to drilling and assessment of the potential in order to know whether or not the project could be put in operation in the near future. These two interesting projects might perhaps further develop the economy in the Lower St. Lawrence area.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have now had just over five years in this House, during which time I have seen a lot of government budgets that have been criticized in one way or another. The members of my party have not criticized everything in those budgets, but we find our alternate suggestions are seldom taken up by the government.

Of course, the government has indicated that this is not a budget we are debating, it is a tax bill. When I look at the budget of March 31 and cast my eyes over the economic and fiscal statement of October 20 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I notice there is not much difference in their looks or their contents. The government has indicated that it is in a hurry to get this bill passed, but I think I should remind the House that this bill arises out of the budget statement of March 31 and that the government has had some seven months in which to get the bill passed by the House.

Since the debate started a few days ago, the government has been putting up speakers every day. Today we heard from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), and yesterday we heard from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). This does not seem to indicate that the government is in any particular hurry to get this bill passed by the House.

After using the red herring of national unity, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated in Calgary earlier this month that the major issue in Canada was economic policy. After having a nice long weekend, he stated earlier this week in the House that he was very happy to be back now that the opposition is turning its mind to economic questions, rather than knocking the RCMP. Only a few days prior to that the Prime Minister decided the economic issue was an important one. I am not sure we can accept the criticism that we finally made that decision ourselves.

As for the knocking of the RCMP, I want to remind the House that on the same day the Prime Minister made that remark, the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) explained some matters in careful detail in the House. On November 8 he indicated that the fundamental principle of the parliamentary system, which is at stake here and which is being violated by the government of Canada, is that ministers of the government must take responsibility for the acts of public servants under their general direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: Later on he said that we have seen far too frequently the blaming of officials in instances where the minister should take the responsibility. We saw that in the case of Larry Stopforth, the executive assistant to the present Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), and we are now seeing it in the case of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. His final reference was to the illegal acts which the House and the country were aware of. He indicated that the purpose was to determine by whom these illegal acts were committed—

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Finance on a point of order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I feel I should rise to indicate that this is not relevant to the debate we are having at this time. This debate concerns the income tax bill, and not the RCMP, etc. I am sure all hon. members are aware of the fact that there are some rules in the House which have to be followed once in a while.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must point out to the minister that I happened to be listening closely to the hon. member. I was trying to figure what his argument on the points he raised was leading to, and I imagine that within a few seconds or minutes, he will return to the subject or perhaps satisfy the Chair that he is speaking to the point. Otherwise, I will have to call him to order.

[English]

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I should like to welcome the Minister of Finance back to the House. I assure him I am trying this up with the remarks made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce yesterday in this same debate. Referring back to the remarks made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition on Tuesday concerning illegal acts, by whom they were committed and at whose direction, he concluded by saying the following:

> They were committed, so far as is known, by members of the security services, and here I make the distinction between members of the security service and members of the regular force of the RCMP.

It was quite clear from the remarks of my leader that there was no attack by this party on the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clarke: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was trying to delude the House and himself yesterday into believing we were trying to ride to power, on this side of the House, on the backs of the RCMP.

Mr. Chrétien: That is true.

Mr. Clarke: The remarks which have been made in this House over the past week would indicate that that is not the case. It is not the purpose of my party to have anything to do with the knocking of the RCMP. I remind the Minister of Finance that it was the leader of my party who during the summer recess urged the government, in view of the worsening economic conditions in Canada, to recall parliament early and to present a new budget. Goodness knows for how many weeks and months the government has refused to bring down a new budget. The government said there would be an economic and fiscal statement, but that is not a budget. All that did is curtail debate and prevent the opposition from having a budget debate.

● (1632)

Mr. Johnston: A shameless mockery.

Mr. Clarke: I want to refer to the remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce once again. He referred to the falling dollar. We wonder if he recognizes that the falling dollar is the result of the failure of the economic policies of his colleagues. In Winnipeg, the minister said that the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar has been useful, and said "I hope it stays around for a while".

I wonder if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has talked to anybody in Canada who today has to pay the increased prices which are the obvious and unavoidable result of this lower dollar which he thinks is such a wonderful thing. While we are talking about responsibility in debate, a matter raised by the Minister of Finance, I would like also to recall the remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce yesterday when he accused hon. members on this side of the House. The remarks I refer to are found at page 758 of Hansard, if the Minister of Finance wants to check that out and if he can get away from his reading. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said:

> There are Canadian citizens on the other side of the House betting that the Canadian dollar will go down more. They are buying American dollars, Canadians sitting on the other side of the House.

Mr. Paproski: A shameful remark, and it is untrue.

Mr. Clarke: Hon. members on this side of the House, including myself, challenged the minister to name them. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) raised a point of order, or a question of privilege, to object to that sweeping falsehood which the minister was unwilling to back up. The minister said, "Yes, I can name some", and when he was pressed further he said, "Naturally, the government has to act in defence of that". I do not know whether that means the government will not let him speak. I am sure hon. members opposite often wish he would not speak. We had a similar problem when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce sat on this side of the House; some of us wished he would not speak.

Let me satisfy the Minister of Finance and get down to consideration of the economic policies of this government. In this bill, the minister asks us to authorize the borrowing of $9 billion simply to cover the continuing deficits created by the continuing mismanagement of the economy of this country by this government. I begin to wonder whether the hon. members opposite who have been pulling the strings for the last ten years under this administration really know what it is to have deficits and to overspend. I do not know whether the Minister of Finance has been coaching his colleagues, but I want to refer to some remarks made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) on Monday in the House in response to a question I put to him. I might say that my question was a serious one concerning the shortfall of the unemployment insurance fund. It is going to pay out $4 billion this year, according to the most recent projections, which will be $1.7 billion short of the amount collected from those insured and their employers.

The minister tries to make the case that the unemployment insurance system is an insurance scheme and not a welfare scheme. My question was simply how the minister thinks it is fair to have taxpayers of Canada who were not eligible to participate in this so-called insurance scheme, because they are not in insurable employment, share in this deficit of $1.7 billion. In his response the minister accused me of playing fast and loose with figures. That was the beginning of his answer. I should say "non-answer", because he never did answer my question. The minister accused me of spreading malicious, imprecise information. How irresponsible! In the first place, I mentioned only one figure. I was trying to get some information about how we might relieve these poor taxpayers who are being called upon to suffer as a result of this government's policy. I am going to talk about why we have that deficit in a few minutes, but the response of the minister was that I was being imprecise. I would like to quote his answer, as follows:

He is using the word "deficit" when he knows it is a government commitment to pay a certain amount after the floating average figure has been established.

That can be found at page 636 of Hansard for Monday of this week. If the Minister of Employment and Immigration does not know what a deficit is, how can we be sure that any hon. member opposite knows what a deficit is? For goodness sake, we are in trouble! The government is very good at creating deficits. I just wish it had the ability to recognize when we have a deficit. I am sure that the level of the Canadian dollar—it was at the level of 89 cents U.S. at one time this week—is an example of the results of the economic policies of this government. A further result we can see—the figures came out just this week concerning unemployment insurance—has to do with unemployment insurance pay-outs. I have already mentioned them, but there is an underlying figure which is very important. This should be very interesting to Canadians.

There is a growing number of unemployed—36 per cent of the total, now—whose unemployment period is longer than three months. That indicates that there is an ever-growing number of Canadians whose benefits have expired. The policies of the government seem to be forcing that number up. It seems to be a secret policy of this government to transfer to the provinces the cost of benefits for those unemployed people. After all, if people do not have unemployment insurance benefits, they have to turn to welfare. Those costs are paid by the provinces to a much larger extent than unemployment insurance costs.

Many times the government has told us that the policies proposed by hon. members on this side of the House will not work. The government has never given them a try, so I do not know how it can say they will not work. The thing that the people of Canada and everyone in this House must know is that the policies used by this government for the last ten years have not worked.

It cannot be said that the policies suggested by this side will not work. They have not been tried. There was one policy that the government felt was not inadequate and would like to borrow. Of course, they waited until they had successfully campaigned against it. I refer to the controls program. As has been said many times, the present controls program is not anything like that proposed on this side. The only similarity between the two is the name, "controls." The proposal from this side was for a total freeze of a temporary nature, 90 days, to give the government time to adjust its policies and bring inflation under control. The government somehow came up with the idea that they could do something about inflation with controls, but after two years they should realize they have not succeeded.

According to their own figures, inflation is continuing, and they are projecting over 8 per cent for this year. That is because they have done nothing to control their own expenditures. We cannot expect controls to do anything, if the government will not get their own house in order. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can put this in any better words than an article which appeared in the Courier, of Vancouver, of September 15, 1977, which stated in part:

However, the serious problem of the moment is the apparent disagreement on the economic issues which is costing Canadian taxpayers dearly. It now seems certain that Turner (an old-style Liberal), did not want a controls program, and resigned when Trudeau (a Liberal-Socialist) insisted. Macdonald—

This refers to a former minister of finance.

—was persuaded to give the controls program a chance, and after nearly two years, had been saying that a decontrol program was coming.

Instead, we know that the former Minister of Finance left. The article continues:

The Liberal party was divided on the introduction of controls and is now divided on their end. Why else did Turner resign, and . . . call for the end of controls when it is obvious that his party wanted to maintain them? Why else did Macdonald resign after making positive statements about a decontrols program?

The article continues, comparing the differences between this party's proposed controls program and that imposed by the government. It points out that the then leader of the opposition, realizing the devastating effects of inflation, proposed a temporary three-month freeze on wages and prices and even on imported goods in order to break the inflation psychology. This would have given the government time to change its spending habits. The article goes on:

Stanfield knew that controls would not stop inflation (look at inflation in the past two years!).

In fact, although many people say they like controls, prices today are rising faster than wages, just as they were in 1974.

I think I can do no better than read a little more of this article, Mr. Speaker, which is quite a good one. It continues:

The government's policies have undermined the confidence of the private investor in Canada.

We have been telling them that you cannot have people investing without confidence. It goes on:

With little new investment, few jobs are being created, unemployment is rising, the dollar is failling, and government overspending is rising. (The deficit this year is projected—

At that time it was $6,500 million, which was overspending by about $650 for every individual Canadian taxpayer. To return to the article, it reads:

After nearly ten years of Trudeau's administration Canada has the worst economic outlook ever, the highest unemployment in history, and the most divisive atmosphere in memory. The man who said he would "wrestle inflation to the ground", and that "separatism in Quebec is dead", cannot now be seen as the "saviour of Canada". Even the PQ's Jacques Parizeau has described Trudeau as the cause of separatism.

Now he is holding himself out to be the saviour. As far as the present Leader of the Opposition and others in this party are concerned, I will again read from the article as follows:

Joe Clark has been repeatedly urging the government to take steps to turn Canada's economy around. Clark has stressed the need for reduction in government spending, in government interference in the private sector, and in the rate of increase in the money supply. He knows that inflation is caused in Ottawa and can only be solved in Ottawa.

There is nothing in this tax bill or in the economic statement that is going to do anything about these ills. I do not know what the government thinks the role of the official opposition is, but they certainly do not pay it any heed. Again referring to the article, it says:

Progressive Conservative policy is for government stimulation of the economy through incentives to business, particularly small business.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard the government speak of personal tax cuts, and the Minister of Finance seems to be very proud that he has given the opposition what they want, a tax cut of $100 for the average taxpayer. That is $600 million in total for the country. But the Economic Council of Canada believe that the economy needs a boost of $3 billion.

Mr. Chrétien: You have just said we have too big a deficit. Try to reconcile the two.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance shows his inability to reconcile economic facts, just as much as the Prime Minister is unable to reconcile separatism facts. If the government stimulates the economy to the extent of $3 billion, they will get it back double and the budget will balance itself. The government does not give that a chance. If we stimulate the economy, we will find new jobs, new confidence in the business community. The jobs will go to the unemployed, who will no longer be a drain on the unemployment insurance fund. I hope the Minister of Finance will listen, because he seems to have missed the point that the people on unemployment insurance will become taxpayers. That is how he would balance the budget. On the one hand, he would no longer have to pay out large unemployment insurance benefits, and on the other the new employed would be contributing to revenue.

I would refer the minister to the United States where, in an unprecedented move 13 years ago, huge personal tax cuts—about $11 billion—were given in order to get the economy going. At the end of the taxation year it was found that the revenues were balanced exactly. The $11 billion came back in additional personal taxes either from higher incomes or from new taxpayers. I do not know what involvement the minister has with the Economic Council of Canada, but I think he owes it to himself and perhaps to the taxpayers of Canada to refer to their booklet and see what they recommend.

The other way this government seems to tackle the problem is by little "gritty" give-aways—$100 million for this or $150 million for that. And, of course, it goes to the right part of the country: we would not want anybody who does not support the Grit party to get any of these little "gritty" grants.

An hon. Member: What about Alberta?

Mr. Clarke: I do not know about it, but I can certainly tell the hon. member opposite about British Columbia.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Any hon. member seeking to be recognized should stand and have the Chair recognize him.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the hon. member opposite who did not want to get to his feet is only familiar with some part of eastern Canada. I can tell him about the last Canada Works program in British Columbia, where nine of 23 ridings got the minimum amount of $100,000. I wish the Minister of Employment and Immigration were here; perhaps he could explain why those nine ridings—eight of which are held by the opposition—got only the minimum amount, while the riding of the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo) got $4.5 million—45 times that amount. The riding of Coast Chilcotin, a Grit riding in British Columbia, got over $2 million.

If these examples are considered unusual, we should just look at the average. A government riding got five times as much, on average, as an opposition riding. I would not want to suggest there is anything wrong with that, but people may draw their own conclusions. Mr. Speaker, I should not leave the article I read from without giving credit to the writer—myself.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been listening to the hon. member's speech. He stated that some years ago the United States had a tax cut of $11 billion. I point out to the hon. member that they do not have an indexing system. With the indexing system that will apply on January 1 next, the tax cut will be about $850 million. Add to that the $700 million cut. That is 50 per cent more per capita than the cut in the United States at that time. When you measure Canada against the United States, you must always divide by ten.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, even if we accept the argument of the Minister of Finance, it would be less than half what was recommended by the Economic Council of Canada. I will ask the Minister of Finance another question which I will not allow him to answer because time is running on.

Mr. Chrétien: Great statement!

Mr. Clarke: He would probably carry on the same as in the question period, anyway. I do not think he will change his practice now. Look at the results of the economic policies put in place by this government. Look at the unemployment insurance payments. According to the government's own figures, payments out this year amount to $4 billion. Collections, according to their figures, are $2.3 billion. According to simple arithmetic, there is a $1.7 billion deficit. The August, 1977, payments were up 25 per cent over August last year. The August, 1977, payments were up 25 per cent over July of this year. Responsibility for that can only be laid at the feet of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues and their so-called economic policies.

The Minister of Finance does not seem to be aware of some of our policies. Therefore, I want to tell him that the leader of my party has called for a massive overhaul of the unemployment insurance system. In particular, we want to eliminate abuses, not only by individuals but abuses of the system by the system. Individual abuses arise when the so-called ski teams received their cheques in the mail at a time when they were not properly looking for work. During the last mail strike thousands of unemployment insurance cheques went unclaimed in Toronto. Presumably those people were too busy at work or play to pick up their unemployment insurance cheques.

I referred to abuse of the system by the system. I refer to the situation which allows a high income person to collect unemployment insurance. On the west coast there are some fishermen who earn large incomes. One I know earns $60,000 during the season. During the off season he is allowed to collect unemployment insurance. It is within the rules. We on this side maintain that is not the purpose for which unemployment insurance was designed. The government must decide whether it will be an insurance system or a welfare system. The way it is being operated, with people not entitled to benefits receiving them, it is surely a welfare system. The taxpayers have to pick up the deficit. The Minister of Employment and Immigration can call it a commitment rather than a deficit. I do not care what he calls it. It is still a deficit that has to be paid for by the taxpayer. In some cases it is the taxpayer who is not entitled to the benefits under the program.

We recognize there are great regional disparities. There are places in the province of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce where jobs go unfilled because there are not enough people to fill them. We also recognize that in some of the Atlantic areas there are unemployment rates approaching 30 per cent. The system should work to provide protection for the person genuinely out of work. It should not be done on the backs of those who are not entitled to coverage under the program.

I want to deal briefly with one specific area of the tax bill. I refer to the proposed changes having to do with life insurance. The policies proposed by the government with regard to life insurance are full of inconsistencies. The Minister of Finance is proposing that the interest on loans taken out against the cash value of life insurance should not be eligible for deduction. This is in direct contradiction of any of the rules of the Income Tax Act, which clearly provides that any expense laid out to earn income is deductible.

If that is not a sufficient inconsistency, the minister then says that if you already have a loan from the insurance company, you can continue to deduct the interest on that loan. However, if you want to take out another loan next year, you will not be able to deduct the interest. What is the taxpayer to do? He is faced with all of these inconsistencies. He will not know what way to turn.

The minister's predecessor said they would not allow the interest on insurance policy loans because there was no obligation to repay the loan: it was not like a loan from the bank. The insurance company has a responsibility to its policyholders. Sure as death, the insurance company will be repaid that loan even if they have to wait until the taxpayer dies. It is nonsense to suggest the loan does not have to be repaid.

The government also says it is going to tax the gain on the investment portion of the life insurance policy. They said they would not reach into the grave and tax it when the taxpayer dies, but they will tax it if a policy is cashed in or a loan is taken out. All that will do is force the taxpayer who wants to make a loan against his insurance policy to pay a higher rate of interest. Many insurance policies with cash values have built-in, guaranteed low interest rates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PRIVATE BILLS

[English]

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, when we closed off last Thursday I was discussing the social responsibility of Bell Canada with regard to its subscribers. I wish to review briefly what I said. When Bell Canada was given the monopoly for telephone service in this country there were some provisions. One was that they would be subject to regulation with regard to their capitalization; that is, they would have to come to parliament whenever they wanted to increase their capital. From the day they received the right to monopolize telephone service in this country, particularly in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, they have worked consistently to de-emphasize the controls, little as they are, which parliament exerts over the company.

Bill C-1001 is a perfect example of Bell Canada attempting to escape even the puny examination of parliament in terms of increased capitalization. They are going to try to escape the scrutiny of members of parliament as they go merrily on their way accruing for themselves greater profits, greater growth and greater control in their particular field and related fields.

I am absolutely opposed to this bill. As the representative of the constituents of Nickel Belt, I would be derelict in my duty if I did not point out to Bell Canada that in my area there are still cases of ten families on one line. I would be derelict in my duty if I sat down and allowed the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) to have his little bill so that he could run across to the Senate and get it passed in one day, after which I would have to face my constituents and they would say to me, "How is it that there are still ten families on a line? Why did you let Bell Telephone have its way?"

I intend to use all the opportunities available to me. This is one of the few occasions on which a backbencher has an opportunity to say, "Hold it, boys. How are the people of Canada going to benefit from this bill in terms of the service they receive? How will this proposal to increase capitalization lead to better service?" The vice-president opened up the books the other day to show me the schedule under which it is proposed to improve non-urban service. I looked in the schedule for places in my constituency, and I could not see any. I asked him why Nickel Belt was not in there somewhere. "Oh," he said, "you must be in the third quarter of 1982." Well, Mr. Speaker, my response to that is he had better take this bill and come back with it in 1982. After we have been given this improved telephone service in my riding, I am prepared to go along with the bill. However, until that time I cannot say, in good conscience, to the Bell Telephone company, "Yes, you can increase your capitalization." Suddenly, the Bell Telephone company, like St. Paul, is aware of—

Mr. O'Connell: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It relates to the date the hon. member has given—1982. This is the second time I have heard it in the debate. The CRTC, the regulatory body, has ordered the company to direct itself to a rural improvement program over four years ending in 1980. It applies to the hon. member's area as well as to others. It is not 1982—and this is not a matter for parliament; it is a regulatory matter not dealt with in this bill.

Mr. Rodriguez: I wish the hon. member for Scarborough East would not try to filibuster this bill by getting up continually to raise spurious points of order. I am glad he raised this point, though. It shows how important it was for some regulatory body to point out to the Bell Telephone company that it had a responsibility toward subscribers in rural areas. One might have thought this would have been one of their first concerns. Why should it be necessary for the CRTC to tell them this? I suggest it is because the corporation has no social responsibility to the people they serve. It has one concept in mind, which is to maximize profits, minimize regulations and keep on growing.

That may be a legitimate goal for Bell Telephone, just as it is legitimate, I suppose, for INCO to get to Guatemala first. But is it a legitimate goal for Canada? I say that what is good enough for Bell Telephone, INCO and Falconbridge, is not good enough for Canada. We have to set our own goals. The goal of this party with respect to Bell Telephone is service, and we have long held that from a philosophical point of view Bell Telephone company ought to be under public control so it can provide the kind of service which we think is desirable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the time allotted to him has expired.

An hon. Member: Let him go on.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am prepared to do so.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but I was persuaded to do so by the eloquence of my hon. friend from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). Since he has persuaded me, I thought I would spend a few minutes talking about the merits of public ownership, because I happen to come from a province of which my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) was the premier and at that time he undertook to put the telephone system there under public ownership. I want to argue that the same thing should be done with regard to Bell. We should not tolerate a telephone system in this country whose main objective is to make a profit for its shareholders without really caring about the service it provides.

It is only normal that in the case of a company whose primary objective is profit, one should see a deterioration of service in rural areas. It costs more to provide service to rural areas than to the larger centres: maintenance is more difficult and it is harder to make a profit. For these reasons, people in Nickel Belt or similar areas will not get the service which people in urban areas receive. They certainly will not get the service the people in rural Saskatchewan or rural Manitoba receive, where there are publicly-owned telephone networks. In the case of a publicly-owned network, the main priority is service to the people who own it, namely, the people of the province. That is not the motivation of Bell Telephone: that is why I am not interested in expediting passage of this bill. I do not care whether they get the bill this year or not. I do not care at all, because the only reason they want this bill is in order to maximize profits for their shareholders.

Mr. O'Connell: What about the jobs?

Mr. Nystrom: That is the response we always get from a Liberal or a Tory government. What about the jobs under INCO? The whole philosophy of the government is the "trickle down" theory. They believe that if you give enough to the big corporations, it will eventually trickle down to the small guy at the bottom. But what happens when a big corporation wants more money all of a sudden, or doesn't really give a damn about our country—like INCO—and goes to invest money in Guatemala or Indonesia and says, "To hell with the workers in Sudbury"?

An hon. Member: They have not said that.

Mr. Nystrom: They have. After getting all kinds of tax concessions and other benefits from the federal government, they make sure that a lot of the profits they made in this country are invested elsewhere. When we attack the large corporations, or when we delay the passage of a measure which will benefit a large corporation, we are criticized for not thinking about the number of jobs involved, or preventing ordinary people from getting something. Where are the government's priorities?

I was talking the other day about veterans' pensions. Tomorrow is Remembrance Day. Over the last four years or so, the government has intentionally short-changed veterans on disability pension by about $40 million. But today we were discussing legislation which will give the corporations some $1.2 billion, and at this moment there is before us a private member's bill to give the Bell Telephone company more dollars and a lot more opportunity to maximize its profits.

Mr. O'Connell: I am sure the hon. member does not wish to mislead the House intentionally. This bill does not give Bell Telephone anything in terms of money. It permits them a higher capital ceiling. Even to put a few more people on the telephone in the north requires the expenditure of capital, and more funds are needed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has the floor.

Mr. Nystrom: The apologist for Bell Telephone is filibustering again by bringing in another red herring. This bill seeks to minimize the regulations so as to make sure that Bell Canada does not have to come back before parliament as it has in the past. This is a way of providing Bell Canada, in the indirect sense, with more money, giving it an easier opportunity to maximize its profits.

I want to make the argument today for nationalizing Bell Canada, for having a publicly owned telephone system in this country. Any industry such as communications, transportation, or any of the resource industries, I think should be publicly owned so that they can provide a service to all the people, rather than maximizing profits for a few people, many of whom may be foreigners.

Many people in parliament, particularly in the Conservative party, may claim that public ownership is not very efficient. They say the public corporations cannot make a profit or operate efficiently. I would argue that in the case of telephones the publicly run corporations are run a hell of a lot more efficiently than Bell Canada. For the benefit of the Tory member who is laughing, I will give him some statistics. People in my constituency are paying a lot less for telephone service than people who live in the constituency of Nickel Belt. My constituents are getting a lot quicker service than those who live in Nickel Belt.

One of the shocks I had when I moved down to Ottawa after I was first elected in 1968 was the inefficiency of the telephone system here. One had to wait so long before getting service in Ontario and Quebec compared to the situation in the province of Saskatchewan. You wait a long time because the customer here is not important. The whole motivation of the capitalist system, or free enterprise system, is the maximization of profit. Bell Canada has a monopoly so it can screw the customer. It has no competition.

By contrast, in my province the priority is the customer, the client, which the company is there to serve. The company is not in existence to make a profit. It conducts its operation with a lot more business skill than does Bell Canada in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Let me give the House some comparable statistics. In the city of Regina there is a publicly owned telephone system. Let me quote the statistics as at August, 1976. In the city of Regina there were 72,400 telephones. Private subscribers paid $5 a month for service. Business telephones cost $11.85 a month. In the city of Halifax where there were 96,249 telephones, private subscribers paid $8.95 and business subscribers $26.

I do not hear the one and only Conservative member in the House, or Liberal members interjecting with cat calls. I have given a real comparison between a publicly owned telephone system and a privately owned telephone system in cities of comparable size. We find that people in Regina get telephone service at almost half the cost of those in Halifax. The business community pays for its telephones less than half what it costs in Halifax. So we have a private enterprise corporation making it tough even for its business friends by charging more than twice what people in Saskatchewan pay.

I have always said, Mr. Speaker, that the socialists in this country are the real friends of small business. To prove this all one needs to do is look at the telephone rates. Business telephones cost $11 in Regina and $26 in Halifax. Who is the friend of the small businessman?

Mr. Parent: What about Toronto?

Mr. Nystrom: Someone says "give us Toronto". In the city of Toronto a private subscriber pays $7.45 a month for a telephone.

Mr. Parent: That is less than Halifax.

Mr. Nystrom: It is less than Halifax, and that proves my point. Toronto is a big city with some 1.4 million telephones. Because there are so many telephones, you can afford to provide service at a lower rate than you can in Halifax. You do not have this kind of consideration with the publicly owned telephone system. You do not discriminate against people who live in smaller centres. Under the free enterprise system—or the so-called free enterprise system, it is not free at all—the smaller the centre, the higher the rate and the worse the service. This is one more good argument why the telephone system should be nationalized, and it is why I am not going to facilitate passage of this bill.

In Montreal there are roughly 1.4 million subscribers. Surprisingly enough, the rate in Montreal is exactly the same as in Toronto, $7.45 for private subscribers, and $22.10 for business telephones. So again the big city gets the better deal because it has the volume. Small centres have to help subsidize subscribers in big cities, and they help subsidize the profits of a large corporation.

Let me turn to other cities, such as Winnipeg. In Winnipeg there is a publicly owned telephone system, as the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent) knows. There are 237,000 subscribers. Incidentally, this telephone system was set up many years ago by a Conservative government and it has been run very efficiently. In 1976 the rates in Winnipeg were the lowest of any city in Canada. I am sad to say that they are even 10 cents lower than the rates in Regina. The Winnipeg rate for private subscribers in August, 1976, was $4.90, and $11.65 for business telephones.

What is the situation in St. John's, Newfoundland? I am sure that if this corporation had any feeling for people in Newfoundland, it would make sure that the people there had telephone service at a very low rate. In St. John's there are roughly 46,000 telephones.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): But what is the comparison in capital investment there?

Mr. Nystrom: I am talking about the rate charged. In St. John's, Newfoundland, the people are charged $8 a month. Business telephones cost $23 a month. In Newfoundland, of all places, Mr. Speaker, people are charged more for telephones than people in Montreal or Toronto! Surely to goodness this is another argument for public ownership of the telephone system in this country.

There is a privately owned telephone system in Vancouver, with about half a million subscribers. The charge for a private line is $8.05, and $24.20 for a business telephone.

Let me now turn to Edmonton, that great free enterprise province of the Conservative party. There, "Peter the Red" has a publicly owned telephone system. I notice that the one Conservative in the House is not even reacting to my comments. The rate in Edmonton for residence service is $5.80, which is the third lowest in Canada, with $5 in Regina and $4.90 in Winnipeg.

Mr. Parent: What is the rate in St. Catharines?

Mr. Nystrom: I do not have the rates for St. Catharines with me but I am willing to bet that the rates there are a lot higher. If the hon. member wants to defend Bell Canada, then he can rise in his place when I am finished.

In Sherbrooke the rate is $6.20 for private subscribers, and every single city which has a private telephone system has higher rates, in many cases 70 per cent to 80 per cent higher, than the rates charged by publicly owned telephone systems such as those in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Alberta. If the members of this House are interested in serving their constituents by giving them a telephone service at the lowest possible cost in these days of high inflation, high unemployment, and a depressed economy, they should join us in arguing that Bell Canada should be nationalized so as to serve the people of Canada better. This company should not be owned by a few shareholders who happen to be fortunate enough to have a few bucks in their pockets, possibly because they inherited those bucks from their granddads or their fathers. Let us take a look at some of these people who own Bell Telephone, some of these little old widows and orphans of the Conservative and Liberal parties who support this great free enterprise system in Canada. We find that the shareholders are large companies, and there are not many widows involved.

Let me refer to a number of them on this list I have, which includes Associated Investors Ltd., with 2,400 common shares of Bell Telephone; Canada Life, owning thousands and thousands of shares; The Canada Permanent Investment Company with some 5,000 shares; Canada Permanent Pooled, 10,000 common shares.

An hon. Member: And who owns those companies?

Mr. Nystrom: Who owns the shares of those companies? I suppose they are owned by other companies.

Then we have on the list the Canada Trust Investors Equity owning 15,000 shares; we have Canada Trust R.S.P. owning 62,000 common shares of Bell Telephone; we have Canadian International Investor Trust owning some 12,000 common shares; we have Commercial Finance owning 9,200 common shares; we have Confederated Life owning 62,400 shares, and

I could go on and on down the list. It includes Eaton Commonwealth owning 50,000 shares; Investors Growth owning 320,000 preferred "E" shares.

An hon. Member: What about senators?

Mr. Nystrom: Probably there are many senators who own shares of Bell Telephone. The ones I have named are a few of the shareholders, Mr. Speaker, and as you can see they include very few small ordinary citizens.

Really what the Liberal and Conservative members here are interested in is facilitating the passage of a bill that will make it easier for one of the large, uncaring and insensitive corporations in our country, to go on taking millions of dollars out of the pockets of the ordinary Canadian citizen.

I happen to note a headline in the Ottawa Citizen just handed me which states that Toronto is Bell's ringing headache; that is the city of Toronto. Perhaps some of the Ontario members would be interested in commenting on that. I do not know whether the hon. member from Toronto who is sponsoring the bill has seen that clipping or would care to comment on it.

There are many people in the Conservative and Liberal parties who say, and of course the Conservatives are not too interested in this debate today, that socialists, or people who are interested in public ownership, are not efficient because such companies cannot make any profits, and so on. I have already quoted to you the very low rate provided by publicly owned telephone systems in Canada, as I maintain all telephone systems should be owned. The lowest rates in the country and the best service are provided by the publicly owned telephone companies on the prairies.

Not only that, I find that in Saskatchewan, in spite of very low rates over many, many years, and in spite of the fact that our province is very rural and it costs a great deal to put telephone service in because of the hundreds of thousands of miles of prairie and the little villages, towns, and farms strung out mile after mile, all of which means a very expensive network to build and maintain, the company is still providing the service at the lowest rates in the country, and still comes up making a profit.

Let me quote here from the annual report of the Saskatachewan Telecommunication Company which is Sasktel. Liberal members might be interested in knowing that at a recent convention of the Saskatchewan Conservative party one of the delegates moved a resolution which would consider the possibility, as I understand it, of selling Sasktel. The leader of the Conservative party got up to his feet, took the microphone, and demanded that the resolution be withdrawn. That indicates that even an extreme right-winger like the leader of the Saskatchewan Conservative party, who demanded that the resolution be withdrawn, is interested in protecting Sasktel.

We can also refer to the Liberal party and to the late Ross Thatcher who was premier of the province. He did not do anything to sell off Sasktel or the Saskatchewan Power Corporation, both of which are publicly owned corporations in that province. Indeed, he made sure they were continued as publicly owned corporations. If he had tried to do so there would have been a revolt on behalf of the people.

I started to quote from the annual report of Sasktel—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the previous speakers and I note that Bill C-1001 which has been renumbered now and again deals especially with an application from Bell Canada to be authorized to increase its number of common shares on the market and sell more shares than it is entitled to do under its existing charter to obtain new funds. We note that it is a financial problem.

I am aware that the companies gathered under the name of Bell Canada provide employment to thousands of workers in the operation of the telephone network system. Some subsidiaries manufacture telecommunication appliances while others are specialized in research. On the whole, it is an organization which has made Canada a forerunner in the telecommunication technology throughout the world while providing employment to thousands of Canadians. Quite true. I am a champion of free enterprise and I am pleased to promote it. However, it is proprer to control the development of large companies which can become monopolies. This is why I feel that it is normal to check the amendments requested which, in my view, would remove one of the controls which it is possible to have on that monopoly on behalf of Canadians. In the midst of inflation, while governments are trying to control rising prices and we have just seen our telephone bills increased, we wonder if there is any justification for these repeated requests by Bell Canada which complains that it does make enough profits.

The real question that one must ask is: Does not Bell Canada, with all the profits derived from its several subsidiaries, make sizeable profits? Indeed, the telephone company itself, with all the operation costs involved, can hardly make the sizeable profits required, as is the case for Bell Canada, to make its shares more attractive. But its subsidiaries amply compensate, in our opinion at least, for the slack periods of the telephone company. Without accusing Bell Canada and its subsidiaries of resorting to administrative sleight of hand, let me say that we find the company's request premature and excessive, considering the present economic situation. It must be kept in mind that Bell Canada is a monopoly and it is in this perspective that one must determine what margin of profit is acceptable. Moreover, since Bell Canada is a monopoly, we are in a position to require that it provide all users everywhere in Canada with a service comparable to that in large centres.

Therefore, considering its peculiar and privileged situation, we are demanding that Bell Canada release with the balance sheet of the telephone company those of its subsidiaries so that we might have a fair idea of the justification for its request. Otherwise its claims will not come to an end since obviously the operational costs of a telephone system will always go up. However, from an administrative point of view, it is important that all members of parliament have the opportunity to obtain appropriate information. They should not be deprived, because of legislation, of the right to look into the company's administrative mechanism from time to time.

It must be recognized that we are not dealing with a poor company since its revenues amounted to more than $200 million in 1976. It would be interesting to know how much it cost to provide free telephone service to over 20,000 employees of this company. What are the salaries of its senior managers? According to my information, there are average salaries of over $100,000. How did the company manage to reduce wage settlements with its regular employees by several million dollars? Doubtless, it was inspired by the fight against inflation. I have here an article published in the newspaper La Presse dated December 4, 1976, on the hearing held to take into consideration the request of the company. Let me quote one paragraph:

> The contingent of company officials and its troop of lawyers and accountants yesterday evacuated the third floor of the Chateau Laurier where they had been staying for five weeks. A similar hearing lasted 45 days in 1968 and cost the company $760,000.

One must admit those are extravagant expenses. It is high time the company worry about the administrative aspect of its business. When we realize what extravagant expenses are incurred in the various sectors of its administration, I feel we have reason to hesitate in giving our support to a bill that would help reduce the possibilities of obtaining relevant information in due course.

Where telephone line installation is concerned, we know full well there are difficulties and that the service could be improved. Out in the country, we can still find party lines being used by five to eight households. It seems to me the company could improve that situation. I have here a clipping from the newspaper La Presse giving a summary of the difficulties encountered.

This situation is not affecting only individuals. In the city of Laval, a number of businessmen are complaining that they cannot get telephone services even in industrial developments which were planned a long time ago. I am quoting from this article: In Fabreville, the delay in telephone installation is due to a pole problem. It is Quebec Hydro which is responsible for putting up telephone poles for Bell Canada—explained Mr. Albert Gagnon, a Laval contractor. The dealings between the two corporations are sometimes slow, but a great many people think that it is difficult to obtain a telephone line, which is quite embarrassing for us and greatly untrue.

The clients of suburban contractors want absolutely to break the feeling of isolation by having the telephone installed in a number of subdivisions. If they cannot get the telephone, buyers will become rare. People do not stop complaining: this is a ridiculous situation, Mr. Roger Brousseau, Deputy Industrial Commissioner for the City of Laval, is reported as saying. We work hard to attract industries, everything is planned, carefully prepared, but people complain constantly about the telephone service. There is no problem with Quebec Hydro, why are there problems with Bell Canada? The poles are there, but some industrialists have to wait months when only 500 feet from their plant their neighbour has had the service for a long time. I have seen it in my area. They were waiting for Quebec Hydro to install a pole in order to connect someone who had asked for the service a long time ago.

Some people claim that Bell Canada had them wait several months before installing a private line. But when they asked for a business line, they were told they could have got it in two days. The only difference is in the price: a residential line costs $6.50 in Chomedey and a business line $19.00 a month. In Montreal, it's $7.10 and $20.75 a month.

I think the company representatives should use part of their surplus to improve the telephone service in all the areas where it is necessary. I admit that since a 27 year-old genial inventor discovered the principle of voice transmission over telephone lines on July 26, 1874, cities have grown larger, regionalization has been made necessary by modern life and contacts with telephone operators have become less personal. This modernization offers a number of advantages but there are also disadvantages. The number of telephone calls has considerably increased. Bell Canada personnel is generally tactful, courteous and poised. The organization of such a communication system obviously requires skilled staff; to this we can add repair work which is not always an easy task, especially in winter. When there is a storm, they have to set to work on Sunday, in the evening, at any time; the repairs must be made as quickly as possible.

There are delays especially in telephone installation and I think that the company, which surely wants to keep a rather well-established reputation, should direct its planning efforts in this area. I have here an article from the newspaper La Presse, dealing with the present situation in the province of Quebec. I quote:

> There are 31 telephone companies in Quebec but Bell Canada alone accounts for 90 per cent of the Quebec telephone industry.
> Actually, Bell Canada holds the most interesting operation areas, namely the main urban centres where rates are higher because of the larger population which can be served and where operations are less costly because of the proximity of services.
> For example, one telephone installation in Montreal costs over $800.00 whereas one installation on the North Shore by Quebec Telephone costs $4000.00.
> Bell has nearly three million telephones installed whereas the other thirty companies put together have hardly 300,000 sets.
> The biggest company operating exclusively in Quebec, the Quebec Telephone, a branch of an American company, has only 190,000 sets installed, even if they cover 40 per cent of the province of Quebec. Needless to say, the other companies are rather small businesses.

I shall conclude by quoting an editorial published quite some time ago, on December 28, 1971, two days before the New Year, but since it summarized a serious situation and also made an important suggestion to Bell Canada, I think it would be appropriate to conclude by reading it. The editorialist wrote about Bell Canada:

> Bell Canada gave a very personal gift to its subscribers just before Christmas—an increase in monthly rates. For many people, 50 cents is not a tragic increase, but it is different for many others.
> We shall not argue that the telephone has become a necessity nearly of the same order as food. In an era of mordern communications, the telephone is part of the effective operation of a world which has become a victim of its innovations and its intelligence. Bell Canada can rest comfortably in the knowledge that it has a monopoly and that no competitor can bother it.
> However, we should like to take this opportunity to make a valid observation to this company. You probably remember the adventure of the dozen boys and girls who got lost in the woods of the Joliette area a few weeks ago. Searches were undertaken as soon as they were missed at a certain place. Two courageous young men walked all night through the snow and discovered a public telephone in a desolate place. They were saved. But were they really? The first question they asked each other was: "Do you have a dime?" One of them found this miraculous item, a measly dime, in his pocket. What would have happened if they had had no money? They had safety within their reach, but they could not have made contact. They could have suffered a terrible fate because of this.
> All this goes to say that Bell Canada never gives anything free. Even in a telephone booth you must pay ten cents before reaching the operator simply to ask for information. Then, they will say that Mother Bell thinks of us. This is a striking example of the lack of responsibility of a company whose structures are often debatable.

And the editorialist closes with a suggestion:

> —at least correct this anomaly in telephone booths; the communication should be given first without the customer having to deposit this famous dime. There are other aspects to public telephone than its non-urgent use.

I believe that this suggestion deserves to be considered by Bell Canada.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate and to express some surprise that an hon. member from Saskatchewan, the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), and a member like myself, members who live in provinces which have publicly owned telephone systems which for generations have consistently supplied efficient service at substantially lower rates than now provided by Bell Canada, should participate in the debate while Liberals and Conservatives from Ontario and Quebec, who should be protecting the interests of their constituents, remain silent on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Orlikow: Let me point out, as did the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, that the publicly owned telephone systems in Manitoba and Saskatchewan were not some kind of wild experiments instituted by radical governments. I do not remember precisely when the Saskatchewan telephone system was set up as a publicly owned utility, but in my province of Manitoba the telephone system for the whole province became publicly owned and operated in 1908, long before the NDP, the CCF or its predecessor, the Independent Labour Party, were formed.

It was formed long before J. S. Woodsworth, the founder of the CCF and the predecessor in the seat now occupied by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), came to this parliament. That publicly owned system was established by a Conservative premier of Manitoba, Sir R. P. Roblin, the grandfather of a later Manitoba Conservative premier, Duff Roblin, and the people of Manitoba have benefited every year since.

I am not going to go over the comparable rates for various cities, but I want to point out to hon. members from Ontario and Quebec, who should be interested, that in the 15 years I have been here there has not been a year in which the rate for telephone service for a month in the city of Winnipeg has been higher than that in the city of Ottawa. And Winnipeg is bigger than Ottawa. We are told by representatives of Bell Canada, when it suits them, that it is very expensive to instal and operate telephones in very big cities because very complicated and sophisticated equipment is required, so I have to assume that, if Bell Canada tells the truth—and I assume it does sometimes—if anything, it would cost more to instal an efficient telephone system in Winnipeg than it would in Ottawa. But every year since I have been here the monthly charge for telephone service in Winnipeg has been substantially less than the amount charged by Bell Canada in the city of Ottawa. Yet we have this strange silence of Ontario and Quebec members and the even stranger introduction of this bill by a member from Toronto.

If this bill is passed—and I can assure the hon. member it will not be passed very easily, if it is passed at all—it will give to Bell Canada the authority and power to charge the subscribers of telephone service in Ontario and Quebec even more than it does now, and to rip off the subscribers even more than it has been able to do up until now. I would not have expected the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), who is one of the better members on the Liberal side, to introduce this kind of bill.

Bell Canada comes here and tells members of parliament that this is a bill which simply relates to the company's ability and methodology of capitalization, including the removal of the scrutiny of the appropriate regulatory government agency, which at the present time is the CRTC, and Bell Canada advances reasons, which I will try to analyze briefly, why that kind of regulation—which we have had until now and which, in my view, has not been very successful because Bell Canada has been permitted increases in its rates almost every year since I have been here—is not necessary.

If it passes, this bill would grant Bell Canada the power to borrow, issue stocks, bonds, debentures or other securities as the company deems necessary. It would also give Bell the right to fix whatever price on such sales that it wishes. Certain clauses of the bill would provide Bell with the authority to establish such voting rights, bylaws, procedures and alterations to share issues as Bell may deem necessary.

The present authorized capital of the company is $1.75 billion. Bell proposes a capitalization capacity of $5 billion. It proposes to broaden the company's incidental and auxilliary powers, and to provide the company with the authority for the alteration, by letters patent, of the company's objectives and powers. This would be achieved by revoking the relevant clauses in Bell's act of incorporation and replacing them with the authority granted under the Canada Corporations Act, and the authority for using letters patent as outlined in the Telesat Canada Act. Bell wants to be allowed to change the rate of interest payable on overdue phone bills to "a rate equal to the prime rate as described in section 178(2) of the Canada Corporations Act" instead of the present rate allowed by the CRTC of 6 per cent. These changes might not seem very startling or significant. However, the essence of the bill is to remove Bell from any kind of effective regulation and, in effect, to treat Bell as an ordinary corporate citizen.

Let us look at what happens now when Bell wants the kind of major change it is proposing here in this bill. The bill has to be approved by parliament first, and I would have hoped hon. members from Ontario and Quebec, whose constituents are mainly affected by anything Bell does, would have been participating in this debate because of the importance of the telephone system in the life of every citizen in Ontario and Quebec. In addition to that, after the bill is passed here it goes to a committee where representations can be made by interested organizations.

We know from earlier discussions on similar bills and from representations which have been made to the CRTC—and before the CRTC had authority, to the Canadian Transport Commission—that the most diverse organizations made representations in connection with Bell Canada. You had unions, consumer organizations, the Ontario government, the Quebec government, municipal governments, making representations to the CTC or CRTC because they knew the importance of watching Bell Telephone. They knew that Bell—I do not blame it—a privately owned corporation, is interested in making as much money as it can. The various organizations I have mentioned knew that increasing the rates more than they needed to be increased would dearly cost the people they represented, so they made representations on behalf of them.

The silence of Liberal and Conservative members of parliament from Ontario and Quebec is interesting and significant. The changes which are proposed to take place in the Bell structure and the ability of Bell to do what it wants which are contained in this bill, may not seem startling or significant. But the effect of this bill would be to remove Bell from any kind of effective regulation and treat it as an ordinary corporate citizen.

I suggest to the mover of this motion that one does not have to be a socialist to recognize the importance of regulating a system such as Bell Telephone. Bell is a monopoly; it has almost 100 per cent of the telephone communications business in Ontario and Quebec. Bell did not always have this monopoly, but because of its superior power it has driven all its competitors out of business. We say that if we must have a monopoly—and we make no excuse for our belief, if a monopoly is the best way to operate a service—it is much better to have a public monopoly than a private one.

It is interesting that in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec, neither of which has ever had an NDP or CCF government, the electrical power systems are publicly owned. The hydro system in Ontario was made a public utility by a Conservative government almost at the same time Mr. Roblin made a public utility out of the Manitoba telephone system. The Quebec hydro electric system was made a public utility by a Liberal government in 1962 because it realized, as have many jurisdictions, that if a monopoly is the most efficient way of providing a service, a publicly owned monopoly is best.

We have a privately owned monopoly of the telephone system in Ontario and Quebec. What this bill proposes to do is give that private monopoly the kind of power that would permit and encourage it to increase its rates, to manipulate the books, to purchase more subsidiaries, to channel more of the profits from the subscribers even where the rates are at least partially regulated by the CTC or CRTC, into subsidiaries, wholly or mainly owned by Bell, over which there is no regulation, and which are able to amass profits in the tens and hundreds of millions of dollars.

Bell wants to be able to increase capitalization of its debt or equity when it pleases, without approval of the CRTC or a public hearing. I do not have much trust in Bell, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe it is concerned about its subscribers or its employees.

I have in front of me an article in which Mr. Andy Stewart, President of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, is quoted. The article from The Last Post of November, 1977, deals with the question of indexing pensions. I know this is not the time to discuss that question but I should like to put Mr. Stewart's comments on the record. The article reports him as follows:

> When the chief executive officer of Bell Canada retired, Stewart said, he received a lump sum payment of $575,000, was made a member of the board of directors at $201,000 a year and was guaranteed a $100,000-a-year pension when he fully retired.

I know Bell Canada knows how to protect the interests of its shareholders, and certainly the interests of its corporate management, but I do not think it is very interested in providing the cheapest possible service for its subscribers. The way in which it has reduced the number of its employees so drastically in the last few years indicates pretty clearly that it is not interested in protecting the rights of its employees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being six o'clock, pursuant to order made Thursday, October 27, 1977, this House stands adjourned until Monday, November 14, 1977, at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ALLEGED WRONGFUL DENIAL OF RIGHT OF PEOPLE TO KNOW ABOUT URANIUM CARTEL REGULATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order No. 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), if given unanimity, the following motion arising from a judgment of His Lordship, the Chief Justice of Ontario, Mr. Evans, concerning a regulation passed by the Energy Control Board and approved by order in council by the cabinet on September 23, 1976, which made it an offence, among other things, to discuss an unlawful uranium cartel which was agreed to be set up with the consent and support of the government of Canada.

Against the legality of the said regulation an application was made to the courts by the Leader of the Opposition and other members of this House. The application for relief was denied by the court.

Although parts of the said regulations have been altered recently, the principle of the judgment remains, that this government clandestinely approved of a regulation that denies parliamentary privilege and as well the rights of the people to know what is going on and denies freedom of the press and media, and in fact under said judgment it is apparent that what was done was within the power of the government.

Therefore, I move:

As this House considers the said regulation and the order in council to be totally unjustifiable and dangerous it is necessary to inform the people of the unlawful action and wrongdoing of the government which constitutes an arbitrary and perilous denial of the democratic rights of the Canadian people, and, for members of this House, a derogation of parliamentary principle.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON POSSIBILITY OF DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the serious allegations regarding the maintenance of a domestic security network of informants and agents by the Canadian Armed Forces, which has allegedly enabled them to supply detailed reports of the activities of unions, and of other legal groups, to the federal government, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House urges the Minister of National Defence to make a statement on motions on whether domestic intelligence activities have been carried out by the Canadian Armed Forces and, if so, under whose authorization and for what purpose.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF ACTIVITIES OF SECURITY GROUPS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the disclosures in the media today clearly indicating interference and influence from the ministerial level in reference to the RCMP, which shows further ministerial irresponsibility and culpability; and in view of the undisputed fact that the conduct of security matters in Canada by the RCMP has been of the highest calibre before interventions by the Solicitor General's department and the setting up of the police and security planning and analysis branch of the same department, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the said security planning and analysis branch activities in every regard be referred to a special committee set up by this House with the right to call witnesses and obtain and subpoena documents.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL THAT ALL SECURITY DECISIONS BE MADE BY COMMISSIONER—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that all Canadians have more faith in the RCMP than they do in the Prime Minister and this government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hurlburt: —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

That immediate action be taken to have all security decisions made by the commissioner of the RCMP until after the next federal election, at which time a new prime minister will take office in the name of Joe Clark.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER SECURITY PLANNING GROUP HAS OPERATIONAL ROLE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and it concerns the security planning and analysis group. As the minister will recall, when that group was originally announced by his predecessor twice removed, the minister made it clear at that time—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All of them should have been removed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Clark: —that the functions of that group would be simply to analyse information and advise the minister. He went on to say: "The group has no operational duties". Will the Solicitor General tell the House whether the security planning and analysis group now carries out operational duties, or is involved in any way in the carrying out of the operations for anyone else?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it has been explained time and time again, and as recently as last April or May, when members of that organization appeared before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in order to explain their estimates. The question was put a number of times by the hon. member for Yukon and the answer was given at that time. There has been no change. That group does not have any operational responsibilities.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, in order to understand what the Solicitor General is saying, is he saying that this group is not involved in any way whatsoever with the operational activities of any other branch or agency of the government of Canada?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, obviously the group receives information from other agencies which have operational capabilities, in particular from the RCMP security services for the purposes of analysis.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has now said that this group receives information from operational groups. Is it involved in giving instructions or directions, which would be operational, to any other agency of the government of Canada, including the security services?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I have examined the matter in detail with the members of that group, and it is quite clear they are not involved in operations. They are on the receiving end of the information gathered by other agencies.

POSSIBILITY MINISTER MISLED BY SECURITY PLANNING GROUP

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the function of that group, as we understand it from the minister and the terms of reference, has been an advisory role to keep the minister advised. Frequently in this House the minister has, to his own discomfort, admitted that he has been badly briefed presumably by the security and analysis group. Will he tell the House whether the group had information which it did not pass along to him resulting in his not knowing what he should have known, or did they not have that information and were they consequently not performing their functions effectively?

● (1417)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I ever indicated that I had been mislead by that group. If the hon. member wishes to raise specific instances, I would be pleased to reply to him.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Central Nova.

ROLE PLAYED BY INSPECTOR BANNING IN SECURITY PLANNING GROUP

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Further to a conversation we had this morning I would like to ask him if he can now give the House any further information on the role played by the police and security planning and analysis branch with reference to any duties or activity involving Inspector Pat Banning. I understand this man was a career RCMP officer seconded to this group.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for getting in touch with me this morning. He asked me a specific question concerning superintendent Banning. I have made inquiries. Mr. Banning served within the police and security group from August, 1971 to the month of June, 1973. He occupied the position of director of security policy, which was exclusively involved with the question of policy formulation within that group during that period of time.

AVAILABILITY OF INCOME TAX INFORMATION TO SECURITY PLANNING GROUP

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his answer, and I would like to ask him a related question. As far as the principle of income tax confidentiality is concerned, a matter raised by the right hon. member for Prince Albert on October 26, can the Solicitor General indicate whether any police security services of government have in fact had a liaison with the Department of National Revenue—the information from which may be found, I am informed, in the "L" section files of the RCMP—so that this information has been in fact available to the security services from the Department of National Revenue for some period of time, in addition to the agreement which was referred to in this House not so long ago between the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to come across any indications of such a practice up to this moment. As I indicated in the House on Thursday, I asked the RCMP to provide complete briefs on all their investigative practices and procedures so that they may be brought to the attention of the royal commission of inquiry looking into the RCMP.

Oral Questions

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGATION ARMED FORCES CONDUCTED DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister confirm that the army's intelligence branch has maintained a domestic service or a domestic operation which has been involved in the monitoring of Canadian trade unions? Related to that, would he confirm that the reports which were allegedly prepared were then submitted to the cabinet?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is no activity on the part of the security intelligence unit of the Department of National Defence which does any surveillance on trade unions at all. We have no agents or undercover people involved in such activity. We monitor a number of people and organizations across the country, and if indeed we are asked, we have a responsibility to respond to requests for aid by civil authorities, but we do not as a practice carry on any infiltration or monitoring of such organizations.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister's answer with care, just as I am sure he chose his words with care, but I would like to ask him specifically with regard to the allegations which were made in a number of newspapers and in other forms of media in the past 48 hours whether there has been a branch of the armed services which has studied the financial operations of one or more trade unions in Canada, which has prepared comments on the likelihood of success in internal trade union elections and which has commented in any detailed way on the internal performance of one or more trade unions? Has there been any branch of the armed services involved in that kind of surveillance and submitting that kind of report?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, there are files on various organizations in the country which are kept. There is monitoring in that sense. Perhaps I was incorrect in using that word before. This applies to some political groups, to some business groups and to individuals across the country. We have a responsibility to respond to the attorneys general of the provinces in the event they need the assistance of the armed forces. The chief of the defence staff has the obligation to respond. The level of response and the nature thereof is a matter of his judgment, so he must have information available to him which will give him an indication of the type of response he should provide.

POSSIBILITY ARMED FORCES MONITORED INTERNAL OPERATIONS OF UNIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister seemed to be much more forthcoming in his response the other day outside the House when he heard about these allegations. He just said in the second answer if I heard him correctly that there was indeed the monitoring of certain organizations, including business organizations. I thought his first answer denied that and implied they might be looking at the observance of certain individuals. I should like to ask him to clarify that because it is fundamentally important in terms of the preservation of civil liberties in the country. Most specifically, he did not answer the question about the observation of internal financial operations. A reference has been made to the Canadian Union of Public Employees. Has any branch of the armed services monitored the internal operations of that union, including an assessment of the possibility of the electoral success or the contrary of certain candidates for office? Has it studied the financial operations of that union?

● (1422)

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no information that such information has been kept.

An hon. Member: Have you asked?

Mr. Danson: I have asked and I have rather comprehensive reports from my people as of today. There are still questions I am asking which I will be asking tomorrow and if we do not have all the information on that I will be asking the day after tomorrow. We are quite certain that we do not engage in such covert operations. We must have information to be available to respond to these civil authorities if we are called upon and the chief of the defence staff must have that information to measure the level of his responsibility.

INQUIRY WHETHER McDONALD COMMISSION WILL INVESTIGATE ARMED FORCES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) on behalf of my constituents that I am most grateful to him for having authorized the Royal 22nd Regiment's band to be part of the celebrations on Remembrance Day.

On that subject, my question is indeed directed to the Solicitor General. Since on that occasion yesterday I had the opportunity to meet many military people and since news agencies have reported that the McDonald commission will probably inquire not only into the RCMP but also into the Canadian Armed Forces, could the minister tell the House if this news which has been spread among the population is true and if so could he justify such a decision?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there has not been any change so far in the terms of reference of the McDonald commission which was requested to examine procedures and practices within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Since this piece of news has now been released, Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise the House whether he will ascertain where it came from and whether it is false, for it is of concern to some people and to the military, and the Canadian people have a right to know. If all our institutions are to be investigated and if as much time is spent discussing the possibility of investigating the Armed Forces as is spent now discussing the RCMP, I feel the Canadian economy will suffer, because administrative matters are thus disregarded.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his kind remarks concerning our democratic institutions and his suggestion that they are essential to the preservation of our present government system. I can assure the hon. member that I shall try to trace to their origin this piece of news and the findings he made yesterday during the Remembrance Day celebrations.

CONNECTION BETWEEN SECURITY PLANNING GROUP AND ARMED FORCES SECURITY GROUP

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Would he be kind enough to tell the House what connection there is between the security and intelligence directorate of his department and the security and planning analysis group which is part of the Solicitor General's office? Which way do the intelligence reports flow or do they communicate with each other on a regular basis?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have a liaison officer in the police and security planning branch, a captain and an NCO clerk, I believe, who maintain liaison between the two branches. There is an interchange of information which we can pass on for assessment.

● (1427)

Mr. McKinnon: Could the minister also tell the House whether the operational direction given to the armed forces security directorate originates with the security and planning analysis group or whether it originates with someone else, and, if it should be the latter case, with whom?

Mr. Danson: It originates within our own intelligence services through Brigadier-General Davros who reports to the CDS. Our work is confined to the armed forces and involves only the armed forces and direction is not taken from the security and planning analysis group.

NUMBER OF BRIEFINGS GIVEN MINISTER BY INTELLIGENCE UNIT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Would the minister inform us approximately how often during his first year as Minister of National Defence he was personally briefed on security matters by his intelligence and security directorate?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): As far as major briefings are concerned, I was briefed shortly after I came to the department. I have had at least two briefings since then, and, in the last few days, several.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No doubt!

REASON FOR FAILURE TO REPORT INTERCEPTION OF SOME COMMUNICATIONS AS REQUIRED BY OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Solicitor General. The former solicitor general, now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, made three specific reports to parliament under section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act in which he indicated that the only methods of interception utilized were wiretapping and eavesdropping by microphone. This amounts to misleading the House contrary to the former solicitor general's duties as prescribed by law. Will the Solicitor General explain why it was that his predecessor so seriously misled the House and why he was unable to obtain from his officials the details of the mail interceptions routinely carried out during the years he was solicitor general?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): As to the reporting requirement the hon. member mentioned, it is my understanding that it is a requirement under the provisions of section 16 of the Official Secrets Act which was added to the legislation in 1974 and my understanding is that it obliges the minister to make an annual report to parliament on interceptions of communications which had been made under that section of the Act.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister has neglected to explain why reference to mail interceptions was omitted. The last report made under section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act was signed by the present Solicitor General. Will the hon. gentleman tell us whether he asked for or received any advice from his predecessor who held the office of Solicitor General until September, 1976, concerning interception of communications other than by wiretaps or bugging, specifically the interception and copying of mail?

Mr. Fox: My predecessor did say in that report which was tabled last year that there had been a request submitted to the Department of Justice for a legal opinion to ascertain whether an interception of the mail could be made legally under section 16(5) and the opinion received from the Department of Justice was that the opening of mail could not be legally carried out under section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act and that section 43 of the Post Office Act took precedence over the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister failed to mention that in that report only one authorization was requested. Will the Prime Minister tell the House, in view of the massive failure of the former solicitor general to exercise his responsibility as clearly outlined in section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act affecting one of the basic pillars of our constitution, whether the former solicitor general, now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is prepared to tender his resignation for his part in allowing this sordid affair to develop?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member is making an argument and a suggestion. I think both are quite false.

KNOWLEDGE OF DIRECTOR GENERAL OF SECURITY SERVICE OF INTERCEPTION OF MAIL

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): A supplementary question to the Solicitor General relating to mail interceptions. The hon. member will recall that on Thursday last I asked him who else in rank above the deputy director of the security service knew about the mail interceptions. His answer to me was: "We have not yet been able to determine whether any higher authority than the one I have mentioned was aware of these activities at the time." Four days having now elapsed since Thursday, I ask him whether he can tell me specifically whether the director general of the security service knew about mail interceptions in June of 1976 when they were terminated.

● (1432)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the answer is that the director general of the security service was not aware of any case where the mails had been opened contrary to Section 43 of the Post Office Act.

PRESENCE OF DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF SECURITY AT MEETING CONCERNING POSSIBLE FURTHER ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): That is not what I asked. I asked if the director general knew of any illegal mail interceptions at that time. If the answer to that is no, I would simply ask this. Was the deputy director general present at the conference a few weeks ago when the Solicitor General asked his advisers, and presumably they would be the security advisers, whether the security service at that time were engaged in any other illegal activity other than the APLQ break-in. The Solicitor General is looking puzzled. He will remember that when the whole matter of the APLQ break-in came to light, he told this House that he had been assured by his security advisers there was no other illegal activity carried on up to that time by the RCMP. Obviously the security service knew about the mail interceptions in June 1976. My question is whether the deputy director general of the security service was present at that conference the minister had with his advisers.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. The deputy director general of operations was not present at that time. The question was put to the then Commissioner and the present deputy director general of the security service. They had no knowledge. I have spoken with the director general of the security service. I have not had the opportunity of speaking with the former Commissioner. It is quite clear the director general of the security service had no knowledge of mail interceptions which led to opening of the mail.

Mr. Lawrence: Are we to assume that in June, 1976 the deputy director general of the secret service knew of the mail interceptions but at that time and since the director general did not know? Are we then to assume that there was a breakdown in communications at that level in the security service or that people simply did not tell the truth at the time of the conference with the minister?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question of people not telling the truth. The people of whom the question was asked, namely the Commissioner and the director general of the security service, both replied there were no other illegalities to their knowledge. I have no doubt that that was the case. It seems quite clear that the director general of the security service was not advised of any illegal acts concerning the opening of the mail.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBLE REDUCTION IN ROLE OF DEPARTMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of reports over the weekend in the press that the government has considered a reduction in the role of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, can the minister assure the House there will be no reduction in the support and assistance by the government to expand and diversify the economy of slow growth areas of Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to dispel the rumor that went around over the airwaves across Canada last weekend. Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no question, and there will probably never be, of doing away with DREE because its role is much too important and if anything, people want it increased. I can therefore assure the hon. member that we shall also continue to look after the interests of his area.

ALLEGED USE BY SECURITY FORCES OF MEDICAL FILES—METHOD BY WHICH FILES OBTAINED

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that reports, allegedly from RCMP sources, indicate that the key operations branch of the RCMP have been carrying on surveillance over university groups, teachers' federations, legitimate political parties and trade unions, and finally that they have been securing without authorization confidential medical files for the purpose of using these files to disrupt what they consider to be radical organizations, I want to ask the minister if the confidentiality of medical files has been violated by any of the sections under his control. If so, what is the purpose of securing these medical files? Is it for the purpose of blackmail? How can this possibly be used in any legitimate way by a democratic government?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I want to first point out that there is no systematic surveillance of groups, be they political parties, unions or any other group such as the hon. member has mentioned. There is, of course, surveillance of individuals who may constitute a security risk to the country. In the case of the medical files that have been referred to, preliminary investigations indicate that there was access obtained to medical files as a result of threats that had been made against prominent Canadians from time to time. In the pursuit of their duty to protect these Canadians, the security service did obtain some medical information. I am told there were no surreptitious means employed in obtaining that information. In any event, as is the case with all the other practices and procedures employed by the RCMP, they are being referred to the royal commission inquiry into the practices and procedures of the RCMP.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House would be interested in knowing how these medical files were secured. If they were not secured surreptitiously, were they secured with the authorization of the health authorities of the province in which they were secured and were they secured with the knowledge and consent of the individuals concerned?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I would be very surprised if they were obtained with the knowledge and consent of the individuals concerned. If it is quite clear that a threat of violence has been made by an individual, I believe it is proper for the RCMP security service to check out the nature and possibility of that threat. In other cases the matter was indeed, if they were obtained, with the consent of the people who remitted the files to the RCMP. As I indicated before, this whole matter along with the other practices and procedures of the RCMP will be the subject of an in-depth examination by the royal commission which was set up by this government.

REASON FOR ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF TRADE UNION LEADERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have never seen such a case of "there is nobody here but us chickens."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Following the allegation that the intelligence unit of the Department of National Defence secured information by domestic surveillance and passed that information on to the security intelligence and analysis group under the minister's department, and this was disseminated to ministers of the Crown, I want to ask the minister about the statement which is quoted in this morning's paper with reference to the Minister of Labour who, when being informed of this alleged spying on trade unions, is quoted as having said "It doesn't surprise me. I do not think it would surprise many union leaders that they have been under surveillance for some time." I want to ask the Solicitor General whether these many trade union leaders referred to by the Minister of Labour have been under surveillance for some time and, if so, why?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants any "éclaircissement" as to what the Minister of Labour wanted to say, I think he should ask the Minister of Labour. Our position has always been quite clear. There is, of course, surveillance of individuals in this country who may constitute a threat to national security, but legitimate political parties or trade unions in this country are not the object of systematic surveillance. If the hon. member opposite believes you should set up a group of preferred Canadians such as those in trade unions and political parties who are not subject to any kind of surveillance even if they constitute a threat to national security, I do not believe that argument would stand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL HEALTH

AVAILABILITY OF INDIVIDUAL MEDICAL FILES TO SECURITY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CONFIDENTIALITY MAINTAINED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It is in the public interest as well as in the interest of individual Canadians that their medical files be kept absolutely confidential. I interpreted the Solicitor General as saying that there was cooperation by the insurance plan authorities with the Security Service in providing these confidential documents to the Security Service. I would ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether this information was passed on by insurance plan authorities to the security services with her knowledge and consent. If it was not with her knowledge and consent—I realize she has not been in her portfolio for too long—was it with the knowledge and consent of her predecessor?

● (1442)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am just thinking of the expression "red herring" which describes exactly what the hon. member is now trying to do. Last week was spent making interpretations of interpretations. I think I am going to be forced to go back to Carleton University to give a conference to which I shall invite the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It appears to me that once again the minister has failed to match up her answer with the question that was put to her. I should like to ask her this. In view of the fact that confidential medical records are of great importance to individual Canadians from the point of view that they must be assured that private medical information is kept confidential by the people who receive it, can she assure the House that she, as national health and welfare minister, will immediately take steps to determine how this kind of information is getting out to the security services, and will she inform the House what she plans to do about ensuring that such an occurrence can never happen again?

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything for the House during the oral question period, because the objective is to inform the Canadian people and not to make unfounded innuendos; I cannot answer anything else to a question which does not concern me but which concerns perhaps the provincial hospital administration. As far as a federal minister of health in Canada is concerned, everybody knows that he follows the policy established by professional medical associations, namely the confidentiality of patient files.

[English]

PROPOSED CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES TO ENSURE CONFIDENTIALITY OF MEDICAL FILES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am very much aware of the fact that medicare schemes are administered by the provinces. I am also aware of the fact that there is some federal participation and that the federal government has certain guidelines which the provinces must follow. I would ask the minister, on behalf of the people of Canada, to consult with the health ministers of each of the provinces to determine what security measures they take and to see whether they are adequate to ensure that confidential information on people's health is indeed kept confidential.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to ask my predecessor if the matter was raised during federal-provincial ministerial meetings and consider the relevancy of the suggestion.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

URANIUM CARTEL REGULATIONS—INSTRUCTIONS TO FEDERAL COUNSEL IN COURT CASE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice; I would not want him to feel that the Solicitor General has taken over the administration of justice. In the instructions which were given to counsel on behalf of the government in connection with the application or motion made by the Leader of the Opposition and other members of parliament, was it suggested that the Bill of Rights should not be permitted to be considered, and that the Organization of Civil Liberties, which desired to present evidence and argument on behalf of the Bill of Rights in that case, should be denied that right?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I discussed our instructions with Mr. J. J. Robinette, who was acting for the Attorney General of Canada, and made it clear that there were two points with which we would agree with counsel for the applicants, namely that the regulation could not affect the privileges of members of the House in terms of debate here in the House—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the question at all.

Mr. Basford: —and, secondly, that members had the right to consult counsel as to the legal effect of the regulations. It was also, however, our instruction that the validity of the regulation be upheld, and that the decision of Mr. Justice Robins in the Westinghouse case be argued in front of the more recent case.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. That is an answer that answers nothing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have been away for a few days, Mr. Speaker, and I watched the proceedings of this House on television. Across this country there is deep resentment at all the noise that goes on when questions are asked. I ask the minister whether or not, specifically or indirectly, counsel was advised to oppose representations being made by the Organization of Civil Liberties. That was the question I asked, and I asked it because, however difficult it may be for the minister to understand, this is the most damnable order in council ever passed in this country, denying individuals their rights, the minister saying that if members object we will hear what they have to say. I ask him specifically: Did he not realize that this order in council, which was brought about in secrecy and conceived in sin—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member has put his question to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not quite through, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. member has put his question. The Minister of Justice.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the right hon. gentleman had finished his question, but as I understand it it is: Were the regulations contrary to the Bill of Rights, and did counsel for the Attorney General so argue? The regulations are not contrary to the Bill of Rights, and counsel for the Attorney General argued that they are not contrary to the Bill of Rights both in the case before the Chief Justice of Ontario and in the case earlier in the spring before Mr. Justice Robins. Obviously, in passage of the regulations the procedures laid down in the Bill of Rights were followed and the regulations were certified by officers of my department or the Privy Council office as being not contrary to the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to see the declaration of those officers regarding this order in council, which denies the rights of individuals and endeavours to bring about an agreement contrary to the law, and approved by the cabinet, an agreement which meant that a crime committed has to be covered up and concealed, as it was until subsequently revealed.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, as I made it clear in the House some time ago, the uranium information regulations were certified as being not contrary to the Bill of Rights.

ENERGY

POSSIBILITY OF PROGRAM TO CONSERVE NON-RENEWABLE ENERGY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Does the government intend to carry out a project similar to the one in force for the insulation of Canadian homes to encourage Canadians to save non-renewable energy, a scheme recognizing the use of solar or wind energy to save oil supplies and money?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I heard the first part of the question about using wind energy to supplement the home insulation program, but if the hon. member is concerned about renewable energy, let me tell him the federal government has taken the decision to increase very considerably our expenditures for renewable energy research and development.

SUGGESTION HOME INSULATION GRANTS NOT BE SUBJECT TO TAX

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister considered that it is inadvisable to make the grants payable under the home insulation program taxable in the hands of the recipients, since this makes them less attractive and thereby impedes the program which the government announced some time ago? If he is considering it, would he advise the House whether he has held discussions with the Minister of Finance in order to change the authorization in respect of these grants so this very important program can go ahead on some reasonable basis?

● (1452)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have not considered changing that to a non-taxable grant. Certainly, at the present time we have been giving consideration to whether more information should be given to the public in respect of the program. There seems to be a good deal of misunderstanding, if not confusion in the minds of Ontarians in particular. This came up in a report over the weekend and indicated that many Ontarians believe that the federal government cancelled this most important program. What they were in fact confused about was their understanding of an announcement by the Ontario government which cancelled its particular program. The federal government's program has not been cancelled in any way.

HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING FUNDING OF RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I would direct my question to the same minister. In view of the fact there have been so few applications approved under the home insulation program, would he not recognize that the program is not reaching those people who cannot afford any type of home repairs or rehabilitation in order to take advantage of the insulation program? Has he discussed with his colleague, the Minister of States for Urban Affairs, increasing the funding under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program which would meet the requirements of those people who cannot now save in respect of fuel through insulation?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is confusing applications on the one hand with grants on the other. If he were to review the program he would see that the system set up under the Canadian home insulation program requires the individual to have put his insulation in place before he gets a grant for that expenditure. There have been something like 60,000 applications. There have been something in the order of just about 3,000 specific applications relating to insulation that has already been put in place. I would expect that will increase very considerably, because, as the hon. member might expect, there has been something of the order of a two-month lead time. You have to buy the insulation first before you can expect to get a cheque.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister understands that there are people in a fixed income bracket who do not have proper walls, do not have proper windows or proper basements in their homes so that insulation would be of no benefit. Under RRAP, these conditions could be met and these people could obtain the full value of the insulation. Would the minister discuss with his colleague the introduction or the expansion of funding under RRAP, which is an excellent program, in order to provide help to those people who need this insulation, but who cannot afford it otherwise?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member understands that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs is fully aware of this particular option, and that this particular option has been used in the past.

Oral Questions

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO AID THOSE UNEMPLOYED FOR MORE THAN THREE MONTHS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, last Monday I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration a question concerning his department and was accused of being fast and loose with figures and of spreading malicious and imprecise information.

An hon. Member: That is true.

Mr. Clarke: However that may be, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister another serious question concerning his department. I hope he will try to answer it this time instead of giving us these statements.

With the failure of the government's economic policy to reduce unemployment, and with the growing number, now 36 per cent, of persons unemployed being out of work over three months, which would indicate that the number with expired benefits will be at record levels, what measures will the government be putting into place to provide relief for this disadvantaged group?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I did not know the hon. member was so sensitive to honest political criticism of some of the comments he made using words like "deficit" when he knew the word "deficit" was not applicable in that particular framework, Mr. Speaker.

I think it is incorrect to say we have failed in the creation of jobs. Since January, 1977, some 292,000 more Canadians are working than at the beginning of the year, and there are, I think, 116,000 who have received employment under Canada Works, to mention only two areas, Mr. Speaker, which indicates that some action has taken place. More has to be done and that is why we are looking at things like job experience training and the possibility of expanding that particular program as one of a series of programs.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his non-answer again, because he completely ignores the plight of the people I mentioned, namely, those who have been unemployed for over three months and are in danger of losing their benefits. I should like to ask whether this is the beginning of the government's plan to transfer this burden to the provinces and avoid the federal government's responsibility?

Mr. Cullen: Very definitely not, Mr. Speaker, and that is specifically one of the reasons I will be meeting with the ministers from the Atlantic provinces, to look into that particular program. When I indicated the jobs under Canada Works, I had in mind that it was those who are no longer able to draw unemployment insurance benefits who can take advantage of the Canada Works program and programs of that nature to help them with this particular problem. To suggest that nothing is being done, again is not exactly in accordance with the facts.

Oral Questions

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF OIL PIPELINE TO KITIMAT—SUGGESTED REVIVAL OF THOMPSON COMMISSION OR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in light of the news which appeared in the media to the effect that the Kitimat consortium has been revived in order to seek permission from the National Energy Board to pipeline Alaskan slope oil across Canadian territory to the United States, I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Environment whether steps are now being made to revive, in turn, after only three or four days demise, the Kitimat oil port inquiry which the minister seems to have contrived to have recessed last Wednesday?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): That is a hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge that there is to be a renewed application before the National Energy Board by the Kitimat oil consortium, and until a serious application is before the National Energy Board we will have nothing further to say about the Thompson inquiry.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, we are obviously reading different newspapers. However, let us assume it to be a hypothetical question, and I do not believe it is on the basis of the information I have, why is the minister not taking advantage of this unscheduled opportunity to hold hearings in case there is a revival of the Kitimat consortium? There has been a great deal of dispute, as the minister knows, about the use of Kitimat as an oil off-loading port. This is an unusual opportunity. Why was the Kitimat oil port inquiry recessed at this unusual moment?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, the inquiry was recessed at the request of Dr. Andrew Thompson on the basis of the fact that there was no application before the National Energy Board. That being the case, he had no serious basis on which to conduct the hearings he was holding, and when he made the request to us for adjournment we agreed with him.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, again I suggest that the minister and I are not reading the same literature, because Dr. Thompson actually told me he could entertain representations about any oil port on the west coast. Therefore, I do not know where the minister is getting this idea. In fact, my information indicates to me that Dr. Thompson wanted to continue. Would the minister refer the whole question of this inquiry to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry which is empowered to study questions referring to the environment?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member should check with Dr. Thompson.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will.

Mr. Marchand: He should check about the meeting he had with us. I have no intention of referring this to the standing committee on Fisheries and Forestry. I expect when the estimates are before the committee hon. members will want to ask appropriate questions at that time.

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): We certainly will.

Mr. Marchand: Check your facts and you will find that Dr. Thompson made the request to us to postpone the hearings.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT ACTING IN ANTICIPATION OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-6

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Transport advise whether his department is now operating in respect of its personnel, and, indeed, in respect of all its activities, as though proposed Bill C-6 dealing with ports was an act of this parliament rather than being before the House very much in its embryonic stage and, if so, how can he justify his disregard for the present law of the land?

● (1502)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, no, the changes which will be required in the law cannot be acted upon until the legislation is in place. We are dealing with the interim situation to make sure that those who are employed in the National Harbours Board area have some certainty about what the future allows for them. Also, we are taking certain steps open to us under the administrative structure of the current legislation to do certain things in preparation for the future position. In those cases it is allowed under the current legislation and not predicting the effectiveness of the subsequent legislation.

ALLEGATION PRIME MINISTER APPROVES ILLEGAL ACTS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister. He is reported to have said in Halifax that he agrees with the illegal RCMP tactics against terrorism, including the Quebec barn burning. Indeed, he is quoted as saying that he agrees entirely with a caller who said: "Let them tear down the barns". We have taken the trouble to check the accuracy of these reports, and we have every reason to believe they are accurate.

I ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks it is suitable for a person in his position, who should be the foremost upholder of law and order, to defend and perhaps even advocate illegal acts.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have made it clear in every public statement I have made that the government does not condone any illegal act, and I have always said that the police and every other person in this country should act within the law.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister denies that the burning down of barns, even if the people concerned had been in some way connected with terrorism, is an illegal act. How can he say he condones that, and at the same time say that he condemns illegal acts? The two are not consistent.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of being quoted by a third party.

Miss MacDonald: It is on the tape.

Mr. Trudeau: I can tell the hon. member, after an interview I had in the studio of the Halifax radio station, that I was talking about an open line program which had taken place in Montreal. I said that I was informed that people there rather supported the police in this action. Whether it was illegal or not, they had the support of the people. That was the position which was reported to me, and I believe that was an accurate position.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—PRIME MINISTER'S REMARKS—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On two outstanding matters I indicated to the House last week that I expected, in relation to the incident regarding the offices of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, to receive a report today from the Bell Canada people who were asked to examine this matter. I received that report this morning, but not in sufficient time to take action, that is to say, to discuss it with the hon. Leader of the Opposition. I hope that will take place later today; therefore, I should be in a position to report further to the House on that matter tomorrow.

The other matter which has been outstanding for some time is with respect to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River. It concerns the question period of November 3, 1977, in which a question of privilege arose as a result of the following remarks by the right hon. Prime Minister:

> They can stand in their places and challenge them, if they have the courage, but I would suggest the way to do it is not by hiring private detectives, as that party does, and not by having some phony bugs planted in their office, which is the way they do it.

That remark gave rise to a question of privilege. I heard arguments from both sides which related to a number of interpretations of what members can or are permitted to do, and not so very directly with what one particular member had done in this case. The precedents go back over many years. However, happily, there seem to me to be two rather helpful precedents which relate to our own experience in this very parliament. I will not refer to one specifically except to say that I am sure it will live well in the memories of hon. members. It concerns the question of privilege related to earlier remarks by the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the acquisition of land at Harrington Lake by the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he was prime minister. On that occasion I found there had been no allegation of illegality or wrongdoing with respect to the remarks at that time, and I therefore found that the matter did not come within the precedents of a remark which had to be withdrawn.

A more recent precedent came within our experience in March of 1976 when on March 18, 1976, the hon. member for York-Simcoe said the following:

> "Do as I say, not as I do" appears to be the creed of the present administration. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this type of thinking is shown up so clearly in the judge's affair that is now before us. What administration at a senior level of government in Canada other than this administration would be allowing cabinet ministers who have acted illegally to carry on in their posts?

A question of privilege arose with respect to that. Argument was made whether or not that remark, in the context in which it was delivered, had an offensive or opprobrious quality to it such as to offend the practices and the rules of our House. In the context, under the format of the incidents which were before the House at that time, after argument that members ought to be entitled to hold opinions or voice opinions. It was my view, while those arguments expressed very well the theory—which I accepted completely—as to what members might or might not do and what they might or might not think, that it did not cover what in fact had taken place, and that was the expression of the statement that members opposite—and I stress the plural—in a group were condoning some sort of illegal act. The word "illegal" is significant there because it was central to the entire argument. The question was whether or not, by the use of the word "illegal", the hon. member for York-Simcoe had crossed the line on opprobrious remarks directed toward a group of members, and that was the decision made in those circumstances. I draw upon that because it seems to me the parallels are irresistible.

Later, on March 22, 1976, I attempted to adjudicate on that problem. As reported at page 11999 of Hansard, I attempted to outline the considerations that ought to govern us in these circumstances by saying the following:

> The basic rule of the House with respect to the procedure and practice in this regard can be found in citation 140 of Beauchesne's. It is probably familiar to all hon. members, and it reads as follows:
> "The rule relating to personal reflections occurring in debate, may be stated thus, namely: that it is doubly disorderly for any member, in speaking, to digress from the question before the House, and to attack any other member, by means of opprobrious language, applied to his person and character, or to his conduct, either in general, or on some particular occasion, and tending to bring him into ridicule, contempt, or hatred, with his fellow-members, or to create ill blood in the House.
> In addition, there is another precaution which the House has always observed. I would direct attention to Standing Order 35, again one which is no doubt familiar to all members and which, paraphrased, says basically that no member shall speak disrespectfully against any other member of the House. The rationale behind this, the practice which has grown up in this respect, has been set out in another citation of Beauchesne's, citation 136"—

I will not belabour that citation before hon. members at this time. I give it to them simply for personal reference. My ruling at that time continued:

The House itself has developed a regime or practice which has grown up to protect members who feel themselves aggrieved by an allegation; it is a protection in the form of a challenge that the allegation either be substantiated, explained, qualified sufficiently or withdrawn.

The arguments which were made in defence at that time were similar to the ones made in defence on this particular occasion; that is, members are entitled to have certain opinions and to express them, whether or not evidence exists in support of them. In effect, that is exactly the privilege which members enjoy.

It seems to me that on that occasion the hon. member for York-Simcoe went beyond that practice by making a very direct statement that an illegal act had been committed by certain ministers and that the government in general was condoning that by keeping those ministers in their posts. The parallel here seems to be evident, because on this particular occasion the right hon. Prime Minister, both before and after the remarks complained of, had made argument in terms and in ways which were quite parliamentarily acceptable. That is to say, that it was his opinion without basis in comparison with opinions held by other members on suspicions about the events. That is quite acceptable and, indeed, to hold a point of view or express it, whether with or without evidence, once it is described in that way is the right of every member in debate.

However, the fact is that when that opinion expressed turns into a direct statement—as it did in the circumstances of the hon. member for York-Simcoe—that an illegality has occurred, it is on that precedent clear to me that it goes beyond the bounds of what is acceptable in a parliamentary sense or what is, in fact, in accordance with the precedents of opprobrious language directed as an accusation against a member or members of the House and ought to be either qualified or withdrawn. On this particular occasion, in the context in which it took place—which must be the necessary background in both cases, both this one and the precedent I have been citing so extensively—there can be no doubt that the remark referred to, reading the precedent back about half a page, referred in particular to members of this House who were members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

That takes out any ambiguity with respect to "they can stand in their places, but this is the way that they do it". There seems to be, in the context, no hope of any ambiguity with respect to a larger group than the persons who are here represented, any more than there was on the occasion of the allegation of the hon. member for York-Simcoe being directed against the government in general.

When the statement said, "not by having some phony bugs planted in their office, which is the way they do it", that seemed to me to transform it from an expression of opinion into an expression of statement that an illegality had in fact occurred because, as in both cases—in the previous one and in this one—it is an offence, by an act of this parliament recently passed, either to have in possession or to use in any way the kind of device which was described by the hon. member for Central Nova and which was obviously the device that was being referred to here.

Therefore, comparing the two precedents, it would be in my opinion inconsistent for me to have held in the case of the previous member that he had offended the practices of this parliament and used opprobrious language against a group of members, and not to find the same thing with regard to what happened on November 3 when the Prime Minister made the remarks to which I have referred. Therefore, I say only one other thing, and that is that in all these cases the Chair is placed in great difficulty. It is always, I think, possible to search the precedents and find a technical ground upon which a decision could be based in difficult cases on either side of the question.

I confess that it is my disposition, in these circumstances, wherever the matter comes down to a serious doubt in my mind, to always, in the interest of protecting the dignity of parliament, exercise the benefit of that doubt in favour of asking the hon. member to withdraw any remarks that might, by a reasonable interpretation of the precedents, be offensive; because in doing so, rather than being relaxed about protecting the dignity of parliament, I am being diligent in that respect. Therefore, I say in conclusion that if I have any doubt—and certainly in this case, and all of them are difficult—in asking the Prime Minister either to qualify or withdraw his remarks, I am exercising that doubt in favour of the protection of the dignity of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I accept your ruling. I think you have the difficult duty of maintaining order in this House. This particular ruling has obviously caused you some trouble in finding the proper course. I accept that you have judged in a proper way in this particular case, and to that extent I do take back what I believe you defined as the offensive words, that opposition members had themselves bugged. Perhaps Your Honour will not find it unparliamentary on my part when I say that our suspicion remains.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Broadbent: Never wrong!

Mr. Trudeau: That is why we asked Your Honour to conduct an investigation into the whole bugging operation, which still appears fishy to us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We await the results of your investigation, which concerns every member of this House, with great impatience. I want to make another point. In the future, general accusations of the kind I am guilty of will be seized upon by us on this side to raise questions of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I will not go back to accusations of last week that this government interfered with the administration of justice, that we covered up, and so forth. These seem to me to be general accusations of illegality. But I want to raise a question of privilege with regard to something which was stated today by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We had better take one at a time. The Prime Minister, it seems to me—as has been done on previous occasions—has indicated that that portion of his remarks which were made before and which I indicated were within parliamentary bounds, that is to say, the expression of any suspicions of a general nature, remains. That aspect of his remarks which contain an offensive or opprobrious quality, that is to say, a direct accusation against members of a particular party in this House, has now been withdrawn. That seems to me to close that matter. If there are other matters of privilege arising out of today's question period, I can hear them at this time.

MR. TRUDEAU—WORDS USED BY MR. DIEFENBAKER IN S.O. 43 MOTION

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on question of privilege affecting all members of this House, and particularly the government, arising from words contained in a Standing Order 43 motion moved by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I regret that he is not in the House—

An hon. Member: He is here.

An hon. Member: Put your glasses on.

Mr. Hees: You are older than you think.

Mr. Trudeau: I was looking at the previous seating arrangement and I forgot that the right hon. gentleman has been promoted toward the leadership. However, the words Your Honour used in your ruling were that one could not accuse another party, another group, or the government of having committed an illegality. I believe the words "illegality" and "wrongdoing" were the words Your Honour used. They were the very words used by the right hon. gentleman in moving his motion today. He used the words "unlawful action and wrongdoing" with reference to the government.

I submit that this affects the privileges of this House, because no illegality or wrongdoing has been proved. There have been some alleged. There are suspicions. Hon. members opposite are trying to find out. But there has been no proof of wrongdoing or illegality in this matter. Therefore, the right hon. gentleman is doing something which is clearly contrary to Your Honour's ruling when he says that this government is guilty of unlawful action and wrongdoing. Therefore, if Your Honour finds a prima facie case of privilege, I will be prepared to move a substantive motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not unaware that the precedent to which I have referred and drawn upon so heavily in coming to the conclusion I came to earlier this day is one which may, in fact, give rise to a number of arguments about statements made by members of this House, and in fact hon. members are going to have to guard themselves carefully. In fact, what has taken place today—or, in fact, at any time with an application pursuant to Standing Order 43—is that a member asked the House for its unanimous consent to debate a particular motion, and that is quite different from an allegation or a statement.

Mr. Trudeau: If you move it, you believe it.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will have to realize that a member seeks permission within the Standing Orders to put forward a motion for debate and discussion. It is not, in its basic nature, a statement but is in fact a motion which is proposed for debate. I express some concern about the contents of that and other motions, but the basic recognition that the Chair has to make in most cases pursuant to Standing Order 43 is that even if they do contain phrases which, if used as a statement, might be offensive to parliament, they are not in fact statements but are motions which are being put forward for debate.

In those circumstances the Chair is in a very difficult position to exercise any scrutiny in a parliamentary sense unless the motion itself seems to me to offend the provisions of the Standing Order or to go beyond the administrative jurisdiction or the responsibility of the House. I do not say that I fail to apply or recognize that there will be occasions upon which members will make accusations of dereliction of duty which may be entirely parliamentary. If they go beyond allegations of dereliction of duty and extend it to allegations of illegality, I will enforce the same precedent as I have today, whether it occurs on the left or on the right side of the House.

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTS OF RCMP—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, before I get on my question of privilege of which I gave Your Honour notice, I was glad to see that in accepting your ruling the Prime Minister lived up to his reputation of being a complete gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege pertains to certain statements made by ministers, including the Prime Minister, regarding the lack of a certain kind of required action by ministers which seriously impedes our ability, as members of this House of Commons, to do our job. Each of these arises from the ongoing issue of criminal wrongdoing and allegations of criminal wrongdoing involving the RCMP. The first pertains to the very important notion of ministerial responsibility, a notion as old as parliamentary democracy itself. In this instance I shall refer specifically to the Solicitor General.

The second aspect of my question of privilege—and fundamentally more serious, in my view—concerns the principle of the rule of law which goes to the heart of any democratic system whether parliamentary or not. Flagrant abuse of this principle undermines in a fundamental way our central reason for being elected to the House of Commons, namely, to pass laws which are to be obeyed by everyone.

First I shall deal with the question of ministerial responsibility and specifically as it pertains to a question of privilege. As most members of the House know, a minister is expected to be responsible to this House for the ongoing operations of his department. In case of flagrant wrongdoing in the past—whether here, in Great Britain or any other parliamentary system—where he is directly involved, his resignation has been expected and has been brought forward. In other cases, a minister must simply take prompt, corrective and, where required, punitive action.

I want to quote one of the most distinguished authorities outside the Government of Canada or outside the practices of the parliamentary system as seen in this country. I refer to Sir Ivor Jennings' book "Cabinet Government", pages 498-99, where, speaking of cabinet responsibility, he said:

> The cabinet must leave to each minister a substantial discretion as to what matters he will bring before it. If he makes a mistake, then he must accept the personal responsibility. On the other hand, a minister cannot hide behind the error of a subordinate. Within a department there must be substantial delegation of power, but the most essential characteristic of the civil service is the responsibility of the minister for every act done in his department. In practice, the minister can hardly avoid saying that the mistake was that of a subordinate, but parliament censures the minister and not the subordinate.

That is at pages 498-99, the third edition of Jennings on "Cabinet Government."

Mr. Fox: What year? What edition?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am impressed by this new interest in scholarly writing by the minister. It is the third edition. The minister seems concerned that Sir Ivor Jennings or others might have revised the argument in the way he has revised the practice. I want to switch immediately to a Canadian source. Following the minister's appropriate, if rather scholarly, concern, this is Dawson in "The Government of Canada" fourth edition. On the same issue, that of ministerial responsibility, he says, at page 190:

> The members of cabinet are above everything else responsible to the House of Commons, not as individuals alone, but collectively as well. This responsibility has been the key to the control of the executive power in Canada as in Britain; the powers of the Crown have remained for the most part intact or have even been increased, but the exercise of those powers has come under the cabinet and this body in turn under the general scrutiny of parliament. This is the central fact of parliamentary democracy; for it is this practice which keeps the system both efficient and constantly amenable to popular control. The minister at the head of every department is responsible for everything that is done within that department—

On the same page there is a quotation from a former prime minister of Canada, Sir Robert Borden, with respect to ministerial responsibility. He said:

> A minister of the Crown is responsible, under the system in Great Britain, for the minutest details of the administration in his department; he is politically responsible, but he does not know anything at all about them. When anything goes wrong in his department, he is responsible therefor to parliament; and if he comes to parliament and points out that he entrusted the duty to an official in the ordinary course and in good faith, that he had been selected for his capacity, and ability, and integrity, and the moment that man has gone wrong the minister had investigated the matter to the full and punished that man either by degradation or dismissal, he has done his duty to the public.

The point I want to underline is that when a minister discovers wrongdoing by anyone in his department, he has a responsibility to take immediate and corrective action. I could find a number of other sources in other works, but I will not belabour that point. The point I want to make now is to apply this concept to the recent behaviour of the Solicitor General. In so doing, I want to argue that he has clearly violated his most basic responsibility as a minister of the Crown, the result of which has been the continuance and appropriate preoccupation by members of parliament with criminal wrongdoing and allegations of wrongdoing by a variety of security services at the total expense, in terms of our time, of our capacity and responsibility to deal with other matters of pressing concern to the people of Canada.

I refer specifically, Mr. Speaker, to the statements made by the Solicitor General in this House last Wednesday and Thursday. On both days the minister discussed two categories of almost certain criminal wrongdoing by the RCMP about which he learned only last week. Both of these points are germane or central to the argument I want to make. Of "Operation Cathedral", that is, the illegal opening of mail, the minister said on November 10 in this House, in discussing the possibility of its being criminal, that it is "perhaps a more clear case than some of the others". That is, a more clear case of criminal wrongdoing. Being a lawyer, the minister knows—I am not, and I have a few other virtues as well—that he cannot come any closer to saying it was criminal wrongdoing than that. There has been no conviction. He went as far as he could in making that assertion.

In reference to "Operation 300" which had been specifically described in the news reports as by definition a kind of illegal activity, he said, "the allegations of course are substantially correct." That is to be found at page 784 of Hansard. We have, in the minister's own words, the judgment that these two kinds of activity by the RCMP are quite likely illegal in nature. That is very important. We also know, from what he said in the House on November 10 as well as earlier, that the Solicitor General had requested the RCMP to bring to the attention of Canadians that there have been possible illegalities. That is also to be found at page 784 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, the question of privilege on this matter is as follows: on June 17, in the House, the minister assured us that he was telling the House of all the illegal and prospective illegal acts of the RCMP. It turns out that last week—at least it turns out in terms of admitting to us last week—that he was clearly wrong on June 17. He had, therefore, misinformed the House of Commons—a very serious act on his part.

What did he do to correct the situation? What did he do to exercise his responsibility as a minister? According to all parliamentary practice of which I am aware, he should have taken corrective and punitive action immediately as far as the officials responsible were concerned. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, in his questions today, was getting right to the root of an aspect of ministerial responsibility. He was trying to find out whether the minister, on his own initiative, had determined in his own department what level of official was responsible for misinforming him. Of course, we never did get an answer to that question.

The point I am making is that, having misinformed the House—at least on June 17, and I am sure, subsequent to that as well—he should have taken corrective action in his department. He should have come back to the House and said, "Yes, indeed, there is misinformation." We are assuming he did not lie to the House when he provided this information; it was presumably provided to him by others. His serious obligation as a Minister of the Crown was to have taken punitive and corrective action.

He should have been able to say to the House of Commons that "X" or "Y" individuals were responsible for misinforming him or not ensuring that he got the information he required as minister in order to exercise his responsibility. It was not done, and therefore that person was going to be subject to this kind of corrective action by him—dismissal, or what have you. He should have been able to say, "I, as minister, am now exercising control over this department." His failure to do so, Mr. Speaker, gives rise to my question of privilege as it pertains to its effect on the House.

It is more than two weeks ago since the hon. gentleman first got up in the House—two weeks ago Friday—and talked about the one new event, then, of criminal wrongdoing. We have been totally preoccupied in the House with allegations of criminal wrongdoing or actual instances of criminal wrongdoing by the RCMP. The responsibility for this, as members of the opposition parties have been saying day after day, does not rest primarily with the vast majority of members of the RCMP who are law-abiding; the responsibility lies on the other side of the House, with that minister.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister's failure to take corrective action has entailed us day after day in having to deal with the mess in his own department, and therefore we are not able to exercise our functions in other—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am prepared to extend reasonable leniency to the development of any argument advanced by any hon. member, and I am prepared to hear the hon. member to determine whether or not there is some establishment of a question of privilege. But as for criticism that the conduct of a minister or, particularly, indication that any minister or any legislative program or any argument before the House which keeps the House occupied prevents it from doing other business, regardless of what can be said about the nature of that argument, one thing can certainly be said: it does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Broadbent: I will leave that point and go on to another aspect of the question, leaving it to others, perhaps, to make the case that failure to accept responsibility, as practised in the Canadian Parliament and other parliaments where the system exists, has indeed resulted in our failure to perform our function as members of parliament, which entails an obligation to deal with other matters. I want to switch, now, to an even more basic consideration. Closely related to this sad affair of RCMP criminal wrongdoing or allegations of criminal wrongdoing is our responsibility as lawmakers and our related obligations to uphold the principle of the rule of law, which has been seriously impinged upon by a variety of ministers of the Crown, including the Prime Minister himself.

Last week and over the weekend the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice each in his own irresponsible and rhetorical way have managed to convey to Canadians the idea that breaking the law is quite all right as long as you believe your purposes are worthy. This is precisely the perverse form of moral reasoning used by the very terrorist groups which the minister wants stamped out. These terrorist groups claim that their violence and illegal means are justified by the nobility of their final goal. That is the logic of a variety of arguments recently put forward by the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice—ironically—and by the Prime Minister.

I say that a democracy which rejects illegal violence and terrorist groups cannot accept illegal terror in its police force. Nor can we respect a government which desires to convey to the public of Canada that a police force can do what it will as long as its objectives are good.

While the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice have made statements which are disturbing, that made by the Prime Minister last Wednesday in Halifax is the most distressing of all. It was reported last Thursday morning that on Wednesday in Halifax the Prime Minister, when informed of a radio broadcast which was describing the current reaction in Quebec to information about the illegal burning of a barn—the information conveyed about the program was that the majority of the people who phoned in said they agreed with that act—the newscast I heard in my hotel room in Toronto was that the Prime Minister, when he was asked about that program, did not respond as he indicated he did today, but he said he agreed with that illegal act, and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is criticizing the conduct of ministers. I do not want to short-circuit that course of conduct. However, he is doing so on the basis of a question of privilege.

The question of privilege is a very narrow vehicle, as we have seen many times in the past. It has very rigid limits. If I am to permit general criticism of the conduct of ministers under the guise of privilege, I am sure I shall be asked to hear five or six of them every day at three o'clock. I have to recognize the hon. member's right to the floor on a serious matter of which he has given me notice. But just last week argument was advanced, during the course of the question of privilege I have just dealt with, that the Prime Minister in his intervention was using quotations from remarks made by the hon. member for Central Nova outside the House.

The argument was very clear: one cannot attempt to substantiate a question of privilege on the basis of quotes hon. members have said or are reported to have said outside the House. I know that such an argument cannot be sustained in particular instances because the Prime Minister was not attempting to establish a question of privilege. He was attempting to defend one—and that is different—and his argument was relative. I am not saying it was relevant, but it was being used in a relative way to say: If an hon. member can do this, I can do that.

In this particular instance, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is going on to say that the basis of his question of privilege is what the Prime Minister was quoted as saying in response to some other quote which was put to him on a radio program. It seems to me that if the hon. member does, in fact, have a question of privilege—which so far has not been demonstrated—it will have to be supported, first in principle, and second by some evidence other than quotes from a radio program in which the Prime Minister had been confronted with a quote of some other sort from a source outside the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, to conclude the argument on my question of privilege, I must say, of course, that I do not intend to challenge your ruling on this matter. If anything, there is ignorance of the rule on my part as it pertains to evidence permitted in the House about what kind of testimony is germane to an argument. It is certainly not my impression that if, for example, a minister or several ministers—says something outside the House which is clearly illegal, we could not use that in the House in an argument having to do with a question of privilege. I will leave that in passing, because I am not clear about your ruling in that regard. But I want to say this with all the certitude and conviction I can muster on the point. According to testimony subsequently confirmed to my office—

● (1542)

Mr. Basford: And denied in the House today.

Mr. Broadbent: —two reporters were present and heard the Prime Minister answer. Mr. James Nunn, who was in the gallery a few moments ago, asserted he was only a few feet away from the Prime Minister and heard the answer, that the Prime Minister agreed specifically with this illegal act.

The question of privilege I have is that ministers of the Crown, particularly the Prime Minister, in our system of government have a fundamental obligation to enforce what we are doing on a day to day basis here in the House of Commons, that is, to pass the laws of Canada. That is the fundamental purpose of our being elected. We have other purposes, other tasks, the ombudsman role—we can list them all—however, the basic purpose of members of the House of Commons is to take part in the legislative process; to take part in this direct way with the principle of the rule of law.

This concerns me very much. That is why I telephoned right away to have it confirmed that the Prime Minister, in his cavalier and authoritarian way, should be able, outside the House of Commons, to say that breaking the law is quite all right. This is now the logic of the argument. The rest, I contend, on the basis of people who were there, is factual information. The logic of that is that people can do what they want as long as their purposes are worthy. That flatly contradicts what the House of Commons is all about.

We should not have a minister of the Crown, particularly the Prime Minister, going around the country vitiating the whole lawmaking process and calling into question the legitimacy of what we are doing. And that is exactly what he is doing; he is saying that on certain grounds the laws passed here in the House of Commons ought to be ignored by the people of Canada. My understanding of the obligation of the House of Commons, particularly the Prime Minister, is that it goes to the root of what we are all about in this system. If Your Honour rules that I have a prima facie case, I will move a motion that the question be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. The leader of the New Democratic Party, quite clearly, has been rather unfair, with the greatest respect, in rising on a question of privilege relating to the rights of members of parliament. He has thereby, under that guise, been dragging into the House statements made outside the House, statements which were asked about and dealt with in the question period today, and then saying that somehow his privileges as a member of parliament are thereby affected. I take it his suggestion is that because someone is purported to have made statements that people are not governed by the law, his privileges and the privileges of this institution are affected. There is no basis for such a question of privilege.

The members of the government, the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General and myself, have repeatedly said within this House and without that the mandate provided to the security service and to the RCMP is that they operate within the law. That is the statement that is being made by all of us and other members of the government in and out of the House.

The leader of the New Democratic Party cited some examples. He did not cite very many. He mentioned my name and that of the Solicitor General. He mentioned something said by the Prime Minister in Halifax which was dealt with in question period today. The Prime Minister said there must obviously have been some confusion, and that he was commenting on some comment, third-hand, made in Montreal rather than Halifax. Because I think the raising of the question of privilege has been somewhat unfair, and because we have been dragged into it in the way the leader of the NDP has done, I want to put on record a very short statement of what I said on the weekend which apparently has disturbed the leader of the NDP and his privileges.

Mr. Basford: I quote:

> It is fundamental to the operation of the rule of law and the protection of our civil liberties that all people in a country, whether they hold public office or not, whether they be civilians or be policemen, that they operate under and within the law. And if there are any changes that are needed in the law to accomplish that first purpose of effective police protection of our society and of ourselves—if there are any changes in the law required, they should only be undertaken after the most careful and deliberate discussion and debate in parliament and they should only be undertaken after the most careful and deliberate designing of the proper safeguards and checks to assure that our individual liberties and freedoms are in fact protected.

That is the position of this government in and out of the House. That statement in no way affects the position of the privileges of this House or of the House itself. Surely, it is a statement of faith in the rule of law and a statement of faith in this institution to write the law properly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby gave me notice of a question of privilege. I indicated to him earlier in his remarks that I had some very serious doubts as to his ability to relate the remarks he was beginning with to the classic definition of privilege upon which we have operated in this House for many, many years. As the hon. member went on, he endeavoured to develop that some failure to respect the political science precepts with regard to responsible cabinet parliamentary government related to a question of privilege because it kept members otherwise occupied for several days when their attention could be on other matters.

That has no resemblance to the question of privilege within the definition as we know it. It is not an argument that has ever been held to be valid. To do so, surely, would be to call into a question of privilege every debate that takes place extensively on any piece of legislation that keeps the attention of the House on one matter obviously to the exclusion of other matters. To accept that argument would be to destroy that very basis of operation of this House.

The second argument put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby related to some alleged statements made outside the House by the right hon. Prime Minister. He indicated that if his statements were properly quoted, his disrespect for the law thereby undermined the very operation of the House and therefore affected the privileges of members of the House. I will not go on to determine whether there is any merit, in theory, in that respect.

The counter-argument put forward by the Minister of Justice seems to be substantiated—in my memory, in any case—in that when the Prime Minister was questioned today about this incident he reaffirmed, on every occasion that he could, respect for the rule of law. These are the difficulties we face in attempting to use this kind of evidence. The Prime Minister indicated that what had been put to him on the radio program was a quote by someone else which he agreed with as an assessment of the accuracy of current opinion but not as the accuracy of his position. How do I know that from the indirect way it has been put forward here today? I say that is simply the danger of attempting to establish privilege on the basis of something that members do outside the House.

I want to clarify the ruling. It does not indicate that actions or words by members outside this House are not the subject of consideration in respect of privilege on certain occasions. I only say that as an indication of the difficulty which we face if we are attempting to establish something of this important nature on the basis of indirect evidence. In any case, on neither ground do I recognize an argument in principle.

MR. WALTER BAKER—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO RESPECTING PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is very short. It is really to reserve a question of privilege. It arises out of the judgment of Mr. Justice Evans of the Supreme Court of Ontario. Quite frankly, we have not yet had an opportunity to see the reasons for judgment in the case and how the judgment of His Lordship might affect the privileges of members of the House with respect to public comment and the things that flow therefrom. I wonder if I might for the moment reserve the right to peruse the judgment and perhaps raise a question of privilege with Your Honour at some other time.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the House leader of the opposition because we, too, have not had a chance to review the judgment in any detail. Very careful perusal is required before there are any questions of privilege in connection with it.

Mr. Speaker: I always accept without hesitation the action by any member to reserve the right about any question of privilege in this way; that is to say, simply to avoid being disqualified on the basis of raising the matter at the earliest possible time. However, I do recognize that it has been raised and needs further examination.

MR. CAFIK—PRESS REPORTS ON ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES BY RCMP

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. During the weekend I was in Vancouver, Thunder Bay and Windsor, and during the course of speaking engagements made some comments relating to the RCMP affair, if I may use that term. I note from press reports covering some of my comments that it is quite possible for members of the House to be misled or even to feel aggrieved. There is one particular headline in the Toronto Daily Star on the 13th of this month which reads: "Mounties are Right to Break the Law, Norm Cafik says".

I raise this question of privilege because, first of all, this is a very misleading headline. I always made clear in my speeches, not only this weekend but prior thereto, that in fact no authority ought really to violate the law, and certainly no police authority. However, having stated that, I made one other point which I think is self-evident, namely, that there is also a rule of reason as well as a rule of law. When the law prohibits someone from doing something that they must do for the protection of themselves, their property, their family, their loved ones, or whatever, the rule of reason has to come into play. In this particular case—and I am not talking about the RCMP but about the illustration I gave—if someone had a loved one whose life was in danger and he was impeded from doing something by the law in order to save that life, the rule of reason would have to come into play and the courts would understand this on a consistent basis.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have respected many times in the past the right of any member who has been seriously aggrieved by any kind of journalistic mistreatment to raise the matter by way of privilege in the House and to put some explanation on the record. However, I think we have to be very careful not to extend this practice unduly. I respect the right of the hon. member if he has been misquoted. On several occasions in the past, the Chair has given members who feel they have been misquoted by the press an opportunity to set the record straight, particularly if there might be some misleading of the House, some grievance or contempt of the House contained therein. I think the deputy House leader ought to put the matter on the record, but it should be very limited.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rose, not to correct the press—I have given up on that a long time ago—but as a result of the question of privilege raised earlier by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Had it not been for that, I would not have raised the question. But I do not want it put on the record publicly or in the House of Commons that I in any way indicated that the RCMP really ought to be above the law. That is not my position and never has been my position. In light of the comments made by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I simply wanted the record to show that.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I make a brief comment with respect to the matter raised by the deputy House leader on the government side. While he may be aggrieved by what is written about him, the fact of the matter is that the Minister of Justice, for example, has been widely quoted over the course of the last weekend as well as being of similar sentiment to that of the deputy House leader. In fact, I suppose it might be said he was quoted as taking a position similar to that of the Prime Minister, in which there seems to be an implicit tolerance toward lawbreaking on the part of some police authorities whether federal or otherwise. While the deputy House leader wants to bring to the attention of the House the fact that he does not hold that point of view, the reasonable interpretation can be put on the statements made by the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice that this will in fact be tolerated by the government.

I would simply bring to the attention of Your Honour, and put on the record of the House, a statement made by the Minister of Justice who took that position in February of this year. I am curious to know whether he will maintain that position. He said in this House—

[Mr. Cafik.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar referring the Minister of Justice to a quotation made in February of this year?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am simply pointing out that the Minister of Justice has made a number of speeches in which he made certain statements and allegations respecting police forces being able to break the law. I want to point out to Your Honour that there has been a change in the attitude of this government to this issue, made more obvious by statements made in the House, as opposed to statements appearing in the press as alleged by the deputy House leader.

At an earlier time in this House, when protection of privilege was more appropriately brought to your attention rather than through press reports, the Minister of Justice indicated that he had great concern over the extent of the powers held by investigative agencies, and that he would look into ways in which these powers should be brought under control by legislation. I simply want the deputy House leader to know, in the course of his point of privilege, that his position in this House as enunciated is diametrically opposed to that taken by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the difficulty we face whenever we attempt to stretch the rules of the House to fit a situation they were never intended to fit. The question of privilege raised here today was a very interesting, substantive argument for a motion which can be put before the House in several ways. However, no part of it at any time had any real connection to the question of privilege. Once we extend any one of our procedures to accommodate an argument that seems to lie at the periphery of these procedures, we invite just what is happening now—namely, one member commenting on what a previous member has said. In my opinion, the matter has been contributed to equally by members on both sides of the House. It does not in any way constitute a question of privilege, and the matter should stop right here.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, having been dragged into the last question of privilege, I think I should be allowed to indicate that I agree with the Chair. I am just grateful to the opposition for indicating that we on this side have had a successful and active weekend.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Victoria on a point of order.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order which concerns the Minister of Finance. Since he is not in the chamber at this time, I will raise it later.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of the question of privilege introduced by the deputy House leader. Under the guise of correcting a statement which appeared in the press, the deputy House leader has taken the occasion to advance a whole theory of law in this country which seems to me to be completely out of order. While claiming to correct a headline in the paper, Mr. Speaker, the deputy House leader went on to say that the rule of reason should override the rule of law. Surely that is a new concept in this country.

All I want to say is that that is exactly the argument which has been advanced by every government which wanted to erode human liberty in the name of protecting human liberty. This is exactly what Richard Nixon said and, long before him, what Adolf Hitler said. I think this sort of intervention under the guise of a question of privilege ought not to be permitted.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the case of two questions of privilege raised this afternoon, the Chair exercised greater leniency than perhaps it should, and this was not all in respect of the matters which were referred to. However, perhaps the experience this afternoon is an indication that the Chair will have to take a much harder line on questions of privilege in the future.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, November 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last Thursday I was in the midst of saying something about the policies the government introduced in this bill dealing with life insurance policies owned by Canadians. I believe it to be worth while to repeat the inconsistencies in this proposal, particularly those which state that some loan interest shall be deductible but not interest on a loan before a certain date. In other words, the government is saying that the general rule of income tax which states that interest paid out on loans obtained for the purpose of earning income is deductible, is not in effect in respect of interest on loans on life insurance policies.

The reason for this, given by the former minister of finance, is that some loans are repayable and some are not. The minister seems to have come up with the equation that if you borrow from a bank, the loan must be repaid; but if you borrow from your life insurance company by way of a loan on your policy, that is not a repayable loan— ignoring the fact, of course, that the insurance company will certainly collect the loan at some time or another, even if it waits until the borrower dies. After all, insurance companies have a responsibility to their policyholders and their shareholders.

In addition, all loans on policies are deemed to give rise to a capital gain, so we have another inconsistency because the government now says, as a final concession, that when you die, it should not reach into the grave and take money away from your family: there is no application of the capital gains tax. However, if there is a cashing-in of a very small policy, or if a loan is taken out on a policy, this gives rise to capital gains tax. I just wanted to repeat those inconsistencies as I was in the midst of dealing with them on Thursday.

Let me point out the final anomalies of these provisions. Anyone who now wishes to borrow on his life insurance and has a built-in rate of 6 per cent or 8 per cent—whatever it happens to be—will find that he has to take his equity in that life insurance policy to the bank or other lending institution and will end up paying in excess of 10 per cent or 11 per cent, probably about 14 per cent, in interest. That should not be too surprising to us because we have seen an example of this in other policies of this government where by some magic it thinks that even though the inflation rate is growing at 8 per cent and plus, the wages and dividends of shareholders, including the dividends of retired people who rely on that kind of income as a major source, is keeping pace when in fact it is sometimes under 6 per cent. Everyone knows that inflation is taking place at the rate of 8 per cent or plus, and the average individual cannot get along with a 6 per cent increase in income.

I think this situation is not surprising, for another reason. We have heard the distortions made in the current debate, and I think particularly of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) who in his speech was critical of those on this side. Although statements to the contrary have been made, the minister criticized hon. members on this side for riding to power on the backs of the RCMP. I think that was the way he put it. We have seen other ministers in the country, being quoted and misquoted as a result of statements, taking that same point of view. I suggest that the people will not be fooled very much longer. They will understand that the policies this government is instigating will not work, and I suggest that this government and this kind of policy will no longer be tolerated.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), reiterated to members of the House the steps announced in the budget of March 31 and also described certain subsequent measures the government intended to take vis-à-vis the economy. He referred to—and indeed there has been in recent years—the considerable public attention and discussion devoted to questions of government expenditures and their relationship to the economy. Since this, as the House knows, is precisely the area of my particular responsibilities, I thought I would take the opportunity to share with hon. members some of my thinking on the matter.

In late 1975, the government adopted a very clear policy of expenditure restraint. The policy is that over time federal expenditures will grow in line with—will not exceed—the trend of growth in the gross national product. In effect, this means that, depending upon the response the government deems necessary to deal with particular prevailing economic circumstances, government spending may grow at a rate somewhat less or somewhat greater than the g.n.p. in any given year, but growth trends of federal spending and g.n.p. over any period of time will remain similar.

Since that policy was adopted, each year we have set an expenditure ceiling and growth target very close to the forecast of the growth in gross national product. In 1976-77, the first full fiscal year in which that policy was in effect, the forecast gross national product growth was 13.4 per cent and we set a spending growth ceiling of 14 per cent. We managed to hold actual final expenditure growth that year to only 10 per cent, well below the forecasted g.n.p. growth and the expenditure ceiling. In dollar terms, we said for that year we would contain spending to $42.15 billion. We completed the year at $41.1 billion, which was over $1 billion less than our commitment, a fact that went by relatively unnoticed by most members, and certainly by the media.

At the beginning of the current fiscal year, 1977-78, the g.n.p. growth rate was forecast to be about 11 per cent. Accordingly, we set our expenditure growth rate ceiling at the same figure. Subsequently—March 31, to be precise—we reduced the target to make room for some tax cuts which were committed in the March 31 budget. There have been changing economic circumstances since which have led to very large new demands for funds. I am referring to such things as transfers to the provinces for medicare, for hospital services, hospital insurance, post-secondary education; all under the formula dictated by the established programs financing act which, as hon. members will recall, was renogotiated last fall.

We have had some very heavy demands to meet our commitments in that regard. In spite of such very large and, in some cases, unforeseen requirements, the government is still confident that it can hold total spending growth in 1977-78 to about 8.2 per cent. We expect to hold to our committed ceiling, that ceiling committed last March for this fiscal year, of $44.45 million. Taking inflation into account, that will represent an almost zero real growth in expenditures for this fiscal year 1977-78.

Income Tax

At the same time that the government has been taking steps to try to bring our expenditures into line, we have been taking steps to severely restrain expansion of the public service. For the 1976-77 fiscal year, the total growth of authorized man-years within the public service, subject to control by Treasury Board, was held to 1.3 per cent, which was considerably less than the growth rate experienced in prior years. For the fiscal year 1977-78 the growth rate has been reduced to only .6 per cent, or six-tenths of one per cent. In order to maintain such low growth levels in light of many new and important government initiatives requiring new or more staff, thousands of man-years had to be reallocated from other programs.

Two consecutive years of low growth in the public service have resulted in some strains. I firmly believe it is still possible, and certainly still necessary, to accommodate new demands by drawing man-years from other areas which have a lower priority. Therefore, we intend to continue this program of constraint of growth in the federal public service.

Back in 1967, the federal government's total outlays, including transfers to other levels of government, amounted to 16.3 per cent of our gross national product. In 1976 this was slightly more than 20 per cent. Our total expenditure as a federal government was slightly more than 20 per cent of the g.n.p. Ten years ago, the purchase of goods and services, including the salaries of public servants and the cost of materials and supplies—the cost of running the government, as it were—plus the government's capital expenditures, plus the servicing of the public debt, accounted for approximately 50 per cent of our total federal government outlays. In 1976, the comparable figure for the same purposes was only 40 per cent of much greater potential outlays.

The point I am trying to make here is: the cost of running the federal government, including the cost of defence, external affairs, tax collections, the delivery of the various social programs, the operation of the criminal justice system, consumer protection, the servicing of the public debt, and so on, has stayed almost unchanged relative to the capacity of the economy. Moreover, the proportion of spending by the federal government for its own salaries and offices is less than ten years ago. The remaining outlays, which consist of transfers to provincial and local governments and transfers to persons and other subsidies, accounted for about half of the total government outlays in 1967 and grew to approximately 60 per cent of the total outlays in 1976.

The really large growth in federal spending has taken place in those programs which are redistributing income through transfer payments by the federal government, either directly to individuals or indirectly to them through the provincial governments. The policy of the government, and the practice it has worked out, has been to reduce spending for its own operations while simultaneously meeting its commitments to the aged, the unemployed, the sick and the less advantaged regions of the country. We have maintained that policy despite the increasing gap between rising indexed expenditures and much slower growing tax revenues that are indexed to protect taxpayers to some degree against inflation.

I should like to illustrate the immense impact such programs have had on the growth pattern of federal spending over the past several years. For example, I should like to place before the House three functional areas which have accounted for over 60 per cent of the increases in spending in the last seven years. Between fiscal year 1970-71 and the fiscal year we will complete on March 31, 1978, roughly 33 per cent of the total increase in government spending has come from health and welfare functions of the government. I want to stress that encompasses more than the programs administered by the Department of National Health and Welfare and includes programs for our native people, the Indians, the Eskimos, as well as some urban programs. That objective absorbed approximately one-third, or 33 per cent, of the increase during that time. About 13.5 per cent of the increase over those years has come from the increased cost of the servicing of the public debt.

Economic development and support programs through the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and DREE accounted for some 12.5 per cent of our increase in spending.

When you consider that there are literally hundreds of programs competing for very limited resources, several things, in my opinion, become very clear. First, the government has apportioned the largest single amount of new resources over recent years to those programs which benefit the individual. Second, the cost of meeting many of our programs has been greater than the growth rate of government revenues. As a result, the government has had to borrow relatively large sums of money and consequently apportion more of its annual income to interest payments.

Third, the growth of investment in economic development, while it is significant, is as low as we can go if we want to maintain a competitive position and play the part of an advanced industrial nation, and if we want to live like citizens of a major world economic power which befits the sixth largest economy in the western world.

To find the course of action of government expenditures, which simultaneously funds the established social requirements and meets the complex economic needs, is not an easy task. First, we must reassess each and every program expenditure to determine how effectively it meets its objective. Second, we must ask ourselves quite candidly if the objective still has a high enough relative priority to justify the resources we have allocated to it. In each of the past few years, such reviews have been undertaken.

Many projects have been modified or cut back. Some have been eliminated to free resources to meet greater needs. Within the area of my own responsibilities, the officials of the Treasury Board secretariat have aided and advised the departments on what is, admittedly, a very difficult exercise; but I will say that without the co-operation of my cabinet colleagues and their deputy heads, this restraint would still not have been possible. They are recognizing the need to re-examine programs and to take the steps necessary to ensure that expenditures, both in quantity and in purpose, are only those which will best serve the needs of the country over the next few years. That re-examination of programs and that evaluation of policies is a continuing requirement.

There are not, and there never will be, enough resources to meet all the demands, even legitimate, meritorious demands, even in this still rich and affluent country. We simply have to balance the continuing needs of all sectors of our society with the achievement of stable economic growth very carefully, because in the final analysis our ability to bear the costs of all our programs is dependent upon our economic health.

One way to achieve this balance—and I presume this will be a subject of stimulating debate over the next month and year—would be to fine-tune the delivery of programs in order to channel income redistribution more precisely to those in need and to ensure that redistribution does not conflict with the objective of increasing the productivity and output of the nation. Indeed, an expenditure pattern and a growth rate which is sustainable, while meeting the needs of the country and all its people, has to be chosen. In my view, this means that we must always seek to rationalize existing programs which are directed to target populations—the sick, the aged, the unemployed and the needy—to ensure that within the limited resources available the most important needs are adequately being met.

I have no illusions that the actions I am proposing for the future will be simple. I think we are all aware that the programs responsible for the largest government expenditure growth are those which affect individual Canadians in the most direct and obvious manner, and everyone is naturally reluctant to support reductions in programs from which he or she benefits directly, no matter how justifiable such reductions may be. Obviously, most of these same programs will require discussion and legislative amendments over the years before any expenditure savings can be realized. With our present pattern of spending—brought about by legislated statutory programs, contractual arrangements with the provinces and other firm commitments—there is a minimum of discretionary room for the government to meet the changing social and economic needs of the country.

The future requirements of the economy in the fields of energy, transportation, primary industry and many other sectors may require the assistance and co-operation of the government and the private sector. Indeed, I do not think those potentially large expenditures by the government in these areas can be met by simply increasing the rate of growth of federal government expenditures, unless we are prepared to accept a burden of taxation which I think would be intolerable. Among other things, for the government to respond in the future to anticipated changes in the national and international scene without unacceptable levels of spending, we are obviously going to require much more flexibility in our spending patterns than we now have.

We have been working hard reviewing spending patterns, particularly over the last two or three years. Much more remains to be done, and when more specific approaches have been developed I look forward to the co-operation of the House of Commons in dealing wisely with them in the future.

Before concluding my remarks I would like to turn for a few minutes to the broader aspects of our economic condition in Canada. I suppose one would be blind and unrealistic not to recognize that most of the world today is facing economic stress and tension. There have been incredibly dramatic shifts in real wealth between the different parts of this world.

I suppose the single, most significant example is that of energy cost increases. We are seeing the developing nations seeking their rightful share of the world's riches, becoming industrialized, competing at, for the moment, much lower wages, wage costs and other costs; and with increasing productivity. They are becoming a new factor in the competitive world. Canada has not—nor could we ever have—escaped this competition, particularly since we are such a high-volume trading nation with regard to both exports and imports.

For most of this century, particularly since World War II, Canada and its people have had an ever-onward and ever-upward gain in wealth and in material standards. That progress, although somewhat slower, continues today. Yes, we do have real problems. We share most of them with the rest of the world, but a few are particular and peculiar to this country. However, by almost every economic, social and political indicator in comparison to almost every other country in the world we are still the most favoured today and for the future.

Our unemployment rate is far too high. We worry about that, and we must respond wisely. But our employment growth rate—the other side of that coin—remains one of the highest in the world. Our over-all economic growth has slowed, but the forecast g.n.p. growth this year of 2 per cent or 3 per cent will still put us amongst the top performances in the world on that score. Our g.n.p. per capita—$8,090 U.S. per person—exceeds that of the United States, Japan, West Germany, France, Britain or Italy. As a country, we list thirty-first in the size of our population, but we have the world's sixth largest economy. While our inflation rate is still too high, it is lower than that of most industrialized countries.

I could go on documenting our better performance. My purpose is not to obscure or to patch over our weaknesses, but to present to Canadians a better balance and therefore to justify, in my view, a more optimistic and confident picture. It seems to me that that is what is needed in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: We need a balanced view of where we are, because I am afraid we Canadians have a great tendency toward introspection. Our media certainly seem to dwell and live on negatives. They pour the gloom upon us in a veritable flood. Our unemployment increase is on page 1 of the newspapers or on the 11 o'clock news. On the other hand, if our employment growth is mentioned at all, it is mentioned on page 89 or on some obscure broadcast.

● (1632)

We have some particular and peculiar Canadian problems, some not shared by others, affecting our ability to overcome employment and combat inflation. We have the very serious and worrisome situation vis-à-vis Quebec, unquestionably affecting not only the economy of that province but of the whole country. We have the continuing problem of our apparent inability as a nation to reconcile any reasonable co-operation for the good of all, the relations between our labour force and management which result in serious and growing productivity and cost problems. We have a vast and diverse country with additional built-in costs in some areas, making for great variance in economic opportunity. These are some of the particular challenges we face. But if we compare our situation today with most of the rest of the world, I think probably the government of almost every other nation would gladly change places with us, even under the economic stresses and strains we think we have.

We cannot patch over our weaknesses, but let us make a constructive beginning in this House of Commons. If we do not, we will psyche ourselves into far more difficulty than the real situation warrants. We must work together on our weaknesses. Certainly, we cannot go around with three solitudes—government, business and labour—each blaming the other. We, as a government, have to accept our responsibility. I am prepared to say that we have made some errors. I think governments of this country over the last several years have allowed their expenditures to grow too rapidly and too much. We are trying to reverse that. I think it is fair to say that the provinces are trying to reverse that as well. We are trying to find some constructive ways to direct the scarce resources that even this country can generate.

I believe that labour and business have to pull up their socks. We have to do our job in a co-operative fashion. Productivity is a great worry. The cost per hour in manufacturing and some export activities is too high compared with that of our neighbours and competitors. There is no use waving a magic wand, carrying banners or creating slogans: there is only one way to change, and that is for government, labour and business to face economic reality.

Let us not psyche ourselves into depression attitudes. Let us not psyche ourselves into a situation not warranted by the facts. Let us start thinking positively. I suggest the best place to begin is right here in this House of Commons, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the debate today is fairly wide-ranging. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) called it a mini-budget debate on several occasions. I should like to outline what I see as some of the problems with the mini-budget. In many ways it has been a reintroduction of measures brought down on March 31 by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), the former minister of finance. His was a very conservative budget and tended to follow the "trickle down" theory, as we call it: you prime the pump and hope some of the stimulation at the top will help people at the bottom.

Mr. Speaker, we do not believe that is the best way to stimulate the economy. This view was endorsed by many people. On April 1, 1977, Geoff Stevens, writing in the Globe and Mail, said it was no mean feat that the then minister of finance had managed to out-Tory the Tories. Perhaps that is how he got the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) to join the Liberal party shortly after that budget.

The president of Shell Oil, William Daniel, said that it is a business-oriented budget, and Sam Hughes, executive director of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, said they were grinning from ear to ear. A wide section of Canadians in the business community seem to think that the budget presented last March and the recent mini-budget are both business-oriented and very conservative indeed.

We must consider whether this type of budget will be good for the economy, Mr. Speaker. I think all of us can agree, despite the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), that the economy is in desperate shape. We have over one million unemployed, all kinds of regional inequities, all kinds of alienation about the way the country is organized—and not just in Quebec but in the Atlantic provinces, Newfoundland and western Canada. We must try to find out how this budget is going to help the Canadian economy. Many Liberal ministers will argue that we must have more incentives in the country. Perhaps they are picking up a Tory argument with that when they say there has to be more stimulation in order to create jobs.

I should like to examine the government's record. Many of the corporations which have received stimulus have not created jobs but, rather, have laid off hundreds and thousands of workers even while getting grants from the federal government. It is not a case of laying off workers once Santa Claus has gone away—they lay them off while he is still there reaching into his pack-sack and handing out gifts to the corporations. Alcan, for instance, started up in 1928 in its present form. By 1970 it had accumulated assets of $2,215 million. In 1977 it had increased its wealth by 46 per cent, to $3,251 million. But Alcan, which has been making handsome profits—its most recent profits increased 560 per cent from $21 million in 1976 to $138.8 million in 1977—laid off 400 workers in their fluorspar mining operation in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland.

That company made quite a lot of money very rapidly, and one would think it did not need incentives to expand. The profit was not made just on the initiative of the company. By June 1977 it had received $180 million in concessions from the government, and under the mini-budget of October this year it will receive another $11 million in grants and tax concessions.

The second case I come to is Inco. I think everyone has heard that they propose to lay off about 4,000 workers in Ontario and Manitoba. Their assets have grown from $1.8 billion in 1970 to nearly $4 billion in 1977. Yet workers are being laid off notwithstanding the fact that the federal government has given that company many gifts over the years. According to the most recent statistics, they have received a gift of $378 million in deferred income taxes. These are taxes which have been deferred by the government and are not paid by the company. There is an estimated additional figure of some $10 million which will go to Inco because of the latest budget brought down by the Minister of Finance during the last month.

If that is not enough, we find that the Export Development Corporation, which is the subject of debate from time to time here in the House, has again indirectly helped Inco to the tune of another $75 million for the development of mines in places like Indonesia and Guatemala. Here is a large company with a lot of assets, a great deal of skill, much experience in world and Canadian markets, which has been given literally hundreds of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, which has been given roughly $10 million more in the latest budget of the Minister of Finance, and which almost simultaneously has laid off some 4,000 Canadian workers.

Now I turn to the third of the four examples I wish to use. I refer to Northern Telecom, a subsidiary of Bell Canada, which received some $3 million in economic gifts very recently as outlined in the statement read by the Minister of Finance. At approximately the same time it laid off some 1,000 workers in plants throughout Ontario and Quebec. But poor Northern Telecom, Mr. Speaker, increased its assets in Canada from $363 million in 1970 to $705 million in 1976. It received this additional $3 million in gifts from the Minister of Finance and has been laying off some 1,000 workers in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Then we come to Noranda, my fourth and final example, in this debate. Noranda started off in its present form in 1922. By 1970 it had accumulated assets of more than $870 million. Again, we see more than a doubling of its wealth to some $1.9 billion in 1975, reaching over $2 billion by 1976. But Noranda, which has received some $86 million in deferred income taxes, a gift from the Canadian government, received an additional $5 million in the budget announced by the Minister of Finance last month. Shortly thereafter, the company laid off some 500 workers in four mining communities in Canada and is presently threatening to lay off another 1,700 workers in the Gaspé region of Quebec.

The four examples I have given are those companies which have received huge tax concessions and numerous gifts in the past from the government of Canada in order to promote an economic climate in which they would hire workers and improve the economies of the areas in which they are located.

In all cases we have seen these companies not only failing to expand their operations but, indeed, laying off workers. In all cases we have seen these four companies receive, as a result of the budget we are discussing today, additional gifts and tax concessions from the government of Canada. I suggest that this type of hand-out to large companies is not the way to increase employment in our country; it is not the way to stimulate the economy. In fact, these hand-outs have had very little bearing on the decisions of companies as to where they will operate a mine or where they will construct a plant.

In the case of Inco, the profits they have made in Canada are being used to develop mines in Indonesia and in Guatemala. The policy followed by this government had in my opinion been wrong. It is not helping the ordinary Canadian citizen in any way.

I have only offered four examples, Mr. Speaker, but there are literally hundreds of instances of the government providing aid to the corporate sector over the last number of years though any benefit to the people of this country has been questionable, if helpful at all. I believe the government probably gives more aid to the corporate sector than any other government in any industrialized country anywhere in the world.

What does this policy do for us? We have the highest unemployment rate of any industrialized country. I do not think any nation in the industrialized world has a higher rate of unemployment. While I was preparing to make my comments, I happened to read some statistics on unemployment around the world. I found some figures concerning unemployment rates between 1960 and 1974 which are very interesting. The United States, Japan, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, United Kingdom and Sweden are listed. Just by reading that list of countries we find that Canada, an industrialized society with people who are educated and technically skilled is blessed with more resources than many of the others.

Which of those countries I mentioned, Mr. Speaker, do you think, over the average of those 15 years, has had the highest unemployment rate of all? It is Canada. Our unemployment rate was 5.4 per cent, on average, over that 15-year period. That is a very high unemployment rate. If one takes our latest figures into consideration, the average rate would of course be higher. The highest rate of unemployment during that 15-year period was 7.1 per cent. The lowest rate of unemployment experienced during those years was 3.9 per cent.

Let us take a couple of countries at the other extreme. West Germany, although devastated in two world wars and divided in two just about 30 years ago, had the lowest unemployment rate of all. Its average unemployment rate was .8 per cent, indicating a country which obviously knows how to manage its economy and its resources so that its citizens are working and producing. The highest unemployment rate in West Germany during those 15 years was 2.1 per cent, and the lowest was .3 per cent.

In Canada, on the other hand, if the unemployment rate is 3 per cent we say that really it amounts to zero unemployment—it means we are really fully employed, with just a few people unemployed as they go from one job to another. But the highest rate in Germany in 15 years has been only 2.1 per cent. I suggest that with statistics like that, our country, given the resources at its disposal, has indeed been governed in a very bad and sad fashion. While I have the figures, let me cite a few other countries. Japan, for example, had an average unemployment rate of 1.3 per cent. The highest unemployment rate there in 15 years was 1.7 per cent; the lowest, some 1.1 per cent. In France the average was 2.3 per cent; their highest was 3 per cent and their lowest 1.6 per cent. Every country has Canada beat when it comes to the unemployment rate. In Sweden the average rate was 1.9 per cent. The highest unemployment rate they suffered was 2.7 per cent, and the lowest some 1.9 per cent.

Not all the countries I have referred to have elected social democrat or democrat socialist governments. A number of them have had Conservative or Liberal administrations throughout the years, countries such as West Germany, Japan and France. Despite that, they realized the importance of good planning and the proper allocation of their resources. They realized in those countries that full employment was not gained by just priming the pump at the top and hoping that some of the stuff you prime the pump with—namely money—would trickle down to the bottom, creating jobs and stimulating the economy. They realized other things need to be done if there is to be a buoyant and strong economy.

I referred earlier to four large companies which over the years have received huge hand-outs and grants, and which in this latest budget received more stimulus from the Minister of Finance. I noted that in all cases those companies had laid off workers or were in the process of doing so. Taking the companies in our country as a whole, about $10 billion is owed by them at the present time in corporate taxes. About $10 billion in deferred taxes is also owed by those companies; that is about $10 billion of interest-free, deferred taxes is owed by those companies. Just think of what we could do with the interest on that $10 billion in terms of creating jobs in places like the Gaspé and Newfoundland. We could create a lot of jobs. The largest 1,000 corporations in this country owe some $9 billion. Therefore, it is not just the small companies that owe this great amount of money.

What would happen if an ordinary taxpayer tried to defer his taxes for a number of years? He would receive a very abrupt notice from the Minister of National Revenue telling him to pay his taxes quickly or face the penalty for not doing so. However, the large corporations do not operate in that way. If, by deferring taxes, the corporations created jobs, that would be a different argument. But look at Inco and the other companies I have mentioned. They have all received large grants, but in every case they are laying off workers. The employees have been put in the position of having to accept hand-outs rather than jobs. That is wrong.

It is not just the companies I have referred to which received grants under the last few budgets. There are a number of others as well. As a result of this budget, the gift to Imperial Oil will be about $3.9 million. Shell Oil will receive, from "Santa Claus Chrétien," some $4 million; Gulf Oil, $3.3 million; BP, $1.3 million; and Texaco, $1.2 million—for a total of $13.7 million in additional gifts.

If any sector does not need stimulus and tax concessions, it is that of the gas and oil companies. They have made immense profits in this country and around the world in the past few years. These companies do not employ many people. They are capital-intensive, not labour-intensive. They do not supply tens of thousands of jobs. Therefore, the policies followed by the Minister of Finance are very bad indeed. In some ways they have become repulsive, looking at some of the public statements that have been made on programs to the effect that they will help people.

I spoke to someone who had called a radio show on Remembrance Day to speak to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). The caller asked why disability pensions had not been increased. Over the past five-years, veterans' disability pensions have fallen off by approximately $6 million a year, for a total of $30 million. The minister replied that pensions had not been increased because the government had to tighten its belt. He said the government was not a money machine and could not go on increasing spending forever.

Mr. Lalonde: You are misleading the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell that to the veterans.

Mr. Nystrom: In the same budget, the government saw fit to give the corporations of this country some $1.2 billion.

Mr. Lumley: To create jobs.

Mr. Nystrom: Like Inco creating jobs with all the gifts they have received from this government! They are laying off some 4,000 employees. I spent a great deal of time putting the statistics on the record. What about Alcan and the other companies that have been given gifts and are laying off people? If the government is going to subsidize a private corporation to create jobs, and the corportion does not create jobs, it should refund the money to the government with interest, so that it can be used elsewhere to create jobs for the ordinary people of Canada. However, that is not being done by this government.

Look at the unemployment situation. The President of the Treasury Board said that our economy is really good but there are too many gloom and doom people in the opposition and in the press gallery who are not telling Canadians the truth. I referred to unemployment in other parts of the world. Canada is the worst of all countries, despite our vast resources. A lot must be done to clear up this situation. I referred briefly to some of the statistics which are a disgrace. We now have a seasonally adjusted unemployment rate in Canada of 8.3 per cent. Our average over the past 15 years has been 5.4 per cent. It has become a lot worse in the past few years.

We have a very high rate of unemployment: 13.5 per cent in the Atlantic provinces, 11.4 per cent in Quebec, 8.5 per cent in British Columbia, 6.8 per cent in Ontario, and 4.8 per cent on the prairies. What is the government going to do about that? What is it going to do to get these people back to work, rather than give them hand-outs? Is the government just going to go on in the same old conservative fashion of stimulating the large corporations which only operate at 80 per cent capacity? If they wished, they could easily expand that rate of production.

I suggest the government should be doing almost the opposite of what it is doing. Instead of stimulating the top, they should be stimulating the bottom, giving a major tax break to low and middle income people. If you increase their purchasing power it will stimulate demand. Perhaps some of the unused capacity of the corporations could then be utilized. More jobs would be created as a result of the increased purchasing power. These people could then buy the necessities of life for themselves and their families. This is what must be done if we want to get people back to work and have an economy that is strong and buoyant.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills. Before calling the order for today I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members that last week the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) raised a point of order as to the procedure in bringing a motion before the House and standing other motions. The hon. member questioned the procedure that has been followed in the past.

Upon an interpretation of the Chair of Standing Orders 19(1) and 49(1) and their application, the Chair left the way open for the hon. member to request reconsideration of the decision at a later date. In his remarks at that time the hon. member requested that the Chair re-examine the whole question of programming of private members' hour as far as notices of motions are concerned. Further to that, the hon. member for Vaudreuil wrote a letter to Mr. Speaker of which I have just received a copy. That letter raised points that go beyond the question of standing motions under Standing Orders 19(1) and 49(1). It goes as far as questioning the right of the government to plan the work of private members' hour.

In light of this point in particular, as well as the other point, I think I should take this whole question under advisement. I would invite comment from hon. members the next time notices of motions are taken during private members' hour. At that time I hope the Chair can render a decision on this whole question.

● (1702)

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a disposition to allow the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to proceed with motion No. 14 and to allow the preceding motions to stand at the request of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 19(1), I ask, on behalf of the government, that all motions preceding that in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on the order paper be allowed to stand.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the remarks you have just made, I might add that the solution is very simple. One merely needs to consider carefully the provisions of Standing Order 19(1) which reads as follows:

> Questions put by members and notices of motions, not taken up when called may (upon the request of the government) be allowed to stand and retain their precedence; otherwise they will disappear from the order paper.

Under these circumstances, if I have to rise each time at five p.m. to ask that notices of motions and public bills in the name of hon. members on the order paper be allowed to stand, because some hon. members are not ready to proceed, I shall certainly do so to by-pass the difficulty, but I feel that practices exist in the House, and that the activities of the House are not governed solely by our standing orders, but also by the practice of the House. May I therefore bring to Your Honour's attention the fact that, when you consider this issue and before rendering your decision, you take into account that sometimes the practice of the House may prevent useless procedural nightmares.

[English]

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, is it my understanding from the remarks which have just been made that the ten members who have motions on the order paper prior to the motion which is now to be called have declined to proceed today, those ten members having put their motions on the order paper on October 27 of this year?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not in a position to answer the question of the hon. member.

[Translation]

Perhaps I might point out to the parliamentary secretary that indeed one of the reasons why the decision cannot be given today is that the precedents are not clear, at least the past practices of the House in that respect are not clear. The procedure now followed by the government to organize the working schedule for the member's hour is a new procedure dating from the last session. It must be considered not only in the light of the last session but also in the light of past experiences and this leads us to inconsistent practices which can be challenged by hon. members, including the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), and if the parliamentary secretary would allow me to complete my comments in the other language for the benefit of the hon. member for Vaudreuil—

[English]

I would want to reserve the matter particularly since there are contradictions in past experience and practices and this is a new procedure which commenced in the last session, based not on previous usage of the two Standing Orders or past practices. This is why the Chair wants to take a deeper look at the question, especially since the hon. member for Vaudreuil is questioning the right of the government to intervene more or less on a permanent basis in organizing the work of private members' hour.

It is a question of opinion perhaps, but I think it is a worth-while point and should be taken seriously. It would also be useful for hon. members to do some thinking on the matter and even to discuss it with the Chair, so there can be a good contribution to the procedural debate which will be invited the next time the House reaches notices of motions in private members' hour.

Motions Nos. 2 to 13 having been stood at the request of the government, the House will proceed to the consideration of motion No. 14 appearing in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

OLD AGE SECURITY

SUGGESTION PENSION BE PAID TO PERSONS AT AGE 60 UNDER CERTAIN CONDITIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the advisability of amending the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to provide for the pensions payable under these two acts to be available at age 60 to all persons who meet the other requirements of the said acts and who are not in or are prepared to withdraw for the labour market, and also to provide for the basic amount of the pension payable under the Old Age Security Act, at age 60 for those not in the labour market and to everyone at age 65, to be increased to $300 per month, for this basic amount to be escalated each year by an amount that will enable pensioners not only to keep up with rising living costs but to share in rising living standards, and also to provide for the elimination of any means or income test from the Old Age Security Act, so that the full pension thereunder will be recognized as the established right of all our people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are telling me that just about everything I need to say has already been said from the Chair in the reading of the motion. Perhaps I should just say that those are my sentiments and then sit down, hoping that my motion might come to a vote. My experience in this House leads me to believe that this would not be the result if I were to sit down. Even though the likelihood is that this private member's motion will get the usual treatment in that it will be talked out, I hope that the discussing of this subject today and the contributions that will be made to it by those who get the floor will help emphasize the point that the time has come to make some real improvements in our legislation respecting our senior citizens.

This afternoon when the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) was speaking to another matter before the House, he drew attention to the large amount of money out of the federal treasury which goes into our various social programs. So what is wrong with that? As a matter of fact, a moment later he said that there was reluctance to cut back any of those programs because they affect individuals, persons whom we know, and so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, that very statement underlines my point that there is no better purpose for a government to have than to improve the life of the people who make up this country. When I say "people," I include all our people both young and old. But surely one of the things which we can do with all the great wealth which we produce in this country—I agree with the President of the Treasury Board that we do not need to spread gloom and doom and to say the future is hopeless—is to provide the best possible retirement for our senior citizens.

This is why I invite the House today to indicate its support for the two main proposals which are in my motion: first, that the eligible pension age should be lowered, certainly for those who are out of the labour market; second, that the amount payable as old age security should be increased. I am prepared to admit, Mr. Speaker—in fact, I am prepared to go further than that and to assert—that the life of senior Canadians today is a lot better, a lot more civilized, than it was when some of us first came to this parliament—certainly a lot better than it was in the days of my predecessor as hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth.

But when one speaks of the kinds of pensions which were paid in the 1920s, the 1930s and right into the 1940s, and compares them with pensions and other benefits that are available for our senior citizens today, there is no argument: we have made tremendous improvements, and parliament is to be congratulated for that. I think we have the right to say that our movement has been worth everything, even if we had done nothing else than to provoke parliament into passing good legislation for our senior citizens. The proper thing to do is not to compare what is available today with what was available 40 or 50 years ago. The proper thing to do is to ask whether our senior citizens are getting their fair and proper share of the wealth the country is now producing.

I spoke on this matter during the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I believe on October 25, and I pointed out then a statistic I think is relevant, that the gross national product of Canada today is a little over $200 billion. The President of the Treasury Board gave a per capita figure today which confirms that figure of over $200 billion. According to the statistics that are readily available, out of the federal treasury, about $5 billion is today being paid for benefits to our senior citizens.

I would estimate, and I think about all one can do in this area is some guessing, looking and trying to figure it all out, that probably our senior citizens, persons 65 years of age and over, receive from other sources, such as provincial treasuries, private pension plans, and so on, something of the order of another $3 billion. I make it clear that this is a guess, but I believe it is an informed one. I think I can say without being proved wrong too far one way or the other, that our Canadians 65 years of age and over are living on a total income of about $8 billion. In my view, the comparison that has to be made is not with what other things cost the federal treasury, but between what our senior citizens are getting, and what is being produced by the population as a whole. The amount of $8 billion is one twenty-fifth of the $200 billion we are now producing, but our senior citizens, about 2 million, represent about one-twelfth of the population. I suggest that is a relevant and important statistic. About one-twelfth of our people are getting about one twenty-fifth of the wealth that is produced.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

If you want to put this comparison in percentages rather than in fractions, you arrive at a comparable statement that 8 per cent of our people are getting only 4 per cent of the wealth we are producing.

I contend that there should be increases in pensions even at a time when the government is shouting for restraint, and I say shouting for it but not necessarily practising it in other areas. I am merely asking for what is fair, and if in a country like Canada we cannot be fair, especially to our older people, we do not deserve to be regarded as a civilized society. I press very strongly, in spite of all one can say, and I could say it as well as anyone else, that in view of the progress we have made in the last 40 or 50 years, compared with what we are able to produce in Canada today we are not giving our senior citizens a fair share.

I am not standing here suggesting there should be absolute equality or that retired people should have the same amount of wealth as those working, raising families, and so on—we are talking about this in comparative terms—but certainly the differences should not be as great as they are. We should not have 8 per cent of our people receiving only 4 per cent of the gross national product. I would emphasize that it is these people who helped bring the country to where it is today in terms of its capacity and in terms of its ability to produce, and I say we should be doing a lot better for them.

I express this desire that something better should be done for our older people in two main ways. On the one hand, as my motion indicates, we should be lowering the eligible age, certainly for those who are out of or are prepared to leave the labour market. In other words, I think both old age security and Canada Pension Plan retirement benefits should be available at age 60. Please note that I use the word "available". I am not suggesting that they be paid universally or automatically as they are now at age 65. I am suggesting that between ages 60 and 65 those who are out of the labour market, or are prepared to leave the labour market, should be entitled to draw the full old age security and the full Canada Pension Plan benefits they have earned. I will not take the time now to compare what we are doing with spouses' allowances, which is a grossly unfair way of providing pensions to some persons in that age bracket; I simply emphasize the fact that this would be a much more fair way of doing it.

Let me also argue, as other members have from time to time, if we did that, gave a large number of people between 60 and 65 the opportunity to retire, this would open jobs which are sorely needed by the younger people in the population. I am aware of the arguments we hear these days about the right to keep on working. We heard them in respect of a motion last week. I do not mind that, but I also want our senior citizens to have the right to retire, and there is not much use talking about the right to retire if you have to retire on nothing. Accordingly, I urge that consideration be given to lowering the eligible age under those two main pieces of legislation for those who are out of the labour market.

I could mention again some of the things that are said in response to this. We heard many statements by the former minister of national health and welfare to the effect that there are other groups who need consideration, that we should not talk only about those between age 60 and 65. The difficulty is that, while he talked about those other groups which needed to be helped, he never did anything for them. There was introduced last year the social services act which was to be of some help, but it was dropped from the order paper and we see no sign of it in this session.

The new Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) has made noises about a guaranteed income plan. She has talked about the possibility of doing something in three selected categories. One was in respect of persons unemployed between ages 50 and 65. She has also talked about a negative income tax. I am interested in all these things she says, but when previous ministers went through these exercises year after year without doing anything, what hope is there that this minister will get anywhere in this area, especially when she is surrounded by cabinet colleagues whose main task these days seems to be to preach restraint?

I am all for the new minister and her suggestions that we should do something for the unemployed, the single parents and the others who are in need, but at least this move could, and should, be taken right away. We should move the eligible age down to 60. There are many people who do not want to retire at 60 or 65. Some may not want to retire at ages much older than that, but for a great many Canadian workers, especially the kind of workers I have in my constituency, mainly in industry, heavy, dirty, rough and tough, the thing that appeals to them is the possibility of being able to retire at age 60. So I press for that part of my motion.

The other part of my motion calls for an increase in the amount of the pension. I suggest the figure of $300. It is running a little over $150 right now. That is the basic pension and, of course, there is the guaranteed income supplement on top of that. That still involves the use of what the government calls, euphemistically, an income test. In my view it is still a means test. If we get a negative income tax we will start to get away from that. The guaranteed income supplement is fine for those who have nothing else, and 30 per cent of our senior citizens are in that position, but it is a very unsatisfactory proposition for many Canadians who are just above the cut-off line. Those are the people who, because they have a little something else, do not qualify for the supplement, yet find it extremely difficult to keep up with today's cost of living.

Please remember, Mr. Speaker, that what we owe to our senior citizens is not just the right to keep up with the cost of living as it was at their point of retirement, but what we owe to them is the right to keep up with the rising standard of living and the rising gross national product. I return to the plea made this afternoon by the President of the Treasury Board, that we do not need to spread gloom and doom but that we have hope for the future of this country. I share in his view, provided we can get rid of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If we have that hope, and if we believe that our productive capacity is such that we can go on producing greater quantities of goods and services than we now produce, the decision must be made that we are going to share that equally and evenly amongst the various sectors of our population.

As I have said before, I am proud of what Canada has done in the social security field, especially in terms of old age security. I think we have made some tremendous steps. I am proud to have been part of that process over quite a few decades. But that is no excuse for us to stop where we are. We can make things still better for our senior citizens, for those over 65 and for those who want to come in on the program between 60 and 65. That is the reason I present this motion today, and I hope the House will treat it favourably.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the Good Lord said one day that we must always pray steadfastly. I think that the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is a practical application of that advice and I am very pleased to support that motion, more especially since I also had the opportunity to present similar motions. Indeed, I consider that Canada is in a position today to meet the needs of senior citizens aged 60 to 65 whose work throughout the years has earned them the gratitude of their country to allow them to live peacefully, enjoying security and freedom.

According to the statistics we have, 896,000 Canadians of both sexes are in the 60-to-65 year age bracket. It is therefore easy for Department of Finance or Treasury Board civil servants to figure out how much it would cost Canada to meet their needs.

We are talking here of voluntary retirement, of course, and I agree with that because many persons who have steady employment and are in good health want to continue working; the motion is not intended to prevent them from doing so, but God knows there are many people who work very hard and barely get by. I know hundreds of them. Representations are often made to me. I had some again over the weekend, and those people are eager to have the right to retire while being assured security. That is totally logical. Studies have been made over the years. The former Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) tabled some on the subject; he often told us that the federal government, through its officials, had discussed the matter with the provincial governments, with their provincial counterparts, with a view to reaching an agreement on how to amend the social acts providing help to the needy. I hope the matter will be studied so that, at long last, a bill can be introduced some time during this Parliament which will meet the needs of those people who are entitled to security and the gratitude of their country.

A serious look at the situation reveals that thousands of young people, young men and women alike, of 18 to 30, are without work. They are qualified, have had good schooling and are capable of serving their country well, but they cannot find work. That comes as no surprise to the government. It is well aware of it. I am also convinced that it is not indefferent to that unfortunate state of affairs. I think it would be in the interest of the country to allow the people of 60 to 65, who want to retire, to do so and make way for the young people so that they, in turn, can give their full measure in order to deserve, when they reach a certain age, and have grown older, that right to security in old age. They must be given that opportunity. I am sure that if the government would agree to this motion, we would see a great improvement. There is no need hiding the fact, we are going through hard times and many homes are near poverty.

I would not want to dramatize the situation, but as an example, on Saturday last, November 12, at eight o'clock in the morning, someone rang my doorbell. There was this man in his thirties who introduced himself and asked if it was the home of the member of parliament. Yes, I said, and you are speaking to him now. You want to see me? He said: Yes, indeed. So I asked him in but he added: Wait until I go and fetch my "gang". I did not know what he meant. He came back with his wife and four kids, from 2 to 11 years old. There, he briefed me on his situation. He was not begging, he just wanted me to help him find a job. This man wants to earn a decent living for his family. While listening, I realized he was in a depressed mood, but he was in fact in good spirit. He wants to work to earn his living, but there is no job where he lives. As for unemployment insurance benefits, he does not like them because he knows very well that this is not a good way of providing himself with a regular income. As for welfare, he says he is too young to consider that.

Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of poor people. Parliament should decide to urge the government to amend the legislation referred to in the motion. Things cannot get worse than they are now. Will that cost more? I do not think so. Some reliable calculations have been made. If we could get back to work those we allow to live on welfare and who can work, we would not have to pay any more for them. They would pay taxes which would bring revenues into the national treasury, and 60 year old people would be able to get old age security benefits. That would be an exchange, even though that might cost a few million dollars more. In my opinion, Canada would benefit from this experience.

Recently I read a statement from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) which has been reported in the newspapers; in any event, I believe it is true and until I get proof to the contrary I must believe what is published in newspapers where he was quoted as having said that "Canadians are too thrifty, they save too much. They do not spend enough". And he added: "They spend their money in Florida".

Mr. Speaker, those who spend their money in Florida earn enough income to get there. But they are not the ones who should be helped. No, we must help those who do not have enough revenues, such as middle and small income workers, those who do not have enough. They will spend their money in Canada, not elsewhere. It is obvious that if we increase their income, we will allow them to spend more, we will stimulate the economy because those people usually buy the things they need every day.

That is precisely the problem today. We have a number of industries which do not operate to their full capacity, others are closing their doors. There are dramatic bankruptcies because they cannot sell their production and, at the same time, there are people who cannot afford the strict minimum. We are struggling in a vicious circle, like a dog trying to catch its tail and running around and around. This is the situation we are coping with.

For these people, inflation is a very serious problem. It means ever soaring prices which prevent those who do not get wage increases from meeting their every day needs. Inflation affects particularly these individuals and these families and the situation is getting worse from week to week, from month to month.

With regard to electricity in the province of Quebec—I prefer taking examples in my own province—in 1962 the Quebec government decided to nationalize electricity because this would help us become masters in our own house.

We could see in the papers the key of the "Masters in our own house". It was so long that it could not be put on the same photo from bottom to top. It had to be put across the page to make the "Masters in our own house" more precise. Let us consider the increase in hydro rates today. I shall probably be told that it is because of the James Bay development which is so costly. It has cost $6 billion so far and the total outlay is estimated now at $24 billion. I read in a report that it is going to cost $18 billion in interest alone. Herein lies the disorder, Mr. Speaker. Clearly, if money is to be remunerated more and more, once, twice, three times, four times, five times, a lot of money will go there and we will be unable to meet our obligations and ensure a decent living to the aged. It is also clear we will be unable to develop our economy, and our industries, and unemployment will increase. By the way, predictions are that unemployment will reach enormous proportions next winter.

When I hear such things I get depressed. Recently I heard somebody, someone highly learned, suggest that a war was the only thing to correct the situation, who said that? I will not name him, out of respect. A war was needed, some other people would have to be killed but not ourselves. Such is war, someone killing others. I have known two wars in my lifetime, the first and second world wars. What did they solve? They were supposed to end all problems. Well this has created temporary jobs but also resulted in huge indebtedness. And once the war was over, what could we do? We went back to that old habit—depression. Was the depression experienced between 1930 and 1940 caused by some scholarly crisis in the economic system? Not at all. The crisis was in the system itself. The proof is that history is repeating itself. After World War I, there was a period of inflation, short lived prosperity. From 1929 to 1939, there was real depression, systematic misery. At that time some people said a war was needed to solve the situation. Well, we had World War II. What did it solve? We are now in the same situation, at the same point we were after world war II.

I am very seriously convinced we should follow the suggestion in the throne speech, that we should be looking for new ways. It would be a new way if we allowed our aged to live decently. This would give work to a number of young people, a positive, productive contribution toward prosperity. We could not do worse than we are now doing. For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I very seriously support the motion now before us and I wish the House would have the maturity to adopt it unanimously.

● (1732)

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I shall not go to the trouble this time of congratulating the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his motion No. 14. We have done that many times before. If ever this House was entitled to have a feeling of déjà vu, it is now, with the hon. member's usual motion, well meaning as it is, to increase retirement pensions, to index them in this case, and to start them at an earlier age. However, there are some concerns about this proposal which the government side has to take very seriously. I hope the hon. member will listen to them very carefully and consider them sincerely.

The very sweeping changes in pensions suggested by this motion would clearly have an enormous immediate impact in terms of total government expenditures and of the taxes which would be required to pay for these benefits. In the long term the economic and social effects could be even more dramatic.

We should look very closely, then, at the costs these proposals would entail and the benefits to be derived by the Canadian population, and weigh them against the burden which that very same Canadian population would have to bear.

Let us first consider the proposed increase in Old Age Security benefits. The OAS program will expend about $4.5 billion in 1977, roughly $3.4 billion of which is spent on the basic OAS benefit payment, $1 billion on the Guaranteed Income Supplement, and $1 million on the spouse's allowance. Since there are at present almost exactly two million Old Age Security recipients in Canada, a $1 increase in the OAS pension implies a cost increase of $24 million annually.

The hon. member's motion proposes that the Old Age Security basic benefit be raised to $300 per month from its present rate of $150.43, virtually doubling the current rate. It is easily calculated that two million pensioners each receiving $300 per month, or $3,600 per year, would be paid $7.2 billion per year altogether. This would represent a rise in total program expenditures of roughly $3.8 billion, or 84 per cent greater than the present cost.

In addition, the hon. member proposes that the income test currently applied to the Guaranteed Income Supplement be removed, but when this same suggestion was debated in the last session he stated that the benefit itself should be retained. In other words, all OAS pensioners over 65 would be entitled to the full GIS benefit. If we assume that the ratio of single to married persons remains the same as for current GIS recipients, we can estimate that roughly 1.1 million persons over 65 would receive the GIS at the single rate and 900,000 at the married rate. This works out to a total expenditure of roughly $2.4 billion at present rates, or $1.4 billion more than current GIS expenditures.

The total Old Age Security program expenditures would therefore rise by about $5.2 billion per year at current rates if the benefit increases suggested by the member for Winnipeg North Centre are applied to the over 65 population, bringing the total program cost to $9.7 billion.

The hon. member suggests also that benefits under both the Old Age Security program and the Canada Pension Plan should be made available at age 60 to those not in the labour market. This is, in effect, the reinstatement of the retirement test which the Canada Pension Plan formerly applied at age 65. Now, however, it would apply at age 60, without an earnings test to mitigate costs.

As to how we could achieve any kind of fairness with a retirement test but no earnings test, I am not sure. Certainly there are many questions to be answered about this concept. It appears that a person with $100,000 per year of income from investment could state that he is not in the labour market, whereas a person who works part-time for a few dollars to eke out his or her income could be said to be still in the labour market. Persons such as housewives who are not in the labour force might be able to collect a full OAS benefit even though their spouse is working and making $20,000 per year.

What would happen if someone in receipt of benefits found work and wished to re-enter the labour force? Would the benefits be suspended and overpayments recovered? What would be done for people who are unemployed but continuing to seek work, even though the prospects of finding employment may be slim? Would we force them to give up all hope of employment and permanently withdraw from the labour market before they could obtain benefits? Since Unemployment Insurance benefits are currently payable up to age 65, would double benefits be permitted, or would we perhaps lower the age limit on UIC eligibility to age 60?

I might note that one of the reasons that the CPP retirement test, for persons over age 65, was abolished was to avoid some of the inequities which I have described above, as well as to remove the disincentive to work which such a restriction implied for persons aged 65 to 69. The hon. member suggests such a retirement test be applied at age 60 for both the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security Act. With such measures, the Government of Canada would be very strongly encouraging people to retire at an earlier age, and almost penalizing them if they did not. If past experience is any indication, the Government of Canada would also be encouraging employers to lower compulsory retirement ages, as happened when the eligible age was lowered from 70 to 65.

Because of the possible changes in retirement patterns that such an incentive to early retirement might have, it is not possible to estimate accurately the total cost of permitting voluntary retirement on full pension at age 60 under the Canada Pension Plan and the Old Age Security program. We can, however, make some observations and approximations which might prove useful in considering the possible effects of such a decision.

First, I might note that at present 13.3 per cent of the population of Canada over age 20 is over 65 years of age, whereas 19.3 per cent is over 60 years of age. If we were to imagine for the moment that the entire population between 60 and 65 years of age were to retire, then clearly the cost of retirement programs would increase by at least 45 per cent. This would increase Old Age Security costs which, as you will recall, would already have risen to $9.7 billion, by another $4 billions, making the total cost 13.7 billion per year, or nearly 3 times the present total annual cost of the OAS program.

This speculation of mass retirement is not very far-fetched in the long view, if we consider the possibility that lowering the retirement age to 60 for the federal government programs might eventually lead to its being adopted as the normal retirement age in Canada. If we suppose, however, that only the approximately one half of the population between 60 and 65 who are not now in the labour force were to take advantage of this early retirement proposal, the cost of OAS would still rise by about $1 billion annually at the current benefit rate, or $2 billion at the proposed $300 rate. This in itself is more than ten times the estimated amount currently spent on social assistance for persons aged 60 to 64, excluding the spouse's allowance.

If this proposal also suggests that these people in the 60 to 64 age category receive full GIS as well, this would make the total annual program cost of Old Age Security nearly $12.2 billion, almost $7.7 billion more than the cost of the current OAS program.

In the Canada Pension Plan, we find a similar pattern. If all eligible persons were to retire at age 60 instead of 65, then the CPP beneficiary population would jump by almost one half. In the long run, the contribution rate would also have to rise by almost one half to pay for these benefits. Since it is now projected that the CPP contribution rate will have to more than double in the next fifty years, we might wish to reflect whether we have the right to commit succeeding generations to such an additional burden.

If legislation were introduced to allow CPP retirement pensions to be payable at age 60 in 1979, and if we assume that only half the eligible population takes advantage of early CPP retirement, we find that benefit payments would rise by $40 million in 1979 and would cost an extra $640 million by 1985.

The tale of financial woe does not end, however, with increases in numbers of pensioners and the dollar amount of benefits paid. We must remember also that, by increasing the number of pensioners, we decrease the number of people in the labour force who must pay the taxes and make the contributions to support the larger population of pensioners. In other words, we are not simply increasing by five the number of years for which the eventual pension must be paid, we are also lowering by five the number of years in which the individual contributes towards the benefits of others.

The effect might be made clearer if we think of the individual as "earning" his or her own eventual retirement through active participation in the economy and in Canadian society prior to retirement. A person who works from, say, age 20 to age 65, a total of 45 years, and then retires and lives a further 15 years to age 80, has, in effect, worked three years for every year of retirement. If we lower the retirement age by just five years in this example, we find that the individual has worked only two years for every year of retirement. Clearly the amount that is set aside in respect of every working year to pay for the eventual benefit must be considerably increased.

One final and vital factor must also be considered and that is the changing population profile in Canada. Our birthrate is dropping and is now well below the replacement rate. This means that the average age of our population is rising. If present trends continue, some demographers estimate that the ratio of retired persons to workers in the labour force will nearly double in the next fifty years, even with the normal retirement age still set at 65. This means that the tax burden required of each worker to pay benefits for the retired population will increase over the next fifty years. It is said that if we lower the normal retirement age to 60, the ratio will be three times what it is now and the eventual tax burden therefore three times as great.

There are other, hidden costs associated with lowering retirement ages and increasing benefits, on which we can only speculate. If income security benefits such as Old Age Security are drastically increased, will this encourage people to become more dependent on public pensions and to decrease their personal retirement savings? Certainly, the average private pension benefit will have to be smaller, or the contribution rate much higher, if we lower the average working career by five years, and increase the average payment period by the same amount.

There is one final point in the member's proposal with considerable financial implications, that is, the suggestion that the indexation of old age security benefits should relate not to the cost of living, but to the "standard of living". While this term may be fairly hard to define, we could take as an example the indexation of benefits in accordance with the average industrial wage, which traditionally has risen more rapidly than the consumer price index by a margin of 2 per cent to 2½ per cent.

If we were to index benefits by 2 per cent more than the cost of living, we would raise the cost of the Old Age Security program by more than $90 million in the next year alone. If the 2 per cent were calculated on top of the other additional expenditures implied by this motion, the additional cost would be $310 million.

If we wish to sum up the costs of the member's suggestions as far as they can be estimated we can say that the changes in CPP and OAS benefits which he advocates could cost at least $7.7 billion extra in the first year after implementation. The annual amount to be expended would increase and not decrease in the long run. At the same time the alterations to our social and economic structures which are implicit in the motion might very well lessen our ability to pay the cost.

If time permitted it would certainly be worth-while reviewing the extent to which these programs have been improved in our lifetime, particularly in the last several years, but I shall not deal with that aspect, since I believe the facts are well known. I shall conclude by saying that, having regard to the progress which has been achieved and the concerns so often expressed about the necessity for restrained public expenditure, we might ask ourselves whether we ought really to be prepared to consider the enormous expenditure which is required to provide the increased benefit proposed in the motion. However laudable the motion of the hon. member who made this proposal, this is an aspect which cannot be ignored.

I realize there are other points which need to be brought out, but I wish to give an opportunity for some of my hon. friends, for example, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), to make their contributions.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us calls for the pension to be payable at the age of 60 in the case of people not in the work force and for retirement at 65, pensioners to receive $300 a month. We have just heard from the Civil Service why they cannot go along with this proposal. It is unfortunate we cannot hear some of the Liberal members explain why they cannot support it.

The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) says that if the motion were accepted taxes would have to be increased. We did not hear one word from him about the possibility of cutting out wasteful federal expenditure, such as spending money on unnecessary airports, spending $1 billion a year on consultants' fees to no purpose—I have the figures for 29 departments—or contracting out work to retired civil servants and others at a loss of $130 million a year. There are many such areas which could be reviewed. We might not be able to find all the money that is involved here, but there are a lot of places where we could find money for increasing pensions and lowering the retirement age.

We in the Conservative party proposed $200 at age 60 during the last federal election, and we knew where the money was coming from. I shall not be the one to talk out this bill. I hope the Liberal who talks it out will speak from the heart and not stand up to read a statement from some civil servant telling us why this motion cannot be accepted.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) say that if the Conservatives were in power they would find the money—that they knew where it was coming from. That is a bold assertion, given the present state of the world economy. I doubt very much they would know where the money would come from, whether they were in power or not.

First I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has always been a great advocate of increased pensions not only for senior citizens but for veterans and widows. I praise him for his efforts. However, somebody has to sit in final judgment and be responsible for taking decisions. It is all very well to talk about giving things away, but unless the money is there first, you cannot do it. I am a great believer in Utopia, or I used to be—I believe it to be an unlikely prospect, now. It would be nice to provide everyone with the same standard of living on retirement. But we have heard the remarks of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook); I think he made it perfectly clear that much as we would like to do many of these things we are finding it financially impossible.

In the July issue of International Realities there is an article showing that the British government has just come through a crisis brought on by excessive rises in wages, heavy social security payments, and free health services. It was generally thought that high unemployment was due to all the taxation and the undue reduction of legitimate business profits. Canada and the United States have been following the U.K. downward slide because the number of jobs in the private sector has been decreasing while the number of employees in all areas of government at all levels has been steadily increasing. The number of people working at productive jobs is too small to provide for all the government employees, for government make-work programs, and for a generous social security system. In other words, we are faced with the need to reduce government expenditures and the ratio of government employees to those in the market place. We shall have to improve the profitability of the private sector in order to pay for even the measure of social security we presently enjoy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE SURVEILLANCE OF MAIL NOT PERMITTED

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, one of the most impressive sights I have had the opportunity of observing in the question period took place on November 9 when I raised the question of the surveillance of mail by agencies of the federal government. We were given the spectacle of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) rising in his place and telling us there had been no interception of mail; he had talked the matter out with officials of his department and, as the protector of the mail of Canada, he could give an assurance, or, at any rate, leave the distinct impression that there had been no interceptions.

Well, to use a current expression, he was blown out of the water by his colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), who acknowledged that the security service had in fact been involved in the opening and copying of the mail—information which has now been passed over to the McDonald Commission.

It appears that the Postmaster General has been very negligent in his duties to the extent that he had not asked his colleague in the same row whether or not any of the allegations which had appeared in the press and in national news reports had any substance.

● (1802)

The question was not whether someone within the Post Office was intercepting mail. It was an allegation that the security service under the aegis of the Solicitor General had in fact opened the mail and, in fact, had gone to the Post Office and intercepted mail. The Postmaster General stood up in his place and had to be told by the Solicitor General during the question period that this was the case.

I want to bring some basic facts about this whole matter to the attention of the House. First, there is no question about the fact that intercepting mail is illegal under Section 43. The Postmaster General understands that. He indicated that in the House.

We want to know the attitude of the government with regard to the interception and opening of the mail. Does the minister of a given department have any given obligation to know whether his officials are obeying the law? Apparently the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not hold there is a responsibility upon ministers to inquire whether they are obeying the law within the department. He said on November 2, as reported at page 568 of Hansard:

> I am a little dubious of the context in which the hon. member says that the operations should be an open book—

That is referring to the minister responsible. Is he saying that in the case of the Solicitor General he should not have a detailed knowledge of what mechanisms are being used by people under his responsibility? Furthermore, the Official Secrets Act places upon the Solicitor General the responsibility of ensuring that the Security Services do in fact obey the law as it applies to surveillance.

Part IV.1 of the Criminal Code applies to any person who intercepts a communication without a warrant. Only the Solicitor General can issue a warrant for an intercept to take place. Under the provisions of Section 16(5) of the Official Secrets Act, which was referred to in the House today, the Solicitor General makes an annual report respecting occurrences of surveillance and intercepts employed. This can only be construed as parliament putting a clear obligation upon the Solicitor General to keep himself informed as to the method of surveillance used by the security force.

The predecessor to the Solicitor General was guilty of gross neglect in his fundamental ministerial responsibility. In three successive reports the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) neglected to mention the use of postal intercepts which, considering the frequency with which they were used, shows a complete failure to exercise his responsibility to determine what was taking place in his department.

Today the Solicitor General said in the House that his predecessor, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, had authorized a postal intercept which, because of Section 43 of the Post Office Act, was illegal. It stretches credibility to the breaking point to believe that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not ask a question of his security service advisers, "Are you conducting mail intercepts at the present time?"

Even the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) stood up in the House to try and defend himself, although not very successfully. The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs does not have the guts to make a statement on motions with respect to his involvement or neglect in this area. He sits mute, and allows another minister to try to answer for him. I suggest he is without any fortitude at all if he does not come forward and state his case with respect to this matter.

The present Solicitor General is not fulfilling his function with respect to mail interceptions. To use the Prime Minister's now infamous words in the House, it is very suspicious that although the deputy director of the security service knew all about the mail intercepts over a year ago, the Solicitor General can contend that his officials did not mislead him nor did he mislead the House as to the degree of his ministerial knowledge or responsibility.

In June, 1977, the Solicitor General told the House that he had met with his officials who had told him that the APLQ break-in was an isolated incident. Now we are asked to believe that the officials he met to discuss the question of illegalities did not include the deputy director of the security service who knew of the mail intercepts. Not only that, but we are asked to believe that the director of the security service did not know of the interceptions even though his immediate subordinate did. How far does the arm of coincidence stretch? I suggest that it does not stretch far enough to cover all the ifs, perhaps, and wherefores of the Solicitor General and spokesmen for the government, including the Postmaster General.

I make one parting reference to the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who was involved in all of this and who, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, promised to make the security services accountable to the government. He hired Mr. Starnes, a man who is now held out as scapegoat for the government's failure in the field of security. Mr. Starnes said on Friday that he would be very surprised if he had neglected to brief the present Minister of Supply and Services on the APLQ break-in. Well, Mr. Speaker, we would not be surprised in view of all the circumstances and the way this matter has been handled by the government.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat worried when I saw that the hon. member's remarks were aimed at me. He had seven minutes to talk about one point. Naturally he tried to touch all bases and consequently he scored no point at all.

If he were to refer to Hansard, the hon. member would see that the statements he has made are totally inaccurate. Mr. Speaker, I have never given the House any assurance that there had been no implications. I did indicate that I had made a preliminary investigation within my department and that, by so doing, I had made sure that so far, to the knowledge of the officials of my department, there had not been any co-operation with the RCMP.

[English]

I should like to indicate to the hon. gentleman that that particular information has indeed been corroborated by the information which has been provided by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox). I have indicated to the hon. member's colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), that if he has any evidence of collaboration or any instance of co-operation between postal authorities and members of the RCMP, then I would be pleased to receive it. I have also said, and indeed have so undertaken to the hon. gentleman and to the House, that I would pursue my investigations, and these are continuing now. It is my responsibility under Section 43 of the Post Office Act to ascertain that there has not been any illegal conduct by any postal official. This I have done and am continuously doing so. It is my responsibility to ascertain all the facts and to take such measures as are available to me under the Post Office Act.

The hon. member also knows that Section 48(3) permits me to conduct an inquiry. To date I have not commissioned such an inquiry because I am still conducting my preliminary investigation. On ascertaining the facts which are available to me, I will then decide whether such inquiry ought to be conducted.

There is another comment that the hon. gentleman made in connection with reports which were filed in this House by the Solicitor General. If he had paid any attention during question period today to the reply of the Solicitor General, he would know that there is no need at all to file any information relating to any interception except as required under the amendments to the Official Secrets Act dealing with communications. The Solicitor General said he had obtained a legal opinion from the Department of Justice to the effect that that would not include mail interceptions. There the matter lies.

The Solicitor General also said that although he had received information from the RCMP that there were mail interceptions, he did not know whether any postal officials were involved. Until such time as I am assured—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret that the three minutes allotted to the minister are well past.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—MEASURES TO AID EMPLOYEES AFFECTED BY CHANGE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my message concerns the several thousands of Canadians who serve this country abroad on behalf of the Government of Canada and its various departments, and on behalf of the Armed Forces. Before getting into that message, perhaps I might be permitted to say that once a late show, always a late show. The fact that we have moved it up a couple of hours does not seem to have changed the numbers of people who are clamouring as they did when it was ten o'clock at night to get in to see what was going on, as compared to now when they are still clamouring.

The reason I brought us here at this hour, instead of later on, is due to the fact that the vagaries of inflation and the changing fortunes of the Canadian dollar have affected the lives of those who serve us abroad. Therefore on Wednesday, November 9, 1977, as reported at page 742 of Hansard, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) what steps the government was taking to help Canadians serving abroad in the employment of Canada who are affected by the changes in the fortunes of the Canadian dollar. I think the parliamentary secretary has a recent reply. I will not use my seven minutes in pressing the question, and I hope he will have all the time in the world to spell forth the Canadian policy.

Aside from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I could have posed that question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) because that department has officials abroad. In fact I could have asked that question of several other departments. I could have asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), but I would be afraid that gentleman would offer us what he did to a learned gathering in Toronto a while back. He said that he had no pancreas for the problems at the moment. When the minister said that, it left so many people on the floor trying to stop laughing and attempting to get up that I assume it would be useless to ask a similar question of him in this particular Chamber.

In any event, I could have turned to the Minister of Employment and Immigration or the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because they have some milk of human kindness flowing in their veins. Whenever the dollar plunges, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce thinks that this is one of the better things that has happened to Canada. When we go bust, I imagine he will write something which will make Milton, Dante and a few other authors turn over in their graves and admire him.

Be that as it may, I am asking specifically about the fate of those who work abroad for Canada, whether they be in the Armed Forces, External Affairs, Industry, Trade and Commerce, Manpower and Immigration or any other body, and who are affected by the changing fortunes of the Canadian dollar. Particularly I am thinking of the cases in Washington where the change of the Canadian dollar in relation to the American dollar has created problems. People have written me about that particular situation. When the parliamentary secretary replies, I hope he will be able to spell out, not only the general problem, but specifically what is being done for the people in Washington affected by the late happenings.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to give some explanation as to the policy of the government in regard to these problems.

In recognition that the costs of goods and services vary between Ottawa and those places where career public servants are working abroad, a part of the employee's income is adjusted when he is overseas to provide him with purchasing power comparable to that which he would have had in Ottawa. This adjustment ensures that the employee is protected in countries where costs are greater than Ottawa, without giving him windfall gains in places where his cost of living is lower than found at home. This price differential between posts and Ottawa is computed and expressed numerically by Statistics Canada, and is called the "Post Index". It represents the retail price relationship of a sample range of consumer goods and services at a location overseas with the prices of a similar range of goods and services in Ottawa.

The Post Index encompasses price comparisons for such consumer expenditures categories as food consumed in the home, meals taken in restaurants, household supplies and maintenance, communications, transportation, health and personal care and clothing, some 225 priceable items being included. Shelter, fuel and utilities and education expenses are excluded from the comparison because separate provisions provide reimbursement for any such excess costs while abroad. Since Canadian public servants pay full Canadian rates of income tax regardless of their place of duty, income tax differentials are excluded.

The Post Index is one part of a system of emoluments and conditions of employment abroad called the "Foreign Service Directives". The mandate to adjust the index is given to Statistics Canada by the various foreign service departments and staff associations acting within the forum of the National Joint Council.

The Post Index is established by carrying out a full-scale retail price and cost of living survey at the location overseas. These surveys are repeated regularly at least every 30 months, and often more frequently if there are sudden changes and the post concerned requests a review. As well, Statistics Canada representatives conduct on the spot visits to judge the price and market supply situation. In between, the Post Index is subject to a monthly review to assess its continuing validity in the light of average monthly exchange rate movements, Ottawa price movements and information on post price movements gathered from as many sources as possible. From January to the end of October this year there have been 223 index recommendations: 191 increases, and 32 decreases. At the end of October 48 upward revisions were made, largely because of the weakening of the Canadian dollar.

Washington's post index of 110 dates back to April, 1977, when it was raised from 105. As Ottawa price levels are always expressed as 100, this means that prices in Washington are presently estimated to be 10 per cent above prices in Ottawa. While the Washington index was closely monitored during October, the comparative difference with Ottawa did not warrant an increase to the higher level of 115 because the Canadian dollar's reduced value was partially offset by a lower inflation rate in the U.S.A. In the month of November Washington's index, along with all other post indices, will be closely monitored by Statistics Canada which will make a recommendation for change, should such be warranted.

That is the way these problems are monitored, surveyed, followed, and eliminated.

FINANCE—REQUEST FOR ESTIMATE OF LEVEL OF UNEMPLOYMENT NEXT YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the debate this evening arises from a question I put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on November 7, at which time I asked him what I thought was a very simple question. I asked him to inform the House what level of unemployment he anticipates for the next year in Canada. I am sorry the minister is not here tonight to join in this debate because I feel that one of the most significant deficiencies of the government has been its tendency not to want to indicate what it plans for this nation not only with respect to unemployment but also with respect to many other things.

The OECD has virtually insisted that member states start setting out quotas, and not just for the next year. The OECD wants member states to set out clearly their targets for unemployment and other related matters for the next year, three years, and five years. This government has consistently refused to do so. It is particularly unfortunate that the government will not set out these goals. It systematically attempts to cloud the issues.

Every time certain negative points are raised with respect to Canada's economic activity the government hastens to say it is as a result of some factor beyond its control. Hon. members will recall that at one time the climate was the favourite excuse of the government. At another time I believe it was the poor crop of anchovies off the coast of South America. At another time the government claimed it was the oil embargo; that somehow the OPEC states caused our trouble, totally forgetting that we were an energy sufficient country.

I notice that the current Minister of Finance chooses to reverse things a little and is saying that somehow the situation in Quebec is causing the economic problems of this country. Presumably what he hopes is that the Canadian public will take their eye off this government in the earnest hope that the government will not be called to account.

I have referred to this Quebec decoy because around noon yesterday, when speaking in Quebec City, the Minister of Finance spent most of his time trying to point out that economic conditions in Quebec were basically due to this question of separatism and that, somehow or other, the federal government should not be called to task. In effect he was trying to indicate that if there is a slow transportation problem at the present time we should not look to him with respect to the train wreck—they created the train wreck but, somehow or other, the minister thinks that is a convenient excuse to take people's minds from the real hard fact that it is the government's economic policies that got us into trouble in the first place.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance stated that we cannot let the question of national unity hang unanswered without serious economic consequences that will persist and mount. I challenge that, Mr. Speaker. For the last seven years, at least, the government has been told by reputable economic forecasters that there is a problem in this country which will be heightened if action is not taken.

For example, in September, 1970, the report of the Economic Council of Canada stated as follows:

> Unemployment has risen rapidly in 1970 to about 6½ per cent by mid-year, from the already relatively high average level of close to 5 per cent in the two preceding years.

It also stated:

> We regard recent and current rates of unemployment as unacceptably high. Canada probably now has the highest rate of unemployment among the more industrially advanced nations, even after allowance for the differences in the bases for unemployment estimates. The current rate is about double the medium-term target for Canada suggested in our Sixth Annual Review.

In its conclusions appears the following:

> A major concern of this report is that the Canadian economy has fallen significantly below its potential.

They take a paragraph to point out that if the economy is not restored to its potential—something over a 5 per cent growth rate—unemployment will grow. The fact is, this government has failed in those very crucial seven years which have elapsed since September, 1970. In September, 1970, inflation was 2.8 per cent, and even then the Economic Council said it was unduly high. In September this year it was 8.4 per cent. Unemployment was 6 per cent in September, 1970, while in September this year it was 8.3 per cent. We actually had a cash trade surplus as far as our current account was concerned in trade in 1970 of $1.1 billion, and this year it is estimated at about $5.3 billion.

It is time the government gave us the targets it is shooting for. It is time it took some action to relieve the unemployment situation that has become so chronic and, I would suggest, is helping to trigger separatist feelings in Quebec. It has not taken those steps so far, Mr. Speaker. To that end I would point out once again that in their most recent report issued last month the Economic Council of Canada said:

> If our projections are correct, the extra $150-million federal winter works projects and the new $100-million employment credit program—two measures announced by the Minister of Finance in October—will not be sufficient to bring about the reduction in either youth or adult unemployment that is needed. Additional measures, at both levels of government, are likely to be necessary in both 1978 and 1979.

The question that faces us this evening is just that. What measures does the government propose over and above anything that has been suggested to date? What, in fact, does it see for the unemployment level in 1978? It is time we had those answers. I am disappointed that the Minister of Finance is not here tonight to give us his version of what he sees for unemployment in this country next year.

Mr. Ed. Lumley (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the first place, contrary to what the hon. member states, the OECD does not request that member countries specify a certain unemployment rate target. Our target for unemployment is quite clear. It is the reduction of the unemployment rate to a level at which anyone who really wants to work will be able to do so.

● (1827)

The hon. member said the minister had placed most of the blame for unemployment on the uncertainty of the political climate in Quebec. Though I am sure that while most hon. members will agree that this is an important factor, the minister enunciated a number of other important factors in the unemployment situation. In a statement made to the House of Commons on October 20, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) pledged himself to doing whatever could reasonably be done to ensure that everyone who really wants to work can find a job. He also agreed that the current unemployment rate of 8.3 per cent is too high. But everyone must realize that there are simply no quick and easy answers to the solving of our unemployment problem.

Mr. Stevens: You have had ten years!

Mr. Lumley: In his use of selective statistics the hon. member consistently draws attention to all the negative aspects. He has forgotten that Canada has one of the finest records of any of the industrialized nations of the world. For example, I refer to job creation. This government has created twice as many jobs as the second leading nation.

Mr. Stevens: We are talking about unemployment.

Mr. Lumley: The hon. member persists in concentrating on the negative aspects. He will not acknowledge the positive achievements.

Given the uncertainty of the future, it should be clear it is not reasonable to forecast any precise numerical value of the unemployment rate. There are too many unknowns. The economy is large and complex, with the final outcome depending upon all our actions, as well as upon those taken by our trading partners and others. For its part, the government believes it has gone to the limits of its financial resources in order to do as much as it can toward creating an economic environment where it will be possible to achieve some improvement in our present unemployment situation over the course of next year. However, the attainment of its goal depends not only on the government but on the co-operative hard work of all Canadians.

Motion withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock I was talking about the endeavours of the government to stimulate the economy by subsidizing huge corporations. I made the point that several large companies in Canada had received hundreds of millions of dollars from the government over the past few years, including millions of dollars in what is called the mini-budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) a couple of weeks ago in this House. I pointed out how that had failed.

Despite all the so-called stimulation of the economy, we have the highest rate of unemployment in the industrialized world. That unemployment rate has not just been with us for the past year or two but for the past 15 or 20 years.

I suggested that instead of stimulating the wealthy in our economy, the large corporations such as INCO, the government should give a substantial tax cut to the low and middle income people. I notice that the Economic Council of Canada, a very reputable group, and others have been suggesting the same thing in terms of stimulating the economy.

If we did that, it would stimulate demand. People would buy more of the necessities of life. That demand would in turn stimulate the industries of this country to produce more, fulfilling that unused capacity in our economy.

Something else that concerns me is the whole farm economy and what is now happening in western Canada. If you look at the farm income statistics, you find that in almost all areas of the country farm incomes, both gross and net, have dropped over the past few years. The price of a bushel of wheat has gone away down this year over what it was a couple of years ago. The immediate prospects for the price of grain in this country, despite a pretty good selling effort for the most part by the Canadian Wheat Board to sell grain abroad, leave a great number of things to be done on the agricultural front.

Many members, particularly from urban Canada, say this affects only the rural economy and will not do much in terms of providing jobs. I remind hon. members that the farm industry employs a lot of people. It could employ a lot more if we produced more of our own food in Canada and processed and packaged that food at home.

One need only look at the statistics for the past few years to see that Canada is rapidly becoming an importer of more and more food products. Last year, if one were to take away grain and oilseeds, we have a net deficit in this country of about 1.5 million. If this continues, projected through the year 2000 as the Science Council has done, even with grain and oilseeds Canada will become a net importer of food. That is tragic for a country with the vast acreage we have and our relatively small population.

One of the government's priorities should be to ensure that we become self-sufficient in food production. In addition to producing enough food to feed ourselves, we should be able to make a good contribution to foreign aid.

There are many food products in which we were at one time self-sufficient, but no longer. That type of situation must cease. If we had self-sufficiency, not only would more people be employed in farming but more people would be employed in southern Ontario in the fruit industry in terms of packaging, processing, transporting, and selling the fruit.

Something has to be done about the price of wheat. About four years ago the government set the floor price for wheat sold domestically at $3.25 a bushel. That price has not been adjusted in the past four years despite the fact that production costs and the cost of living have gone up very rapidly. The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) said recently that the cabinet is considering an upward revision in the price of domestic wheat.

I suggest that the price of domestic wheat should be around $5 a bushel. That would enable the farmer to meet his ends. It now costs over $3 a bushel to produce wheat. Some estimates are as high as $3.86 a bushel. Grain today is selling at around $2.50 a bushel. At least the grains sold in Canada should be priced at $5 a bushel. That would be of some help to the farmer.

When we talk about farm income, we should consider the need to ensure that orderly marketing is supported to the fullest possible extent right across Canada for all farm commodities. If commodities are put on the open market, the farmer is not guaranteed a price for the commodity he is selling.

One trend now developing across the country which I find worrisome is that more and more organizations are attacking orderly marketing. The Cattleman's Association does not want a marketing board. Cargill Grain is trying to take away some of the power and authority of the Canadian Wheat Board.

In 1974 the minister in charge of the Wheat Board took the marketing of feed grains for domestic purposes out of the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board. Recently, and this made me very angry because he is a westerner, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) suggested at a meeting in Manitoba that perhaps the Wheat Board needs some competition in the selling of grain.

I have before me a copy of an article written by a very reputable journalist, Fred Harrison, in the Regina Leader-Post of October 19. He quoted the Leader of the Opposition, who spoke in Manitoba. He wrote, and I quote:

The meeting was in Morden, not far from Elm Creek, site of a controversial new high-throughput grain elevator built by the Cargill Grain Co. Ltd. Many farmers in the area are sufficiently impressed by the Cargill operation that they believe competition is needed in the selling, not just the storage, of grain.

● (2012)

Murta—

That is the hon. member for Lisgar.

—was accompanying Clark on the trip.

It continued:

The Valley Leader, a weekly newspaper based in Carman, reported August 24 that Clark had said a Conservative government would seek "expansion of the Wheat Board's selling efforts, but permission (would be) given to private organizations to sell grain in competition with the Wheat Board".

So we have the Leader of the Opposition saying in Manitoba that if a Conservative government is elected, permission would be given private organizations to sell grain in competition with the Canadian Wheat Board. Even the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) shakes his head in disgust that the leader of his own party would suggest that the Cargill Grain Company should be allowed to sell wheat in competition with the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am normally a very quiet member and do not like interjecting with points of order, but the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville said I was shaking my head in disgust. I just want to place on record that shaking my head had nothing to do at all with his own specious argument; rather it was directed toward him.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I suggest to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that that is not a point of order but a point of dispute.

Mr. Nystrom: I suppose the truth hurts, Mr. Speaker. It appears that the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar does not believe the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix or the Manitoba Valley Leader. Perhaps I should quote another weekly Manitoba newspaper, the Pembina Times which is based in Morden. According to that newspaper the Leader of the Opposition had this to say:

—Conservatives favour supplementing the selling activities of the Board by allowing Canadian grain trading companies to enter into the international market to improve our grain sales.

It is not I who says these things, Mr. Speaker; I am just reading my prairie newspapers like all good prairie members should; but when one sees the Leader of the Opposition quoted in newspapers, I tend to believe them, especially when I see two or three quotations. I know the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and other members do as well. However, the press did not simply interview the Leader of the Opposition but other members too. For example:

Frank Hamilton, Conservative MP for Swift Current-Maple Creek and PC wheat board critic, registered surprise over Clark's statement.

Another quotation:

Alvin Hamilton, MP for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain and a former agriculture minister, was equally surprised.

The Leader of the Opposition is a very important person. It is only fair that western farmers and the people of western Canada in general know where he stands with the Wheat Board, since the Wheat Board is so important to development of the west and to the financial integrity of the farmers. Again I see the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar nodding his head in agreement with me that it is important that people of the west know where the Leader of the Opposition stands. He does not stand behind the Wheat Board at all. I think it is very important to let the people know that.

We are discussing today a tax bill and talking about the economy. One thing which is imperative in a strong economy is a strong farm economy. To have a strong farm economy we need a strong Wheat Board and orderly marketing, which means as much support as possible for the Wheat Board. Our party clearly stands behind the Wheat Board and orderly marketing.

There are a number of other matters which one can mention in a debate of this sort, but the most important of all is that we believe the Government of Canada should have a planned economy. We want to allocate the resources which we have in a planned way for the benefit of people, not necessarily for the benefit of large corporations and profits. We must process more of our raw materials. We are importing more manufactured goods on a per capita basis than any other industrialized country, and this is one reason why we have so much unemployment in Canada today. If we started to process goods and materials, to build our own fridges, stoves, and deep freezes and so on, we would create many more jobs in Canada for our people. This is something the government could do, along with revising the tax system so there is fair taxation for everyone.

If the government does not start to take action of this sort, we will continue to have high unemployment, very high inflation, and regional inequities. But instead of going in the direction I suggest, the government talks of going in the other direction.

Today in the House a Liberal backbencher from northern Ontario pleaded with the government not to abolish the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There are rumours in the press that the government is considering the possibility of abolishing DREE, a department which was established in 1968 in order to try to rectify some of the basic inequities which we have in Canada. The government is talking about the possibility of disbanding FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Agency, since it may be scaring off foreign investment.

These two bodies were set up to provide some kind of positive direction for this country, but even these timid steps are an embarrassment to the cabinet and to many MPs opposite. Instead of abolishing them, the government should have the courage to tackle the economic problems facing Canada today, and to do things for ordinary people, not for large corporations such as INCO, Imperial Oil, the big money men, and other companies that are controlled and owned outside Canada.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to protect the government from what might be said by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), but I should like to elaborate for a moment on the statement he made that money should not be going into business but should be used for labour. Perhaps the best example I can give of putting money into business would be if the Farm Credit Corporation lent a farmer $45,000 to buy a combine. If he wanted to use labour instead he would probably have to employ about 500 people. I suppose that is what the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville was talking about.

If you assume that it would cost in the vicinity of $10,000 to $10,500 a year to operate that combine, if you divide that sum by 500 people with a flail to do the same work this would give about $21 per person for a season's work. About 75 years ago that is what was happening in this country, so perhaps the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville should bring himself up to date and, instead of talking about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) so much, put his own position in perspective.

With regard to the comments made today by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), there is not doubt he was comparing apples with oranges. He stated that there would be approximately an 8 per cent increase in expenditure this year, but he did not say that he was using estimates and expenditures. He was not going from estimate to estimate from one fiscal year to the next. It is a trifle misleading for the minister to use this figure of 8 per cent, when it runs close to 10 per cent in actual fact.

Also the minister stated that it was not his purpose to obscure and patch over the government's weakness, yet it was quite evident that he was not prepared to give a balanced view of what the government was doing at the present time. In fact, it was a very, very foxy presentation which he made today.

He had to admit that the over-all growth of Canada is down, because there is no way around it, even though he said that there was a pessimistic view being promoted by people throughout Canada today. Also he indicated that it was on page one of newspapers and on the 11 o'clock news. I do not think the minister is being exactly fair when he makes comments like that and does not tell the exact truth. He did not tell us that approximately ten years ago the federal government was borrowing from pension funds in Canada approximately $500 million. This year, 1977-78, the government will probably borrow in the area of $1.8 billion or $2 billion from pension funds. If this were treated as a debt, that is, the figures the minister was presenting to the House of Commons, then it would be more realisitic and it would not be so misleading. This is why I said his presentation today was foxy.

In the last five years the federal government has borrowed from pension funds approximately $7.5 billion. This is just a paper figure. The same thing is happening with the money which is going into the grain stabilization fund. The government should be putting in there $2 for every dollar that the producer is putting in, and it is not doing that. It is just treating that as a paper figure. It will calculate the interest. It will be there. I am not saying the government will try to beat either the farmers or those who have paid into the pension fund, but we have to recognize this is happening. Somewhere down the road there will be a day of reckoning and the government of the day will have to come up with the financing. I am referring to that which the government is obligated to pay out of those funds.

The minister stated today that there is a comparative expenditure related to what it would have been ten years ago in relation to the gross national product. The significant thing the minister missed was the fact that the over-all debt today is accelerating at a greater rate than it ever has in Canadian history.

Last year the government borrowed approximately $19 for every $100 it spent. This year the government borrows $23 of every $100 it spends. When you consider the government in the last ten years has doubled the Canadian debt, the debt which was accumulated over the first 100 years, then certainly we have to consider the direction in which we are going.

The minister also referred to his inability to go to businesses and unions and tell them how to correct the problem. I realize he cannot do that, because the government should be setting a proper example. There is no way unions or businesses will co-operate with the government until such time as the government sets an example. Certainly a 10 per cent increase is not setting a proper example of the manner in which inflation can be controlled. He also indicated that we were psyching ourselves into a depression. I must impress upon this House that there is a tremendous difference between psyching ourselves into a depression and facing up to the facts. This is one of the things the government has failed to do, and thus it is misleading Canadians.

This afternoon in the House there were motions made by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Hurlburt). I would identify myself with both of those, because we come from RCMP country and all recognize that the force is held in high regard in most parts of Canada. We recognize the tremendous contribution the members of the force have given, which forms the roots of the very foundation of justice and security in our Canadian heritage.

We cannot divorce ourselves from what is happening in Canada today. We are debating a bill which is a glaring example of a government out of control, a government which never knew or has forgotten the meaning of the word "restraint". The 1978 spending forecast of $45.1 billion is rising to approximately $46.5 billion with the tabling of supplementary estimates. The 1978 authorized spending to date is 10.3 per cent over the total of last year, or 3 per cent higher than the 7.1 per cent forecast by the President of the Treasury Board. We must remember that we still have five months to go to the end of the fiscal year. If that is restraint, what would the government do in the period without any promise? How can the minister request any Canadian to restrain his or her spending when proper leadership is not given?

An excellent example of how the government can cut costs without depriving Canadians of important services would be the disbanding of the security and analysis group of civilians, political appointments of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Canadians would like to know why such a branch was established when the RCMP always carried out those important tasks without interference from the outside. The cost of that group runs approximately $500,000. People in this country want to know what are the rules and regulations of that civilian group. I am sure the RCMP would appreciate being informed of that group's mandate, as well as its duties and responsibilities. The group consists of approximately 200 employees, employees duplicating the services of the RCMP. What amount would be saved by the removal of that branch within the Department of the Solicitor General if it is not $500,000?

The main culprit in today's inflation and the resultant necessity of borrowing an additional $9 billion, as provided in this legislation, is the government itself. Perhaps the best example of bungling funds and administration is the situation in which the government has placed the RCMP. The government created this mess. Time and time again the Prime Minister was warned of the grave danger of using a police force for political gain. Now that admirable and dedicated force is expected to shoulder the blame for orders issued by a civilian director general of security within that force, another personal appointee of the Prime Minister. Who pays the salary of this person and those under him? None other than the Canadian taxpayer.

While the Prime Minister seeks to give the impression that he is the only saviour of unity in this country, never has an individual done so much to destroy unity under the guise of a great protector. Many taxpayers are of the opinion that he is even using our national police force as a guinea pig.

There is no better way to undermine confidence and strength than to place an outsider in charge of a sensitive arm of the service, that of security. To add to the dilemma, instead of reporting directly to the RCMP Commissioner, that civilian appointee of the Prime Minister reports to the Prime Minister without the necessity of first communicating with the Commissioner. Let us not stop there. The politically appointed security and analysis group communicates to the Clerk of the Privy Council, who also happens to be chairman of the interdepartmental committee on security and intelligence.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are discussing Bill C-11, a tax bill; we are not discussing the security force of the RCMP.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): We are talking about the expenditure of money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I was listening very carefully. The hon. member was coming back to the expenditure of money, so I will continue to listen, and if he strays off the path again, I will warn him.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let Mr. Speaker do his job.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can certainly understand that a government which cannot control its expenditures cannot stoop to the lowest aspect of dealing with individual expenditures. I was dealing with the politically appointed security and analysis group. I was trying to explain, for the benefit of the hon. member, that this group costs approximately $500,000, and I am sure that there are a great many Canadians who would appreciate it if their income taxes could be reduced accordingly. I pointed out that the politically appointed security and analysis group communicates to the Clerk of the Privy Council, who also happens to be chairman of the interdepartmental committee on security and intelligence, and whose superior is none other than the Prime Minister who is also chairman of the cabinet committee on security and intelligence. One cannot help but note how cozy is that arrangement.

Who pays for all this? The Canadian taxpayer. Perhaps that answers the question for the hon. gentleman. How would any of us, as representatives of constituencies at the federal level, like to have someone appointed by the government of the day to investigate and do research in our areas and residences, and then submit the findings to the Prime Minister and not to us? Could we operate under that kind of manoeuvring? How can we expect the RCMP to perform vital and dangerous operations with a non-force group duplicating its services and authorizing orders unknown to the RCMP Commissioner?

I feel very sad indeed that officers and members of the RCMP are now being personally investigated, and perhaps even jailed for misdemeanours carried out under orders allegedly given by a civilian director general of its security services. While we do not know that to be factual until a complete investigation has been completed, our national police force is experiencing frustration, humiliation, and accusation, due to instructions which have been given by senior personnel.

We all know that anyone who has unlimited funds reaches a point when he spends for the joy of spending, eventually squandering without reason simply because he can always go back to the bottomless purse supplied by taxpayers. Would a head of a government be able to set up a group of employees comprising 200, more or less, if he had restricted funds? What has the establishment of the civilian group within the Solicitor General's department to do with the Solicitor General as minister responsible for that portfolio? Did he know such a group was being appointed, and did he sanction that action?

Since the RCMP director general of security and the branch within his department both report directly to the Prime Minister, is it fair to ask the Solicitor General to shoulder the responsibility for his position? Not only has the Prime Minister undermined the operations of the RCMP, but I think the authority of his Solicitor General has also been degraded and left in question. Certainly the funding of the Department of the Solicitor General is considerable, and it all falls on the Canadian taxpayer.

The RCMP Commissioner, who supposedly is responsible for the police force under his guidance, reports to the Solicitor General, and rightly so. Why then should the director general of security within that force be able to bypass the Commissioner, and thereby the Solicitor General, and communicate directly to the Prime Minister? What type of co-operation is this? It seems to be the same type of co-operation the government is giving to business and labour. It seems that most Canadians now know what the 1968 "just society" meant: a country dictated to and run into the ground by a one-man show.

There is no possible way that the RCMP Commissioner should be answerable for acts, illegal or otherwise, performed by members of his force who are under orders of a director general of security operating outside his jurisdiction. We will continue to have chaos within the RCMP and in this country until the Commissioner is the only person who can be held responsible—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) indicated that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) was not at all addressing himself to the bill at issue, and evidently he is continuing to deal with matters which are completely irrelevant to this bill. He ought to be called to order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on the point of order. I think the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) is right on, because this government has been using the police force to obtain files surreptitiously, and those files have been obtained illegally by the RCMP.

Mr. Lumley: What has that got to do with the tax bill?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest that the hon. member does stray off the path every once in a while, and I suggest that he come back to the terms of Bill C-11.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a new point of order on the basis of what has been advanced by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). I might indicate to him that he ought to refer to Mr. Speaker's ruling of this day relating to unfounded allegations.

Mr. Woolliams: Are we going to be babies?

Mr. Towers: Mr. Speaker, I recognize that this is a sore spot with the government, but the only way to heal a sore spot is to have it cleansed, and that is exactly what I wish the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) would recognize I am doing. Certainly there are enough problems in the Post Office—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member get back to Bill C-11.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

While on the subject of unnecessary spending and flagrant disregard by this government for taxpayers' dollars and their rights, I must impress upon this House the fact that the inquiries which are taking place throughout Canada cost taxpayers one way or another. On top of that—

An hon. Member: He is back on the topic now.

Mr. Towers: —the security of this country at the present time is in jeopardy. What guarantee do Canadians have that Michael Pitfield, for instance, is qualified to be chairman of the interdepartmental committee on security and intelligence? I presume he is being paid, and that his salary is paid by the taxpayers of Canada. Is he better suited to wield almost unlimited authority than a seasoned and capable officer with the RCMP or at least a person on the staff of the Department of the Solicitor General?

Where does political interference cease and common sense begin? What better way to destroy our wonderful country than to demoralize its national police force and ruin its economy, at the same time—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest the hon. member get back to the terms of Bill C-11.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Value for our money, sir.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that lousy speech anyhow?

Mr. Towers: We cannot separate ourselves from security and its cost to the Canadian taxpayer.

We have had four years of inflation in excess of 7 per cent. Many of us here can remember that we were told by economists that we could not live with inflation beyond 4 per cent. We have had an unemployment rate of over 7 per cent for the last three years, and unemployment is causing many problems for the RCMP. We must also consider that we have had four years of economic growth below 5 per cent, and three years of trade deficits of over $4 billion. It will probably be $5 billion this year. Somebody has to pay the piper, yet the government apparently is not prepared to wake up to exactly what is happening. I know the truth hurts. We have to recognize that in five years the federal deficit has increased each year. For ten years we have had the fastest growing national debt in Canada's history, even including the period of two major world conflicts.

When the President of the Treasury Board spoke about taxation today, he did not mention that there will have to be an increase in revenue this year for the funding of our international debt due to the devaluation of the dollar. When it is considered that this will be in the sum of half a billion dollars, then it is time that somebody faced the facts.

I am glad to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the House, Mr. Speaker. I am sure he is aware of all the problems Canada is facing today because business confidence is being destroyed. Priming the pump does not put more water in the well.

There are many issues the government should face up to. Canada is in a very, very serious economic condition at the present time. I hope the government will accept some of the opinions expressed on this side. Canadians have been reprimanded for living too high on the hog, and I do not have to tell the House who said that. They have been instructed several times to tighten their belts. These same people are forced to witness their country speeding down the road to economic disaster, with its well-being and security undermined by a government which only exercises control where it can do the most harm—by manipulating the regular and vital actions of the RCMP and by creating unexplained and unnecessary ways to squander their taxes.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has muddied the waters of law enforcement through his personal appointments at incalculable cost, financially and on the security front. I believe, in the best interests of the security force and of Canadians generally, that the Prime Minister should revoke all these appointments he made within the RCMP security and analysis branch, excluding the present Commissioner, and give sole jurisdiction for control, management, appointments and advancement of that force to the Commissioner. This should cut down on the cost of operation.

The Commissioner should be responsible only to the Solicitor General as head of that department, with parliament setting out guidelines on the "rules of the game" within that force. The government has been lax in not giving the RCMP adequate protection and guidelines that could be provided by legislation so that members of the force would not be subjected to criticism, investigation or innuendo in the performance of one of its main duties, the protection of the security of this country and the maintenance of the rights of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I am 100 per cent behind the RCMP. Every Canadian has known that force to be dedicated and loyal for almost 100 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is very amusing to see hon. members from the opposition parties make a lot of criticism against the government while not being able to put forward any valuable suggestions. Mr. Speaker, because of its past, particularly its recent past, Canada is a very rich country. Canada could benefit from tremendous natural resources as it continues to do. Canada could rely on its subsoil and its food products without having to face real competition from foreign countries. However, some time ago there was a change which is not particular to Canada but which is worldwide, namely the emergence of Third World countries among the productive countries. Let us just look at the mines which made Canada an exporter of natural resources, and which are now forced to face foreign competition. This abundance of natural resources must be used much better, and with different means, if it is going to go on supporting our balance as a country. Of course, Mr. Speaker, in a country such as ours, labour costs more than in some countries of the Third World. Taking into account the present situation, we will therefore, over the long term, have to consider a policy for the complete transformation of our industrial organization in Canada.

As a Quebecer, I am that much more concerned about the matter, because we find in our province the traditional industries; neither the provincial nor federal government willed that we find in Quebec mainly the shoe and textile industries, and others, we call soft. Mr. Speaker, I think of the St. Lawrence River going through Quebec before reaching Ontario; Canada developed historically first of all in Lower Canada, the Quebec of today; in that area we find the first industries ever built up in Canada and consequently those that run up against the most difficulties today.

Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, we have had the good luck of benefitting from a country that is vast and has enormous potential. We need but think of the field of energy; contrary to almost all other industrialized countries in the world, we can enjoy so many things. And time is on our side because we have enormous natural resources. On the other hand, we, in the east, depend on the west for energy supplies: but because we will have construction of the pipeline, exploration projects and, naturally, the building of the infrastructure needed to develop the resources of western Canada, we, of the federal government, will have to see to it that eastern regions can benefit from those developments and thus be assured of some economic fall-out.

Mr. Speaker, let us examine the economic structure of Canada. I believe we should recognize the fact that the western provinces can no longer be considered as a means of supplying the rest of the country with food or energy products. We must accept the aspirations of western Canadians to industrialize. I believe this is legitimate and normal. Moreover, because of the enormous projects that this will require in that part of the country, we shall have a unique opportunity to change the economic structure of Quebec, the Maritime provinces, and partly of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, even though in its textile policy our government has confirmed without a shadow of a doubt that it wants to save and maintain the employment level in the textile sector, we should honestly ask ourselves if Canada will have to maintain 200,000 jobs in the Canadian textile sector until the year 2000. Should we not ask ourselves how we could on the long term, when the situation allows it and if there is such a need in the future, orient part of the manpower now employed in the textile sector towards other sectors where we are more competitive on an international level and at the same time orient not only our human resources, but our capital resources—our investments and equipment—towards more productive sectors. In my opinion, these issues should not be the subject of petty politics and we should instead meet with the trade unions and the heads of businesses to study how in the long term and through re-orientation we can direct our workers to sectors where they will also be better paid.

Mr. Speaker, the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Chrétien), who is now Minister of Finance, has taken a step in that direction. Moreover, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is now making a detailed analysis of each industrial sector in Canada to determine the competitive position of our industrial sectors compared with identical sectors in other countries and to identify the strong areas where we could concentrate our manpower and our capital and where Canada has certain technological advantages.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in the long run this is the kind of question that has to be asked. When we see a plant closing down, we can of course look for all the past causes. There are many and I think the opposition should be able to list more of them than they did in the past, but one must wonder how each of these industrial sectors can manage to be competitive and if it cannot be, we must have the honesty to consider the situation and find out where we should direct our manpower.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the fiscal and monetary policies were the tools which were used by provincial and federal governments in the past, but given the present world and domestic situation, there is no way we can continue as we now do to rely only on these two working tools, namely tax rebates from time to time and interventions in our monetary policy at other times. Those interventions, however worthwhile they may be in the short run, will surely not bring to this country the anticipated prosperity in view of all the resources we have at home. If the devaluation of the Canadian dollar can temporarily benefit our exports, one must also realize that it will surely have an adverse effect on the inflation index. I believe we cannot rely only on this sector to restore stability in future.

Mr. Speaker, the Department of Finance, like the department in which I have the opportunity and honour to work, tackles the real problems, going at their very roots and trying to work in conjunction with all partners, unions and employers, with a view to rationalizing and concentrating our production in those sectors in which we are strongest, in which we can be more efficient not only on the domestic but on the international market.

Mr. Speaker, another thing which is essential when considering a long range industrial re-organization and short range fiscal and monetary policies—and it has the same importance in any country—is confidence, that of workers in the future of our industry and that of investors; such confidence, unfortunately, has been partly lost for some time in this country.

I do not want to go on a witch hunt and identify some groups or individuals rather than others. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if we do not want to find who is responsible we should at least try to restore that confidence climate in Canada, that confidence climate which is essential. I think that the first thing to do is to offer to those working in that field some long term political guarantees.

It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that we can accuse a politician of being demagogic when he says that political instability results in investment losses. Multinationals do invest in certain countries of South America. And some people often use that example to demonstrate that political instability is not a factor. But they invest in some countries which I shall not name, provided the risk capital represents about 20 per cent of the capital invested in a project, and they will invest that 20 per cent if they can recover it within three years, when in Ontario the average period for recovering risk capital is 33 years. So there are much fewer projects for which the capital invested can be recovered within three years instead of 33 years, which is why such projects are very scarce.

Mr. Speaker, I think that Canadians, with their natural resources, their human potential and also their will to succeed together in spite of their differences, should take advantage of those factors to restore the confidence that we all need to believe in the future of our country. For those who say that the situation is critical, yes, it is. But as Canadians we can ensure our energy supplies for many years. The province of Quebec produces now only 27 per cent of the energy it uses. For the rest of our supplies, that is oil for 54 per cent of our energy consumption and natural gas for 24 per cent, and the rest being coal, or coke, we can at least rely on supplies from our own country, from the west.

Mr. Speaker, that in my view is an extraordinary advantage. Let us think of all the still unknown resources we have there, in our Northwest Territories or Arctic areas, to boast about. We can use them as a promotional feature to tell other countries that they can still have confidence in the Canadian economy and our future. More often than not price is not the only consideration, because there is also the question of a reliable source of supplies. And this country's supplies are reliable, what with the assurance this government will be able to give that the price of oil will always be competitive with that in the United States. We believe we can honestly compete with our neighbour down South.

Mr. Speaker, opposition members have been crying for the $100 personal tax reduction. But for some in the opposition it is not enough, and for others too much. This is overstressing matters of detail. The measures recently announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) are worthwhile, just and fair at this point in time. But the same minister had started working on something the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) will pursue. In my view, this is not simply a short-term, six-month affair, but rather a long term enterprise that will today and tomorrow give every Canadian confidence and a better future.

Mr. Speaker, the best thing that could happen to us is that the opposition stop criticizing, sometimes rightly but more often wrongly, that they stop making rather weak points that are only a repetition of old tricks or ill-conceived and badly written editorials. If they did so the opposition certainly could bring a more valuable contribution by putting forward more useful, more positive points and proposals.

[English]

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity of taking part in the debate on Bill C-11, entitled an act to amend the Income Tax Act and to provide other authority for the raising of funds. It is more than that. It is a minibudget—at least that is what it was called by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the question period about a week ago. The bill is both complicated and lengthy. It consists of 225 pages of material and would take weeks, indeed, months of study to comprehend its contents fully.

I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who, on November 7, said in this House that 99.9 per cent of the people in the country don't understand it. It is only a handful of tax lawyers, tax accountants and people in National Revenue who do. Can you imagine legislation so complex that provision has to be made by the government for a taxpayer to make a submission to the department for a decision, and then the department makes a charge for that decision? I think it is time for the Minister of Finance to instruct his legal officers to revise the Income Tax Act with a view to producing a piece of legislation in language that can be understood and which leaves little doubt in the minds of the tax lawyers, chartered accountants, business people, and the public generally.

The Minister of Finance, when speaking in the House on November 2 on second reading, urged that the bill be passed without any unnecessary delay. He indicated that the passage of the bill before us is extremely important in securing the confidence of the business community. If one looks at the present state of the economy, namely, high unemployment, low productivity, our balance of trade deficit, and our faltering dollar, one will realize it will take something more than amendments to the Income Tax Act to restore that confidence.

I suggest that what makes the country strong is strong leadership. That is what this country has lacked for the past ten or 15 years. There has been no sense of direction since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has taken power. People in business and people in all walks of life are confused as to the direction our country is going, both from the economic point of view and from the political point of view. Perhaps in the Prime Minister's mind the universe is unfolding as it should. This is what frightens me and many other Canadians.

The government's policies have divided the country and have caused its citizens to lose that sense of pride and enthusiasm which we had shortly after the last world war and through the years in office of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and of the right hon. member who followed him as Prime Minister. At that time this great country was looked upon with respect and envy by leaders throughout the world. We have lost all this. If one sits down and analyses the reasons, it can only be seen as being the result of the policies and attitudes of the present government over the past ten or 15 years.

During the course of the summer I had calls from chartered accountants, members of the business community and others who expressed concern over the fact that, while the then Minister of Finance had made certain proposals in his March 31 budget, no serious steps had been taken by the government to pass legislation to implement these proposals. These people were planning their affairs based on the March 31 budget proposals and in anticipation they would be passed, only to find that the House had adjourned and the proposed amendments to the Income Tax Act had died on the order paper. They asked me what they could do. Should they proceed with their plans or would they have to scrap them? Mr. Speaker, how can a businessmen operate if there is uncertainty as to the rules under which he must operate?

I pointed out to them that the budget proposals of May 25, 1976, were not finally passed until late February of 1977, and I had to admit that there was no way that I could give any guarantee that they could proceed with their plans because the government could easily bring in a new budget or, in the alternative, modify some of the provisions of the March 31 budget.

More and more people across this great country are asking, "Where are we going? What direction is this government taking us, or in fact does it know what direction it is leading us?"

I would like to now turn to some of the specifics of the legislation. First I would like to say a few words regarding the provisions affecting the proceeds from life insurance policies. The original proposals came as a shock to a majority of Canadians who had purchased insurance coverage over the years in order to build up an estate for their wives and families on their death, or alternatively as a retirement fund for their golden years.

The proposals created a great deal of concern, with the result that many representations were made to members of this House and to the Minister, resulting in some changes being made in the original proposals. The changes, as I understand the bill, are to the effect that the earnings on a life insurance policy will not be taxable as income on death. The provisions still remain, however, which provide that the earnings will be taxable if a policy is cashed in during the lifetime of the policy holder, or if he or she borrows on the policy.

I appreciate that, on each instance, it is only the earnings that are taxed and not the amount of the premium contributions of the policy holder, but is this fair in either case? A policy holder only cashes a policy in or borrows on it if he needs the money for some purpose. In addition, the bill provides that if one borrows on the policy, the interest that is paid to the company will not be allowed as an expense for income tax purposes.

There are many small businessmen throughout the country and many farmers who make use of this borrowing feature in their businesses, and I fail to understand how the government can refuse to allow the interest to be claimed as a business expense, because actually that is what it is. Is this an attempt on the part of the government to assist the banks and other lending institutions? If it is not, I would like to know what it is. As I read the present legislation, an individual can take an insurance policy into the bank, use that insurance policy as collateral to borrow money at relatively higher rates than he could borrow from his insurer, and claim that interest as a business expense. Yet if he borrows directly from his insurer, the interest cannot be claimed.

Small business and farming are the backbone of this country. Government should help rather than hinder, yet here is yet another example of the government failing to appreciate the problems facing small businessmen and farmers, and attempting to gouge a few extra dollars of income tax out of them. I ask the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, to give serious consideration to withdrawing these particular clauses in order to permit small businessmen and farmers to deduct the interest they pay to an insurance company as an expense for income tax purposes.

I now turn to the question of Registered Home Ownership Plans. I have had many calls with respect to the changes in the rules respecting this program. I will not go into the details of the changes but it is sufficient to say that when a program is brought in, whether it is a RHOS Plan or otherwise, that is widely advertised by the government, the public should be able to participate in the program with the assurance that the rules will not be changed during the course of the program.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, what the game between the Toronto Argonauts and the Ottawa Roughriders would have been like yesterday if, suddenly in the course of the game, the officials had announced that the rules of the game were being changed? This is what happened with the RHOS Plan. Surely the bureaucrats, or whoever it was who developed the plan, should have had the foresight or the ability to see what ramifications the introduction of the program would have, and prepare the rules and regulations accordingly. Perhaps it was simply a case of a government hungry for power, Mr. Speaker, instituting a program with the intention of buying some votes.

I am sure that the public from now on will be very cautious about participating in government programs of this nature unless there is some assurance that the rules will continue throughout the whole programs.

I was pleased to see that there is a provision in the bill to provide, and I am quoting from the Income Tax motion, that:

[Mr. Neil.]

> Where a taxpayer disposes of a capital property after March 31, 1977, that is real property (other than a rental property), or eligible capital property used by the taxpayer primarily for the purpose of gaining or producing income from a business, any recapture or capital gain be permitted to be deferred provided that by the end of the taxation year following that in which the property was disposed of, the taxpayer acquired a replacement property.

This amendment was a long time coming and should have been brought in at the time the government brought in a capital gains tax. It is particularly important to farmers who, from time to time, dispose of certain of their farmlands, not to make a capital gain but to consolidate their holdings in order that their farm units be more of an economically viable nature. In the past they were penalized, and in many instances this created hardship. This change was proposed by our party for years, and it is interesting to note that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) moved a private member's motion to that effect last session. Here again, I think it was a case of bureaucrats in the minister's department not understanding the economic situation in western Canada, particularly as it relates to farmers and farmlands.

It is disappointing to me to note that there is no amendment in the bill to provide for a tax free rollover of farmland from father to son where they have operated as a corporation. I will make no further comment on this because the hon. member for Wetaskiwin spoke at length on this subject when he participated in this debate on November 7 last. I hope, however, that the minister will instruct his officials to give consideration to bringing in an amendment to allow such a rollover, because there are a great many family farming corporations in western Canada which are being penalized under the present provisions of the act.

I have read the remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) as reported in Hansard of Wednesday, November 9, and quite frankly, I was disappointed. He has become an apologist for this government and its policies which over the years he attacked so vigorously. He stated, to quote from page 756 of Hansard:

> I was rather shocked during the debate this afternoon on the question of privilege that arose, as I have been shocked by the debate that has taken place in the House of Commons this week and last. The only conclusion I can draw is that in the absence of that right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), the Conservative party has attempted to ride to power on the backs of the Mounties.

The hon. minister, I am sure, knows perfectly well from his long-time association with members on this side of the House that all of us hold the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the highest esteem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Neil: We are proud of that force, which is one of the finest police forces in the world.

If the minister will review Hansard, he will note that the thrust of questioning has been directed to ministerial responsibility. The government has attempted, supported by some of the media, to make it appear that our motives are otherwise. I am disappointed that the minister, who, I know, holds the RCMP in the same high regard as I, would make such a charge, which can only create more confusion in the minds of the public as to parliament's attitude toward the RCMP.

As critic for northern development for the official opposition, I had hoped that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would have made some comment with respect to what plans his department has to ease economic problems in the Northwest Territories. I know he is aware of the problems that are facing the small businessman and the labour force in that area because, according to news reports that I read of his trip to the north, he seemed to indicate a certain feeling for the north, and certainly he expressed concern for their problems.

Assistance could be by way of tax incentives or programs which may be instituted by his department, and I am sorry the minister is not here this evening. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the minister will hold discussions with the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) as well as with the Minister of Finance to see what steps can be taken to alleviate the severe economic depression that is facing business in the Mackenzie valley.

In concluding my remarks, I would like to say that Canada has possibly the greatest potential of any country in the world. However, potential, whether it be resources, manpower or otherwise, is of no value if we do not have leadership—leadership that would instil a sense of pride of country in Canadians from coast to coast; leadership that will create an economic climate that will give businessmen, both large and small, the confidence to invest in this great country and to create jobs, not only for the vast number of unemployed, but for the many youth who graduate each year from school and who, at the present time, face the future without much hope. We do not have that type of leadership at the present time and there is no indication that there will be any change in the foreseeable future. Canada has the potential. This bill, which has been called a mini-budget by the Minister of Finance, will do very little, if anything, I am afraid, to improve the situation.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that if in the context of my remarks I should wander from the subject, or in some way say something to which the Chair takes exception, I hope that Your Honour will draw it to my attention. I would also hope that in drawing it to my attention I would apologize with better grace than that which was demonstrated this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was found to be out of order, when he was found to have made a statement which was not founded on fact. I expect that kind of bad grace and ill form from the Prime Minister, but not, Sir, from any other member of the House, and I want that on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: Having witnessed that astounding performance I should now like to participate in the debate on Bill C-11.

In my view, Bill C-11 is a reflection of the tax policies of the government as it confronts industry and the provinces. One area of confrontation, which goes back to the era of 1974, has been in the area of mining taxation, where clearly the provinces have a basic right to tax. But with the federal government putting in its oar, and with the former minister of finance, John Turner, being bloody minded and determined to confront the provinces, we are witnessing taxation of the mining industry of both British Columbia and Ontario to the tune of 110 per cent. Now we hear complaints from the government side that that industry is not doing its fair share, is not carrying the load and is not being a good citizen. In terms of INCO, we have heard that they have not been good citizens, but that is in another framework and another context.

The mining industry, by its very nature, is of a type and kind which requires a great deal of time in order to gear up and get that locomotive of industry rolling. It takes time to develop prospects. It takes money to prospect, and it takes a great deal of skill. Canadians have withdrawn from confidence in the mining community, as a result of the tax burden this government inflicted on the mining industry. Canadians can see little profit in supporting their home grown industries through the purchase of stocks when the mining industry is being taxed up to a level of 110 per cent in some cases, that is, on the basis of the tax policies by this government.

Mining is not the only industry to be singled out by the government. This afternoon I listened to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) talking about our gross national product. I was a little disappointed that he did not touch on the forest industry, a massive industry in terms of GNP contributions, more so than the mining industry and the agricultural industry combined. This industry is massive because of the enormous amount of timber available across this land. By far the majority of our square miles is comprised of timber. Here we have an industry which has the support of the government in the form of regressive taxation and also in the form of a total lack of a national forest policy! There is absolutely no forest policy for Canada's first industry.

The other day I read the remarks of the senator who at one time was the minister responsible for fisheries, forestry and the environment, Senator Marchand. He stated in an address to a standing committee that the Economic Council of Canada had expressed concern over the fact that Canada did not have a forest policy. He felt it should address itself to that. He hoped that the incoming minister responsible for the environment would adopt and have an opportunity to introduce a national forest policy.

We have had four ministers of the environment, and we now have a Minister of State for the Environment (Mr. Marchand), who has gone on record as saying that he thinks we should be doing something for the forest industry. Sir, that is sheer arrant rhetoric of the most shallow nature, because he knows that this government reduced the budget for the forest service of Canada by $2 million last year. He knows that the minister responsible for the environment, for fisheries and forestry, said to the standing committee last year that we do not have a national forest policy. That was the minister's statement. We have been hearing the same statements from ministers ad nauseam and ad infinitum since 1974.

How is the forest industry affected by the tax policies or the failure of this government to have any policies? For one thing we see the Department of Regional Economic Expansion getting into the ball game and periodically funding the forest industry in one place or another. For example, not too long ago it funded a firm in my own riding, Salmo Forest Products, Salmo. It is reported that DREE provided some $300,000 in order to provide more job opportunities for Canadians, the residents of that small community of Salmo. What have we seen as a result? We have seen that same American owned saw mill sending its lumber across the line to the United States to be finished, laying off some 20 or 30 Canadian employees in order to hire on 20 or 30 United States employees, not to mention the 12 or so truck drivers they will require to haul the lumber down to the United States. Where is the policy of this government in regard to that type of rip-off? Is there any value in an American owned operation demonstrating this type of irresponsibility? I do not care whether it is American, Canadian, or German owned. Can anyone here convince me that 42 American employees are the equivalent of some 20 or 30 Canadians who will be laid off?

This government, with its tax policies and its lack of a forest policy, inflicts this kind of problem on the small average worker in Canadian society. The saw mills may be excused in part. I am not referring to this one, but some of them may be excused for the shipment of their goods by CP or CN rail because the charges that are levied are on the basis of a full box car. In the United States that kind of shipment does not apply. Frankly, the entrepreneurs in the forest industry in the western United States, for example in Washington, Oregon, Montana and Idaho, have everything going for them in terms of transportation benefits to move their goods to U.S. and foreign markets. It is not so in Canada.

Every effort is made to make it tougher for Canadians to do business in Canada in terms of the forest industry. The plywood industry is in the same position. The pulp and paper industry is in the same position. So, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this government, by demonstrating its irresponsibility by funding a U.S. firm—and I do not care whether it is lumber, mining or what it is—is denying jobs to Canadians and is not living up to the role it is supposed to play in terms of DREE.

Further, in terms of DREE, we heard the rumour today, vehemently denied by the minister, that the government and the cabinet are concerned about the fate of DREE because it is not getting enough PR Assistance to an industry or to a particular project from DREE is not getting enough mileage in terms of public relations for the federal government. The reported source comes from within DREE itself. I suppose where there is smoke, there is fire. I would say the government has cause for concern in terms of its PR with DREE because much has been a failure, much has been mismanaged and has been in the wrong direction, without the right ideas.

[Mr. Brisco.]

I cannot see the Maritimes accepting the proposal that DREE should go down the tube so that this government and its cabinet can pork barrel in the Maritimes or where else it pleases. I would think that that proposal would be totally unacceptable to any hon. member from the maritimes, be he Liberal, Conservative or NDP.

● (2132)

One of the other concerns I have with reference to the tax legislation the government is introducing has to do with the lack of an industrial strategy that this government demonstrates. We talk about a billion dollars which it has been proposed will be spent on industry in some fashion. The guidelines have not been spelled out. We really do not know in what way that money that money is going to be handed out. Would it not have been much more acceptable to Canadians and to thinking members of parliament if such a proposed expenditure were wrapped around a clear and distinct policy and strategy of industrial development? Clearly that type of thing does not exist.

I draw the attention of the House to page seven of the bill, and I note that reference is made there to a proposed amendment which reads:

> That for the 1977 and subsequent taxation years, a grant received under the Canadian Home Insulation Program be included in the income of the recipient or, in the case of a married individual residing with his spouse, in the income of the spouse with the higher income.

We have heard the eloquent speeches of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie), of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), and of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) who, on October 26 in response to a question by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Philbrook) said, and I quote from page 290 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and the House that the grants for insulating homes will not be considered additional income or assets to old age pensioners and will therefore not interfere with the receipt of supplementary benefits.

I can recall that that announcement was greeted with desk thumping responses on both sides of the House, but now we see this little clause on page 7 sneaked into Bill C-11, a massive bill of some 250 pages, in the fond hope that nobody will pick it up. What kind of shell game is the government playing with the senior citizens of Canada?

The insulation program is a good program, but its management has to be the most inept, bungling mess I have ever had the misfortune to come across. When a member of parliament cannot get from the department responsible for the management of this program, located in the city of Montreal, more than one copy of the program unless he writes a second letter for a second copy, or a third letter for a third copy, there has to be something wrong. My constituency office was assailed with phone calls from people who wanted to participate in what they thought and I thought—and still believe—is a good program, but in terms of efficiency and organization, what a bloody disaster!

Strangely enough, the government must have recognized that I was incensed about this because just on Friday of last week some 50 copies of this home insulation, information package arrived at my door, but it took an editorial in the newspapers, and on open letter to every business firm in my riding dealing with insulation to explain the program that this government has failed to explain to Canadians, in spite of its three quarter page ads. Wrong numbers have been listed in the newspapers. People have been calling Montreal and getting Halifax or some other place. There has been no notice taken of the time differential.

With all respect to my Francophone brothers, there are those in British Columbia who have difficulty with the French language, including this member, and it is rather difficult to communicate in French when you do not speak the French language. That was another problem. I realize that every program the government introduces has its problems. It takes time to put programs into gear, but many of these things could have been thought out beforehand.

Perhaps I am deviating from the point, but the point is that after the Minister of National Health and Welfare assured this House that the senior citizens of Canada would not be taxed on the benefits of this program, we now see it introduced by this government on page seven of this bill. I say shame! That is the very least I can say, and I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare to withdraw her statement, or apologize.

I note that the government has withdrawn its hand from the graves of those who had life insurance policies. However, as one of my colleagues recently remarked, the government has not gone to the extent of demonstrating assistance to small business.

It seems to me that it was about October 28 that the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) spoke in Trail to an assembly of people attending a Chamber of Commerce luncheon. At that time the minister, formerly responsible for small business, described not his new responsibilities for the environment but those with which perhaps he was more familiar, his former responsibilities for small business. I admired his frankness when he said that for too long the government has imposed too much red tape on small business, and that it could see that the small businessman was being drowned in red tape and in forms of little or no consequence.

Yet after a frank speech of that nature indicating how dedicated this government is to the support of small business we find that it is moving in this bill to frustrate further the advance of small business. What does the government want? Does it want the small businessman to go to that court of last resort with the highest interest rates? Does the government want the small businessman to run to the FBDB? Does the government really want to cultivate and encourage small business? It certainly has not demonstrated that inclination with the provisions contained in this bill as they affect insurance policies.

This weekend I called on a small businessman, Mike Banderoff. He operates a small store in the city of Castlegar, and he is tearing out his hair. He has a small bakery attached to his general store. He has three bakery employees supporting three families. He will have to let those employees go because, as he said, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has told him that he must label all his bakery products. He says he has no difficulty with bread, and his bakery bakes buns every day. That is easy enough. But then he says, "Today because I make a dozen apple pies—I may not make another dozen for six weeks—I must have 2,000 labels on hand telling the public what the shelf life is, what the labels are—"

Mr. Woolliams: Ask Basford. He got one in the face.

Mr. Brisco: That is right. I understand the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is an authority on pie. These ridiculous little labels are supposed to be for the protection of the public. Anyone who has been in the business of serving the public knows that when you cease providing quality, you lose business. A mouldy apple pie on the shelf is not going to attract customers. Anyone who buys it will never buy again.

Why is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs hassling this small businessman with such nonsense? If he has a dozen danish rolls that happen to have jam in them he must have a label for that, and then a label for his peach turnovers, and one for his apple turnovers. It will take him about 25 years to use up the labels.

The ultimate insult to this small businessman is not only that ridiculous regulation but the fact that he received a letter headed "Consumer Fraud Protection", not the official letterhead of the department. It could have been a fraud. That letterhead could imply to the businessman that he was already pulling a fast one on the public. He could accept a letter from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but when it comes under the heading of "Consumer Fraud Protection" does it mean he is regarded as a gangster?

A little while ago I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Loiselle) talk about the failure of the opposition to do anything but criticize. When he said that I thought he had failed to recognize the role of parliament and the role of the opposition. It is the role of the opposition to criticize, and I suppose from time to time we are guilty of not criticizing constructively, perhaps because we are frustrated at the government's policies. I should like to draw to the attention of the hon. member that it is the role of the opposition to oppose, to criticize constructively. That has been demonstrated many times in the past through amendments introduced by the opposition that have helped improve legislation.

The tax policies of the government as set out in this bill give me some concern. I do not understand their priorities. The city of Castlegar is unable to expand industrially, commercially, or socially in terms of housing, for want of water which could be supplied with $3 million of this government's money. Yet every day in the newspapers and through parliamentary reports the residents of Castlegar learn about the government spending $100 million on an office building in Montreal—although it would not matter whether the building was in Vancouver, Regina, or Halifax. In this so-called period of restraint the government spends money for an office building in Montreal where we are told there is a surplus of office space. It looks as if the government is bending over backwards to buy votes in Quebec.

If Castlegar were to receive assistance from the federal and provincial government it could triple its employment opportunities in the next five years but, instead, it may have to halt the expansion of existing industry. All the applications made to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) fell on deaf ears. The government has tunnel vision. It shafts the small businessman while it introduces a program to assist Canadians to reduce the cost of energy and an insulation program, which I have already said is a good one; then it turns around and, with the other hand, grabs dollars from the pockets of senior citizens.

The government takes and the government gives, but it always takes more than it gives. On the one hand the minister assures us that something will not be done, while on the other hand somebody else introduces it through a provision in this bill. It just demonstrates the government's failure to recognize priorities. It would rather spend $100 million on erecting a tower to reflect—

An hon. Member: That is not right.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite will have his turn to speak when I finish, unless he has a question, which I doubt.

The government has failed to set its priorities, it has demonstrated tunnel vision and decided that a community the size of Castlegar does not need to expand and increase job opportunities. Rather, the government proposes to erect a tower to its policies in the city of Montreal.

That is the kind of policy, the kind of tunnel vision, the kind of "emphysema" of rhetoric from which this government suffers.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of interest that I should like to make some comments about this legislation. I notice that the minister has already mentioned misuse of freedom of speech. However, Mr. Speaker, I think that he indicated in his presentation how important this legislation was and, on that basis, I think that we have serious reasons to make comments about it. I wish to say right now to the minister that there are some good provisions in this legislation that we wish to support at once. Unfortunately there are also some which are debatable not to say questionable. Once more, we think that it is a strategy of this government to present a legislation containing several provisions deserving our support because we should not hesitate of course to support, for instance, a tax reduction. We have been asking for it in the last two years. It is only last week that the minister decided to introduce this legislation. I hope that our friends opposite will not try to take credit for such a brilliant idea.

For two years, Mr. Speaker, the leader of my party and several of my colleagues have been asking—and they believe that it was urgent two years ago—that the Canadian people be given additional purchasing power. And they come up with this legislation in which once more, there are provisions that we consider inadequate for the time being. And we think that those measures should not all be included in the same legislation. If in the minister's view it is urgent to act, then let him suggest a proposal to select measures that are urgent, valuable and interesting and we shall certainly give them our support.

But it looks very much like the omnibus bill of long ago in which totally different measures were being proposed. Four or five of the seven measures were valid and we were supposed to accept the whole package without question. This is where the problem lies, and we ask for the insurance that, at least at the committee stage, the minister be ready to make some concessions and present in third reading a legislation more acceptable than it is now, in which case he will certainly get the cooperation he wishes from the opposition. But I somewhat regret to see that my hon. friends opposite are maintaining a stubborn silence about debatable and debated measures with which a majority of the people probably do not agree.

We believe that it is normal, or at least that we are doing our duty in telling the government members that once again some provisions are unacceptable for the moment, that we are greatly pleased with some others and that what would make Canadians most happy is a tax reduction, but as I said earlier, my party has been asking for these reductions for three years in order to increase our purchasing power. Last week, previous speakers talked in particular about the clauses dealing with insurance companies, the holders of insurance policies and, of course, capital gains, especially as concerns farmers, and we certainly have serious reservations about those provisions. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we are very much in favour of the good clauses and that we intend to do our duty with regard to those that we find unacceptable for the moment.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding with problems as well, and neither the Speech from the Throne nor the estimates that the minister would like to propose and which, in his opinion, the people would find most interesting can truly solve these problems. Some people in my constituency are greatly worried about the economic situation, and this legislation is not likely to solve certain important problems.

I was listening to the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) who is, I believe, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and he mentioned the opportunity that we have to correct the situation. He made an excellent speech which I greatly appreciated, and he touched on almost everything, Mr. Speaker, except for a minor matter. He forgot or tried to forget the past. But that is our problem, our responsibility. According to what he said, he would have liked us, members of the opposition, to forget all the failures of the government in so many areas, he would have liked us not to talk about what has happened and as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) did in his statement, he of course asked us to help this government and to recognize how important it is for the government to regain the confidence of the people. He therefore admitted that the government has already lost much of the confidence of Canadian voters.

The economy, stated the minister, depends in large part on a climate of confidence in business circles and it is essential to pass the bill now under consideration to ensure that climate of confidence. Mr. Speaker, I will deal with this matter for a few minutes.

How is it possible for the opposition to accept readily to support this government when it recognizes the importance and the necessity of gaining the people's confidence, as I said earlier, after so many failures. We would be less than honest if we asked the people to forget what happened and merely say: I think this government is well-disposed now. This government has been running the country for 12 years and for as many years the Canadian people have been expecting measures when they only got promises since 1965, and I am thinking of the just society which was promised to us.

I am also thinking of that great and noble purpose, the reconciliation of all Canadians, but dissension occurred. I am thinking of the undertaking to reduce unemployment in 1968 by almost 168,000 if I remember correctly, while the number of unemployed now exceeds a million; to restore agriculture, while degradation is witnessed in that area, to increase the number of farmers when we know that they are fewer; to increase the net revenues of producers when we know quite well that they have dropped. Excess revenues, gross and net revenues will be mentioned, but the opposite is the truth. To curb inflation! Never before have we known such a serious inflationary trend. We heard about close co-operation with the provinces and it was rather confrontation than consultation. There was confrontation as well with businessmen, the business community and unions. I shall not deal with the security service, since I may have the opportunity to come back to this later on. The behavior of some federal ministers as regards some Quebec members before November 15, Mr. Speaker. I am not referring to that day but to the period before November 15. I recall very well all the arguments we had and the recommendations of their cousins of the provincial legislature which all resulted in negative answers on extremely important matters. Then, one wonders how this famous November 15 ever happened? And the carelessness of our industries! Last week, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) referred to federal handouts. There were quite a few, that is true. There were very interesting grants, particularly in Quebec, but there was also in the riding of Berthier—

An hon. Member: In the riding of Joliette.

Mr. La Salle: Who is speaking of Joliette?

An hon. Member: I am!

Mr. La Salle: Ah! That is another story, excuse me. I say several industries disappeared, but we are not told why it happened. Efforts were made to set up new industries, but unfortunately, the Canadian production in several industries disappeared or declined. Now, how could we forget, how could we trust this government which comes to us and says: There now, this time we are prepared to act properly. Therefore, a lack of estimates for research equals a lack of a long-term policy. And for the past 12 years, they have been wondering what was going on or they have just not cared. And recently, in a joint committee, Senator Lamontagne, who is not a Progressive Conservative, blamed the government in direct and strong terms for allowing a decrease in research funding. Therefore, how can this government ask us to have confidence in them, how can they be serious when they introduce a few more budgetary measures, fully aware of the fact that the predecessors of the present Minister of Finance sadly failed in all their projections, and as far as I know, unless some changes occurred, the same analysts or economists are probably preparing the background papers for the present Minister of Finance. Once again, we are being asked to trust this government which gave us abundant proof of its failures.

Mr. Speaker, you can understand why we are not prepared to comply with the request the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) made a moment ago, to forget the past and look forward to the future. If the past is the guarantor of the future, we must remind Canadians that the coming months and years are going to be difficult ones. Therefore, in these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, we really intend to remind the people of this government's tremendous failures.

I would also like to make some comments about an industry which affects my riding in particular and greatly concerns the province of Quebec, I am referring to the dairy industry. I do not think any reference has been made to this, nor any special funds earmarked for this purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, this is important in our economy; besides, it is considered a very important part of our agricultural industry. I wish to remind the minister of the importance and urgency of providing financial aid for this industry. As far as agriculture in general is concerned, promises have been made. The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) indicated that meetings would be held with the Quebec Minister of Agriculture to discuss Federal government grants to the dairy industry. But, as far as a dairy policy is concerned, Mr. Speaker, great hopes and tremendous expectations have been raised among the people concerned. Enormous hopes have been raised and milk producers have known miseries and problems two or three years ago. They are still refusing—I mean the government—to introduce a program on a five year scale. They have talked about restrictions on cheese imports but let them reach 50 million pounds before making any move and now we are told that we are probably going to reduce those imports. At the same time the production capacity of milk producers has been reduced.

We did not even protest against powdered milk competition from the European Economic Community under the pretext that we could not challenge and compete on equal terms with them. And yet we knew very well, Mr. Speaker, that at the same time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was negotiating small economic agreements with the EEC on the back of milk producers. The fact is not known. That was the problem. I think the member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) is not much aware of that. The member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Yanakis) is surely aware of it. I know that the member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) dealt with it. His colleagues did not listen to him carefully, but the papers reported recently that the member for Compton was not satisfied with the government's behaviour. As it turned out, the government chose to let the EEC compete with us, no matter again who was going to pay the price of such a decision.

Again, the government refused to assume its responsibilities and help the milk producers in allocating supplementary estimates and to face that competition in order to protect a Canadian industry. And this is a further example of a lack of courage as in so many other fields. The member for Beauce (Mr. Caron) is aware of that. There are milk producers in his riding who are not happy, Mr. Speaker.

I am anxious to see the member for Beauce rise in his place and have the courage to condemn the lack of adequate measures in order to save the milk industry not only in Quebec but throughout the country.

There is again some talk about importing butter. Mr. Speaker, such things compel us to take the floor and ask the government to show some understanding. At the very moment I am speaking to you, I am quite convinced that in the riding of Beauce as in other ridings, the situation is the same for milk producers. The member for Beauce, Mr. Speaker, prefers to promise a federal penitentiary in his riding by 1979, but it will apparently only take place in 1989. Anyway, due to the present economic situation, there are many milk producers in my riding who have reached their quota and who don't know what to do until the month of April, yet the government refuses to listen to them. Indeed, it is going to let them down. From 5,000 to 6,000 of them have already given up a couple of years ago. Many more will give up as well, Mr. Speaker, but that does not bother the government in the least.

I had an opportunity to speak with the chairman of the Canadian Milk Board and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). Next April, the government will see what it will do, but until then, no doubt some milk producers from Ontario will be forced out of business. There are not enough unemployed as it is. That is the position: one of denial. Some people find the situation amusing. The member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) may find that funny, but when the Liberals run out of milk or food, and when their stomachs ache from hunger, Mr. Speaker, maybe they will understand how important it is to give the producers a decent income.

Mr. Blais: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. La Salle.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Postmaster General on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: I am quite aware that the hon. gentleman has not much expertise in the field of agriculture and that he likes to deal with it in a rather general way, but could he tell us, since we are studying Bill C-11, if any clause of this bill allows him to refer to all those matters?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains some provisions aimed at re-stabilizing or restoring Canada's economy. I am referring to a deficiency in this bill—

An hon. Member: Ah!

Mr. La Salle: No, they don't care. I would have to accept the funds offered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and completely disregard a very important area from an economic point of view for my riding and for the Canadian agriculture.

• (2212)

The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) is not interested in that. But that is not possible, for I know the Postmaster General too well to believe he is not interested in such an important sector for the agricultural economy of our country. I denounce, I deplore and I regret this absence of sufficient funds that the Minister of Finance could have presented to the House, as I am speaking of the urgency of the present situation for our milk producers. I wish our members from Quebec would say as much about it, that they would say a little more. Mr. Speaker, in my riding, for example, we had trouble in a textile manufacture. There have been small problems in the riding of Berthier as well.

The Minister of Finance has mentioned it quite often, and recently he was applauded because he presented a proposition last fall which could perhaps save the 200,000 people left. However, the 600,000 workers who had to leave this industry in the last few years are not to be mentioned. That is not mentioned. The 200, 000 workers left may be saved, but that is not sure by any means.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Longueuil on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for interrupting the hon. member for Joliette but I think the House should not be misled. First he just said that about 600,000 people left their farms. Second, he says the government has never done anything, but if he considers what has been proposed by the government, he will see we are talking about something like $600 million.

But the people from Montreal, as the member mentioned it, are paying for the people whom he defends now. He should not ignore it—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of the parliamentary secretary that he is making a very interesting point but he may have the floor after the hon. member for Joliette and bring these points before the House.

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Longueuil wants to contribute and it seems that there is enough time for him to do so. It would be very interesting to listen to him and I am ready and indeed I would be very pleased to hear him. Nevertheless my time has not expired yet. As I said, the absence of proper energetic measures in both our textile industry and our industry in general has forced several industries in Canada to close their plants. The absence of research is responsible as well for the research subsidies for industries which had to close. We are told that the government makes incredible efforts and people are highly indignant because one deplores now the lack of courage shown in these past 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, earlier I acknowledged the comments of the hon. member for Chambly. All I said is that it is not easy to accept an invitation saying we are going to look at the other side and try to make Canadians believe that we are right to trust the government. Mr. Speaker, I repeat it over and over and I say it everywhere. We have no reason to trust a government which has failed in its responsibilities for too long and which has respectfully lied to us for too long on god knows how many issues and has constantly tried to mislead us. All the projections of the previous Minister of Finance and of the present Minister of Finance were wrong. The hon. member for Longueuil knows that.

Mr. Speaker, there were a series of statements about the economic situation of the province of Quebec which were equally false. Many extremely important recommendations, which I am sure would have curbed the rise of separatism in Quebec, have been rejected. But in Ottawa, nobody cares. And now we are in a difficult situation which is described here tonight but we are told we should not talk about it. Mr. Speaker, I agree with the responsible ministers who try to find new funds so that when one talks about restoring the economic climate in Canada and within my province of Quebec, there is not one single member of the House who is against it. Still I cannot applaud the efforts which have been made these last 12 years. This is wrong. But this is a different situation altogether and it seems that something is going to be done.

As I said earlier, in my constituency people refer to false projections. Must I remind this House that when there was question of the Mirabel project—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member allow a question? Would he specify the areas where the government allegedly lied to the opposition, before I rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. La Salle: When I am finished, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to rise on a question of privilege, he will be able to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Joliette alone can allow a question. He may conclude. The Parliamentary Secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: I wish to reserve my right to rise on a question of privilege, because the hon. member just blamed illegal action on the government, by suggesting the government lied to the opposition. I reserve the right to rise on that question tomorrow, if I am so allowed by the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I would like to point out to the hon. member that there is nothing in our rules to preclude the hon. member from accusing the government or a political party as a group in this House, or even from suggesting that a party or the government uttered falsehoods. It is in cases where the character of an individual member is involved that his rights may be infringed upon and he may rise on a point of order. Anyway, the hon. member in the opinion of the Chair is simply raising a matter of opinion and I do not feel at this point that he has a proper point of order.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this government has been misleading, if the term "lying" is too harsh for the hon. member to hear, this government has been misleading the Canadian people for ten years. In all its projections, as I said, not to mention the 1968 commitment to reduce unemployment, if this be not sufficient proof in the current context, is this not misleading the people?

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hope the parliamentary secretary is rising again on a question of privilege.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Joliette has used another word and that instead of using the word "to lie", he has elected to use the word "to mislead", you will no doubt allow me to rise again on a question of privilege and to call the attention of the Chair on the ruling which was given today by Mr. Speaker around 3 p.m., when he ruled that to accuse a party or a group of an illegal act is deemed at this time to be a breach of privilege and that the hon. member should withdraw his accusation if he is not in a position to substantiate it. In this case, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette does not only make statements without substantiating them, without supporting them with specific facts. He accuses government members of telling lies. He accuses government members of misleading the opposition and, under these circumstances, I ask permission to raise a question of privilege as early as tomorrow, which is an allotted day.

Mr. La Salle: Having heard the remarks of the hon. member, I shall try to provide additional evidence. In 1974, we went to the people on a very clear platform of wage and price controls. The government kept repeating throughout the country that they would never take such an approach. They called us prophets of doom and gloom. They tried to have us believe that the leader of the Progessive Conservative party was retrograde. But what happened only a few months later? After winning the confidence of the majority of the Canadian people, the government came to power under false pretences. Only a few months later, the government made a complete turnabout: they imposed wage and price controls and mislead the Canadian people—

• (2222)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Loiselle) on a point of order.

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, but anyone who has any knowledge of the economy knows that between the wage and price freeze suggested by the opposition and what we proposed to the Canadian people in 1976, there is as much difference as between day and night. Of course, you have to be a little knowledgeable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will agree with me that he just expressed a matter of opinion on which the Chair does not have to rule. He already had the opportunity to make his own speech and put forward his arguments. Therefore I think he should allow other members to listen closely to the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Moreover, the government has even more misled the people because with those measures they promised to curb inflation, and that is not what happened. Inflation has increased. It had promised to restore the business world, to make agreements with the unions, but we saw a continuous confrontation, and not later than today he was suggesting dates for decontrol, but we are still waiting for it. Mr. Speaker, how can my hon. friends opposite honestly accuse me of foul play? It is not possible, Mr. Speaker, and they know it. We saw this in how many measures where some hon. members felt like denouncing their own government, I am sure, on these projections which proved erroneous. Then do not tell me that the government did not mislead the people when they promised to maintain national unity, to reduce unemployment, to slow down inflation, to spur the Canadian industry, to reduce annual deficits; it was a complete failure all along the line, Mr. Speaker. And they try to have me retract my words when I say that the government took in the Canadian electorate. I am flabbergasted, Mr. Speaker. I thought my hon. friends opposite could be more honest and sincere with me. Well, I am being asked too much, Mr. Speaker. That cannot be!

Mr. Speaker, in my riding as well as in my province, I repeat that a cynical hypocrisy is obvious. They try to make us accept certain provisions that cannot be added to the same act. I will venture further. I had forgotten my good friend, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). Some people say that we have been taken in. It is funny to see how things turn out to be. How can we expect the public to have confidence?

[Mr. Pinard.]

A few months ago, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was on our side and my friends opposite wanted his hide. They had been dreaming of that for years. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has been on our side for 19 years. He has fustigated, condemned and repudiated this government. Then a transfer occurred for reasons everybody knows. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce dared attempt with great seriousness to convince us that he was truly motivated by the desire to advocate measures he had been denouncing for 19 years.

But, Mr. Speaker, the most sickening thing in all this is when I saw my friends opposite applaud him. They actually applauded the one they wanted to crucify merely six months ago. But the Canadian people are not blind. When they learn of things like that, when they realize what has happened, they say: No, it cannot be. It is just not possible that this government changes its mind so quickly and that members of parliament support and applaud the very one they would have gladly nailed to the barn six months ago.

That is what we see, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Finance as well as a number of members of this House, with all the respect I owe them, are asking me to trust this government. I cannot honestly tell my constituents that there is no problem, no reason to be afraid. Nor can I ask the people of Canada to trust this government. If I say that this government has betrayed us on too many occasions, Mr. Speaker, am I going to be called to order? Maybe. But like thousands of other Canadians, I suggest that this government has failed in its duty and that several of its ministers have failed in their responsibilities.

In such circumstances, it is impossible to trust this government and to give an unreserved support to this bill. If the government would agree to split this bill in order to keep only the best and most pressing part of it, we would be ready to support it. We would support it indeed! But there are a number of proposals in this piece of legislation which are too important and too questionable, with regard to capital gains and insurance policies, to be approved without reservation. Besides, we would be blamed for doing so, which we are not going to be, because we will stick up for the rights of Canadian electors in this regard.

I should like to point out, in passing, the statement the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion made last week. He said, and I quote:

> What I mean is that it is not the responsibility of the federal government and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion alone to fight against disparities. In my meetings with the premiers and the provincial ministers with whom I have regular consultations and negotiations—

When the minister speaks to us of fighting against those infamous regional disparities, I have no doubt whatsoever that he is sincere, Mr. Speaker, because I know the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion very well; but we have been talking about that for ten years now, and what results do we have?

Last Tuesday, I asked the Minister of Finance to convene immediately the ministers of the Maritime provinces and Quebec, in view of this growing economic imbalance. He said that if the ministers wanted to discuss things with him, they could always come to see him. A few days ago I suggested to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) that he meet with his provincial counterparts, business and labour. He replied that it may be a good way of setting up a long term policy but we did not hear about that yet. What are we waiting for? Businessmen are waiting to see what government intends to do. The government is waiting for an answer from businessmen. Maybe the government is waiting until business and labour get along better.

However, it is the responsibility of this government to get all those people to sit down at the same table and devise long term and firm policies. This government is not doing its job in this respect. Apparently they seem prepared to meet business and labour but they have demonstrated, Mr. Speaker, their inability to set long term policies and their lack of leadership, and the recent cabinet shuffle is definitely not enough to reassure Canadians.

It is impossible, Mr. Speaker. No new idea can come out of that Cabinet. There has been no new blood injected in the Cabinet. As I already mentioned there are young backbenchers, Mr. Speaker, who might have some good ideas. I am sure that the hon. member for Chambly could come up with something new. I remember the promise which was made to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Lamontagne), the hon. mayor of Quebec City, but he must wait for his turn. They have chosen to play musical chairs for the last ten years with the same ministers and the same inadequate ideas. This is why it is impossible to trust this government that has disappointed us too much.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being 10:30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

At 10:30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

PRIVILEGE

CLARIFICATION BY MR. SPEAKER OF RULING MADE ON NOVEMBER 14, 1977

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before calling motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, I wonder if I might endeavour to borrow a moment of the time of the House to refer to some remarks which I made yesterday during the course of a ruling on the question of privilege raised by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

After I had decided on the question of privilege raised earlier by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the right hon. Prime Minister raised a question concerning some alleged comments connected with a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 earlier in the day. I rather quickly set that aside—upon reflection, perhaps a little too quickly. In any case, that was set aside yesterday, and I do not propose to return to it.

My concern, first of all, is that I had expressed the view that since the complaint raised by the right hon. Prime Minister yesterday was part of a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ought not to deal with it in the same way as I might those other areas of discussion which were subject to the strictures I referred to in the ruling yesterday. In fact, I was not entirely correct in that, because the sum and the substance of the complaint was not in the motion but in the preamble.

In any case, it occurs to me that I may very well have given an impression that motions and preambles to motions are somehow exempt from the strictures I have put on language used in debate according to the citations to which I referred yesterday. If I have done that, I want to hasten today to correct that impression, because it is quite wrong.

If in the past I have been in the habit of adopting and accepting a sort of self-policing feature about motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, I hope the House will understand that since there has been a limited time for the presentation of these motions, I have tended very much to allow them to police themselves in terms of aspects which might offend or come close to offending some of the rules. Sometimes I simply brush them aside and do not put the question, and I have not examined them with close scrutiny with respect to the opprobrious or unparliamentary language provisions.

I should like to refer to Standing Order 51 which reads as follows:

> Whenever Mr. Speaker is of the opinion that a motion offered to the House is contrary to the rules and privileges of parliament, he shall apprise the House thereof immediately, before putting the question thereon, and quote the Standing Order or authority applicable to the case.

Furthermore, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, at citation 199(3) reads as follows:

> If the language of a motion is offensive either to the House, or to any member, the same proceedings may be had in relation to it as are proper in the case of disorderly or offensive words used in debate; and, for the same cause, a motion may either be refused an entry among the minutes, or if already entered, may be expunged.

Thus, I think I should make it clear to the House that if I created the impression in a somewhat peremptory answer yesterday to the point raised by the right hon. Prime Minister, that all motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 enjoy some exemption from the strictures against unparliamentary or opprobrious language, that was an incorrect impression. I hope the House will accept my penitence for having done so yesterday and my desire to correct the record as quickly as possible, before even taking any proposed motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 today.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF DECISION TO MAINTAIN WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. With inflation of over nine per cent this year and unemployment levels of over eight per cent, giving a combined misery index of more than 17 per cent, confirming that wage and price controls are not only not working but are also adding to our jobless ranks, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

> That there be an immediate reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with respect to the government's decision to maintain wage and price controls for most of next year and with respect to the government's attempt to enforce a six per cent ceiling on wage increases, which appears to be based on its forecast of a six per cent inflation level next year, a forecast not shared by independent economists.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTION WAGE INCREASES BE PERMITTED TO EQUAL LEVEL OF INFLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the well understood and brilliantly put motion which just preceded mine, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House deplores the economic policy of this government which has resulted in high levels of inflation and unemployment and calls upon the government to permit wage and salary increases within the framework of the controls program next year which at least match increases in the cost of living.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REFERENDUMS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PROPOSAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order No. 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the present constitutional crisis and the ambiguous comments made by the Prime Minister about his idea of a national referendum, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That this House instruct the Prime Minister to clarify his proposal for a national referendum as soon as possible in order to remove every possible uncertainty, especially for the people in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation for debate of such a motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON FILE FOR OPERATION "FEATHERBED"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity concerning the security service file bearing the code name "Featherbed". I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the Solicitor General advise the House whether the government has had knowledge of this file or played any part in setting it up, specifically whether the file includes details or certain surveillance of members of the news media as well as considerable information about one of the highest ranking members of the cabinet, and finally, whether any attempts have been made to destroy the file and the whereabouts of the file or copies thereof today.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH PROVINCES TO SETTLE MILK MARKETING DIFFICULTIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Recognizing and respecting the fact that it is in the best interests of the dairy industry, producers and consumers alike, that the national dairy policy, with some modification, continue; however, in view of the fact that a very dangerous impasse has developed between the federal government and the fluid milk producers of Quebec and that in addition dissatisfaction continues throughout most of the participating provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the Minister of Agriculture call together immediately a meeting of all provincial ministers of agriculture along with representatives of all provincial milk marketing boards to resolve these ongoing difficulties and to reach a decision which is mutually acceptable to all.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST THAT BLACKOUT OF TELEVISION COVERAGE OF EDMONTON-VANCOUVER FOOTBALL GAME BE LIFTED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion on a matter which is urgent and pressing and which will occur this weekend. In view of the fact that all the tickets were sold out by 9.30 a.m. November 10 for the western final game of the Canadian Football League between the British Columbia Lions and the Edmonton Eskimos in Edmonton this Sunday, which means there is no justification whatsoever for any blackout of television coverage of this playoff game, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House request the Minister of Communications and the Secretary of State of Canada, who is responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to arrange with the Canadian Football League and the management of the Edmonton Eskimos to rescind immediately any blackout of television coverage so that people in communities such as Edmonton, Athabasca, Fort McMurray, Lac La Biche, Whitecourt, Hinton, Jasper, Leduc, Lacombe, and Wetaskiwin may watch this event along with other Canadians.

HEALTH

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF LOSS OF MEDICAL DOCTORS TO UNITED STATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. From 1974 until 1977, Canada lost 1,500 medical school graduates to the United States. The cause of this emigration lies in the increasing frustration of Canadian doctors with governmental and bureaucratic interference in the medical profession on the federal and provincial levels as well as with the prospect of better income in the United States.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco):

That this matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for study and report to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such motion can be presented to the House only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED REIMBURSEMENT OF TAX ON FUEL TO AID SMALL BUSINESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since small and medium businesses in eastern Canada have a hard time competing with larger businesses located in large centres, and since those businesses use more diesel engines for their operations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the House recommend a partial reimbursement of the tax paid on such fuel in order to help small businesses to survive and to contribute to job creation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CITIZENSHIP

PROPOSAL FOR INQUIRY TO STUDY DELAY IN DELIVERING CERTIFICATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

According to confidential information, it seems that thousands of applications for Canadian citizenship from ethnic groups are pending, and especially that the files of Quebeckers are knowingly and voluntarily withheld by some Ottawa officials, so as to deprive those future Canadians of a sacred right, the right to vote. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith):

That an inquiry be immediately undertaken by the Secretary of State to clarify this deplorable situation and that action be taken against the officials found guilty of such a misdeed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REASON FOR BELIEVING LEVEL OF INFLATION NEXT YEAR WILL BE SIX PER CENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Figures released today by Statistics Canada show that inflation in 1977 so far is rising at an annual rate of more than nine per cent. As the Prime Minister knows, his government has proposed a six per cent wage ceiling this year and next year as far as our workers are concerned. Since prices are rising so much faster than wages, is the Prime Minister aware that the average Canadian family may well lose $300 in buying power if it is held to a six per cent wage ceiling and inflation continues? If the Prime Minister is aware of this would he indicate to the House why he believes inflation will only be six per cent next year or does he not care if the Canadian worker loses such buying power?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated in the budgetary speeches and economic speeches that we expect next year the cost of living index will go up at a rate of six per cent or less. That is still our expectation. We do not take the pessimistic projection that the hon. member has in mind as being true.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY MANUFACTURING SALES TAX MIGHT BE RESCINDED

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Since the policies of this administration have led to the unique state of rising inflation and rising unemployment, would the Minister of Finance consider waiving the manufacturing sales tax that the government now imposes in order to encourage consumer demand and at the same time lower prices with respect to the predictions concerned?

● (1422)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we discussed the possibility with the provinces a few weeks ago of lowering—

Mr. Stevens: I was asking about the federal manufacturing tax.

Mr. Chrétien: We did discuss that and only the province of Ontario was willing to go along with the proposition that if the provinces were to cut their sales tax by one per cent we would help them with the other per cent, but there were no other takers. We have looked at the possibility of cutting the federal sales tax, but this was not judged a very good means because we were afraid that the benefits would not be passed on to the consumer. Instead of that, I have decided to cut, for January and February, income tax for people of medium and lower income by the amount of $100.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION OF DECISION TO ALLOW CONTROLS TO CONTINUE NEXT YEAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is again directed to the Minister of Finance, who must realize that as far as the federal manufacturing sales tax is concerned a rebate could certainly be made over the next six months. In view of the fact that we do have rising inflation, which would indicate that the controls program is not working—in fact, the controls program has been counter productive in that our jobless ranks are always swelling—would the Minister of Finance reconsider his decision to allow controls to continue well into next year and end controls at least before the end of this calendar year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that this would have exactly the opposite effect. Had it not been for controls in the last two years, we would be in an even worse position than we are now, and I do not think that the inflation indicator released today will make me change my mind as regards removing the controls by April 14. This confirms that I made the right decision when I made my speech on the economy.

FINANCE

PROPORTION OF INFLATION RESULTING FROM DEVALUATION OF DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CORRECT BALANCE OF PAYMENTS PROBLEM

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, and I am interested in his last reply. The Americans are doing much, much better without controls. My question is this. What have his officials told him in regard to what proportion of the current inflation is a result of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to know exactly what percentage of inflation at this time is due to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. I do not know exactly how to quantify it, but it is certainly a factor. The report released this morning says, for instance, that higher housing costs are due to the rate increase in municipal and provincial taxes. And it is an area on which we have no control.

[English]

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Given the fact that his own officials have stated that probably about 25 per cent of our inflation rate is due to devaluation, what steps is the Minister of Finance taking to try to make Canadian industry more competitive or, indeed, to stop the continuing devaluation of the Canadian dollar? Has the minister talked to provincial governments about borrowing abroad? Has the minister considered any restrictions on travel abroad? What is the minister going to do to try to stop this balance of payments problem and the devaluation of the dollar which is contributing so much to our inflation and to unemployment?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member to read the speeches of two ministers of finance who are not supposed to be necessarily my friends, the ministers of finance of Ontario and Quebec, who have said that devaluation of the dollar at this time was probably something which was good for the manufacturing sector of Canada.

Mr. Gillies: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the Minister of Finance did not understand my question, which was very simple. What is the minister going to do to improve the balance of payments problem and to stop the continuing devaluation of the dollar, which everybody knows is having an incredible effect upon the rate of inflation in this nation?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am very surprised that the hon. member does not understand that devaluation of the Canadian dollar is making Canadian products more competitive in the world. It is very basic to the economy. I would be very surprised if in the past he taught his students something else.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REQUEST WAGE INCREASES EQUAL INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING AND PROPOSED OIL PRICE INCREASE BE DENIED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. No economic analysis group outside the government, whether we are talking about the Conference Board, U of T economists or labour groups, agrees that inflation will be held down to six per cent next year. In fact, most of them say it will be a minimum of eight per cent. The minister's own tax reduction of the grand sum of $100 will still mean, with the present rate of inflation, a net loss of $350 per family at the $15,000 level next year. The minister said a minute ago that he is prepared to gamble. Will he remove the gamble for Canadian workers, modify his program and permit increases in wages and salaries next year which will at least be commensurate with the cost of living?

• (1427)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate to change our economic policy just now. I am of course disappointed with the rate of inflation for this month. On the other hand, I am sure this problem would have been a lot easier to solve if only we could have obtained last August the voluntary support of management and labour, which would have enabled Canada to gain a more favourable competitive position on world markets. Unfortunately we have been unable to convince labour to co-operate with us.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister is at least consistent. Liberals never let facts get in the way of their policy. The government has already agreed that the oil companies will be permitted to increase the price of oil on January I by $1 a barrel. This will mean an increase in the cost for every Canadian who drives a car and heats a family home. As well, it will result in the loss of some 25,000 to 30,000 jobs on the basis of past experience. Will the minister take steps now to stop that January 1 increase in the price of oil?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this policy was established a long time ago. At the time of the increase in oil prices by the OPEC nations, we decided that rather than Canadians having to take the brunt of it in one shot, we would phase in the increase over a period of years. That policy, which was approved by all parties in the House at that time, has to be lived with today.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister is flatly wrong. The price increase was approved by his government. His government did that, not those on this side of the House. Will the minister confirm that the price increase will result in hundreds of millions of dollars in additional profit to the oil companies, something they do not need? Also, it will result in a one per cent increase in the cost of living and the loss of 25,000 to 30,000 jobs in the Canadian economy.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I remember a premier from Saskatchewan by the name of Blakeney urging us not long ago to have the international price for oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Let the hon. member check with him.

REASON FOR DELAY IN PAYMENT OF SUBSIDIES TO FLUID MILK PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is for—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it seems very hard to obtain silence in this House or at least to get the ears of the hon. members.

I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture or, in his absence, to his parliamentary secretary. As a result of the problems experienced by fluid milk producers who are having a hard time getting their subsidies since May, the chairman of the Canadian Dairy Commission wrote recently to my colleague from Kamouraska that as long as members of the federation were accused of false representations, those cheques would not be sent out.

Can the parliamentary secretary tell us whether the attitude of the government and the Canadian Dairy Commission has changed and what he intends to do in this specific instance?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, following the many representations made by the hon. members on this side of the House, I am pleased to indicate that both federations, that is the Quebec Industrial Milk Producers Federation and the Canadian Dairy Commission have reached an agreement on the payment of subsidies. I must say also that this morning the cheques were mailed out for the months of May and June. The officials of the Commission are now in the process of figuring out the subsidies for the months of July, August and September. In about ten days, everything will have been straightened out and all producers will have been paid.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture for his positive answer, even if it took over six months.

Could the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether those agreements entered into recently, either yesterday or today, with both federations are long-term agreements or whether the same problem is likely to crop up again tomorrow?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I might tell the hon. member for Témiscamingue that these agreements are mainly the outcome of the negotiations conducted by members on this side of the House and not by members on the other side. I might add also that the federation got along very well with the Canadian Dairy Commission and that this agreement is applicable to the dairy policy for 1977-78.

DEVALUATION OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Crosbie (St. John's West): A question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said last Tuesday in Winnipeg that the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar has been, and I quote "useful, and I hope it stays around for a while". And in the House last Wednesday he said this would help turn around the tourism deficit, correct our manufacturing problems and help our exports. I thought this attitude against the healthy Canadian dollar was a Horner hang-up until I heard the Minister of Finance express his views on the same subject. Is it the policy of the government to do all it can to devalue the Canadian dollar even further so as to strengthen the supposed virtues of an 89-cent dollar or is it the government's policy to fight the flight from the Canadian dollar?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I can appreciate that the hon. member may have some difficulty in understanding the meaning of a devalued dollar but if he will refer to my speech during the debate on the Speech from the Throne he will find that I dealt with that matter at some length.

[Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue).]

Mr. Crosbie: The Prime Minister was as clear in his answer today as he was in the speech he made during the debate on the Address, at which time he was pretty opaque. In view of the fact that according to the calculations of the Department of Finance the result of each one-cent decline in the value of the Canadian dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar is the addition to our cost of living of one-tenth of one per cent within a year, and since the cost of living is expected to rise by four per cent within the next year in consequence of the decline in the value of our dollar last year, would the right hon. gentleman explain in what way the lower value of the dollar will help decrease costs in the areas of manufacturing and tourism, to name two examples. In other words, does he not agree that dependence on a declining dollar would be self-defeating?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this at some length but I will begin again and continue until you stop me. The hon. member will understand that the difficulty with industry in Canada, particularly the manufacturing sector, is that it is less productive than the United States manufacturing sector and that our costs are higher. Part of the policy of the government is to make sure our costs become more competitive with those of our main competitors. This is done by offering incentives on the positive side but it is also done by the money markets of the world making a judgment at some point with regard to Canada's high cost structure. When they make such judgment they sell the Canadian dollar short. When the Canadian dollar is worth less than the American dollar it means that our exports cost less to those who buy them, which makes us more competitive with other exporting nations.

Mr. Speaker: The danger of attempting to deal in the question period with matters of general policy ought now to be very evident. The hon. member might wish to put a specific supplementary.

Mr. Crosbie: Would the Prime Minister not agree that there is a grave danger that costs will only decline in the short term? Would he agree with the policy which was followed in 1963 when he and his comrades howled about the Diefendollar? Is this the Trudeaudollar?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not see the relevance of that question.

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INTRODUCE PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES FOR INDUSTRY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Now that the howls of the unruly mob have subsided, I will put a question to the Prime Minister. It is a very specific question and I should like to get a specific answer. The Prime Minister has stated quite correctly on two occasions in this House during the first week in this present session, and again in Fredericton last week, that if this country is to pull itself out of the very serious economic situation in which we find ourselves today we must greatly improve our industrial productivity. Would he explain why there was no mention either in the economic presentation given by the Minister of Finance on October 20 or since then of any plan to introduce productivity incentives for industry to be paid in direct proportion to productivity increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member refers to my contribution in the debate on the Speech from the Throne he will find that I dealt with this question of productivity and indicated, as I believe the Conference Board will indicate next week, that Canadian productivity is closing the gap vis-à-vis the United States; we are closing the gap and government policies must therefore be correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As to the second point: there are presently before the House fiscal measures in the name of the Minister of Finance which will have the effect of increasing productivity. They were debated yesterday and I believe they will be debated again tomorrow. I hope the opposition will understand this and enable us to dispose of these measures as soon as possible.

Mr. Hees: As the measures being discussed this week are only tax measures and have nothing to do with productivity incentives—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Hees: —and since the Prime Minister's only contribution in the debate on the Speech from the Throne was to say over and over again that our productivity was 20 per cent below that of the United States and that steps must be taken to increase it, and since he has agreed with me both publicly and privately that this can only be done by introducing productivity incentives, I ask the right hon. gentleman when he intends to introduce such incentives. Does he propose to sit back and do nothing?

Mr. Trudeau: I think there is probably an honest difference of opinion between these two economists—the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and myself.

Mr. Hees: Just make that one economist, Pierre!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member has just disqualified himself as an economist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I can understand that, because in his comment on my previous answer he said tax measures could not be an incentive to productivity. There is an honest disagreement here because we believe tax measures can be helpful to productivity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Scarborough East.

Mr. Hees: You are taking him off the hook, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Andras: You struck out, George!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR MEETING WITH MINISTER TO DISCUSS IMPRISONMENT OF ANATOLY SHCHARANSKY IN SOVIET UNION

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister agree to meet, as a matter of urgency, with members of the Parliamentary Helsinki Group to hear its plea that the Government of Canada through its delegation in Belgrade and in bilateral discussions with the U.S.S.R. express the extreme concern of Canadians about the imprisonment and impending trial of Anatoly Shcharansky and ask for the release of this man whose only crime was to appeal to the Soviet Union to live up to its pledges with regard to human rights under the Helsinki Agreement?

● (1442)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be more than pleased to meet with the committee which I understand is made up of members of the House from all parties, and if the hon. member and others would like to get together to work out a mutually satisfactory time I would be pleased to do that.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST COMMISSION STUDY PROBLEM OF NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would like to know if the government is now willing to create a parliamentary committee composed of representatives of all political parties with a mandate to explore the issue of the Canadian constitution and national unity, since the Pepin-Robarts Commission has already done the larger part of its job. With regard to such a committee and the discussion of such issues, does the right hon. Prime Minister have in mind to give a role to play to the members of the House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to do better than that. Instead of referring the constitutional issue to a parliamentary committee, I would rather refer it to Parliament. I wish to remind the hon. member the proposal that Her Majesty made in the Speech from the Throne when she announced that during the present session the government intended to propose some constitutional measures. We expect to do that as soon as the major part of the economic measures proposed by the government have been adopted by the House of Commons. We propose then to open the debates on the national unity and constitutional issues and I intend to refer these issues to Parliament at that time.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister sincerely believe that such a committee could sit with similar committees from the provinces and that a joint dialogue with the provinces could enormously help the government in drafting these proposals?

Mr. Trudeau: I wonder if the hon. member has heard what I said. I never mentioned a committee, but I spoke only of the House itself, adding that the government meant to introduce in the House legislation or move a motion concerning the constitution, and that we hope that not only a committee of hon. members, but all elected representatives, hopefully including Progressive Conservative Party members might contribute some concrete ideas from their constitutional philosophy.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM AND MAKING GRANT NON-TAXABLE

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs who I believe is behind the curtains.

An hon. Member: He is hiding.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: The private from Quebec should come out.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of State for Urban Affairs aware that because of the many complexities involved in the insulation program only 2,800 applications have been received, which is only 800 greater than the anticipated daily inflow? In view of this initial lack of response, is the minister prepared to step up the program and extend the eligibility date to 1931 to allow more Canadians to take advantage of the program?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this program is under consideration.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious lack of tax cuts so far available to Canadians, I wonder whether the minister would make an exception and make the available grants tax deductible for those living in Ontario as well as the other provinces, other than Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia? Certainly, this would be an incentive. The program has not been too successful, as the minister will now concede, and I think it has cost $1 of every $3 in administration so far to get the grants to the public.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member. I think it is much too early to come to the conclusion he has made about the merits of the program. It is an excellent program which is just starting, and I think the hon. member should be patient and wait for a little while before drawing conclusions about it.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION FUNDS GENERATED BY OIL PRICE INCREASE BE USED TO REDUCE PRICE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it arises from an answer he gave to my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, in which he said the premier of Saskatchewan had advocated the world price for oil. In view of the fact that Premier Blakeney based that on the proposition that any increase over $8 per barrel would go into a national resources development fund, and in view of the fact the government has not followed that practice but, instead, has made the oil companies the beneficiaries of the price increases with the result that the government's own monitoring figures show that between 1971 and 1976 the cash generation was $13.3 billion but, after tax, profits were $6.7 billion, an increase of over 50 per cent, does the minister not think it clear that if the government is not going to put this extra money into a national resources development fund, it ought to be used to reduce the price to take some of the burden off the Canadian consumers?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is just confirming what I was saying, that the premier of Saskatchewan was, indeed, advocating international prices for oil. Of course, the hon. member is proposing to follow a different course in using the money, but this would not protect the consumer. In fact, since we did not go to the international price, we have been able to keep the price of oil and gas in Canada lower than the international price.

OIL—USE BY COMPANIES OF FUNDS GENERATED BY PRICE INCREASE FOR EXPLORATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister makes light of the point that the money is not going into exploration. The fact of the matter is—

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The fact of the matter is that amount of money which has gone to the companies, according to the government's own monitoring survey, would indicate that whereas the petroleum industry in this country increased its domestic exploration by 104 per cent, it increased its foreign exploration by 568 per cent, an increase more than five times greater than the increase in Canada. In view of that, Mr. Speaker, is it not clear that because the government's program of allowing the companies these very large windfalls has not resulted in increased exploration, the government should be prepared now to cancel the $1 increase per barrel which is to come on January 1 and the additional $1 increase on July 1, which will raise the price to $12.75 per barrel, with an increase in natural gas proportionately; to forgo those increases so as to relieve the consumers of Canada of, according to the commodity price index, an increase of 14.5 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could reply briefly to a very long, very convoluted and, I believe, very misleading question. The point the hon. member seems to be trying to make is that as a result of the price increase, Canadian companies have been using that money to explore abroad. He has quoted some very selective figures. If he looks at the base upon which those figures were made, he will see that even with the increases he mentioned, the funds devoted by Canadian corporations to exploration outside Canada are still a very small fraction of their exploration expenditures. Close to 90 per cent of those expenditures are made in this country.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer is completely deflated by a statement in his own publication "An Energy Strategy for Canada" at page 38 which points out, by the government's own figures—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been engaged in a fascinating debate up to now. However, it is the question period, and I think in his final supplementary he ought to stick to his question.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, based on the government's own statements that over the next five years the industry will have, after taxes and royalties, $3 billion a year, is it not perfectly clear that the oil industry has had a windfall and we are justified on this side of the House in urging that instead of continuing the increase—this largesse to the oil companies—we ought to forgo the $2 per barrel increase which is to come into effect in 1978?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Canadian taxpayers would be better served if we were to receive a lot less rhetoric from the hon. member and a lot more action. The way in which I think he might be able to show some action would be to move expeditiously to get an agreement from his party to move quickly on the bill now placed before this House, the petroleum corporations monitoring act.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING EXPORT OF NATURAL GAS TO UNITED STATES AND USE OF TANKERS

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Rivière-du-Loup-Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Does the government intend to export more gas to the United States in exchange for more trade opportunities for Canadian products? If so, would the government also intend to ask that an equal volume of gas be made availabe for Canada out of U.S. sources? Second, is the minister favourably considering the possibility of transporting Canadian gas from the far north by methane tankers rather than by pipeline, thus permitting us to balance production with Canadian consumption and provide significant incentives to shipyards?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board report, "Reasons for Decision", raised the possibility that it might be in Canadian interests to accelerate the deliveries of natural gas against existing contracts, or to make deliveries against future time swaps for American Prudhoe Bay gas. At no time am I aware that they have suggested we should increase, in any total sense, our gas exports to the United States.

I believe there may well be merits in the predelivery or swap arrangements. I do not believe it has been demonstrated that there will be any merit in increasing in total terms the export of Canadian gas at this time. Of course, it will depend upon whether the United States wants to make an application. So far no application has been made through the National Energy Board, either on a time swap basis or on an accelerated delivery basis.

As to the question of gas reserves from the high Arctic and from the eastern regions of this country, it is very likely that there will be an application placed before the National Energy Board which will seek to receive a certificate of public convenience and necessity for the building of such a pipeline. Also it is possible, it seems to me, from reading and talking to various officials, that we may be looking at a proposal with respect to liquefied natural gas from the high Arctic. Most of these projects—

Mr. Paproski: Order.

Mr. Hees: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL SECURITY

MACKENZIE REPORT—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF UNPUBLISHED PORTIONS OF REPORT

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General, may I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It relates to those parts of the 1969 Mackenzie Royal Commission Report which were not published, for security reasons. Did this unpublished material of the 1969 Mackenzie Commission deal with security forces methods and procedures as they related to such matters as interception of mail, surveillance of individuals and political parties, source 300 and so on?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will remind the House and the hon. member that the published version of the Mackenzie report was published by the Mackenzie commissioners themselves. They decided to edit out those parts, which were very sensitive in terms of security, from the report to the government. Therefore, obviously it would be impossible for me to tell the hon. member what in detail was edited out, because it was edited out for reasons of security by the commissioners themselves and not by the government. From the general tenure of my answer, the hon. member can assume that what was edited out—and the commission said so itself—were those facts, figures and data which had to do with very sensitive security matters, and not with the general question of government responsibility.

MACKENZIE REPORT—FAMILIARITY OF TWO PREVIOUS SOLICITORS GENERAL WITH CONTENTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question has as its basis the fact that I believe there was available to the government the unedited report. Therefore, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister is: does he know whether the present Solicitor General and his two predecessors read either the unedited or unreleased portions of the Mackenzie report in order to be fully briefed on the security matters contained therein, after they were appointed to their respective cabinet offices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know for a fact whether they did or not, but I assume they did. In so far as the question is relevant, I will assure myself that the answer is correct.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF REACTIVATION OF APPLICATION FOR OIL PORT AT KITIMAT AND REFERENCE TO THOMPSON COMMISSION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for the Environment. Yesterday the hon. minister advised the House that he did not know of any intention on the part of the Kitimat consortium to reactivate the application for a Kitimat oil port which was before the National Energy Board. Yet, as the minister knows, immediately after the cessation of the Thompson inquiry into tanker routes and oil generally, there were newspaper reports indicating that the consortium would reapply. Can the minister now tell the House whether, to his knowledge or to the knowledge of the government, there is now going to be a reactivation of that application before the National Energy Board?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, not to my knowledge. Perhaps the question could be more appropriately directed to my colleague, the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[Mr. Jarvis.]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I will put this question to anyone who has the answer.

Mr. Gillies: That is nobody.

Mr. Fraser: Primarily I put the question to the Minister of State for the Environment because this is an environmental problem. Can the minister assure this House that no application before the National Energy Board for an oil port at Kitimat will be approved without the reactivation and the finalization of the Thompson inquiry or a similar inquiry? If anything less than that should happen, then the entire thing has been a wasteful, expensive sham.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there is provision that the Thompson inquiry can be reactivated, but at this point it is hypothetical. As I indicated to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich yesterday, until there is a serious application before the board and we can see what the parameters of that application are, there is not really very much we can say. It is fair to say that the government indicated its intention to hold public inquiries relating to the application for a Kitimat pipeline when it established the Thompson inquiry.

FISHERIES

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEVELOPMENT PLAN FOR SURPLUS STOCKS IN ATLANTIC

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. For the past two months the government of Newfoundland and the government of Nova Scotia have been proposing a fisheries development plan for Atlantic Canada costing an estimated $900 million over the next ten years, or less than $100 million a year. First, I should like to ask the hon. minister if he has seen this plan. If so, in light of the uncertainty which prevails both among the inshore fishermen, as well as the offshore fishermen in Atlantic Canada, over the six species which are presently being given away as surplus stocks, when can we anticipate an announcement from the minister as to his development plan that will enable Canadian fishermen to take advantage of these surplus stocks?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in order to answer the hon. member's question very quickly, I have not seen this plan. I have seen press clippings from the Halifax and Newfoundland newspapers. I am sure the hon. member is very well informed on these matters and would not want to mislead the House. Most of the species which are not taken by Canadian fishermen are in fact species for which there has been very little market in the past and at the present time. I am thinking of species like capelin, round nosed grenadier, silver hake and Argentines, which are not easily commercially exploitable or have not been in the past. Of course, we are making efforts to do this.

Mr. Forrestall: Oh, oh!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): If the hon. member listens, he might learn something about fisheries. A lot of the misrepresentations on this issue assume that we have given away stocks in which Canada is interested. In fact, if the hon. member and all hon. members look at the figures, they will see that Canada's share of traditional fisheries has increased dramatically. We are keeping the fishing effort low for restoration of the stocks, and we are trying to find new markets for those stocks which we have not traditionally used.

● (1502)

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the minister would not want to mislead the House. In truth Canada at the present time does not have any capability whatsoever for catching the six species which were mentioned, namely, round nosed grenadier, silver hake, offshore mackerel, capelin, squid and Argentine. I know that the minister realizes there is a market in Japan for all the squid we can catch. I would like to ask the minister when we can anticipate an announcement by the minister that we will start on a program of building freezer trawlers in order to catch some of the stocks which the minister is now declaring as surplus. Is the minister going to continue to give them away to foreigners forever?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks at the squid market he will discover what I have feared from the very beginning, that a very heavy and dramatic development in the fishery in one season would create market difficulties, and it already has. As for the other species which Canada has not traditionally caught, if we find that the economics of vessels for catching these fish are such that they are justified, of course we will go ahead, but at the moment—and the hon. member knows this—the whole offshore fleet is just now beginning to be economic. That is a fleet which was being disastrously affected by the condition of the stocks. Surely, he is not advocating that we add another disaster to the disasters we have almost had and prevented by our actions since 1974.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FILE ON OPERATION "FEATHERBED"

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister tell the House what knowledge the government has of a security service file labelled "Featherbed", any part the government played in setting up that file and whether it includes details of surveillance of members of the news media and information about one of the highest ranking members of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of it, but I am sure it is misnamed if it applies to the media. I am sure they are not featherbedders. I am surprised the hon. member would repeat this calumny.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I expected a rather flippant answer, as usual. Have attempts been made by anyone in the government to have this file destroyed since the Prime Minister entered the cabinet, and have any of his current remarks on the security situation in Canada been in any way influenced by the existence of the featherbed file?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. member that I have never heard of the file.

An hon. Member: How about "waterbed"?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE USE OF PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN SOUTHERN LEBANON—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the minister has just returned from the Middle East, would he advise the House if any discussions took place regarding the use of a United Nations peacekeeping force in Southern Lebanon and if any commitment was made as to Canadian participation in such an operation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there were a number of discussions, not only with representatives of various governments in the area but also with representatives of the peacekeeping force themselves, about the possibility of some involvement in peacekeeping in southern Lebanon, but these were of a very general nature, and there was no commitment made other than to say that, as we have always done, if there were a very specific proposal put to us, of course we would be glad to deal with it sympathetically.

Because this is the first time I have had an opportunity to give an answer, may I just add that I was pleased to visit with the Canadian forces who are in the peacekeeping service, and I can tell the people that they have every reason to be very proud of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Patterson: In view of the serious situation in Southern Lebanon, is the minister intending to recommend any new initiatives to the United Nations and, if so, what is the nature of those proposals?

Mr. Jamieson: I do not believe any special or new initiative would serve much useful purpose at the moment. The activities presently under way, as I was glad to note and as I am sure all

hon. members were yesterday, may very well bring the Prime Minister of Israel and the President of Egypt together. This, it seems to me, as a further move toward a resumption of the Geneva peacekeeping talks is by far the best thing we ought to, and can, encourage at the present time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED "BUGGING" OF MEMBERS' OFFICES—STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER ON INVESTIGATION

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I have already indicated to the House, I received advice by letter dated November 3, 1977, from the Leader of the Opposition that a discovery had been made by consultants retained by him that a telephone in the offices of the Leader of the Opposition had been altered in such a way as to make it capable of becoming an eavesdropping device. I asked that the equipment be examined by experts from Bell Canada. I received their report yesterday. While there is some disagreement with respect to the manner in which the device could be used, there is agreement that the telephone had at some time been altered so that it could have been capable of use as an eavesdropping device.

I will not attempt to paraphrase the reports, because in our conversation yesterday afternoon the Leader of the Opposition and I agreed that both reports ought to be tabled, and I will do so immediately. We also agreed that I ought forthwith to invite the Ottawa police to extend the investigation in which they are presently involved to include this occurrence, and I am instructing them accordingly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, do I understand that these reports having been tabled, the government could look at them and debate them at some point?

Mr. Speaker: I have attempted to make sufficient copies available because of the level of interest there would be, so that interested members might have an opportunity to examine them. It is difficult for me to see now whether we ought to attempt to discuss these during the course of the investigation or wait until the police investigation is in a more complete state.

However, I do recognize that all hon. members have an interest in the matter, and if there is to be some suggestion that a discussion might take place at any time after hon. members have had an opportunity to examine these reports, I will of course be pleased to hear suggestions as to whether it ought to take place during the course of the investigation or wait until its conclusion.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we will gladly have our House leader discuss the opportunity for a debate now or later with the House leaders of the opposition parties, and subject to Your Honour's decision on timing, we would agree as to when the debate might take place. At the same time, may I ask if Your Honour intends to table the report on the so-called bugging device which was found in the office of the hon. member for Central Nova, so we can debate that as well at the appropriate time?

Mr. Speaker: I had not given that any thought, but not out of any reluctance to table it. The report of the consultants with regard to that occurrence was made available to me, and in turn our preliminary investigative report was made available by me to the hon. member for Central Nova. Both reports have been turned over to the police. I would think there would likely be no objection to tabling them in the same manner as we have just adopted. The hon. member for Central Nova is here and is indicating that he has no objection, so perhaps as soon as it is reasonably possible to do so, we will arrange to table the sets of documents with respect to that matter as well.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, because of the interest involved, I wonder if it would be in order to have the reports attached as an appendix to today's Hansard, since I am sure that thousands of people would want to read them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Neither document tabled today is overly lengthy. I think the report enclosed in the letter of the Leader of the Opposition is about three pages in length, as is the one from the Bell Canada experts. Perhaps if there is a disposition in the House, it would be agreed and now ordered that these documents be printed in Hansard as if they had been read.

● (1512)

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For reports referred to, see appendices.]

Mr. Hugh Poulin (Ottawa Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In order that all eventualities may be examined, I wonder if in your instructions to the Ottawa police Your Honour could also instruct them to continue their investigation including section 128 of the Criminal Code. The general tenor of it is to cause an investigation with respect to public mischief. We should get all the investigative matters taken care of by the Ottawa city police while they are investigating to see whether a criminal offence has been committed. If there has not, there may well be an offence under section 128, public mischief. I would suggest that Your Honour so advise the city police—

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very responsible way in which you have handled this investigation, the intervention of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre is an abuse of the privileges of this House. It is very interesting, if you review the history of this matter, that the hon. member himself made a suggestion some time ago that this investigation should be put into the hands of the Ottawa police. Now, by suggesting there is some doubt on the extent of their investigation, he is casting doubt on the ability of the Ottawa police to conduct the investigation.

I must say, although I have not said so before on the record, that I hope the House—I can say that this is the case on this side of the House—is content with the Ottawa police carrying out the investigation. We are content, as well, with the way in which Your Honour has proceeded with respect to this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have indicated on previous occasions the difficulty of attempting to make interventions in this manner during the course of the investigation. It may be necessary to do so, but in light of the suggestion a short time ago by the Prime Minister that discussions be held on whether or not an appropriate time should be set aside soon for discussion of this matter, perhaps hon. members will agree that any further discussion on it ought to wait until those discussions take place.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARTIN—COMMENTS MADE IN STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, flowing from your ruling yesterday, relating to certain proceedings that took place this morning in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts involving some comments made at that time by my hon. colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham. I think it has been evident for some time that there has been concern within that committee with respect to certain matters relating to the sale of nuclear reactors and agents' fees associated therewith. This has been going on for a year or more. I should like to quote—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I ought to remind the hon. member that he can reserve his right to argue this matter further, but the House has always made a practice of never taking into account proceedings in the standing committees until they are reported to the House. The simple reason for this is that the committees are deemed to be masters of their own procedures. I think it is felt, therefore, with great wisdom, that the committees ought themselves to attempt to iron out any procedural difficulties they may have.

Members are able to take steps within the committee which would form part of the report that would be reported back to the House and would be the basis for some action at that time. It is a very dangerous precedent for the Chair to attempt to rule on activities that have taken place in committee, or for the House to direct its attention to events that have taken place in committees prior to those events being reported in the usual way by the committees. Unless there is some clear reason for doing so now, which the hon. member could explain to me at the outset, I would not want to entertain a question of privilege of the type he is now raising.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I would be very pleased to quote immediately the extract in question and leave it in your good hands as to whether a question of privilege exists.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member misunderstands me. I am not concerned about what in fact happened. I am concerned about the hon. member being able to explain to me that, no matter what happened, the House ought to direct its attention to events in committees before those events are reported. I would need some persuasion on that point before I would ever look at or hear what took place.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I would simply say, in view of the importance of your ruling yesterday, that it seems to me we are breaking new ground. I feel that before committees move any further we should have some clear ideas of the application of the ruling in this House to the committees.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will want to consult the record. I did make, I hope, some elucidating remarks about that ruling at the outset of today's session. With respect to the content of motions and practices related to motions, perhaps the hon. member might want to take an opportunity—I have confronted him with an argument that I am sure he had not prepared for today—to examine my remarks today, and also examine the precedents in respect of taking into account proceedings of committees before they are reported. After examining both of those, if the hon. member still has a question that he wishes to raise, of course I will respect his right to raise it.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order which refers to the fact that earlier this afternoon Your Honour decided differently than you did yesterday on the question of privilege raised by the right hon. Prime Minister with regard to the motion under Standing Order 43 that was put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I should like to bring it to Your Honour's attention that as the right hon. Prime Minister apologized to the House yesterday for his comments—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Spadina is making an assumption that is not correct. I was not in any way reopening a decision I took yesterday, and I thought I was at great pains to set that on the record today. As a result of checking yesterday's Hansard and re-examining the comment that was put forward, which I had set aside, by the right hon. Prime Minister yesterday, I did indicate that perhaps, in the circumstances, I had moved quickly in setting that aside and other considerations might have been taken into account, which I set on the record. I did that in order to make sure the House had proper guidance for future events. It was not in any way an attempt to second-guess my own decision of yesterday. I have no intention or desire of doing that at all.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree with Your Honour that it would be extremely unwise to second-guess oneself the next day. I thought the right hon. member for Prince Albert, since he professes such great respect for this House, and now that he knows what the rules are, would withdraw his scurrilous and unparliamentary language that he—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have noticed in the last hour or so that government members have howled down members of the opposition. I do not intend to be howled down by anybody.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, I must say that I apologize for the fact that over the years I have had that regard for the Prime Minister whose petulance recently has indicated that something has gone wrong with him.

Mr. Trudeau: Not very good. No guts.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF MINISTERS TO ACCEPT RESPONSIBILITY FOR METHODS USED BY SECURITY FORCES

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

—That this House has no confidence in the competence or desire of this government to follow the principle of ministerial responsibility, particularly as it applies to the direction of and methods used by the government security forces, and deeply regrets its unwillingness to allow a committee of this House to study the role of Ministers in security operations.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members will recall that, pursuant to Standing Order 32, not later than 10.15 this evening every motion necessary to dispose of these proceedings shall be put forthwith, in accordance with Standing Order 58(9).

● (1522)

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I might say, before beginning my remarks, that I am very pleased to have placed on the record of the House of Commons and on the table of the House the documents referred to by Your Honour immediately prior to the commencement of this debate. I must also say that I welcome the suggestion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that there be a debate on these matters after the requisite investigations by the police of the city of Ottawa are carried out. We certainly look forward to that. Indeed, we think there are a number of matters which should be debated—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the Leader of the Opposition is taking the right moment to raise these points.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition will agree with me that this is an opposition day. We have a motion in front of us which has nothing to do with the inquiry which is to be held. If he does open the debate to the point put forward by the Speaker of the House, I think it goes beyond the administration of the government. As I read the motion in front of me, it concerns the authority and the will of the government to control security in this country, not necessarily control the House of Commons and the workings of the House of Commons.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would, of course, never dispute your ruling in this matter. I was simply, as is a well-established custom in this House, warming up to my remarks.

Mrs. Holt: It does take a while.

Mr. Clark: I am told by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) that it takes a while. It has certainly taken her some while.

I think it appropriate, as we begin this debate on the motion now before the House of Commons, to note the quite surprising change in atmosphere evident today on the government side, particularly after the Prime Minister of Canada was forced, with his customary graciousness, to withdraw remarks which he made yesterday. I think it is clear to us all how painful it is for the Prime Minister to have to admit that he was wrong. I think it would be quite appropriate for me to say, on this first anniversary of the election in the province of Quebec of a government formed by a party which the Prime Minister declared dead, that the Prime Minister had better get used to the pain of being wrong.

As Your Honour knows, this is the first allotted day in this new session, and there are a number of matters which we on this side of the House could have chosen to raise in this debate. Current economic problems are serious and they show no sign of improving under the policies of this government. We have very serious problems in regard to national unity in this country, problems which were dramatized one year ago today by the election of the Parti Québécois government, as well as problems regarding which there has been a signal lack of positive response or initiative by the government of Canada in the intervening years.

All of these, sir, are very important questions which could have commanded our attention on this day, but we have decided that it is of utmost importance for this parliament to deal today with the fundamental question of ministerial responsibility and with the refusal of ministers on the other side of this House to accept their responsibility in matters relating to the national security activities of the government of Canada.

I raised this matter in an adjournment debate a week ago. My colleague, the leader of the New Democratic Party, attempted to raise a similar matter yesterday, on privilege. It is a matter which is of fundamental importance to the House. I will not repeat the number of learned authorities which have been cited previously, because I think that the House of Commons accepts the practice of parliament both in the past and today that a minister cannot blame his officials when things go wrong, that the people who are responsible are the ministers of the Crown, not their officials.

We raise this point, Mr. Speaker, because if we destroy that principle of ministerial responsibility we destroy the system of government which we have in this country. Our system says that the people of Canada elect members of parliament. Some members of parliament become members of the government, ministers of the Crown, but they answer to the rest of us for all—I emphasize the word "all"—the actions of the government.

The signal fact which has become clear in these last days is that these ministers will not answer for the actions of their government when those actions have been in violation of the law and practice of this country. I remind the House of what has gone on in the last couple of weeks. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), the man who was solicitor general of Canada at the time of the break-in in 1973, sat silent in his place throughout the long debate when this matter was first raised under special order of this House.

In the case of the APLQ break-in, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), the solicitor general of that day, deliberately declined to ask questions which he should have asked and which he knew he should have asked, because he wanted to remain technically ignorant of matters which he had a responsibility to know about. The present Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) admits that he has regular briefings, but he never seems to be told anything. We do not know, of course, what kind of questions the minister asks, and we might never know in this parliament because the cabinet refuses to tell the House of Commons anything.

Now, sir, in a very ominous development the government has prepared the way to give the royal commission of inquiry only a limited story, a partial story, as to the role of ministers in this affair. As reported at page 684 of Hansard, when answering my questions about the nature of testimony concerning the role of ministers to be given to the McDonald royal commission of inquiry, the Prime Minister had this to say:

—there may be some areas which must be kept secret and we would be guided by the law officers of the Crown in that regard.

Two things are important here, Mr. Speaker. One minor matter, except that it falls into the pattern, is that the government itself is not even accepting the responsibility of saying what should be secret and what should not be secret. It is passing that responsibility on to public servants so that the government can blame them if they are found out to be wrong. But what is more ominous, because it raises questions about the adequacy of the evidence before the McDonald royal commission, is that the government of Canada is preparing the way to limit the testimony which it gives concerning the role of ministers of the Crown in all these activities.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, in our system ministers have a larger duty than just to ask occasional questions at briefings. Ministers have a duty to oversee the general work of their departments. This matter has been debated before, so I will quote my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), who in 1969, when the Mackenzie report was tabled in the House, had this to say:

It would be completely unacceptable for the House to have the security operations of this country put beyond the knowledge of the Prime Minister or the responsible minister of the government.

That makes clear the fact that ministers have an obligation to ensure that they know what is going on. The Prime Minister, as usual, has tried to draw attention away from that responsibility of his ministers. On November 2, as reported at page 563 of Hansard, he pretended, when we asked him questions about general supervision of what the security service was doing, that he was being asked to begin monitoring the day to day operations of the police, asking them about their information, how they got it and who they got it from. Well, sir, no one has asked that. No one would. But the point is that there is a lot of room between reading every file and knowing nothing at all.

● (1532)

As the distinguished journalist, Mr. W. A. Wilson, has pointed out, the present Solicitor General has apparently been limiting his own questions to security officials by the form in which he puts them. I quote Mr. Wilson:

By the form of his questions stipulating acts that "ought to be brought to my attention," Mr. Fox left it to the RCMP to decide what he should know.

They may have been guilty of very bad judgment in saying no, but that is not the same thing as lying to their minister.

The point is of great importance because, according to his own statements, Mr. Fox has been doing exactly what most of his predecessors seem to have done: he has been leaving the vital decision to the force and its security service.

Mr. Wilson goes on to reach this conclusion:

Ministers have been derelict in their duty to supervise.

That is a conclusion which all fair-minded Canadians would share.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As I was reading that quotation I heard the Solicitor General shout across the House, "Was Mr. Wilson there? Was he in at the briefings?" No, he was not there. Neither was any member of this House of Commons there. Neither do any of us know what went on in those briefings between the minister and security officials; and the minister himself is certainly not going to tell us. He says, "If anybody has any business to know about that, it is the McDonald commission," and he will tell them a partial story because he has been given a cover to tell them a partial story by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is particularly alarming about this new practice is that when ministers do not accept responsibility themselves, then, sir, they go on and blame their civil servants. They do it directly or they do it implicitly. In this case, the impression is conveyed that the only culprits are the civil servants who actually broke the law, or else the civil servants who did not take the initiative to brief ministers, including ministers—for example, the Minister of Supply and Services who deliberately asked limited questions or in the case of ministers who asked no questions at all.

The line the government is putting out is that the people in the field are the culprits, the people who carried out the policy. But, sir, what about the ministers who set the policy? What about the ministers who have a duty to supervise policy? In our system they, too, are responsible. Indeed, they, above all, are responsible for what is done by the public servants under their direction. But this government is doing everything it can to protect the ministers and to blame the civil servants—whether those civil servants are Mounties, members of the security service or whatever.

What must alarm this House, what threatens the very basis of our system of responsible government, is that this is not the first time ministers of this government have blamed civil servants in order to escape responsibility themselves. In the case of the Lockheed affair, the government of Canada accepted millions of dollars of obligations on the basis that it had an oral agreement with Lockheed that would provide interim financing. The minister responsible for drafting the contract complained that one public servant did not reveal that it was simply an oral agreement. He blamed it on the public servant and, in so doing, seemed to suggest that this person, this public servant, stood between the minister and knowledge of: first, what was going on in an interdepartmental task force; second, what was going on in the head of his colleague, the then minister of national defence; and third, what was going on in the entire defence structure of the government of Canada. That was all the fault of one civil servant: it was not the minister's fault, of course!

We saw it again in the case of Atomic Energy of Canada where the minister responsible ducked, ran and tried to leave responsibility fully with civil servants. We saw in the Rudnicki affair. I remind the House that Mr. Rudnicki was fired from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for the stated reason of showing a cabinet document to the Native Council of Canada, the group for whom he was supposed to be working. He was finally exonerated by the courts after a trial which indicated that the confusion about the document was the fault of his superiors. But the victim was the civil servant on the scene.

Now, sir, now it is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who are being blamed for the actions of this government.

An hon. Member: The government is shameless.

Mr. Clark: This government has adopted the deliberate strategy throughout the last couple of weeks that whenever questions are raised about the role of ministers or, particularly, about the role of the security service, it pretends those questions are an attack on the RCMP. It is important, once again, to make the distinction clear between the security service and the ordinary member of the RCMP. The security service is run by a director-general who does not come from the force and who has the authority to report directly to the Prime Minister of Canada and to the Solicitor General of Canada. There is a very real question as to whether the actions of the security service are within the control of the Commissioner of the RCMP.

I want to make it clear, sir, because I think it is very important to emphasize that this mechanism, this security service is put into the RCMP under a director-general who is controllable in all matters by the Commissioner of the RCMP. That mechanism was established by this government. The security service was not the choice of the police, but the choice of this government. The security service is probably not controllable by the police, but it is certainly controllable by this government, particularly by the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The point stands and remains that whatever the agency, these are civil servants who are acting under the direction of the government of Canada. The illegal actions we have heard about in the last several weeks did not just happen. They were not the result of a wild night on the town. They were done because civil servants thought they had orders to do them.

In his remarks on October 28 in this House, the Solicitor General referred to what he called the "political and social climate prevailing in 1973". I think it would be very worth while to examine that climate. Let us remember, sir, that we are speaking of 1973—not 1970. In the fall of 1970, the government believed there was a state of what was called at the time "apprehended insurrection" in the country. That view, presumably, led the government to give one set of orders to security officers which had to do with the FLQ. But that climate had changed markedly between the fall of 1970 and January of 1973. The Solicitor General might not think so, but his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), stated the reality which most Canadians accept when she said at Carleton University with reference to that time, January, 1973:

> There is no way somebody is going to tell me that as a Quebecker there was a state of national emergency somewhere in Quebec and some threats to God knows what. I never perceived anything like that.

The point is this: just as she did not perceive any unusual political climate at that time, neither did anybody else. The question is whether the government of Canada, the political minister who had sounded the alert in the fall of 1970, did their duty and changed their policy instructions to the security service in the time between the October crisis and the break-in in January, 1973. Let there be no mistake about this: the ministers of the Crown had a duty to tell the security service that the mandate had changed because the climate had changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It appears the ministers did not perform that duty, so the security service acted on the existing instructions. Now the members of that security service are being left alone to carry the consequences. When he first revealed what he thought was then the latest series of illegalities, the Solicitor General talked about the dilemma that exists in a free society, the dilemma of imbalance between the right to know and the need for secrecy involved in any kind of security activities. That is a very genuine and important dilemma. It is one I would welcome the opportunity to have this House discuss.

We in this House of Commons have two more immediate obligations. The first is an obligation to find out what went wrong, particularly since we are the group to whom ministers of the Crown are responsible. We have a duty and an obligation to find out what was the role of the ministers, what did they do, what did they know, what questions should they have asked that they did not ask? The second obligation is to ensure that some means is established to guarantee that in the future security activities of the government of Canada are bound and guided by policy directions which come ultimately from duly elected persons.

Concerning the first obligation, we need a means to ensure that information about the role of ministers is not covered up or hidden away. The government argues that the McDonald royal commission will inquire into that question. We believe their terms of reference will not allow the kind of inquiry that is required into the role of ministers. We believe there is not a mandatory requirement in those terms of reference to require the McDonald royal commission to make that kind of inquiry into the role of ministers of the Crown. Indeed, it is informative to look at the name of that inquiry: as I recall, it is called a commission of inquiry into certain activities of the RCMP, not a commission into the role of ministers of the Crown.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The minister has frequently said that the terms of reference are broad enough now. If he is so sure of that, why does he not take the extra step and add the extra term of reference that we on this side of the House have proposed several times, so there will be no doubt about the adequacy of the terms of reference. We need to have spelled out beyond any question the obligation, not just the right, of that royal commission to look explicitly into the question of ministerial responsibility. Given the length of time this study will take, the conditions that were attached to it and the delay before a report, we do not think a royal commission is an appropriate vehicle for a matter that concerns parliament as centrally as the question of ministerial responsibility.

For that reason we have proposed a better way to get at the evidence as to what was the role of ministers. We want to have a special committee established in this House of Commons, a committee with unusual power to call evidence, to subpoena witnesses and to carry on research. We think it should be chaired by a member of the opposition.

An hon. Member: Ha, ha!

Mr. Clark: Someone on the government side laughs. We think it very important that this kind of inquiry should not be suspect. The best way to ensure that it is not suspect is that it be chaired by someone who is absolutely independent of the ministers whose conduct is being investigated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I make it quite clear that while we want someone from the opposition side, we do not insist that it be a member of the official opposition. I have not discussed the matter with the hon. member, but I say to this House that if a committee of that kind, with those powers and with that mandate, is established we would be delighted if it were chaired by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We think he would be an outstanding chairman for that kind of committee. A committee with that kind of power, looking into the question of ministerial responsibility, should also have on its agenda the power to recommend means by which we can assure some right to oversee security policy that goes beyond the political party in office at this time. There are ample models to draw from. In Britain there is a regular practice of briefing members of the opposition. In the United States there are congressional oversight committees which meet in confidence. Either alternative is better than the situation we have today in this country. I think all members would agree that discussion as to the way parliament will carry out its ultimate responsibility regarding security matters would better begin here, in this House, than in some royal commission.

There has been no action on these matters. I received a one-time offer from the Prime Minister to have one briefing on some aspects of security matters. That was in response to letters that I wrote. There is no system in place, and there has never been. There has been no willingness that ministers who set policy are responsible when things go wrong or when their supervision fails. Since this session of parliament commenced, the government has had ample opportunity to reveal the facts and to begin the process of establishing more effective means to oversee security activities. Instead, they have tried to cover up. That is the reason why today we have to move this motion, expressing lack of confidence in the way the government has conducted its affairs and suggesting a better way for it to proceed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: For the past several days the country has been preoccupied with matters that are undoubtedly serious. There have been stories of barns being burned, laws being broken by agencies pledged to uphold the law, and ministers not knowing or not saying what was going on. That has been in the headlines. All of that is important. Equally serious for this country, for our future and for the way we govern ourselves, has been the breaking down of the basis of the system of responsible government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: In our system, the government must accept responsibility. Today, and too frequently in the past, the ministers of this government have refused to accept responsibility. Instead, they blame somebody else. Parliament must have the power and the information with which to hold ministers accountable. Today, because of the refusal to come clean by ministers on the other side, we do not have that kind of information.

Some surprising and troubling things have happened to parliament in the last decade. Ten years ago we in this House had the power to control spending by the government of Canada. In the years in which this government has been in office, this House of Commons has lost that power to control spending. Throughout the life of this government there has been a refusal to add to the powers of private members, to add to the powers of committees and to make this place more effective. Often, ironically, that refusal has been defended by some reference to ministerial responsibility.

We have had further evidence in the past few weeks that the fundamental principle of a parliamentary system, the principle that ministers are responsible for the actions of their departments, is being broken down gradually, steadily and—in this case, sadly—dramatically. Ministerial responsibility must be restored. If the government will not restore it, parliament has an obligation to do what it can to restore it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: An inquiry by the parliament of Canada into this question is of fundamental importance to the future of our system. If the government of Canada refuses to allow the parliament of Canada to conduct that kind of inquiry in order to ensure that there is again a system of responsible government in Canada, it has no right to the confidence of parliament and no right to the confidence of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this motion. It is a serious motion, one that goes to the root of the problem in a way that the government, through its actions since the opening of parliament, has completely failed to do. I want to discuss two aspects of the motion. The first and most important one is ministerial responsibility which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has emphasized and which I raised in a question of privilege yesterday. The other aspect that I will be speaking on will be expressed concretely in the form of an amendment to the motion. That pertains to the important question of the rule of law.

● (1552)

On the question of ministerial accountability I shall take only a minute or so because I do not wish to repeat arguments I made in the House yesterday, nor do I wish to repeat some of the points the Leader of the Opposition made so well today. The people who are ultimately responsible for what takes place in the ministry of the Solicitor General, that of Justice, or that of Health and Welfare, are not civil servants, whether deputy ministers or the lowest ranking clerks in the department. The people who are responsible, in a parliamentary democracy, are the ministers.

There is one group of people today which has forgotten that principle in a way which puts all others to shame by comparison. I refer to the cabinet. I quoted yesterday examples from Jennings and from Dawson, two constitutional authorities—and I could add others—pointing out that the notion of ministerial responsibility does not mean a minister needs to have a day to day knowledge of what is going on in every section of his department. What it does mean is that he assumes responsibility for broad policy and the orientation of the law as administered by the department and that, in particular, when something goes wrong he should be ready to correct it promptly. This is the attitude which has been totally absent from the performance of the government and, in particular, totally absent from the performance of three successive solicitors general.

As I say, I do not intend to deal with this aspect at any length because it has been already discussed by the Leader of the Opposition and because I raised it in the House yesterday. Nevertheless, it is something which is essential to parliamentary democracy, and there has been complete failure on the part of the government, and particularly on the part of the Solicitor General, to recognize its responsibility in this area.

I wish to deal today with a broader question as one living, not in the thirties in Germany or in the seventies in Russia but as a Canadian who lives in a society which is basically free, overwhelmingly democratic, overwhelmingly civil libertarian. I address myself this afternoon to the response made by the government when it learned that there had been wrongdoing on the part of a minority in the RCMP and elsewhere in the security services. When I sit back and think of what happened in the United States a couple of years ago, I am scandalized by the response of this government.

Hon. members will recall that the Watergate inquiry, which ultimately led to the resignation of a president, came about because of revelations of spying upon a political party—one political party spying on another. At the time the issue was raised by Senator McGovern, a presidential candidate, the affair was dismissed as having little importance. Indeed, the reaction in the United States was not dissimilar to the reaction here in Canada to the issue we are presently discussing. On one hand, there was a tendency to dismiss it as a trifling thing, if it occurred, and on the other there was reluctance to criticize because of the supposed sanctity of the entities involved. In the United States, for example, people were asking themselves: How is it conceivable that the presidency itself could have allowed such a thing to occur, or actively direct it?

Here, in Canada, I would remind hon. members it has not simply been a case of one political party monitoring another. What we have before us is evidence of the commission of a number of crimes—crimes committed by the RCMP, I regret to say, involving the burning of property, the theft of property, spying illegally upon a political party, and the opening of mail which is categorically forbidden under the Post Office Act. We have learned, too, of "Operation 300," an illegal operation with respect to which the minister said the other day the allegations were substantially correct. These revelations in 1977 in Canada came on top of disclosures that certain security forces or branches of the RCMP or other security forces were spying on Canadian farmers in the National Farmers Union, spying on members of my political party, spying on all kinds of innocent Canadians democratically exercising their rights in a free society.

What has been the response of the government of Canada that dares to call itself Liberal? What has been its reaction to these revelations about burning, about theft, about spying on farmers, trade unionists and political opponents? Have we heard voices from small "l" liberals in the party which history links with the name of John Stuart Mill, saying, "This has got to stop. We are administratively responsible for a number of these things because they have come about through our failure to prevent them"? Did members opposite acknowledge their responsibility and take prompt action to put a categorical stop to it? What have they done? That is the question I want to deal with.

Mr. Speaker, the response has been a debasement of Canadian politics. You would have to go back a long way in Canadian history to see a worse one. First, we got misleading comparisons and phony information provided by a number of ministers. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) used the wonderful analogy that sometimes it is necessary to break the law; that on occasion one had to drive at 80 miles an hour to catch a thief. Then we heard the "spirit of the times" argument—another gem! How John Stuart Mill would have laughed to have heard this argument seriously put forward.

It was left to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to blurt out the truth in the course of an address to students at Carleton University—that in 1973 the spirit of the times was anything but violent; that it was certainly not an atmosphere which would have justified the breaking of the law if, indeed, that is ever justified. Another tactic of the government, arguments having failed, was to attack the opposition. The Conservative party and my own party were attacked for raising questions about civil liberties. We were attacked for suggesting that criminal wrongdoing by the police was every bit as wrong as criminal wrongdoing by other citizens. We were criticized for having the audacity to suggest that it was the government itself which was finally responsible for ensuring that the police obey the law like everyone else.

We heard a perfect example of that attitude in the speech given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) to his Liberal cohorts in Vancouver over the weekend. He foamed at the mouth, I am sure, in his castigation of the terrible opposition parties who had dared to criticize the failure of the government; and he introduced a red herring by saying we had been critical of the RCMP. He knows, if he is honest, that we have been critical, on this side of the House, of the complete failure of his government to make sure the RCMP performs correctly.

There was a third device used by this great Liberal government, and that was the suggestion that such illegalities or moral wrongdoings were really carried out in the context of dealing with terrorists. Time after time we heard statements from a variety of ministers that they had to deal with violent groups in society. Extremism in defence of liberty is no vice, according to this government. This is wrong, in terms of their factual suggestions.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, rhetorically: Is the New Democratic Party a party committed to violence, and does it warrant spying upon? Is the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the largest union in Canada, representing working people in every community across the land, the kind of institution that should be spied upon? Is the National Farmers Union of Canada, representative of farmers in half a dozen provinces, the kind of institution that should be spied upon? Is the Quebec Federation of Labour, an institution organized by workers to work for the benefit of the working people in the province of Quebec, the kind of institution that should be spied upon?

An hon. Member: Or members of parliament?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, to ask the question is to answer it. We have been concerned about the question of liberty and the rule of law. We have been concerned overwhelmingly over questions regarding the rights of free institutions, free parties, free movements and the free citizens' groups to go on about their lives unmolested by the police. Again the Liberal government, which dares to call itself liberal, has tried consistently to say that the issues we have raised always have to be put in some kind of context dealing with a terrorist group. That is a phony and dishonest approach.

Another approach—and I will be very brief with this—involves the buffoonery of the Prime Minister which reached its low point in recent days when he had the audacity to suggest that the official opposition planted some kind of bugging device upon itself. He did it off the top of his head, I am sure, in his characteristically frivolous and irresponsible manner in terms of dealing with a serious issue.

The most serious concern I have with the approach of the government in this whole episode, apart from the question of ministerial responsibility, has regard to the insidious suggestion made by no fewer than three ministers—the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General and the Prime Minister—day after day in this House and outside, that the end justifies the means. We heard from the minister of multiculturalism yesterday that gem of new reasoning, that gem of new legal theory, when he said that sometimes the rule of reason has to replace the rule of law. God forbid, particularly if it is his rule of reason! The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) was shaking his head when I said that.

An hon. Member: I could hear it from here.

Mr. Broadbent: I want to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister with the rattling head there who was correcting me yesterday—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: You will have your chance in just a minute. Do not be a cry baby. I quote for the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker, that nice, rhetorical reply that came to the opposition the other day when a question was raised about freedom, and so on. He said, and I quote him, "No, the bottom line is security". Let me suggest to the minister that if he were really a Liberal he would not give us, and he should really appreciate this, that beautiful Stalinist argument.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I have been dealing today with correspondence from very serious people in the Soviet Union who have been put down by their government, that government which has refused to live up to the Helsinki agreement. As everyone knows, the reason the Soviet Union puts down its dissidents—

An hon. Member: That's not true.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't give me that rubbish. It shows how little you know about that as well. Not only does the member know nothing about liberalism, but he knows nothing about socialism. I say quite seriously that the reason the Soviet Union does not permit the kind of dissidents—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: You will get the chance to make your speech. The reason the Soviet Union takes away liberties from decent citizens, which we take for granted here, is that the bottom line there is security. That is exactly the line used in every totalitarian society throughout the world. I suggest that for a Liberal to get up in the House of Commons and say that the bottom line is security, instead of saying that the bottom line is liberty, which is what they should be saying, is to perform a profound disservice to everything Liberalism stands for and everything parliamentary government stands for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: This attitude toward law, this callous indifference to the principle of the rule of law, reached its high point last Wednesday in Halifax when the Prime Minister said—and two reporters are prepared to swear to it—that the action taken by the RCMP in the province of Quebec in burning a barn in clear violation of the law was something with which he agreed. He said that in the presence of two reporters who stood right beside him.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is that the kind of reasoning we should be getting at this period of crisis—and it is a crisis in terms of the supremacy of law and ministerial accountability? Is that the kind of leadership we should be getting from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice? Of course it is not. The irony is that it is precisely the kind of reasoning—the noble ends—that we are getting from ministers. The Solicitor General said that you have to look at the purposes of the people who are breaking the law. He said that with reference to the opening of mail. They did not know it was wrong, so it was permitted. Every violent group in Canada, in West Germany and in Ireland today says their purposes are noble and that that justifies breaking the law.

Let me suggest that when the Solicitor General, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister travel around the country saying that as long as the purposes are acceptable, and as long as the long range goals are good, or to use the words of the minister of multiculturalism—

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to interrupt the speech of the hon. member, but I challenge him to put on the record any such statement of mine.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, I will do it when I get there.

Mr. Basford: Put it on the record.

Mr. Broadbent: Let me reply to the minister. The Minister of Justice is a master of innuendo. He does not say it is proper to break the law; in fact, he carefully couches nice, low-key phrases which do not get cheers at Liberal conventions. He always says, "Oh, yes; of course, we believe in the rule of law". Immediately prior to that—this is when 7,000 Liberals cheered the minister, and that must have been all the Liberals in British Columbia—he was attacking the opposition for upholding the principle of the rule of law; and he knows that as well as anyone.

Mr. Basford: You are wrong, and you know you are wrong.

Mr. Broadbent: The serious point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that in addition to this government's failure to act according to parliamentary precepts of ministerial responsibility which go back at least 100 years, the most profound disservice this government has done, a disservice in the classical tradition of liberalism, is the complete undermining, in terms of leadership at this time, of the importance of the supremacy of law in our society. What this government has invoked is the classical argument about terrorists, whether at home or in other countries, and it may live to regret that in the province of Quebec. I suggest that once you start invoking the principle, in a democratic society, that your ends justify the breaking of the law, you are on a very slippery road to complete undermining of the law.

● (1612)

Mr. Fox: No one said that. Get your quotes straight.

Mr. Broadbent: Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, immediately after the word "forces", the following words:

"and as it pertains to the principle of the rule of law".

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to rebut some of the things said by the hon.

leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). He went to great pains to quote statements which are said to have been made on this side of the House, particularly something to the effect that the end justifies the means. If those statements had been made, perhaps he would have a case. He set up his own wooden horse and then proceeded to knock it down. I should like to refer to the statement I made in the House in June, 1977, which reads in part as follows:

First of all, I cannot stress too highly that in a democratic society like ours, the rule of law is and must be paramount. It is the vital force without which our basic liberties run the risk of becoming empty slogans. No threat to such liberties can justify, in any way, and even with the best of intentions, the use of illegal means to protect these basic rights. Clearly, there can be no compromise in this regard; it is upon this premise that the integrity and survival of our democratic institutions and our fundamental liberties are based. If the law is not adequate to handle such dangers as threaten our liberties and our institutions, then the answer does not lie in breaking the law, but rather in changing it so that it can be effective in responding to such threats to society.

Changing the law in this country refers to the democratic way of changing the law by bringing proposals before parliament and having them studied in depth by parliamentary committees, with full debate. While the rule of law was paramount, I asked Canadians throughout the land not to be too harsh in their judgment of some of the people who carried out some of these actions. It was not because they can be justified, but to a certain extent these people have explanations for the way they acted.

Mr. Fox: I let Canadians judge as to what the situation should be. The matter has been referred to the royal commission. I asked the RCMP to give me a couple of indications of some of the illegal acts which have been carried out. I should like to give one example in connection with the mail. I should like to bring this to the attention of the House since it is a situation which is now being referred to the royal commission. In 1976 the RCMP obtained information on the identity of a member of the Japanese red army.

An hon. Member: Here we go.

Mr. Fox: Yes, here we go. It is important to note some of these things. That is why I indicated to the House that we ought not to be too quick in jumping to conclusions as to why these people acted. I should like hon. members to listen to the example of one case which I want to leave with them.

Mr. Gillies: Why didn't you bring in legislation to make it legal?

Mr. Fox: I should like to put the hon. member to a test in the not too distant future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: The letter was identified as being addressed to a Canadian in this country. Through the mail-opening devices which have been described in parliament, the RCMP obtained access to it. As a result of this interception they were able to identify someone who was a member of the Japanese red army.

He was arrested at the border and deported to Japan. Subsequently, in Japan, he was convicted of bombing. He was one of the members of the Japanese red army whose release was demanded in the later plane hijacking by the Japanese red army. We can say it was not justified, that it was illegal; but I should like to bring this to the attention of the House as an example to indicate that we should not be too, too harsh in commenting on the actions of these people.

Mr. Broadbent: Right back to Nixon.

An hon. Member: The end justifies the means.

Mr. Fox: I am not saying the end justifies the means. I am indicating to hon. members that the people involved in some of these illegalities did so—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: Perhaps hon. members feel that they should not have tried to obtain information as well as they could on a possible member of the Japanese red army.

Mr. Broadbent: Within the law.

Mr. Orlikow: Why didn't you change the law?

Mr. Fox: I am pleased to hear that hon. members opposite now agree with the statement I made in June of this year, when I said:

If the law is not adequate to handle such dangers as threaten our liberties and our institutions, then the answer does not lie in breaking the law, but rather in changing it so that it can be effective in responding to such threats to society.

Mr. Gilbert: This is November, not June.

Mr. Nystrom: That was five months ago.

Mr. Fox: I am pleased to hear that hon. members agree with all the statements made by myself, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that if the law is not adequate it should be changed along with—

Mr. Broadbent: Don't get carried away, Francis.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would invite hon. members to allow the Chair to hear what the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) is saying. This is a very important debate. Anything said might upset members, but I want to make sure I hear everything. Interventions from across the floor at the other end of this chamber are making it very, very difficult for the Chair to hear what is being said.

Mr. Gilbert: This fellow is very argumentative, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fox: Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is quite a lot of talk about these inequalities and some people say heads should roll. When I explained some of these operations to the House, I underlined that some of them were dating back to an almost immemorial period in the history of the RCMP. In some cases, operations dating back to the mid-fifties were traced back, such as for example the so-called Operation 300. This is the information given to me by the RCMP. Then it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that to be quite logical with the situation it is not enough to say to Mr. So and So or to any other person that he or she has lost his or her job in the RCMP but to refer the whole practice, the whole procedure to the inquiry commission to cast full light on this matter. The inquiry commission which has the means of examining sworn witnesses can study the matter in depth and make recommendations.

[English]

I am pleased we are having this debate today. I hope it ends up on a far more constructive note than the previous debate, the emergency debate which was called by the opposition parties. This debate gives us an opportunity to focus on a number of questions and issues of concern which are important to Canada's security service and its future role.

At the very outset I am disputing the use of the terminology used by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) when he referred to government security forces. The forces referred to in the motion of the Leader of the Opposition are not the government's forces; they are forces which are used to protect our national security and integrity. To imply that the RCMP is a political police force in the hands of this government is a clear attack on the integrity of the men and women who form the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Nobody ever said that.

Mr. Fox: I believe it is an undeserved smear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fox: In spite of the severe criticism of the RCMP in the past few weeks at the hands of the loyal opposition, I believe Canadians and the government retain great confidence in the force and the manner in which, generally speaking, they have conducted themselves in carrying out their responsibilities.

There are two parts to the motion introduced by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. The first part deals with ministerial responsibility for national security and the national security service. By convention, the responsibility for national security devolves upon the Prime Minister and is shared with those ministers charged with specific responsibility for the police, external relations and the administration of justice.

In part, the government accepted the Mackenzie recommendations in relation to the structure and the responsibility of the security service. It is responsible to a designated minister, the Solicitor General. The head, the director-general, has the right of direct access to the Prime Minister, and the head has a high degree of independence as recommended by the MacKenzie commission. I refer hon. members to recommendation 277(b), page 106 of the Mackenzie report. Also, the government accepted that the security service should become a more clearly recognized, separate and distinct element of the RCMP since there is a clear distinction between the operational work of the security service and that of the police force. On June 26, 1969, the Prime Minister said the following in this House:

It is therefore the government's intention, with the full understanding of the RCMP, to ensure that the Directorate of Security and Intelligence will grow and develop as a distinct and identifiable element within the basic structure of the force, and will be more responsive, in its composition and character, to the national security requirements described by the commissioners . . . The security service, under the Commissioner of the RCMP, will be increasingly separate in structure and civilian in nature.

As far as policy and operational responsibilities are concerned there is, of course, by positive decision of the government, a very clear line of distinction between responsibility for the policy under which the security service operates and responsibility for the direction of the operations of the security service. That, I understand, is also a position approved of by the Leader of the Opposition—a distinction between policy guidelines and the day to day activities of the RCMP.

The political level, of course, has responsibility for the over-all policy guidance and mandate of the force, and while the security service has some form of operational independence from the political level under policy guidance, the government is convinced that this distinction is right and should be maintained. If I understand the Leader of the Opposition correctly, that is also his position. In that broad context, the commissioner and the director-general of the security service are involved in the over-all operational direction of the security service. The director-general has exercised delegated responsibility for operational policy of the security service.

The government believes that to exercise direction over the day to day operations—in other words, to assume direct operational control over the security service—would be counter to the basic principle of the independence of the police to which we have strongly subscribed for many years. The government has subscribed to this principle in order to make clear that there must not be any possibility of the use of executive authority to influence the work of security and intelligence agencies for partisan political purposes.

We all know from recent painful experiences elsewhere that where executive partisan control is exercised over security and intelligence services, there can be perversion of them for partisan purposes. Watergate is past, but not forgotten. The other thing Watergate showed us is that if there is political intervention in operations and perversion of them for partisan purposes, the involvement of the political level can make disclosure and investigation very difficult. There can be the cover-up of activities or the suppression of information because they involve activities at the executive level. It seems to me that it is, therefore, a great disservice to the country and to services such as the RCMP and the security service to suggest or imply that they have been involved in a Watergate. They have not, and they do not deserve the slur.

Any suggestion that the government should take responsibility for operational control of the security service is one which if implemented could lead to the very situation that was Watergate. We prefer to be judged responsible on the basis of the policy guidance given to the service by the government and by the initiatives we take in relation to the legal framework that governs the operations of the service. In that regard, we continue to examine our policies and the legal framework under which operations are conducted for which we in the government are responsible. We take our responsibilities seriously, as is clearly demonstrated in the initiatives taken in respect of the policy direction given the force and in relation to laws which govern us all.

I would like to enumerate approximately 15 instances of policy guidance given to the force over the years. This has been a matter of continuing attention and concern to this government, especially since the royal commission on security reported in 1969. However, even before that commission reported, the government of Mr. Pearson took steps. In 1963 that government enunciated the security threat and effected procedures to protect the individual and to define the role of the RCMP in the security screening process. In 1966 responsibility for the RCMP was transferred to the Solicitor General from the Department of Justice, to ensure more comprehensive and intensive attention to law enforcement.

In 1966 the royal commission on security was established. In 1969 the report of the royal commission on security was tabled and a number of points were emphasized. Some of these points were that Canada remained a security target and that security should remain the responsibility of the RCMP, but in the context of an increasingly separate and civilian security service. In 1971 the then solicitor general announced the formation of a planning and research group in his ministry to provide civilian analysis and advice on internal security matters. In 1972 the committee structure reporting to the cabinet committee on security and intelligence was restructured. In 1974 the government proposed legislation to govern wiretapping to ensure protection of the individual and to ensure control by the minister responsible of wiretapping where legitimate reason for it was established. Prior to 1974 there was the implementation of those powers by the then solicitor general.

In 1975 and 1976 the government provided guidelines for the security service and clarification of those guidelines in the context of separatist activities. There was the establishment of the Marin commission of inquiry, which reported in 1976. In March of 1977 there was the establishment of an operational review committee. In-camera briefings were offered to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs over the past few years, including this year. A letter was written to the Leader of the Opposition this year offering him briefings on the matter of security.

Finally, this year a commission of inquiry to investigate evidence of illegal activity by the security service was established to advise on policy and procedures of the RCMP and on the adequacy of the law relating to security. Those are approximately 15 measures which have been taken over the years, all for the purpose of ensuring greater policy direction by, and accountability to, the government, the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General.

Mr. Peters: They all failed.

Mr. Fox: While the government has worked toward ensuring appropriate guidance for the security service, it has tried to continue the long-established tradition that the government should not become involved in the day to day operations of the RCMP, including the security services, which is a position argued time and again by some hon. members of this House, particularly hon. members in the opposition—and I think more particularly of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Peters: The minister should have some general knowledge of what is going on.

Mr. Fox: It is this aspect of the problem that is being emphasized by the opposition, and in my view there is a very difficult problem here for which we must find a solution. I do not think the solution can be found in the simplistic criticism that the government must be responsible for the detailed operational activity undertaken by the security service in trying to ensure national security. However, there is a challenge for the future. In any human organization there is surely room for improvement. That applies to the Tory party and to the NDP as well as to the RCMP, although in the case of the opposition parties to which I referred, the reasons are more self-evident.

I believe we must arrive at decisions on a series of complex policy and legal issues in order to ensure that police operations can and will be carried on within provisions and procedures authorized by law; to decide to what extent the law may have to be changed to permit measures that are considered necessary to combat terrorism, organized crime, espionage and other matters of that kind; and to ensure that our decisions are consistent with the protection of basic and fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual. We must ensure these things while still preserving the independence of police operations from possible political intervention, but with ministerial control of policy. The issues are very important for the country and our society as a whole, but we must not undermine or make impossible the effective work by the RCMP in order to have quick, dramatic and possibly wrong solutions.

In the second part of his motion the Leader of the Opposition also proposes the establishment of a parliamentary committee to look at ministerial responsibility in directing the security forces. I make the following points: first, the government has already established a commission of inquiry concerning the activities of the RCMP. The opposition frequently demanded this. It seems to me advisable to await the report and advice of the commission. The commission can call before it whoever it wishes. In his letter to the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister also pointed out that the government is prepared to discuss questions and issues related to the security service in in-camera sessions of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Such in-camera sessions were held in 1973, 1974 and 1975, and offers for such sessions were extended in 1976 and 1977, but as yet those offers have not been taken up, undoubtedly for valid reasons, by members of that committee.

The Prime Minister also offered to the Leader of the Opposition briefings on the state of security in this country. However, the procedure in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs provided an opportunity to members from both sides of the House to raise questions about the general application of security policy. I am, of course, always amazed to see the questions asked by members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, particularly on the police and security side, administered by the Solicitor General, come back up in the House without reference to the fact that questions have been asked systematically by people in this organization and very detailed answers have been furnished in the past, as they will be this year if it is the wish of the parliamentary committee to so examine the estimates of my department in connection with the police and security analysis group.

I should also point out to the Leader of the Opposition that the royal commission of 1966 came to the conclusion that detailed scrutiny of the policies and operations of security agencies was the responsibility of the executive and should not be entrusted to a parliamentary committee. That is not to say that we are not willing to have a look at the over-all policy within the confines of the in-camera examination by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that all the measures that have been taken, there were almost 15 of them, show to what extent the government has seriously taken its responsibilities to ensure control over a mandate given to the security services of Canada. I believe, Mr. Speaker, and I am convinced that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will agree with me, that nobody in Canada would wish that a government, be it this one or any other, have control over the day to day operations of the Canadian police forces. It goes without saying, Mr. Speaker, that if such were the case, we would have in fact a political force and a political police in Canada.

Mr. Clark: That has never been suggested.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition said that nobody ever suggested that. None the less, Mr. Speaker, I suggest hon. members on the other side should look over the statements they have made over the past few months. On a number of occasions, they accused us of having a political police which is supposed to prepare lists of enemies of the system; yet, Mr. Speaker, they are accusing us today of not having the police forces in Canada under control. Either we have them under full control, or we do not have them under control at all.

I am saying to the House today that we do not intend to watch over the day to day operations of the Canadian police forces. No government in this country, whether federal or provincial, need control the day to day operations of our police forces; the function of any elected representative is to define a clear mandate for the police forces and see to it that this mandate is carried out. Through the setting up of some 14 or 15 elements of solution, of control, since 1963, I have demonstrated to what extent the government is aware of this problem, and it goes without saying that there is room for improvement in any human organization. If the control mechanisms and the legislation must be improved, we will improve them.

I would like to stress one thing because hon. members opposite have too often insisted on the fact that we want to amend the legislation and legalize what was illegal, but basically, Mr. Speaker, we have always very clearly established that a security service, a police force generally must act in accordance with the law, the Criminal Code and other federal and provincial statutes.

We have stated, however, that it was clear today that there are some gaps in that legislation. We have reached a point where it would be necessary in an airport such as Mirabel to put up signs which would read as follows: Would terrorists please report to such or such counter. Surely that situation would be quite ridiculous. We think it is necessary to have a security service in spite of the fine words we heard from the leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Speaker, the issue at stake is not to take away any civil liberties but to allow people such as the leader of the New Democratic Party to continue exercising that very right. He who belongs to a socialist party should know thoroughly the history of European socialist parties; he should know how often European socialist parties have seen their freedom taken away because governments had set up security services to take that freedom away.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian security services are absolutely unique. It is a shame to compare them to those of countries behind the Iron Curtain. That kind of comparison is made by the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, yet he knows full well that it is not valid. Indeed, the only reason for the existence of security services in Canada is to prevent subversive and terrorist groups from denying to people such as the leader of the New Democratic Party the right to exercise their democratic liberties in a country as free as Canada.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak on a question that to me is of paramount importance. I intend to deal with just two or three phases of it and shall endeavour to arrive at a conclusion as to why this government has set out, apparently, to smear the greatest police force—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what they have done, and they have done it continually.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to questions, even from the least intelligent. I find it tremendously interesting that this group across the way, the Liberal party, again this afternoon have shown their contempt for parliament by endeavouring to howl down any person with whom they do not agree. If I have to identify someone from now on, they will only have themselves to blame. I must say, to begin with, Mr. Speaker, that the speech delivered by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Clark) was in every way an outstanding one, worthy of the traditions of parliament and the preservation and assurance of freedom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman opposite will stand up, if he has the backbone to do it, I will be glad to have his questions. These subterranean objections and interferences may lead to self-edification of those who participate, but they add nothing to a discussion of serious moment that we are now engaged in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery) on a point of order.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman said he would accept questions. I have a question. Will he accept it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the intelligence of the hon. member has now been fully revealed. We all know that he does not know what we are talking about. I listened to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox)—

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. the hon. member is seeking permission to ask a question. It is the right of the right hon. member to accept a question, of course, but from his remarks the Chair has come to the conclusion that he does not wish to do so.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, he just said he would accept questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is the decision of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this kind of intervention. I have been away for ten days through indisposition. I have heard people ask if it is the usual course of conduct of the Liberal party of Canada in this place to drown out the opposition when there is any argument. They are certainly getting a name across Canada, and parliament is being smeared accordingly. As far as the minister is concerned, I followed him in the House and through listening to what he had to say on television. I must compliment him on his capacity to speak at length but convey no information. That is something worthy of the finest traditions of his two predecessors.

Today the Solicitor General set out what has been done. He says, "We have been doing things." Apparently what has been done has not been very effective. Going back to the earliest days of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country, he left the House this afternoon with such speed that he might have been mounted on a motorcycle again. This is one occasion when he who is responsible for the security of Canada should be in the House, even to listen to that which he does not fully appreciate, understand or is willing to hear. It just amazes me.

Now, sir, what do we have? We have a continual endeavour on the part of this government to smear the Mounted Police. As far as I am concerned, I will have none of it. I have known the Mounted Police since the days of the territories when they went west to what had been Fort Carlton in 1903, when the force was called the Northwest Mounted Police. Later on it became the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, I think in 1904, and finally in 1919 it assumed its present name. Let not any member think that people on the prairies will ever countenance in the slightest the contemptuous innuendoes which have been directed at the Mounted Police. If there has been wrongdoing, then, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, the responsibility is with the government of this country, and nowhere else.

I mentioned the Mounted Police because I saw the force in those days as a boy. We were living 17 miles from the nearest village on the old Edmonton-Carlton-Winnipeg trail. The Mounted Police had come there, proud of their traditions. When there was crime committed, they sought out the alleged wrongdoer. When he was brought to trial, he was prosecuted by a member of the Mounted Police, generally a sergeant. He was often tried before an inspector of the Mounted Police. In all the years during those early days of the settlement of western Canada, no one—except in one or two isolated cases—ever denied that justice was being done. The Mounted Police endeavoured to ensure justice and to maintain it.

From the time I became a member of the bar in 1919—I was a member of the bar in all three western provinces—until 1957 I had many cases. With the exception of two individuals, the Mounted Police believed in their slogan "Maintain the right". But today, in consequence of the actions of this government in endeavouring to bring about the suspicion that what has been done is wrong and was due to the Mounted Police, I need only point out that none of these things happened until the government of Canada decided to place security under certain civilians. Since then some things have been done which cannot be justified.

Why was security removed from RCMP? I am beginning to wonder whether this was part of a plan to put an end to the Mounted Police. I have already said that going back to the 1940s the Prime Minister has had a disregard for the Mounted Police which I am not going to detail in his absence, though he will immediately recollect what I have in mind.

What is the situation today, Mr. Speaker? The Solicitor General has given the House an explanation. Where are the other former solicitors general? Where is "Go-go Goyer"? He is in Africa endeavouring to establish some kind of Francophone combine. Why is he not here? There was not such a rush that he should leave at this time. The hon. gentleman opposite will disqualify himself for cabinet rank unless he watches out.

Mr. Olivier: Identify him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman will speak up, I will identify him correctly.

Mr. Paproski: That is the hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is not the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) here? All during his period of time when the PQ—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the right hon. member of the opposition has no respect for your decision. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is customary for all hon. members not to be called by their name in the House. In two or three instances, the right hon. member has called the Minister "Mr. Go, Mr. Go, Mr. Goyer". That's a shame, for he is a minister of the Crown; the right hon. member should show the respect owed to him as a minister of the Crown.

An hon. Member: He should set the example.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is obvious that the point raised by the hon. member is correct and conforms with the standing orders of the House.

[English]

It is true that the point raised by the hon. member conforms with the Standing Orders of the House. But it also happens that in speeches here and in general conversations an hon. member may go beyond the rules. I know the right hon. member for Prince Albert did not do this purposely, since he has been following the rules of the House all during his lifetime as a parliamentarian.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, your ruling is correct, but it is hard to identify hon. members opposite, with the musical chairs game that is played over there, and to keep oneself up to date. Although it is difficult to identify one or two members opposite, the hon. member has been fully identified now. I presume that the Minister of Supply and Services is over in Africa supplying intelligence and services to the people of the various countries. I say his place is in the House of Commons to answer for the fact that the PQ, a legitimate political party which was not undermining the state but operating with constitutional right, was investigated during his regime in a way that cannot be justified. Does anyone think it was the Mounted Police which decided to pick on the PQ? What possible reason would they have? But the hon. gentleman who is in Africa would have a reason. We remember him as the "twenty million dollar kid". As for that, I will go no further at this moment. He is the one who should be here.

In the last few days evidence has been given in the city of Montreal that indicates, according to the press, that he knew what was going on. We ought to have the minister here. As far as I am concerned, suspicion does not fall upon the Mounted Police for getting a list of the names of the members of the PQ, their funds or any other information; that suspicion rests on the Liberal party, which is afraid that it is going to be defeated. Where is this minister? Why is he not here? Why, during the days of the debates that have gone on here, has he not made clear his position?

• (1652)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as I am concerned, the smear on the Mounted Police is a direct result of instructions that must have been given by him to the Mounted Police to act in search of something in which there was no crime or suggestion of a crime.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad for the silence now. I go on from there. Where is his successor, to pass a law as Solicitor General—

An hon. Member: He is up in the gallery.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, he is now in consumer and corporate affairs.

An hon. Member: Some affairs.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He has sat in the House day after day—silent, unspeaking.

An hon. Member: Yes, sir.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was he afraid that if he spoke he would say something unspeakable? There he sat. I have watched him engrossed in writing backwards, trying to pretend he was busy. Why did he not stand up and have something to say? The suggestion can only be one thing: he knew what was going on. As far as his predecessor is concerned, I would like him to answer under oath the suggestions that are being made today, that he was fully briefed by the officers of security. What is the constituency of the Minister of Supply and Services?

Some hon. Members: Dollard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Dollard. Nobody seems to know what the hon. member represents. Where is he? Dollard is named after a great hero in French Canada, one of the greatest in Canada. That is the only reason I can speak highly of Dollard in so far as it is represented by the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is in Africa. Where is the minister—

An hon. Member: In the Sioux.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand).

An hon. Member: Say something.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is in seclusion; he has disappeared. Why?

An hon. Member: He is in the Sioux.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why is he not here? The answer is very clear: he does not want to be around on this occasion. Why does he not stand in his place and tell the story of what happened during his period of office? Certainly, this is not a government which is noted for its lack of loquacity; they talk on every subject. Why is he not here today? That is the reason I feel a sense of deep concern for the Solicitor General—"The boy stood on the burning deck, when all but he had fled."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There he is, endeavouring to answer something of which he has no personal knowledge, and the two who know are silent or are absent in Africa or elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The very fact that they are not here is evidence that they have reason not to be here, and the conclusion that follows that is simply this: they do not want to answer questions concerning the most unjustifiable claim of misconduct against a legitimate party. The only party that could benefit from that would not be the Mounted Police; it would be the Liberal party. I point that circumstance. I have nothing more to say in that regard.

Sir, as long as I am in this House—

An hon. Member: Too long.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —I will not tolerate the kind of attacks that have been made surreptitiously, subtly, against the Mounted Police to blame them for the shortcomings of this government and the failure of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said I have seen the Mounted Police in action—I presume in a couple of hundred cases, on one side or the other—and except for one or two instances the truth was told. There they are today, sitting ducks, subjected to the attacks of a government that has decided to make the Mounted Police goats for their failure to carry out their ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now the minister says they are going to turn this whole question over to the McDonald commission. Do you know what that means? It simply means that the commission has been sitting since July. How much consideration has been given to these problems? Little or nothing. What the government hopes, by placing this matter generally in the possession of the commission, is that there will be no findings until the next election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the reason exactly for turning over to the McDonald commission matters that should be decided here in parliament. Furthermore, under the terms of the commission the only special mandate that they do not receive specifically is authority to question ministerial responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: My time is up. I simply want to say that the government is not going to get away with it.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, those two people waved their hands the way they did in the Reichstag just before 1939. I say to the government, "Come clean. Give us the facts. Do not hide these things in the way you are hiding almost everything else. Restore to parliament its rights and let us clear this matter up." The Mounted Police shall not be the scapegoat of the ministers of this government who are looking for any cover to protect themselves.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the motion for debate today deals with a most important matter of course, but we have been debating it for over two weeks now. The motion reads, and I quote:

> That this House . . . deeply regrets its (the government's) unwillingness to allow a committee of this House to study the role of ministers in security operations.

I feel that we should know the truth about the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and every other police corps in Canada, about its methods of inquiry and procedures in enforcing law and order in Canada. All police forces must operate according to the law and order of the land, within well defined guidelines. Their task is very tricky in that they must enforce law and order while respecting the freedoms of every individual.

Mr. Speaker, I remember when I was very young how we used to read in the newspapers that, for instance, the RCMP or the Mounted Police, as we used to call them in those days, were above reproach and always got their man. We were proud of that police force and rightly so, I would think, in those days; but today and especially more recently, every attempt has been made to belittle that police force; I sometimes wonder just how successful those attempts have been.

However, Mr. Speaker, in their operations to fight against organized crime in Canada, the police must not abuse their rights, and the government must see to it that they do not. Over seven centuries ago, Bracton expressed this principle—it is true that in those days he spoke of the king, but today we could speak of government. Here is Bracton's principle:

> The King himself must not be answerable to Man, but to God and the Law, because the Law makes the King. In consequence, let the King give the Law what the Law gives him, that is authority and power, for where the will and not the Law constitutes authority there is no King.

It could be said today that if the will takes precedence over the law, democracy is in jeopardy. Closer to us, the then Speaker of the House of Commons, Dr. Gaspard Fauteux, said: "In the Canadian democracy, the state is the servant of the individual and in all other forms of government, the individual is the servant of the state." However, we can avoid lapsing into these other forms of government where individual rights are relinquished to the almighty state. According to Ralph W. Page, democracy promises liberty to all and to everyone an opportunity to manage his own self improvement. It is based on the principle that man is not a machine and that his destiny is not based upon the accumulation of material goods but on his understanding of moral and spiritual values and on his self-improvement in this field. This is the kind of democracy we want to safeguard.

We do not want to lapse into that kind of regime where one half of the population watches the other half. In a well governed democratic society, the law abiding citizen has nothing to fear. He may eat, sleep, work and entertain himself in peace. He may have his conscience at rest, secure in the conviction that he and his family are safe, provided they all abide by the law. He may even expect certain things from society such as those he is entitled to under the law. He does not have to fear the torture chamber, the concentration camp, the execution squad, the confiscation of his property or the loss of his citizenship, but in all other societies one must be ready for the worst.

The Canadian citizen must be able to address himself to his provincial or federal representative to express to him his desires, make representations or voice his complaints without feeling that he is being spied upon. Civic study circles must be able to reach the same ends by making known the opinions of more important groups without being spied upon. This is what I am asking from this government and at last the Solicitor General seems to have understood that it is necessary to monitor more closely the actions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to prevent that police force from turning into an SS corps devoted to the service of a tyrant. In a free country such as Canada, the existence of laws and their implementation imply as a necessary corollary the existence of order. In the absence of any kinds of laws or when the existing laws are not observed, then the law of the jungle will prevail. When order does not exist, nothing will prevent attacks against the freedom of the majority of the citizens. This is why law and order have become almost synonymous. This expression conveys a single identical concept.

Mr. Speaker, parliament must have the right to inquire and have its say in the ways laws have to be applied; this right must not be surrendered exclusively to the government's discretion. As history shows, every time men have neglected to restrict the powers of their rulers, their powers have been increased at the expenses of the people governed. Every time governments have acquired unlimited powers, they have turned into tyrannies. The duty of Parliament is to preserve democracy and no police force whatsoever should have the right to commit illegal actions to further its ends. We have instituted an inquiry commission, the McDonald Commission, to throw the light on all aspects of the issues raised by the actions of the RCMP.

The RCMP is not blameless and efforts are being made to destroy it piece by piece. In certain sectors, this police force has been nearly completely depreciated. Honest Canadians feel that they need an authority to enforce the law and what should this authority be if not a respected police force? We are not faultless. There is much work to be done. The police must deal with organized crime. There are underground organizations for drug distribution, people who smuggle liquor and other goods, betting syndicates, prostitution chains, gangs of murderers; there is also bribery and corruption since without it very few illegal organizations can survive. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is very busy.

Drug trafficking is prohibited by law, but when we see how easy it is for young people even in high schools to obtain all sorts of drugs, we wonder what the RCMP is doing. Those who are not used to smoking pot and who try to sit down in certain movies houses cannot resist very long the atmosphere in those places.

Mr. Speaker, I have some reservations about supporting this motion. I would certainly be in favour of establishing a committee to study the role of ministers in security operations, but this committee should have all the powers of a royal inquiry commission to call on all the witnesses that the committee will deem necessary to hear and these witnesses should testify under oath. This is very serious. But we already have a royal commission. If this commission is not empowered to investigate the role of ministers in security operations, we should extend the mandate of the McDonald Commission.

The House of Commons has many other matters to deal with. We are aware of the problems of unemployment, inflation, energy and housing. We must ensure a guaranteed minimum income for all Canadians. We must pass as soon as possible some legislation to improve the lot of small and medium businesses in Canada. We have urgent economic problems to solve in Canada. We should not let the government be sidetracked to minor issues.

Since the beginning of the present session, we have not really dealt with concrete matters; we have talked at length of the future of the Canadian constitution, of the problems caused by the Parti Québécois. It is all very well to be preoccupied with Quebec's or Canada's future, but words, patriotic speeches or thinly veiled threats will accomplish little in the way of settling these problems. We need social and economic laws to restore the confidence of the Canadian people in their institutions. Instead of trying to find solutions to our problems, we apply ourselves to exposing all kinds of scandals. I do not know if this situation should be blamed on the television broadcasting of our debates and the fact that some believe that we must keep up with the tradition of crime and violence that television conveys in far too great a number of its everyday programs.

Mr. Speaker, a year ago today the people of Quebec passed a harsh judgement on the Bourassa government for neglecting the province's economic problems. Other provincial governments have also been judged on this. The same thing will happen to the federal government if it does not take strong measures to counter the breakdown of our economy.

Any opposition party will be judged the same way if it always criticizes without ever proposing any real answer. Mr. Speaker, this motion proposes to give a mandate to a standing committee or a special committee—it does not say which—to study the role of ministers in security operations. It is not enough to be efficient. If we have no confidence in the McDonald Commission why not give it more power? Why not ask it to accelerate its hearings and file a report as soon as possible? We shall reach the same ends.

Mr. Speaker, why should we have two organizations doing the same studies for the same purposes? Yet this is the second motion on that same subject in the last two weeks. We have heard many questions of privilege. The question periods have been almost completely monopolized by this problem, the RCMP. Yet I think it is time to make a decision, to act and work together to deal with problems that are waiting for an answer. The Canadian public is anxious and might be more strict with members who do not realize the seriousness of the situation, they might be more strict with those members than towards the members of the RCMP.

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we witnessed an extraordinary performance in the House this afternoon. What we have seen is a transparent attempt by the official opposition to manipulate public opinion. That is the whole purpose of the exercise this afternoon and of the motion put down by the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: We heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) say the RCMP was being blamed because of the actions of the government. We know that the official opposition has created a climate of suspicion and contempt for the RCMP in this country, and that they are now hoist on their own petard and are desperately trying to manipulate public opinion in order to get out of a predicament of their own making. It has been such an extraordinary afternoon that we have witnessed the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) coming into the House in support of his leader. The party opposite must be desperate. We have all heard the right hon. member for Prince Albert express his admiration for the RCMP and his confidence in the force. Yet his party does not have sufficient confidence in the RCMP to ask them to investigate a simple bugging device in an office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, it was the Speaker of the House who made the choice of the Ottawa city police to investigate that bugging incident.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Perhaps members on the other side will let me finish my statement. I hasten to point out that it was their own member, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Poulin), who suggested to the Speaker that the Ottawa police be called in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) that the point he has raised is not a point of order but a matter for debate.

Mr. Basford: My colleague, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), in his speech this afternoon drew attention to the need in this country for police and security services. It is clear that, unfortunately, we live in a country where there are people engaged in criminal activity and people engaged in planning and preparing for terrorist activity, people who believe they should engage in espionage and people who think they should operate by violence rather than by democratic means. It is, therefore, evident that we need police protection for our society and our people. The people of Canada, as well as this government, respect the members of the RCMP who have historically provided them with police services of this kind, and we do so today. The RCMP is entitled to respect from the people of this country and is entitled to it from members of the official opposition. Second, we listened to a transparent speech—

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, I would hope that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) who holds a position which is supposed to be non-partisan would not make statements which are totally untrue with reference to the position we take with respect to the RCMP. I hope I shall not hear such statements from him again today. I intend to answer those charges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that the Minister of Justice is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I hope all of these unfounded points of order, heckling and noise from the other side, are being taken out of the time of hon. members in the opposition, rather than mine. Secondly, we listened to the transparent speech of the leader of the New Democratic Party in which he tried to suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), myself and other members of the government had somehow supported the concept that people were entitled to break the law. He raised that as a question of privilege this afternoon, and even when I challenged him in the course of his speech to do so, he did not put on the record one piece of documentation supporting that proposition.

I read into the record the position of this government, which has been repeated by the Solicitor General, the Prime Minister and others, that it is fundamental to the operation of the rule of law and the protection of our civil liberties that all people in a country, whether they hold public office or not, whether they be civilians or policemen, operate under and within the law. If there are any changes needed in the law to accomplish this purpose of effective police protection of our society and ourselves, they should only be undertaken after the most careful and deliberate discussion and debate in parliament, and only after the most careful and deliberate designing of the proper safeguards and checks to assure that our individual liberties and freedoms are in fact protected. That is the position of this government, and any attempt by the NDP and others to say we have some other purpose or some other policy other than that the people must, and should, obey the law is an attempt to mislead the public, and again, as in this debate by the opposition, to manipulate the public and public opinion.

The resolution talks of the responsibility of ministers and the whole concept of ministerial responsibilities. I suggest that the position of the official opposition, if implemented, would mean that members of the government would be interfering in the day to day operations and investigations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Fraser: I wonder if the minister, on the very point he was raising, would permit a question.

Mr. Basford: No, Mr. Speaker. I have had so many interruptions I will do that at the end of my time, if I have any time left.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Your time is coming quickly.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and under the policies of the government we have given the RCMP, particularly the security service, a very carefully spelled-out mandate, including the direction to operate under and within the law. This afternoon my colleague, the Solicitor General, outlined a whole series of steps that had been taken over the years to assure that that was done in terms of ministerial responsibility. It is surely the responsibility of ministers and of government to set out or to provide a policy framework for the operation of police forces; but it is to leave, however, the actual day to day operation of the force—and that is of any police force—to the head of the police force itself.

We have had some quotations on ministerial responsibility in this House, many of them learned. Surely it is fundamental to the British system, the Canadian system and all other systems in the Commonwealth that those ministers responsible to parliament for police forces do not interfere in the day to day—

An hon. Member: Nobody ever asked them to. You are misleading.

Mr. Basford: —that they do not intervene in the day to day investigations.

Mr. Fraser: Point to a single place where we have advocated that.

Mr. Basford: The right hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Prince Albert, has come from his province and said that people are watching television and are saying we are not allowing people to speak properly in this House and are not allowing members opposite to ask questions. I have been out in my own province, and people there are equally angry at the opposition for never allowing ministers to make any sort of statement without heckling, yelling and caterwauling from the opposite side. Let me read, for example, from a judgment of the Master of the Rolls, Metropolitan Police Commissioner, ex parte Blackburn, as follows:

> No minister of the Crown can tell him that he must, or must not, keep observation on this place or that; or that he must, or must not, prosecute this man or that one. Nor can any police authority tell him so. The responsibility for law enforcement lies on him. He is answerable to the law and to the law alone.

That is in reference to the constable. If we were to follow the suggestions of the official opposition or their policies, we would have the government and government ministers interfering in the day to day operations of a police force—

Mr. Fraser: You are not telling the truth.

Mr. Basford: That is a policy that President Nixon seemed to believe in, but it is not a policy in which we believe.

An hon. Member: You and Nixon would run well in harness.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, we had allegations, through evidence in a court case, of some wrongdoing by a member of the RCMP. Recognizing our responsibilities which were set out by the Solicitor General, in late May and late June of this year officers of the Solicitor General's Department and mine interviewed people both here in Ottawa and in Montreal and it came to light, through those interviews, that there were two incidents of alleged illegality in Montreal, namely, the arson incident and the incident involving dynamite.

As a result of those disclosures, officers of the Minister of Justice and of the Solicitor General inquired of the then commissioner regarding an explanation. The then commissioner could not receive explanations that were satisfactory to him, and at that point he requested the government to appoint a royal commission into the investigative procedures of the RCMP. That kind of action has been described on the other side as a cover-up. It seems to me it is the exact opposite of cover-up to send officers of the government from here to Montreal to investigate and take statements from witnesses, returning them to Ottawa, and, when not having satisfactory explanations of the statements, setting up a royal commission to investigate.

Surely that is ministerial responsibility, and there is not a textbook in this country or in the British Commonwealth that would suggest that is not acting in accordance with ministerial responsibility. The ministers and the governement did what they were responsible for doing—setting out a mandate to the security service and the police force. When there were allegations, some of which were discovered by ourselves and brought to light by ourselves, we set in place the proper machinery to get to the bottom of them and to get the answers.

If we pass this motion, we would apparently have going on, and relating to the same incidents, a royal commission inquiry under Mr. Justice McDonald, a police investigation in the province of Quebec, a royal commission taking place in the province of Quebec, and a House of Commons special committee with apparently the same powers. This whole situation is serious, as are some of the allegations and suggestions that have been made. They have caused all of us grave concern and they are now causing grave concern all across this country, including grave concern on the part of the commissioner, officers and the men of the RCMP.

Surely, the proper way to get to the bottom of these allegations and suggestions is through the instrumentality of an impartial, non-partisan forum in the form of a royal commission. That is what we have provided, and that is what is going on. We, as a government, will co-operate—contrary to the suggestions of the Leader of the Opposition—to the fullest possible extent with the royal commission. That has been said by the Prime Minister and other ministers in the House, and for the hon. member to suggest in his speech today to the contrary simply reinforces my thesis that today's debate and this resolution are nothing more than a crass, transparent device to manipulate public opinion.

I would suggest if members of the opposition have the regard and respect for the officers and men of the RCMP which they profess, it seems to me in a system of law, wherein the rule of law provides that the most heinous of criminals is entitled to a fair and impartial hearing, that surely members of the RCMP and of the security service, who have served this country well, are entitled to a fair, full, impartial, and non-partisan hearing in the form of a royal commission. Mr. Speaker, that is what we have provided.

Instead, we have the suggestion that we should now have a standing committee or a special committee of the House of Commons headed by a member of the opposition, possibly the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek). He made an address in this House not too long ago. At the present time any such committee in this House could in no way provide a fair and impartial hearing on the very serious matters which are at stake here.

Apparently the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley has not been disowned by his leader, even though he referred to Harvard University as being a spawning ground of leftist intellectuals, and that apparently the University of Montreal has become a pro Castro stronghold.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) is not quoting directly from the comments of the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek). He is quoting from what the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley read into the record, which was authored by someone else other than himself.

[Mr. Basford.]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted the hon. member has raised that point of order. That was precisely what I was doing. I can only take it that the interest of the hon. member opposite, and of some of his colleagues, is to introduce into the record of this House things that are utter nonsense.

Mr. Jarvis: Get serious.

Mr. Basford: Actually I am looking for a word which is parliamentary to describe their interest. That indicates the tactics which would occur in a special committee. They would introduce into the record all sorts of utter nonsense, and when they are challenged on it, they try to disown it, and run away from it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: For a number of weeks last May and June hon. members opposite called for a royal commission of inquiry into all that was going on. That commission has been established by the government at the request of the Commissioner of the RCMP. It has backfired on hon. members opposite. Now they are trying to find a device to get out of the political hole they have dug for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: We on this side of the House do not intend to assist them, and obviously we intend to vote against this motion, which is a crass, transparent attempt to manipulate public opinion.

The real reason came to light from the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he started talking about an election campaign. It is obvious hon. members opposite want to get this committee going before an election, want to have some hearings, and want to fill those hearings with various partisan, political innuendoes. They want it set up so that it would be in full operation before the next election. That is their object. They are not interested in ministerial responsibility. They are not interested in the civilian control of security forces, which is a matter that is being examined by the royal commission. By means of this committee in the very short term, they are trying to get their house in order for the next election. That is their object, and we will not participate in that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) that the allotted time of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has expired.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, in following the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) in this important debate, during the course of my remarks I should like to deal with some of the historic and perhaps constitutional questions involved in the evolution of security and of the RCMP in this country.

It has become obvious to all of us over the years that in examining principles of ministerial responsibility, or the lack of it, with particular reference to security, which is covered in this motion, how unnecessary the growth of undesirable or misguided security methods were, had the government acted conscientiously and efficiently on the report of the Mackenzie Royal Commission on Security tabled approximately ten years ago. Also, it is obvious how stubborn and perverse this government has been over a long period of time in refusing to be frank with parliament, even when it became evident to some of us that something in security matters was going terribly wrong.

Responsible ministers, which include not only solicitors general, were either curiously anxious not to know what was going on, or they lacked any desire to correct the situation. Therefore the present conditions are caused, in a large part, by the negligence and shortsightedness of ministers of the Crown and are exacerbated by the indiscriminate use of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, which has roused the ire of the chief law enforcement officers of the provinces who resent the withholding of information which is rightfully, in their opinion, within their jurisdiction.

Another element has been the complacency of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said on February 7, 1977, when I questioned him about government files on millions of Canadians and the necessity of providing Canadians with access to their files and more freedom of information, the following:

> I for one as a Canadian would not admit we have lesser rights than the Americans. They may have more abuses there and that is why, perhaps, they have to have corrective measures.

It appears the Prime Minister's conclusions were wrong. Since that day we have seen that we need corrective measures as well. It was obvious to many of us, apparently before it was obvious to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Security matters in this country, besides being in a state of disarray because of poor judgment and lack of attention on the part of the government, are also complicated by very real constitutional problems. I am sure the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and the Minister of Justice are very aware of that.

Both the Attorney General of Canada and the Solicitor General of Canada are concerned with the operations of security. While I would not attempt to specify all of the powers possessed by these ministries, there is a doubt as to whether their powers extend into the administration of justice given to the provinces by section 92(14) of the British North America Act.

If such powers do not extend into this widely defined provincial prerogative, serious difficulties arise; one must look at the Official Secrets Act, for example, before prosecution can be entered, the authority of the Attorney General of Canada is required. An examination of this act clearly reveals that it comes within the meaning of the administration of justice. Furthermore, certain offences contained therein are duplicated in the Criminal Code, which is the responsibility of the provinces. In the latter instance, no such authority for prosecution is required. I wonder precisely where the Attorney General of Canada legally derives his power to override provincial jurisdiction. Also this act provides authority to appoint persons with the powers of peace officers, with no jurisdictional limitations imposed by order of the governor in council. I am not satisfied where it is clearly specified in the law that the governor in council can override the exclusive powers of the provinces in the field of the administration of justice.

We should consider as well another very important statute as far as civil rights in this country are concerned, which is the Protection of Privacy Act. The definition of subversive activity in that statute is very interesting. I seem to recall, when the term itself was put forward, that it was met with opposition. I suspect it was returned to the authorities to come up with some more acceptable forms of definition which finally found its way into the act. If we examine the definition of this term and translate the actions into offences, practically every one will be contained in the Criminal Code. This means that subversive activity also comes within provincial jurisdiction, yet it is the Solicitor General who is responsible for issuing warrants.

This matter requires some explanation. It has been suggested over the years that an assumption has grown up without challenge that the RCMP is constitutionally responsible for national security or internal security, although both terms have no real meaning in law. The only term I can find is "peace and order", and certainly the RCMP is not by definition responsible for that, although they have been its foremost defenders over the years. The assumption has wormed its way into this act as it has into the Official Secrets Act, and if it cannot be substantiated by constitutional law, it can be establishing a very dangerous precedent.

One must take a very hard look at whether the role of a security service should include an enforcement function. Perhaps to be consistent, if it is to be a federal responsibility, it should not have this power, which brings it back into an even more apparent conflict on jurisdictional grounds.

I believe that parliament should seriously consider that the term "defence", set out in section 91(7) of the British North America Act, should be defined to include the term "security intelligence" which should also be defined. This would place the matter firmly at the federal level and overcome the jurisdictional problems which are inherent at this time.

I think it is obvious as well at this point that military intelligence activities, by virtue of section 91(7), have a far clearer and more legitimate function than the security activities of the RCMP, and this to my mind is an unfortunate situation. If section 91(7) were amended in this way, the Solicitor General would be on firm legal ground for the issuance of warrants under the Protection of Privacy Act.

While parliament may legislate laws for peace and order, I submit that it has constitutionally no power to administer justice in the provinces. Logically it seemed a bit irregular, I suggest, for parliament to have a statutory police act in these circumstances, but years ago it did just that when it enacted the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, which provides authority for members of the RCMP to be appointed peace officers in every part of Canada, thereby allowing unlimited jurisdiction, which again provides the provinces with a good constitutional argument.

It is now very apparent that this is being interpreted as a licence for the RCMP independently to enforce laws which may be the sole enforcement responsibility of the provinces. It is not difficult under the circumstances to envisage a growing concern, police rivalry, and federal-provincial conflicts. In fact we seem to be in precisely that kind of scenario at the present time.

Recently the Quebec Minister of Justice stated in the national assembly that the RCMP was invading the provincial field in the administration of justice. He charged that this behaviour was unacceptable, and demanded that the force report to provincial authority. In Ontario we find the RCMP under similar circumstances, while in Alberta, which is a contract province, there is a clash between the attorney general, the RCMP, and the Department of National Revenue.

Who is responsible for these dilemmas? Is it the RCMP? I suggest that it cannot be, and that over the years parliament has been derelict in allowing this kind of situation which is now surfacing at a very inopportune time to develop.

Let us remember that in 1871 there was an addition made to the BNA Act providing parliament with the power to administer peace, order and good government in any territory not for the time being included in any province. In 1873 the Northwest Mounted Police, now the RCMP, was established, with its headquarters in Regina. The parliamentary authority to so administer was obviously the authority to form a police force.

As the provinces came into being and the area of the territories was accordingly reduced, parliament could no longer administer peace and order within these new boundaries. It follows that the Northwest Mounted Police similarly lost its territorial jurisdiction and, facing some pressure, the force moved its headquarters to Ottawa, simultaneously changing its name to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. One of its functions was to assist certain federal departments in the enforcement of their governing federal statutes, notably the customs and excise acts. Obviously a decision was made that in order to enforce these statutes the executive powers of a peace officer were required, hence the provisions in the RCMP Act. This is the crux of the federal-provincial conflicts which are now surfacing.

In those provinces where the RCMP is on contract to enforce laws on behalf of the provinces, for all intents and purposes that force is the provincial police force, following in the footsteps of the original provincial forces which had been appointed under the police acts of the individual provinces. In this role those members of the RCMP engaged under these contracts should rightly be qualified under the relevant police acts of the provinces for the duration of the contracts.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Those federal statutes outside the meaning of the administration of justice and enforced by the RCMP are another matter. The appointment of the RCMP for such enforcement duties should be by way of the individual statute, and any powers required limited to the provisions of the act; all operating costs being paid out of federal funds, which again would go a long way to assuaging the problems in Quebec.

I note that the presidents of Bell Telephone Company and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce have both recently commented, and with apparent alarm, on the invasion by the present federal government into the exclusive affairs of the provinces. I suggest that this situation applies equally to the federal police force, and the prescription for this is to amend the RCMP Act and other specific statutes to produce the cure for the jurisdictional disease which is causing problems in the administration of justice in this country.

By modifying the course now being undertaken by the RCMP a partial vacuum will be created. This, however, could readily be filled, in my submission, by giving that force a prime function—and I underline that prime function—in the criminal intelligence field against organized crime and a more clearly defined security and intelligence capability.

I sense that the Solicitor General himself is far from pleased with the efforts in this field and does not fail to make mention of police rivalry. In this sense I believe the term "rivalry" should be interpreted as jurisdictional resentment, and that can be eliminated only by jurisdictional corrections.

I would now like to turn to another matter, which I consider perhaps of most importance. I refer to the security service. In doing so I am prepared to suggest some changes, but as a preliminary I would like to point out that parliament has been very remiss in failing to take any positive interest in this specialized field. This obvious lack is no less than a sin of omission. It was the RCMP, acting on its own initiative, which first became interested in certain political threats against Canada, and over the years—and continuing largely on its own initiative—it has increased and expanded its function, but for want of direction produced its own ground rules.

The function of the security service has been accepted as a police role, which in turn means that it is an enforcement function. Acting under this impression we are once again confronted with jurisdictional problems from which there is no escape. Or is there? I quote from the Mackenzie Royal Commission Report on Security of 1969 as follows:

> Defence against threats to security is a duty and responsibility of a state comparable in meaning and relevance with defence against armed attack and insurrection.

Enforcement actually is only a by-product of the security role, and a very minor one at that. Further, the offences become, within the meaning of the administration of justice, a provincial responsibility. The police in the provinces, I am certain, are quite capable of providing enforcement, but only when they are given information.

Of fundamental importance is the following quote from the Mackenzie royal commission when reporting on the RCMP:

> There is, however, no explicit statutory authority for the security role.

With these thoughts in mind I am convinced that the role of the security service should be one of defence. Therefore I suggest that the term "defence" as contained in section 91(7) of the BNA Act be defined to include the term "security intelligence" and the latter term be defined tentatively along these lines, much in keeping with the Official Secrets Act:

Security intelligence is that information relating to the activities of persons, organizations and foreign powers which may be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the state.

Assuming we can have these two terms defined by law, the stage is then set for parliament to enact a statute relating to the security service, thus establishing the type of service it requires and its governing provisions.

An organization involved in such sensitive and important work should have a clear charter issued by parliament. The charter, which should not be so restrictive as to render the security service impotent, must be in the statute. The function of that service should be the acquisition of security intelligence as defined, which in turn is a role of defence. Thus, not only do we achieve constitutional authority not envisaged by the authors of the BNA Act, but also parliamentary control by way of statute and the elimination of the existing jurisdictional problem, which is perhaps the most important of all. Finally, continuity is established.

The security service must be raised in status comparable to its function and made sufficiently attractive to induce the professionals required, something which a military or para-military type of organization finds difficult to offer.

The British learned long ago that when they gave the responsibility for security intelligence to the police, the police in turn engaged specialists. A classic or conventional police service could not cope with the problem.

Freedom of movement and flexibility of mind are two fundamental terms in the intelligence world. Military and para-military organizations find it difficult to achieve the flexibility of mind required of a security service for the very reason that the whole concept is the rule by rank.

● (1752)

The military rank structure, even at officer level in the military orbit, militates against the operational levels functions and initiatives required of a security service. While it is always possible to operate at a lower level in a military format, it is next to impossible to do so at a higher level than status permits. Excepting support staff, this should warrant attention.

The size of the security service largely depends upon its targets, but a service that is not held in check by expert senior administrators can potentially load itself to the point of saturation, saturating both itself and its targets.

It is very tempting for some to avoid, at all costs, the taking of a calculated risk, but such a risk must be taken. It is obviously far better to have a small competent service than one which is unable to determine what is important and that which is not important and divide the two. The laws of Parkinson must be kept in mind.

There is one area which, quite frankly, baffles me. The Solicitor General has a group known as the Security Planning and Analysis Branch, SPAB, which has undergone a metamorphosis of name changes since its conception a few years ago. If its title reflects its function, it can only imply the present government lacks confidence in the capability of our national police force.

In no other federal organization can be found such an invoked barrier between a department and its minister. One has to ask, in assessing Colonel Bourne's organization, what are its standards of qualifications? How are they set, and by whom? What are its objectives, its terms of reference, and have these objectives been met? Unless positive answers are forthcoming, and its role justified, there seems no alternative than to get rid of it. Certainly since it has been established I know of no particular service it has achieved with distinction. A series of solicitors general and other ministers of the Crown do not appear to have been particularly well briefed or served by this organization.

It is quite interesting to note, by checking as far as I have been able, the type of people who have been seconded. To be specific, there was a very highly qualified, in the technical sense, employee of Bell Canada. What would his function be? There are other specialists whose role is unclear to me. Mr. Speaker, the very existence of SPAB, under its present circumstances, to my mind is nothing less than an affront to the RCMP and, to my mind, it should be eliminated. I suspect that many—

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I most sincerely regret interrupting the hon. member whose comments I generally find worth attention. May I repeat to him, however, what the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) said this afternoon, and what I believe the hon. member himself has said on previous occasions, that the very information he is asking for has been made available to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs by briefings of that section of the Secretariat to the Solicitor General. Those briefings will again be available in forthcoming weeks when the estimates of the Department of the Solicitor General will be before that committee. It seems to me inappropriate to persist in arguing that they are not available when they have been offered no later than this afternoon by the Solicitor General.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by my friend. All I can say in response is that while we have been assured on different occasions that information is available about this and other groups, it has been apparent in recent months that not even the ministers concerned with these people have been fully aware of the extent of what they are doing and have done. I think the hon. member would concede that.

I think it is quite fair for me to comment that this particular group, in my opinion—and all members are entitled to their opinion in this House—has not particularly fulfilled any notable or any effective function. Is it a channelling group? Is it an organizational group? We have been told it is, yet nowhere have I ever seen any evidence that this group has provided any particular meritorious service either in channelling or analysing information. I do know, as I think the hon. parliamentary secretary knows, that it has caused a considerable amount of resentment and disquiet in the RCMP. I do not believe that it has that type of security competence that I have suggested might be considered for the security service. It seems to be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate that very much. I would appreciate being informed if I am wrong, but I do not see in the service being presently performed by SPAB any particular justification for keeping this organization. I do not believe it has the capacity or the qualifications that would bring it within the definition of the role of intelligence services performed in other countries. Obviously it has not the type of background or organization that is found in the RCMP. I do not use this word disrespectfully, but in the Anglo-Saxon term it seems to me to be sort of a bastard organization. I mean no disrespect in that. It has some people seconded from the RCMP—career officers—it has a technical input and it has a military input, and yet—this may be my own deficiency—but I am not clear on its function, in terms of either helping the country's security, assisting the work of the RCMP or military intelligence, or whatever. It may be, if it is purely non-operational and analytical, that it is superfluous.

I am quite prepared to concede that I may be wrong. I would suggest, however, under the circumstances, with the greatest respect, that it is nothing less than an affront to our existing security organizations. If it were up to me I would strongly urge that it be disbanded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, now that it is just a few seconds to six o'clock, might I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the next speaker when we resume at eight o'clock will be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard).

Mr. Woolliams: I had been recognized, had I not?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would suggest to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that he was recognized on a point of order. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) will be the next speaker.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Mr. Woolliams: May I answer that, Mr. Speaker? I am not making anything of it, but I did misunderstand. It is not always easy to hear down here. I appreciate Your Honour raising the question. I did not want to be difficult about it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INCOME TAX ACT—ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF PRIVACY PROVISIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am going to deal briefly with a question I raised with the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) with respect to the confidentiality of the income tax forms of ordinary Canadians.

I am not at this time suggesting that there should not be, if it is clearly set out by parliament, some arrangement to attack tax information that can clearly be identified as emanating from or concerned with organized crime. In regard to the questions that I asked of the minister, I must say I am not satisfied that he has demonstrated he has sufficient concern or indeed sufficient knowledge of the situation with respect to the interface or relationship between RCMP security and National Revenue. It concerns me very much, and I should like to read a couple of things into the record which I believe will be of some assistance to the House.

Perhaps hon. members have not had an opportunity yet to be aware of testimony being taken at the commission of inquiry before Mr. Justice Laycraft. Inspector Graham George gave evidence on November 14, yesterday, and I should like to put a brief excerpt of his testimony on the record. He said:

There were many, many investigations where the income tax and the police forces acted together.

Mr. Jenkins, lawyer for Royal American Shows, asked:

If they (the tax department) wish to breach the Income Tax Act, in co-operation with your officers, that is fine with you?

The witness answered:

If you want to put it that way.

● (1802)

Then there was this question by Jack Major, another counsel:

There was a wide scope of investigations (involving both tax men and RCMP) that operated outside that (1972) agreement entirely?

The answer was, "Yes, sir".

Some years ago I was concerned, as were many other members, at the situation which occurred when William Buchanan, the then chairman of the anti-dumping tribunal, ran into some abuse of National Revenue authority. Members will recall that evidence was received that National Revenue had sent in a tax investigator on the pretext of doing a routine audit, when in fact the investigator appropriated evidence to support conflict of interest allegations. The justice in this case who rendered the final decision was none other than Bora Laskin of the Supreme Court of Canada. In dealing pretty harshly with the then minister of justice, I might add, he had this to say:

> I resist the temptation to expatiate on the way in which records were obtained from Buchanan and on the attempted use of the appellants' documents against Buchanan, although obtained on a confidential basis for the purposes of the Combines Investigation Act... or of the Income Tax Act. I say only that unjustified tactics were employed.

I repeat the words "unjustified tactics". So we have the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada saying in his judgment these things, which were extremely relevant and very harsh at the time, and which have been shown with the passing years to be very much apropos.

I am not one of those who are paranoid, and I recognize that in some areas we have to have extraordinary powers given to the police. But I resist strongly the suggestion that the police ought to be able surreptitiously, without a clear definition being given of the purposes for which they do it, to get access to the income tax files of millions of ordinary Canadians who have operated through the years in the sure and certain belief that if there is anything that was as inviolate as the mails—before we found out how opposite to inviolate are the mails—it was the income tax returns, which they sent in.

I think it is incumbent at this time, in view of the information which has been provided to the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), and which is coming from the Laycraft commission of inquiry, that the Minister of National Revenue at the earliest possible opportunity demonstrate his mastery of his portfolio, that he demonstrate that he understands the trust that he has, that he demonstrate that he knows what is going on, and that he stand up on motions and assure us as parliamentarians and as Canadians that, if there are encroachments upon this principle of confidentiality, they are very narrow. He should assure us what their scope really is, what are the circumstances under which the police do these things, and, most of all, that he knows about it and approves of it.

So far as National Revenue is concerned, I am afraid that, unless this is done, the people of Canada will be justified in drawing the conclusion they have drawn so far as solicitors general in recent years are concerned, that what has been going on certainly has not been within the knowledge of the minister concerned or, that if it was within the knowledge of the minister, that it was not with his approval.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker. The income tax reforms which we are talking about mean nothing if it turns out that the very basis upon which these returns are sent in is unclear and suspicions are left in the minds of Canadians that their returns are subject to arbitrary use by the police authorities, those returns having absolutely no reason to be included within any definition remotely resembling organized crime.

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, before dealing with any remarks on alleged infractions of the privacy or secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act, for the benefit of the hon. member I would like to make clear just what these provisions are. They are set out in great detail in section 241 of the Income Tax Act, and they are quite exacting.

Except as authorized by the act, "no official or authorized person" may give out information collected for the purposes of the act or permit others to have access to records obtained for those purposes. However, the law does say that these officials and authorized persons may communicate the information to other officials and authorized persons for purposes of the administration and enforcement of the tax law.

● (1807)

The act also makes it very clear that official and authorized persons need not in all cases be employees of the Department of National Revenue. To quote the act in part, an "official" is defined as:

> Any person employed in or occupying a position of responsibility in the service of Her Majesty.

An "authorized person" means:

> Any person engaged or employed to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act.

With one of the main points of the hon. member's question in mind, the Department of National Revenue is therefore clearly allowed to give tax information to the RCMP when we have asked them to assist us in a tax matter, since RCMP officers are very obviously "officials", as defined by the Income Tax Act. I might emphasize, however, that by the same token RCMP officers, as "officials" when they are in receipt of tax information, are bound by the same secrecy provisions of the act as are the employees of the department itself.

There are other items dealt with in the privacy provisions of the act in question concerning restrictions on the supplied information required in connection with legal proceedings, when it may and when it may not be supplied. I emphasize again, for the benefit of the hon. member, that these are not new provisions. They go back, with minor adjustments, for many years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

HEALTH—INSULIN—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON POSSIBLE PRODUCTION CUTS AND PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to pursue my recent question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) requesting an investigation of disturbing news of possible insulin shortages in Canada in the near future. Also the cost of insulin to diabetics has increased significantly, especially in the Toronto pharmacies.

This was disturbing news to many people, as insulin was discovered in 1921 by Toronto medical researchers, Frederick Banting and Charles Best. As we all know, Dr. Banting and Dr. MacLeod both received in 1923 the Nobel prize in medicine for this great work. What is also disturbing is that the Connaught Laboratories of the University of Toronto, now a subsidiary of the Canada Development Corporation, is virtually the sole Canadian manufacturer of insulin. In the past it has kept down the price of insulin.

In 1922 the cost of insulin was $10 per 100 units, but was reduced to 25 cents per 100 units in 1941, and remained at about that level until approximately 1960. Since 1961, and especially since 1967, the cost of insulin has increased dramatically. Today the Ontario Parcost Comparative Drug Index quotes the price of $6.70 for 100 international units of pork Toronto insulin. Of course, the price is much higher in certain private pharmacies in Toronto and neighbourhood.

What is also disturbing is we hear that the current feeding methods of livestock will result in lower yields of insulin from pancreas glands. More disturbing from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) on October 26 in this House is that Canada will be a net importer of pork this year because there is a reduced production of pork by 46 per cent in Canada. We are not self-sufficient in pork in our country. Therefore we will have to import pork. With the level of the Canadian dollar as it is, the price of pork pancreas will increase, as will the price of insulin.

This brings me to a disturbing question which many people are asking, not only diabetics but also diabetologists. Since we are going to see an increase in the price of insulin and specialty insulin preparations, we would like to know what Canada is preparing to do about this eventuality.

The United States is already making contingency plans to make sure they will not be caught with a shortage of pancreas glands. From some manufacturers we learn that it takes about 16 head of cattle plus 16 pigs to provide enough insulin for one diabetic for one year. As more and more diabetics are being diagnosed and require insulin, it looks as if demand for the pancreas glands will keep the prices up.

In view of the analysis of the situation that there is very little hope that prices will be controlled, especially from rising too high, and as we are not self-sufficient in pork, every effort should be made to find new ways to improve the production methods of insulin.

The government should investigate this disturbing news that we will probably be short of pork insulin in the future and that the cost of developing pork insulin and specialty insulin preparations will be high. That is why I hope the parliamentary secretary or the representative of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson) will give us some assurance that the government is doing something about the problem of insulin production and insulin prices in Canada today and in the near future.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be very curious to learn the source of the information placed before the House by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), as I am sure would be the Department of National Health and Welfare and possibly the Ministry of Agriculture, with regard to his statement that we are going to have a shortage of pork.

From time to time over the last two years, questions have been raised in the House and by the press relating to the availability and supply of materials for the production of the essential drug product insulin, needed by persons suffering from diabetes. Insulin, a naturally occurring hormone, is prepared from the pancreas glands of cattle and pigs, obtained at the packing plant level.

Let me first address the question of availability of animal pancreas. Until 1973, despite a ban on exports of beef pancreas, Canada was partially dependent on imports of pancreas glands and insulin to meet Canadian needs for insulin. Self-sufficiency was attained when collection procedures in packing plants were made more efficient and prices rose to world levels, thus encouraging more efficient collection.

Generally speaking, Canadian prices for pancreas glands are at par with U.S. prices which are decisive in determining the world price. Until 1973, Canadian insulin manufacturers paid less than the world price, and since then prices have increased up to the world market price. For the information of hon. members, the pancreas of beef and calves offer the most efficient yield of insulin; pork pancreas are one half to two thirds as efficient. The latter are not subject to export controls.

At the present time, I am informed, the total poundage of pancreas in storage is at historically high levels.

Questions have also been raised about the cost of insulin and its availability and reserve in Canada. Mr. Alun Davies, Executive Vice President of Connaught Laboratories Limited, the domestic producer of insulin, was contacted to determine if there was any potential for insulin shortage in Canada. He advised officers of the health protection branch of the department that current reserves of insulin are at an all time high and Connaught Laboratories Limited have an inventory which would supply all Canadian needs for a period of one to one and a half years, even if there was no more production of insulin at all.

● (1817)

As a result of increased production costs, the price of insulin rose some 10 to 12 per cent in each of the years 1975 and 1976. Increases in the price of pancreas and increased production costs necessitate a further 20 per cent increase in 1977. These increases in the price of insulin are not tied to any decrease in production or linked with the export of pancreas. I have just said that supplies of both pancreas and insulin are at levels ample to supply Canadian needs.

Permit me to remind hon. members that pork pancreas, which are not subject to export controls, are subject to wide price fluctuations on the world market and are less efficient for insulin production, and hence the insulin produced from these is more costly than that produced from beef.

In this light, I think that Canada is fortunate indeed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but his allotted time has expired.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF DEPARTMENTAL PROGRAMS—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE OF POLICY FOR ATLANTIC REGION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to pursue a little further with the government and its representative the question of the role of DREE, particularly as it affects the Atlantic area in the light of the desperate situation in which that area now finds itself.

When I raised this question on November 8 I drew attention to the work and studies done by the Economic Council of Canada and urged that these efforts be recognized by the minister. The Economic Council in its report "Living Together", indicated clearly that in the Atlantic region, at least, if not in all the disparate regions of Canada there was a surplus potential which could be exploited without over-exciting or agitating the inflationary pressures which exist in Canada today. I asked the minister whether it was not now time to take heed of the advice given by the council and apply what it termed innovative fiscal policies to the Atlantic region particularly, as well as to other disparate regions. I asked the minister whether or not consideration was being given to the application of new procedures, new incentives, to help balance out economic opportunities in various parts of this country.

The subject has become a lively one in recent days. The minister, in a well orchestrated effort yesterday, found an opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) suggesting—this was the inference—not only that the department would carry on but that there had been no discussion whatever with respect to the future of DREE. This was in spite of the admission a few weeks ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and the minister once responsible for the department, that it had failed in terms of its objectives.

In any event, the question of the department's future is not the one which I am raising. The question is whether or not the minister and the government have any proposals before them which might correct the disparate position in which the Atlantic area finds itself. Any such proposals must centre upon the development of new and innovative approaches to means of achieving economic expansion. Quite simply, we have to put an end to the "leakage" which has been occurring with regard to all forms of government aid going into these incentive plans and other ad hoc programs. It now runs as high as 70 or 75 per cent.

● (1822)

For every dollar that goes into the Atlantic region in the form of these grants, 70 cents or 75 cents of it goes back to central Canada, Quebec and Ontario, to purchase machinery, building supplies, electrical cable and so on. The Maritimes do not get to keep the money. Of the $155 million we have had under the Regional Development Incentives Act, the Atlantic region has retained less than $30 million. This has to be turned around.

When will the government recognize the surplus potential which exists in Atlantic Canada? When will it recognize that this surplus can be developed without fanning inflation? When will it use DREE in a way which will rid the Atlantic region of disparity?

There is room for the application of innovative ideas. Now is the time. There is need for greater tax cuts and the entire question of job development incentive in the tax area. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) has said on a number of occasions in this chamber over the last eight or ten years, we have to look for methods of developing and changing trading patterns. Failure to do these things will result in the continuing situation that faces us.

When the economy of Canada is high and going along well, we enjoy the benefits. When it turns soft, the Atlantic provinces go down much more rapidly than the rest of the economy. When the economy goes back up, we are so much further down and so much slower at recovery that the gap tends to widen. That is the nub of our problem. I can argue that the application of DREE has done more to bring pressure to bear on provincial and municipal social welfare programs—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, in commenting upon economic development in the Atlantic region of Canada, I wish to restate that the government has such a policy and that programs to give effect to that policy are being implemented.

Once again I must explain to the House that the DREE policy aims at strengthening the medium to long term economic base of the Atlantic region, and that it cannot be measured against short term job creation objectives. Also I must repeat that all of the North American continent, and indeed the world, has been experiencing an economic decline in the past three years. It is not realistic to expect that the Atlantic region of Canada can be exempt from that economic situation.

Criticism of the department has been aimed almost entirely at incentive programs which comprise scarcely more than 10 per cent of the DREE budget in Atlantic Canada. However, that 10 per cent can be demonstrated to be successful in terms of job creation. The remainder of the budget is directed to longer term developing strategies which, with the full concurrence of the provincial governments of the four Atlantic provinces, are being put into effect. The Economic Council of Canada has not criticized these strategies. The Atlantic Provinces Economic Council supports these strategies.

● (1827)

The philosophy and policies of development for the Atlantic region were formulated with the governments of the Atlantic provinces in 1974 at the beginning of the world turn-down. These policies, however, which range over the more productive and efficient use of resources, the enhancement of more value added and industrial development in the region, necessary infrastructure for economic development, and the reinforcement of urban centres of strength, remain valid and will pay off. At the present time over 35 action pacts under these strategies are under way across the region and will produce measurable results in the coming years. I know that the Atlantic provincial governments support DREE. I am firmly convinced that the people of the region also support and understand what DREE is doing in Atlantic Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

Motion withdrawn.

At 6.28 p.m. the House took recess.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF MINISTERS TO ACCEPT RESPONSIBILITY FOR METHODS USED BY SECURITY FORCES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark:

That this House has no confidence in the competence or desire of this government to follow the principle of ministerial responsibility, particularly as it applies to the direction of and methods used by the government security forces, and deeply regrets its unwillingness to allow a committee of this House to study the role of ministers in security operations.

● (2002)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if we are to judge by the mealy-mouthed and monotonous comments of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), whose full and specific meaning eluded us because he read a little too fast an overly lengthy text, which is in contrast with his enthusiasm of the last two weeks in this matter, there is no doubt now, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition has been called to order by an alert public opinion fully aware of the priceless value of the RCMP. It is now beating a retreat and avoiding any disparaging comment against an organization which after all deserves the respect and admiration of all Canadians.

[Mr. Maine.]

Faced with the double standard of behaviour suggested by the opposition, namely our unwarranted intervention for which we are blamed in the inquiry about the Sky Shops affair or the lack of it in the case involved in this debate, it is important, Mr. Speaker, to point out among significant facts one that deserves attention and seems to be deliberately overlooked by the opposition, that is the creation by the government on last July 6 of a royal commission of inquiry, the McDonald Commission. Therefore, it is important to review the facts in the true context of an institution democratically and legally constituted to shed light on the whole matter. So, on July 6, 1977, the government acknowledged several facts, and I quote,

... the government acknowledges the fact that it has been established that certain persons who were members of the RCMP at the time did, on or about October 7, 1972, take part jointly with persons who were then members of la Sûreté du Québec and la Police de Montréal in the entry of premises located at 3459 St. Hubert Street, Montreal, in the search of those premises for property contained therein, and in the removal of documents from those premises, without lawful authority to do so;

The government acknowledges the fact that allegations have recently been made that certain persons who were members of the RCMP at the time may have been involved on other occasions in investigative actions or other activities that were not authorized or provided for by law;

The government acknowledges the fact that, after having made inquiries into these allegations at the instance of the government, the Commissioner of the RCMP now advises that there are indications that certain persons who were members of the RCMP may indeed have been involved in investigative actions or other activities that were not authorized or provided for by law; and that as a consequence, the commissioner believes that in the circumstances it would be in the best interests of the RCMP that a commission of inquiry be set up to look into the operations and policies of the security service on a national basis;

● (2012)

The government recognized, on July 6, 1977, and I quote:

Since public support of the RCMP in the discharge of its responsibility to protect the security of Canada is dependent on trust in the policies and procedures governing its activities;

Finally, Mr. Speaker, on July 6, 1977, the government acknowledged the following:

AND WHEREAS the maintenance of that trust requires that full inquiry be made into the extent and prevalence of investigative practices or other activities involving members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that are not authorized or provided for by law.

THEREFORE, the Committee of the Privy Council, on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, advise that—be Commissioners under Part I of the Inquiries Act.

Members of the opposition who have been complaining that the commission of inquiry does not have the necessary powers to investigate all details of the incidents referred to these last few weeks should read sections 4 and 5, Part I of the Inquiries Act. Section 4 clearly stipulates the following:

The commissioners have the power of summoning before them any witnesses—

Including ministers.

—and of requiring them to give evidence on oath, or on solemn affirmation if they are persons entitled to affirm in civil matters, and orally or in writing, and to produce such documents and things as the commissioners deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine.

Section 5 of the act which applies and to which the order in council establishing the McDonald Commission refers, stipulates the following:

The commissioners have the same power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

Mr. Speaker, I read the preamble of the decision of the Privy Council to establish a royal commission of inquiry on last July 6 and I restated the facts it acknowledges and the provisions of the Inquiries Act to show that opposition members were wrong when they said the commission did not have all the powers it needs to clear up the incidents for which a branch of the RCMP has been blamed. I wanted to set the record straight because the situation must be analyzed in its proper perspective.

In a fable about a mountain that gave birth to a mouse, La Fontaine said, and I quote:

Une montagne en mal d'enfant
Jetait une clameur si haute
Que chacun au bruit accourant
Crut qu'elle accoucherait sans faute
D'une cité plus grosse que Paris
Elle accoucha d'une souris.

When scandals are not what some would like them to be, they make up their own! Thanks to the tremendous means of communication and amplification offered by modern media, a mountain is made out of a molehill. That is how after enough time has gone by history will undoubtedly interpret the explosion of righteous indignation we are witnessing with regard to the alleged "RCMP scandal" which I sense as a camouflage for a display of lowly demagogy and political partisanship.

The real RCMP scandal is not so much the incidents of which it has been accused, however wrong they may seem, as the frantic manner in which they are used not only to embarrass the government but to debase and tarnish an institution which, despite its errors, remains one of the most worthy of our society's confidence.

Mr. Speaker, the words I have just cited were written by an ordinary citizen and published in an eastern townships newspaper on November 10, 1977.

The Canadian people, Mr. Speaker, are now shocked by the way this debate raised by the opposition parties is evolving. Certain procedures of this House allow the opposition to make its point and I do not mind if it uses them completely. It is within the rules of parliament. However, there has been an abuse of procedure because in two weeks and a half they have used almost every single question period and almost every single motion proposed pursuant to Standing Order 43 to attack systematically the credibility of the RCMP. The opposition found it necessary to ask for an emergency debate as it did on October 31 to attack systematically and discredit the RCMP, and the opposition used its own leader, which is unusual, to participate in a late show at six o'clock pursuant to a special order of this House for the month of November and this once more to denigrate the RCMP.

And today, Mr. Speaker, this opposition day is again used to blame and attack systematically the RCMP, but had the opposition been more objective and more sensitive to the needs of the people it would have used that time today to discuss economic matters or, as this is November 15, to discuss Canadian unity.

Mr. La Salle: We will get around to the economy!

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I hear the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) shouting. He knows very well that today is November 15 and this is a good opportunity to speak about Canadian unity but his party forces him to denigrate the RCMP.

Mr. La Salle: We do not criticize the RCMP, but the government. Read the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council has the floor.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the opposition had a very good opportunity recently to demonstrate its good faith in this whole issue. The opposition had the best opportunity to demonstrate the great confidence it claims to have now in the RCMP.

Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that not very long ago, all of a sudden two pieces of equipment reportedly meant to be used for wire-tapping were found in the offices of two members of the opposition, namely the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark). How is it, Mr. Speaker, that at that time it was deemed proper to request the services of a little known company of private detectives from Toronto to handle, analyze and report in the first instance on that so-called wire-tapping equipment, when it would have been easy to call in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police? Why did the opposition not take the opportunity to prove its trust in—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Pinard: —when the RCMP was better equipped and could easily have found that equipment, analysed it and made a report to the House early in the game, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: They wanted a private firm!

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I say that calling in a private firm rather than the RCMP is strange indeed. That private firm found so-called wire-tapping equipment only in the offices of two members of the opposition. Later on, this House launched an inquiry; almost one hundred offices were visited, not by that private firm from Toronto, but by the House security services. Mr. Speaker, no one has heard of wire-tapping equipment being found in any office other than those of the hon. member for Central Nova and the Leader of the Opposition. I understand the suspicions of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) when he mentioned again yesterday that he had doubts about where those gadgets came from. I understand him very well, Mr. Speaker, but what strikes me most in this whole story is the obvious lack of respect and confidence that opposition members have shown for the RCMP. And it was reflected not only—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Pinard: —it was reflected not only in the situation I have just described but also in the remarks they have made for the past two and a half weeks during which they used all the procedures and tactics conceivable in this House to criticize and systematically discredit the RCMP regarding some isolated incidents into which a royal commission, an institution that was set up in a democratic way, will inquire and report.

Mr. Speaker, I blame the opposition for overlooking our institutions. This royal commission is set up in a legal and democratic manner. It has a mandate and I wonder why the opposition has been ignoring it for the past two weeks and a half. Apparently they want to take its place, make a judgment and consider facts one after the other in an attempt to discredit the RCMP and put the blame on the Solicitor General of Canada.

Some hon. Members: It takes cry babies! Unbelievable!

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, when the right hon. Prime Minister says that opposition members specifically are behaving as cry babies, he is right. These people would have been better advised to use these two weeks and a half of the time of the House of Commons to discuss the real problems of our society. Our economy needs some practical advice and a constructive opposition in the House. Our country's economy needs the co-operation of members on all sides of the House.

An hon. Member: That is too much to expect from the opposition.

Mr. Pinard: National unity is at stake and they manage to criticize those who try to help us maintain a peaceful and healthy social climate. If there were any illegal acts, if there were any isolated cases among the thousands which the RCMP are investigating, the federal government is not ignoring them. As soon as it became aware of them it has referred those cases to an existing royal commission one after the other. We can only wait for the McDonald commission to do its work and report to us later on. The federal government has always insisted that the rule of law should be respected. It will not oppose, if necessary, the proceedings which might be instituted against those who may have been at fault. In the meantime, however, I am all for applying the most equitable principle known in our society and to grant the benefit of the doubt; a person must be presumed innocent as long as he has not been found guilty in a court of law. I suggest it is the duty of this commission to examine the evidence and decide whether a number of RCMP members should be prosecuted.

Mr. La Salle: How about a number of ministers!

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) is again voicing his customary innuendoes. He will have the opportunity to speak again tonight—I assume and hope so—and to cast aspersions upon the RCMP just as his colleagues have been doing for the past fifteen days and a half. Tonight, I want to say this: What the opposition should have done today, what opposition parties should have done today is not to move a non-confidence motion against a governement which has assumed its responsibilities and respects its police force as well as the Canadian public; what the opposition should have done is move a motion of full confidence in, support and admiration for the man who, in all this, has been receiving the full support and esteem of all his colleagues on this side of the House as well as the larger majority of the Canadian public, I mean the most esteemed Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Fox).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (2022)

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in the debate tonight I would say that of any debate I have been engaged in in this House, this is the most important debate to parliament and the Canadian people.

In my few words of introduction I would like to return to the motion which reads:

> That this House has no confidence in the competence or desire of this government to follow the principle of ministerial responsibility, particularly as it applies to the direction of and methods used by the government security forces, and deeply regrets its unwillingness to allow a committee of this House to study the role of Ministers in security operations.

These two points are what this debate concerns. We say that the country and parliament has lost confidence in this government because of its failure to discharge ministerial responsibility, and secondly, its failure to allow parliament, by committee, to examine what has been going on in reference to the security of this nation.

It seems to be the parliamentary secretary has exaggerated in the sense that he said, "We have been engaged for two and a half weeks in this matter." During the question period we have been asking questions and receiving no answers.

The point I want to make at the beginning is this: I believe the parliamentary secretary should appreciate that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is the chief minister in Canada, and it is his responsibility to look after security matters. That responsibility cannot be passed on to any planning security branch, nor can that responsibility be passed on to any police force. That responsibility is on the shoulders of the Prime Minister and on the shoulders of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) and of the Attorney General (Mr. Basford).

I want to turn to two charges that were made by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice, speaking in Vancouver, as reported by the Canadian Press and repeated again this afternoon in the House, attacked opposition demands for greater ministerial accountability for the activities of the force. "Day to day political control of the police by the Attorney General is contrary to the Canadian practice and leads directly to a police state. We are not going to have political manipulation of the police force, and we are not going to be pushed into this sort of a thing, by the opposition, by anyone."

The minister's same statement is reported in the Citizen and I do not need to repeat it again.

The charges we are faced with tonight are these: First of all, it is alleged we have suggested that the government, either the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General, the Attorney General or any minister concerned with security must monitor the different duties and responsibilities of the police force day to day. Nowhere in the pages of Hansard, nowhere in the media or in the press generally has there been any foundation for such a charge.

I ask the Minister of Justice to stand up and show us anywhere in Hansard or the parliamentary debates that we have suggested to them monitoring the police work from day to day. In fact what we have said, and as my leader so ably pointed out this afternoon, is that the responsibility for security is under the jurisdiction of the Prime Minister and the two ministers I have mentioned. What we are saying is this, that surely there would be no accountability at all if we are to believe the ministers, which I do not accept. They have never had any accountability. It is not a day-to-day job. They have not done it from week to week or month to month or year to year for eight years. There has been an absence of any accountability, or any responsibility.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Woolliams: It is not ministerial responsibility we should be talking about tonight, it is ministerial irresponsibility and culpability as far as this matter is concerned. It is a serious matter, because the unity of this country is at stake tonight on security matters, when you realize it is being governed by a group of men and women who have done nothing to make sure the security service of this nation was accountable to the government, and that they take or discharge their responsibilities in that regard.

An hon. Member: Take it seriously.

Mr. Woolliams: So I say, nowhere has the Progressive Conservative party taken a position that the government must necessarily monitor the activities of the RCMP and it is nowhere in the evidence.

Now I turn to the second charge, for which I need to make no apology. It is this red herring. I would say it is a plot by the Prime Minister and those responsible for security in this country to say, "How can we get this onus and responsibility off our shoulders? Because the opposition are interrogating us, and we are covering up and we are not going to give the answers, we will come out with a red herring," and that red herring is the plot set up by the government to say that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada is standing and criticizing, and is opposed to one of the great police forces of this world, namely, the RCMP.

Mr. Harquail: That is what you did for two weeks.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not intend to answer my friend and will not name his constituency. I do not want to embarrass him back home. He is embarrassed enough by the policies of this government.

Mr. Harquail: You will not embarrass me. Go ahead.

Mr. Woolliams: I repeat, nowhere can you find that we have offered any criticism of police officers. We say that responsibility should have been that of the Prime Minister and the other ministers. So that when the Minister of Justice makes the charge that we suggested they should monitor the police work from day to day, that is utter nonsense. That is untruthful. When he made that charge in Vancouver, he said he had 400 or 500 clapping Liberals from British Columbia stand up. I can understand why he got a pumpkin pie in the face. It is too bad those seeds were not as hard as rocks.

• (2032)

Mrs. Campagnolo: Shocking!

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the lady minister talking. Does she want to make a speech? The Minister of Justice, because of the position he holds, because of the traditions of this parliament and our due process of law and democracy in this country, has always been accepted as a man like Lapointe, Fulton, and others who stood above politics because their job was to administer the law of Canada and to make sure that law and order were applied to everyone equally. They made sure we were governed by the rule of law, not the rule of people.

I say without hesitation these accusations made by the Minister of Justice are absolutely without parallel in the history of the Canadian parliament. It was scurrilous and unprincipled and, coming from the Minister of Justice, a supposedly non-political figure, it makes it much worse.

Such an attack might be expected from the former solicitor general, the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand). As the head of the justice caucus of my party, I say it is unworthy of the Attorney General of Canada to make such a political attack based on facts that are not correct.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Let us analyse his attack as far as the police are concerned. Like the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), many, many times I have stood in my place to defend citizens in this country in cases in which police officers of that great force, the RCMP, have given evidence. It has been our job to cross-examine them in cases of murder and other serious crimes. Over the years I have found them to be very honest and sincere. Probably only 1 or 2 per cent are involved in security.

The change in security came about when this government set up the planning security branch composed of civilians, which interferes with the good work and traditions of the RCMP, which we on this side of the House supported. Like the right hon. member for Prince Albert and our former leader, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), I have supported them over the years.

Mr. Harquail: Apologize to the RCMP.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend should apologize to the Canadian people. The parliamentary secretary should restrain himself. I rose on a point of order this afternoon. I did not yell from my seat. I try to keep my brains in a little higher area of my anatomy.

The Minister of Justice attacked the official opposition over the weekend on the basis of what he would like our position to be. He would like to pretend that we on this side do not believe in a strong and effective police force who want to achieve their aims by legal means, not by terrorism, kidnapping and assassination. He would like to pretend that the Conservative party is not proud of the job done by the RCMP at the Olympics and that the RCMP will not get our support and respect.

He would love to be able to show the opposition as unrealistic, naïve, and unwittingly supportive of subversive elements in the country. In fact he wants this to be our position so badly that he assures his gullible Liberal friends that it is our position, and then he attacks it mercilessly. This is known as knocking down a straw man.

However, he made a slip in his presentation. He said it is fundamental to the rule of the law and the protection of civil liberties that they, the police, operate under the law. Presto—the minister repeated the essence of the opposition case. Obedience to the law by the security forces is not just nice or sometimes convenient, but fundamental. Is the minister about to cross the floor? Is he going to take the opposite position that he is against the police? That is what he is suggesting, and he is accusing us of being against the RCMP. I say to him that all the evidence is the opposite. The responsibility is on the government. This is merely a plot to take the responsibility and the heat off their own shoulders because of their irresponsibility and culpability in this matter.

Mr. Harquail: So says the opposition.

Mr. Woolliams: The government would also have everyone believe that we are advocating political interference with the course of sensitive investigations, and that we are in favour of giving politicians access, willy-nilly, to whatever is turned up. An ingenious perversion of the truth!

The minister said we are not going to have political manipulation of the police force. Nobody ever suggested that. Not even the Liberals suggested that. We only want some accountability. The minister said they are not going to be pushed into that sort of thing by the opposition, or by anyone. The brave Minister of Justice! Will there be a single straw man left standing when his courageous purge of heresies is completed?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

He knows full well that the question at issue is the responsibility of ministers for defining in general terms the ends and means of their departments, to set the tone. No one has suggested that a Solicitor General should interfere in day-to-day police work, or demand access to security and criminal files as the whim takes him. Can the minister not tell the difference between ministerial responsibility and ministerial interference?

However, we must show some sympathy for the dilemma the minister faced. He could not have gathered a standing ovation from his audience by telling the truth. The one thing he did accomplish is to get a pie in the face.

Mrs. Campagnolo: Do you think he is lying?

Mr. Harquail: Are you calling him a liar?

Mr. Fraser: Yes, he is. Nowhere did we ever say what he alleged was said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has the floor for the purpose of making a speech, and I suggest we all listen.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps when I am asked about whether he is lying, I can sum it up in the words of Francis Bacon, "Nothing does more hurt in a state than that a cunning man pass for wise." That may be the answer to the question.

Mr. Harquail: That is not Bacon; it is yourself, ham and eggs.

Mr. Woolliams: According to Dicey, all ministers, whether they be in or outside the cabinet, are responsible for their personal acts, the general conduct of their departments, and acts done in their name by the departmental officials. If a minister is personally blameworthy, he ought to make a public admission of his responsibility. That is all we are asking.

Dicey said, unless the Prime Minister is unwilling to stand by the minister under attack, a minister may choose, and has not infrequently chosen in recent years, to brazen out appalling indiscretions. That is what this government has done on this issue. It has brazened out appalling indiscretions of its own responsibility which it has shelved and put on the shoulders of the RCMP.

Only a short time ago this government was removing words from RCMP cars across this nation. They took off words from various police stations in this country. We stood and defended the RCMP. They were against them. Now they want to move it across to the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Diefenbaker wants to apologize; why don't you join him?

Mr. Woolliams: Dicey said, and I quote:

> The point, however, which should never be forgotten is this: it is now well established law that the Crown can act only through ministers and according to certain prescribed forms which absolutely require the co-operation of some minister, such as a Secretary of State or the Lord Chancellor, who thereby becomes not only morally but equally responsible for the legality of the act in which he takes part.

When we asked these questions, why did the minister not say it was his responsibility and that he would look into it?

If there has been an indiscretion in the planning security group, which is a civilian group, it really changed the whole image of the RCMP. It got them into the situation today where they are not able to defend themselves and where they are being blackmailed by this government right across this land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: That is the kind of language they like. Your friends are happy now.

Mr. Woolliams: My friends are always happy, but I understand why you are not. Paranoid people are never happy. Dicey continued:

Hence, indirectly but surely, the action of every servant of the Crown, is therefore in effect of the Crown itself, is brought under the supremacy of the law of the land.

● (2042)

Mr. Harquail: They'll get you!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, this hon. member wants to speak at the same time as I do. If he wants the floor I will sit down and let him get it off his chest. He is the man who is destroying the image of this parliament across the nation because of the shouting and yelling.

Mr. Harquail: I am delighted to have been invited by the hon. member to say a few words. It is one of the few courtesies we have been shown by the opposition in recent weeks. I feel that my privileges have been trampled on in the House in the last few weeks because of the attitude taken and the language used in this chamber, and I want to say—

An hon. Member: Who's crying now?

Mr. Harquail: Do you understand me?

Mr. Gillies: We all understand you are the stupidest man in the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I should like to point out to the parliamentary secretary that he ought to raise a question of privilege when it affects him, not now.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry to see the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) in this light, because his constituents must know, now, because I have smoked him out, who has been making all the noise in parliament which has been seen over TV across the nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Bye-bye!

Mr. Harquail: Go ahead, you have the floor, now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams).

Mr. Woolliams: Hence, indirectly but surely, the action of every servant of the Crown and thereby, in effect, the Crown itself, is brought under the supremacy of the law of the land.

The acts of ministers no less than the acts of subordinate officials are made subject to the risk of law. In other words, every public servant in whatever department comes directly under the responsibility of a minister. That is the issue of the debate today and that is the reason we moved our motion. We did so because we have found that hon. members sitting on the treasury benches opposite are not prepared, as a democratic government, to accept their constitutional responsibility to be accountable to parliament.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Young: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to interrupt the learned justice critic for the official opposition while he was in full flight, but there are two points he made which I should like him to clarify.

An hon. Member: His time is up!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I am prepared to listen to the point of order raised by the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, at one point in his speech the hon. member for Calgary North said it was a pity that someone threw only a pie at the learned Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) over the week end. I do not know whether I heard him correctly, but I believe he said it was too bad it was not rocks that were thrown. I am sure he would wish to withdraw that remark.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I am sorry. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in my speech did I say they should throw rocks. I said that when they threw pumpkin pie I hoped the seeds of the pumpkin would be as hard as rocks so that the minister would realize that when he made this, in my view, untruthful attack on the opposition, he was being opposed by public opinion across the land even though they did take a pie to do it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to the hon. member that that is not a question of privilege but a matter of dispute.

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been understandably distressed to learn that police forces entered premises in Montreal without a warrant and removed records in October, 1972, and that police burnt down a barn in Quebec in the same year to prevent a meeting between members of the FLQ and the Black Panthers.

Canada's police have enjoyed an excellent reputation for maintaining peace and good order, and they have earned the confidence of Canadians. Recent publicity raised the possibility that this confidence may have been misplaced and that the judgment of our police forces, especially in the complex area of national security, may not always be dependable. The opposition response to that concern would be to require tight political control, including an accounting by officers of the RCMP of their methods of information gathering.

Obviously the law applies to everyone, including the police. Indeed, one might say that police in a civilized society have a particular obligation to uphold the rule of law. I think it is fair to say that most Canadian police personnel pride themselves on operating in a disciplined way within the limits society considers acceptable. However, we have before us some evidence of what, at best, may be regarded as over-zealousness and, at worst, can be described in harsher terms.

If one accepts that the government does need to tighten effective control over the RCMP, one is left with the question of how this is to be done without the government then being open to accusations of political interference. There are some very broad questions involving the rule of law and the proper limits of national security activity which need to be addressed.

While media attention has focused on the RCMP in its over-all mandate, it is clear that the motion before us deals with the security functions of the RCMP and this, indeed, is where matters have changed so much in recent years. The RCMP, in its capacity as the federal police force, has long had prime responsibility for security investigations and operations. Section 18 of the act which came into force in 1969 gave the RCMP broad responsibilities for crime prevention and for intelligence and security services. Common law tradition also gives a peace officer broad discretion to do whatever is necessary to maintain public peace and order.

Until recent times, the question of exercising any of these broad powers would not have arisen because the provocation was not there. In 1963 Canadians encountered for the first time terrorist activities involving bombings and personal injuries resulting in death. In 1970 came the events in Quebec which resulted in the proclamation of the War Measures Act.

In Quebec at that time, police cast a very wide net. Some 5,000 raids were conducted which netted 465 suspects, of whom only 62 were charged with any crime and only 30 were convicted. The criticism was made that because of weak police intelligence-gathering earlier, this wide net was cast after the event and innocent people were subjected to grave inconvenience and interference with their lives. It was also said then that, in at least some cases, addresses of known and previously-arrested radicals were not available at police headquarters. Hence, thousands of searches absorbed the regular police forces to the point where they could not perform other essential functions and where they had to ask that troops be brought in to perform them.

The presence of troops in Quebec streets was distressing to all Canadians, and particularly to Québécois. Many people said then, if in peaceful times the police knew more about the potentially violent, when those people did strike, that the police would be prepared and would be able to take efficient and economical measures to deal with them, without infringing so broadly on the rest of society. As John Gellner put it in his "Bayonets in the Streets", "there would not be as much hitting of air as there so often is when a liberal democracy moves reluctantly and uncertainly to defend itself against assault from within." At that time public opinion demanded and required that the police improve their intelligence gathering about potential urban guerillas.

However, Canadians were concerned also that security and intelligence gathering forces be able to differentiate clearly between peaceful dissent and potential for violent acts, between noisy students with a fondness for rhetoric as an end in itself and those who were likely move from loud words to violent deeds.

Canadians have traditionally had high requirements for our security forces. We expect they will protect us and enable us to live in peace and security under the law. The average law-abiding citizen considers that since he or she fulfils obligations in society, he or she is entitled to demand that the state fulfil its obligations by maintaining its ability to ensure security and to take adequate preventive measures. On the other hand, we have a proud tradition of respecting civil liberties and wanting to have the rights of the majority protected in ways that are civilized, reasonable, and fair to dissenters.

That sense of fairness has been less evident of recent weeks. We have heard calls for charges to be laid against RCMP officers who are thought to have acted extra-legally. Many of these requests were made without evidence of a case that would be sustainable in court. The question also arises as to whether an officer in these situations may, in fact, be able to defend himself adequately in public court, or whether, in the interest of national security, he would have to remain silent about matters which might assist his defence.

Questions of intent have to be considered. Is the police officer who enters premises without a warrant in search of information, which he believes vital to safety and security, to be charged under precisely the same "break and enter" provisions as the criminal who breaks in to steal for personal gain; or should the security officer be required to be accountable for his actions in some other fashion?

Are we limiting the protective and preventive functions of our security officers by requiring that they always have warrants? Conversely, is it a myth that security information needs to be gathered secretly, and should we challenge this myth and insist that warrants be obtained in all cases?

These are matters on which we have heard a lot from the media in recent weeks; but we need to hear from ordinary thoughtful Canadians whose interest in having a sane, secure, and civilized society is of a different order from the media interest in sensationalism.

We have encountered new threats to safety in recent years, such as the activities of the Japanese Red Army, one of whom was found in Toronto last year and was got out of the country without incident, thanks to the RCMP intelligence. Also there have been the activities of the Baader-Meinhof gang in Germany, and terrorist groups in the Middle East. We have seen a massacre in Germany at the time of their Olympic Games, and we have seen our Olympic Games in Montreal conducted in peace because of our security forces.

Recently we had to send diplomats back to their own countries because of unacceptable activities in Canada. That information came from the RCMP security forces. On each occasion when a consular or an embassy official is required to leave Canada, the media asked for reasons and full disclosure. I do not detect much general support for that position. The average citizen does not consider that security intelligence needs to be printed in every newspaper, as long as the threat to our internal safety has been removed, and most important, as long as people have the confidence that our security officers have acted reasonably and responsibly.

Canadians want information when it is useful and practical. They want to know in general that our police and security forces act in a way which is consonant with our moral values. That may mean, in order to restore confidence at this time, it may be desirable to have a broader publication of such things as cabinet directives. On October 28 the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), when speaking in this House, summarized the cabinet directive of March 27, 1975, which defined the mandate of the security service of the RCMP, and that of May 27, 1976, which dealt with security screening of public servants.

Public perception of security requirements changes in response to changing times. The broad general powers of the 1959 act are clearly not specific enough to be acceptable in our times.

The Royal Commission on Security statement in 1969 that "A security service is unavoidably involved in activities which run counter to the spirit, if not the letter of the law, and in illegal or other activities which seem to infringe upon individual rights", stated a position which had support in 1969 but which concerns many people today. Granted that security work involves undercover work and the use of informants, but one must ask if that should include illegal or extra-legal activities.

In 1974 the Protection of Privacy Act included a new definition of "subversive activities". The cabinet directive of 1975-1976 further attempted to bring more precision to a field where security officers were operating to a large extent on the basis of personal judgment.

The Royal Commission of Inquiry under Mr. Justice McDonald has broad powers to inquire into the national security service. I look forward to seeing their recommendations, which will assist us in defining precisely the parameters of effective and acceptable security procedures.

Particularly I hope that the RCMP, who up to this point have been excluded from participation in media coverage, will have an input to the commission proceedings. If experienced people who have a well developed evaluative bent have recommendations to make, those recommendations would surely be a very important ingredient, an ingredient which has been missing from the current debate and which is an essential part of the dialogue if procedures are to be brought about which are sensible and effective and are to be seen as such by all Canadians.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, the issue in this court is clearly ministerial responsibility, and let no one doubt that we are in a court. However, in this court it is not the RCMP which is on trial. I believe the government realizes that, despite the red herrings, the gymnastics, the gyrations, the figure skating and the repetition time and again from government benches, "RCMP, RCMP, RCMP". We heard that 24 times yesterday. Despite that it is the government and its ministers who are on trial, as they are on trial every day in our system of government. So let us forget the red herrings, the figure skating, and the gymnastics.

What is ministerial responsibility? There are many textbooks. I had five, I think, sent over from the parliamentary library tonight. There are many scholastic papers and academic dissertations. There is no shortage of material describing ministerial responsibility, but one definition which is a common sense definition is simply that ministerial responsibility is synonomous with ministerial competence. An irresponsible minister is an incompetent minister. That is the issue. A minister who is incompetent and so judged in this court, the House of Commons, ought to be returned to the back benches or sent back to private life. It is as simple as that.

The second aspect of ministerial responsibility is, responsible to what and for what? The "responsible to" is easy. A minister is responsible in a collective sense to the cabinet but ultimately to the House of Commons. Responsible for what? In my view, there are three categories of responsibility. First, the administrative lapses or errors for which an official is to blame and which could not possibly have been within the range of knowledge of the minister: in this case the minister owes an assurance that corrections have been made to prevent a recurrence.

Second, policy errors leading to departmental problems for which the entire cabinet takes responsibility: this having happened they are perfectly entitled to say, "If you don't like it, you can defeat us at the next election". That is a second form of responsibility.

There is a third one which the government, for some reason, fails to acknowledge. It has tried to throw all the illegal and unusual activity into one or other of those first categories. The third one is administrative lapses or errors in operational policy which should have been within the range of knowledge of a reasonably intelligent and energetic minister who, in accepting office, accepted the responsibility of supervising the operating procedures of his department to ensure they were consistent with community standards of efficiency, justice, and decency. That is ministerial competence.

I am very reluctant to refer to that definition because it contains the word "operational", and I say this as an aside. Today as he stood in his place the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) went on at great length using that word and discussing the difficulty with his department interfering with the day-to-day operations of any security force. I agree, but he went on at such great length that I am now very concerned. We put questions earlier this week and last week with respect to whether the police security planning and analysis branch within his department was operational, and I am very nervous about the answers we now have because, according to the minister's definition, operational goes far beyond what I would have thought would have been the meaning of that word in the ordinary sense, and I believe we should ask those questions again. However, this third function is the test of a responsible minister in the sense of ministerial competence, and this House—not a royal commission, not an administrative tribunal, and not our law courts—will judge that competence.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: If we are to judge the responsibility and the competence of a government or the ministers within that government we must do so, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, in the context of the times, but I would put that context much more honestly than the right hon. gentleman did. He was talking about 1972 and 1973, and the real context, as has been pointed out in this House, at that time was not murders and kidnapping. It was a minority Liberal government here in Ottawa and a Liberal government in Quebec getting ready for an election. It was a spill-over from Watergate. However, let us put this in the proper context of the times.

Let us go back to June of 1969 when the Prime Minister tabled the edited version of the Mackenzie royal commission report and rejected the recommendation of that commission, rightly or wrongly, for a security service separate from the RCMP. As reported at page 10637 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> The security service, under the Commissioner of the RCMP, will be increasingly separate in structure and civilian in nature.

The Prime Minister said the security service would be under the Commissioner of the RCMP, but subsequent events give very serious doubts indeed as to whether it was under direct supervision of the Commissioner of the RCMP. However, leaving that aside, the important aspects in that statement by the Prime Minister in tabling the report were that the security service would be separate in structure and civilian in nature. What should that mean to a competent, responsible minister? It should mean a possible lack of policy direction from the minister and that this group would have none of the discipline or tradition of the RCMP. Therefore the minister responsible for that group should be doubly diligent.

On that very same day the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), who I am sure takes no satisfaction whatsoever in his prophecy, had this to say, and I quote from page 10639 of Hansard:

> I am sure that members of parliament accept the necessity that much of the security operation is conducted outside our purview. What would be cause for grave concern would be any thought that much of the operation is beyond the ken of the ministry or the Prime Minister; that there are not ministers, elective and responsible members of government, to whom the entire security operation is an open book, who have continuing access to everything that is going on in that area, and who give proper, responsible, political, civilian direction to the operation on a continuing basis. None of us would want to see a security operation in this country running under its own steam and answerable only to itself—a government, so to speak, within the government. The very decision as to what affects security and what does not, what must be secret and what public, is finally a matter of political decision and judgment. The effective supremacy of the civilian authority must never be compromised in this matter.

This was the clearest possible warning to be vigilant, to be competent, to be responsible. All of this in June 1969, yet two years and three months later the then solicitor general, now the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), in a statement on motions described the operations of a group in his department called the Security Planning and Research Group. Any pretense of research soon disappeared. This is now known as the Police and Security Planning and Analysis Branch, under Colonel Bourne.

In giving that statement the then solicitor general clearly adopted the principles enunciated by the hon. member for Halifax, then Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. He clearly adopted those principles, clearly acknowledged the need for vigilance, competence and responsibility in this area of security. Along the way there was created a security secretariat in the Privy Council, and also some group or other in the Prime Minister's office. There was as well a cabinet committee on security chaired by the Prime Minister.

All of these—the security and intelligence group, the Solicitor General's group, the Privy Council secretariat, and the Prime Minister's group, were not composed of lowly civil servants but rather, highly placed men and women with direct access to ministers and the Prime Minister. Despite all of this, or perhaps because of the web the government created for itself, there has been no vigilance, no competence, and no responsibility.

The government must stand convicted in this court of one of two crimes. First, if the cabinet or some of its members knew of the illegalities and irregularities, they are guilty; if they did not know, they are equally guilty. We have to give the ministers and the government the benefit of the doubt, which is very hard in light of the revelations. Even giving them the benefit of the doubt we must ask ourselves whether they were careful to remain ignorant. For example, the Solicitor General said in so many words, "I cannot go through six years of files." Mr. Speaker, his time would have been better spent going through six years of files than engaging in the figure skating we have seen during the question period. I might excuse him if I knew he had been going through those files.

The Prime Minister says that to ask repeated questions would invite the accusation of having undue political influence on law enforcement agencies. What nonsense that is, Mr.

Speaker, saying that to ask questions would invite accusations of having undue political influence. That is sheer garbage, a complete desertion of ministerial responsibility. Certainly they have to ask questions. I presume that every week in his briefing sessions the Solicitor General is asking questions. If he is not, he should be asked why. And what about his predecessors, why were they not asking questions?

All the red herrings and all the figure skating we have seen over the last two weeks are consistent with only one thing—they are consistent with a government and its ministers who have rejected their responsibilities. They are consistent with nothing else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jarvis: Some of the responsibilities are difficult, Mr. Speaker. It is trite to say what a difference there is between political dissent and subversion. That is a difficult problem and no one on this side, or in any party in this House, is denying that. But surely that difficulty is no excuse or reason for a minister or ministers to be careful to remain ignorant of facts. It cannot be thus in our system in terms of ministerial competence or ministerial responsibility.

The Solicitor General unhappily insists on the easy way out—change the law, not break it. That is a trite answer. He asks Canadians not to be too harsh in judging some of the people involved. People are not harsh in judging the people involved, Mr. Speaker—the people are harsh in judging, as is their right through their elected representatives, the competence and responsibility of ministers.

The minister stood in his place today and said that he wanted people not to be too harsh in judging people. That is garbage. It is our job to judge them. That is the reason for the existence of this House—to judge them.

The Solicitor General said that people are demanding that heads roll. He also objects to the term "government security forces." Good heavens, if we cannot use that term without the Solicitor General objecting, what term shall we use? The Solicitor General says we create the impression that it is a state police. Nonsense!

Finally, the Solicitor General says that everything goes to the royal commission. When he runs out of answers everything is a matter for the royal commission. The McDonald commission has been overtaken by events in the context of times through no fault of its own—an avalanche of events, as one editorial put it.

That commission was established on the basis of one alleged illegal event—the hon. parliamentary secretary shakes his head—with assurances in this House that there would not by any more. The hon. member would do well to check the record and I hope he will rise to correct me at the end of my remarks if I am wrong. I would welcome his interjection.

We were not talking about revelation after revelation, daily, every time we turned on the television or read a newspaper. I have no satisfaction, no member of this party and I am sure not even the parliamentary secretary know any satisfaction in that at all. My point is that taken in the context of its time, the time of the appointment of the McDonald Commission, events have overtaken it and left it far behind. I am not saying the commission should be disbanded. Not at all. Let it continue, but let us be clear: the sequence of events that have overtaken the McDonald commission now involve the rule of law, the limits on national security activity, the political supervision of the police function, and the quality of ministerial judgment. The McDonald commission is not and cannot be charged with the political half of this problem. There is no indication that the terms of reference are broad enough. Forgetting that, what inclination would the commission have to assume that responsibility? None at all, Mr. Speaker. Events have overtaken that commission.

For the sake of the integrity of the RCMP, if for no other reason, do not wait for the ponderous deliberations of the royal commission. The commission is not charged with the responsibility of restoring public confidence. What exists today, November 15, in Canada is an attack on the integrity not only of the administration of law enforcement agencies, which is serious enough, but on the political system itself.

It is this House of Commons and no other forum that should and must meet the attack. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to reconsider its rejection of an all-party committee of this House of Commons because it is our view, and surely must be the view of Canadians everywhere, that it is only this House and its members through this committee that can take the first step to meet that attack.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, what I have found thoroughly depressing about the last week or two is not the activities of the RCMP although I must say I think in some cases the police have deserved criticism, but it has been the complete insensitivity of the Government of Canada to its responsibilities and to the whole basic human right which depends upon the maintenance of law and order.

● (2122)

We have seen contempt for the principle of law and order on the part of representatives of the government, and I propose to try to document that statement to some extent. This is what I think has been the most distressing feature of this whole situation, and it is so unnecessary. If you want my opinion, Mr. Speaker, I think it is plain stupid.

I think that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) in her little discussions at Carleton University spoke more sense than all the ministers of the government who have spoken on this matter when she said there was no emergency, that the proper thing to do—and I underline this—was for government representatives to say, "Something has happened which is serious, which is wrong, and we intend to investigate. We intend where necessary to prosecute. We intend to appoint a commission to see whether there are further ramifications".

Instead of doing that, Mr. Speaker, the government erected a wall of indifference in this House. I think "concealment" is not too strong a word. I say that is totally unnecessary. If the government had come forward in a straightforward manner and said, "Some things have gone wrong which we did not know about but now we are prepared to act", then I think this House and the public of Canada would have gladly accepted that. But that is not the way the government chose to act. Among all of the principal ministers concerned there has been evasion. There has been failure to face the facts which were clearly put before them.

I want particularly to refer to something which was reported just today which the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), who, I remind the House, is one of the law officers of the Crown, said. He is reported as saying that the RCMP felt nothing was unusual or wrong in operations, and that is why they did not report anything. That is why they kept the matter concealed from the minister himself. Surely no more gratuitous insult has ever been paid to the RCMP.

Does the Solicitor General really believe that the RCMP are so lacking in moral understanding that they do not understand the meaning of theft, or breaking or entering, or arson, taping other people's telephone conversations, or tampering with their mail? Does he really think the RCMP do not know that is wrong? If he does think that, Mr. Speaker, then he is totally and utterly perverse. To imagine that the RCMP do not know better than that is, as I say, a gratuitous insult. That some of them erred is obvious. Their errors are serious and should be dealt with seriously; I am not arguing that. But to suggest that you can excuse them, as the Solicitor General tries to do by saying that they really did not know that they were breaking in, or that they were diverting the mail and that they did not know that it was wrong for them to do this, is ridiculous. Of course they knew it was wrong. Any child would know that breaking and entering or arson is wrong. Any child with half a brain would know that burning down barns is wrong.

I have been quoting the Solicitor General from an interview which he gave to the Globe and Mail, reported in its issue for November 15. The Solicitor General is a lawyer learned in the law—at least I presume he is—and in addition is one of the chief law officers of the Crown in this country. I say we have come to a pretty pass when a law officer comes up with a statement like that.

I should like to quote another statement made by the Solicitor General which appeared in the Ottawa Today newspaper for November 10. The headline reads: "Mounties Lied But Fox Defends Them Anyway". Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I ask what sort of Solicitor General do we have? If his employees are lying to him, why does he not take some action? Why does he defend them when they have lied to him? How can he expect any discipline or respect when he gets up in public and says that although the RCMP lied he is going to defend them in any event? I will not go into the text of the quotation but it can be found in Ottawa Today for Thursday, November 10.

The minister has constantly played down the seriousness of this matter. He has constantly taken a defensive view of some matters which are clearly in no way defensible, least of all defensible by an employer who is responsible for maintaining law and order in Canada.

I now want to turn to the next scene in the act, and this concerns an even more distinguished individual. I refer to the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). The Prime Minister has constantly played down this matter. According to another headline, the Prime Minister "was not prepared to condemn those in raid." He then went on to use one of the most crazy analogies I have ever heard. He said the situation was as if someone had an atom bomb and was about to blow up a city, so that you had to take immediate action. What nonsense, Mr. Speaker! Did anybody in this whole story have any atom bombs ready to blow up anything at all? That analogy is utterly false. I cannot imagine what sort of reasoning would have allowed the Prime Minister to put those words into his mouth, yet that is what he said; I have the full text of his press conference.

The Prime Minister then went on to say something else which I found very remarkable. He said that the royal commission on security had said "Well, you know, you've got to stretch the law to its limits; sometimes it might even be stretched beyond its limits." Well, Mr. Speaker, I have looked through the report of the royal commission. I know personally two of the royal commissioners, one the late Mr. Coldwell who is not with us any more, and the other Mr. Max Mackenzie, and I cannot imagine either saying any such thing. Therefore I looked through the record to find out what they did say, and I can confirm they never said any such thing. This is not the Mackenzie doctrine or the security commission doctrine; that you stretch the law if you find it convenient to do so is the Trudeau doctrine. So much for the Prime Minister.

I do not want to forget, because he is my favourite bête noire, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). I hesitate to trust myself to describe the stand which he took. He went to Vancouver and spoke to a cheering crowd of people.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Liberals.

Mr. Brewin: Liberals. He lashed out at the opposition parties for pillorying the RCMP with innuendo and allegations. I say this is an absolute falsehood. We have not pilloried the RCMP. We have not used innuendo. We have not used mere allegation. We have used almost entirely the admissions made by the government itself, and by the Solicitor General on behalf of the government. Yet he lashes us for trying to do our duty in this House.

I hope that nothing will ever persuade me to listen to a Minister of Justice telling me that I should not dare attack something which I know is clearly wrong merely because someone is going to be critical about me for doing that. I think that members of the opposition have a clear duty to say what we did say on this matter, and I think we have done so honestly.

I know the heat of debate sometimes overcomes us a little bit, but nevertheless, by and large, the opposition has fulfilled its responsibility, and it ill behooves the Minister of Justice, of all people, to get up in front of a partisan audience and say he is going to lash out because we dare to do our duty.

As far as I am concerned, the situation of the Minister of Justice is the most pitiable of all of these cases. I find the Solicitor General's explanations unsatisfactory. I find the Prime Minister, to put it mildly, casuistic, but I find the Minister of Justice absolutely intolerably hypocritical in the way he dealt with this situation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said enough to indicate my feelings on this matter. It is a highly serious matter. It is not a matter to be laughed at, or pushed aside, or shouted down. We earnestly desire to see the RCMP treated with the credit they deserve.

I want to say the failure of the government to handle this issue has been a great boon to those who believe in terrorism and subversion. If you adopt the general doctrine that you can do anything as a terrorist or as a subversive, what happens is that by not enforcing the law you have contempt for the law. This is precisely what the performance of this government has been in the last couple of weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate on this particular motion with some trepidation. Being a layman and not trained in the law, I realize full well that I am not qualified to make all the nice interpretations and qualifications of the law that are made from time to time by others. However, I and everybody else here represent people, the majority of whom are in the same position as I am, and I hope to try to speak from the point of view of the layman.

In such capacity I recognize the necessity in today's society for a security force. In fact if we look into the history of security forces over the past three or four decades we will see that security forces have been absolutely essential to the survival of the whole democratic system. Indeed, had the security forces of Great Britain and, to a lesser extent, the security forces of the United States and Canada, not been very active during the late 1930's and early 1940's we would in all probability be under nazi domination today. Therefore no one can argue that it is unnecessary to have security forces.

It is absolutely essential in these days of violence, terror, and anarchy that we be able to know who are the terrorists, who are the violent, who are the anarchists, and that we be able to control them.

It is also essential that the police forces of this country have the tools at their disposal to be able to act at least as efficiently as organized crime, so that organized crime does not spread and become a cancer in the Canadian society. But what have we had during the last few weeks, Mr. Speaker? Despite their denials today and in the last few days, the opposition have been witchhunting, with broken brooms.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): They have professed today to have the utmost admiration for the RCMP. However, they did not have enough admiration for the RCMP to call in the RCMP detachment on the Hill to sweep their offices for the bugs they suspected. Instead of doing that they went out and hired some private "gum shoes". Even after they allegedly discovered them, they did not call in the RCMP. How is that for confidence in the RCMP?

An hon. Member: Or the Ottawa police.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): And even the Ottawa police, as my hon. colleague says.

An hon. Member: The Ontario Provincial Police.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is another possibility.

I would like to quote from today's issue of the Daily Gleaner. It reads:

York-Sunbury MP Robert Howie says the Royal Canadian Mounted Police 'is a great police force' which 'has done what the government told it to do'

Well, Mr. Speaker, how is that for talking out of both sides of your mouth? In one breath he says they are a great police force, and in the next breath he says they have been intimidated by a political party; by the government of this country. That is, of course, a total about-face in the same sentence. That comes from an MP who is a very close friend to the government of New Brunswick, which has been accused of interfering with the activities of the RCMP, and which at the moment has appointed a commission of inquiry with very limited terms of reference, that preclude the possibility of that commission of inquiry looking into the charges of political kick-backs in New Brunswick, rather than the broad terms of reference this government has put forth. Then they dare to say this government manipulates the RCMP.

To top it all off, as if that was not enough, at least we might say the NDP have been consistent in condemning the RCMP. The official opposition started off condemning the RCMP; they were out to get somebody, they did not really care whom. They would, of course, prefer to get ministers, but if they could not get ministers it would do to get the RCMP. They found out that that did not wash with the public, so today they brought in the right hon. apologist from Prince Albert to turn things around. He is good at that, but it did not work. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) had dug himself into such a deep hole that there was no possibility of extricating himself.

The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) goes on to say, as reported in the Daily Gleaner:

Howie says he doesn't condone any illegality and he isn't advocating suppression of "any legitimate allegations of wrongdoing against the RCMP or any federal agency."

That is nice.

The article goes on to read:

But it's the federal government's responsibility to defend the reputation of the force and bring in whatever "corrective measures" may be required, he says, and he blames the Trudeau government for giving the force "a very broad mandate in both domestic and national security matters without the necessary guidelines, supporting legal authority and economic resources to fulfil it".

It is a well known fact in this House that the opposition has had made available to it three briefings on national security, and members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs can, at their request, whenever they wish, have briefings with the chief overseers of security in the public service. I refer to Mr. Robin Bourne and Major General Dare. Such briefings were held on at least three dates that I know of, May 24, 1973; May 2, 1974; and May 7, 1975. To my knowledge, and from the research I have been able to do in the past few days, they have not taken advantage of any security briefings since that day. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) extended to the Leader of the Opposition the courtesy of being briefed on national security matters, a courtesy which has not been accepted. The Leader of the Opposition has seen fit to make at least two major speeches in this House in the past few weeks on the irresponsibility of the government and the RCMP on national security matters when he does not know what he is talking about.

We have heard repeatedly today there is no effort on the part of the opposition to condemn the RCMP. They say they support the RCMP. Let us look at the record. I refer to a speech made on October 31 by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He said as reported at page 496 of Hansard:

—I say the RCMP have to be brought to heel.

That is not a condemnation by the RCMP in their terms! They will bring in another apologist to try to eradicate that statement.

The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) said:

How do we address ourselves to the young people of this country when, on one hand, three law enforcement officers, presumably instructed by officials senior to them to break the law, are exonerated, when a 14 or 17 year old who breaks and enters a public or private residence is given two days, two weeks, two months, or whatever the sentence may be?

No one on this side of the House advocates breaking the law. There is a principle in the criminal law called the principle of hot pursuit. It permits police officers in active pursuit of criminals to continue their pursuit, even if it means breaking into a residence or building, or going outside of their limited jurisdiction.

In New Brunswick, for example, town police are now authorized in hot pursuit to go beyond the boundaries of the town in which they are the police officers in order to make an apprehension. Perhaps it is time that theory applied to the security force of this nation. However, that is a matter for those more capable of interpreting the law than I.

Let us look at some of the other statements made by hon. members opposite. On October 31 the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) said:

The Solicitor General told us repeatedly that this particular group was not an operational group. We know better. As my hon. friend from the Yukon has clearly shown, this group is indeed an operational police force. It recruits and trains agents to provoke actions within unions and on university campuses, to infiltrate right wing and left wing societies, to encourage them to demonstrate on the streets, and to promote acts which are normally illegal.

Those are very serious charges. They were made by members of the opposition who have gone to pains today to claim that they support the RCMP. They challenged us today to indicate any instance when they condemned the RCMP. I say that is a condemnation.

He went on to say:

Now that we have an idea as to the kind of security forces which are operating in this country I ask the question: why is it necessary sometimes, as the Prime Minister says, for these agencies to break the law?

That is a legitimate question, one to which the government addressed itself. Later in his speech he said:

During the debate tonight, a number of my colleagues in the House stated they will have submissions to make to the royal commission, revealing some of the Machiavellian schemes.

They say our police force and our security force are Machiavellian.

They were not conceived by the opposition, but by the government and by some of the sick paranoid minds that operate within the security analysis group of the Solicitor General's office.

A lot of charges have been hurled about this place today. As I said before, the opposition has gone to great pains to try to paint themselves as lily white. However, their paintbrushes have had many of the bristles removed and they are leaving obvious streaks.

The Leader of the Opposition, in his contribution to this debate today, prejudged the results of the McDonald commission into the activities of the RCMP and the security service. He said the Prime Minister has already made a statement that the government would be guided by advice from the law officers of the Crown. I admit that the Prime Minister made that statement. It is an entirely legitimate statement. In fact if any minister of this government were to act in any legal matter without the advice of the law officers of the Crown, the opposition would raise outraged howls of indignation.

When the Prime Minister says that he is going to consult the law officers of the Crown, the Leader of the Opposition is upset. Apparently the Prime Minister, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) are to make legal judgments without the benefit of law officers of the Crown.

The sinister aspect he applied to it was that the Prime Minister was building a cover for the Solicitor General previous to appearing before the McDonald commission. A few days ago the opposition was very indignant because the Prime Minister suggested they may be involved in a few shady deals.

It is O.K. for them to make specious charges, but the minute a charge is made from this side of the House, there is a great uproar from members opposite. They become very indignant.

When I was parliamentary secretary to the minister of national defence, the opposition were after the heads of several officers in the department over the negotiations with the Lockheed Aircraft Company. They thought they smelled a scandal. Because there had been payoffs in other countries, they were sure they would be able to find such things in this country. They now say it was completely the fault of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) who tried to place the blame on the public servants. However, it was members opposite who named public servants early in that debate in the House.

Later today we had the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) make an astounding statement in this House, after we listened for about three weeks to continuous opposition charges that the RCMP was out of control, that it had no respect for the government, and that the government was not aware of what the RCMP was doing.

We had the astonishing statement today by the right hon. apologist from Prince Albert that the government is trying to smear the RCMP. He compounded that ludicrous statement by saying that the government was making contemptuous innuendoes against the RCMP, and referred to the musical chairs of the Solicitor General's department. What about the musical chairs game in the opposition, particularly in the leadership of that party? That charge is, of course, completely unfounded. And as I said earlier, it is obvious that the opposition brought in the right hon. member for Prince Albert today to try to turn the argument around, a facility he has in abundance, I must admit, but which failed today. So he became rather personal and attacked ministers who were absent from the House today on government business, another point the opposition likes continually to make, despite the fact that their attendance is no better than that of government members.

It was a shallow and hypocritical attempt to cover their tracks. It was they who smeared the RCMP. It was they who laid the original charges against the force. It might well have been that their aim all along was to try to get the minister, and if they destroyed the police force—

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, the hon. member has been giving us a number of direct quotations, something which I appreciate, but he is now making charges that we have smeared the reputation of the RCMP, and I should like to hear some direct quotations in justification of those charges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. If points of order are raised, they should be valid points of order and not merely points of argument.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): At least I am not reading a speech made by one of my colleagues seven months ago.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): When did he make it then?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I read from Hansard the references to support what I said. Two weeks ago the opposition wanted the government to know everything the RCMP was doing. However, they tell us now this was never the suggestion. They only wanted the government to be in control.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, this is a significant day on which to be debating such a serious issue as the one now before us. Since the election of the Parti Québécois one year ago today we have heard many speeches and statements about the concept of Canada, about what it is we want for this country, and those speeches and statements have all reflected the fundamental values which we hold in common as Canadians.

It is presumed by all who are concerned with keeping this country together that there are certain basic principles, including adherence to the rule of law and respect for individual freedom, which are shared by all of us, and which justify our people in believing in a united Canada. For many years I have listened to views about national unity, and have taken part in many discussions about the future of our country. Never in all that time did I doubt that the values and beliefs which made Canada what she is were shared by all Canadians. I took it for granted they were there as an underpinning of our society, a foundation upon which we could build the Canada of the future.

However, the evidence of the last two weeks, the revelations of illegal activities which went unquestioned by ministers of the Crown, the abrogation of ministerial responsibility, and the callous neglect of our civil liberties have made me pause and reflect about these basic shared values which I took so much for granted.

I now have to say that there is an even more fundamental question to be asked than how to hold this country together. The evidence of the past few weeks forces one to ask why we would wish to hold the country together. Why should we care about a united country if that united country is to be one in which the values we have cherished throughout our history are to be denied? Will it help us to have a geographical whole a mari usque ad mare if within that whole the freedoms and rights of individuals have been shattered? Is it enough to strive for unity without ensuring that democratic principles are guaranteed?

Fundamental to the democratic principles of this country is the belief in ministerial responsibility. Things are changing in this country. The Globe and Mail put it very well in a recent editorial: "The Prime Minister and his colleagues either don't know or won't admit what cabinet responsibility means."

When revelations about illegal security operations first began to surface it appeared to this side of the House that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues simply were not admitting to their responsibility in these matters. That, Mr. Speaker, is bad enough. But after two weeks of questioning by the opposition, during which time the government has attempted to shift the blame on to the RCMP, it is becoming more and more obvious that the government does not know what cabinet responsibility means. Further, it is becoming obvious that it does not know what "illegal" means.

The events and revelations which have been disclosed over the last few weeks should make us all tremble with rage! What have we found? A prime minister who shrugs with indifference at the idea of the police breaking the law, or who glibly suggests that if the law gets in the way then it ought to be changed; a Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) who refuses to accept responsibility for what has gone on in his department and to whom the illegal acts appear, in his own words, mere "unfortunate events"; a Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) who is not even aware that mail is being opened by the RCMP, contrary to the provisions of the Post Office Act.

The news reports of the past few weeks are astounding to ordinary Canadians. Just as disturbing is the fact that the serious events about which we have heard have become almost routine happenings. Even worse than the allegations which are coming forth every day, is the reaction of the government when pressed by the opposition to account for them. Ministers evade questions and avoid giving answers. They try to cloud the issue by suggesting that opposition parties are undermining the integrity of the RCMP. They accuse the opposition of neglecting the greater problems of the economy and of national unity.

What the government is seeking to do by these diversionary tactics is to distract the attention of Canadians from the very real danger which threatens them, a danger which outranks in importance and gravity both the economic issues and the threat to national unity. It is a danger which derives from a government which has placed itself above the rule of law and which, in so doing, has created a real and imminent threat to the political processes which we have taken for granted throughout our history.

● (2202)

Of course it is to the government's advantage to manipulate the views of the public by downgrading the attempts of the opposition to get to the bottom of these serious allegations. However, the attitudes of the Prime Minister and of some of his colleagues notwithstanding, surely there must be some members on the other side of the House who still understand that even more fundamental than any economic or constitutional concern is the maintenance of parliamentary democracy in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Miss MacDonald.]

Miss MacDonald: Opposition questioning about these serious allegations is an attempt, if ministers opposite will try to understand, to make the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues accept the responsibility for what goes on in their departments. Opposition questioning is an attempt to make the Prime Minister and his cabinet aware, since they so easily forget, that they are accountable to the people of Canada through parliament. It is an attempt to bring home to the people of this country the fact that their freedoms and their civil liberties are being eroded before their eyes by a government which no longer knows the difference between national security and the security of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: What is at issue here is not the actions of the RCMP. The real essence of this issue is the lack of government responsibility and the erosion of civil liberties.

The government, in its answers to questions in this House during the last two weeks, has been vacillating between two positions: that of denying responsibility for any illegal actions that may have taken place, and that of excusing them in the name of national security. Both of these positions are reprehensible; but I want to concentrate on the last one, excusing them in the name of national security.

I am very much bothered by this term national security, which has been bandied about so freely in the past few weeks. What does that phrase mean? Is it a threat to national security to disagree with the Prime Minister and his colleagues? Is it a threat to national security to express that disagreement through legitimate political channels and actions? Who in the government is setting the parameters of national security, and who is defining what constitutes a threat to it?

I have always believed that we in Canada lived in a democratic society. I have always believed that in that democratic society there existed certain inviolable rights: the right to freedom of speech; the right to join any group in order to express that freedom, be it political, social or religious; the right to privacy; the right to a fair trial; and the right to presumption of innocence.

I have always believed that the law applied to everyone, but here in parliament we have been repeatedly told in recent days that the law does not apply to everyone, that some people cannot be presumed innocent, that privacy of individuals can be invaded, that certain organizations can operate less freely than others, and that the freedom of expression of some individuals may be intercepted or monitored, all in the interests of national security.

We in the opposition are being told that we should not make a fuss about this, that we should be reasonable and allow that some people are freer than others, and that occasionally the rule of reason must take precedence over the rule of law. The law is written down and is applied and interpreted within the strict confines of the traditions of precedents and of the judicial system. Reason is rather nebulous and is often interpreted and applied by the most unreasonable of agents, and I cannot accept that the rather suspect rationality of this government should have precedence over the rule of law and the law of the land.

● (2207)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a very pertinent question at this point, and I wonder if the hon. member—

Miss MacDonald: I will take the question when I have finished my speech, Mr. Speaker.

The people of this country have lived all their lives trusting in the basic tenets of their democracy. They have waved few banners about their rights, and I suppose if pressed to enumerate them they would probably have trouble doing so. They simply take them for granted, and assume that their elected representatives do so as well. Well, it is obvious that such complacency about our civil rights is no longer justified.

The citizens of this country can no longer assume that their government will protect their basic freedoms. That trust which they placed in their leaders is no longer respected. The government has been misusing the trust of the nation. It has been manipulating that trust to condition Canadians to accept, on the one hand, the fact that a certain amount of law breaking by those in power is essential and, on the other hand, that such law breaking will never touch them or their rights. The most dangerous aspect of this whole issue is the notion that these infringements of basic freedoms can touch some of us and not touch all of us.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough that the revelations of wrongdoing which have emerged recently affect every single Canadian; that the freedoms of every single Canadian are threatened by the attitude of this government; and that the trust and complacency about our freedoms are no longer justified.

It is time for every Canadian to re-think the basic civil rights which he or she has taken for granted for so long, to recognize the fragile nature of those rights and to demand that the government respect them. We must all realize that by allowing the negation of civil rights in some "special" cases we have created an apparatus which can eventually infringe upon all of us, and we need to be aware of the progression of that infringement.

In the past we have been faced with the temporary suppression of our freedoms during times of war, through the War Measures Act. Many injustices were carried out under the umbrella of that act which were excused because the "national security" was threatened by war. More recently, during peacetime, the government invoked the War Measures Act during the October crisis of 1970. Again injustices were carried out against innocent people, and the government excused it all because the "national security" was threatened, not by war, but by subversion, terrorism or by an apprehended insurrection.

Now we discover that the freedoms of some individuals and groups are being eroded every day in peacetime, without even the pretense of a War Measures Act, and that it is all taking place because the "national security" is being threatened, not by war, subversion or terrorism, but by the democratically expressed dissent of some groups or even by the suspected beliefs of some others.

I suggest that both the concept of national security and what constitutes a threat to it have undergone a considerable revision in recent years, a revision not conducive to civil liberties, and I am terrified to think how much further that progression might go. These fears are not exaggerated when we are faced with a government which confuses the national good with its own good.

It is the responsibility of all Canadians to uphold their civil rights in every area of their lives. But it is the special responsibility of the members of parliament to uphold the system of law and of parliamentary democracy. That applies particularly to cabinet ministers. Those who have governed us in the past have always taken that responsibility seriously and, by so doing, have encouraged the belief of all citizens in their political system. But the cynical attitude of this government toward parliamentary traditions has thwarted the expectations of Canadians and encouraged a cynical attitude in the public perception of values. If the people of this country can no longer look to their government for confirmation of their basic freedoms, then where can they turn? If the government cannot be counted upon to uphold the law, who can?

What the events of these past few weeks have pointed up is that we must all reflect on what the rule of law means. It is a fundamental tenet of our democracy and we must not take it for granted, lest it slip away from us. As expressed by the British jurist, Dicey, in "The Law of the Constitution", the rule of law means not only that with us no man is above the law, but that here every man, whatever be his rank or condition, is subject to the ordinary law of the realm and amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals.

That ordinary citizens do not rise above the law is assured by the efforts of the police and the security forces. That the police and security forces do not rise above the law can only be assured by the efforts of the ministers who are supposed to be responsible to this House.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—CHEF DE L'OPPOSITION

November 3, 1977

Hon. James Jerome, M.P.
Speaker of the House
Room 222-N
House of Commons
Ottawa, Ontario

Dear Mr. Speaker:

Following disclosure of an intrusion device in the office of the Member for Central Nova, authorization was given for an examination of my Office by a professional counter-measures firm.

Enclosed is a copy of the report which the firm has submitted on the basis of their examination of my Office on October 31st and November 1st.

I will leave to you, as the responsible officer for the security of these buildings, any further action which you might deem necessary or appropriate.

Sincerely,

Joe Clark

November 3, 1977

Mr. William H. Neville,
Chief of Staff,
Office of the Leader of the Opposition,
Room 409S,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Neville:

Pursuant to the authorization given to us by you, we have examined the Office of the Leader of the Opposition in accordance with established professional counter-measures practices and wish to report the following:

1. In examining the telephone installed in your Boardroom with Dektor DTA, it was disclosed by the ohm meter and oscilloscope that a reverse bias diode appeared within the hook switch network.

2. Upon opening the phone, it was observed that a dilapidated top hat diode was connected to the hold circuits through a wire that was not current to the manufacture of the phone.

3. Upon inspection of the hook switch and comparing with other similar phones in the building, it was noted the finger leaf of the hook switch was bent in such a manner that the "closes second contact" was not opening.

4. Upon further inspection, it was noted by the crammed recircuited wires that this phone had been tampered or opened and dismantled in times past.

5. Upon examination of the hook switch cover, it was noted that the fastening clip was broken on the cover.

Attached are our professional opinions and conclusions based on the above findings.

Report Submitted by:

W. M. Sandiford,
General Manager,
Uniserv Sound & Signal Inc.

Dan McGarry,
President,
Uniserv Sound & Signal Inc.

Conclusions

1. The boardroom telephone indicated that its manufacture was around the 1966 period.

2. In checking, it was disclosed and consequently verified that this style of top hat diode had not been used by the manufacture for 10-15 years.

3. The diode was not installed in a recognized common practised manner, as would have been by the manufacturer.

4. The diode connecting wires were cloth covered wires and all other wires within the phone are vinyl covered wires.

5. With the hook switch bent as it was, it is possible that, although the receiver would disengage from the phone, the transmitter would not.

6. With the Dektor DTA indicating a reversed bias diode, it is quite possible that a remote listening device could be placed on the telephone as long as one of the five lines coming into the Leader's Office boardroom was depressed.

7. It is further noted that, with the technology of this type of phone set, the hook switch only disconnects the ring but not the tip of the incoming line, and, thus, the addition of different types of listening devices could be more conveniently added at the set end.

8. Therefore, a potential intruder's only problem is to ensure that one of the five lines in the telephone is depressed in order to activate it.

Submitted Opinions

1. The conference room telephone was capable of being used as an eavesdropping device and, in fact, still was capable of being an eavesdropping device until 8:10 p.m. on Monday, October 31, 1977, at which time effective counter measures were taken.

2. Installation of foreign equipment and modifications of this type would not have been done by any regular telephone company personnel.

3. The modifications made to the telephone were highly professional and covert. Sophisticated equipment would be used at the listening post in order to decrease detection from the user and the telephone company.

4. All phones should be scanned and proper safeguards taken against illegal intrusion devices.

5. The following characteristics would apply to the kind of listening device which could be operated with these modifications to the boardroom telephone:

Life span: until removed from the phone;

Installation time: 5-10 minutes;

Listening capabilities: whatever was said in the boardroom;

Detection: does not affect normal operation of phone, only detected by use of electronic equipment and hard physical inspection;

Listening post: within telephone network, with harmonica or infinity transmitter, ultimately receivable virtually anywhere in the world (with exception of Germany);

Popularity: Utilized by professionals in the intelligence gathering field.

APPENDIX "B"

BELL CANADA

House of Commons,
Col. D. C. Currie, V.C.
Sergeant at Arms,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Colonel Currie,

As instructed by your office, I took possession of telephone apparatus identified as Station K associated with telephone number 996-5084 at mid afternoon on Tuesday, November 8, 1977.

We are informed that:

This telephone apparatus had been installed in the Conference Room associated with the office of the Leader of the Opposition prior to November 7, 1977.

The telephone was identified at 8:10 p.m. on October 31st by Uniserv Sound and Signal Incorporated as capable of being used as an eavesdropping device.

The device and wiring causing the alleged condition were removed from the telephone by Uniserv Sound on October 31st, 1977, without Bell Canada's permission or presence.

On November 8th, 1977, W. Sandiford of Uniserv Sound in my presence attempted to restore the telephone set to the condition he had found it in at 8:10 p.m. on 31st October, using the components that he said were those removed from that set. On completion, Mr. Sandiford stated that he had restored the telephone to the condition in which he found it except for the following:

(a) a broken lead on the diode prevented him from making one termination, and

(b) he could not restore the bent contacts in the switch hook as found for fear that he would cause additional problems.

As requested by you, we have assessed the telephone apparatus in the condition in which it was given to us to determine (a) whether it could be used as a covert listening device and (b) whether the top-hat diode and connecting wires installed in the telephone set were foreign to telephone company use for such installations. Bell-Northern Research Laboratories, Ottawa, upon request of the Telephone Company have analyzed and conducted extensive tests on the telephone apparatus and conclude the following:

1. "It is our view based on our tests that any telephone accessing this telephone through the switched network could not use this telephone as an eavesdropping device. However, the subject telephone was in a condition that if accessed in a sophisticated way directly from cables associated with that telephone it could have acted as an eavesdropping device."

2. "All materials found inside the telephone were of types commonly used by Bell Canada."

On receipt by us of this telephone set the hook switch contacts were in operating condition. It was stated to us that at the time Uniserv first inspected the set, one hook switch contact was bent. We cannot now know what bending had been imposed on the hook switch contact.

We would observe however, that if the hook switch contact had been bent as claimed, the telephone set would have been found by the user to be in a defective condition. A Bell craftsman who worked on the set on 27 October 1977 did not find the set to be defective as to service.

In addition to our examination of the set and apparatus, we have also carried out a thorough physical inspection of all associated cable and wiring to the station, and have uncovered no irregularities.

Our report with respect to this set is limited to the capabilities of the set in the condition in which it was presented to us. A more definitive view could have been given prior to the set being altered.

If I can be of further assistance to you please do not hesitate to contact me.

THE MINISTRY

REQUEST MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE APOLOGIZE FOR REMARKS ABOUT CAPE BRETONERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. On October 20 I rose in this House urging the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) to consider new coal mines on Cape Breton Island. I received a rather satisfactory reply. In his reply the minister said, and I quote:

My long association with the hon. member has made me very, very aware of the problems in Cape Breton. He can rest assured that his representations will be noted and remembered.

On Wednesday, November 9 in a speech made in this House the same minister stated:

We are slow in developing some of our coal mines. That is one aspect which—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a motion, would he put it forthwith.

Mr. Muir: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to do so, although I have to lay a foundation for Your Honour's assistance. The minister went on to say the following:

... especially in Cape Breton because of the costs, and I think I should say perhaps because of the inappreciability of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job.

Then he admitted: "This is a serious accusation".

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member has a motion, would he move it.

Mr. Muir: I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

That, in light of this insane and disgusting insinuation by the minister, which more or less implies in his view that Cape Bretoners are lazy and cannot retain their jobs, it is incumbent upon the hon. gentleman to make a public apology to the people of Cape Breton for his outrageous contumely.

I might add for the minister's information that "contumely" does not refer to a wheat combine. If he wants to know what that means, we will send him a dictionary.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION ACTION BE TAKEN TO INCREASE BASIC DISABILITY PENSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am confident that there are members in all parties who would like to see this motion passed without debate. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs, now that he has learned very clearly from a great many veterans of their deep concern over the decision not to increase the basic rate of the war disability pension, to re-open this issue in cabinet, it being the view of this House that the basic rate of the war disability pension should be kept in line with the level of take-home pay of the five categories of public servants, as approved by parliament in 1973, and that action on this matter should be taken without any further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT MAKE PROPOSALS FOR RENEWED FEDERALISM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

The CBC French program Télé Mag recently made public a poll in which 70 per cent of Quebecers questioned were in favour of a renewed federalism, 35 per cent, or more than the whole of the opposition parties, were for the Lévesque administration. Due to constitutional uncertainty prevailing at this time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the government to state as soon as possible its views about a renewed federalism, association or other constitutional views, in order to restore a climate for discussion and not for confrontation with the Quebec government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FILE ON OPERATION "FEATHERBED"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity as a result of the fact that information I have received within the last half-hour indicates that the so-called "Featherbed" file maintained by the security service is far more extensive than it was initially thought to be and deals with a number of additional matters of which I was not aware yesterday and that the "Featherbed" file is probably the government's most carefully guarded secret at this moment. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke):

That the Solicitor General make an immediate admission of the extensiveness of this file—

I move this motion despite the fact that a minister opposite cannot do anything but laugh at reality.

Some hon. Members: Order.

—that he make public all subjects dealt with in this file and, in addition, that both he and the Prime Minister advise the House whether the statement made in Halifax overnight by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he is sure that files exist on everyone going into public life, particularly cabinet ministers, is actual fact—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Cossitt: Would you shut up for once over there! You just can't face reality.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Red Deer.

POST OFFICE

SUGGESTION DEPARTMENT GIVE PRIORITY TO IMPROVING SERVICE RATHER THAN ADVERTISING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the continued deterioration in postal services and growing dissatisfaction on the part of the general public, many members of which consider the current television campaign advertising of that department to be a form of brainwashing, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Postmaster General give priority to upgrading postal services rather than publicizing and extolling those services, which are unacceptable to taxpayers, especially during this period of supposed government restraint.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST THAT IMPORT QUOTAS ON CLOTHING BE EXTENDED FOR THREE YEARS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an urgent matter concerning the Canadian textile industry.

In view of the government's failure to negotiate a three-year agreement on the imposition of textile quotas and since textile imports represent over 60 per cent of the Canadian market while European countries, Great Britain and the United States are restricting them to between 15 and 20 per cent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the House urge the government to avoid other lay-offs in that sector of our economy and demand that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) maintain current quotas to their 1975 level for at least three years.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL CERTAIN MUNICIPALITY REDUCE TAXES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 is made because a town in Ontario has suggested in a resolution that the House of Commons should not be debating the topic it did yesterday. My motion is therefore made in the spirit of complete political friendliness. I therefore move:

That the said town fathers do their best to cut the town taxes by 50 per cent and we in the House of Commons will applaud their efforts.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSED COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED ILLEGAL ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I am desirous of seeking the permission of the House to obtain unanimous consent under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That an all-party committee be set up forthwith to meet in camera with appropriate Cabinet ministers and staff to get to the bottom of alleged improprieties of the RCMP, the security service and the DND because there is public concern, first, that the image, decorum and performance and its traditions will be further destroyed; second, the public confidence in the RCMP, the DND and the national security service will continue to be in doubt and third, subversives and organized crime and their actions will continue to thrive and the lives and safety of innocent Canadians and the nation will be in jeopardy.

Mr. Speaker: Such motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if I might take a minute before beginning the question period to remind hon. members that a short time ago I had asked their co-operation and assistance in seeing to it that we try to share the question period in a proportionate way between participants on both sides of the House, from all regions and with several subjects of interest. This can be done only if hon. members are prepared to discipline themselves to a certain extent with respect first, to the shortness of questions and second, to the shortness of answers.

I have been quite lenient with respect to the length of questions, so it is difficult for me not to be lenient with answers and therefore I have perhaps been a little bit generous on both sides in allowing prolonged questions which are responded to by prolonged answers. The result has been, I think, a little unfair to backbenchers on both sides of the House who have not been able to participate greatly in the question period.

I know I am speaking on behalf of all members of the House, not simply the Chair, in saying this because I know this concern is shared by everyone in the House. Therefore, perhaps we might begin by disciplining ourselves again to keep both the questions and the answers as short as possible today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF DISCUSSING WITH ITALIAN PRIME MINISTER ROLE OF ITALIMPIANTI IN SALE OF NUCLEAR REACTOR TO ARGENTINA

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In putting the question to him I hope you will permit me to say that on the day when the Prime Minister of Italy is arriving in Canada I would hope that at a more appropriate time members on both sides of the House would join with the Secretary of State and the government in welcoming him on his four-day official visit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: In saying that, may I point out to the minister that the government of Italy has immense equity and financial stake in the contracting firm of Italimpianti, the partner of AECL in the nuclear reactor sale to Argentina and, I have been told by Italimpianti individuals, has authority over senior personnel of Italimpianti including Mr. Lucien Secouri, general manager of Italimpianti who knows where our Canadian payoff moneys went but who will not divulge that information to either a committee of the House of Commons or the RCMP.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is hardly an exemplary start. I wonder if the hon. member would put his question.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I was just indicating to my colleagues that you would start this new policy on the day I had the initial question.

● (1417)

My question to the minister is simply this, and it is a most serious one: has the government put on the agenda of its discussions with the Italian Prime Minister this subject to elicit the help and support of the Italian government which, if it was forthcoming in this matter, would give us some information which has not been forthcoming in the past?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Speaking from memory, Mr. Speaker, I do not recall that this specific item is earmarked or spelled out on the agenda. However, there is a general topic relating to Canada's relations with Italy and, of course, the matter could be raised there. If the hon. member has any further requests to make and would convey them to me in specific terms I will, as I hope he will agree I have done up to now, transmit them, and I will be very glad to see what further steps we can take to get the information which I presume the former chairman of the Public Accounts Committee still wishes.

Mr. Lawrence: My only supplementary to the minister then is simply this: because of the lack of success that members of this House, including members of the Public Accounts Committee, have had in the past in getting this type of information from either the minister or his department, I wonder whether the minister or the government would object to a minor breach of protocol so that some private members of this House, even members of the Public Accounts Committee, could seek an audience with the Italian Prime Minister while he is here in order to emphasize the need for finding out what happened to that Canadian money?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member is not aware of the fact, but the Prime Minister of Italy has very kindly agreed to meet with the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of this House during his stay here. I understand there are members of all parties who will be attending that event. Certainly, there is no restriction in so far as we are concerned of the kind of discussion which could take place, so I would say it would be entirely up to members what matters they discuss with him.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

AGREEMENT WITH MR. EISENBERG ON REACTOR SALE TO KOREA—PROPOSED DEMAND FOR RETURN OF MONEY PAID

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary to the Acting Prime Minister. Since there is now evidence from South Korea that none of the 23 specific requirements of the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited agreement for post-contract services arising out of the Korean electric sale have been performed by the AECL agent, Shaul Eisenberg, will the government, which has allowed AECL to advance over $2 million on these reportedly non-existent services, now direct AECL to demand the return of the money?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire and report to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, if the minister would not mind addressing himself to this, since the testimony of the AECL chairman to the Public Accounts Committee has now been placed in serious question, perhaps he would investigate these reports as well?

Mr. Chrétien: Fine, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

IMPORT QUOTA ON CLOTHING—SUGGESTED RETENTION FOR THREE YEARS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister in both his capacities; that is, the Acting Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

Since the first talks to negotiate new voluntary restraints on clothing imports have now broken down, creating a great deal of confusion in the retail clothing industry, will the minister now guarantee that present global import quotas will be retained at no more than the 1975 import levels for at least three more years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is the policy of the government. We imposed those quotas in November last year.

Mr. Saltsman: For three years?

Mr. Chrétien: We implemented them last fall and we said later that they would be extended until July, 1978. Following that we have been negotiating an extension of these quotas for three more years. Those negotiations are still going on. Depending on the results of those negotiations, of course, it is the government's firm intention to provide a period of time in which the textile and clothing industry of Canada can adjust to the present situation. We envisage that as being for three years after 1978.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, about the only adjustment that has taken place has been one of disaster. Reports indicate that the talks with Korea about the levels of clothing imports have now broken down in what the press describes as wide differences. Can the Acting Prime Minister say what policy he will put in place to protect the domestic clothing industry because this talk about going to 1978 places the whole industry in a state of confusion.

● (1422)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I just said we are planning to act for three years after July, 1978. We acted last November. The policy that the hon. member is promoting at this time is the policy that I enunciated last fall. We do not plan to change it. We have to follow the international rules. The first step is to get involved in negotiations with those countries that affect our markets. When that is completed, we will act according to international law. However, we have to complete the first round of negotiations.

Mr. Saltsman: As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of confusion in the sense that people do not know what orders to place and manufacturers do not know what orders to anticipate. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House how long he intends to go through this period of negotiation before coming to some final conclusion about the three year restriction and allocation of imports?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member that I am quite surprised to hear him speak of confusion, for these decisions were taken following the establishment of a joint committee made up of the industry, the unions and the provinces concerned, and all parties were in favour of our following this policy. I feel the sources of the hon. member should seek additional information from their respective organizations, for the policy we have developed in this area was approved by all parties involved.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SUGGESTED DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC ON RENEWED FEDERALISM

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

Following an opinion poll made public yesterday evening by the CBC French network, 70 per cent of Quebecers which were questioned opted for a renewed federalism, but the PQ government got 35 per cent of the votes, more than all the opposition parties in Quebec put together. I would like to ask the minister whether he intends to meet his Quebec counterpart, Mr. Morin, in a near future in order to discuss this matter of renewed federalism?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the government indicated clearly in the Speech from the Throne, that they were in favour of a new federalism in the Canadian system and that specific proposals would be put before the House during the present session which would include some amendments to the Canadian constitution.

As for the negotiation with the provinces and particularly with Quebec ministers, I shall remind the hon. member that the Prime Minister is now touring different provinces in Canada, that he has already met several premiers and that he intends to meet the Quebec premier in a few weeks on this subject, just as he met the other premiers. I can tell the hon. member that we are regularly in communication with the departments and the ministers of Quebec who are responsible for different sectors. If following the meeting between the Quebec premier and the Prime Minister it is necessary to pursue discussions at the ministerial level, of course I shall be pleased to be at the service of Quebec ministers to pursue these discussions.

INQUIRY IF MINISTER WILL MEET HIS COUNTERPART FROM QUEBEC

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell the House whether he has already met the Quebec minister, Mr. Morin, to discuss a new formula of renewed federalism? Since the present discussions between the right hon. Prime Minister and the provincial premiers seem to be—according to the press for I do not follow these discussions—confronting discussions, particularly on the Quebec side, could the minister tell the House whether he has already met or intends to meet Mr. Morin to launch this renewed federalism which everybody is expecting?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, the attitude or the option of this government is by no means one of confrontation and I do not quite understand how the hon. member can talk of an attitude of confrontation when we have yet to meet the premier of Quebec. However, I must remind the hon. member that it is very difficult to enter into negotiations with a government whose aim is to split this country into two parts and which has very clearly stated that its target was the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada. As for us, this is a non-negotiable option. We are prepared to negotiate a new federalism with Quebec, with substantial changes. But it must be quite clear from the start that what we are talking about is a new federalism and not the creation of two different countries with some kind of economic association.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FILE ON OPERATION "FEATHERBED"—POSSIBLE MAINTENANCE OF FILES ON PEOPLE IN PUBLIC LIFE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General and it is in regard to the so-called "Featherbed" file in possession of the security services of this country. I am informed it is far more extensive than I was able to indicate to the House yesterday. Will the minister confirm with a "yes" or "no" answer whether or not there has been in existence or still exists a file with the code name "featherbed" which is in any way in the hands of the security services of Canada.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cossitt: I would like to ask the minister this supplementary: Is he prepared now to outline to the House the general nature of the subjects dealt with in this file?

Mr. Fox: It is a security service file dealing with extremely sensitive matters. It is not my intention to open up all the files of the security services, no matter what the code names might be. I have had the opportunity to review the operation "Fea-therbed" with senior officers of the service and I am satisfied it is a proper one for the service to be involved in.

Mr. Cossitt: My final supplementary arises out of a statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Halifax and widely publicized today to the effect that he was positive that files were maintained on all those who are prominent in public life, particularly cabinet ministers. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to tell us whether this is true, whether it is government policy that this should be done?

Mr. Fox: I assume there are a number of files on members of the present cabinet. A number of us were engaged in work in the Prime Minister's office before entering active politics and our employment there made it necessary that security clearance be obtained through the RCMP.

POST OFFICE

REASON FOR EXPENDITURES ON PUBLICITY PROGRAMS

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General. In view of the opposition of the general public to the present publicity program associated with the Post Office Department, can the minister tell us why the Post Office is spending taxpayers' money at a time when it is in such a serious deficit position?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I listened with some interest to the hon. gentleman's motion under Standing Order 43. I am not aware of any ongoing publicity campaign being televised at the present time.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF IMPORT QUOTA FOR BEEF IN 1978

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Minister of Agriculture but in his absence I shall direct it to the acting minister or to the parliamentary secretary. It arises from a reference he made during the throne speech debate to the possibility of a Canadian meat import law or the establishment of a meat import authority. In the event that important legislation on this subject is not available by the end of the year, and in view of the fact that there has been only slight downward adjustments in world cattle inventories, especially in Australia and New Zealand, does the minister intend to announce temporary quotas on imported beef for 1978 as he did for 1977?

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the question asked by the hon. member and I will immediately bring this matter to the attention of the minister.

COW-CALF STABILIZATION—AMOUNT OF PAYMENTS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): My supplementary is for the parliamentary secretary and it has to do with the current cow-calf stabilization policy which has been in existence for the whole of this year. I would have asked the minister whether he intends to announce details of the pay-out under this policy and whether he would hazard a guess as to whether or not there will be a pay-out at all this year.

THE ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY OF HEALTH MINISTER WHETHER TAPES OF SPEECH TO CARLETON STUDENTS ACCURATE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in order to clarify a few things. Surely she had enough time to listen to the tapes made by university students of the speech she delivered before them last week. Could she tell the House today whether these tapes which we have all heard reflect exactly what she said before those students.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, rather than analyze the interpretations of interpretations—we are now at the third rendition of what I have said and I do not remember anything whatsoever. I did check what an hon. member in the opposition had asked me and also the only point on the cabinet responsibility upon which I would like to report to the House. As for the medical records of the Laboratory Centre for Disease Control, and in as much as I have been able to check out, no medical record of patients or no—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: No, I know very well what I am doing. I am telling the House what it ought to know. No record has been communicated to agents of the armed forces or the RCMP.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, once more unto the breach. To my mind, the statements the minister made last week are very important bearing in mind the fact that she recognized that the instruments of the security service were such that the government no longer exercised any control over it. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare make her statement on the lack of governmental control bearing in mind those powerful instruments which she described to the university students?

Miss Bégin: As far as I can remember, Mr. Speaker, I answered that question when I rose on a question of privilege last Wednesday.

HOUSING

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM—INCLUSION OF ROOMING HOUSES

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of his minister's commitment to include private rooming houses under the residential rehabilitation assistance program which was made some time ago, can the parliamentary secretary assure the House that he will effect such change through legislation at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to thank the hon. member for Vancouver East for bringing this question forward to the House. This matter was discussed and focused upon at the Habitat conference in his very own city of Vancouver. I would assure the hon. member and all hon. members of the House that it is the minister's intention to bring forward amendments to the legislation in view of the limit of $500 under the present program.

ALCAN FLUORSPAR OPERATION AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS TO AVOID LAY-OFFS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and perhaps he will thank me for my question as well. As the minister knows, the House is currently debating a bill which gives about $1 billion in tax concessions to corporations ostensibly to create jobs. Considering that the Alcan corporation has responded to this and it will get about $11 million assistance from the government by laying off some 400 people at St. Lawrence at their fluorspar operation, I would ask the minister, who has been directly involved in negotiations with the company, I understand, whether he has anything to report to the House; and specifically can he tell the House whether the company has changed its mind and will keep that plant in operation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it may be drawing a long bow to have me answer this question in my ministerial capacity. I am happy to do so, however, with your permission because it is a matter which affects my own constituency and, as the hon. member says, several hundred workers there. I had meetings on the weekend in connection with this matter, and regrettably I do not see any likelihood that the Alcan corporation is going to change its mind. I equally say that it is a quite shocking situation that in fact they have shown so little concern for the workers in that particular operation, but rather than cry, as it were, over events which cannot be turned around, we are looking for, and I hope can find, alternative employment for those affected.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED DENIAL OF TAX CONCESSIONS TO ALCAN IN VIEW OF CLOSING OF OPERATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Considering that his colleague has just acknowledged that a corporation which is going to receive, out of the minister's present budgetary proposals which we are debating in the House today, $11 million, and is supposed to be involved in job creation yet is shutting down operations, not because it is losing money it is important to note, but because it can make more profit importing from Mexico, will the Minister of Finance consider retaliatory action to stop this company behaving in this way?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that kind of question. We have a tax system which applies to all companies and it may happen that some of them might be forced to cease their activities at this moment. However, I do not think that we could use the tax system to punish some and not others. The law is the same for everybody and we regret that company has taken that decision. However, I have investigated the matter myself and the hon. member's allegation that they had to do so in favour of another operation is not correct, because the mineral they extracted cannot replace the one they get out of the country for their operation.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I want to get it very clearly from the finance minister. Is he saying that this corporation can respond in this way, a corporation which is making hundreds of millions of dollars profit annually and which has benefited from the labour of people in that town for many, many decades, and that there is nothing the government of Canada can do in face of that action by the corporation?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—DATE EXPANSION OF FACILITIES WILL BEGIN

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Since he has been in Winnipeg and appears satisfied that there is necessity for expansion of Winnipeg international airport, when will construction at the airport begin, and has the government at the present time let tenders for construction of the additions which will be needed? My question is for the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member addressed his question to the Minister of Finance, perhaps he might reword it for me.

Mr. Murta: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I address my question to the Minister of Transport. Since the government has at the present time expressed satisfaction that expansion of the Winnipeg international airport is necessary, I should like to ask the minister whether he has given thought to letting public tenders for construction of additional facilities at the airport, and when does he envisage construction beginning?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we have just completed a very satisfactory and successful study of the question of the expansion of the airport and the alternatives which are available—that is to say, expansion on site or expansion in another place. Last week I released a study and asked for further comments on it within the next period of 60 days from members of the public. At that point we will begin to draw up a specific plan of action for the various improvements involved, and then in due course over time move to the actual construction phase.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY DR. EPSTEIN

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding an address given by Dr. Epstein at York University based on the following statement. "The defects in scientific testing range from extensive incompetence to manipulation and distortion and actual data destruction on food additives, drugs, animal feeds, pesticides, auto pollutants, chemical waste and water quality". My question to the minister is: in view of the serious effects of this statement, what steps has the minister taken regarding this situation?

● (1442)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to obtain the permission of the hon. member to reply thoroughly tomorrow or in the coming session.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

IMMIGRATION

MEDICAL CONDITIONS WHICH PREVENT ADMISSION TO CANADA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The minister, in a letter dated November 3, announced that persons in Canada on the authority of a minister's permit, who could not get landed immigrant status due to medical prohibitions, will be eligible to receive landed immigrant status and possibly immediate citizenship status in some cases. I should like to applaud the government because this action has been taken finally. I should like to ask the minister: in what cases could persons be inadmissible due to medical conditions, as the minister announced on November 3.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we were aiming primarily at epileptics who could not get into this country before under the old legislation. They were allowed in by ministerial permits, but they could not apply for Canadian citizenship. We propose to land them as immigrants and start their time of residence in Canada from the time they actually came into the country to facilitate their securing Canadian citizenships.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, on the basis of the answer just given by the minister, can I ask him whether he would be willing to table the regulations whereby persons will know exactly which medical prohibitions will no longer be prohibitions and which will remain in place?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, in this specific instance we had a target group in mind. Already we have communicated with them and expressed the government's intention to take this channel. Of course, the regulations will be tabled in the usual way. I hope they will be ready for study this month. We expect to proclaim the bill somewhere around the latter part of March.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—RETENTION OF MONEY IN CANADA FOR RESEARCH

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in view of his absence, I should like to direct it to the parliamentary secretary. Over $200 million a year is being taken out of Canada from the auto industry to support research in the United States, according to Dr. Patrick McTaggart-Cowan, the former head of the Science Council of Canada. Will the minister take steps, when he is having discussions on the auto pact, to see that this research money is spent here in Canada in order to create more jobs, boost our research and development efforts and keep Canadian dollars in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as regards the automobile agreement, we are now reviewing all measures taken in that sector, including our research policy, and I will draw my colleague's question to the attention of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REASON FOR FAILURE TO INCREASE BASIC DISABILITY PENSION—POSSIBLE REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the widespread concern expressed and the disappointment and discouragement of veterans' organizations across the country, as a result of the reluctance of the government to fulfil the commitment to equate the basic rate of pension with the five lowest categories in the public service, I wonder if the minister has had an opportunity to discuss again with cabinet the reason for its refusal and if this matter will be reviewed in the immediate future?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, I answered the question in the House a few weeks ago. The situation is still the same. The basic rate was not to be increased in the way requested. I want to remind the House that veterans will be receiving the cost of living index. When the financial constraints on the country become a little better, we will look at this again.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it is recognized that in January there will be a 7.2 per cent indexing to the basic rate of pension, I wonder if the minister will indicate whether he has heard concern expressed by the National Council of Veterans' Organizations which expressed their disappointment and discouragement. Is he going to meet with them? Will he refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs in order for the problem to be dealt with and to express what veterans think is fair and just?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, in relation to this question, I indicated previously that I see no problem in referring it to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs when it is called. As far as receiving anything authentic from the veterans' organizations as such, I have not received anything; but I have received considerable mail on the same issue.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO AWARDING OF MEDAL TO PREMIER LÉVESQUE BY FRANCE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the House if the medal awarded to Premier Lévesque by the government of France, which I understand is the second highest award that can be given by the French government, fell within the 1968 guidelines issued by the government of Canada governing the receipt of medals and honours by Canadian nationals?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the guidelines referred to by the hon. member are precisely that. They are not binding in the sense of any legal requirement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Obviously we would have preferred that the guidelines be followed and respected by the donor country or indeed, for that matter, by the recipient. As I understand it, since the medal is rather widely distributed and it does not carry all that much distinction, it is not something I will get up tight about.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: How come Pierre has not got one?

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us whether that medal or award fell within the guidelines issued by the government? I am not clear as to whether in fact it fell within the guidelines issued by the government.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me if it falls between the guidelines—

Mr. Hees: Within, within. He did not say between.

Mr. Jamieson: Certainly, it fell between protocol, if you want to put it that way. Quite honestly, it has not concerned me enough to even look at the guidelines to see whether if fits or not.

Mr. Hees: Have you checked lately with the Prime Minister?

HARBOURS

HALIFAX—PARTICIPATION OF GOVERNMENT IN CONSTRUCTION OF SECOND CONTAINER FACILITY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. After the lapse of quite a bit of time, I should like to ask him once again whether the time for the second container pier in Halifax has yet come? Is the minister now prepared to make a firm commitment that the government will participate in the second container facility, as well as facilitate the planning and land fill which is already done?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government accommodated the move ahead with the land fill by the province in order for the site to be ready as soon as possible. There has been no revision, which I am aware of, in the date upon which we felt the completion of the terminal was necessary. Therefore, we will be taking the appropriate steps in due course; but I do not have an announcement to make at this moment.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to a date. Can the minister give us that date?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, probably I can get that analysis for the hon. member. It indicated that construction would be required in the fairly near future in order that completion be available by a date, which is not exactly in my mind but is only two or three years away.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

OXFAM—PROPOSED STUDY OF FUNDING

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the absence of the House leader. In an analysis of Oxfam's financial position, a regional director suggested that it would be possible to obtain between $100,000 and $300,000 of CIDA funds in advance of when it would be required, depending upon the poor accounting practices of CIDA. In light of that statement by a director of Oxfam, would the minister be prepared to undertake a study of the funding of Oxfam now and in the future?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to do that. We carry out a continuing examination of the so-called non-governmental organizations. I have not seen that particular quote, but I will look into it and take the necessary steps to have it examined.

SMALL BUSINESS

REQUEST THAT ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR AID BE COMMUNICATED TO MEMBERS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Small Enterprise).

Since the policy has been announced in the House some time ago and since it has undoubtedly been the object of a very serious study by the officials of his department, is the minister now prepared to tell the House if the eligibility criteria have been established and would it be possible for him to tell the members of the House about it so they can inform their constituents who are awaiting the benefits of this policy, hoping naturally that it is efficiently carried out one day.

• (1452)

[English]

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, in September I announced a policy which had been arrived at by my predecessor in a ten-point program. Some of this policy involves the burden of paper work, and in following legislation that we have introduced amendments to the CALURA legislation which have been given first reading. I hope to make further improvements in that area, apart from that legislation when it is passed. There are a number of other areas we are developing, including the purchasing policy of the government and its approach on venture capital, but a number of these things are going to take time, and I hope that when we do bring something before the House it will meet the hon. member's concerns.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Would the minister tell the House very briefly, if he intends to call for information meetings in various areas of Canada and also in Quebec when the work he has just outlined is over in order to inform directors of small enterprises about it and enable them to benefit from it so they can help the government and the country put an end to unemployment?

[English]

Mr. Abbott: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that is an excellent suggestion by the hon. member, and we do intend to spread the message in the new year about the precise policies we have developed, but I think the hon. member would share my view that until we have something that is concrete to place before small businessmen it would not be advisable to go around the country simply making speeches about what we are going to do.

INQUIRY WHETHER TEN-POINT PROGRAM GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a short supplementary for the minister. Are we being led to believe by what he has just said that the ten-point program he inherited from his predecessor is in fact government policy on small business?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, the ten-point program as enunciated by me and developed by my predecessor was and is government policy, but the program as outlined anticipates a number of developments which are going to take place over a period of time, and therefore I am simply saying that I would like to see some of these proposals put in a more concrete form before we have study sessions for the benefit of small businessmen.

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF BANKS TO GRANT LOANS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I have another supplementary question for the same minister. Is the minister aware that some banks are flatly refusing to accept applications from worthy, bonded customers for small business loans using the excuse that they would rather lend the money at 12 per cent and 13 per cent than at the rate recommended by the Small Businesses Loans Act?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I have heard such allegations. I have been advised that some banks view the Small Businesses Loans Act with a lack of enthusiasm, and only as recently as yesterday in Kingston when some people were making the same allegation to me as the hon. member. I am investigating this, and I will be holding an early meeting with several senior officers of our chartered banks.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

POPLAR RIVER PROJECT IN MONTANA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ENSURE NO ENVIRONMENTAL DAMAGE

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Environment) with respect to the concerns of a great many people in the southern part of Saskatchewan and the northern part of Montana about the potential pollution threat resulting from the Poplar River power project. I wonder if at this stage the minister can specify the actions the federal government will take to satisfy itself that this project will not in fact become a serious international air polluter, particularly once it develops beyond the initial 300 megawatts stage?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the federal Department of the Environment has been watching this project very closely. I want to assure—

An hon. Member: Budgets, studies—

Mr. Marchand: Don't get excited. I want to assure the hon. member that we will be vigilant, and high environmental standards will always be foliowed by the federal government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT OF DANYLO SHUMUK IN SOVIET UNION—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it relates to the case of Mr. Danylo Shumuk, who the minister will recall is a man who has spent 35 of his 62 years in Soviet prisons exclusively for political crimes. Will the minister tell the House whether officials of his department or the minister himself have intervened directly—and I emphasize directly—with the Soviet authorities here or in Moscow to obtain the release of Mr. Shumuk and permission for him to travel to join his Canadian relatives?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Leader of the Opposition appreciates, I would have to check the list since the matter stretches over a number of years. I have not personally and specifically identified the gentleman in question in the representations I have made. Having said that, however, I have personally delivered lists of individuals to Soviet officials, so I will look into that to see if the name is on those lists, and I will get a chronology of whatever representations there have been.

In a more general way, as I believe the Leader of the Opposition knows since he has supported motions in this House and elsewhere, we have made repeated representations to the Soviet Union with regard to cases of political prisoners and others in similar categories.

Mr. Clark: After the minister looks into this matter and if the name of Mr. Shumuk is not on any of the lists which have been submitted by the minister or his officials will he advise us why the name of Mr. Shumuk is not on those lists, and whether it will be the intention of the government to intervene directly in the case of this gentleman?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to do that. By way of an interim answer I can say that individual representations are legitimate and proper when in fact travel to Canada or matters affecting relatives in Canada are concerned, and against that background I suspect that something has been done on an individual basis, but I will look into this matter and provide the answers.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION BY CABINET OF INCREASE IN BASIC DISABILITY PENSION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It is similar to the terms of a motion I sought to move today under Standing Order 43. It is also similar to a question asked earlier by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, but there is one important point the minister has not answered as yet.

In view of the fact that Canadians generally do not approve of the government's taking its economic troubles out on veterans and are anxious for the basic rate of the disability pension to be restored to the level established in 1973, will the minister take this matter again to his cabinet colleagues and urge that it be reconsidered by the government?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to leave one impression, and that is that down through the years—not just this year and last year—veterans have been treated quite well by the governments of Canada, and not just particularly by this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I would not like the impression to be left with this House or the country that we are not concerned.

I also would like to say that I am not the only minister who has been denied something he has been looking for. I want to make that clear because things can be very much misconstrued. However, as far as going back to the government with the proposals referred to is concerned, I cannot give the hon. member a date. I will go back to the government, but in all sincerity I would like to see that dust cleared first.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the minister goes back to the cabinet with the question of the rate of the basic disability pension would he also re-open the question of improving the position of veterans' widows?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, in the Department of Veterans Affairs we always have the concerns of veterans under consideration.

An hon. Member: Especially at election time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—RANGE OF POSSIBILITIES FOR SETTLEMENT REFERRED TO BY MINISTER

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the minister's statement in Jerusalem that the Middle East problem will have to involve some sort of territorial foundation and that there is a range of possibilities, what is the range of possibilities referred to by the minister?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the rules would permit me to give the kind of detailed answer the hon. member wants. I think perhaps my best answer might be to invite the hon. member—and any others, by the way, who might be interested in this subject—either in a formal meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence or separately to discuss it with me because it is far too complex, and I think the hazards of perhaps an improper statement at this time preclude my answering in detail.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

MINISTER'S DEFINITION OF PALESTINIANS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's response I hope he will in fact refer the matter to the committee or make a statement on motions in this House as a result of his visit.

With reference to the minister's statement that the Palestinian Arabs cannot be left out of peace-making processes, who in the minister's opinion are the Palestinians? Are the Palestinians in fact those who live within the disputed territory, outside the disputed territory or both?

● (1502)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, again I will do my best to be brief and precise. I had in mind most particularly those who are presently in the so-called disputed territory. One can also refer to some who are so-called refugees—that is one definition that is given to them—who may be living elsewhere at the moment. Of course, there are other definitions as well. In the terms that I made the statement, it was to the effect that there are people who have either been dislocated in terms of their traditional homes or who are at present insecure in terms of their present homes. This was a humanitarian and political problem which had to be resolved if there was to be progress on a Middle East settlement.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WALTER BAKER—PARLIAMENTARY PRIVILEGE VIS-À-VIS SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO RULING

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which affects all hon. members and to which Your Honour has already given some thought as a result of the notice I gave in this House the day before yesterday. It relates to the judgment given by Chief Justice Evans in the Supreme Court of Ontario respecting the "Regulations respecting the security of uranium information, S.O.R. 76-644." In my respectful submission, this judgment gave an interpretation of the extent of parliamentary privilege which I do not believe this House is obliged to accept, and I say with deference that I believe it should not be accepted. The relevant part of the judgment reads as follows, at page 42:

> Following the authorities set out above, I have come to the conclusion that a member of parliament may utilize information proscribed by reg. 76-644 in parliament and may release that information to the media. However, I hold that the privilege of the member cannot be extended to protect the media if they choose to release the information to the public. Nor do I consider that the "real" and "essential" functions of a member include a duty or right to release information to constituents. The cases indicate that the privilege is finite and I would not be justified in extending the privilege to cover information released to constituents.

This judgment is no doubt consistent with the course of judicial interpretation, but I am not so sure it is consistent with procedural authorities and rulings by Mr. Speaker in this House. I believe, first of all, that it makes little sense and bad precedent to assert the clear line between the House and the press which the judgment sets out. In this connection I would quote from one of your rulings, Mr. Speaker. In your ruling of December 19, 1974, at page 2383 of Hansard, in the case of remarks made by the late Mr. Real Caouette respecting possible bribery of press gallery members, you said:

I have additional concern about the fact that the allegations relate to the relationship between the members of this House and the members of the press gallery here, or at least some of the members of the press gallery, because to a certain extent the press gallery is an extension of the functioning of the House in bringing before the Canadian people, the electorate, the events of the House through the faithful and objective reporting of such events. This is not the sole responsibility of the press gallery but is a matter over which this House wants to exercise some interest—

That statement was an explicit recognition that free communication between a member and a constituent or the general public is more than a question of freedom of speech in the House. It is a recognition that the medium which transmits or interprets the message is part of the parliamentary process in a general sense and must not be subject to pressures or intimidations which do not permit conscientious and accurate reports to be made. The judgment of Mr. Justice Evans explicitly upsets the assumption made by you, Mr. Speaker, on the place of the press in this parliament. The judgment challenges our assumption that we are entitled to fair and accurate reports of our proceedings. May says, at page 80 of the nineteenth edition:

But the publication, whether by order of the House or not, of a fair and accurate account of a debate in either House of parliament is protected by the same principle as that which protects fair reports of proceedings in courts of justice, namely, that the advantage to the public outweighs any disadvantage to individuals unless malice is proved.

I would add here that if it is asserted that this quotation is inoperable because it is not the rights of individuals, but national security which is involved, should that be a criterion if the House has not taken the action which is its prerogative, that is, to resolve to sit in camera? Are members of the press, reporting on the comments of members, to be liable to prosecution because they did not, at the proper time, suddenly begin to act as if they were attending an in camera session at which their normal rights had suddenly vanished? To combine the points of fair reporting and the role of the press I would cite another quotation from May, the same edition, at page 81:

There is a distinction between the absolute privilege of members speaking in the House, or in any committee of the House, and the qualified privilege of a publisher reporting words spoken; in the latter case publication of parliamentary proceedings is protected, not specifically by privilege of parliament, but on the analogy of the publication of proceedings in courts of justice.

A specific case is cited, the conclusion being:

A fair and faithful report of the whole debate would therefore not be actionable.

I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that: first, the judgment by Mr. Justice Evans, in its comments upon parliamentary privilege are not in accordance with interpretations in this House on privilege as it relates to the relationship between members and the press. Second, the judgment is a clear and present source of intimidation to press gallery members which would prevent them from fairly and accurately reporting House proceedings. That is of vital concern to this House, as Your Honour has said. Third, the judgment usurps from the House the responsibility of determining itself when its proceedings are to be secretive and in-camera. Fourth, the judgment makes an addition to the body of legal precedent on the question of privilege which the House must challenge as soon as possible because it violates the right of the House to determine the extent of privilege.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that a committee of the House must look at this question as soon as possible. As I have said, there is no doubt that Mr. Justice Evans is entitled to rule as he did in keeping with judicial practice—and if we could, we would not want to call him as a witness. But we must act, as well, to protect the privileges of members. Because of the general, rather than the specific nature of the implied intimidation, you may consider it a matter for the Standing Committee on Rights and Immunities of Members. I believe the question is an urgent one, and I would move, if Your Honour finds a prima facie case of privilege:

That the portions of the judgment of Chief Justice Evans of the Supreme Court of Ontario, given November 9, 1977, which appear to restrict the right of members of parliament to full and accurate reporting in the press, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. House leader of the opposition raised this matter two days ago. At that time I indicated that, like him, I had not had a chance to study the judgment very carefully and wanted to reserve my right to say something on the subject. I did not know that this matter was being raised today and, therefore, I have not completed my study of the Chief Justice's judgment as I would like to do. There are a couple of things I should like to say first. There is nothing substantial that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has said with which I at this point would want to take exception, but I would ask that this motion not be put right now until the House leader on our side has had an opportunity of considering the remarks of today and the motion.

There is, undoubtedly, some confusion caused by the judgment, as there was, of course, on the question of whether the uranium information regulations affected the rights and privileges of members of parliament in so far as debates are concerned, or whether members' rights to consult legal advice was involved. Counsel for both the applicant and myself agreed on that position in court and, as I understand it, the judge clearly found the regulation to be subordinate to the privileges and immunities of members of parliament. There is the matter of the effect on publication raised by the hon. member. I understand there is an action arising from some comment made after the judgment was rendered as to the effect on publication.

It is quite clear, and certainly my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that questions on the publication and reproduction of Hansard are matters for the House and the Speaker, and it is up to the Speaker and the House to determine those matters and to determine that the practice has been that there is no bar to such publication or reproduction of Hansard. Therefore,

I am not entirely clear whether we actually need to examine this question.

I think there is probably agreement among us all as to what those privileges and immunities contain, as well as to publication, but I would ask that the House leader on our side should have an opportunity of considering the remarks made today and whether we are in agreement with the motion of the hon. member. As I say, I did not know that this matter was being raised today. I should like to consider the question, and I might advise you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, that it might be advisable for the Speaker to take action by way of appealing that particular part of the judgment. I would really like an opportunity to consider those questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will hear those hon. members who indicate their willingness to discuss this matter at this time. I certainly would have no difficulty in holding the matter over in order to permit a prepared intervention by the Minister of Justice or, alternatively, the House leader or his nominee in this matter. At the moment, I will hear those members who are prepared to speak to the matter brought forward.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I, too, was unaware that this matter was coming forward today. I read that judgment with amazement, and it is difficult to understand that this judgment would have been delivered. As far as the interference with the rights of members of parliament contained therein is concerned, those rights are not determined in the courts: those rights are determined in the House of Commons and are not subject to interpretation by any court outside the supreme court of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: When I first heard the judgment and what was stated there and in the press, it was impossible for me to believe it was in accordance with what had actually taken place. In so far as a great portion of that judgment is concerned, it is in no way binding on anyone, certainly not on any superior court. It consists of observations which you, Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer, and lawyers generally, recognize to be what is known as obiter dicta.

The judge proceeded to give a judgment regarding a lot of extraneous matter, making up 54 pages or so. I read it instead of following the usual course of measuring that kind of thing and, having done that, I concluded that measuring it would have been the most successful course I could have followed. There is one matter I should like to have the opportunity of pointing out. I am impressed by what the Minister of Justice has said. I think his observations were very pertinent and very reasonable.

An hon. Member: But!

Mr. Diefenbaker: But, I must point out that this judge, newly elevated to the height of Chief Justice of Ontario, refused to allow the representations of the Civil Liberties Organization of Canada as to whether the Bill of Rights applied. That, to say the least, did not receive my full approbation. The Bill of Rights should have been considered. It provided, and provides, freedom of the press for the first time under legislation in this country. The civil liberties association should have been permitted to make its representations, and the fact that that course was not permitted would indicate the judge was unaware of the provision of the Bill of Rights.

In so far as parliament is concerned, I repeat what I said earlier: the courts have no right to interpret what the rights of this institution are or how they shall be determined. That type of action was acceptable in the days of Judge Jefferies, but not in 1977. Adjourning this matter for further consideration is a wise idea. I hope this parliament will announce that we do not intend to have our ancestral privileges and rights abrogated under obiter dicta by the Chief Justice of Ontario who denied any possibility of representations being made in connection with the Bill of Rights. I speak as one who is a member of the bar of this province when I say that—and as a member of three other bars across Canada—I cannot understand the reason he chose to endeavour to interfere with those rights, apparently unaware of the fact that what takes place here today is broadcast across the nation. This could cause a multitude of things to keep a judge in this country busy on worth-while things for a very long time to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties about this debate is that we are all on the same side. I am sure that even after the government House leader has participated and we have, perhaps, had a further intervention by the Minister of Justice, it will still be the position of hon. members of this House that our freedom of speech in this place cannot be curtailed from the outside, and that the people of Canada have the undoubted right to know what goes on in this place.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert pressed the point that no judge could limit our freedom of speech. I think, in all fairness to Mr. Justice Evans, that he has made no suggestion that we should be limited in our discussions in this House about the uranium cartel question or any other. However, in my view where he overstepped the line was when he suggested we could not convey to our constituents things we had learned in this House, and that members of the media must be careful about reporting what goes on in the House. I find that almost ridiculous, even though it comes from such a learned person as a Chief Justice. As other hon. members have pointed out, what goes in this House is printed verbatim in Hansard in two languages, and Hansard is published in 15,000 or more copies per day and sent all over the country and the world.

How any judge can say we cannot convey to our constituents what we have said or learned in this place is beyond me. Is he trying to say to me that on a day when there has been a discussion on the uranium cartel in this House, I cannot sent Hansard to my constituents?

An hon. Member: What about TV?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is he saying to this House that if the hon. member for York-Simcoe gets up and starts to talk about the uranium cartel, the cameras over there must be turned off.

An hon. Member: Or turn him off.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is just about that ridiculous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let me say, Mr. Speaker, even though I take that position very strongly, that I have done some reading in this area and that there are citations in the book even on page 80 which the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton read from. That must confuse the learned judge. Even though sentences in May and in other books dealing with the matter seem to confuse, I think they make the position clear if you read them closely. May says although there is the unquestioned right that the papers and the documents of this House can be made public and distributed, and although there is the unquestioned right of the press and other media—even if I am adding that phrase—to report fairly and honestly what goes on here, there are still certain limitations which members must face.

For example, if a member of this House makes a speech which includes libel of a citizen outside the House, he can make that speech in the House, and I think it is still fairly clear that the press can report the speech that was made. But May says that if the member reprints that speech and publishes it by itself, particularly if he publishes it by itself rather than as part of the whole debate, and distributes it outside the House, he must face the fact that an action could be taken against him for libel. He can say it in the House, and there can be no libel charge against him. If he publishes outside what he has said here, there is the possibility of a libel action being taken against him.

This is part of the confusing law we have. But today we are not dealing with a case of members making statements that seem to be libellous: we are dealing with an order in council passed by the government which says we must not discuss a certain subject. This is a subject declared by the government to be forbidden. I suggest that is a totally different thing. If speeches are made on that subject, Hansard is circulated or the newspapers report it—and who is offended? Who is going to lay a charge? Who is going to prosecute? It will be the government which passed the order in council.

You can see the kind of Pandora's box which the learned judge has opened up. He has suggested to the government that its order in council was valid—some of us do not think so, but the judge says it is. He now says not only is that order in council valid, but if members debate the issue in the House and then report it outside, the government can take the members to court, not for what they said in here but what they published outside. Well, this government does some ridiculous things, but I cannot imagine it would do that.

An hon. Member: You do not know this Minister of Justice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a totally different category from the libellous things, the defamation of character that might be uttered in this House which lead May and other authorities to warn members there are some things about which we should be careful. In terms of discussing a policy of the government, particularly this whole area of the uranium cartel, I do not think the judge did all the homework that he should have done. First of all, I think his judgment, that the order in council was valid, is questionable. Even on that basis, he has gone on to say it is still within the privilege of parliament to discuss the matter here. Well, if it is all right to discuss it, and if that discussion does not involve defaming the characters of individuals out there but involves offending the sensitivities of the government that did not want its policy to be talked about, I see no reason why there should be any limitation on the fair reporting of what took place in parliament.

These things are pretty basic: they go back for centuries—the right of the country to know what is going on. It is not enough for us to have free speech in parliament. If the country does not know, it does not have full access to what is going on here. That would not be in tune with the whole democratic process. I do not think the learned judge was as learned as we call him when he made this pronouncement. I hope that when this discussion ends, whether tomorrow or some other day, there will be a clear ruling from the Chair or an agreement to refer the matter to a committee so that the House can make a decision.

I think it important that we affirm our right to freedom of discussion in this House of Commons and that we affirm the freedom of the press and the media to report to the country what is going on here. So, Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton on raising this issue today. I hope that by the time the discussion is over, the apparent unanimity that is already here will be solid and complete.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): I would like to make a few brief comments on the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton partly in response to two of the suggestions put forth by the Minister of Justice. As I understood the Minister of Justice, he said, first of all, that in effect he did not know there was too much urgency with respect to a ruling on the question raised by my colleague. He had asked for some time so that his House leader could review the situation with a view to making a fuller statement at a later date. He raised the question that perhaps a ruling is not needed in any event.

Speaking first on the question, I think there is a very high degree of urgency. If we read the full judgment of Chief Justice Evans, I agree with my colleague, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, that much of what was said was probably obiter dicta. He has put us in a very awkward position. The Chief Justice makes it very clear that while we have certain privileges as members of parliament, those privileges clearly do not extend to the general public with respect to anybody in that class who has first-hand knowledge of what transpired within the cartel and the activities between January 1, 1972, and December 31, 1975, involving uranium production in Canada.

The type of person that is caught there, clearly not only under the first regulation but also under the newly amended regulation—which is presumably still a valid regulation—is a governmental official who has had some hand in the formation and operation of the cartel during those years I have referred to. I refer to those that are members still, or who were at that time members of the various producing companies active in the uranium industry, and who have some hand in uranium cartel activities.

The reason it is rather urgent that we get an interpretation as to our privilege is that we have some first-hand knowledge from some of those people who are still covered by the amended "gag" regulation that we would like to reveal, not only to this House but to the Canadian public generally. The unfortunate thing that has now arisen is that if we offer that information in the House, clearly our privilege, according to the Chief Justice is guaranteed, if you like—he does not question that within the House—but he makes it very clear and says the privilege stops at the press.

I am in this odd position. I have some danger in going to an official either within a producing company or within the government and seeking the information that some have indicated they are willing to give us. That might be aiding and abetting that person breaking the regulation as amended. I emphasize that. Second, when I get that fresh information and I offer it in the House—and I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre touched on this—unless I alert the tv cameras and those who might be listening that I am about to reveal certain information that the Chief Justice indicates I have the right to reveal, but the press does not have the right to communicate, there is going to be an offence committed. We would be in a rather awkward position. Presumably, I have to give Your Honour an indication that I am going to reveal information. Your Honour could call for a black-out or something like that in case there is some offence. That is the rather ridiculous position we are in.

The Minister of Justice indicates that he is not sure whether a ruling is needed. I would emphasize that a ruling is needed very quickly. Contrary to what the minister has conveyed, the Chief Justice deals very specifically with what he regards to be the rules within the House of Commons. He cites various precedents; he goes into that; he does not stop simply with a judicial interpretation. But perhaps the confusion comes up at page 42 of his judgment. If I may, I would like to quote his words:

> Following the authorities set out above, I have come to the conclusion that a member of parliament may utilize information proscribed by reg. 76-644 in parliament and may release that information to the media. However, I hold that the privilege of the member cannot be extended to protect the media if they choose to release the information to the public. Nor do I consider that the "real" and "essential" functions of a member include a duty or right to release information to constituents. The cases indicate that the privilege is finite and I would not be justified in extending the privilege to cover information released to constituents.

[Mr. Stevens.]

What the judge is apparently relying on is a House of Commons decision in England of a special committee that was set up there in 1938-39 entitled "a select committee on the Official Secrets Act". He refers extensively to comments made in that committee which were subsequently adopted by the House in England and presumably are now part of the privileges as defined in the House in England.

Where the confusion seems to have arisen is that the Chief Justice has likened the "gag" regulation, with which we are now dealing, with something that might fall under the Official Secrets Act. He is, in effect, saying that if they are one and the same, the limit to privilege under the Official Secrets Act of England would presumably apply to members of the House of Commons in Canada. With all due respect to His Lordship, I do not feel that is a fair comparison—in, there is nothing about this "gag" regulation that can be looked upon as an official secrets type of activity. In short, it is simply a gag on those who have first-hand knowledge with regard to what transpired in the production, distribution and sale of uranium between the years that I have indicated. In fact, members of the government have often tried to tell us that there was nothing secret about what happened.

We are in the awkward position where the government by order in council has said it is an offence to reveal anything, certainly of a first-hand nature. With regard to what transpired touching on this subject within those years, we have the Chief Justice indicating that our privilege does not extend beyond this House in the sense that we cannot communicate with our constituents or the press on their own if they want to release this information. We need an early indication of what, in fact, is the privilege we enjoy in this House and to what extent it extends to other members of the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has already made an intervention. I do not know if he is seeking the floor on a point of order or for clarification.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I was hoping to move on. I want to raise a question of privilege on my own. However, with regard to the last intervention I just want to say, as the House knows, that the President of the Privy Council has been very seriously ill for some time. I would at least like some time to be able to consult with him before a decision is taken on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton gave notice earlier in the week, supported by the Minister of Justice, that the matter ought to be raised in a preliminary indication of the contents of the judgment by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Upon the request of the Minister of Justice today to consider the matter before making an intervention, I am certainly prepared to accede to that, provided any further intervention on the part of the government is made as quickly as possible. We would certainly be looking for that advice at the earliest possible moment. It is, therefore, appropriate that I should reserve on the matter pending the further intervention, and take some careful consideration of the judgment itself and of the arguments which are all very valuable in attempting to come to a decision on this important subject.

There is one thing that is very clear. There is no doubt in my mind that the privileges, rights and immunities of members of this House are in the first place to be decided by this House and not by any other body.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The second is that there is, as I indicated in previous discussion on this order in council as it might affect members of the House of Commons, a very real danger in anybody, including this House, attempting to deal with matters of privilege in the abstract or in theory. That is a danger we have to recognize. In this instance, and as it has been since this matter was first raised, it is very difficult to deal with potential difficulties that may arise. However, that may have happened in the House. We may be faced with something we will have to take into consideration in a different way. It seems to me always preferable to assume that a member has the rights, privileges and immunities that have always surrounded a member until such time as a member finds himself unable to function and brings before this House the interference with his ability to function for consideration on a question of privilege. That is the most direct way to deal with it.

However, the matter has taken on other dimensions and the Minister of Justice has asked for time to consider an intervention. Therefore, I will hold the matter over until that intervention is made.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I indicated earlier that I wanted to raise what has become, under our practice, a question of privilege. It is probably more correctly a point of order. It arises from a speech made in the House yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary North and words that he used in that speech. On Monday last Your Honour made a ruling on a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River—a ruling against the Prime Minister for certain words that he had used in this House.

At that time Your Honour said that you were ruling in the interests of protecting the dignity of parliament and that you were being diligent in that respect. Obviously, that is a matter of concern to you, that the dignity and decorum of the House of Commons be preserved. It is a task for which you have our full support in endeavouring to achieve. Especially now, with television in the House, it is important that we re-examine, if need be, the rules relating to conduct, behaviour and parliamentary language. I know, having been talking to the public outside, that people have been watching television and that they have been very concerned and upset to see and hear daily the unfounded innuendoes, slurs and allegations directed against Ministers of the Crown by members opposite.

• (1542)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: In the past we on this side have not generally complained, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member for Peace River recently raised a point of order and Your Honour took the occasion to make a ruling relating to the dignity of the House with regard to which you have our complete agreement and support. I therefore feel we have, as a result of your ruling on Monday, a new basis upon which to govern ourselves in the House.

Last night the hon. member for Calgary North made a speech, and I am sure he meant no ill. But in his usual exuberance and enthusiasm he made a forceful speech in the course of which he said, as reported at page 905 of Hansard:

It is not ministerial responsibility we should be talking about tonight, it is ministerial irresponsibility and culpability—

Well, Mr. Speaker, culpability is defined in the Oxford Concise Dictionary as "criminal or blameworthy" and in Webster's Third International it is described as "guilty or criminal". I think, therefore, it is quite clear on the basis of your ruling on Monday and from the citation to which you referred in that ruling—citation 140 which is familiar to us all—and the example cited from paragraph 155 of Beauchesne's, that language of this kind is contrary to the citations of Beauchesne and contrary to the Standing Orders relating to debate and contrary to your ruling of Monday.

I will go on reading from the same page of Hansard, page 905. As reported in the same column, the hon. member said:

Because the opposition are interrogating us, and we are covering up—

He was referring to the government. Again, the words "covering-up" have connotations of interference in the administration of justice and are unparliamentary. Further on, in the next column, the hon. member is reported as saying, "That is untruthful". It was a reference to a speech I made in Vancouver, and I think reference to Beauchesne would make it clear that the expression used is unparliamentary. On page 906, the hon. member said:

This is merely a plot to take the responsibility and the heat off their own shoulders because of their irresponsibility and culpability in this matter.

I referred a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, to the use of the word "culpability". Again on page 906 the hon. member went on to say:

He could not have gathered a standing ovation from his audience by telling the truth.

The hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) asked:

Are you calling him a liar?

Then the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) said "Yes, he is". And he was referring to me.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Basford: The hon. member for Vancouver South was again referring to a speech I made in Vancouver. It is unclear from the record to what part of that speech he was referring—whether it was that part of the speech which pointed out that despite the reorganization of the Conservative caucus it had been so reorganized that there was not one British Columbian member of parliament on the Conservative side who had been given a key position in the Conservative caucus. I am not sure whether that was the part he was referring to, or whether it was the portion of the speech referring to the RCMP.

To my way of thinking, Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that both Beauchesne and your own ruling on Monday show that to refer to people in this House as lying or as liars is unparliamentary. I can quote more examples. On page 907 the hon. member from Calgary North accuses us of blackmail and says the security services have been blackmailed by this government. That is clearly an allegation of criminal wrongdoing and is contrary to the rules laid down in Beauchesne.

Mr. Chrétien: Terrible!

Mr. Basford: Again, on page 907, the hon. member said of me:

I said that when they threw pumpkin pie I hoped the seeds of the pumpkin would be as hard as rocks—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: I am not complaining about that, but it seems to me that for the hon. member for Calgary North to associate himself and align himself with crackpots in our society who throw pies is just a little disappointing. I will not, however, ask him to withdraw that. The hon. member then went on to say:

—when the minister made this, in my view, untruthful attack on the opposition—

Obviously, that is an allegation of lying which is clearly unparliamentary.

Mr. Chrétien: Withdraw.

Mr. Basford: I am sure the hon. member was speaking with his usual verve and enthusiasm and did not really mean to use such unparliamentary language. Mr. Speaker, in line with your ruling of Monday in which you endeavoured to set out how we in this House should behave with dignity and decorum—an effort which we on this side endeavour to make—I would ask that the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Vancouver South withdraw those remarks which I have cited and withdraw them in a large and liberal way, as required by citation 141.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am rather amused, to say the least. I would, however, just point out that when the Minister of Justice was in the House he delivered quite an attack on the opposition. I find it rather interesting that he would take objection to what I said later. I feel I was making what amounts to fair political comment. Nothing in my remarks makes me feel otherwise. Last night when I spoke—and a fellow needs to have fairly good lungs sometimes—the hon. member for Restigouche spoke louder than I did all the time I was speaking. I would hope that now the minister has raised what he thinks is, maybe, a joke, when he means to be serious, I have to answer him seriously. These are the minister's words as reported at page 894:

[Mr. Basford.]

That has been said by the Prime Minister and other ministers in the House and for the minister to suggest in his speech today to the contrary simply reinforces by thesis that today's debate and this resolution are nothing more than a crass, transparent device to manipulate public opinion.

Mr. Chrétien: That is not illegal, though. That is not against the rules.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the same sort of thing.

Mr. Woolliams: If the hon. gentleman would be silent for a few moments, I would read from Beauchesne, citation 132. The minister has been in the House and has made his speech. I do not think I would be breaking a confidence if I said I met the hon. gentleman and he said, "I understand you'll be speaking. I hope you don't mind, but I have a dinner engagement." I shall not go into that further. He knew I would be speaking. I had my speech prepared. It was not made off the cuff; it was written out. I delivered it with all the ability at my command. But the proper time for interference is when the offensive expressions are uttered, and not afterward—and I am not saying they were offensive. It may take place either on the Speaker's voluntary motion or a call to order of a member assailed, or some other member or a general call of the House. The speaker feels more strongly his duty to interpose such language as seems unparliamentary with regard to the absent member.

To be fair, Mr. Speaker, there was a large number of Liberal members in the House when I delivered that speech. Any one of them could have risen if it was thought that the language was unparliamentary. But no one saw fit to do so. I want, now, to deal with what I am really saying. Surely my remarks were fair comment. You pretty well have to read the whole thing. What I was saying was this:

What we are saying is this, that surely there would be no accountability at all if we are to believe the ministers, which I do not accept. They have never had any accountability. It is not a day to day job. They have not done it from week to week or month to month or year to year for eight years. There has been an absence of any accountability or any responsibility.

In the absence of accounting, I say that the minister or ministers were negligent. You are a lawyer, sir, and will appreciate that when dealing with the word "negligence" in the vehicles act it has a different meaning. I can quote a case in which the Supreme Court of Canada defined negligence in that sense as something greater than ordinary negligence, as having some culpable or blameworthy weight. I do not refer to culpability in the criminal sense of a voluntary statement; I am talking about the minister being called negligent in not giving some accounting for the security of the nation. I am not going to say anything more about that.

When I talk about covering up, Mr. Speaker, I do not think anyone could sit in the House for 19 years, as I have, and not say that there has not been some covering up, to use layman's language, on both sides of this House from time to time. I am sure that when we formed the government, our ministers—I do not mean this in the criminal sense—may not always have told everything. However, I have been listening to ministers opposite since 1968, and when I use the phrase "cover-up" in connection with them I do not mean covering up some criminal activity, as Richard Nixon did, but a cover-up in layman's terms. I just cannot believe that this "cry baby" can be so sensitive at this time.

I come now to the next point. The Minister of Justice has charged us with suggesting that the police workday should be monitored from day to day. I say that is utter nonsense. I am not saying that the minister lied, but it is untrue. If I had said that he had deliberately made a statement to falsify facts in this House, then I would not be standing where I am, I would withdraw.

I come to the next statement, that there is merely a plot. Well, Mr. Speaker, if you believe that there have not been plots in the Liberal caucus against this poor old party ever since confederation, then I am not Eldon Woolliams from Calgary North. There have been plots and plots. I am not talking about a criminal conspiracy or some illegal plot, but an ordinary plot. The Liberals often make plots.

Mr. Fraser: In fact, they leave them behind them.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sure that if they ever hid a wire recorder in our caucus room they would sometimes hear about plots. Perhaps we do not plot as well as they do, Mr. Speaker, but we plot. I am telling you honestly that we plot.

We now come to the fifth objection. This was when the noise in the House became so loud that you could not hear yourself think, let alone speak. This has to do with the hon. member for Restigouche. I do not know what happened to him, Mr. Speaker, or what he had for dinner, whether it was mustard on steak, but something upset his digestion, to say the least. He was yelling at me when I said that the minister could not have gathered a standing ovation from his audience by telling the truth but that the one thing the minister did accomplish was to get a pie in the face.

I said that perhaps a little facetiously, Mr. Speaker. I thought it rather funny, having come back from Calgary on an aircraft, when I saw the Minister of Justice wiping the cream from the pie out of his eyeballs. You could not help but think that funny, Mr. Speaker. I always get along with the Minister of Justice and he would be the first to say so. I was not trying to be cruel, unkind or bitter; I just wanted to have a little humour with him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member enjoyed many opportunities for that last evening, and it looks like he is getting a second run. I want simply to intervene at this point to say that both members have had an opportunity to raise this matter. I think we ought to pay careful attention to the general principle here in accordance with the ruling that I made earlier in the week, namely, that no allegation of law-breaking or of illegality, can be made by one side against the other side in this House. I think that is consistent with the principle of the judgment I made.

The expression referred to by the Minister of Justice can, I suppose, in some contexts have that effect, but I would not want to eliminate that for all time. However, the hon. member has already referred to the main point of culpability, cover-up and matters that might be untruthful; but those words do not seem to carry with them any suggestion of illegality in the context in which they were used.

The other point which gave me some doubt in the minister's argument was the question of blackmail, which at best is a slang term, one which cannot be taken from the annals of the Criminal Code. In the context which was used by the hon. member for Calgary North I do not see any allegation of direct illegality. However, I would ask all hon. members to be vigilant that we do not relax this practice of prohibiting allegations of direct illegality by one member against another.

I think this matter has been thoroughly discussed by both sides. Both members have had an opportunity to contribute to it, and I think we ought to move on to another question.

MR. CROSBIE—REMARKS OF MR. M. DIONNE

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not want to keep Your Honour long, but I want to refer to a matter which came up last night, as reported at page 914 of Hansard, having to do with remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi. As recorded at page 914, the hon. member said:

> We have heard repeatedly today that there is no effort on the part of the opposition to condemn the RCMP. They say they support the RCMP. Let us look at the record. I refer to a speech made on October 31 by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie). He said as reported at page 496 of Hansard:
> "—I say the RCMP have to be brought to heel."
> That is not a condemnation by the RCMP in their terms! They will bring in another apologist to try to eradicate that statement.

That is a misrepresentation, Mr. Speaker, of what I said on October 31. I refer Your Honour to Hansard of that date. As reported at page 496, I said this—and compare it with the previous quotation:

> I have no fetish about the RCMP, and if members of the RCMP are going about Canada committing illegal acts in the manner we have evidence they have done in three or four instances, then I say the RCMP have to be brought to heel.

The deliberate partial quotation made by the hon. gentleman is a complete misrepresentation of what I said, Mr. Speaker. May I refer Your Honour to page 130 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, where halfway down the page it says that the misrepresentation of the language of another is unparliamentary. This is a misrepresentation of my language. The hon. member took part of a sentence only, and there is a great difference between the two statements, one being "I say the RCMP has to be brought to heel", the other being:

> I have no fetish about the RCMP, and if members of the RCMP are going about Canada committing illegal acts in the manner we have evidence they have done in three or four instances, then I say the RCMP have to be brought to heel.

I do not think an hon. member should be allowed to take partial quotes of another member and twist the meaning. I submit that that is a breach of the privilege of that hon.

member, and I should like the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi either to withdraw or to correct his quotation.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would commence my remarks by briefly quoting Shakespeare; "Methinks he doth protest too much".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You should tell that to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I referred to several quotes of the hon. member, but before going back to them I might refer to what the hon. member for Calgary North just cited—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. John's West has raised a point of privilege which I do not propose to deal with at great length. The hon. member for St. John's West raised the point that the quotation ought at least to be in sufficient context to set it. There is no requirement upon a member to do that so long as he is using language used by the hon. member, in this case the hon. member for St. John's West. I am interested in knowing whether or not the hon. member is prepared to include a reference to a more expanded quote. However, I do not think the matter should be debated at great length.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to cite the same citation as that cited some time ago, namely, that the proper time to raise such an objection is when the offence is committed. I could have also quoted the succeeding statement of the hon. member for St. John's West, which I believe makes it even worse:

● (1602)

They have to be brought to heel, and their political masters who encouraged them, or who are hiding them, or who directed them or who condoned those acts, have to be brought to heel also.

On November 8, 1977, the Prime Minister used that same quotation in a question of privilege which he raised. At that time the hon. member did not raise a question of privilege, and in my opinion the hon. member has no question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for St. John's West had a point of order or some other argument when the matter was discussed during the course of debate last evening. Whether he has a point of order now seems to be in some grave doubt, certainly as a question of privilege. However, the hon. member for St. John's West has already had an opportunity to correct the record in so far as his expanded quotation is concerned, and to set it in context. Under the circumstances, that seems to be fair.

COPY OF STUDIES REFERRED TO BY POSTMASTER GENERAL

Motion No. 54—Mr. Dinsdale:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the studies referred to by the Postmaster General at page 6530 of the House of Commons Debates of June 10, 1977, in his reply to questions raised by the hon. member for Don Valley.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, November 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill I want to say that I certainly do not support it. I do not support any legislation which will give this government the power to borrow up to $9 billion, because I do not think the government is fit or competent to spend $1, much less $9 billion. If hon. members opposite do not object, I should like to point out that the government brought the economy of Canada to heel. It brought the economy to a standstill and has given it a fearsome dart in the last five or six years. It mismanaged the economy of this country, which imperiled our lives. We are on the same slippery slope which the United Kingdom travelled after the war. The U.K. had much more reason to do that than we have: we have no reason to be on that slippery slope at all, except the mismanagement of our economy. The government has brought in this legislation which contains critical measures to stimulate the economy and get us going again. There is nothing in this legislation which will stimulate the Canadian economy and get it going again. In fact, it is far from it.

Our general economic position is a desperate one. There are no signs of progress. The Economic Council of Canada has given us the picture. Soon it will be abolished because it has given truthful opinions about the record of the government. In its annual review the Economic Council of Canada pointed out that we face a resurgence in inflation. The fact that the cost of living went up by 1 per cent to an 8.8 per cent annual rate in September and October confirms what the Economic Council of Canada has indicated.

The Council also foresaw heavy unemployment continuing and growing worse, failing businesses, failing consumer confidence and large government debts. Surely this bill is proof of large government debts. The government wants us to authorize the borrowing of another $9 billion. That would be another $9 billion for this group of spendthrifts to misappropriate, with large current account deficits stretching into the years ahead.

The deficit balance in our balance of international payments will exceed $4 billion this year. Yesterday, in St. John's, a newspaper columnist said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should wear a wreath in his buttonhole—not a rose—when he comes to Newfoundland next week. That columnist is dead-on. The Prime Minister should go to Newfoundland in mourning for the unemployed. At the present moment we have 29,000 unemployed in Newfoundland.

Dealing with unemployment, at the present time it is 11.4 per cent in Quebec; 17.4 per cent in Newfoundland; 14.6 per cent in New Brunswick; 10.7 per cent in Nova Scotia, and 11.2 per cent in Prince Edward Island. The average in the Atlantic provinces is 13.5 per cent. The youth unemployment rate in Newfoundland is 24.9 per cent. The percentage of the labour force looking for work and still unemployed for three months in Newfoundland is 43 per cent. The Prime Minister should go to Newfoundland in black; he should go with a wreath in his buttonhole and dressed in black, accompanied by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The other day the Minister of Finance said with great pride in this chamber that the increased employment this year was 257,000. He was trying to fool the television audience.

Mr. Chrétien: The figure was 292,000.

Mr. Crosbie: All right, 292,000. The figure I have for the increase in the labour force this year is 365,000, but it is probably more than that. We are all aware of the fact that every year more people will be employed as long as our population continues to grow. The increase in the labour force is outrunning the increase in the number of jobs created. What good is there in the Minister of Finance flapping his wings and indicating that the number of employed people has increased?

In Newfoundland it has not increased. The job creation in Newfoundland was minus 4,000 last month, while the labour force growth was 2,000—for another 6,000 unemployed. The sorry record of this government goes on and on.

The government should voluntarily resign and get out of power in order to let someone else attempt to do something for the economy that it has ruined. Cabinet ministers are like whirling dervishes. Mr. Speaker, have you ever seen a whirling dervish? I saw them once in the Egyptian Sudan. They stand in one spot and they whirl, whirl and whirl. They keep whirling, whirling and whirling for a long, long time. That is what is happening to cabinet ministers. Canada has had three ministers of finance in the last four years—whirling dervishes! Mr. Turner whirled like a dervish out of the House of Commons. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) whirled like a dervish out of the House of Commons. My prophecy is that the present Minister of Finance will whirl like a dervish out of the House of Commons in the next year or two when the election comes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The "Shawinigan saviour" will not save his deposit next year when the electorate has a chance to get at him, even with the partial treatment which has been given to businesses and industries in his district. What are our financial, business and economic ministers doing about this tragic situation? What the Minister of Finance is doing is before us in this bill. What is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) doing about this situation? Well, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is doing everything under the sun but doing his job. He should get down to trying to produce some solutions. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is blaming Canada's present condition on everyone but himself and the government. Members might agree that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is only responsible to some extent because he has been in that portfolio for only six months.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He has not had the time to muck it up.

Mr. Crosbie: He has not had the time to really do a job, so we will not blame him too much. The minister is blaming everyone under the sun. I should like to refer to Hansard of November 9, 1977, page 757, which indicates that the hon. member for Crowfoot will have a lot of "crowfoot" to eat after the election next year. In fact, he will have lots of time to eat it. The hon. member for Crowfoot blames everyone but the government for Canada's present economic situation.

• (1612)

As hon. members in this chamber realize that the difficult economic times we have in Canada are not caused by the government and they have no relationship to the government? I quote the minister as follows:

> We are having these problems partially as a result of the maturing of Third World countries.

We have to blame the poor Third World countries for the mess our economy is in, according to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Further on the same page the minister is recorded as saying the following:

> This high inflationary period was certainly not the fault of this government or the result of its policies.

Six months ago he was saying every day that it was the fault of this government and the result of its policies; but now because he is on the other side of the House it is not the fault of this government. What does the minister think about unemployment? There is not a heavy, high unemployment rate in the minister's own district out in Alberta. Because of the good PC government in Alberta there is almost full employment there. They are begging people to take jobs out there, so the minister does not have to worry about unemployment.

However, as recorded at page 759 of Hansard, the minister was talking about Cape Breton where unemployment is as bad, if not worse, than it is in Newfoundland. I think the rate in Cape Breton is in excess of 30 per cent. People there have been subject to the unemployment tragedy for at least 15 or 20 years, and the history of unemployment goes back even further than that. But I am talking about the latest bout of unemployment for the miners and people of Cape Breton. What sympathy does the minister display for those who are out of work on Cape Breton Island? As recorded at page 759 of Hansard, the minister was talking about energy and saying that we have a chance to become self-sufficient. He said:

> That should give any Canadian a great deal of hope and confidence. We are slow in developing some of our coal mines. That is one aspect which could be improved.
> MR. BLACKBURN: Especially in Cape Breton.
> MR. HORNER: Especially in Cape Breton because of the costs, and I think I should say perhaps because of the inappreciability of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job. That is a serious accusation.

The minister himself acknowledged that it was a serious accusation. The minister accused humble mine workers of Cape Breton of being wastrels, sluggards, job-avoiders and welfare-seekers. He said that they do not appreciate retaining their jobs; that they "inappreciate". I have not heard that word before, but it is clear what the minister meant. He meant that Cape Bretoners do not appreciate working; that they do not appreciate jobs; that they "inappreciate" them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A "Hornerism"!

Mr. Crosbie: According to the minister, it is the fault of the Cape Breton miner that he is unemployed. I hope the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who also represents that area, will confirm that this is indeed the government's analysis of the situation in Cape Breton and that it is the fault of Cape Breton miners themselves that they are unemployed because they do not want jobs and that they "inappreciate" them. I hope the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will have the good sense to come to this House, get down on his hands and knees before hon. members from Cape Breton and apologize for that insult to the people who live there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: So now we have some idea of what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce thinks is the situation.

Mr. Stanfield: We "inappreciate" his remarks.

Mr. Crosbie: Our former leader, the respected hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) says we "inappreciate" the minister's remarks. I cannot imagine another member in this House who has more to "inappreciate" about the minister than the hon. member for Halifax.

What is the minister doing in the field of industry, trade and commerce? He is going around the country making little sermons to people in various industries and telling them that our poor economic situation is their fault and that it has nothing to do with the government. I am sure some hon. members are thinking I should not be too harsh with and critical of the minister because he is not here to defend himself. I cannot help it if he is not here. He can read Hansard, and I hope he will reply to the points I make.

The minister gave a speech to the travel industry on October 26. The fact that there is a huge deficit on our tourism and trade account which is going to be an estimated $2 billion this year—it was more in the first half of this year than it was in the whole of last year—is not the fault of the government, according to the minister. Whose fault is it? It is the fault of the tourist industry, those dirty slobs! This is what the minister said about that industry:

> In addition to high prices the Canadian tourist industry is also earning a reputation for being unfriendly, indifferent and sometimes prone to sharp practices in its contacts with travellers.

The minister said that if the tourist industry is going to be unfriendly, indifferent and prone to sharp practices, it will certainly suffer. I say that is an apt description of this government. This government is getting a reputation for being unfriendly, indifferent and sometimes prone to sharp practices in its contact with everyone. The minister went on to tell the tourist industry:

> "Canadian, as well as foreign, visitors complain of rudeness, slack service of poor quality, quarters that could benefit from a little paint, not to mention soap and water."
> After laying it on the line to the industry, Mr. Horner said—

I am quoting from the Globe and Mail.

> —he had no specific answers to the problems other than a general and co-operative upgrading of the industry in which governments could help significantly.

Not the federal government, mind you. The minister gave a whole list of things, including the minimum wage, as reasons for the fact that we are losing our share of the tourism market. He said that the cost of travelling in Canada is too high. It is not the government's fault that that cost is too high, according to the minister. He says that it costs too much to travel here compared with the United States. He says hotel prices are too high, food prices are too high, gasoline at the pump is more expensive and that these problems are all the fault of somebody else, not the government.

He says air fares are too high and rail travel is expensive, inconvenient and uncomfortable. But really what is wrong in this whole situation is the fault of those "dirty slobs" in the tourism and travel industry in Canada! The minister says they are to blame and that they had better pull up their socks or this fearless minister is going to see to it that they wash behind their ears. That is the hon. gentleman's solution to our huge imbalance and our huge deficit on the trade account. In 1976 the travel deficit was $1.191 billion. Canadians spent more travelling outside Canada than tourists and travellers spent here.

In the first half of 1977 the deficit was $1.245 billion, more than that for the whole 12 months previous, and the greatest in our history. The minister has another solution to the whole problem, and that is ABC charters. He must have the news from the CTC that it is not going to agree to this, so he is covering himself in advance. He says this is one of the great solutions: ABC charters available in Canada. It is not what the government does, it is what the government says is important to it, because after the minister went to the trouble of lambasting the travel and tourist industry of Canada, what happened? The Prime Minister set a tremendous example for all Canadians as to how we should spend our holidays and recreational periods. He went down to the sunny Bahamas for three days, snorkelling and skin-diving. That is a fine example to set for the rest of us.

The government is either serious that something has to be done about this fantastic deficit, or it is not. It is no good for the government to say we should not travel outside Canada, if the Prime Minister even on a casual weekend prefers to spend three days outside the country. How can we ask the people of Canada not to go south next year and to give it up for a couple of years to help us out, if the Prime Minister and the rest of the government pay no attention to the situation and do not set an example themselves? For the government it is a matter of "Do as we say, and not as we do".

What is the solution of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to our precarious trade situation and the fact that we are not competitive any longer in international trade? His solution is to devalue the Canadian dollar. He is positively ecstatic because the Canadian dollar is going down in value compared with the U.S. dollar. Every day it goes down a cent and the hon. gentleman becomes thrilled and elated. Am I making this up? No, I am not. In a speech in Winnipeg on November 9, the minister said:

The fall in the Canadian dollar has been useful, and I hope it stays around for a while.

He positively loves the decline of the dollar. It is down to 89 cents. He certainly does not want its value to go up. He becomes annoyed if the Canadian dollar shows any signs of becoming healthy or gaining any strength. He is going to fight a strong Canadian dollar to the death because he says that a devalued dollar is the answer to all our ills.

I am sure hon. members would expect the Prime Minister to correct the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and to indicate that that is not government policy, but yesterday I asked the Prime Minister, and he confirmed that it is. He was positively ecstatic. I had never seen the right hon. gentleman looked so pleased with himself as when he said that this floating Canadian dollar which has developed a leak and is sinking would help our export situation. A few weeks ago the Minister of Finance in answering questions in this House, said that the Canadian government would do nothing to prop up the Canadian dollar. But his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, said in Winnipeg that the expenditure of millions of dollars by the Bank of Canada to hold up the dollar in the international money market was calculated to keep it from dropping below 90 cents in relation to the U.S. dollar.

So the Minister of Finance says we are not propping up the dollar—just doing a little tidying up, smoothing out the ragged edges. We are supplying a market that goes along smoothly, but we are not propping it up. We are not propping up the dollar: apparently it props up itself. When the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce went to Winnipeg, he said we are propping up the dollar with the millions we are spending so that it does not go below 90 cents. Who is right, Mr. Speaker—the "propper-upper" or the "de-propper-downer"? We would like the minister to tell us who is right.

Let us consider another aspect of the minister's answer to our economic problems. He is quoted in the Winnipeg Free Press as saying that he is going to induce investment capital to stay in Canada "with the carrot rather than the stick." He must think the people with the investment dollars are like donkeys and will take whatever carrot the minister offers. But they have had four or five years to see what this government is doing. The smart money is now leaving Canada, not coming here. The idea is to get investment money out of Canadian-dominated investments and into United States-dominated investments. That is what the smart money people advise their clients. There will have to be a lot of carrots if that trend is to be reversed. I do not know what the minister's carrots are. As long as hon. gentlemen opposite stay in power, there is not a carrot in the universe that will attract investment money to this country. The financial community knows we are being mismanaged.

Is the lower value of the Canadian dollar the solution? You do not have to hold a Ph.D. in economics to know that if the Canadian dollar goes down in relation to the U.S. dollar, the Japanese yen, the German mark, and so on, it will help us sell our exports because they will be temporarily cheaper. They are 12 per cent cheaper now. We also know that Canada has tremendous imports. Many imported materials are used in manufacturing. A lot of our food is also imported. Because of the decline of value in the dollar, imports have gone up in price as much as our exports have gone down.

We know that workers will need more money to keep up with the increase in the cost of living. We also know that Dr. Hood, assistant deputy minister of finance, has said that for every cent the Canadian dollar declines in value compared to the U.S. dollar, the cost of living in Canada within a year will increase by one-tenth of 1 per cent, and within two years by three-tenths of 1 per cent. We know that the dollar has gone down 13 per cent in the last 12 months, from $1.03 to 90 cents. We know that within the next year, for that reason alone, the cost of living will increase by at least 4 per cent. We know it is going up now and has gone up by 1 per cent in just this last month to an annual rate of 8.8 per cent.

How long is this devalued dollar going to help us, Mr. Speaker? How long will it be before the idiotic practices and policies of this government, their inertia, their economic insanity, their political will to stay in power and survive—how long before all that forces the dollar down even lower than 90 cents? One thing this government will not do is take effective action to reverse our economic malaise. It will do nothing until the next election is over, and then if they stay in power they will be forced to take action just as the government of the United Kingdom was forced to take action. If this government stays in power, we will have foreign exchange control, travel control and all those controls that the Prime Minister likes so much. He is an anti-free enterpriser, a state socialist. All these controls will go into effect. That is my prophecy, Mr. Speaker.

It used to be said that Turkey was the sick man of Europe. Today, Canada is the sick man of the western hemisphere. How far have we descended in the last nine years under the leadership of the Prime Minister? I wish he would come into the House one day so that we could tell him what we think of some of his policies. If this government does not take some important steps to halt this economic malaise, get more productivity, persuade people to work harder and set an example for them, tell them that there have to be sacrifices that will affect our standard of living, in six or nine months' time it will not matter that the dollar has gone down to 90 cents or goes down to 85 cents, because our advantages will all be gone.

No fundamental reforms were introduced during the wage and price control program—so what was the point of it? We had two years of controls. We still have them, but what did the government do to change the basic economic structure of things that were interfering and causing unemployment and inflation? Nothing has been done to change it. There will be no improvement by the time controls are lifted in a few months. On November 9 the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce delivered a speech with all the zeal of the convert. He had the gall and the audacity to remark, as reported at page 756 of Hansard:

—the Conservative party has attempted to ride to power on the backs of the Mounties.

He said that the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) could straighten out the Conservative party when he got back to parliament. The right hon. gentleman came back yesterday and he straightened out the hon. gentleman opposite on what he thinks of this issue. The Conservative party does want to ride to power, but not on anyone's back—just on their own hard work and the things they have tried to do as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition since 1963. We do not want to creep on our bellies across the floor of this House to get into power, or to go on our hands and knees to the Prime Minister to get into power. When we get into power it will be when the electorate vote us in. We will not be going any other way. It takes gall for the hon. minister to say that the Conservatives are attempting to ride to power on the backs of the Mounties.

He should not speak too much of these matters. He has done very well for himself by leaving his background and tradition of the last 20 years and crossing the floor. We will ride to power if the electorate will support us; otherwise we will carry on as we have done for the last 20 years. Had the hon. member for Halifax taken power several years ago, we would not be in the sorry state we are in now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: One thing that is wrong, Mr. Speaker, is that I never have enough time to speak in this House. Maybe hon. members will agree unanimously that I may continue. The Tokyo round of trade negotiations is continuing. I am the critic of the official opposition for the industry, trade and commerce portfolio. Knowing that I will receive decent treatment from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I wrote to him on October 25 saying that the government of Newfoundland had submitted a brief to the Canadian trade and tariff commission dealing with questions that the province felt were important to raise at the negotiations in Geneva. I asked if I could have a copy of the brief, or if he would ask the Newfoundland government to let me have a copy, as I am interested in their position. I do not think it is marked "Top Secret"—surely the RCMP have not stamped this one "Confidential". It would not be breaching the "Featherbed" file to let me have a copy of the brief. I said I would appreciate it if he would send me a copy, and I went on to say:

> With respect to the whole issue of these negotiations, do you intend to brief the opposition critics with reference to these negotiations, the position to be taken by Canada, the state of the negotiations and our prospects? I understand that you are briefing the various provincial governments and interested industries and it therefore seems to me that the same kind of information should be made available to the opposition parties so we will know exactly what is happening in this area which is of such great importance for Canada and the various provinces.

I have not received an answer to the simple request that I be allowed to see a copy of the brief of the government of Newfoundland. Are we to be briefed on these negotiations which affect everyone in Canada? The minister is just as slack as the slackest of his slack colleagues—and he has only been over there since September. He was in opposition for 19 years prior to that, so you would think he would be right on his toes and would reply within a day, giving full co-operation. Somebody should ride on his back, Mr. Speaker. Let me quote from the Globe and Mail of November 5 under the heading "GATT Talks off to Slow Start with Late Lists":

[Mr. Crosbie.]

• (1632)

> —most countries, including Canada, missing the designated day for tabling lists of barriers to agricultural trade—

The United States tabled their list. This is dated November 5. The United States tabled their list on time, identifying the cuts that they want made. Let me quote:

> The Canadian list is wending its way through the federal government—

God help it if it is wending its way through that wearisome, weird mass—because it will never come out. The report says it—> —could be tabled as soon as next week.

That is very optimistic. It goes on to state:

> Canada's agricultural exports totalled $3.96 billion in 1976.

Why is our list not being tabled at Geneva? What is the minister up to? Incidentally, when is he going to carry out his promises to Alberta? When is he going to get entry for Alberta petrochemical products into the United States, as well as their agricultural products? That is what Premier Lougheed wants. Perhaps, then, Premier Lougheed will loosen up on the gas—not the type we get from hon. gentleman opposite, but the real gas that you can light a match to: that useful gas. Perhaps he will loosen up on the gas and we will be able to export more gas to the U.S. When is something going to be done there?

Here is the minister from Alberta whose brother is the deputy premier of that province. I do not know whether they still speak. I suppose they still speak to one another. He has been in office now, as the minister, for the last three months. Why did that gentleman, who was in the cabinet at the time—the hon. member for Crowfoot—allow this agreement to be signed with the United States in respect of a pipeline, that great pipeline from Alaska down through Canada to the U.S., without Canada receiving some trade concessions at the time? Where was this great, big, tall Texan-type Albertan when that signing was taking place? Why was he not sticking up for Premier Lougheed and his government of Alberta to get these concessions when that agreement was signed?

I hope I am not being offensive to the hon. gentleman. If I said of someone in this House, "I shall see Otto Lang tarred and feathered and driven out of Saskatchewan. I will pay for the oil and I will pluck the chickens," as the minister said as reported in Hansard in 1974, I am sure I would be asked to retract it. I wonder if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to retract that since he got into the cabinet. He was going to see the Minister of Transport tarred, feathered and driven out of Saskatchewan. He was the man who accused the Prime Minister of being "diabolical"—and I take "diabolical" to be something not favourable to the person to whom you apply it. And if I were to say that as well as "putting the "torch of tyranny" to Canada, I would hardly expect to find myself in the same cabinet with that gentleman. That was said only on January 7, 1976, by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

I will not go into the rest of the things he said about the Prime Minister then, such as there being similarities between Prime Minister Trudeau and the Nazi dictator, Adolph Hitler, or the fact that he said the Prime Minister was "a dictator who is attempting to undermine our system of government", that "Mr. Trudeau must not to be allowed to win his class war. Stopping him is the duty of every Conservative in Canada. It is the task of every Canadian who cares about the freedom and prosperity of this great land." I ask, what is that duty? Was it to get into the cabinet? No, not at that time: it was to get the government out. I hope we will not hear any more from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and when he comes and speaks in this House I hope he will keep himself to the business before the House and not cast any aspersions and insults about the colleagues he left behind when he crossed the House to go into the Prime Minister's cabinet.

There is so much to get one's teeth into, Mr. Speaker, that you just do not have the time. We have an hour and a half to speak in the Newfoundland Assembly, but here we have 40 minutes. Let me refer to the home insultation program which is directly relevant to this bill, because this bill makes these mingy, stingy, wingy, paltry, putrid grants taxable. What was said by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) when he announced this great new program, this great new bonanza, last June? The minister stated at a press conference on Monday of the week of June 29 that eight provinces concerned with the new home insultation program had been consulted about the program. That comes directly from the minister's press release, right from the minister's own lips. He said that the energy ministers had shown a great deal of enthusiasm for it. That is what the minister said the ministers of the eight provinces concerned had said.

The provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are Liberal provinces and have their own schemes which are much more generous. We understand that—it is political. They are the only two Liberal provinces in Canada. They have their own special schemes. Their grants are not taxable. They get greater grants and greater assistance. That is fine, and we understand they are being rewarded for voting Liberal provincially. But the other eight provinces are not Liberal, so they got a lesser program. However, the minister told the world that the energy ministers had shown a great deal of enthusiasm for it. I am not going to accuse the minister of lying—certainly not—or of exaggerating, never, or of being too enthusiastic. I would not say anything like that. Then I looked at the papers and I saw that Premier Ed Schreyer described this new program as "restrictive and unequal". Have you ever heard such enthusiasm as "restrictive and unequal"? The press article goes on to state that Manitoba would enjoy "only a fraction of the benefits enjoyed by the two maritime provinces". He said that insulation requirements were greater on the prairies. That was his reaction. That was, certainly, frantic enthusiasm.

Then I looked further and saw that the deputy minister of energy for Ontario said they were not even consulted except for a telephone call. That minister certainly was not very enthusiastic. In fact, he was decidedly not enthusiastic. The deputy premier of Alberta said that Alberta was not going to accept such a program when the federal government interfered with provincial jurisdiction and inserted conditions that were not acceptable to them. That was deputy premier Hugh Horner. That was enthusiasm. That was certainly accurate when the minister said that Alberta was enthusiastic. Of course, he was undaunted—but a few days later he put out a press release, on August 17. All these comments were made in between, and I will come to them. I have some ripe ones yet. On August 17 the minister put out another release in which he said:

> Six of the eight provinces eligible for the Canadian home insulation program, and the territories, have responded favourably to the conditions outlined by energy minister Alastair Gillespie.

Now the enthusiasm of all eight—that great deal of enthusiasm—has now become muted and now it is only six, and they are responding favourably. He certainly could not say Alberta and Quebec responded favourably, because they would not go into the program at all. What do they think of it in Newfoundland? What was the great enthusiasm displayed by the minister there? He stated it is a slapdash effort designed to win the support of the provinces for the July 1 increase in the price of domestic oil. He was unable to give details of the scheme because this knowledge was limited to a telephone call from the minister, Mr. Gillespie. That is what he said. He protested the ad hoc approach. That is what he said and that was his enthusiastic approach.

What did the Premier of Newfoundland say? How did he display his fantastic, unconquerable enthusiasm for this great offer of the federal government? Premier Frank Moores said, in a release on July 5:

> I am extremely upset over the discrimination against the citizens of this province exhibited by the federal government in offering us an ill-conceived version of the conservation program which was given to the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

How in the devil do you describe this as being enthusiasm? This is how accurate the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is in reporting to this House and putting out releases. The premier was "extremely upset" over a proposed federal program which was conceived in haste without any meaningful consultation with the provinces. He said:

> The reason for this unseemly haste in announcing the program was to regain political points which may have been lost through the recent petroleum price increase.
> I also strongly resent the use of federal financial power to interfere in the internal policies of the provinces.

That is absolute enthusiasm and acceptance of the program. Newfoundland is accepting the program, it not being in the financial position to follow Alberta and say "No, we will not have anything to do with your ridiculous, foolish program". They have gone into the program, and it is recommended by the premier that the program be withdrawn and that there be a federal-provincial conference to draw up a proper program.

In fact, I understand that the eight provinces described by their minister in June as showing a great deal of enthusiasm for it are coming to meet with the minister—if he has agreed to meet with them—to put before him another scheme they have described to replace this ill-conceived scheme that discriminates against the citizens of eight of the provinces of this country. The minister should come into this House and confess his errors and sins: he should not be pretending the enthusiastic acceptance by eight ministers when none of them accepted it with any enthusiasm that we know of, and when everyone who spoke publicly—every premier I have quoted—was definitely against this unwarranted intrusion, this political interference in the rights of the provinces, and in an ineffective manner, ineffective because now it has been admitted that there have been only 2,800 applications received, or a figure which is only a figure 800 greater than the anticipated daily inflow is supposed to be.

The government is now going to change the grant system to apply to pre-1931 houses in places like Ontario, and so on, instead of pre-1921. I have not time to go into all the inadequacies of this program—but it was a cod, and the people of Canada saw it was a cod and they are not responding to it. When they get their mingy grant after fixing their home—which I think is a maximum of $350—they are taxed on it: it is added to their income. If they do not live in Nova Scotia or P.E.I., it is added to their income. But if they live in those two provinces it is not added to their income. Ye Gods, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people will certainly be flipping their lids and losing their senses if they re-elect a government that will try to put an atrocity like that across on the public.

They talk about the unity crisis in the province of Quebec. That is only half the problem. The whole unity crisis is caused by the heavy-handed, ham-fisted approach of this government—autocratic, arrogant, overbearing, covering up. I will not bother with the rest of the adjectives, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) will come here tomorrow and complain.

An hon. Member: "Featherbedding."

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, featherbedding as well. Mr. Speaker, that covers the insulation grants and the inaccurate forecast of revenue. We used to think that the Department of Finance was first-class and had first-class people. I suppose, I hope they still do. Here is a little province like Newfoundland caught $20 million short this year from the estimates in its budget because it was given a wrong estimate by the government of Canada, the Department of Finance, on what it was going to get in corporation tax and personal income tax this year. They give projections each year to the province, and we all know the tremendous amount which goes to Ontario.

Now, our minister of finance, who has a hard job to rub two nickels together, has to find $20 million more—and he is going to have a current account deficit in Newfoundland. There is something very, very wrong. There is something wrong in the Department of Finance's forecasting. I do not think I have time to get into the income tax system, but I will return to that in committee.

I now return to the case of John C. Doyle. I will take it clause by clause in committee because that case needs rectification. I do not have time today to get into it. The Supreme Court of Canada has had two appeals which have been pending for seven years. The Department of National Revenue and the Department of Justice did not do anything about pursuing them because of Mr. Doyle's connections, apparent connections with the government or the party that forms the government. One of these was brought out three weeks ago as a result of my bringing it up, and the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed it. They did not even withhold judgment. That will show you something about gross negligence. There is a man, a fugitive from justice, who owes the government of Canada $3.5 million for income tax for 1950 and 1954. He has fooled around and has been allowed to get away with owing that money. He has not paid, and he has not put up adequate security. He has been allowed to do that from 1950 to 1954—27 years in one case and 23 years in another. He lost his income tax appeal board case and his exchequer appeal court case in 1970. The government did not do anything for seven years until I raised it in this House. One of these cases has now been heard and the judges have dismissed it. That will show you how serious the appeal was.

There is one still to come for a larger amount of money—$3.5 million. The person involved is now in Panama, a Panamanian citizen. The government has not adequate security. However, I will go into this matter when I have more time. I object immensely to favouritism for somebody who is a friend of the government. When the ordinary taxpayer is reassessed, he has to put up the money at that point or the department will haul it right out of his pocket. Or the department will slap you right into jail. If you are an ordinary taxpayer, you have to put up security, bank guarantees and bonds. But Mr. John C. Doyle—and the right hon. member for Prince Albert explained this in his book—I do not have it here today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to inform the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the previous speaker. I would like to make one or two comments. First of all, the hon. member attributed the wealth, the well doing of the province of Alberta, to a great Conservative government. If he uses the comparison that the Conservatives are responsible for the prosperity of Alberta, I wonder what he says about the depression in the province of Newfoundland, also led by a provincial Conservative government. Does he attribute that, sir, to the provincial Conservative government? No. He says, of course, that is the federal government. But where there is prosperity in Canada, that is a result of a provincial government, especially if it is a Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members and those who see these proceedings will realize the foolishness of a statement of that kind. Surely the government of Canada is composed of provincial, municipal and federal governments, and it is very simplistic to say, "Well, my goodness, isn't that nice? We have that great government there, and look how well they have done". Of course, it is a collective thing in Canada that all governments are a part of the whole.

I think it is all very well, Mr. Speaker, to take one section—to take Bill C-11 and put it in the context that it is the only thing the government of Canada is involved in. Those are only programs with which we are concerned. Therefore, to take this bill solely in the context that there is no other spectrum in the economic life of this government, I would like to point out that in British Columbia in 1977, an agreement was signed between the province and the federal government, in the amount of $181 million, for industrial development in the province. I would also like to point out that in 1977, in the province of British Columbia, another agreement came into force. I refer to the salmon enhancement program, worth approximately $153 million to British Columbia. I refer also to the coal development agreement under which the federal government is funding, in part, studies to explore the possibilities of using northeast coal and open up the northeast portion of British Columbia. In addition, the agreement regarding the ferries in British Columbia can be used as part of that spectrum of economic life in Canada, in British Columbia, which is not specifically dealt with in this bill. It occurs on a day by day, month by month basis, as the hon. member is well aware.

I did not hear, Mr. Speaker, any contrary remarks about the measures included in Bill C-11 referring to reducing taxes by individuals in the sum of $500 million in 1977. As I understand that, in 1978 this amount will increase to $1,200 million. This is a reduction in taxes for the people of Canada which can be said to be very small. But are we disagreeing with the principle that in order to make the economy more buoyant, tax reductions should be made at this time and perhaps should flow to the purchase of consumer and other goods which will, hopefully, stimulate our economy?

I was very pleased, Mr. Speaker, in Bill C-11 to note that for a number of years representation had been made to increase the maximum deductions in employment expenses. Finally, this year it has been raised from $150 to $250. Mr. Speaker, I have had several hundred letters from members of the IWA in the province of British Columbia who have complained over a number of years that this should have been increased because the purchase of logging boots, the purchase of clothing—which is expensive and has gone up over the years—has now been recognized and there should be greater allowances for those people.

People who work in the bush, in the mines and in various other manual occupations will be able to take advantage of a tax cut. They will be able to put this on their income tax. I applaud the fact that this has been increased. No one has said, at least this afternoon, that the tax credit has been increased to $300 from $200 and $50 for each dependant child which will be of benefit to lower income taxpayers. If the hon. member who spoke before me was opposed to this, let him say so and perhaps we can have a debate on it.

Unfortunately, what happens in many cases is that instead of debating the actual bill, we end up in a dialogue on the ills of the country. In many cases there is more gloom and doom than actual fact about the economy of Canada. All hon. members are aware of the impact of this House and what is reported to the people across Canada through the various media. If the opposition parties day in and day out continually emphasize the failures or shortcomings, whether of a long-term or temporary nature, in our economy, they do a disservice to the Canadian people.

Obviously, there are things that must be corrected. I agree that there are problems in our economy. However, I ask hon. members whether we are the only country that has these problems. This is not something unique to Canada. If hon. members are honest, I suspect they will say there are dislocations throughout the world economy, on some of which we can have an impact, some we can try to correct, but many are outside our boundaries and we cannot correct. We cannot change the policies of other countries. There are many examples of this: the OPEC countries have quadrupled the world price of oil. When the price of coffee doubles or triples, at the source—whether it be Brazil or some other country—the government of Canada has a very small role to play. The consumer may have some part to play by refusing to buy such items as coffee and other goods where there is a discretionary power of purchase. Our message to the people of Canada should be that instead of complaining about the cost of goods coming into this country, they should do something about it. If people boycott or reduce their purchases of goods because of high prices, those prices will become lower.

It is our job, as parliamentarians, to show alternatives to people rather than to decry the fact that something has happened over which we have no control. I feel very stongly that we do have a discretionary buying power. I hope that out of these debates there will be one thing to which I can contribute when we have a dollar that is approximately 13 cents below the American dollar. The government and parliament should come out with the message, strong and clear, that if Canadians do not like the prices they are paying for their imports, they should buy Canadian goods. If we bought more Canadian goods, we would not have the unemployment we have today. If we are sincere, members on both sides of the House should be encouraging people to buy Canadian goods instead of trying to find the lowest possible price in the markets which put our people out of work. This is a goal for which we should strive.

Instead of crying crocodile tears about our dollar being 13 cents below the American dollar, we should get our own house in order. This would give us a means of being more competitive. We are not only non-competitive in world markets, but in many cases we are not competitive within the Canadian economy. If a Canadian article costs a few cents more, we should stress that if people "Buy Canadian" they will create more jobs in Canada.

Members on both sides should stress that point. I hope the government of Canada will come up with a program, whether it be through advertising or some other form, to bring this message to the Canadian people. In order for our economy to grow, Canadians must purchase Canadian goods. If it does cost a few more cents, it is better to have more jobs within our nation.

Mr. Jones: That includes the government.

Mr. Anderson: I trust all my remarks refer not only to consumers, but governments—whether they be municipal, provincial or federal. I thank the hon. member for bringing that matter to my attention. Where we have hydro development in provinces such as British Columbia, the maritimes, Labrador and Quebec, we should "Buy Canadian". Why not build the turbines and generators in Canada? If it costs a few more dollars, the retention of Canadian jobs will more than offset that extra cost. It should not only be the responsibility of consumers, but municipal, provincial and federal governments. If they sincerely believe that unemployment should be lower, perhaps they should put their money where their mouth is and "Buy Canadian".

If for no other reason, I am very pleased to participate in this debate in order to bring that point across. It is very important that it be brought to the attention of the nation. I referred earlier to the 90-cent dollar. An unpegged dollar reflects a decreasing demand for the Canadian dollar. The dollar is like any other commodity, such as a loaf of bread, a tire or a battery—it is bought and sold: it has a certain demand and a certain demand price. We have not been in a strong economic position in exports over the past few years, especially in manufactured goods. This is reflected in less demand for our dollar to buy goods which are manufactured or produced in Canada. Surely this should be an indication that we have a problem.

Instead of saying "Isn't it terrible that we may have to spend more to go to Hawaii, Cape Cod," or wherever, we should heed the warning that we are consuming more from abroad than we are producing. I hope hon. members opposite recognize this fact. It is also an opportunity for Canadian manufacturers, producers of raw materials, farmers, and others. Goods that we purchase from abroad cost us more. Maybe that is not a bad idea. We may not want to purchase as much from abroad. In the province of British Columbia—and I hope I have agreement from my colleague from British Columbia—we are given an opportunity in the mining industry and in the forest products industry to be more competitive in world markets. In the past we have lost some of our competitiveness. This gives us a chance to be more competitive.

I now want to refer to the copper industry in British Columbia. The largest open-pit copper mine is in my constituency on northern Vancouver Island. I wish to quote from a paper given to me by a mining engineer, John Giovanetto, of Trail, B.C. He made the following point:

> It has been stated that Canada is one of the few countries which has an abundance of mineral deposits available for exploitation. This is incorrect. On the basis of equal surface area, Canada is no better endowed with mineral deposits than any other area in the world. In mineral wealth Southern Africa, Western South America, Australia, Melanesia in the Pacific, all have concentrations of minerals equal to or greater than Canada's . . .
> A flourishing copper mining industry was established in this province on a copper content which is so low that in other parts of the world it was not considered economically viable. The copper grades in the southwestern U.S. mines average about 0.8 per cent copper. In South America, the copper ranges from 1 per cent to 1½ per cent; Africa has copper grades of between 2½ and 4 per cent. The mines in Melanesia are in the range of 1 per cent to 1½ per cent plus gold. In contrast to these, the copper mines in British Columbia run between 0.45 per cent and 0.55 per cent copper. These are very lean deposits which require very close operating controls, and which can quickly become uneconomic with even modest increases in taxation.

However, under the right incentives the mining industry created a viable copper industry in British Columbia. Referring to the 90-cent Canadian dollar, it is my understanding that if the apparent price of copper had been unchanged during 1977, many of those mines in British Columbia would have had to lay-off men or close down operations entirely.

● (1702)

The 90-cent dollar has allowed these mines to remain open. I would find it very hard to accept massive unemployment in copper mining in British Columbia. As some hon. members may be aware, some of this copper is of very low grade, and at the best of times the operation is very marginal. Nevertheless, by reason of the technology which has been developed, particularly in British Columbia, we have managed to make the industry competitive in the copper markets of the world. But given the very low prices which have been in existence for the last year or so, it would only have been a question of time had the Canadian dollar continued to be quoted at $1.03 U.S. before mining operations were severely curtailed or shut down altogether. Thus, while the hon. member who spoke before me appeared to find something ridiculous about the present standing of the Canadian dollar, I have placed before the House one concrete example—and there are many others—to show that there is a positive side to this development.

If we are wise, we will use discretion when purchasing goods from abroad and take advantage of this opportunity which is now given to us to be more competitive in world markets.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is your answer an 80-cent dollar?

Mr. Anderson: Returning to Bill C-11, might I point out that there is one provision in it which to my mind has not been brought to the attention of the Canadian people to the extent it should have been. By virtue of the indexing feature, a married taxpayer earning less that $8,435, with two dependent children, will not be called upon to pay income tax in 1978. It means that no tax will be payable in these circumstances by persons making approximately $700 a month. This is not to say a man earning $8,400 a year will not have problems, especially if he is still buying a house. But surely indexing is a step in the right direction.

The hon. member spoke about deficits. We are all aware that if the government collects less in taxes from the people, deficits are likely to result. We are all aware that when people are laid off work they are usually in no position to pay taxes and that government revenue suffers accordingly. But in times of economic dislocation it behooves the government to stimulate the economy to some extent, always bearing in mind that those who call for massive tax cuts are inviting massive deficits. Regard must be paid to what we can afford. Surely, no members would wish to go through another period of high inflation such as led to the establishment of the Anti-Inflation Board in the first place. I know that Bill C-11 provides for certain benefits to corporations and shareholders and that an effort is made to introduce investment incentives. It is not my intention, though, to attempt to deal with all the various parts of the measure at this time; other hon. members have already referred to them.

We in Canada have a great deal to be proud of and a great deal to be thankful for. I suppose it depends on whether you are an optimist or a pessimist. A pessimist, I suppose, would say we have 7 per cent or 8 per cent unemployment; an optimist would say we have 92 per cent employment. Coming from British Columbia, and being a Liberal, it is easy for me to be an optimist because I believe we have a great future before our province. Indeed, I believe Canada generally has a great future. Canada has one of the highest promises of any nation in the world.

An hon. Member: Who made it?

Mr. Anderson: This does not mean we will not be affected by dislocations which take place in the world economy. We are not an island with a wall around us. If the price of steel goes up on world markets, we will have to pay higher prices in Canada. If the price of oil continues to rise, it would be unrealistic to imagine that Canada would not be affected.

I do say, though, that we have a discretionary power. Even in the field of energy we have a discretionary power. Remember that a large proportion of the oil we produce or purchase is used for private travel, to drive people back and forth to work, and so on. We have all seen rows of cars, each of them carrying only a single occupant to work. We all knew that the supply of fossil fuels would run out at some point. Alternative sources of energy must be found. It is unrealistic to expect that the low fuel prices which have existed for so many years will continue. But there does remain an area for discretion, and I wonder if that discretion will be exercised if the price of a barrel of oil is $3 or thereabouts, as was once the case.

What reason would we give the Canadian people for asking them to conserve energy? What reason would we give them for saying that car pooling is a better idea than using larger numbers of cars to drive separate individuals to work? Should we not be encouraging the development of mass transportation systems? Should we not be encouraging the development of automobiles which will secure better mileage? To my mind, the encouragement of conservation is one of the most important parts of government policy. It is surely an important role of government to encourage the conservation of resources.

I hope that with the introduction of new technology we can cut down our dependence on oil. I thank the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Marchand) for his statement that funding will be available for research into the development of methanol which can be combined with gasoline to reduce the amount of gasoline used in Canada. If I can paraphrase him, his department has given the green light to this development. This is a step in the right direction, I hope we will go on giving this green light to ensure the possibility of 40,000 new jobs in Canada just by the introduction of methanol. I believe the minister said we could save $800 million on this single item—the combining of methanol with gasoline.

This is the sort of thing which gives an optimist grounds for hope. People are looking toward the future and saying, "Isn't everything terrible?" Sure, we have problems. But our people have proved time and time again that they are equal to meeting changes. One of the problems we have now, and I include Quebec, is that for many years we have had very few problems to look at and people have lost their challenge or feeling of adventure in this country because things have been very good and there has not been anything to challenge them. I am not suggesting that there are not people below the poverty line in Canada, but generally speaking we have had years of growth and years of good times—and when these good times are taken away or are a little less good, instead of moaning and groaning, surely we should meet that challenge. I have always been of the opinion that we should test the mettle of a person or of a country with challenges. We can either rise to meet them or you sink in hopelessness and despair and say "My goodness, poor me".

I do not think Canadians are like that. We do have challenges which we will have to solve, and I am confident in the ability of Canadians to solve them. Perhaps it is time we had some good ones to solve. Indeed, the situation in Quebec may lead to a greater feeling on the part of Canadians for their country; they may have a greater appreciation of what it is to be a Canadian. I think that many times in the past we have not had the sense of pride that we are Canadians, and I think the present situation may lead us to greater heights. Indeed, I hope so, and I think that economically we shall also rise to the occasion.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some care and attention to the hon. member who has just spoken, my good friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). He was critical of the opposition, berating us for what he termed "doom and gloom talk". On a number of occasions in this House, commencing last March when the previous minister of finance presented his budget, one of the results of which is this bill, Bill C-11, and since as I listened to other members of the government and to the financial critics of the official opposition, it kept going through my mind that I had heard all this before. When I considered that there were upward of one million people in Canada out of work and looking for work, and when I considered the general state of our economy, I said to myself, "My God, it's Herbert Hoover, R. B. Bennett, Mackenzie King and 1930 all over again".

I believe it was Herbert Hoover in 1930 and 1931 who told the critics after the stock market crash that they were crying doom and gloom, that prosperity was just around the corner, that they had to show restraint, tighten their belts and take less. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been telling us that they are not only taking less, but they have got less. It seems to me that the economic managers of this country, in the private sector but particularly in the federal government, have learned nothing during the last 45 years. They still mouth the same kind of talk and propose the same kind of measures which got us into much of the difficulties in other years of depression and recession, measures which have not succeeded in the past.

The way to make Canada work is to put Canadians to work. Surely the measures contained in Bill C-11 in large part will not only not do that, but in many instances will be counterproductive. They will not lead to any significant or necessary reduction in unemployment. They will not lead to any significant increase in the well-being of Canadians generally, particularly Canadians of low and middle income.

Since last March the government has proposed tax benefits of various kinds in excess of $1,200 million to provide incentives to the corporate sector to increase their capacity, to retool, to increase their production and to create jobs and put people to work. Well, Mr. Speaker, although manufacturing concerns have known about this tax incentive for many months now, statistics tell us that in the first nine months of this year, as compared to last year, there has actually been a decrease in the number of jobs in the manufacturing sector, from an average of 1,945,000 last year to 1,915,000 as at the middle of October. There has been an actual loss of 30,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector alone, and this in spite of the knowledge of the manufacturing sector that $1,245 million in the form of tax credits designed to put Canadians to work was available.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): And $2 billion was given in the previous budget.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, as my colleague reminds me, prior to that, $2 billion was given in the budget of the previous minister of finance. But what has happened, Mr. Speaker? There is even more unemployment. This measure did not work and it is not working now. Such a method has been tried before in other decades when we had depressions and recessions. It was the wealthy who received the breaks; it was the poor and unemployed who paid.

We have been proposing for many months now, and we will continue to do so, that it makes more sense to make sure that there are more dollars in the pockets of the majority of Canadians at the low and middle income level. They are the ones with needs. They will spend those dollars in consuming production, much of it Canadian production. Surely that not only makes more sense but is more civilized and more fair. Providing extra savings and benefits for the wealthy, for corporations who do not need them, means that they will put them away into reserves or into savings. The impact on increased consumption will be minimal.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

We believe there are many things which this parliament could be doing to deal with the economic situation, which members on all sides agree is bad. I should like to refer to some of the things which we could and should be doing, rather than what we are doing in this bill. It seems to me that in the budget and the budget bills, the government—and, I am sad to say, some spokesmen of the official opposition today—keep remembering dollars and forgetting people. They place dollars and the welfare of the privileged ahead of the people.

Let me illustrate, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that most, if not all, of us attended Remembrance Day services just a few days ago. A few days prior to that we had the government's announcement that it was not about to meet the goal of increasing disability pensions for war veterans, which I am told would cost in the neighbourhood of $30 million. The unanimous recommendation of a parliamentary committee and of another group looking into the whole area of war veterans' pensions and disability pensions and allowances set, as a goal, certain pensions for five categories of employees in the public service. With the government's refusal to put that into place, a 100 per cent disabled veteran has now fallen $536 a year behind. The government says that in view of the economic situation and this time of restraint it could not see fit to give $30 million to our disabled veterans, yet it can give $1,200 million to corporations. Yet they want us to vote for this bill! If one of the cabinet ministers will move an amendment to the bill which would restore $30 million of taxation on corporations and high incomes, and allow the Minister of Veterans Affairs to announce at the same time an increase in veterans' disability pensions, I would be more inclined to support this legislation, and I would be more inclined to say there is some humanity and decency here. The government is giving no increases in basic pensions for veterans to whom this nation owes a great debt and can never fully repay it. The government has forgotten these people!

I listened to the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) complaining about a wealthy gentleman who is allegedly escaping millions of dollars in taxes, after being in Newfoundland for many years working for, with or under a Liberal government at a time when the hon. member for St. John's West was in the Liberal government. In any event, he complained about this gentleman being able to evade $3 million or more in taxes. A veteran in Regina gave me permission to quote his letter. His wife wrote to me first in regard to the matter of pensions. I am referring to a Mr. and Mrs. Howard Brown, 8 Osler Avenue, Regina. The letter reads as follows:

Thought I'd write to you. I am the wife of a disabled war veteran. It was most disappointing to read and hear on radio and TV that the feveral government did not have the extra money for the disabled veterans. My husband has been disabled for 34 years now, and after all that time I guess one does get sick at heart, when four days before they could raise the MPs salary. Please thank Mr. Stanley Knowles for his hard work for the veterans. Hope you're able to do something for us. Would appreciate hearing from you.

I have received another communication from Mr. Howard S. Brown, addressed to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr.

Guay). Mr. Brown is a self-employed man in construction work. He filed his income tax return in March or April of this year and owed slightly over $1,300 income tax for 1976. He suffered a massive heart attack in May or June. At the moment his total income is $492.34 a month, being $347.88 in disability pension as a veteran and $144.46 from the war veterans' allowance. That is their total income. They have been faithfully paying all they can afford, namely, $40 a month, on their income taxes for 1976. I was advised just a day or so ago that the Department of National Revenue has placed a lien on their home for $1,365 in taxes owing. There is no money for disabled veterans. There is no increase for them. But there is $1,200 million for corporations—and a lien can be put on a veteran's home.

Mr. Brown's disability pension and war veteran's allowance gives him an income of less than $500 a month. He is not old enough for the old age pension, and he will never work again. The government will not increase his pension, and it has put a lien on his home. This government has the nerve to expect me, or anyone who has any conscience or consideration for people, to vote for a bill which gives an allowance of $1,200 million for corporations.

Unemployment is costing Canada. The figures vary, but they are anywhere from $7 billion to $10 billion a year at the present rate of unemployment. We have $4 billion or more in pay-outs from the UIC fund, and $1 billion or more pay-outs from additional welfare benefits because of unemployment. Is that $1 billion, $2 billion or $3 billion in lost tax revenues for all levels of government? Surely this parliament should be acting on measures to spend as much, nearly as much, or half as much as what unemployment is costing. It is not only for the sake of our people and our nationhood, but if one wants to be a crass dollar considerer, also it can be for the sake of restoring revenues to levels of government as well as putting people to work.

Even though measures have been proposed by the New Democratic Party, I think they are insufficient. They call for the expenditure of $2,450 million to create something in the order of 300,000 to 350,000 jobs quickly; and another $400 million in a federal-provincial-municipal capital works program which the statistics indicate would mean 60,000 jobs. The need is present in the municipalities. Not only do the municipalities have needs, but our towns and cities have needs as well. These needs have to be met in a host of areas. In fact, the $400 million proposed by my party for the new federal-provincial-municipal capital works program, if it is direct funds from the federal government, should be augmented with a $2 billion or $3 billion low-interest loan fund which municipalities can draw on. I am referring to interest at one-half the bank rate or below the bank rate. Any deficits on those interest charges should be picked up by the nation as a whole.

It is called sharing, co-operation and working together. Municipalities know what needs to be done. They know how to put people to work. They can build police stations, fire-halls and parks. They can widen their streets and they can renew their sewer and water systems. They can do a host of things which need to be done. They can improve their traffic systems. Most of these things are high labour-intensive and are legitimate needs of our communities in this country. That would not be lost money. Not only would it increase the well-being of the people in our towns and cities, but it would increase the assets of the nation as a whole. It would be money well spent.

My party suggests income tax cuts double what the government proposes. They would be in the order of $1.5 billion for people on low and middle incomes. They could take the form of tax credits. People with incomes of $20,000 and over would get nothing, and it could be graduated upward to the ones on the lowest end of the scale with tax credits of $400. If they do not have enough income to pay $400 income tax, instead of a tax credit they would get the difference in a tax rebate or a cheque. We would be putting $1.5 billion into the pocket of the lower income section of our population. That is the section of the population which will spend it.

We propose that $500 million should immediately go into housing and urban transit. This government promised in writing $290 million for urban transit in the 1974 election campaign. It has now announced $230 million by shifting $200 million from other areas. Urban transit in Canada needs something in the order of between $2 billion and $3 billion. Even the $500 million we propose is just a start.

Small business employment assistance of $50 million is proposed. If one would look with objectivity and fairness at the program of grants to small business for actual permanent jobs created in Manitoba a short while ago, he would see that that resulted in another 1,300 jobs in very short order. That can mean 20,000 jobs for the nation as a whole. We estimate that the income tax initiative we propose for low and middle income people would mean anywhere from 100,000 to 200,000 more jobs because of increased consomption requiring increased production, and another 70,000 as a result of what we propose for housing and urban transit. That is for the short run. We could think up more proposals, and for the long run there is much to be done.

Let us look at the immediate and long-term things which need to be done. Some of them involve very little money, and some none at all. Some of them involve a lot of money. If there ever was a time, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni says, for challenging Canadians, now is the time. We did that in wartime. Instead of the hon. member's emulating Herbert Hoover, decrying gloom and doom and letting us think that prosperity somehow is just around the corner, let us place the challenge before Canadians, like we did in wartime. Let us say that over the next eight to ten years we are going to spend between $8 billion and $10 billion to rebuild and modernize our harbours and our railroads. Let us put some sanity into the use of the different modes of transportation. Let us do something about freight rates and passenger fares so that we can stop discriminating against people and goods because of where they happen to be made and live.

Let us treat one another equally when it comes to the accessibility to, the use of and the cost of transportation. Of course it would cost money, but that would help Canadian unity. Let us treat people equally, no matter where they live. That would increase the assets and the well-being of the nation as a whole. Let us stop worrying about competition, about whether the CPR made a profit last year and about whether the CNR should be instructed to make a profit and sell off profit centres to private enterprise. Let us stop thinking of dollars instead of people and our nation.

What has happened to grain prices? The drop in net farm income in this nation and in the three prairie provinces has been one of the biggest drops in the last 20 or 30 years. Let us stop attacking the statutory Crowsnest pass grain rates, as they are commonly called. There is justification for that because those rates are beneficial to Canada as a whole. They are in place for the benefit of Canada as a whole, and they are not some subsidy or gift to prairie producers.

Those who attack the statutory grain rates are not interested in the welfare of this nation. They are not interested in protecting our grain producers or enabling them to compete with other nations in the world which export grain. Those who attack the statutory grain rates conveniently forget that our competitors produce their grain much closer to export centres than do our producers in Canada. Most of the grain production in Australia and Argentina is within a very short distance of ports. Even the grain that is produced far inland in the United States and the Soviet Union has access to cheap river water transportation. Canadian grain has to travel thousands of miles to get to export centres in competing with grain produced in other nations. That is the reason and the total justification for the statutory grain rates. For the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) or anyone else to attack those rates or to suggest that somehow farmers should get the benefit of the rates in some other way is irresponsible. If the Minister of Transport thinks he is going to emulate Jimmy Gardiner and the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and run around handing every grain farmer a government cheque for wheat or refunds on freight charges for grain movements, he has another think coming. Neither the minister's party nor any other party would get away with that.

To attack those statutory rates would be a betrayal not only of western Canada but of something which is of massive benefit to Canada as a whole. What those grain exports mean to our country in terms of balance of payments alone more than offsets any costs there may be because of the statutory grain rates. I submit that any legitimate deficits transportation companies have on moving grain out of the prairies to export centres should be made up out of the treasury of the nation as a whole and paid directly to the transportation companies—two cheques a year. That is a sensible, fair and proper way to maintain the statutory grain rates for grain producers in western Canada while at the same time paying a reasonable price to transportation companies for moving it.

Orderly marketing is essential to the well-being of producers of many kinds of agricultural products in all parts of Canada.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

The attacks on orderly marketing in western Canada continue, aided and abetted—I am sad to say—by some politicians. The minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board enlarged what was started by a former Conservative minister of agriculture by putting feed grains on the open market, with the support of the official opposition, in spite of the fact that the three prairie wheat pools and the United Grain Growers, which represent something in the order of 80 per cent or 90 per cent of grain producers, objected. The most recent example, I am very sad to say—and I know there are many Conservatives on the prairies who are horrified and shocked at this happening—was when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was in Manitoba in August. He is reported in the Valley Times of the Pembina Valley as saying—and this has been verified by the notes of two reporters who were there—the following:

> —expansion of the Wheat Board's selling efforts, but permission given to private organizations to sell grain in competition with the Wheat Board. Mr. Clark said private organizations working alongside the Wheat Board would "stimulate" the board's efforts.

● (1742)

Mr. Speaker, the very reason for the existence of the Canadian Wheat Board through legislation originated by the Conservatives in the 1930s and implemented by the Liberals in the 1940s is because of what private organizations were doing to grain producers then. They are doing the same thing now in feed grains. The Leader of the Opposition says we should allow private organizations to sell export grain, not just feed grain, in competition with the Canadian Wheat Board. Mr. Speaker, I am going to do everything I can to make sure that every grain producer in western Canada has a copy of that quotation.

In this parliament we should be dealing with the strengthening of orderly marketing and the removal of the private grain trade from the backs of the producers. If we want to do more for our economy and an important sector of the agricultural industry, we should deal with legislation to strengthen orderly marketing and provide a better two-price system. That was a good idea, and we supported it, but there has been no increase in the domestic price since the program was initiated. At least the price of grain produced for human consumption in Canada should be raised in order to offset the increased cost of production and the decreased income of farmers over the last year and a half.

This parliament should bring to an end some of the government's restraint programs. The official opposition demands more for one program that I would have put an end to yesterday if I could, and that is restraint in the Post Office department. In every city of Canada there are tens of thousands of homes that do not have mail delivery because of the restraint policies of the government. At the post office in Regina there is parking for about 20 cars, but they seem to expect 11,000 home owners to come there for their mail. We are told they cannot put boxes in the mud in the new housing areas, but at the same time they are spending nearly $2 million for automated equipment to sort the mail. Why sort it if they do not deliver it?

I estimate that something in the order of 2,000 or 2,500 jobs are needed for efficient postal delivery in the cities. The people of Canada do not expect the Post Office to make money or to break even. They have always been willing to pick up the deficit in the Post Office as long as they get service. I do not know of a post office department in any country that breaks even. They all make money.

Mr. Stevens: In the 1970s ours made money.

Mr. Benjamin: If ours is to lose money, it should at least lose it in such a way as to maximize the service. Instead, it buys automated equipment to sort the mail and then refuses to deliver it. There are other things this parliament should do to help the economy. If we want to do something about pollution and unemployment at the same time, we could begin a seven or eight-year program to spend several billions of dollars at all three levels of government for sewage systems in each city and town that has tertiary sewage treatment. The manufacture, transportation and installation of such equipment would create jobs and reduce pollution. That seems to me to be a worthwhile program and the sort of thing that should be included in Bill C-11, rather than $1.2 billion in gifts to corporations and the wealthy. When they get it, they will not spend it in ways that would increase employment.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, dwells too much on dollars and not enough on people. I illustrated what a cruel hoax we have perpetrated on the veterans of Canada. How anyone in this chamber will look a disabled veteran in the eye if this bill is passed is beyond me. In view of past experience, I had hoped that the government would change their ways, try new methods and, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson) said, challenge the nation. The knowledge and the money is there, but we need leadership, planning and direction. We can only get that from a national government, not in a bill like C-11—and I say that sincerely. If the government can find $1.2 billion for this, but can only find $30 million for disabled veterans, I cannot support such legislation.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would entertain a question in the time he has remaining.

Mr. Benjamin: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lumley: Could the hon. member tell the House how he arrives at the figure of $1.2 billion for incentives to industry?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will check Hansard, as I shall, I am sure I said $1.2 billion in tax revisions, incentives, write-offs and relief for corporations and wealthy people.

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend all my colleagues who have taken part in this debate. Their comments have been very useful. The Income Tax Act is very difficult for the average Canadian to understand. It is becoming so complicated that more and more Canadians are turning to professional people for assistance. Tax experts are emerging in the legal and accounting fields and many of our middle and larger corporate citizens have special tax departments to assist them in taking maximum advantage of tax provisions and in computing the amount of money they must pay under our tax laws. This is an expensive process.

In 1971 we tried to deal with this complicated matter and to simplify it. Instead of becoming more simple and straightforward, it is becoming more complicated. Every time we, as law-makers, attempt to confer a benefit on a select group of people or to provide an incentive or stimulant to a sector of our economy, we make our income tax much more complicated. Projecting our performance for the past ten years, we must ask ourselves, "Where are we heading?" Clearly, we are heading into an era when we will see double the number of accountants with probably half the clients that each now has. How much can one mind absorb? Can one chartered accountant or one lawyer deal with this myriad of taxation legislation which we are developing? I doubt it. I feel we are heading into an era of specialization and team approaches to some very complicated taxing laws. It is, clearly, becoming too involved. Just like government, it is too big.

Our present taxation system places a severe burden on the average Canadian. To a great degree, our taxation policy penalizes this group of people and in particular small businessmen and small professional men who simply lose their incentive. When Canadians in the middle income group take a look at the large portion of their income that goes to the government of Canada, they find that their ambition is stifled and the incentive is not there to expand and provide more jobs. The wealthier people, people earning over $50,000 a year, may find they are involved in different companies, in capital gains and in a taxation system in which they have more options available to them in dealing with their taxation problems. They can protect themselves.

We do have a number of anomalies in our existing tax legislation that raise the question of fairness and equality of all Canadians in respect of our tax laws. For example, a private duty nurse who is self-employed and works at a hospital can deduct the expense of her uniform, while another nurse who works beside her but is employed by the hospital as a member of the staff cannot make the same deduction even though she performs substantially the same services.

Our lumberjacks working in our forests cannot deduct the cost of their mackinaws which are essential to protect them against our cold Canadian winters, but they can deduct the cost of their chainsaws. A carpenter who comes into your house to perform a small service can deduct the cost of his tools if he is self-employed, but the same man coming in to perform the same service cannot deduct the cost of his tools if he works for a construction company. A judge cannot deduct the cost of his robes that he is required to wear in the performance of his duties, but lawyers practicing before him can deduct the cost of their robes.

The tax application of government grants to industries, and the requirement that such grants be deducted from the value of machinery for depreciation purposes under the Income Tax Act, really means that these non-taxable grants are in fact taxable, and it does not appear to give sufficient consideration to the fact that the purpose of depreciation or the depreciation allowance is to provide a fund to replace the machinery when in fact it becomes obsolete. Clearly, personal tax cuts for low and middle income earners are steps in the right direction to stimulate consumer buying and assist us at a time when our economy of Canada is in a critical condition. The proposal of the Economic Council of Canada in this respect should not have been dismissed out of hand by this government.

Tax credits to corporations which provide jobs in slow growth areas and which provide jobs for young people coming into the labour market—a group where unemployment is extremely high—are steps which I would commend to the government. New approaches to achieve increased industrial research and development, particularly in fields where Canada has an inherent advantage, are long overdue measures which are badly needed. A policy of incentives for small business without increasing the pressure and paperwork which so many small businessmen are subjected to by government would be a welcome measure.

Clearly, our objective must be to recover and maintain the real economic growth potential of our Canadian economy while achieving full employment and stable prices. This is a most worthy objective, it is an extremely good goal, and even if it is not achieved by moving in that direction we can greatly improve our economic performance. For the past decade our economic performance has deteriorated. There may be more than one million Canadians out of work this winter, and inflation continues to sap our economic strength. One of the most disturbing bits of news has been the drop in productivity and our competitive international trading position. Our $10 billion deficit on trade in manufactured products has been caused in part, although not totally, by Canada's failure to keep abreast of technological improvements.

This is a very significant factor and one which has not been reflected in our taxation policy. A deterioration of our trade position is perhaps the most important shift that has taken place in our economy. We are consuming more than we are producing and we are borrowing foreign money to make up the difference. I feel there must be a massive effort to assist Canadian business through tax incentives to attain technological breakthroughs in fields where we have an inherent advantage. Clearly, with the resources of people and money available to us there is a need for selectivity in this program. There is a need to concentrate on areas where we have an inherent advantage. These fields include agriculture, our fresh water supply, resources of our three seas, and those industries drawing upon our mineral and chemical wealth. Farm machinery and mining equipment are examples.

[Mr. Howie.]

An imaginative taxation policy can do much to induce small businesses and large businesses to improve their technology and its application in industry to increase our gross national product and, through planning, to enable Canadian products to re-enter and expand in the trading markets of the world. It is essential that Canada restores its technological advantage in the production of goods for export if we are to maintain our present standard of living and create good jobs for Canadians without serious social disruption. Let me give you an example. Canada has always been a large exporter of pulp and paper products. Now plantations in South America and Europe can produce marketable trees in six to ten years, compared to our 40 to 50 years. This is an area which urgently requires early attention if we are to use incentives to improve our productivity. I shall have more to say about this particular subject in the days to come.

This bill's provision of an investment tax credit of 5 per cent to 10 per cent is an avenue that can be used to fund new technology breakthroughs, but it will require a more sophisticated strategy with greater dynamics than this lowly measure. The magnitude of the effect of a tax credit depends to a great extent on the size of the incentive and the period within which it will operate. Research and development is an important and expensive exercise, and a small tax credit of 5 per cent to 10 per cent with no policy commitment as to the time it will be in force will not yield the same benefits as a credit of 20 per cent to 25 per cent and a commitment for ten years.

In relation to the respective g.n.p., American, German and Japanese government funding of research and development is twice as high as ours. The Japanese have increased their international sales effort for existing products and have developed new products through government-sponsored research. For example, the Japanese government has spent $214 million in the past five years to help the computer industry compete with IBMs series 370. We no longer have a full-time minister of science and technology in Canada. And we should. Our taxation legislation has become so complex that it is extremely difficult for legislators to vote intelligently on it. It is so complex that I foresee all kinds of litigation over conflicting interpretations. Chartered accountants have to work morning, noon and night to keep up to date with all the changes, and this time so spent is reflected in the charges they have to pass on to their clients. The 1972 reforms are changing all the time. Some are being cancelled, others are deleted, and many of them are being amended. It is a most confusing situation for the average Canadian. The amendments announced last year have been reintroduced and already they are changed. The tax shelter provisions for multiple unit residential buildings have already been changed. The 10 per cent depreciation write-off allowance for frame buildings has been reduced to 5 per cent the same as that allowed for buildings built of concrete and steel, because apparently our tax people did not want to give an advantage to one form of construction over another, in spite of the fact that the two types of construction are so different. This, however, would be too simple a change to make, so they inserted the word "most". "Most" wood frame dwellings will have the rate reduced from 10 to 5 per cent. On the one hand, we want more apartment buildings built, and on the other we reduce the capital cost allowance except for those where the higher rate is "clearly warranted".

To which ones does this provision apply? Your guess, Mr. Speaker, is as good as mine—and to guess is exactly what the Canadian taxpayer will have to do.

• (1802)

The rules regarding the distribution of corporate surpluses through profits are changed again, and the rules as to what is and what is not taxable are enough to drive a Canadian lawyer to Philadelphia. The only constancy the average Canadian can look forward to in this government's taxation policy, is that every year there will be a multiplicity of changes. I am pleased with the decision of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to withdraw the budget proposal which would have taxed a portion of life insurance proceeds payable at death. Unfortunately, the problem has not been completely resolved. Amendments to the bill will still tax the policyholder at the time of taking out a policy loan and disallow the deduction of interest on the loan as an expense incurred to earn income. Such interest deductions are usually allowed to small business people when they borrow working capital from the bank and, in the past, have been allowed when they borrow it from their life insurance company.

I feel that a policy loan should be treated the same as any other loan, because it is repayable and if the policyholder passes away before the loan is repaid, then it is deducted from the proceeds of the life insurance policy. Loans against life insurance policies are usually a last resort by many people who have a real financial need of a critical nature, and this does not appear to me to be a good time to levy an additional tax on them.

Strangely enough, if a policyholder takes his life insurance policy to a bank and uses it as collateral, he can then borrow money from the bank and the interest he pays on the bank loan is deductible for income tax purposes if it is used to earn income. The policy of treating a loan against life insurance as income, and the policy of disallowing interest payable in respect of such a loan, does not make very good sense. One final thought I would like to leave with our taxation people is to suggest they study the concept of permitting Canadians to deduct a portion of the interest charges for mortgages on their principal residences and municipal taxes from earned income for taxation purposes. My suggestion is only that this concept be studied, because until I get the answer from some order paper questions I cannot determine what expense would be placed on the public purse.

It is conceivable that such programs would have to be phased-in over a period of time. First, perhaps, one and then the other—and indeed each of these programs—may have to be phased in by permitting such deductions only for persons in certain income categories or permitting only portions of interest or taxes to be considered for deduction. I think the concept should be explored by an appropriate committee of this House. I am fully conscious that in making this suggestion I may well be contributing to the confusion that already exists in our badly overworked taxation system, and I would gladly forgo these suggestions and all the other ones I have made for a simple income tax system where the benefits from a simplified administration could be passed on in lower income tax rates to all Canadians.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The final comments of my colleague, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie) give me an excellent introduction to this bill. Tax laws are complex. This document represents only amendments to the tax laws. Mr. Speaker, in some respects you are fortunate in not having to work your way through this particular document. I do not know whether you have lifted it. It contains 225 double pages. The amendments are on the left-hand side and the actual laws or regulations are on the right-hand side.

The first thing I want to do in this debate—and I believe in being constructive—is to suggest that those who draft cumbersome laws like this should be required to provide an index at the back as well as marginal comments. They should be easily visible. There is no order whatever in the way this bill is set out. What we, as legislators who are responsible for commenting on this bill, need in order to find our way through it is an index. It should be attached. That would assist us immeasurably when dealing with amendments that may or may not be agreed upon. The index could be carried on into the Revised Statutes. We need something to find our way through this maze. The income tax consultants for small businesses will have difficulty. Is it any wonder that small business is folding up its tent and going away? They need very expensive consultants to deal with amendments such as those being proposed.

As my hon. friend said, the proposals that were put forward earlier have already been amended in this bill. For example, there was the suggestion that death benefits were going to be taxed; that portion of the insurance policy which amounted to the investment portion of the individual's contribution during his lifetime were going to be taxed. That provision has been withdrawn. I cannot emphasize too much the need for bills as monstrous and horrendous as this to be provided with an index.

I cannot possibly deal with all the items that are in this bill. One deals with an insulation scheme. The only comment I want to make about the insulation scheme is to underline what was said earlier in the debate this afternoon. Exemptions for income tax purposes or grants obtained under the insulation program will be applicable only in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I want to further underline that these are the only two Liberal provincial governments in Canada. That is not just plain coincidence. The citizens of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are going to be exempted from paying income tax on loans they get under the insulation provisions of this bill.

There are thousands of other matters. There is one other comment I want to make before coming to a couple of specific cases. That is the way we got into this particular debate. It is worth while noting that we had a procedural gimmick invented, simply because the proceedings of this House are being televised, in order to present a budget speech. True, the House leaders eventually agreed to the use of that gimmick. However, four or five days in advance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) delivering his budget speech, arrangements were made with the CBC for that time to be blocked off. I do not know whether they blocked off "As the Stomach Turns" or what. It was not "As the World Turns". However, as he stood up, the stomach turned. That was all done by prearrangement with the CBC.

In addition, equal time was not allotted to the opposition as is normally the case with a budget speech. When I look back to October 20, I see that the Minister of Finance began his budget speech at 2001 hours. He went on until 2038, approximately 38 minutes. I was not in the chamber that particular night. However, I watched it over television for that particular reason. I wanted to see whether equal time would be accorded to the opposition. It was not. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) stood up at approximately 2038 and, gentleman that he is, resumed his seat at about 2053 in order that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) could speak within the hour.

On a contribution of this importance to the Canadian people, there should have been two hours taken out of CBC's time so that all parties would have had equal time to make their comments. It was a gimmick, pure and simple, three or four days after the introduction of television to this House in order to exploit that opportunity, and I find it an unacceptable manipulation by the government of the rules of the House, taking advantage of the situation to profit from the installation of the television facilities.

I feel the CBC ought to have been asked to set aside 1½ hours or two hours that evening so that all parties might have had an equal opportunity. In fact, I remember now that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge did not get on live from the House. The hon. member for York-Simcoe was interrupted very shortly after he had started, and the CBC went out into the entrance hall and took video-tape and broadcast live the leader of the NDP. This is an improper exploitation of the rules of the House, and it is quite unacceptable.

I have spoken about the need for an index. This brings me to two of the matters I want to speak about particularly. One is the capital gains provision in this bill with respect to properties being rolled over from a sale and the acquisition of another property. The provisions relating to this are to be found on page 27 and page 4. It is section 6 on page 4. An accountant or other person who is called upon to advise a client about this area has to explore this extremely complicated bill without the help of an index.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

When the matter of the capital gains provision was first brought to my attention, I turned to page 27 only. Then I found I had to refer to page 4, because that page is relevant. One element which has to be taken into account by anyone thinking of changing his property is the definition of a taxation year. The words "taxation year" occur right at the top of section 18, the new section 44 on page 27. But whose taxation year is involved? Is it the government's year, or is it the businessman's taxation year? I believe the businessman does have an option to set up his own taxation year, but that is not clear from the section. When we get to clause by clause study, I will return to this matter and ask for definitions. Whose taxation year is it which section 44 has in mind?

● (1817)

Then there is the time period which is to be allowed between the acquisition of new land and the sale of the old. What is the time period allowed? I think I have that question straight in my mind by doing some collation of clauses on page 27 and page 4, but I am not sure. I want to be absolutely sure, and so does a man selling a piece of commercial land; he wants to be darned sure he is not going to make a mistake.

The other matter he has to take into account is the order of the sale and acquisition operation. In this particular operation, a businessman obviously has to take advantage of situations that occur. A piece of land may be coming on to the market; he may bid on it and acquire it before he has sold his old piece of land. I never thought I would be talking about milk and the milk problems of British Columbian farmers who are in my riding, but supposing a man has to acquire a new piece of land before selling his old piece—what about the interest charges on the bank loan he may have to make in order to acquire the land; settling up once he has sold his old piece of land? Are those charges a legitimate business expense? Then, what about other charges that he may have? Supposing he sells a piece of land before acquiring a new piece of land, what does he do with his cattle meanwhile? He will have to pasture them somewhere. Would this be an expense which is tax deductible when he changes from one piece of property to another?

Then there is the measure of a capital gain. Supposing the properties are of different sizes. Supposing a farmer wants some bigger pasturage, or he needs some better hay land and he has to pay more for that land than he receives for his previous farm. Is this done on a unit basis, or is there just a roll-over of the amount? Supposing for some reason or another, because of technological developments, he gets a smaller piece of land and makes a big profit on the sale: is this going to be considered a capital gain? I think these kinds of questions should be answered, and when we get into clause by clause study I am serving notice that we will require answers at that time.

I should like to quote from a letter which I received from this man's accountant. He writes:

In visualizing the exchange of properties we believe there are two basic situations that a taxpayer could find himself in. These two situations are:

I put them in his words because he is the tax expert, not me.

1. The sale of their existing properties and the subsequent acquisition of a replacement property.

I think I have covered that in my comments.

2. The acquisition of replacement property which is subsequently followed by a sale of his original property.

It is a question of which comes first, the buying or the selling.

This can happen in a situation where a taxpayer is planning to expand his business but because the availability of suitable land, buildings or other related factors, may require him to acquire a new property prior to arranging a sale of his present property.

These are real problems for a businessman. Dairy farmers in my area have 70 or 80 head of cattle. I do not know exactly how many. I see them every time I go down the road to my home from my office, but since they are all black and white and there are so many, I cannot count them. The principal objective in life of these farmers is to produce milk, not to try to work their way through this bill. We have to work our way through this 225-page book. I hope that when the time comes these questions will be answered. Supposing there is a capital loss—how would it be calculated?

● (1822)

Another matter which concerns me is the taxation of insurance loans. I was delighted that all members in this House and even the members on the government benches have made representations to the Minister of Finance to have that benefit tax taken away. Last night someone said that it was all done because of representations from the government side of the House. Mr. Speaker, that is poppycock: we all made legitimate representations; we have all heard from our constituents.

Taxing widows is outrageous. I do not know what the responsible public servant had in mind to get involved in this matter. The government has not backed off fully, just partially. I should like to quote from the minister's information sheet which was tabled along with his budget. It reads:

The government has decided to withdraw, pending further study, the proposal that would have made taxable a portion of the investment income on certain life insurance policies realized on death.

Apparently that has escaped our notice. What further study is required to eliminate that unjust imposition of taxing widows? No further study is required on that. It had better not show up again, because there will be another attack on it. Further, in relation to the taxation of policy owners, the minister indicated that the remaining proposals will go forward as originally proposed. There are two proposals, both of which require careful examination. An allusion has been made to them already. The information continues:

Despite the dropping of the death tax, Life Underwriters Association of Canada and its members must continue to oppose the highly objectionable proposals.

I share their position. The highly objectionable proposals are those to tax the alleged investment element at the time of a policy loan, and to disallow the deduction of interest paid on a policy loan in all circumstances. The last time I said "comprehensible", and somehow an "in" got in front of it. This time I say that it is incomprehensible that there would be a disallowance of the deduction of interest paid on a policy loan in all circumstances.

As the previous speaker mentioned, one can bring an insurance policy to his insurance company in order to borrow against it, and the interest charges will be non-deductible. One can take that insurance policy and go to the bank in order to borrow against it, and pay an interest rate of 12 per cent or 13 per cent, and the interest charges are deductible. Why the difference? It is clear. It has been described as an Alice in Wonderland theory that a policy loan is not a loan, and that policy loan interest is not interest. Not only is that unfair, it is fantastic. The language of life insurance policies clearly requires a policy loan to be repaid. It will be repaid. The insurance company is in the business of getting repayment of its loan. Anyone who has received a loan from an insurance company and does not pay it back, knows what happens. That is a fair deal: that is their business.

● (1827)

This nonsense about not being able to deduct the interest on a policy loan when it is taken out from an insurance company, but being allowed to do it when it is taken from a bank, using insurance as collateral, is absolutely beyond my belief.

I would like to deal with clause 116. It is on page 210. I have had to do a bit of my own indexing here. Clause 116 deals with supplementary borrowing authority and reads, in part, as follows:

The governor in council may . . . at any time before 1979, raise by way of loan . . . the sum of nine billion dollars, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

Mr. Speaker, would you believe me if I were to tell you that the total budget of this government when it first came to power was just $9.9 billion? Now it wants to borrow $9 billion. Its budget this year is over $40 billion. It has gone from, let us say, $10 billion in 1968 to $40 billion—$45 billion or $47 billion; I do not know. One loses count. Does anyone know how much $1 billion is? Tonight I heard some hon. member opposite say, "Oh, what is a zero or two?" When I resume tomorrow I am going to tell the House how much $1 billion is, and it will shake the House rigid. A billion dollars is a lot of bucks.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 6.30?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being 6.30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FILE ON OPERATION "FEATHERBED"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the House because I have a slight case of laryngitis, I hope my voice can be heard. I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pertaining to operation "Featherbed" and to reports that a copy of the file is for sale at up to $200,000 and that espionage and investigation of high ranking members of the public service are involved. I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That the Solicitor General make an immediate statement as to whether the Prime Minister at any time attempted to have the file destroyed or the investigation which the Solicitor General yesterday termed as a legitimate activity stopped, whether the file indicates involvement of a foreign power in the security service of this country and that he explain the discrepancy between the Prime Minister's Tuesday statement that he had never heard of the file and his own admission yesterday that it does indeed exist.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONFLICTING STATEMENTS ON FILES INCINERATED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) said in the House on June 21 of this year that "no material pertaining to any inquiry presently under way in the province of Quebec was destroyed" in the incineration of RCMP documents which took place in Montreal on June 3. He also said of the same material that it "had no value". Considering that Chief Superintendent Guy Marcoux, head of the criminal investigation branch of the RCMP in Montreal said yesterday about this same material that he "could not be sure that some of the documents burned did not refer to alleged activity of the RCMP", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Solicitor General to make a statement on motions today explaining the serious contradiction which exists between his description of what was burned on June 3 and the statement made by Chief Superintendent Guy Marcoux yesterday and also to explain the circumstances which led to the report making the recommendation for the burning of these documents being prepared on May 23 of this year which was the Monday of a long holiday weekend.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR CONCLUSION OF AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES ON INSULATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that insulation is one of the best means to save fuel; considering that the insulation program launched by the Canadian government is likely to encourage Canadians to insulate some types of dwellings; considering that it would be advisable to include other types of dwellings and that the implementation of the program requires the agreement of the provinces, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House urge the Minister of State for Urban Affairs to intensify negotiations with provincial authorities so that some agreements be concluded immediately to allow Canadian taxpayers to take advantage of that program and that the amount of the subsidy be also increased.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Under Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION REPORT ON GARRISON DIVERSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the final recommendations of the International Joint Commission are now in the hands of the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the subject matter of the International Joint Commission's recommendation regarding the Garrison diversion project be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry in order that all members of this House have a meaningful input into the final position taken by the government of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to the standing order requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. My motion arises from the disclosures today by Toronto broadcasters Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton that unauthorized individuals have been able to get their hands on confidential income tax returns of individuals. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That this House expresses its concern about the apparent ease with which confidential tax information on individuals can be obtained by unauthorized people and requests the Minister of National Revenue to make a statement in the House at the earliest opportunity today explaining how such a breach of confidentiality could have taken place and what steps will be taken by the government to protect the privacy of individuals.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE OF CLAYTON RUBY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of the same rule. In view of the report in the Wednesday, November 16 Globe and Mail that physical and electronic surveillance was placed by the RCMP on Mr. Clayton Ruby, a prominent Toronto civil rights lawyer and bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada, for a period of two years and in view of the need to retain some vestige of solicitor-client privilege and the rule of law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House requests the Solicitor General to conduct an immediate inquiry into these allegations and, if found to be correct, that appropriate charges be laid with regard to any wiretap violations or Criminal Code offences committed.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FOOTWEAR—SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the tremendous difficulties experienced by Canadian shoe manufacturers and following numerous representations made by spokesmen for the Canadian Manufacturers Association who, once more, spoke to me about massive footwear imports in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House urge the government to take immediate action to protect Canadian manufacturers against surplus footwear imports on the Canadian market.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. According to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

INSISTENCE ON USE OF CANADIAN PIPE IN CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to present a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely the Prime Minister's statement in Hamilton yesterday to the effect that "the Canadian Steel Industry will have to be competitive if it expects its steel pipe to be used on the Canadian portion of the Alaska-Yukon natural gas pipeline."

In view of the fact that Canada has provided the United States with a land bridge to bring United States gas from Alaska to that country thereby saving it $6 billion compared to the only other route under consideration, and in view of the fact that one of the few benefits accruing to Canada from this project is the commitment of Foothills (Yukon) Ltd. that all pipe will be purchased in Canada, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the federal government to make it clear that it intends to hold Foothills (Yukon) Ltd. to its commitment and that it will insist that all the steel pipe used in the Canadian portion of the proposed pipeline will be produced in Canada in order to provide employment for Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Such a motion can only be presented for discussion pursuant to Standing Order 43 with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ACCUSATION BY CONSUMER MINISTER FORCE WITHHELD INFORMATION—NAMES OF OFFICERS INVOLVED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Acting Prime Minister. Could he tell the House whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was stating the position of the government when he accused the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of deliberately withholding information from that minister and other Solicitors General?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs talked to the press yesterday I think he talked about one situation that was completely public at the time he made a statement in the House, and later he had to say he had not received complete information. I think we always said we have a very good force in the RCM Police in Canada and I am delighted that the opposition is coming to realize all the damage they have caused the RCMP.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I realize that this government is going to do everything it can to prevent the minister from speaking for himself. So that we might be clear on the revised version of what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said, is it now the position of the government that he was accusing the RCMP of deliberately withholding information from him only in one case and that he did not say that "it seems that they did withhold information from me and other solicitors general?"

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has said he has every intention of appearing before the McDonald Commission to discuss all the problems. I do not believe we would gain anything at this time by creating a controversy that will be investigated by the McDonald Commission in the very near future. We should leave it as it is to make sure that the commission can provide the House of Commons and the people with an interim report as quickly as possible in the new year.

• (1417)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what the situation is now is that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has made accusations outside the House which have the effect of smearing the reputation of the RCMP. The RCMP cannot defend itself in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, government members joke about this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the Acting Prime Minister or the Solicitor General is: will the government now specify the names of those individual officers of the security services or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police whom the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said deliberately withheld information, so that the accusation will be specific to a few officers and not be a smear against the entire RCMP?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in no way did the minister say yesterday that the RCMP had deliberately misled him.

An hon. Member: Read what he said.

Mr. Chrétien: I had a discussion with the minister about it, and he has given me his word that he did not say that. He is more than willing and eager to appear in front of the royal commission to debate those things.

An hon. Member: Next year or the year after?

Mr. Chrétien: I am very pleased to see that the hon. Leader of the Opposition is changing his position and now wants to protect the RCMP. He would have been well advised to start that two weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

SUGGESTION OFFICERS ACCUSED OF WITHHOLDING INFORMATION APPEAR BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister's third answer is not consistent with his first answer. Would he be prepared to give us a guarantee now that those members of the RCMP, who have been accused by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs of withholding information from him, and to quote him, "other solicitors general", will be allowed to come before either a special committee of this House or the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates in order for them to defend themselves before parliament regarding the accusations made against them by a minister of the Crown?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was at the request of the opposition that the government decided in the summer to have an inquiry into the matter, and we have established the McDonald Commission. The former solicitor general will be there—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Shame!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Justice McDonald and members of the commission will have an opportunity to question the former solicitor general and everyone involved in it. I do not think the national security of the nation will gain anything by debating that in a committee of the House.

CONTRADICTORY REMARKS CONCERNING INCINERATING OF FILES—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question of what is said inside and outside the House about the security service. Last June the Solicitor General was very definite in some remarks he made in the House concerning the burning of some security files. Last night he was quoted in the media as saying something quite different, as I understood it. I wonder if he could explain this contradiction to the House now?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to have the hon. member say where I was quoted in the media as saying something different from what I said in the House.

An hon. Member: The CBC.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of quotations last night on the CBC indicated that certain files, which should be available to the McDonald Commission and should be available also to the special committee of this House investigating this matter, if one is called, have been destroyed, irretrievably lost. This was the import of the media report last night on television and also in the daily press. This is quite contradictory of the statement by the minister on June 21, 1977, which reads in part as follows:

> . . . the files were incinerated in accordance with the normal policy of the force . . . these files dated back to the year 1966. However, I am informed that any information that was pertinent was transferred to the National Criminal Investigations Unit of the RCMP.

● (1422)

That certainly sounded like a direct contradiction. If I am wrong, I am certainly very pleased to have the minister correct it.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned, I had not been interviewed by the CBC National News last night. Perhaps the hon. member is referring to another statement that may have come out of Montreal which I believe the leader of the New Democratic Party attributed to an officer of the force in Montreal. As far as I am concerned, the statement I made in the House in response to the question on June 21 was as a result of inquiries I made with the force at that time. I have not been advised of any changes made with regard to what I indicated at that time.

NAME OF OFFICER INFORMING MINISTER OF INCINERATION OF FILES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the minister referred to some things I used earlier in today's proceedings. I have had that checked out. I am informed that the head of the criminal investigation branch of the RCMP in Montreal, a man by the name of Marcoux, said the following: He could not be sure some of the documents burned on June 3 did not refer to alleged illegal activity of the RCMP. On June 21 the minister assured the House none of the documents burned on that day, not the previous day, pertained in any way to the inquiry. The minister also said the documents burned had no value. You could not have a more flagrant contradiction.

This is an extremely serious matter which affects the federal inquiry as well as the provincial inquiry. I am sure the minister did not deliberately misinform the House last year. The other implication is that someone in his department, presumably at a very high level, misinformed the minister. Can he now inform the House who told him last June the information that he conveyed? Did he check it out this morning in light of this very serious contradictory statement made by a senior RCMP official in Montreal?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not completely convinced that a contradictory statement has been made by a senior police officer in Montreal. The hon. member has drawn my attention to a statement allegedly made by Mr. Marcoux in Montreal yesterday. I will be pleased to check it out. As far as I am concerned, information I gave to the House at that time was information provided by the RCMP. Once again, I have no indication that that information was not correct.

Also, in the course of my reply in the House, I believe I indicated that no material was destroyed which was in the possession of the security service and no material pertaining to any inquiry underway in the province of Quebec was destroyed during the course of that consideration. I also wish to bring back to the memory of hon. members that following that consideration, the fact that it was brought to the attention of the House, a very strict directive was issued by the Commissioner of the force indicating that no further destruction of files of any kind was to take place during the period of time the inquiries were under way. I will of course get back to the police officer who made that statement in Montreal to see whether he may have information which was not available to us at that time.

DATE OF FILES INCINERATED

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The minister at the same time last June left the clear impression with the House that all the documents that were destroyed dated back to a time well in advance of the 1972 break-in in Montreal. It was alleged last night by the same officer that the documents that were destroyed on June 3 were as recent as documents up to 1974, which included all the crucial documents that the federal inquiry would need and that the provincial inquiry would need. If they have been destroyed, I think the minister will agree that could make a complete farce of the inquiry. Will he then check with his officials to find out why he told the House the documents that were destroyed were in fact documents pertaining to a much earlier period?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as far as documents being destroyed are concerned, any documents relating to allegations or accusations made against the force have been made fully available. The instances that have been related to the House over the past few days were related in good part insofar as the illegal operation was concerned to the Keable commission in Montreal and also to the McDonald royal commission in Ottawa. The same, of course, pertains to the allegation of break-in into the building which housed the computer tapes of the Parti Québécois.

As far as the dates of the documents are concerned, the CBC report in that regard is quite correct. I indicated in the House last summer that they dated back to 1966 in the sense that the oldest document destroyed dated back to 1966. I understand that the documents do go up to the period 1972-1973—I would have to check as to the exact date. I remind the House once again that there is a whole series of documents within the force, as in any other government department, with respect to which a normal policy of destruction is followed. I indicated at that time that the destruction which took place in Montreal had been carried out further to an audit which had been done in Montreal following a report given to the commanding officer of C Division, Montreal, indicating it was time that certain documents should be disposed of in accordance with normal force procedures.

Mr. Broadbent: In his answer in the House, the minister said the material dated back to 1966. But I would remind him he was responding to a question which specifically asked him whether there was any more recent material relating to 1971, 1972 or 1974. His reply clearly implied there was not—that, for example, there was no material relevant to the inquiry which had been set up a few weeks previously in Quebec. The hon. gentleman cannot have it both ways.

There seems to be a clear contradiction between what is now being said in Montreal and what the minister said in reply to the question put to him. I would like him to look into that.

My final question is this: would he inquire into the immediate steps which led to the order for the destruction of these documents being given on May 23. May 23, as the minister may now know, was the Monday of a long weekend. It would seem unusual to many Canadians that an order for the burning of the documents would be made on that particular day. Would the minister inquire on whose authority that order was given and why it was given on that particular day?

Mr. Fox: I remember seeing the report of the auditor which I asked to see at that time and it is my understanding that it was indeed dated May 23. I would have to check to see whether the officer in question worked on May 23; there are some police officers in the country who do work on May 23.

Mr. Broadbent: Burning documents?

INDUSTRY

FOOTWEAR—SUGGESTED ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO PROTECT MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In a telegram addressed to the government on July 29, 1977, the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada asked the government to impose severe quotas on footwear imports, particularly imports of shoes for ladies and little girls.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is directed to the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Beaudoin: In a letter dated November 15, 1977, the association reminds me of its dissatisfaction with the measures taken by the government and by the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Therefore, I should like to ask the hon. minister whether he is aware of this telegram and whether he intends to go much further to save this industry and the thousands of workers whose jobs are in jeopardy?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the telegram and the department has attempted to reach bilateral agreements with Taiwan, South Korea, Brazil, Spain and the European Common Market, particularly Italy, with regard to their exports of footwear to this country. I can inform the hon. member we have not been entirely successful in that approach. I have placed a document on footwear before the cabinet and hope to have a decision very soon.

[Translation]

FOOTWEAR—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO PREVENT DUMPING

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Considering that the bilateral discussions with the underdeveloped countries where wages are low did not produce the results expected by the government of Canada and particularly by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, can the minister tell the House whether the government intends to take extremely severe measures against the import or near dumping of footwear which hurts the Canadian markets, and particularly whether the government will take measures to inform the public that shoes imported from these countries are similar to those which are made in Canada but that the quality is different?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We can, indeed, take action under Article 19 of GATT but the hon. member must realize that if we do so we might well have to pay for it. In paying for it, part of the footwear industry of Canada, and that is in Ontario and the province of Quebec, will have to pay through loss of exports. Therefore, the good part of the industry might have to pay for the bad, and that is the difficult position in which we find ourselves.

INCOME TAX

BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the very startling revelations made today by Toronto broadcasters Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton that it is possible for unauthorized individuals to get their hands on the confidential tax returns of virtually any Canadian; information which is given to the Department of National Revenue on the basis that it is to be kept confidential and secret, would the minister explain why there is such laxity in his department's security regulations that this could take place, and explain what actions are being taken by his department to ensure that information which is given to the government on a confidential basis is kept confidential and not available to unauthorized individuals?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I learned of this very serious offence this morning through a radio broadcast in Toronto. I am extremely concerned, as I am sure are all Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You had it prepared.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I should like to repeat, this is a very serious offence against the Income Tax Act. My cabinet colleagues have met this morning, and the RCMP has been asked to launch an immediate investigation.

An hon. Member: Here we go again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It is hoped that this investigation will be complete, swift and as soon as possible, and that the person or persons involved will be subject to the prosecution which is provided under the Income Tax Act.

I have also ordered an immediate increase in security procedures in revenue offices across the country, and have ordered the 20 directors in the various offices to take steps to review and tighten security.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to take the hon. member seriously. Could he tell the House whether he has asked his officials how it is possible for an individual who is not authorized, but as a private citizen, to simply call up a telephone number and ask to have the private and confidential information on the tax returns of individuals, information given to the government on a confidential basis? Would he indicate how extensive this sort of violation of individual confidentiality has been in the past, and what specifically is being done by the minister today to eliminate this particular breach of security?

An hon. Member: He has told you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will not have to repeat what I have already said.

An hon. Member: You are not alone.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Do it again, Joe, in French.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has all the information he pretends to have, I think he should have got in touch with me because I was in the House all day since very early this morning and no information has been brought to my attention or to the attention of my officials.

In answer to his question—

[English]

Apart from the anxiety this has caused Canadians generally, it also is of great concern to the thousands of loyal employees of the revenue department who traditionally protect the confidentiality of tax information. I should like to express, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, this is painful.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: What is surprising is not how much I know as an individual, but how little the minister knows as the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister this one simple question which I think he can answer with a yes or no. When he was made aware of that this morning, and Mr. Templeton and Mr. Berton have indicated they contacted the Prime Minister's office to alert him of the fact that they were going to be making this revelation, did the minister not today contact his officials to find out how it is possible that an individual could simply call up a number of a government office, request information and have it handed over to him? That does not require an investigation by the Mounties. Can he not answer that?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the hon. member has the ability to repeat the same question three times. I would like to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have been in good discussion with officials of my department, and in good discussion with my cabinet colleagues, including the Acting Prime Minister, and you can rest assured that the situation is in good hands and is being investigated by the RCMP, as I mentioned a while ago.

THE MINISTRY

ACCEPTANCE OF PRINCIPLE OF MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the extraordinary statement made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs last night in Montreal, dealing with matters that came within his jurisdiction when he was solicitor general, is it a principle accepted by the members of this present government, as it has been accepted by members of every other government that ever served this country, that a minister accept the full responsibility for the actions of those who work for him in his department and in affiliated agencies, and does not whine publicly about his ignorance of matters with which, if he had been doing his job properly, he would have been thoroughly familiar?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the rules of ministerial responsibility are quite clear and, as I said earlier, the matter which the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been referring to is only an incident which took place here when he answered a question and subsequently had to rectify his answer because he had not been made aware of all the information regarding this case. This kind of thing happens from time to time when we are not fully aware of a case or when the information does not concord.

After all, what matters is that, in all circumstances, the minister and the government took their responsibilities. That is why, if there were some mistakes in the past, we sincerely hope that the McDonald Commission will help us find a better way to ensure our national security objectives and place the RCMP in a position where it can always serve the best interests of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister to clarify this whole matter for the House and the country and not wait for what may be months before the McDonald commission gets around to this matter. Will he have his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, take the first opportunity, preferably today, of making a forthright statement to the House as to exactly what he did say? If this government does accept a principle like that accepted by all governments in respect of ministerial responsibility, will the Acting Prime Minister have his colleagues in the present government start acting like men instead of weasels which hide behind the coattails of responsible civil servants?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

POSSIBILITY OF RE-ESTABLISHING ATLANTIC SALMON FISHERY

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In answer to the request of fishermen from eastern Quebec and much of the Maritimes, does the minister intend in 1978 to re-establish salmon fishing which was abolished some seven years ago and, if so, could he outline briefly the conditions by which the fishermen who are interested in that kind of fishing will have to abide?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as I said previously in answer to a question from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, we intend to open the salmon fishing season in the Atlantic for a short period of time, surely shorter than before prohibition six years ago. Details on that are being discussed with representatives of fishermen's associations, and I will be pleased to convey information to the House when we have come to a common position.

INCOME TAX

BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to return to the question asked earlier in connection with the revelations made in the city of Toronto by two most responsible and reputable individuals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister—I will wait until he finishes his consultations. I suggest that if he is getting legal advice from the Minister of Justice, he should go elsewhere.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask him to realize that it is 60 years ago this month that the Income Tax Act was placed on the statute books of this country and in all these years there has not been a more shocking revelation than the one that is now being looked at. I ask him this—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I find that these gentlemen over there, unidentified and unidentifiable, have a way of trying to howl down the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him this: Will he now say something regarding this matter? Apparently he has been in consultation with the Minister of National Revenue. What is the present position? Is there any suggestion whatever—and I do not think there can be—that the revelations are not correct? What are you going to do about it instead of postponing action? What are you going to do today so that Canadians will not regard it as being an open season on their income tax returns? The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations smirks!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of National Revenue I am extremely concerned about this revelation. The Minister of National Revenue has been in touch with his officials this morning and we have asked for information about this because no previous information has been available to the department on this. Right away the Department of National Revenue contacted the RCMP because we consider this matter to be extremely serious. It is another great institution which is perhaps at this moment under attack.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: The Department of National Revenue has always served the interests of this nation very well in keeping all the information extremely confidential. I hope that the RCMP will be able to find the individual who has committed the crime of revealing this information and, as the Minister of National Revenue has said, that the individual or individuals involved will be prosecuted very severely because we cannot allow anyone to tamper with the tax returns of Canadian citizens.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister suggests that a department of the government is under attack. It is the maladministration of this government that is under attack.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him, has he been in touch with these two reputable persons in Toronto to ascertain from them the basis for the copyright article which they have put before the public? It cannot be brushed aside and it requires immediate action. Has he been in touch or has anyone from among his officials or those of the Department of National Revenue been in touch with the two persons? This is a damnable situation which has been revealed and it cannot be laughed off or brushed aside.

Mr. Chrétien: I share the concern of the right hon. member and I have asked people who are probably the best equipped to deal with criminal offences, namely, the RCMP, to look into the matter right away. This is a group of law enforcement officers in Canada in which I have complete confidence, and I think it is the best door on which I could knock at this moment. Of course, if I have to speak to Mr. Templeton and Mr. Berton, I would be willing to do that, but I hope that those individuals and other people who have known about this for more than 24 hours will collaborate to the maximum—

Mr. Broadbent: Including the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chrétien: —with the law officers of the Crown, the RCMP, in order to make sure that everyone who is guilty of anything is prosecuted as quickly as possible. One thing that is perhaps a little bit suprising—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: This thing has been in the mill since Sunday and I have asked the RCMP if they knew anything about it. They have told us that they did not know anything until the program came on the air this morning. Perhaps some individuals would have been well advised when they heard about this in the first instance to communicate with the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENERGY

USE OF CANADIAN PIPE IN CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and it arises out of a statement attributed to the Prime Minister made yesterday in Hamilton that:

> The Canadian steel industry will have to be competitive if it expects any of its steel pipe to be used on the Canadian portion of the Alaska-Yukon natural gas pipeline.

In view of the fact that Foothills (Yukon) has repeatedly committed itself to purchasing all its steel pipe from Canadian steel producers, who changed this policy of securing all the pipe for the Canadian portion of the pipeline from Canadian steel mills? I want to ask him whether this reversal of policy has come about as a result of pressure from the U.S. government, and did the Canadian negotiators enter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now on his third question already. I think two at the most should be taken at a time.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): I have not read the statement of the Prime Minister. Perhaps I can ask the Minister of Labour who was there to answer that question, but the way I understand the question, there was no change in the policy of the government that led the Prime Minister to make that statement. Perhaps the Minister of Labour can answer that question.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is, unintentionally of course, misinterpreting the Prime Minister's remarks. I was there. He said that of course there is a preference for Canadian steel. I was very glad to hear that, as I am sure the whole House is, in terms of employment for Canadians. But the firms have to be competitive. Obviously, it is not at any cost, and the Canadian steel industry knows this. They are very proud of the fact that they are competitive and they will be competitive.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The statement of the Minister of Labour simply confirms what the Prime Minister said yesterday, that is:

> . . . the federal government will not make consumers pay more for their natural gas by using Canadian steel if it is priced higher than steel from other countries.

In view of the fact that the primary purpose of this pipeline is to take Prudhoe Bay gas from Alaska to gas consumers in the United States—not to Canadian consumers but to U.S. consumers—does this mean that the government is more concerned about protecting the interests of American gas consumers than they are about protecting the jobs of Canadian workers?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): The answer is unequivocally no.

PROTECTION FOR CANADIAN COMPANIES FROM SUBSIDIZED BIDS ON PIPE FOR NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour has just given an answer that Canadians are to receive preferential treatment. The fact is that before the National Energy Board and in all other statements made by Foothills, Canadian companies were to get all the steel business. I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister, in view of the fact that U.S. Steel Company has just got an order for 80,000 tons of steel for a pipeline to Mexico at knock-down prices which Canadian steel companies say are 20 per cent below the going price, assisted undoubtedly by the DISC program in the United States which subsidizes these companies in order to get into foreign markets, what protection will there be for the Canadian steel producers in this country if these bids are open to competition from the United States and Japan?

● (1452)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed there is a provision to the effect there will be no dumping in those circumstances and that we are well protected against the danger to which the hon. member refers.

TARIFFS

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE TO ENABLE HORTICULTURAL INDUSTRY TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In 1973 the Tariff Board of Canada was asked to look into the requirement of duty for horticultural products and horticulturally-processed products in the field of agriculture. After four years we have only a summary of the recommendations of that board. Would the minister arrange a reference to a committee of the House so that the horticultural industry might present its claims with respect to the deficiencies of the recommendations of the Tariff Board? There is no time for any means whereby their requirements might be made public.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to consider this possibility and if it is the best way to solve the problem we might accept the suggestion of the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer, but in view of the fact that some of the positions which we have taken are to be tabled and revealed to those with whom we will negotiate in the very near future, would the minister try to give this House an answer not later than tomorrow about the committee to be set up, how many negotiators can be present and how many agricultural interests he will allow to be represented?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I undertake to give an answer to the hon. member tomorrow.

TOURISM

FEDERAL AID FOR INDUSTRY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is also responsible for tourism. At a recent meeting in Toronto the minister spoke to the tourism industry and was very critical of the industry. He blamed the declining tourism in Canada on the industry itself, which is a complete contradiction of a series of resolutions the travel industry passed at a convention in Edmonton last May where, among other things, the federal government was asked—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McKenzie: I would like to ask the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. McKenzie: What is the problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Fort William.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON PROPOSAL TO INCREASE TOLLS

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Considering the strong opposition to the doubling of seaway tolls and the inequity that exists between Canadian and American users in that the latter group have public hearings and the Canadian users do not—as a matter of fact, Canadian users have to appear before the American tribunal to have their views aired—is the minister considering a referral of the matter of toll increases to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications or some impartial body? If not, what is he considering in terms of allowing Canadian users to have open hearings so that their views can be heard in an open environment?

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the users interested in putting views forward had the very fullest of hearings before the seaway officials and also in many cases through representations to me directly so that all their views could be taken into account.

As I have said before in the House, it is recognized that those who have to pay a freight rate or a toll are always happier if that toll or rate is low, and that is not surprising. We are in the final stages of discussing with the United States the appropriate course to attempt to put this great waterway on an appropriate basis for its financial viability, and I hope that we will be reaching a conclusion about that in the very near future.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL CONCERNING ALLEGED WITHHOLDING OF INFORMATION BY FORCE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It arises out of an answer given by the Minister of Finance a few moments ago in which he referred to an incident. This question is to the minister in his capacity as a minister of the Crown. The Minister of Finance indicated that the incident referred to in the minister's statement last night was one incident, whereas in the quotation of the minister the minister has said that "it seems that they," referring to the RCMP, "did withhold information from me and from other solicitors general," indicating that this was a course of conduct, which is quite an accusation against the RCMP if it is true.

In his capacity as a minister of the Crown and knowing that all of us in this House are interested in hearing from him, would the minister undertake to make a statement on motions today to indicate to the House what he was referring to, the number of incidents he was referring to and what officers of the RCMP he was referring to so that they can clear themselves? Would he take the opportunity?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Even if the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs were to attempt to answer that question, I would rule that he could not. I think questions of that sort can be properly put only to the Prime Minister, the Acting Prime Minister or the present Solicitor General. In fact, questions of that sort have been put already. If the hon. member has a supplementary to those questions—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a supplementary, and I do not want to offend the rules, Sir. It is a difficult thing, but let us assume the accusation is true. Will the Acting Prime Minister—because there is time now—consult with his colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to see whether he will make a statement on motions this afternoon—which is coming up in just a few moments—as to what he meant by the allegations which are attributed to him by responsible journalists and responsible newspapers as to his relationship with the RCMP?

As part of that question, does the Acting Prime Minister, as the acting leader of the government today, feel that his colleague is discharging his duty as a minister by failing to take an opportunity to make a statement on motions as opposed to some other course of action? In other words, does the Acting Prime Minister not feel that it would be appropriate in these circumstances for this matter to be cleared up as soon as possible?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I said many times earlier in the question period that the minister is more than willing to testify before the McDonald Commission.

Mr. Hees: Several months from now.

Mr. Chrétien: I do not think that the security of the state or the police would gain anything by having these questions debated in the House. I think there has been enough of that kind of questioning and that it would be in the best interests of the nation to ask the McDonald Commission to look into this as quickly as possible and to report very soon to the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: In three years?

Mr. Chrétien: We think this kind of thing hurts a very good body of the Canadian public service, the RCMP, too much.

THE MINISTRY

MANNER IN WHICH MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY IS DISCHARGED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, is it, then, the view of the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of this government that the doctrine of ministerial responsibility, which many of us think is in tatters, can be discharged by a minister going to a body outside this House of Commons and there answering allegations against himself? Is it the view of this government that that is the way to discharge ministerial responsibility?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all questions with regard to these matters can be asked of the Solicitor General. I talked with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs at noon, and he referred to one incident which was debated publicly in this House.

An hon. Member: Let him speak.

Mr. Chrétien: I think the fact that the matter comes up two or three years later does not change the substance of what happened, so I have nothing else to add at this time.

POSSIBILITY OF FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL APPEARING BEFORE COMMITTEE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister be prepared to clear up this very serious matter—very serious charges have been made by the minister—by appearing before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates when that committee has before it a supplementary estimate dealing with the Department of the Solicitor General so that this matter can be clarified by the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a matter which can be taken up when the committee is in session, and I do not think it is a question which can be put to this minister in his current capacity.

INCOME TAX

BREACH OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question arising from the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. The Minister of National Revenue seemed to treat this matter very lightly. I would like to know to what office Pierre Berton and Charles Templeton were referring and whether that office is under some degree of surveillance. What is being done to protect confidentiality?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I did refer to security in my previous answer. With regard to the comments made by the right hon. gentleman concerning two well-known and good Canadians, Charles Templeton and Pierre Berton, I hope they will fully co-operate with the investigation taking place so that we can get to the bottom of this very serious matter. I should like also to say I am rather puzzled and surprised that the Leader of the Opposition did not contact the RCMP. Why did he not contact my department or myself to see what we could do? I want also to request his co-operation as well as that of members of his party who know something about it so that we can get to the bottom of it?

● (1502)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard such verbicide. I asked a simple question and I will put it very simply again. What office disclosed that information? Surely that question can be answered yes or no without the minister reading from a memorandum from his department.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): When I know that, Mr. Speaker, I will let you know and also the hon. member.

ACTION TO PREVENT FURTHER BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very serious suggestion that has been made that credit bureaus and others who want it can get tax information, can the minister assure the House that he has taken action now to adjust the existing procedure so that there will be no further incidents such as have been reported by Messrs. Templeton and Berton? Can the minister tell the House that he has taken action to prevent any further disclosures of the type indicated by this broadcast?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat that we have tightened the security and are trying to find out where that particular problem is. When I do, Mr. Speaker, I shall let you know.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER INFORMED MINISTER OF BREACHES OF CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister indicate to the House whether the Prime Minister, who was contacted before the broadcast, has informed him of the communication from Messrs. Templeton and Berton that was also conveyed to the Leader of the New Democratic Party before the broadcast, so that they on that side of the House may co-operate with the authorities to get to the bottom of this matter?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I was only alerted to this this morning. We are acting accordingly and as quickly as we possibly can. If the hon. Leader of the Opposition had known about it before why did he not bring it to my attention? By now I would have had an answer for him.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CLARK—STATEMENTS OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief question of privilege relating to some of the recent statements of the Minister of National Revenue who has tried to excuse his conduct of the affairs of his department. I should simply like to put on the record of the House a certain chronology of events.

I am sure the minister, being the competent minister he is known to be across the country, will already have read the transcript of the remarks of Mr. Berton and Mr. Templeton. He will know that the contact with me was made before there was verification of the contents of the particular file relating to me. I became aware of the verification this morning at roughly 11.15, an hour and ten minutes after the matter was broadcast. I am told that the Prime Minister's office was advised well before that time.

[Mr. Guay (St. Boniface).]

If the Minister of National Revenue wants to inquire why members of parliament who became aware of this matter did not bring it directly to the attention of the government itself, perhaps he should deal directly with the office of his leader to find out why they did not advise him before the matter was broadcast.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was Acting Prime Minister this morning, and nobody informed me of anything until the Minister of National Revenue—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: They do not want to know the truth. The Minister of National Revenue informed me of the problem. I had a meeting with him and his officials in the cabinet room, and I have given all the facts to this House. What is extremely important is for everyone involved in a situation like this to act immediately. No one can reproach the Minister of National Revenue, the deputy minister or other officials who did not know anything about it. I asked the RCMP if anyone had informed them, and I am informed they knew nothing about it. If the hon. mumber learned anything about it before this morning, I should like to know. If not, I am happy it is not as some people have said, that perhaps he knew about it before. I accept his word that he did not know anything about it before this morning. I am very satisfied, but that is not what somebody has led me to believe.

Mr. Clark: You accept my word?

MR. BALDWIN—MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a very important question of privilege inherent in the answer given by the Acting Prime Minister to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I shall be very brief, but that does not mean it is not a very important question.

The question of ministerial responsibility is one which this government has sought to bring forward to defend its actions over the last tumultuous two weeks. As I interpreted the answer of the Minister of Finance, as leader of the government in this House today, he is saying it is adequate, to meet the charge of ministerial responsibility, for a minister to appear before a body outside this House, a body appointed by the government and with terms of reference established by the government. He says it is adequate for a minister to meet the question of ministerial responsibility by answering to that body.

I suggest to Your Honour that the powers and privileges of this House have been sadly reduced over the last eight or ten years by this government. One of the few left should surely be the right to demand that this House, on behalf of the people of Canada, may hold a minister accountable on the basis of ministerial responsibility.

If what the Acting Prime Minister has said is to be taken at its face value—it was a direct answer to a direct question—that has gone by the board. If that is the case, then I suggest we in this House are entitled to know it. I would think that the Acting Prime Minister must be prepared—if not now, certainly within the next day or so—to let this House know if that is the way the government views the question of responsibility. If, in their view, it is sufficient that a minister can go to some outside body and in secret, if necessary, give testimony and meet the question of ministerial responsibility, then this House might as well pack up and go home.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been endeavouring to get the floor on what I was going to call a point of order. It is closely related to the issue raised by the hon. member for Peace River, however, so perhaps I could endeavour to make now the point of order I have in mind.

Several times during the question period interest and concern were expressed in the statements made outside the House by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs regarding matters that related to his former responsibility as a solicitor general. Members have tried to avoid offending the rule that says we cannot ask ministers questions relating to something for which they are not now responsible, and yet parliament seems to have been put in this position—supreme though we are, as we tried to say yesterday in another connection—that we cannot do on the floor of the House what a reporter can do outside the House.

It seems to me that somehow or other a way ought to be found for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make a statement to this House concerning the matters that were within his knowledge when he was solicitor general, particularly in view of his statements outside the House. I am fully aware of the rule, and Your Honour has to guard it very carefully, but I would point out that upon occasion, usually after consultation with the House leaders of all parties, variations in the procedures have been made to meet a particular situation. One that came to mind when I was thinking about this matter, and which I looked up, occurred during the course of what was called the judges' affair. On two occasions during those days, once on March 12, 1976, and again on March 16, 1976, after consulting with the House leaders Your Honour varied the rule respecting motions made under Standing Order 43.

I am not trying to say that Your Honour varied the rule about questioning ministers on things which were their former responsibility, but Your Honour did vary another rule because the House was particularly concerned about the matters then being discussed.

On March 12, instead of waiting until three o'clock Your Honour permitted the hon. member for Westmount, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations and the Minister of Finance to make statements which had no relation to matters which were then part of their responsibilities. The House was concerned. Then statements were made by hon. members on this side of the House.

On March 16, 1976, when the Minister of State for Urban Affairs had resigned that morning from his position as minister of consumer and corporate affairs, he was permitted not only to make a statement but he was permitted to make it at a time reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. It was at the end of that statement that he told us his resignation had been submitted that morning. We agreed to that, and comments were made afterwards. My point is: the rules, practices and procedures of the House were varied, by consent, because the House had a particular interest in the matters then being discussed.

There is no doubt of the interest of the House these past few weeks with respect to matters related to the RCMP and to the relationship between that body and the Solicitor General. Now we have a minister of the Crown making statements outside the House that are extremely relevant to the whole situation, and yet somehow or another our rules seem to prevent us from asking him questions or getting any information out of him. To say he will appear before the McDonald commission of inquiry is not very satisfactory. It is not recognizing the supremacy and the importance of this House. We have not even had the assurance that he will appear before a committee. Even that would not meet the immediate interest of the House of Commons.

My point of order is that surely common sense calls for us to have at least the rights in this House which reporters have outside. I would ask Your Honour to consult the House leaders of the various parties to see if an arrangement can be made for this interest of the House to be met in order for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs either to make a statement and be questioned after it, or be questioned with respect to matters within his knowledge because of the responsibility that he held for them.

I am happy to raise this point of order in association with the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River, because I think his concern regarding what has happened to ministerial responsibility is very serious and very important. I think we should do something about it and not let our procedures stymie us completely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to make a submission with respect to this matter. As I tried to say in the submission I made in the question and the preamble to the question, earlier in the question period the Minister of Finance, when talking about the incident referred to by the Solicitor General in his statement outside the House, inferred in his answer that it was one isolated matter of an accusation made by the former solicitor general against the RCMP, that they had in fact lied to him on one occasion. That was the inference.

In any event, it is very clear from the newspaper clippings and from what I saw on CTV last night that it was more than one incident. I attempted to quote what the Solicitor General said about what the RCMP had either said or failed to say to him, which was a pretty strong accusation against the police. He said, "It seems to me that they did withhold information from me and from other solicitors general". Because there seemed to be some discrepancy concerning what was being said by a minister who did not make a statement outside the House with respect to a statement made outside the House, or purported to have been made outside the House, I asked him not to comment on his answer as to the truth or not of the statements attributed to him, but whether, as a member of the ministry, he would take advantage of the opportunity provided him by the rules of this House to come to the House and make a statement. If he came to the House and made a statement, there would be opportunity to question him specifically with respect to that which was contained in the statement. That was the purport of the question.

I realize Your Honour has to make instant judgments, but you did rise in your place and that question was not answered. Therefore, at this moment we do not know whether a minister of the Crown is prepared to come forward and give us the details surrounding those statements made by him outside the House about which there has been some confusion today on the floor of the House of Commons.

Perhaps I put it to Your Honour inarticulately, but I attempted to indicate that I was asking the minister a question in his capacity as a member of the government. During the judges' affair the hon. member for Westmount was questioned, as a member of the government, with respect to incidents which did not fall under his then ministerial responsibility. Yesterday in the House of Commons the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerned a matter which the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that it would be drawing rather a long bow to have the answer to the question in his ministerial capacity. It is on that basis—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is dealing with a point which concerned me, as well, yesterday. Perhaps I should clarify that for the House. As the hon. member has said, I am required to make instant judgments, but yesterday the preamble to the quesion began with some reference to negotiations by the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs over the weekend. I have not verified the record, but that was the beginning of the question.

With that in mind, of course I had no way of knowing whether the negotiations referred to were domestic negotiations concerning the minister's political area of activity, or whether they were in fact ministerial in nature. Until the minister rose in an attempt to answer, I was not sure. Therefore, I could not tell from the question what area of responsibility was involved.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in order for the House to understand the situation, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is reported in Hansard as saying the following:

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

As the minister knows, the House is currently debating a bill which gives about $1 billion in tax concessions to corporations ostensibly to create jobs.

That was the preamble to the hon. member's question which was directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My point is that that question was allowed.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It was allowed in the same way, and for the same reasons, as the questions were allowed a year or so ago to the hon. member for Westmount when he was involved in the judges' affair which ultimately, and unfortunately, led to his resignation from the ministry.

It is within my capacity as a member of this House to ask a minister of the Crown whether or not he is prepared to make a statement. I am not asking him to make a statement in answer to my question. I consider a ruling on that to be extremely important, because I want to pose that question once again to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, if I can, and perhaps to the Minister of Supply and Services because he is the other solicitor general referred to.

I would like to know whether or not they are willing to make statements in the House with respect to the allegations which have been made against the RCMP concerning the way the RCMP conducted itself in relation to members of the ministry. If the statement of the minister outside the House is true, then some heads should roll in the RCMP. However, if that statement is not true, the minister has a course of action open to him. He will have carried out, albeit outside the House, an action which would indicate that his statements are not in accordance with the facts. This House has to know the facts before the McDonald commission knows them.

I believe it is important that I be allowed to put the question. As a result of it, I hope the minister will make a statement so he can be questioned with regard to that statement. So that Your Honour will be forewarned, I would like to put the same question to the Minister of Supply and Services. If there is one place where we ought to be able to question ministers, it is here. If there are to be restrictions on the right of members to question ministers—and I am prepared to admit there should be from time to time—we ought to lean against that to the greatest extent possible.

The whole purpose of this parliament is to be able to ask ministers questions directly as events occur. If we are to wait for the royal commission, the RCMP and the officers who are not now named by the Minister of Supply and Services will remain under a cloud. That is a fact, a fact that this House ought not to allow to exist in terms of any public servant of the government.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this question of privilege. I am pleased that the hon. member is afraid that someone can cast doubt on a civil servant. I wish he had developed that philosophy two weeks ago when they started making accusations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Under the circcumstances, I think the rule is clear. When a question concerning a particular department is asked, it is the responsible minister who must reply to that question in the House. The Solicitor General was willing to answer questions, and in fact has done so. In my capacity as Acting Prime Minister today, I spoke with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in my office. We discussed the matter and I asked whether he made those accusations. He told me that he referred to an incident that was debated in the House. He gave it as an example. He did not intend to make any accusations against the RCMP.

I have followed the rules of this House. Perhaps members opposite find these rules somewhat restraining. However, we have to abide by the rules and practices of this House. Sometimes they are also restraining for members on this side. It is often difficult for a parliamentary secretary to get the floor to ask questions because he has accepted some responsibility. For the past 10½ years that I have been a minister I have had to forgo my right to ask questions on behalf of my constituents who elected me. However, that is one of the rules we have to live with.

This morning we did exactly what has been done under similar circumstances over the years, that is ask the minister what comments he made. I reported to the House what the minister said to me. I said that if there are other questions related to this matter, they can be asked of the Solicitor General. I can appreciate the frustrations of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but that is the price one must pay when serving another department. He can no longer answer for the previous department for which he had responsibility. If a member wishes to ask some questions about a minister's former responsibility, he must do that through the Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister. That is the rule, and we are obliged to abide by it.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give quite briefly my opinion on this issue which is, I feel, very serious indeed. In view of the fact that this report was seen by millions of Canadian taxpayers who submit every year their income tax returns, with the assurance that the information they provide is treated as extremely confidential—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse is dealing with an entirely different subject, for the House is now considering the possibility of a statement the hon. Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) might make concerning a question and answer exchange which took place in Montreal last night. That is one thing. The second concerns income tax returns and their confidential nature: that is something completely separate.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I wish to thank you for your decision, Mr. Speaker. That was my preamble. What I mean to say is this: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) came up with a wise suggestion a while ago, a suggestion with which I fully agree, and I feel that the minister should be given the opportunity to provide the House with full explanations, even if he should require a whole hour to do so, in such a way that this institution may be truly recognized by the public as really responsible.

As far as House leaders are concerned, I feel that we should meet and discharge very wisely our responsibilities. If the minister wants to explain his conduct to the House, he ought to be given the time he needs, which would clarify the situation and rekindle the faith the Canadian people have always had in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly to this very important question now before the House. I listened, as the House did, with great interest to the Acting Prime Minister. I say to him, through you, sir, with respect that I do not think he understands the gravity or the seriousness of the question before the House. If the good name of the RCMP which has been dragged down in the mud by his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is to be cleared of this unprecedented smear by a minister, what better place to do that than here in the House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: It could be done in the House on a statement on motions or on a question of privilege by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That is precisely what the House leader of the official opposition was asking, and the point the House leader for the New Democratic Party was getting at. The central question here, and I say this with great respect, is that of the collective responsibility of ministers of the Crown. Last evening the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as reported over national television, referred to several instances when he was solicitor general and, indeed, referred as well to his predecessor and where he had been given misinformation or information had been withheld from him by the RCMP.

The only way the House has to get at this matter today, according to the ruling of Your Honour, which I respect, is by way of questions to the Acting Prime Minister. The Acting Prime Minister then told the House that on the basis of a conversation he had with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs it is an entirely different situation and there is only one particular instance that was referred to. We have two stories. One was given to the press and reported over national television by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has not been given an opportunity by Your Honour to report to the House, and the other story was given today by the Acting Prime Minister on behalf of his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I realize Your Honour has to make instant judgments from day to day. This is a very serious question. It has seized the attention of the House for the last number of weeks. What we are getting at here is the question of collective responsibility of ministers of the Crown in dealing with a question before the House which has to do with, not one but three ministers still in the cabinet who were responsible for this very question, namely, the question of their dealings with the RCMP on matters of national security.

We are not trying to get at former ministers of the Crown. We are not trying to deal with a minister of the Crown on the basis of his constituency responsibilities, as was the case yesterday in the question put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. If you examine the record, you will find it dealt purely and simply with a matter within the jurisdiction of the minister by virtue of his position in this House as the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo. There is no way in which the question could have been permitted except on that basis. But we are not getting at that.

I can understand that Your Honour would perhaps wish to reflect further on that question by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby so that a dangerous precedent might not be set. But the precedent is well established that ministers of the Crown are collectively responsible and accountable to the House for their actions. However, serious charges have been made, in the presence of the press, by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the former solicitor general—charges which, if substantiated, would result in severe disciplinary action being taken against members of the RCMP; and if they cannot be substantiated, the minister would have only one honourable course to follow, which is to resign.

So there is also the question of the serious charges which have been made by a minister outside this House against the RCMP whose name has been smeared without any substantiation, and I submit that the House should be given an opportunity to hear from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs either by way of a statement on motions or by way of a question of privilege, so that the good name of the RCMP can be cleared in this House by a minister who has smeared it outside the House.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of this matter which has not so far been covered. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, speaking in Montreal, used the words "solicitors general" in the plural form. I take it he was not referring only to his immediate predecessor but to his successor, the present Solicitor General. Is he implying that the present Solicitor General is being misled by his officials?

We want to have confidence in the statements the present Solicitor General makes in the House, and this is hardly possible if there are suspicions that he is being misled by his officials. If the Acting Prime Minister refers this matter to the commission, it will take months before anything is done. What will we do in the meantime while this lack of confidence exists, and what will the RCMP do in the meantime? They can put up no defence for themselves.

We wish to continue to place confidence in the statements made by the Solicitor General. Are we to live under this shadow in the months ahead while statements made by the Solicitor General are under a cloud, as well as the RCMP? I would, therefore, ask Your Honour to rule in favour of the submission made by my leader and by my hon. friend for Grenville-Carleton.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, as so frequently happens, the opposition is basing even the preliminaries of its case upon a report of something which was said outside the House. I would point out that one of the ordinary functions of hon. members opposite is to deal with questions asked directly of ministers in relation to matters which are within their responsibility. Many of us acting in political capacities speak on subjects of many kinds across the country, and it would be quite impossible to deal with those matters in this House.

The issue is this: can questions be put here in relation to matters about which the opposition wishes to ascertain facts? Clearly, they can. The minister can be asked whether there are any new accusations against the Mounted Police: that question could have been directed to the Solicitor General. If the opposition is making an allegation of conduct unbecoming a minister, that is a matter which obviously goes to the Prime Minister or to the Acting Prime Minister. In that case, though, it would as well if they had the full facts, rather than simply basing their position on a press report. I think this is part of our difficulty, this practice of basing questions on what is reported in the press instead of asking questions directly in order to seek information or to determine responsibility.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): With all due respect to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, I think he has missed the point altogether. The question of privilege is not one which deals specifically with press reports. What the hon. member for Peace River and others were dealing with was an answer given by the Acting Prime Minister in which he contended that a former minister can avoid questions in the House of Commons and still give evidence before a royal commission related to matters which had come before him during his tenure of office as solicitor general. He can give evidence before the commission, but we are to be denied the opportunity of hearing him in the House of Commons which, after all, is the supreme commission and the highest court in this country.

The point is whether or not, now that we have made provision in our rules for a minister or for an ex-minister to stand in his place and make a statement related to circumstances which occurred during his tenure of office, we are to be prevented from asking questions even if he is prepared or has the courage to face his peers in this chamber and face the Canadian people. Alternatively, is parliament to have no ability to deal with this issue? Is it one which can be circumvented by the Prime Minister shifting his cabinet around every few months so that no one is accountable for any significant period of time? That is the crux of the situation. We must have the opportunity of addressing ourselves to the issue before the House. The issue of ministerial responsibility involved here is one which transcends the limitations of cabinet portfolios held at a particular time; it is one which does not merely concern one particular portfolio or another.

I grant that the Prime Minister has an overriding capacity in this regard, but when it comes down to the question of ministerial responsibility, to accusations made by a former minister against the public servants under his guidance over a period of time, we ought to have the right to ask that minister to clarify his position or, if he does not, to resign.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on this, a point of order rather than a question of privilege in my view, I would simply like to say a few words to stress what has been recognized by the other side, namely that we have a rule under which a minister does not have to answer questions relating to matters of administration for which he was formerly responsible. Such is the rule, and we must abide by it.

And since the Royal Commission of Inquiry has apparently been taken to task for holding certain privileges, I would like through you, Sir, to remind the House that in the preamble to Privy Council's decision dated July 6, 1977 establishing that Royal Commission, it was provided that the commissioners were appointed under part I of the Inquiries Act. Sections 4 and 5 of that act specifically give commissioners the power of summoning before them any witnesses, and this includes ministers of the Crown. Therefore, in view especially of the last point the last speaker tried to make, I see no reason why the Royal Commission of Inquiry should be taken to task for having that privilege of calling witnesses, because here in this House the minister cannot be questioned on matters of administration for which he is not now responsible. The rules are there. While they may not be perfect, I submit we should not try to change them one by one, as and when we find this advisable from a partisan standpoint.

There is room in this House, as has been advocated for a long time, for in-depth reform. I feel that such changes should be considered in a perfectly objective way, in a totally non-partisan context. Once more, I respectfully submit that what opposition parties have today is a point of order rather a question of privilege. Our rules are clear. A minister does not have to make a statement on matters of his former responsibility. If opposition parties feel they should complain about rules, we on this side are prepared to consider changes of a general nature in various other areas, such as reducing the length of speeches, shortening the parliamentary week schedule from five to four days in order that members may have more time to look after constituency matters. All such changes should in my view be considered in a completely non-partisan context.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would simply note that the opposition feel it is in their interest to rescind the rule preventing a minister from answering questions that pertain to matters of his former responsibility. They would welcome that, because they believe this could be profitable from a partisan point of view. I doubt this would be the case. If, however, changes are desired, we are prepared to discuss them, not in a piece-meal, unruly way, but in good faith and in a totally non-partisan context.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has raised, by way of a question of privilege, a difficulty that has faced us on occasion before. I would like to consider the arguments which have been put forward. I think hon. members will realize, however, that there is a fundamental difficulty for the Chair, in the circumstances, and that is that there is no relief which can be ordered by the Chair. Previous occasions have been cited and there have been applications from both sides to attempt to vary the rules in order to accomplish a certain purpose. In the face of those applications, there are certain things that can be done.

There are other circumstances with which I have been faced: motions attempting to deal with a certain circumstance in a given way. However, at the moment I have no application for specific relief, and it is very difficult for the Chair to invent actions which can be taken and which might attempt to provide relief in certain circumstances. I do confess to some difficulty, as hon. members have expressed today—and this is one of the things I will want to consider—that in the circumstances members of the House are confined in their questions to the current and present ministerial responsibility of each incumbent of a ministerial portfolio. That is clearly understood and no one will put that at issue today. That doctrine is strained greatly when a minister takes advantage outside this House to make statements—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: —about previous ministerial responsibilities. It seems to me that if that doctrine is to prevail, then those responsibilities, if anything is going to be said about them, ought to be said by the present incumbent of that portfolio in order that it can be reported to the House. But, in any case, that is a rather gratuitous observation which I hope is germane to some of the arguments which were presented today. I will want to reserve on this, but I thought before doing so, I might expose to the House some of the difficulties that I face. I will try to be of as much assistance to the House in this matter as I can and rule on the matter in a more definitive way tomorrow.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question on behalf of the tourist industry in Canada, which is experiencing serious economic difficulties. I had a short preamble to explain my question, and then the next thing I knew, you rose to cut me off when I started my question, without any explanation. You recognized another member across the way. If my preamble was too long, sir, I would certainly like it explained. I have watched this matter very closely and I have read questions in Hansard with regard to the length of preamble that certain members are allowed, especially the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I have watched with great interest over the past few months the length of time that he has been allowed to ask questions and make a preamble.

I have not abused the question period since the House resumed on October 18. This is only my second question, and I have had only one motion under Standing Order 43. If certain members are to have special privileges regarding the length of their preambles or the length of their questions, then I think we are entitled to an explanation, sir. I am going to rise tomorrow, and I am asking you now to recognize me tomorrow and allow me to ask my question. When you cut me off, you are cutting off the constituents of Winnipeg South Centre, the Canadian people and the travel industry.

Mr. Speaker: I must apply the same rule to all other members of the House in the situation to which the hon. member referred. He was given the floor, began his question, was permitted a preamble, and then proposed, it seemed to me, to read from a set of documents a resolution by an association. At that point I rose specifically to ask the member to put his question. The member continued, without reference to the fact I was on my feet.

In any case, as he was then moving to put his question, I sat down to permit him to do so. Instead of doing that, he turned around and faced the Chair with the words, "What's the problem?" That, it seems to me, was a somewhat disrespectful way to address the Chair in any circumstances. At that point I recognized another member, and not previously. I had no intention of stopping the member putting his question until he did that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOGAN—COAL INDUSTRY IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I notified you previously that I wished to raise this matter when the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was in the House. With your permission, I would like to do so now. In order to lay the basis for my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and in order to guide you in deciding whether I really have a question of privilege in fact, I have to quote briefly from Hansard of November 9, 1977, page 759.

We are slow in developing some of our coal mines. That is one aspect which could be improved.

MR. BLACKBURN: Especially in Cape Breton.

MR. HORNER: Especially in Cape Breton because of the costs, and I think I should say perhaps because of the 'inappreciability' of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job. That is a serious accusation.

MR. BLACKBURN: What's that?

MR. HORNER: Read it in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, I want to distinguish between two things that the minister said about Cape Breton as far as the opening of the coal industry is concerned. If he had remained with a question of fact that because of high costs—as he implied in the past—it is very difficult to open new coal mines, then he is obviously correct and is correct up to this day. The federal government has, since 1927, because of high costs in connection with Cape Breton coal mines, given subventions to the private owners who own the coal industry. That was done until the federal government took over the industry under Devco in 1967. But I remind the hon. minister that costs are relative, and the minister in charge of DREE said in Edmonton two or three weeks ago, at a national coal conference, that he expected that by the end of this decade the coal mines in Cape Breton would be a viable economic operation.

I go further and suggest that if what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the head of the petroleum institute of Venezuela have been telling us is true, that we are possibly going to pay $20 a barrel for crude oil by 1987, then the price of Cape Breton coal will be low in comparison and the government will be making all kinds of money on the Cape Breton coal mines. That is not the question of privilege, but I wanted to make the distinction because of what the minister introduced as a question of fact.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that the inappreciability of Cape Bretoners for the retention of their jobs is one of the causes for not opening new coal mines. He said that in the House. This is a serious accusation. As is usual in this House, when the minister speaks, unless he is reading from a speech prepared by civil servants he gives no factual evidence for his straight from the lip, wild generalizations and accusations.

In fairness to the many Cape Bretoners who are unemployed, to the people of an historic area of Canada who have fought a hard fight for economic security all through this century, with thousands of them having been killed or maimed for life in these coal mines, the minister owes this House, the citizens of Canada and the people of Cape Breton an explanation of his evidence for the statement "the 'inappreciability' of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job" as one of the reasons the government is slow in developing coal mines, especially in Cape Breton.

The minister should know there has been no major strike in the Cape Breton coalfields since 1947. The minister is a lover of free enterprise, and he should know that the days lost through illegal walk-outs at the Appalatian coalfields in the United States, which are privately owned, have been about 500 per cent higher, on a per capita basis, over the last five years than in the Cape Breton coalfields. I therefore challenge the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to back up his accusations with solid, factual evidence. I personally, am getting a little sick and tired of hearing him in this House acting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has been given a pretty good opportunity to make his point, and it seems to have been well made. I wonder if the minister should now be allowed to reply.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to clear up the uncertainty and concern I caused the hon. member and the many friends I have on Cape Breton Island.

An hon. Member: You don't have many now.

Mr. Horner: I have. I was down yesterday—

An hon. Member: Dalhousie gave you a rousing boo.

Mr. Horner: I was speaking at length about the whole question of energy. I did mention we were slow in developing some of our coal mines and that is one aspect that has to be improved. I have long been a believer that more coal mines could be opened and developed in Cape Breton, particularly now that coal has to compete with highcost oil, not the 80-cent a barrel oil it was competing with a number of years ago. The hon. member was reading a statement and someone interrupted by saying "Especially in Cape Breton", and I agreed, especially in Cape Breton. I went on to refer to the extremely high cost in respect of some of the old underground mines. I should say, perhaps, that I spoke of the "inappreciability" of the Cape Bretoner. I want to point out to the hon. member that I did not say the "Cape Breton miner"; I said the Cape Bretoner generally.

An hon. Member: And what does that mean?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member now wants to know what I meant. I will tell him. I did not say the "inappreciability" of the Cape Breton miner; I said "the 'inappreciability' of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job"—"as a coal miner," I probably should have added. I was referring to jobs as coal miners. Coal mining is a little bit like farming; some people look upon it as being the last job on earth that they would take. It is down at the bottom of the scale. The coal miner is often regarded as some kind of a serf in our society. I have never believed that. That is what I was referring to. The coal miner today should have a very noble place, particularly in coal mining areas such as Cape Breton. Nova Scotia now does not have as high a utilization of coal for the generation of electricity as it should. It does not have as high a utilization of coal for this purpose as does even the province of Alberta.

I was pleased to be down in Nova Scotia yesterday when the Premier of that province announced the opening of a new strip mine in that area which will take out an estimated one million tons of coal a year. I want particularly to bring that to the attention of hon. members. That will do much for the coal mining industry and the coal miner. In addition, on the mainland of Nova Scotia, the Wimpey Coal Company Limited, which is under contract to do strip mining of some coal there—and this government has encouraged both projects—will take out some thing like 400,000 tons of coal.

I should go on to say, in addition, Mr. Speaker, that this government has paid for drilling exploration off the coast of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton to find more, as well the depth and quantity of coal deposits in Cape Breton. Approximately three-quarters of the cost of that exploration has been paid for by this government, and the exploration results are very encouraging. It is my belief that more underground coal mines can be opened up which will be far more efficient than some of the old ones now in production.

Having said that, I hope I have cleared up any misunderstanding that might have been left by that remark in reference to "inappreciability". I was not referring to the coal miner but to the Cape Breton and Nova Scotia people, because to me it has been an appalling situation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: It is an appalling situation to me that the province of Nova Scotia generates 65 per cent to 85 per cent of its electricity through the use of imported, high-cost oil. More of the electricity should be developed through the use of coal, and I am pleased to see that the province is moving in that direction by opening up these two strip mines from which will be taken out a total of 1.4 million tons of coal per year for the development of electricity.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I presume that the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys wanted to support the original point. I did fail to recognize him when I gave the floor to the minister, but the hon. member may want to make his intervention now.

Mr. Muir: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did try to catch your eye at the time, but you allowed the minister to speak. I want to join wholeheartedly the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, who I think did a very good job. The minister, during his reply, squirmed, wiggled, twisted and turned all over the damned place and never did get around to explaining what he meant by "the inappreciability of the Cape Bretoner for the retention of his job". He said he was not referring to the miner; he was referring to all Cape Bretoners. Then just before he concluded his remarks he said it was all Nova Scotians.

I proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 yesterday. I waited through Monday and Tuesday and the minister was not here. Some days back I raised the same question. He was very kind. I reminded him of having been my former seatmate, and told him of the problems of Cape Breton. I tried to tutor him on the problems of that area. He agreed that we have problems. He was very kind, yes. He said at that time he was aware of the problems of deep mines in Nova Scotia, as well as the strip mining, and said he would encourage the development of both, etc.

He said, in reply to another question, "My long association with the hon. member has made me very, very aware of the problems of Cape Breton. He can rest assured that the representation will be noted and remembered". Then he changed, on November 8, as the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton-East Richmond said—it is right in Hansard—and admitted this when he said, "That is a serious accusation". Well, if you are going to put your tongue in high gear when what little brain you have is still in park, you can expect statements like this.

Indeed, in addition to that I asked yesterday in my proposed motion whether the minister would make a public apology to the people of Cape Breton. My good friend who sits over there now should know what problems we have in Cape Breton. As one who has gone through a mine explosion, has been carried out of the mines twice and had his spine fractured in half a dozen places, I know what these men have gone through, as referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. There are miners suffering from pneumonomelanosis, silicosis, who have had arms and legs amputated, yet here we have a minister of the Crown who has the gall to make a statement such as he has made. He intimated that Cape Bretoners are lazy. Then he said it was not the Cape Breton miner, just Cape Bretoners; and he went on to say it was Nova Scotians. What can we take from that?

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, according to today's press, the minister was in a bearpit session last night at Dalhousie University where he reiterated, according to the press, his statement about the inappreciability of the Cape Breton coal miner for the retention of his job. In addition, the minister said that Cape Bretoners have an aversion to working in the coal mines. Is the hon. gentleman aware that the latest information from the personnel office of the Cape Breton Development Corporation shows there are between 3,000 and 4,000 applications for employment in the coal mines of Cape Breton, whether they are strip mines, deep mines or anything else? Is he not aware of that? If there is an aversion to working in the coal mines and guys do not want to work there, why would they be applying for jobs in the coal mines?

The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond and myself receive telephone calls, letters and other communications day after day from these people asking us to please find them jobs in the coal mines. I want to know what this hon. gentleman is going to do with his great, strong, loud voice, shouting from the lip rather than the hip, to get us some more money so the Cape Breton Development Corporation can open up more mines. He talks about drilling. We know about that. We need more mines operating. We know about the strip mining, and that is okay as long as they replace the overburden; but there is no work on deck.

The minister certainly owes Cape Bretoners an apology. He talks about his dear friends in Cape Breton. From the reports I have been getting on the telephone, by radio and television, he has no friends in Cape Breton and will not unless he straightens out this matter. We are just a bunch of idiots down there, as far as he is concerned. We are lazy, and nobody will work. If this government will provide the work, there are plenty of people down there who will work.

An hon. Member: Withdraw, Jack.

• (1602)

Mr. Horner: What the hon. member has just said is completely false. Never at any time have I said that they were lazy and would not work. In the same speech I referred to the difficulty that Cape Breton miners have, and how much better off they were than the workers in the fluorspar industry in southern Newfoundland because the aluminum company wants to close it down. It is the only one in existence in Canada. I see tremendous potential for the development of the coal industry in Cape Breton.

I just want to add on thing to enlighten members of the House about the seriousness of the situation. When I looked at Canada's coal figures and saw that western coal was moved through the Panama Canal to Nova Scotia this past year, I was both alarmed and concerned. That is a serious situation. Certainly, I am pleased to see the opening up of the strip mine and pleased to see the results of some of the exploration and testing which has been done off the coast. I believe that an underground mine can be opened up which would be far more efficient than the mines that are now operating there.

Mr. Muir: That's right; they sure can be opened up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): While it may have escaped everyone's attention, today is Thursday although it seems like Friday. I wonder, therefore, if I could ask my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, what we will be doing today, tomorrow and next week. Could he give us some indication of what will happen in terms of government business when Bill C-11 is given second reading?

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we will continue today, and tomorrow if necessary, with the second reading of Bill C-11, the income tax bill. If the second reading debate should end quickly, there has been agreement, after the usual consultations with our hon. friends opposite, to defer any votes on second reading of Bill C-11 until Monday of next week. If the second reading debate on Bill C-11 does end before any votes can be taken, we will proceed to the bill on CALURA, Bill C-7, the bill on the comptroller general of Canada, Bill C-10, and the bill concerning petroleum corporations, Bill C-12—but not necessarily in that order. I would like to tell the House that next Wednesday, November 23, will be the second allotted day for this supply period.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was somewhat concerned when the parliamentary secretary said the bills would be called, but not necessarily in the order in which he presented them. Do I have his undertaking that he will at least consult us with respect to the order of business? Is he saying to us that we will not be going into committee of the whole stage, clause by clause consideration, of Bill C-11 when we give the bill second reading?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That depends on whether or not there is a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, obviously, if we are to study Bills C-7, C-10 or C-12, before choosing one, we will consult the hon. House leaders of the various opposition parties.

As for deciding whether we shall proceed with the study of those bills immediately upon completion of second reading of Bill C-11, before going into committee of the whole, it is much too early to say. I have indicated that if we reach second reading of Bill C-11 today or tomorrow, the vote will be deferred till Monday next. But I cannot say now what will follow its second reading, that is whether the House will go into committee of the whole or whether we will take up another bill. It is too early to say.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order on the matter of the business of the House. Yesterday, in Montreal, when the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was speaking to an assembled group on the matter of the conduct of the business of the House and future business of the House, the minister, in answer to a question put to him as to when phase two of the competition bill would be introduced, stated that there was an all-party agreement that there would be no hearings on phase two of the competition legislation when it was reintroduced to the House, which he anticipated would be next week.

We have made no such commitment to the minister, and I conveyed this fact to him yesterday. His reply was that he consulted the deputy House leader immediately prior to going to the meeting in Montreal and had been told that this was the case. When that bill was put before the House prior to the House rising for the summer recess, the matter was discussed briefly in committee and we informed the chairman of the committee, who is now Minister of State for Multiculturalism and deputy House leader, that under no circumstances would we forgo public hearings on a bill of this nature. I just want to put it officially on the record that we have made no such commitment at any time. In fact, we indicated very strongly to the contrary, that we would not proceed in this manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I should like to claim the right for the minister to make himself acquainted with the observations of the hon. member and answer them if he so wishes, upon his return to the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 169, 397 and 398.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend to statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to wonder whether I would manage to get the floor this afternoon, because I have a plane to catch in 40 minutes. But I still feel that I have something to contribute to this debate. When I called it six o'clock last evening, aside from the fact that it was 6.30 p.m., I was speaking about the size and depth of the borrowing authority which is being sought in this bill. I understand, although I am not a legislative lawyer, that there could be some question about trying to insert borrowing authority into a bill of this sort. I think that matter might be raised in the House by other members, or in committee of the whole.

The point I was making last night was that some $9 billion was being sought under this authority, and I offered to describe to hon. members just how much $9 billion was. I am not sure that we are all aware of how much it is; therefore, I made a few inquiries. According to my information, which is derived from the Bank of Canada, our bills are printed on paper which is three and three-quarter thousandths of an inch thick; that is, by my interpretation, .00375 of an inch. So I said to myself, suppose I had one $1,000 bill printed on the same kind of paper. I do not know how many people in the House have ever seen a $1,000 bill. I do not know that I have ever seen one. I see there are some members who have seen them: they are all on the other side. In any event, whether or not they have seen them, these bills are .00375 of an inch thick. If we were to put a thousand of these bills together into a pile amounting to $1 million, the pile would be 3.75 inches high.

● (1612)

That is not very much, but what about $1 billion? We would have to pile a thousand of those $1 million piles on top of each other, and if we were standing on the balcony around the Peace Tower and reached into the pile, we would be reaching into it at about two-thirds of the way up, but we could do so only if the pile did not tip over. We should not try to tip it over, because it would make a mess on the street below. Normally we consult Beauchesne with regard to our rules, but the same Arthur Beauchesne also wrote about Canada's Parliament Buildings and he described the Peace Tower in this way:

At approximately the two hundred foot level and opening of the clock chamber are four balconies—

I said that each $1,000 pile would be 3.75 inches high. If we multiply that by one thousand, we get 3,750 inches. If we divide that by 12, we get something in the order of 312 feet of $1,000 bills. At the 200-foot level of the Peace Tower we would be only two-thirds of the way up that pile. We are not talking today, however, about $1 billion; we are talking about the authority to borrow $9 billion, so we have to multiply by nine. How much is that? Instead of piling those bills up that way—because we could never keep the pile balanced—we would have to lay it on its side, putting the packages on their edges and stretch it out that way. Those packages of $1,000 bills would stretch over half a mile across the countryside.

I mentioned last evening that $9 billion was approximately the budget when this government came to power in 1968. Now it is asking for authority to borrow $9 billion because its indebtedness this year is going to be a little more than $9 billion. After ten years, this government is seeking to borrow an amount equal to $1 million packets stretched half a mile, standing on edge. That is a lot of money. On page 84 of the latest public accounts we can find the size of the national debt. We are going to add $9 billion to the national debt if this bill passes.

In 1968, when this government came to power, the national debt stood at $32 billion. In 1976, the last year for which figures are available, the national debt was $71.7 billion. When we reduce these figures to the per capita debt of each one of our constituents—not just the taxpaying constituents but even the small ones who do not yet have the right to vote—we find that the per capita debt in 1968 stood at over $1,500. Today, it stands at over $3,000. These figures are absolutely staggering; therefore, we must look very carefully at this provision. This is a request for borrowing authority to be found at page 210 of Bill C-11. We must look at it very carefully before approving it, because the government is asking for what can only be described as phenomenal borrowing powers.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to contribute to this debate, in keeping with the recent ruling handed down by that eminent jurist, Mr. Justice Evans, I ask Your Honour to keep strict and assiduous control of the television switches in this House. In case I make any culpable statements, privileged here but not beyond, I hope Your Honour will turn off that media so that the CBC or the CTV will not be sued in our courts of law for the illegal dissemination of my remarks.

For my opening remarks on this bill, I will go straight to the opening statement of the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when he spoke on the bill last Monday, the seventh day of this month. As recorded at page 644 of Hansard for that date, the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, Bill C-11 is now before the House for second reading. Its purpose is twofold: first, to implement amendments to the Income Tax Act as announced by myself on October 20 and as put forward by my predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), in his March 31 budget; second, to increase government borrowing authority.

To deal first with the second part of the minister's statement, I do not think anyone in this House can seriously consider extending this government's authority to borrow. This government has overborrowed. It has abused the use of taxpayers' money. It has overspent. The last thing we should be considering at this time, and the last thing which I, in all conscience, could agree to at this time would be to give this government carte blanche to push us further into debt. Any wage earner in Canada who manages his or her finances as poorly as this government does, or who has as much difficulty meeting payments on debts, would be the poorest risk for making further loans. Such a person would have to be either a fool or a dreamer to think that any lending institution would advance more money—in effect, to throw still more money after bad.

This government should not be coming to this House for an extension of borrowing power, especially at this time when the state of our economy is sick. This government is already spending money we do not have, money that is not earned and in some cases money which has not yet been accounted for. Nowhere in the opening remarks of the Minister of Finance can I find one shred of justification for allowing the government to borrow more money. The minister brought his colleague, the former minister of finance, into his opening remarks, perhaps hoping that we had forgotten that the previous minister virtually wrecked the Canadian economy. He at least put the finishing touches to a national economy which has been going downhill steadily for the past seven or eight years. For this minister to suggest that he needs more borrowing power to finance programs initiated by the previous minister of finance is less than credible.

The minister really should have started from scratch unless, of course, he needs someone with whom to share his blame. When one observes the game of musical chairs the cabinet has been playing over the years, it seems that every minister of the Crown is constantly seeking someone with whom to share blame for this thing or that. If the cloud hanging over a minister gets too big or too heavy, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) simply shifts him sideways out of the portfolio and slides someone else in. One thing which can be said of the previous minister of finance is that he was so sure he was heading in the right direction that he just went on and on with his vehicle stuck in reverse until the Prime Minister finally steered him to the side of the road and got him out of the driver's seat. However, I might add that happened four or five years too late.

The Minister of Finance said in his speech that Bill C-11 is designed to increase government borrowing authority by $9 billion in new money—I repeat, $9 billion in new money. He was quick to add that this was in addition to the authority presently vested in the government to borrow to repay maturing debt. So all we are doing is trying to raise money to pay the interest on interest. That is very poor economics.

I wish the minister had taken the opportunity to bring us up to date on the present state of the gross national debt. That is something this House does not talk about enough, the state of our gross national debt. That is the load our children, our grandchildren and our great grandchildren will have to bear. Perhaps the minister will take this as notice and provide that information to the House in the course of the debate of Bill C-11. I propose to speak of it later in my remarks. I know that the level of the national debt is shocking.

The minister stated that the government has relented in part and will not ask the tax collector to the graveside to collect proceeds of life insurance policies from survivors. The government was fully prepared to do just that in the original draft of this legislation, as hon. members will recall. The government backed down to some degree following a barrage of protest from the official opposition and people all across the country. The efforts of the official opposition were largely responsible for the government backing down on the proposal to tax proceeds from life insurance policy death benefits. However, the government saw too much of a good thing, an easy grab, in the proceeds from life insurance policies to back off completely. While it has retreated from its previous ghoulish position at the graveside, it has not retreated from the field. It is still in the cemetery. I should like to return to this item later.

I should like to address myself again to the minister's opening statement and lay to rest the fiction that he is not planning to table a new budget. In response to repeated requests from the official opposition for a budget that would come to grips with unemployment and inflation, the tumbling Canadian dollar and a multitude of other economic woes, the Minister of Finance insists that a new budget is not needed at this time and is not forthcoming. What are we debating today, then? Is it a near budget, a mini-budget or pseudo budget? Call it what you will, it is a budget.

The Minister of Finance ties this bill directly to the budget tabled by the previous minister in March, 1977, according to his opening statement on November 7. I prefer to entitle this a pseudo budget, using the definition of the word contained in Webster's Seventh Collegiate Dictionary. The word "pseudo" is defined as "sham". It is a sham budget. The most we can expect is the government's own expectation of a $9 billion borrowing authority if this bill is passed—$9 billion further into debt. Yet the government denies that this is a budget. Perhaps the reason the minister will not call it a budget is that a budget is expected to contain provisions to improve the state of the economy and improve the lot of the average Canadian, usually coming at intervals of one parliament at a time. That is not the case here. Another reason is that a budget debate would open up new areas of discussion that the government would like to avoid. The fact remains that this is nothing but a sham budget.

To get back to the question of taxing the benefits of life insurance policies, life insurance in our society has always been the last refuge of the lower and middle income earners, in more ways than one. I am one of those, so I speak from experience. Life insurance is the best way for a poor person to save money. It always has been, and I hope it always will be, available to the Canadian people, untramelled and untouched by the long fingers of government. There is the all-important aspect of the death benefits which help the survivors to recover from the shock of losing a breadwinner as well as a loved one. This refuge is slowly being eroded by a government that is totally unfeeling and completely avaricious. The name of the game, where this government is concerned, is to reach out and grab, no matter what the consequences to the individual.

Another way in which life insurance has been a boon to the lowly paid wage earner has been the provision whereby a portion of the cash value of a policy that has been in effect for a number of years can be borrowed, using the policy as security. Tens of thousands of policyholders through the years have used this provision to obtain money to ease them through a financial crisis.

Always on the lookout for a quick buck, the mandarins in the tax bureau have alerted the government to a so-called loophole which they say will yield so many million dollars in taxes if it is closed off. I refer to the alleged "gain" provision in the insurance policy loan provision, whereby the difference between the cash surrender value of a policy and the premiums paid is construed as income for tax purposes.

That is utter nonsense and does not stand up even under cursory examination. A loan is a loan, whatever the manner in which it is made, and it has to be repaid. If it is only for the amount of premiums paid, plus accrued interest, or if it is for an amount that is greater than the amount of premiums paid, it must be repaid at one time or another. The ultimate value of a life insurance policy is the amount of the death benefit paid on the death of the insured. Any outstanding loan on a policy, no matter how it has been described or computed, is deducted from the benefits payable to the survivor and so, Mr. Speaker, at some time along the way the loans are repaid.

All of us here know that the minister did not prepare this bill, or budget, whichever it is. It was prepared by high-priced mandarins in the Department of Finance. I do not expect a $50,000 or $60,000 a year mandarin to have any feelings for the plight of the lowly wage earner. The value and worth of those mandarins to the government is to find new sources of revenue for the hungry boss. When they come up with a new gimmick, they get a pat on the head and a longer lease on their cushy jobs. The Minister of Finance, on the other hand, is—like myself—an elected representative of the people. The minister's riding is very much like my own, comprised largely of wage earners and farmers, and it is a long way from being a Rosedale or a Mount Royal. The minister must surely have more feeling for the little man than a mandarin, insulated as he is from the realities of earning a meagre wage or salary.

The minister should never have approved any part of this bill dealing with the taxation of life insurance policies. I know that part of the bill evolved before he was moved to his new portfolio, but all the same he should have deleted this section from the bill presently before us. This whole section dealing with the taxation of insurance policy benefits is shifty, devious and totally unwarranted, and it should be struck from the bill. I make my recommendation as a result of over 100 letters that I have received from constituents.

I should like to turn to the provisions for tax rebates outlined in this bill. Here, again, there is an obvious effort on the part of the government to deceive. There is no clearcut policy in this section that spells out the manner in which the rebate will be effected. The minister proposes to put the onus on employers to give the rebate to employees. It is not a directive, but is more in the way of a request. It is rather like saying to the employer that it would be very nice if some way could be found to give each employee the $100 rebate, which amounts to less than $2 per week and which is not very much.

Without specific direction on the manner in which the rebate will be made, it could, and probably will, be paid in dribs and drabs—not in a lump sum which would have the most desirable effect on our public economy and the economy of the recipient. The only way such a rebate would have a stimulating effect on the economy, especially such a small amount as $100, would be for taxpayers to receive the money in a lump sum. It is very likely that having an extra $100 which is not committed to a specific purpose, such as paying the rent or making a car payment, would encourage people to make purchases that have been delayed. I am thinking of hard goods such as refrigerators, stoves and other appliances of the larger and more expensive type.

This would help to wipe out the inventories of appliances that exist throughout the country, and stimulate new production. I do not believe spending by individuals of $100 or $200 on necessities, or even luxuries, would have very much effect on the level of inflation. I cannot accept the proposal of the Minister of Finance to defer the tax rebate until next year. If we approve the rebate, let us make it effective with the 1977 taxation year and let us decide ourselves how it will be accomplished. Leaving it to employers would result in the money being dribbled out piecemeal in scores of different ways, and it would be highly improper.

It is not the proper function of the private sector to engage in the distribution, allocation or in any other type of management of tax moneys. The only way in which the private sector can engage in the management of taxes is to collect taxes in the name of the Crown. It is for ourselves, the elected representatives of the people, to decide how tax moneys are to be distributed and allocated.

Another section of this bill which troubles me is the one dealing with changes in the rules affecting the operation of the registered home ownership saving plans. The government has resorted to overkill in an attempt to close off a few loopholes in the original program. Tens of thousands of Canadians have invested in the registered home ownership savings plan since 1974 in the honest belief that it would be an ongoing program. There is no reason why it should not continue to be an ongoing program with firm rules and guidelines.

In the two-year period of 1974-1975, 597,000 Canadians invested a total of $564 million in the home ownership savings plan. Seventy-four per cent of those people had annual incomes of less than $15,000. They invested in registered home ownership savings plans under a set of rules that had been established and approved by the federal government. Granted, we in the official opposition warned in 1974, and on subsequent occasions, that there were loopholes in that legislation and that the way had been left open for certain types of abuses. But our warnings and advice were ignored. The government mandarins have discovered a way to put the tax bite on all holders of registered home ownership savings plans, simply by changing the rules. These are drastic changes, and thousands of innocent and honest Canadians are liable to be caught in the squeeze.

This is criminally deceptive, and I would venture to guess that the Department of Finance mandarins have already computed to the dollar how much additional tax revenue the government will be able to squeeze out of these unsuspecting investors. There is no doubt in my mind that this is a budget we are debating. All it needs is for the Minister of Finance to admit he wanted to table a budget, but wanted at the same time to avoid the responsibility of bringing in a budget with some meaning.

There are no real cures in this budget for any of the pressing economic problems we are facing today. Most of the provisions in this bill are mere window-dressing for the central purpose of the document, and that is, to extend the government's risky, flimsy line of credit. I hope it will not be necessary for the government to call the International Monetary Fund into our financial problem before the spring, but it could happen. I am not fooled by it; I am appalled and disgusted.

I should like to make a few remarks on the procedure introduced by the government to increase its borrowing authority, the main purpose of which is purported to be to amend the Income Tax Act. On page 646 of Hansard for November 7, 1977, the Minister of Finance is reported as saying:

> The government intends to introduce a bill soon providing a new procedure which will give ample opportunity for normal debate. In the meantime, there is need for an increase in the borrowing authority.

The minister was referring to his earlier remarks recorded on the same page when he stated that the Financial Administration Act provides that no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of parliament. That is pretty straightforward. I do not think there has ever been any doubt on the part of members of this House as to what that means. The minister's alleged concern that this House should have ample opportunity to debate a government request for borrowing authority is specious. We are debating such a request at the present time although it is neither the proper time nor the proper vehicle for such a debate. More than one hon. member of this House has brought this point to Your Honour's attention prior to my doing so. We are debating a bill that seeks to accomplish a matter that should properly be debated as a separate issue, not in the context of amending the Income Tax Act.

● (1642)

We are, in effect, telling the Minister of Finance and the government that they are off base. I have to wonder if the minister hoped we would overlook the fact that he had slipped the request for a $9 billion extension of the government's line of credit into this bill, or if he expected us to just treat it as casually as he seems to treat it.

I would like to throw in an aside at this point, Mr. Speaker, based on a press release circulated a couple of days ago by the Canadian International Development Agency. That agency has just granted long-term loans, no doubt at a very low rate of interest, totalling $20 million to the African country of Zaire.

In addition, CIDA is throwing in an outright gift to that country of $7 ½ million. This money is intended to assist Zaire to develop its forest industry. The press release noted that Zaire is one of the Francophone countries.

The Canadian forest industry is one of the largest employers in some of our provinces, notably British Columbia, and that industry is in serious difficulty. The Canadian forest industry is presently laying off workers and the immediate and future prospects of that industry are anything but bright. This loan and grant to Zaire reminds me of the CIDA loan to Cuba a few years ago, a matter that I brought to the attention of this House. Originally, CIDA had offered Cuba an interest-free loan of $10 million in addition to some millions in outright grants. I objected to this practice and the very modest interest rate of 3 per cent which was applied to the Cuban loan.

The then minister of finance, Mr. Turner, was questioned in the House more than once on this matter. I questioned him. He managed to put on a ridiculously low interest rate of 3 per cent. That is what the government is doing with our money. As the hon. member said, it was done so that Cuba could send troops to Angola. That is what this government does with the taxpayers' money. That is why it is in the worst financial position of any government since the first one in 1867.

We are debating the question of raising more taxes and giving the government authority to borrow an additional $9 billion. I insist that that money should be spent on programs and projects that will further the interests of Canadians first, the lumber industry in British Columbia for example, and if there is any left we can then decide who else in the world is entitled to the money raised by taxing Canadian citizens.

Canada is in a bad position. Yesterday I noted an article by the eminent writer and publisher, Richard S. Malone, in the Globe and Mail. I quote from that article:

> Scandals, kickbacks, wiretaps—Almost since its inception the Trudeau government has been guilty of shabby behaviour.
> Each week in Ottawa as more charges are made of waste, scandal and cover-ups, the conviction grows that our nation despite all its advantages of wealth and social advancement has lost direction and is sick with an ancient disease. The symptoms are inflation, unemployment, disunity, a falling dollar, enormous debts and public apathy.
>
> Other countries throughout history have suffered from a similar sickness.

Some have never recovered. Malone goes on to state the serious symptoms of this dilemma which faces us. I quote:

> We are still in the grip of serious inflation. We spend recklessly and borrow mindlessly committing our children to a debt for years to come.

That is timely. Here the government is asking for $9 billion to pay interest on interest.

> We price ourselves out of world markets and pay the penalty of high unemployment, again at the expense of our youth.
> We buy the dream of having the highest wage rates in the world by printing more dollars, issuing more bonds and borrowing more money abroad.
>
> We crowd to our airports complaining of hard times as we make our way to Hawaii or California, piling up a tourist deficit of more than a billion dollars and promising to double it next time around.
>
> We accept a budget deficit this year that will be greater than our entire budget was less than ten years ago.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

> We countenance rates of crime, drug addiction, child abuse, violence and sexual perversion that soar to staggering levels.
> We endure scandals in public affairs that make headlines every week.

That is all I want to quote from Mr. Malone. I am sure all members will agree with that article, regardless of their political leanings. I add to that one short sentence: a scandal a day is the Liberal way. There is one more point I would like to make before I conclude. I draw the attention of the House to still another breach of faith on the part of this government. Earlier this year the government sought the help of Canadians to reduce the waste of energy, specifically to insulate their homes and thereby reduce the consumption of home heating oil. The government offered grants of up to $350 toward the cost of insulation. I compliment them on that policy. I agree with it. Many of my constituents have taken advantage of it. Some failed to do so after receiving the particulars. After the program was well under way we found that the grants have to be added to a person's income for tax purposes. It is just a little thing, perhaps, but it does add another straw to the camel's back. I do not think those grants should be taxable.

I wish to conclude my remarks by saying a few words about the national or public debt. I asked the Minister of Finance to enlighten us on that score, but so far I have not heard from the minister or his parliamentary secretary. I received some information since then which I will relate to the House. As of March 31 this year, the gross national debt stood at $67,075 million. Inasmuch as the present request for $9 billion in additional borrowing authority is in addition to the new tax revenue sought in this same bill, we can assume that the gross national debt for the coming year will reach or even exceed $75 billion. Interest paid this year on the national debt was $5,350 million, or 13 per cent of our total national budget. As of March 31 of this year, Canada's net recorded assets totalled $37.5 billion. This means we have a net national debt of $29.5 billion. To sum it up, we owe $29.5 billion more than we are worth. Mr. Speaker, no business of any kind could survive under those conditions.

When the Prime Minister came to power nine years ago, the gross national debt amounted to $39.2 billion, part of which was due to the financing of two world wars and two lesser wars. In just nine years of Trudeaucracy, as someone termed it, the spending policies of the government have increased the national debt more than 100 per cent. Added to this is the fact that we now have a 90-cent dollar. We are in a hole there, too. For every cent by which the Canadian dollar is depressed, the country loses $60 million a year on the basis of our present adverse trade balance. Thus, if our trade balance position does not improve—and there is not much encouragement to believe it will—it is going to cost us $600 million a year to keep this country solvent. That is the result of nine years of Trudeaucracy under this Socialist-Liberal government which the Canadian people have had to endure.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot, in all conscience, support any part of the bill before us. I would support the tax cuts to our citizens if they were meaningful and if I knew how the tax cuts and rebates were going to be accomplished. But I cannot support the government's request for an increase of $9 billion in borrowing authority. I strongly urge that the provision to this effect be removed from the bill, after which the minister might bring it before us again in a proper manner so that the elected representatives of the people could deal with it.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill which is of extreme importance to the Canadian people. It is important for what it does to them as well as for them. I should like, in the course of my remarks, to draw attention to areas in which I think the budget bill is inadequate, and to propose some alternative ideas for the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in the hope that when we get to committee of the whole we might prevail upon the government to bring forth some meaningful amendments.

When the opposition comments on bills brought before the House, we often hear from the Liberal benches that we are negative, that we are preaching gloom and doom and that everything, really, is pretty good in the context of the world situation. We are told that Canadian problems are not of our own making, but that somehow they are the result of world economic conditions which we are unable to change. I do not accept that kind of philosophy because, surely, a government, by virtue of its economic, taxation, employment and trade policies, plays a highly significant part in determining a nation's affairs. It is precisely because I am concerned about the sad state of our economy that I wish to criticize the measures we see before us in this bill and other measures put forward by the government.

I do not accept the argument that Canada is doing well by comparison with other countries, when I find that other industrialized nations, during the period in which the Prime Minister has been in office, have held their unemployment rates to a figure consistently below one-half of Canada's, and when I see that our inflation rate, despite controls, is higher than that of the United States without a control program. But I am most deeply disturbed by the lack of attention on the part of the Minister of Finance to the high degree of unemployment facing the nation. Unemployment is the number one problem, yet somehow I do not think the message has come through to the policymakers on the other side.

Over the past few years we have witnessed a preoccupation with inflation and with policies to control it. Unfortunately, those policies have failed. Inflation is still running at 9 per cent, well above the government's target. At the same time, the anti-inflation program has destroyed our economy to the extent that there is tremendously high unemployment—presently more than one million Canadians, taking into account the hidden unemployment figures. I shall attempt to show that the policies placed before us will not reduce unemployment, as the government says, but will only mean further hardship for millions of Canadians—the unemployed and their families—over the winter months. I want to outline some of my reasons for believing this policy will not work, and propose alternative plans.

I see by the clock that it is now time to move on to other business temporarily, so I will call it five o'clock and resume later this evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to private members' business as listed on today's order paper. As there are no notices of motions (papers) listed, the House will proceed to private bills and resume debate on Bill C-1001.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL CANADA

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. O'Connell that Bill C-1001, respecting Bell Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. When the House was last considering this bill, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) had the floor at six o'clock. I want to let him know he has about two minutes of his time left.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I think I have more than two minutes left. I looked up the Hansard for that day, and it was pretty obvious to me that I had not spoken for 18 minutes. I said when I last spoke that we were opposing this bill because what is being suggested here would give a tremendous amount of power to the company to do things it has not been able to do until now. I said that while I thought the company was very good at protecting its officers and its shareholders, it was not very concerned about protecting the users of the telephone service in Ontario and Quebec. I should like to quote from an article reporting a statement by the president of the Public Service Alliance, Mr. Andy Stewart. I quote again, Mr. Speaker, because I want to correct an impression I left. I quote the article as follows:

When the chief executive officer of Bell Canada retired, Stewart said, he received a lump sum payment of $575,000, was made a member of the board of directors at $201,000 a year and was guaranteed a $100,000-a-year pension when he fully retired.

Mr. Speaker, I was able to get access, and I am not suggesting for a moment that it is difficult to get access, to a page from the annual report of Bell Canada for 1976. This page deals with remuneration, direct remuneration and the estimated annual benefits upon retirement of senior Bell Canada officials. I would like to quote from a page of the annual report of Bell Canada for 1976. I wish, Mr. Speaker, that we had the right they have in the United States Congress to put something on the record, because this page is really a table which is much clearer when looked at than when read as Hansard will report it. The page has three columns, with three titles at the top: first, name and capacities in which direct remuneration was received; second, aggregate direct remuneration; third, estimated annual benefits upon retirement. Then it lists a number of people, begining with R. C. Scrivener, and then there is an explanation:

(January 1 to April 30) chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Bell Canada; director of NTL. (May 2 to December 31) chairman of the board and chief executive officer of NTL: director of Bell Canada, Nedco, NTL.

Aggregate direct remuneration was $201,000. Then there is a footnote, and I will read it in full:

Includes Bell Canada's contributions under the employees' savings plan (1970). In addition to such remuneration, eligible officers who are enrolled in Bell Canada's employees' savings plan, as in effect from July 1, 1966, to June 30, 1970, are entitled to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the House would have wanted to hear the remainder of that very interesting argument by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

An hon. Member: I think we are going to.

Mr. Peters: I am interested, Mr. Speaker, in the application that Bell Canada has under Bill C-1001 for a change in their financing structure. I am actually more interested in the reasons they are before us today. Everyone, I am sure, is in agreement that Bell is a multinational corporation, probably controlled by Bell of the United States and probably has more than a working agreement with IT and T, the largest multinational corporation in the world. They work very closely with each other in the manufacturing of goods in their subsidiary companies, and their purchasing structures, and in fact are probably the largest public monopoly in the world—their public monopoly, not in ownership but in the service that they are supposed to, and anticipate they do, render.

Bell Canada and, in fact, any public utility of that nature is very important to the nation. They are so important that when we set up our structure in Canada it was mandatory that agencies such as public utilities, whether they were privately owned or publicly owned, would have to come before parliament for changes in their financial structure, and this applied to only a limited number of things. It applied to railways, it applied to gas and oil pipelines, it applied to insurance companies, trust companies, finance companies, banks and other closely related public agencies. Why were they brought before parliament for changes in their financial structure? One of the reasons is that the public obviously has to be protected against a monopoly. When you grant a monopoly, whether it is for a sewage system, for lights, for streets or for anything that is universally supplied on a monopoly basis, there must be some way of controlling the cost of that service.

In most cases we control these services by having people elected who report to the public and are responsible to the public, both for their election and for their remuneration. In this case, where we are dealing with a private monopoly corporation in a public utility field, it was always agreed they would have to come to the public before they could change their financial operation and before they were allowed to make expenditures in a totally different field. Over the years some changes have been made. We have now reached the stage where many of these public agencies that were considered of such importance to the public have had to come before parliament to change their certification. They have had to come to change their financial structure. They have had to come to make major changes in the role they are playing in the field in which the federal government has a great deal of interest.

Over the years we have established, by letters patent, changes which have allowed insurance companies to be certified, to make changes in their financial structure, to amalgamate, to join with other companies, to do a number of things. We retained something for ourselves, something that was really no control at all, which was the right to demand in this House that before an order in council was granted allowing the acceptance of those letters patent, we as members of parliament would be able to question the decision the minister was making by order in council.

This type of operation has not worked. For a long time the government has depended on its members to vote for the government, whether or not they knew anything about the subject, whether they were concerned about the subject or, in fact, without any knowledge of the subject at all. So that after the debate was over they could always count on the order in council being approved, because if the members did not approve it there would probably be an election, and most of them were not too interested in having an election over something they did not understand in the first place.

There really has not been any control. Most people do not care if one insurance company has an arrangement or develops an arrangement with another insurance company. So we gave up our rights with the insurance companies. It got to the stage where nobody was too sure what was happening with the pipelines, so we gave that up. We have given up most of the powers for the establishment of public corporations. We have over the last four or five years made changes to the Bank Act which allow us to get rid of the power of parliament, to decide on the extension, capitalization and methods of operation of our national banks. We have really made a lot of concessions in this House, in the interest, I suppose, of getting things done. It seems to me that the public is very interested in some of the agencies over which we no longer have any control.

● (1712)

I am sure that if we were to give passage to Bill C-1001, we would be accomplishing what Bell wants, but we certainly would not be doing very much for the Canadian public. Because it is in a monopoly position in respect of a public utility, Bell really has a licence to print money. This company has a number of ways of raising money. During a previous debate an hon. member was talking about the national debt being something like $67 billion.

An hon. Member: No, $71 billion.

Mr. Peters: I think he said $67 billion, but we could bring it up to that level easily by adding Bell's debt which I understand is about $2.5 billion. It really would not make much difference. I am sure the hon. member who indicated it was $71 billion would not really care if we added Bell's debt to the national debt. I would be willing to do that by nationalizing Bell and taking over the $2.5 billion. I am sure we would be able to whittle that amount of debt down, even though we may not be able to do very much about the other.

What does Bell really want? It wants to expand into international markets and into other fields than the telephone business, and it wants to do this without any control. It is true that the company has to go before the CTC. Is it the CTC now, or has that been changed?

An hon. Member: It's the CRTC.

Mr. Peters: I guess they got tired of the CTC. They kicked them pretty hard for some time until Bell became experts in dealing with them, so the government changed it to the CRTC and it is now trying to develop experts to handle this monster. Bell is probably doing a little better with the CRTC than it did with the CTC. I am not prepared to let the cabinet deal with this matter. That would really be giving up the right of hon. members to protect the public from this utility. There is absolutely no legitimate reason for a public utility in a monopoly position being privately owned. There is no logical or justifiable reason for that. I can think of no case at all where there has been a public utility owned by the people, turned over to the private sector after being operated as a public utility.

Perhaps I should say that I can think of one instance. I know of a number of corporations which got rid of their garbage collection systems and turned them over to private enterprise. In most cases the cost went up and up to the point that the municipalities or corporations had to take the operations back and run the garbage collection system again. I do not know of any municipalities which have turned their lighting companies over to private enterprise, and I do not know of any that have turned sidewalk construction or road building and maintenance over to private enterprise. I can remember they started out that way in Montreal and one had to pay to cross the bridge until everybody, even those in the province of Quebec, decided they had paid for the bridge time and time again and they wanted to own the bloody thing, so they gave it back to the people.

Generally speaking, I do not think that once a public utility has been owned and operated by the people it is ever transferred the other way. I do not think that even in British Columbia, where all the parties got together under the banner of free enterprise, they turned the hydro company or the roads or other public utilities over to private enterprise. Public utilities enjoy a monopoly position, and they must be in that position, but they certainly should not be in that position for the purpose of printing money. That is really the privilege that Bell Telephone is seeking.

I am amazed at the concessions that Bell Canada has been granted. When a hydro company puts power into your house, you get a bunch of connections on the wall. Hydro approves them, and that is the end of it. If you want to put a Westinghouse stove in and connect it to hydro, that is fine. If you want to put a Frigidaire in, that is fine. I am sure that General Electric has some equipment in almost every home. The telephone company, on the other hand, says it wants to put in not only the service or the facility, in a monopoly position, but it wants to sell all the parts or appliances to be used on that system: you cannot put in any other make.

The government has got a facility in my house. I hope someone makes up his mind pretty soon whether it is to be changed, because I am sure this company is not going to charge me for it. I am quite prepared to pay the telephone company to come into my house with the service, but that is the end of it. If I want to buy my telephones from Radio Shack, I will do so, and if the company wants to take me to court, that's fine. If I want to rent a telephone from them, that is fine; but if I want to buy one from somebody else, I intend to use that one too. As long as it has an acceptable standard stamp on it, then as far as I am concerned it is none of the company's business what I do in my house.

We have given all these concessions to Bell Canada. It now wants the right to increase capitalization without supervision by parliament. This company really does not want to increase its capitalization. What it wants is to be able to do anything it wishes, including increasing capitalization. If the company had just wanted to increase its capitalization, it would have brought a bill before us that said so. I can remember the company coming here when it wanted to increase its board of directors. Did it really make a huge difference to Bell whether it had 15 or 20 directors? It sure made a lot of difference to them when we included an amendment which said that one of those directors had to be appointed by parliament or the government to represent the public, without involving share capital. We were not going to buy the position; we were just going to control one directorship. Let me tell you that they put up a battle for a couple of years over that.

I had very interesting conversations every Friday afternoon with the president of Bell Canada who came to tell us why they could not accept that one directorship. His argument was that we did not need a director on the board to look after subscribers' problems, because he handled all the complaints as president of Bell Telephone.

An hon. Member: And he got $201,000 a year for that.

Mr. Peters: He was certainly well paid—$201,000, plus a free telephone for life, plus, I suppose, he could stay at Place Bell Canada when he came to Ottawa and fly in their jets. He probably even gets a telephone from the Maberly telephone exchange which is now fairly prestigious. It was only 121 customers, as I understand it. They will always enjoy their present basic rate, because the company owns buildings in downtown Ottawa, a fleet of trawlers and a fleet of aircraft. This just goes to show how much money a telephone exchange is worth. That one little telephone exchange with 121 customers owns, in addition to Place Bell Canada in downtown Ottawa, a fleet of jets and a fleet of trawlers plying the seven seas. It is a pretty rich little exchange which has not had an increase in rates since Bell bought it.

An hon. Member: When, in 1860?

Mr. Peters: No, it was not that long ago. However, you raise a very interesting point. It has only been a few years since Bell bought that small telephone business and already it owns a fleet of jets, a fleet of trawlers and this building, yet it has been producing for Bell for a very short period of time. I suggest these 121 subscribers are not really paying for these things. I am sure the company will never go to the commission asking for a rate increase, because it would then have to open its books. I am sure this will never happen until all these people die off. I am sure it is hard to get another telephone, but as long as those people are there, I am sure they will pay the same rate.

• (1722)

Bell Telephone has an excellent telephone system, and no one is complaining about the system as such. Sure, one can complain about the fact that they have not provided a rural telephone service, but I think on the whole it compares with other telephone systems throughout the country and throughout the world, so there is nothing particularly bad about the Bell Telephone company. If Bell Telephone were to ask us to provide money so they could put in telephones in Searchmont, if they were to tell us they would put in telephones throughout the rural areas of Ontario—

Mr. Foster: We have been trying to get them out there for a long time.

Mr. Peters: I know, of course. Let me tell you, my friend, that if you help to pass this bill, it will not speed up the provision of a telephone service in your area one iota. If you raised their money by $10 million they would still not put in telephones in your area any faster. So if you vote for this bill so as to get telephones in Algoma, forget it, because it will not happen. Neither will it happen in my area, or in other areas in Ontario, if we increase the capitalization of this company.

If it were an honest financial transaction because they needed to go to the market to raise money to modernize rural telephone systems, then we would say, fine, go ahead. There is not a member of my party who has not some area in his constituency which is in difficulty for lack of telephones. I could tell my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), of very interesting machinations by the telephone company—in fact not only one of them, but three of them, because CNR also has provided a telephone system in a little place called Shining Tree, a place which he probably knows quite well. For all the fuss that was made there, it is no wonder they finally got telephones in that area. But if we had increased this amount by $10 million, it would still not put them in a better position to provide telephones in Shining Tree faster.

Most hon. members who have considered this realize, as has the Canadian Transport Commission for a number of years, that in the rate increases for which they ask they are not really asking for money to operate telephone exchanges or money to pay higher wages to their employees; what they are asking for is money to buy into other corporations. If we were to give them the right to raise whatever money they wanted, they would buy Telecom, they would buy all the other telephone companies in Canada, and they would develop a monopoly from one coast to the other. With the exception of the Maberly exchange, I am sure they would make an effort to take over every telephone company in Canada. I would go even further and say that if we were to allow them to raise money as they wish to do, they would not only stay in Canada, they would go into a number of other businesses throughout the world, because they have already done so. The Maberly exchange, with 121 subscribers, only a few miles from Ottawa—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to ask the House for unanimous consent to allow me to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I must say I come to this debate rather late, and I apologize to you and to the House if there are any points that I misunderstand. I am pleased to see that my honourable and intelligent colleague, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), has introduced the bill. I know he would be anxious to correct any misunderstanding that one might have, although I must say I am a bit surprised that the hon. member is piloting the bill through the House. I am beginning to think he is serving some kind of a penance on that side of the House. Surely hon. members on that side of the House have to draw straws in order to pilot such a bill through the House.

I remember the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) attempting to pilot the IAC bill through the House. I must congratulate members on the other side of the House who draw those short straws and have to go through the exercise of allowing major monopoly corporations to avoid the proper regulatory function. The initial point I would like to make about the bill is that this is the place where monopoly operations such as this must have the ultimate regulation. There is, of course, a rule for the CRTC, but to produce legislation and avoid, in effect, a reasonable and full debate about this legislation is a very serious avoidance of the parliamentary process.

So no matter what we may think are the merits of the bill—I do not happen to think the bill has much merit—surely, as members of parliament, we could agree on one principle, namely, that when bills come in front of the House which mean that the House does not have to review them or look at them any more, whether or not we agree with the principle of the bill as designed, we can surely agree on the principle that this is the place to review bills for capitalization change in major corporations.

As I see the bill, it attempts to do a number of things. First, it is a revision of the act of incorporation relating to the company's ability and methodology, including the removal of the scrutiny of the appropriate government regulatory body. It grants Bell, if passed, the power to borrow, issue stock, bonds, debentures or other securities the company deems necessary, plus it would give Bell the right to fix whatever price on the sales that it wished. Subsequent sections would provide Bell with the authority to establish voting rights, by-laws, procedures and alterations to issue shares as Bell may deem necessary. The present authorized capital is $1.750 million. The bill proposes a capitalization capacity of some $5 billion. I would like some guidance from the hon. member who has introduced the bill. I see he is not in the House.

An hon. Member: He will be right back.

Mr. Leggatt: I will leave this point until later, because I am quite serious about it. Let me just say, for the record, that I want to know whether an increase in the capitalization will mean that the return on the investment on which the regulatory agency has to pass judgment will have to be increased when you increase the capital structure of the company. I would like to have the question clarified as to whether you can increase the invested capital of your company through changing the capital structure under the bill, thereby increasing the rate of return, which is not related to the service that is being provided to the public. In any event, if I am wrong, I would be happy to be corrected on that point, but it seems to me to be a real risk.

In essence, the major criticism continues to be that this bill will have the effect of avoiding the consequences of a parliamentary debate and of avoiding the consequences of MPs scrutinizing that company. In effect, it will take away from us, as members of parliament, our sworn duty to look after our constituents with regard to these matters. We have heard some public criticism of most telephone companies, some of it by the CRTC. For example, the B.C. Telephone Company has used many beautiful devices for avoiding real regulation. I am relating this matter to the bill because exactly the same principle applies to Bell Canada.

● (1732)

As soon as a telephone monopoly finds any profitability in the company—and I defy anyone to dispute this after examining the record—the first thing that is done is that the profitable section is spun off to make sure that when the regulations come down they regulate only the low profit section, and the high profit sections go off into self-owned or partially controlled or owned companies.

Mr. Friesen: Can you give an example?

Mr. Leggatt: The hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) asks for an example. I think probably the best example in B.C. is what happened to certain services provided by B.C. Telephone. Those services used to be under the ambit of B.C. Telephone, and therefore had to be included in terms of the profitability of the company. For years the Canadian Transport Commission regulated the profits of B.C. Telephone and included the most profitable section of the operation, which was its yellow pages and directory service. I do not think it took too long for the company's solicitors and accountants to have a look at this and hive off that profitable operation into a private, self-owned and controlled entity. That profitable operation would therefore no longer be controlled by the regulatory body. Therefore, what the public looks at is the bare bones of the telephone system.

The public gets to look at only the worst example, the operations which do not make a lot of money and which have to return on investments about 6 per cent. I believe that is what they are now allowed on invested capital. When profitable sections of companies are hived off—for example, the purchase of telephone services from wholly owned subsidiaries—we are not dealing at arm's length and we are not dealing with the market price.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) talked about rental arrangements. It is almost impossible to buy a telephone. Everything is rented. I remember having a little buzzer put into my law office. I think I was charged 50 cents per month for that buzzer. The buzzer was paid for after the first two months. It has now been there about 15 or 16 years, and I feel I own part of the company now. There is a reason why these services are not sold to us. The reason is that in the world of real competition the company would be out of business.

That is the whole basis for our philosophy that a private monopoly does not compete in the free market. Its charges do not compete in the free market, its products do not compete in the free market, and therefore it is an appropriate vehicle for public ownership.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Leggatt: By all means.

Mr. Friesen: A few minutes ago the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) was saying he wished he could buy his telephone from Radio Shack—

Mr. Peters: I already have one.

Mr. Friesen: —because it is cheaper to buy one from Radio Shack.

Mr. Peters: No, it isn't. It doesn't save money. I just own it.

Bell Canada

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) agrees that is is cheaper to buy one, but obviously there is some advantage. The telephone company in B.C. to which the hon. member is referring is in some conflict with members of the union there over the right to buy equipment where the company wants to buy it. Would the hon. member agree that that is a principle which ought to apply to B.C. Telephone? He says he has paid for his buzzer over and over again by making rental payments. Does he not agree that B.C. Telephone has the right to buy equipment wherever it wants in order to stay profitable?

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I am not able to supply my hon. friend with an answer because I am not familiar with the background of that part of that dispute. The hon. member is alleging that at the moment the union is trying to tell the company that it cannot buy from certain companies. I was not aware that it was possible, in view of restraint of trade legislation, but nevertheless I do not know the answer to that in the context of that particular dispute. I think in principle the question is a good one. I think that the free flow of products for telephone service should be there, but nevertheless the key point is that a privately owned monopoly in many, many case does not deal in the free market with regard to its own services.

I would be interested in knowing what the relationship is between Northern Electric and the B.C. Telephone Company. I do not know whether there is some interlocking arrangement, and it may be that the union is seeking to support some brother union members in another firm. That is entirely possible. I do not know. I do not like to see that kind of lock-up in terms of the free flow of products, but we are still not coming to grips with the essential question which is: is it appropriate in terms of our needs in telecommunication that large private monopolies should continue to provide these kinds of services? We hear much about how inefficient public corporations are. It is the conventional wisdom now that anything publicly owned cannot be effencient. But in fact public telephone companies have been kicking the stuffing out of private telephone companies in Canada regarding price and service for a very long time. I wonder if there is anyone who lives in Manitoba who would like to see a private telephone monopoly.

Mr. McKenzie: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Leggatt: There is a fellow who wants to see a private monopoly.

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member just asked a question, and I would be only too happy to answer. I have heard this repeated reference to telephone rates, and I wonder if—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would like to say to the hon. member that that is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. McKenzie: Would the hon. member entertain a question?

[Mr. Peters.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) rose on a point of order. He said nothing about a question. Would the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) accept a question? He has roughly five minutes.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, I have only five minutes left, so I would be happy to discuss this after I have finished my remarks.

Mr. McKenzie: You are misinforming the House.

Mr. Symes: The rates are lower.

Mr. Leggatt: I will give the rates. Then we can study them.

Mr. McKenzie: I know the rates. I was in the business 30 years.

Mr. Leggatt: In the city of Winnipeg the private rate is $4.90. These are 1976 figures. The business rate is $11.65, this with a public telephone company. In Toronto the business rate is $22.10, and the private rate is $7.45. In Vancouver where there is a private monopoly telephone company the private rate is $8.05, and the business rate is $24.20. In Edmonton there is a very sensible Conservative government, and there is a public telephone system. The private telephone rate there is $5.80.

I have not heard my friend, Premier Lougheed, lobbying to bring private telephone companies into Alberta, and there is not much of a move in that direction in my hon. friend's home province either. The plain fact is that a public monopoly in this field operates more efficiently than a private monopoly, and there is a good reason for that. The private monopoly uses its mandate to increase the profitability of its subsidiary companies.

People sometimes accuse us of being against business. I can go through the rates in Canada again, and we will find that the only friend the small businessman has, as far as telephone rates are concerned, is this party, because public telephone rates for business are consistently lower all across the country. If we want to reduce the cost of business, let us bring in public telephone companies. Clearly, that would save money.

I did want to spend a moment or two on a subject which is directly related to the question of the change in telephone company capitalization. It deals with a very abrasive strike in the province of B.C. which has been going on for some time between B.C. Telephone and its workers. The workers in that company have been kicked around in the press. They have had rotating strikes and they have blocked traffic. Mr. Speaker, people are tired of strikes. They see the disruption, but they do not see what is behind the dispute.

● (1742)

Let me tell what happened in the B.C. Telephone Company dispute. A conciliation commission recommended settlement within the AIB guidelines. In other words, the recommendation to the union was to settle below the AIB guidelines, and the union accepted that recommendation. The company, however, has rejected the conciliation report and has attempted to remove the job security clause that the union has had two years. That is what is at the heart of the dispute.

Why is there a dispute? Bell Canada, because of an AIB rollback, had a windfall profit of some $13 million, and I believe B.C. Telephone was looking for exactly the same result in this dispute with its employees. When it did not get it, it found it could carry the stress anyway. If you examine the merits of that dispute objectively you will find that the workers in the union are on the right side of the issue.

That particular dispute could be settled tomorrow, but one of the reasons it is not settled is that this private monopoly does not have to withstand the market forces where people are in competition. A strike or a labour dispute is usually an economic war—how long can the workers hold out, how long can the company hold out? A private monopoly can hold out forever because, at the end of the road, all it has to do is go to the regulatory body and say, "Those are our costs, that is our capitalization, such and such is the rate of return we must have on our investment." That is one of the reasons we will have increasing labour trouble in Canada—private monopoly telephone companies.

I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

"Bill C-1001, an Act respecting Bell Canada, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

One of the other matters about regulations that we constantly ignore in this House is that because of the technology in the telephone business it should be one of the most efficient. New technology over the last 20 years can reduce the cost of communications very substantially. Yet we find that these big, fat, lazy, private monopolies have not taken advantage of that technology and have continued to pass on their costs to the consumer. They have not practised the kind of efficiency we should expect from them.

I have every sympathy for the hon. member for Scarborough East, who has been saddled with this awesome and distasteful task—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this argument we have been hearing from the New Democratic Party on telephone rates. There are a few things with which they are not acquainted. There are no low telephone rates in large cities like New York, Los Angeles, Toronto or Montreal. Hon. members of that party might be under the impression that volume leads to low rates. Large cities do not have low telephone rates however, because it is very costly for the telephone company to provide trunking facilities, exchange facilities and so on.

Members of the New Democratic Party have mentioned the efficiency of provincial telephone companies which are Crown corporations. I worked for one of them for 30 years, Mr. Speaker, and I know that today they are run on advice and specifications provided by Bell Telephone. They are called Bell specifications. The telephone companies of Alberta, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan get these specifications from Bell and Northern on how to run the commercial department, the plant department, and the engineering department. These are provinces with small populations, and low rates can be provided in cities like Winnipeg, Brandon, Saskatoon, Regina, and even Edmonton.

In large centres, especially Ontario, it is very costly to provide exchange and trunking facilities. In areas like Mississauga it costs hundreds of millions of dollars to provide telephone service. Everytime a new centre is built with a population of 100,000 or so, it must have access to all other parts of greater Toronto and Ontario. This is very costly and it is why the rates are high. That is the difference between the Crown corporations in the small provinces and Bell. I must emphasize again that they get all their information on how to operate from Bell and Northern.

I hope I have made that clear to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I did not have a chance to speak on that point the other day.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) because I think it is extremely wise to cool off for six months and take a good, hard look at this bill.

I have not made it a secret in this House that I am absolutely opposed to this bill. I have said it would be a dereliction of my duty as a representative of my constituents who, by and large, depend on non-urban telephone service, if I were to let this bill go through. The bill would allow Bell to escape forever the scrutiny and examination of members of parliament. My constituents are not in Mississauga or Toronto, they are in small communities, and the Bell Telephone Company tells them it would cost $20,000 to instal a telephone.

An hon. Member: One telephone?

Mr. Rodriguez: One telephone, something which is not a luxury any more. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) may go to Radio Shack—I recognize there is some conflict there because his son has the franchise and he can buy all the exotic equipment and buttons he wants. We are not interested in that. We are looking for the basic telephone service.

I want to read into the record part of a letter dated January 28, 1977, from a constituent. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir

I am hoping you can help myself and four other families with our problem with Bell Tel. The phone comes to within one mile of us. I've been trying to get the phone for three years. There are five families—ourselves, pensioners, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Carriere, pensioners, also Mr. Carriere's health is not good, Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Blomme, Mr. and Mrs. Dorrice Carriere—when Dorrice is in the bush cutting pulp his wife is alone with two young children and Mr. and Mrs. Laurence Carriere who also have young babies. The Bell told my husband this morning they would require $108 from each of us toward the line, eleven dollars installation and a reasonable monthly rate. It's the $108 that is really beyond Dorrice and his family and it would be a hardship for the older Carrieres and ourselves. Could you please find out if this is really needful?

● (1752)

I wrote to Bell Canada and I received the same bubble-up I always get: that it will cost to instal the telephone; that they are not providing welfare to people; and that those people should move into the city to live.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Rodriguez: We have to try to touch the hearts of those apologists for the large corporations with a little bit of sympathy, concerning problems communicated to us through the pens of the poor folk.

I should like to refer to another letter dated March 20, 1977, which I received from Mrs. Elma Hutchins of Markstay, Ontario. It reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

Thank you very much for your efforts on our behalf concerning Bell Telephone. I made a last trip to my different neighbours. The Blommes and ourselves would have paid the $108 but the Carrieres refused to. If the line comes in they would take it but won't pay toward the line. It was a large sum for us also but in case of fire or accident the $108 would seem a small sum. I don't know if I had told you but my son was in a bad accident on February 3. He was hurt at 8.30 in the morning and had been in hospital ten hours before I knew about it. Thank you again.

Largely because of the fact that this bill is before the House, I am sure Bell Canada decided not to ruffle up this guy Rodriguez, to pacify the New Democratic Party, and to give us some things. Finally we received some action, and the telephones were installed.

I should like to refer to the last letter which I received from Mrs. Elma Hutchins dated October 25, 1977, which reads as follows:

Dear Sir:

My late thanks for your help with the phone. I had hoped to see you on your visit to Markstay but I had just had a nasty fall and broken bones in my foot. This was my second fall this summer—both my own fault. In the first I had broken ribs. I watch the polls and hope to see Mr. Trudeau start to slide soon. His ideas on our economy are dreadful. I have three grandsons who will be caught in the possible lay-offs at INCO. Two more who work for other companies who will probably lay off also. Mr. Broadbent seems a much more sensible person seen on TV than Mr. Trudeau and I think this is what we need right now. Thanks again for your help.

I was glad we were able to assist these people in getting their telephones. As I said before, we were able to squeeze this kind of service out of the hard hearts of those Bell Canada people, because of the fact that they knew this bill was before the House and they knew we would filibuster the bill. They were right. That is what we will do.

Members of my party have been arguing consistently that we need to develop northern Ontario with small entrepreneurs. Our party has never opposed small entrepreneurships. As a matter of fact the best friend of the small entrepreneur is the New Democratic Party, and certainly not the Liberals and the Conservatives who are for big business. We hope we represent the interests of small business.

I should like to refer to a letter I received from a small business entrepreneur in Gogama, which is north of my riding. He does not live in my constituency, but he decided to write to me. He wanted to instal a public telephone at his place of business to serve the public. He had written letters to Bell Canada, the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), the hon. member for Timiskaming, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome), and myself. The problem was that Bell Canada wanted to charge him $20,000 to instal a telephone. The letter I received from him is dated August 15, 1977, and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

Thank you for your letters of July 5 and 28 re Bell Canada. I agree with you that we seem to have come to a dead end on this matter, but due to Vagabond's responsibility to provide road service to the travelling public, which includes emergency service, Vagabond will make sure that the public it serves is fully aware that Bell Canada, the monopoly in this public utility, has completely abdicated its responsibility and has refused to instal a pay telephone.

This will be done by the posting of a sign and handing out printed notices to our customers, which would read as follows:

"Dear Customer:

Bell Canada has refused to instal a public pay phone at its own expense, on these premises. The nearest public pay phone is two miles away in Gogama. If, under emergency situation, this lack of public pay telephone service has caused you harm in any way, we will assist you in laying criminal charges against the federal minister, the federal public service administrator and the Bell Canada administrator responsible and accountable for this lack of service."

Again, Mr. Rodriguez, I must say thank you for your concern, and especially for the ardent desire you have displayed in this matter. I just wish we had more of your kind in Ottawa, who are genuinely concerned with the availability of services to the people who help develop the north.

Yours very truly,

B. Petitclerc,
President,
Vagabond Ltd.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has breached the parliamentary tradition of remaining modest, and he has demonstrated immodesty by reading praises of his own work.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I have read the words of my constituents into the record, because of the fact we have this bill before us. May I call it six o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ENERGY—HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING FUNDING OF RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in this adjournment debate I should like to refer to my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on November 14 in which I tried to explain the weaknesses which exist in the Canadian home insulation program. The program denies the persons in Canada who need it most the advantage of the grants which are paid.

As I have pointed out before, there has been a program in existence which provides what is needed for those people on fixed and low incomes, who cannot afford the increases in fuel oil or in hydro power, in order for them to cope with the cost of living which exists today. On a number of occasions I have brought this to the attention of the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). It is one of the best programs ever produced by the government. I refer to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. It provides everything that a person on low income needs, but cannot afford, in order to have that insulation.

There are many homeowners in Newfoundland with fixed or low incomes in the $6,000 or lower category. Their homes are deteriorating because they cannot afford to maintain them with the present cost of building materials. How can they take advantage of this $350 grant when they do not have a porch, verandah, walls or windows that keep out the cold; storm windows, proper plumbing, basement, a proper heating system or proper electric wiring? That program, which has been in existence for four years, provides grants of up to $3,750 to allow them to do that. It provides grants of up to $750 for those in the $10,000 bracket.

Granted, the home insulation program will fill a need for some people. However, it eliminates those who need to save fuel the most because they cannot afford it.

Every time I have questioned this in the past two or three years, I have been told there is not enough money available. However, the government now comes out with a massive $1.4 billion program, the Canadian Home Insulation Program. This is contradictory to its other programs and is directed to only a few people.

I do not know how these programs are devised. It is so ridiculous it is not even funny. What they do is set up a new bureaucracy. I can see their hands moving now. With the $1.4 billion, they can build a new bureaucracy and promote some people.

One office was set up in Montreal to handle the 1.2 million people who will qualify in the first year. There is only one number that these people can call. The people in my district cannot get through to Montreal. They cannot even get through to me because of lack of telephone service. What about those in the Yukon or Northwest Territories?

The government has come out with this $1.4 billion program. However, in the first year it is providing only $45 million to satisfy 133,000 units. The minister stated that there have been 60,000 applications. That was in only two months since the program started September 1. If every application were approved, it would take $30 million. Therefore, how are they providing any help?

There is something else I cannot understand. Through this program members of the government are creating discrimination and destroying national unity. The country has been divided into different regions under this program. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island the citizens there receive $350 for $350 spent. God bless them, they need it. However, in other provinces you must spend $500 to receive $350. I do not see the reasoning.

This country has also been separated because in New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan, only homes built prior to 1921 can qualify. Dwellings in Newfoundland, Alberta, British Columbia and the Territories qualify if they were built prior to 1941. It amazes me how they can keep confusing the people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Gilles Lamontagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to clarify a few points for the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) concerning the Canadian home insulation program.

The Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, or RRAP, now includes insulation, but this is not the main purpose of this program. One of the restrictions of the program is that it applies only to very specific areas of the country. If the problems mentioned by the hon. member occur, we shall probably have to consider a more general approach to the problem than amending RRAP.

In so far as the problem mentioned concerns insulation needs rather than more general housing problems, the solution must be identical to the other changes we intend to make to the Canadian home insulation program. It is too soon to evaluate the reactions to the program since insulation materials must be bought and installed before people can apply for a grant. Consequently, even though only 2,900 application forms have been received, about 32,000 have been sent each month in September and October. Many people have probably received the forms and are now insulating their homes, but they have not yet asked for a grant.

If this rate of response is maintained throughout the year and if all those who request an application form obtain a grant, 360,000 houses will have been insulated in the next 12 months. Moreover, if Alberta and Quebec homeowners become eligible and take advantage of the program to the same extent, the number of insulated homes will increase by 120,000. This total of 480,000 homes corresponds closely to the maximum estimated number of existing houses which could be insulated according to the insulation industry. In Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, where about 50 per cent of owner-occupied homes will have been insulated under a similar home insulation program during the first year of application of the program, experience suggests that the response to the Canadian home insulation program will be considerable.

[English]

● (1807)

Mr. Speaker, the program can't be poor and at the same time be responsible for the shortage of insulation materials, for which it is being blamed. Nevertheless, as with any new undertaking, there are some start-up problems with the program. We are hopeful that, as the process evolves, the application procedure will be simplified.

In addition it is clear that, at least in Ontario, there is considerable confusion as to whether or not the program has been cancelled. This is, no doubt, caused by the recent cancellation of the proposed Ontario loan program. Undoubtedly we will have to direct a major effort to overcome this confusion and to ensure that the public is aware that the federal CHIP program is still available.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. parliamentary secretary but the time allotted to him has expired.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT ACTING IN ANTICIPATION OF PASSAGE OF BILL C-6

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, in this session of parliament we should be hearing a great deal about ports, more especially when Bill C-6 comes up for debate and when the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) and I try to unravel the somewhat curious hesitancy of the Ministry of Transport in trying to question whether there should be an increase in containerization in Halifax, though certainly there has been rather indecent haste about providing for Montreal although, as far as I can see, the needs of both are about equal. But my main purpose this evening is to concentrate on Bill C-6 and, if I can, obtain some reassurance from the ministry about the future of the 150 or so people who work for the National Harbours Board and for the ports and harbours division of the Ministry of Transport. These people are very much affected by Bill C-6 which would replace much of the existing administration of our harbours across Canada with arrangements which are very, very new.

My understanding is that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is legally quite entitled to go ahead and have the officials in his department prepare for the day when the provisions of Bill C-6 become law, so that the administrative structure would be in readiness. But that is as far as it goes. Until the bill becomes the law of the land he may not start that administrative apparatus going. This is as it should be, after all.

● (1812)

The Department of Transport, at least the chairman and others of the National Harbours Board, and I have the Chairman's memorandum here before me, Mr. Pierre A. H. Franche, have acted with some dispatch in this matter but not exactly to the liking of a large number of employees who are now, frankly, I think scared to death. it may be that the minister's representative when he speaks will be able to quieten their fears, but their fears are in two particular areas. First, they were promised that any hiring in the future ports structure would have equal representation from both the Department of Transport and the National Harbours Board. We are told that this is not so, that it is only the Board which will have the say in the hiring, and the people in the Department of Transport—that is the section of that ministry I have referred to—are pretty uptight, and I would hope that the minister's representative would be able to set their fears at rest on this matter.

Secondly, those who are passing through the screening process were assured that the process of bilingualism would not substantially change the numbers now involved in the operations of Canadian ports. Our understanding, and again the minister's representative might be able to set the record very precisely on this point, is that of the 150 jobs in the new port set-up, 135 are to be classified as bilingual. This raises the very substantial question: by what criteria has the figure of 135 been reached, and why is it substantially in excess of the numbers who are now classified as bilingual?

I do not quarrel with the principle of bilingualism as such, but when you look at the numbers of ports across Canada, one would have to think of places such as Vancouver, and to a lesser extent Halifax, Saint John, St. John's, Newfoundland, Hamilton, and all of the other ports within the jurisdiction of the former or outgoing National Harbours Board, now to be within this new empire, and wonder whether as high as 135 of 150 is a necessary figure. Perhaps we can have an answer to that.

Again, I admit there is a justification for government, for this particular department and the minister to start reorganization now, but there comes a point at which they must take into account the House of Commons, the other place, and the Governor General who all have their say in this whole process, that is, there has to be a parliamentary enactment giving a blessing to this change that will be brought about by Bill C-6.

Mr. Franche in his letter to employees had this to say, and I will quote one paragraph from it. The letter is available to anyone who may wish to see it.

> Since the Minister of Transport has tasked—

That is a bureaucratic word "tasked".

> —the Commissioner-Designate with the responsibility of having an operational organization in place when the Canada Ports Act is promulgated, we must begin now to co-ordinate all the activities concerned with ports administration in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by the hon. member on this very important issue of the creation of a Canadian port commission. However, I must say that, in my opinion, the answer given to the House by the hon. minister on November 14 should dispel all fears that present employees of the National Harbours Board and all persons now working in the head office may have. I think the minister gave a clear denial to the allegations that the federal government is trying to fill positions within the Canadian port commission before Parliament has even promulgated the act which will create that commission. Last July, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) made a statement, and I quote:

> We have asked the employees of the head office of the National Harbours Board and the personnel of the harbours and piers division of Transport Canada to apply for these positions within the newly created commission so that we may be able to confirm their assignment by the time this act is passed.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that this quotation illustrates quite well the fact that the new positions created when the Canadian port commission comes into existence will not be opened only to National Harbours Board employees but also to the employees of the head office, that is to say the employees of the department in Ottawa. As for the government, it is trying to ensure a continuity in the harbours administration during the transition from the National Harbours Board and the harbours commissions to the Canadian port commission, while at the same time offering the employees of the board and of the head office the possibility of making a career within the Canadian port commission. It is quite clear that the government has an obligation towards its employees and those of the board and of the head office who contributed so much to the present administration of these harbours and are therefore likely to transfer the benefit of their experience to the new organization. It is only justice that any uncertainty as to their future be removed and that they be given the opportunity before anyone else to apply for positions which will be created when this bill is approved by Parliament. The harbours policy review commission instituted by the cabinet in the fall of 1975 recommended that this Canadian port commission be set up before the passing of this new act so that it might become operational at the earliest. As for the government, it has met with the union representatives in Ottawa to show them the program governing the personnel under which their members will be placed following their reassignment to the new central organization.

Competitions for the senior positions started in July. Any proposed appointments, however, cannot be confirmed until the legislation is approved by parliament.

By this means, qualified employees of the National Harbours Board and ports and harbour headquarters groups will know in advance to which jobs they will move when legislation is passed. It is the best way to ensure continuous management of our ports, which is so essential to shipping and transportation in this country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—APPLICABILITY OF GUIDELINES TO AWARDING OF MEDAL TO PREMIER LEVESQUE BY FRANCE

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I participate in this debate this evening as a result of a question asked by my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), and also of my own question of yesterday addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), which was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the House if the medal awarded to Premier Levesque by the Government of France, which I understand is the second highest award that can be given by the French government, fell within the 1968 guidelines issued by the Government of Canada governing the receipt of medals and honours by Canadian nationals?

The minister, in effect, refused to answer my question when he said in reply that, first of all, the guidelines had no legal effect and were in no way binding upon anybody. I think that is a terrible admission to be made by a minister of a government which has issued some rather strict sounding guidelines.

Secondly, he said that the medal was widely distributed and therefore did not carry much distinction, so he did not even consider it necessary to check those guidelines. I think it is interesting to check the facts in this regard. This is a very old award in the history of France.

● (1822)

As I understand it, the Legion of Honour was established by Emperor Napoleon in 1807 or thereabouts. It is instructive to note that the first recipient of this honour was Czar Alexander of Russia. Some five years later Russia was invaded by the French. I do not know if that has any bearing on whether Mr. Levesque feels any insecurity as a result of the medal being awarded to him recently. However, the guidelines are clear that approval is not given to accept an order or decoration which is in relation to events more than five years prior to the proposal for the award.

I do not know whether Mr. Levesque received this award for services as a war correspondent during the Second World War. That was not stated. Being employed by the U.S. government, I suppose he did not feel it necessary to help Canada in that war effort.

The award is not approved for anyone who receives it on the basis of something which is at variance with considerations of general policy or public interest. I do not know what Mr. Levesque has done lately in this country which is good for the general policy or public interest of Canadians who wish to maintain our federation.

Section 3 of the guidelines says the following:

> Approval is, otherwise, contemplated in the case of any Canadian citizen . . . to whom an honour or decoration is offered on one of the following grounds:
> (a) for an extraordinary service to mankind;

I will be happy to hear from the parliamentary secretary whether Mr. Levesque has performed an extraordinary service to mankind or, as set out in subsection (b), has shown conspicuous bravery in saving or attempting to save life. Subsection (c) refers to important and personal services rendered to the reigning sovereign or to other members of the Royal Family. I do not suppose the government is too concerned about that. Subsection (d) refers to services rendered while in the salaried employment of the donor country. That may be interesting. Approval is also contemplated when there is recognition of an exceptional achievement or service.

The minister said that this is a widely distributed medal. It is interesting to note that only one other Canadian prior to Mr. Levesque received this award. That was Ambassador Roy, who was Canadian ambassador to France for more than 25 years. That is a significant achievement, but that shows the importance the French place on distributing this award. I suppose "widely distributed" means that if it is awarded once it has wide distribution. It is interesting to note the effect of distribution on these guidelines. However, I wonder into what category Mr. Levesque falls.

An editorial in the Toronto Sun of November 15 asked the same question, as follows:

> In which category has Levesque shone so brilliantly that the French government, always a stuffy, pretentious government, chooses to abandon normal protocol and make the award without informing Ottawa?
>
> The French link with Quebec that Levesque is trying to restore is tenuous and ironic.
> De Gaulle, who started it all, despised Quebec as a place and Quebecers as a people. He has been quoted as viewing them as "Petainists"—followers of Marshall Petain who co-operated with Hitler: Cowards and quislings who wouldn't come to the defence of France in World War II.
> Unfair perhaps, but de Gaulle had a long memory stretching back to Quebec's voting non in the conscription plebiscite of the early '40s.
> A gallantry award to Levesque merely debases the Legion of Honour and shows him up as a man of little class. Style, maybe, but no class.
>
> That Quebecers should feel allegiance to France is mysterious and ill-conceived. For centuries French-Canadians were abandoned by their home country. In fact the very existence of their language, culture, rights today are due primarily to the generosity of their British victors. Tough to swallow—but true.

I wonder what category the parliamentary secretary will put this in, and I hope—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I know my distinguished colleague is not hung up on that subject and neither am I; nevertheless, I listened with great attention to his very interesting observations on the question of the Premier of Quebec receiving a decoration from the French government.

[Translation]

The Canadian government was in fact advised of the possibility that Mr. Lévesque might be awarded a medal but the French government did not ask for an authorization.

When advised of the French government's intention, the Canadian government, through the usual diplomatic channel—its embassy in Paris—reminded the French government there was a regulation governing Canadians accepting and wearing insignias, orders, decorations or medals given by Commonwealth countries and foreign governments. This regulation, as mentioned by my hon. colleague, was issued by the Secretary of State in 1968 and stipulates that acceptance by Canadian citizens of distinctions, decorations or medals, whatever their class or order, is in every case subject to preliminary agreement by the government of Canada and preliminary publication in the Canada Gazette.

The Canadian government also reminded the French government there is an international normal practice according to which the government of the honoured recipient is normally informed of the intention of the foreign government and its authorization is requested.

In this case, the usual protocol has not been respected. However, as was indicated yesterday in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), the Canadian government has no real intention to take further action on this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

Motion withdrawn.

At 6.30 p.m. the House took recess.

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, before the debate on this budget bill was interrupted for private members' hour, I was outlining my concerns about the inadequacies of the budget introduced last March and subsequently reaffirmed a couple of weeks ago by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Canada's number one problem is unemployment, but I do not see that recognition in the budget before us. On other occasions I have gone into the reasons why we have high unemployment in this country: the dependence on resource based industries, the lack of manufacturing, and the lack of research and development to stimulate our manufacturing industry. I will not belabour that point at the moment.

As all members are aware, the unemployed and their families are the first to experience the pain and dislocation which come with not having a job. I wonder how many working Canadians understand what they themselves pay in terms of this high unemployment? We are experiencing the effects of approximately one million jobless Canadians. We all have to recognize what is happening to our unemployment insurance program.

For the first half of 1977 payouts in the unemployment insurance program totalled $2.1 billion; but the projections are that by the end of this winter the total cost of this program will have doubled to $4 billion in order to keep people off the welfare rolls. The fund does not have enough money to make that kind of payout, and therefore working Canadians have to pay for this high unemployment through their tax dollars in supplementing the unemployment insurance fund.

Also because of high unemployment, we suffer from the loss of billions of dollars in tax revenue. The government does not get tax revenue from Canadians who are unemployed. That means there is less room to manœuvre to maintain programs such as the old age pension. I wonder if every working Canadian realizes that last year every man, woman, and child lost approximately $520 in goods and services not produced because of high unemployment. Family problems, alcoholism, marital break-up, and increased crime are caused partially by the high unemployment we are experiencing today.

One of the saddest repercussions is the disillusionment which this causes to young people, whether they be university, community college, or high school graduates out on the labour market for the first time. We have told our young people to get an education and the world would be theirs. Unfortunately today we find 46 per cent of the unemployed in this country are under 35 years of age. Even after having high hopes and training, the young people are the first not to find a job. I worry about what is happening to the future generation of workers whom we are going to depend on when they experience this kind of disillusionment because the country has not organized its economy in such a way to give them that all-important job. I think of the most disillusioning experience I saw first-hand.

I travelled with the leader of our party a few months ago to Newfoundland. We looked at the state of the unemployed there. That is not unemployment that is seasonal, but unemployment that has affected adults and young people year after year. No matter how hard they try, the job vacancies are not there.

A kind of dependent psychology is beginning to take hold in areas of Atlantic Canada where there is no hope of ever finding a permanent job. This was vividly demonstrated to me in a little slip of the phrase, I suppose, when we were interviewing some unemployed people. We were talking about unemployment insurance payouts. They never referred to it as we do, as an insurance program. They called it "the pension". Unemployment had become a way of life, and unemployment insurance had become their only means of livelihood. Therefore they looked upon it as a pension. They were dependent on it. The whole idea of the work ethic had been eroded through no fault of their own, but through the fault of the Canadian and provincial governments which had so organized the economy that these people could not find work.

I am also concerned about the government's analysis of those who are unemployed. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has often said that unemployment is not all that serious because so many of the unemployed are women and young people. They are looked upon as secondary earners, people who are really not that serious about seeking a job or for whom having a job is not as important as the so-called breadwinner, the adult male of the family.

Let us look at that argument and the statistics we have for last year on the unemployed. They are the latest available. I am indebted to H. L. Robinson, an economist, who has written in the September issue of Canadian Forum a brilliant analysis of this problem.

When we look at this 1.1 million unemployed Canadians, how does it break down? We find that unemployed men represent about 8.9 per cent of the labour force. Breaking that sector down into age groups, those 15 to 24 years old represent 17.7 per cent of the labour force, and those over 25 years old, 6.1 per cent.

When we look at the women who are unemployed, we find that they represent not 8.9 per cent but 14.5 per cent of the unemployed. With the age groups, those 15 to 24 years old represent 18.1 per cent, and those over 25, 12.8 per cent. In other words, the majority of the unemployed in this country today are young people or women. The majority of these unemployed belong to families in which at least one other person is working.

Given those statistics, the Minister of Employment and Immigration advances the argument that somehow unemployment among this group of women and young people really is not that serious. Because they are not adult males, the breadwinner of the family, their unemployment is only secondary.

Aside from the male chauvinism in that argument, the minister and his colleagues ignore a very important fact, the fact that so many wives and young men and women work for the following reasons. First, they have to work in order to supplement the family income so that they can make ends meet. With the kind of inflation that we have, one income is simply not enough to maintain or improve the standard of living in relation to the inflation of the past few years. What do I have to back up that contention?

Using figures from 1975, the latest available, we find that the average annual wage earnings in Canada were $10,574. That is what the average person earned in 1975. The average family income in the same year was $13,805. If you look at the breakdown of those earnings, you find that 60 per cent of all wage earners had incomes below the average of $10,574.

According to Statistics Canada, any family with an income in an urban centre of $8,422 or below was classified at the poverty level. When 60 per cent of the workers are earning less than the average wage and the poverty line is only about $2,000 below the average wage, you begin to appreciate why so many wives and young people have to work to supplement the family income.

Is it any wonder that family members other than the adult male, the traditional breadwinner, have to find jobs to help pay the bills? Women and young people are in the labour force out of economic necessity. They are not "secondary" workers in terms of the needs of the majority of Canadian families today.

I also want to say to the Minister of Employment and his officials that the women and young people are not secondary in the work force today because the nature of the jobs in our work force has changed. The service sector of our economy has grown tremendously. Nursing, social services, hotels, restaurants, secretarial, clerking, teaching and other such services have grown. In 1956 only 48.5 per cent of jobs in Canada were in the service industry. In 1976 that had increased to 65.5 per cent.

If you claim that these people are only secondary and not serious income earners or serious to the work force, I shudder to think what would happen to our economy and the businesses that employ them if they were removed from the work force. I dare say that members of parliament would not be able to function since their staffs are primarily made up of women and young adults.

Women and young people are essential in our economy on both the supply and demand side. Their unemployment is no less tragic than the unemployment of the traditional unemployed male. These people are not secondary in importance. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) says that unemployment is a serious problem, but it is blown all out of proportion. That is a falsehood. We know from his own government department, Statistics Canada, that for every 100 unemployed in Canada today, there are only four vacant full-time jobs.

The unemployed are not lazy. They are not avoiding work. I dare the Prime Minister to go to Sudbury and say that there are jobs just begging for people to take in light of the recent INCO lay-offs. Therefore job creation must be of primary importance in the budget before us. I do not see that.

The government is bringing forward tax policies that I consider to be the wrong ones at the wrong time. It has brought forward a $1.2 billion corporate tax concession. I know my Liberal friends will immediately say we are opposed to any kind of corporate tax concession. That is not true. I want to argue that the kind of tax concessions they are bringing forward at this time are wrong in light of what is happening in our economy.

The other element of the job creation program in the budget is $150 million to supplement existing programs. We say that is not going to work. I will explain that later. We need an emergency job creation program at this time.

The New Democratic Party has outlined how we can create from 250,000 to 300,000 jobs during the winter months. We would give a billion and a half dollars tax cut to low and middle income taxpayers to stimulate buying power, decrease the present level of unused capacity in the economy, and create an estimated 100,000 to 150,000 jobs. We find support for this suggestion from no less a prestigious group than the Economic Council of Canada composed of businessmen, economists, and others from all walks of life, who also called for a tax cut of more than $2 billion to stimulate employment.

We would not want to cut back on family allowances and old age pensions, as the government has hinted it might do, nor would we want to see continued the plight in which the veterans have been placed because of the government's refusal to increase their pensions to a reasonable level—I am thinking particularly of veterans' disability pensions.

We would also favour the introduction of a $400 million federal-provincial-municipal capital works program, similar to the 1971 job creation program, which would create around 60,000 new jobs. We want to see a $500 million housing and urban transit program capable of creating 70,000 jobs, particularly in the construction industry. We also want to see a $50 million program of assistance to small businesses, currently so hard-pressed, which would assist them in hiring approximately 20,000 new employees, especially young people. These are some of the proposals which we put forward as leading to the creation of jobs on an emergency basis.

There is no need to resort to further deficit financing in order to finance the program I have just outlined. What we would do is this: we would redirect some of the tax policies the government has proposed in the budget. For example, we would end the $1.2 billion in tax concessions to large corporations announced last March and reintroduced by the Minister of Finance, and redirect it to personal income tax cuts. This is not because we say, as if in blinkers, that all corporate tax incentives are wrong. But these concessions are designed to encourage corporations to invest and expand their plants. We say it is a ridiculous policy at the present time because industry is only operating at about 80 per cent of its capacity. What businessman in his right mind would use these tax concessions to expand, when he cannot use his existing production line to full advantage?

Could there be any more ridiculous example of the failure of this policy than the realization that INCO, for example, will have received $10 million as a result of these measures, and has recently announced its intention to lay off 3,500 workers?

Alcan, which has profited from these measures to the extent of $11 million, has laid off 400 workers, and Noranda, to whom the concessions have meant $5 million, has already laid off 500 workers, and there are threats that another 1,200 will be laid off in the Gaspé region. This certainly flies in the face of all the assertions that these concessions generate employment. The fact is, and I use the government's own statistics, that since these budget tax concession measures were introduced last March we have seen lay-offs of more than 34,000 workers in the manufacturing industry. The minister is simply misleading the public when he says these concessions are needed to create jobs. They are the wrong concessions at the wrong time.

In today's Globe and Mail we find a survey made by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which shows that Canada's 300 largest companies do not expect to increase on average their capital spending in real terms in 1978. In other words, the budget measures are a failure. They are not creating the jobs the minister promised they would.

We could also finance the program I have outlined from savings through keeping people off unemployment insurance and keeping them paying income tax as employed persons. The saving in unemployment insurance claims would amount to about $1 billion, and the increased tax revenue from the newly employed would come to around $250 million. Thus, for our emergency job creation program, we could use the same funds as the government has laid out in the present budget, only they would be redirected.

As Eric Kierans, a former Liberal cabinet minister has noted on many occasions, the government has treated the 1,000 major corporations in this country in a most generous way. It has probably treated them better than any in the world. The profits of these corporations increased from $7.7 billion in 1970 to $17.8 billion in 1975, an increase of 131 per cent. At the same time, corporate tax rates declined from 29.6 per cent during that period of record profit increase to 26.6 per cent. The government has always favoured big business as opposed to small, and has allowed the corporate sector to defer payment of income tax to the tune of $10 billion. The 1,000 largest corporations owe the government $9 billion of this $10 billion deferment of taxes.

What we need is some attention paid not only to big business, as has always been the case in the past, but to small business which employs 60 per cent of the working people of this country. I am really angry that the government continues to ignore this major sector of our economy.

I have talked to small businessmen on many occasions. I find that their difficulty lies in raising working capital. The banks laugh off the government's small business loans program; they are not interested in it. The Federal Business Development Bank often applies criteria as strict as or even stricter than those imposed on borrowers by private banks. These sources are of no help to small businessmen who have the enterprise or the know-how, but who cannot find the capital to expand or put their projects into operation.

Businessmen also complain to me, time and time again, about the difficulty of obtaining information and management expertise under the programs the government offers. These programs are more often exercises in public relations than anything of substance. Businessmen need assistance, but I am afraid the government programs put roadblocks in their way rather than help them. There is too much government regulation, as they keep pointing out. They are not able to hire expensive accountants and lawyers to give them advice in these areas. The effects of taxation policies, the problems of cash flow, are very onerous.

If the Minister of Finance were really interested in job creation he would turn more of his attention to the small business sector in terms of tax concessions and the advice he could make available to them. I lament the state of small business. Bankrupticies are up 30 per cent and almost half these business failures involve small businesses in the retail sector. One of the key factors is reduced demand caused by high unemployment and the government's failure to stimulate demand by introducing tax cuts. We want to get the economy healthy again. We have to get Canadians back to work so that they are purchasing goods which the small businessman can supply.

I know the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister keep bringing forward the argument that the problem with business in Canada is that we are pricing ourselves out of world markets. We are told that we are no longer competitive. The Minister of Finance points to our trade deficit as proof of this, but I would like to remind him that the trade deficit includes goods and service transactions. It includes interest and dividends and profit outflows. We have had an over-all deficit for 13 out of the last 16 years. We should know that that deficit is as a result of service transactions by Canadians purchasing imported foreign goods.

In the merchandise trade sector where Canadian workers are involved, there has been a surplus in 15 of the 16 years, and the reason we have had a decline is that the volume of our sales has dropped because the countries which are our customers have been in a recession. I think it should be remembered the end products trade group, that is, the manufactured goods where we have a high labour component, in that group these exports have continued to grow. In fact last year our manufactured exports increased 15 per cent, and they are continuing to increase this year. So I ask the Minister of Finance, if we are pricing ourselves, our manufactured goods, out of the world market, why is it that the volume of our exports is continuing to grow?

I know that the minister is also putting forward a related argument to the phony one of our non-competitiveness, that wage settlements in Canada are higher than those in the United States, and that this justifies holding Canadian wages down to a 6 per cent increase under the AIB over the next year. That wage comparison, I am afraid, is also a myth. What we are trying to do is compare American wages to Canadian wages, but not taking into account the different variables.

First of all are Canadian wages, as the Prime Minister tries to argue, 7 per cent higher than in the United States? Well, the point is that he fails to recognize the Canadian dollar is worth less than the American dollar, so to make that kind of dollar for dollar wage comparison without taking that into account is misleading when our dollar is worth only 90 cents. The Canadian figures also include public service settlements, whereas the United States figures do not. Canadian figures are calculated on base rates, and the U.S. is on average hourly earnings. About 60 per cent of American workers have cost of living adjustments, but only 30 per cent of Canadians do. You have to take all those factors into consideration when making comparisons. When you do, as the National City Bank of New York has done, you get some pretty interesting revelations.

In 1976, before the 90 cent dollar, making the comparison for wage compensation, taking into account fringe benefits and everything else, the United States worker was paid $7.91 an hour while his Canadian counterpart was paid only $7.05 an hour, or 12 per cent less than his American counterpart—not 7 per cent more as the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister want us to believe. If you take the 90 cent dollar into consideration, the United States worker today is 25 per cent ahead of his Canadian worker in terms of wage settlements.

As well, the Minister of Finance knows Canadian workers have to pay more in interest rates, energy costs, housing, food, and most consumer goods than does his American counterpart.

I am sad that the Prime Minister still makes the workers of Canada the scapegoats for his government's mismanagement. The Liberals continue to hold wage increases below the cost of living increase, because we know the CPI is almost 9 per cent, but the majority of workers will be held to the 6 per cent increase under the guidelines of the anti-inflation program. I ask you, what justice is there in that?

Mr. Rodriguez: None.

Mr. Symes: In the budget before us the minister likes to boast about the individual tax relief that is there. He points out quite correctly that an average family of four people with an income of $15,000, for the tax year 1978 will save $100 by the tax credit method, and another $140 through indexing; a $240 tax saving.

Inflation is running at 9 per cent, and this projection will go on for 1978. It is well above the government's guideline of 4 per cent promised under the anti-inflation program. In addition to that, the AIB controls will be in effect for most working Canadians well into 1978. But the government, of course, in the budget announcement has changed the rules. It says that wage increases will be held to 6 per cent even if inflation is at 9 per cent or more. Therefore what happens to the average family which the minister says is going to get such a tax saving? If the income for that family is $15,000, as I have mentioned, they will see their income decline by $450 over the next year despite the tax relief of $240 in the budget. Because of wage controls that family will end up losing $210 in income next year. Where is the fairness in that kind of budgetary measure?

The NDP, supported by the Economic Council of Canada, has argued that what we need to stimulate the economy and to protect the average Canadian from the effects of inflation is a major personal income tax cut. That will stimulate consumer demand. That will create more jobs in the manufacturing industry which is so desperately in trouble at this time. I say to the minister, his budget contains the wrong kind of tax concessions at the wrong time of our economic history. What we need is some protection for the average worker and his family against inflation, which the government has failed to control.

What we need more is a stimulus to consumer demand, as the Economic Council has recommended, so that we can get Canadians back to work again. Unless the government realizes our major problem is unemployment, which has to be tackled by meaningful budgetary measures, I am afraid that we are in for a very, very hard winter indeed, Mr. Speaker, and that things can only get worse.

I say to my colleagues on the Liberal side of the House that what I have tried to do is present an analysis of the problem, and recommend some concrete alternatives to the present policy. I do so in the spirit of trying to work out the best plan for the unemployed in this country. I think the minister has to recognize, as have so many economists, that his present policies are inadequate to deal with this crucial and pressing problem of unemployment.

I hope that when we move back into committee he will be sympathetic to some of our amendments so we can get Canadians back to work, and get consumers and taxpayers protected against the ravages of inflation and unemployment.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset I am very pleased to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is present, and I thank his colleagues from the Privy Council who are here with him too.

The subjects I intend to speak about tonight are not earth-shaking, but are important. They are two in number. The first one is SIN, and the second one is potential. To the uninitiated SIN simply means social insurance number. My memory goes back, as the Minister of Finance's memory goes back, to the year 1964 when the Prime Minister of this country gave a solemn promise on the floor of this House that the social insurance number could not be used for anything beyond social services programs, such as unemployment insurance and the Canada Pension Plan. The Prime Minister of that time was well aware of the fact that the great majority of the Canadian people, and in fact the great majority of all free people, do not like to see this gradual closing in of unneeded controls and regulations on the individual.

Parliament reluctantly accepted the social insurance number system in 1964 on the argument that it would make it possible to operate the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance better. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) brought this up in this debate and quoted the passage out of Hansard in which this pledge was made in 1964. The background was simple. The House leader then, who is not present here tonight, was the hon. member for Cape Breton. The leader of the opposition was pressing him on whether they were going to extend this SIN to other uses. What was concerning the leader of the opposition, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in particular was the fact that the National Revenue people would seize this device as another weapon in their arsenal to control every drop of water, every drop of blood in this country.

In response to this type of questioning by the right hon. member for Prince Albert the then Prime Minister said that certainly SIN would not be imposed for the use of the income tax collectors. That was a pledge made in good faith, and I am positive it was the viewpoint of every sitting member of parliament, regardless of whether he was a Liberal, a Conservative, a member of the NDP or a Creditiste, because the great majority—in fact all the members of the House—do not like to see the continual erosion of our civil liberties, step by step, at the increasing pace at which they are being eroded today.

The bill that brought about this unhappy change, this breach of a Prime Minister's word to the people of Canada, was brought forward last February. Under a similar type of bill as we are discussing here today, the government was trying to get through the budget resolutions of the 1976 budget. It was a long bill, and way down at the end of the bill was clause 75, an innocuous clause written in legalistic language designed not to attract the attention of members of parliament on any side. It was sneaked into the bill. It had nothing to do with the budget resolutions.

Where were the members of the legislative committee of the cabinet? How did they let that clause slip into the legislation before the House? I do not know how. It must have been in their complete absence of mind or exhaustion, because theirs was the ultimate responsibility to keep their eye on those nitwits in the Department of National Revenue who are always trying to extend their power over the people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I do not want to mention the RCMP, but they even have the RCMP under agreement, to have them carry out their dirty work. I am positive here tonight that there is not a single member on the government benches or on the opposition benches who would not support a removal of this iniquitous provision in clause 75 of Bill C-22 of last year. Every one of us in the House is guilty, with the exception of the hon. member for Edmonton West who did notice it and cried out during the voting "on division". Many of you will remember the occasion. The hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) was waging a one man filibuster.

Mr. Rodriguez: I needed help.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The government became angry and imposed closure on us eventually. After clause 62 was reached, closure came into effect, and clause by clause was passed one after another. That is the only excuse we, as members of parliament, have that we let that clause go through. But everyone of us, having let it go through, should be ashamed, and we in the opposition have to accept that responsibility as well as members of the government.

My remarks to the Minister of Finance are simple. My memory goes back a number of years during the regimes of the last nine finance ministers when I have seen every one of them, without exception, destroyed, and rarely any one of them was responsible for his own destruction. In each case, with the tremendous responsibility that each one of them had looking after the finances of Canada, the same group which controls the decision-making in that department and in related departments had the minister of finance do things for which he ultimately had to take the responsibility. I have seen them go down since the days of Walter Harris, one after another.

If there is any crusade that I lead in this House, it is not only to protect ministers of finance from the awful fate that lies in wait for them but to protect this House and this parliament in general. So what I say to the minister now is that we in the opposition cannot make an amendment to a bill unless there is a clause in it which would allow us to amend it. The minister cannot do so now either. When we go into committee of the whole I think he would be speaking for every single member on the government side if he put in a simple clause deleting clause 5 regarding SIN in Bill C-22 amending the Income Tax Act. Why do I say that?

When we put through clause 75 under closure it simply said that if any person went into a bank and presented a bond with coupons on it and they did not have with them their SIN, 25 per cent of the value of their coupons would have to be retained by the bank and submitted to the Department of National Revenue, and of course it would be entered as part of the prepayment of their income tax.

Who were the people the Department of National Revenue were after? They were after all the young children who do not have SIN and whose parents bought them $50 or $100 bonds instead of Christmas or birthday presents as savings for the time when they would move into their teens. This also applies to the older people, but above all it applies to the married women who do not have an income of their own, who are not in the work force, and who occasionally get their husbands to buy them a bond. That coupon clipping that they do once a year is equivalent to what we used to have on the farm years ago when the farmer allowed the wife to take the money she got from selling eggs—the egg money, they called it. They used to collect enough money that way to buy Christmas presents for their family.

Here you have these minute searches after minute drops of water and drops of blood. Sneaking through past the politician into the statute books of this country was a clause last February causing a situation we now have to clean up.

There are other points that I could raise, such as the attempt to force the banks to do the dirty work of National Revenue. This did not pass unnoticed, and I have a letter dated October 6, 1977, from the Canadian Bankers' Association, to which I rarely have access. It states simply:

> It is unfair that banks should bear the brunt of reaction of the public against intrusions into their financial affairs.

● (2052)

We can all weep for the banks; they are in the firing line. Later on from another gentleman in this same organization I received a copy of a press release sent out by the banks on this same matter. Incidentally, this is from a Toronto bank. It says:

SIN pays. Or at least, it may be inconvenient if you don't have it.

In this case, SIN refers to a Social Insurance number. Starting soon, you'll need one to get the full amount due when you collect certain bond interest payments from banks and other financial institutions.

The Canadian Bankers Association (CBA) issued this caution today, following confirmation that regulations embodied in amendments to the federal Income Tax Act will be effective from July 1.

The CBA said customers who hold corporate, federal, provincial and municipal bonds and who don't have a Social Insurance number, would be wise to apply for one now to avoid future inconvenience. It normally takes at least two weeks to get a number.

The regulations specify that banks and other cashing agents must withhold one quarter of the interest payment if the customer doesn't provide a Social Insurance number. This is remitted to the government and is credited to the taxpayer.

"We want to make it clear that in this matter the banks are acting to comply with the law", the CBA said. "We have no choice but to withhold the 25 per cent if a Social Insurance number is not provided".

I could go on and read letter after letter from individuals, and I may read one or two of them, but I am more interested in the battle that went on in the press as to who was going to take the blame for this.

I will quote now from a full page ad in the Montreal Gazette dated September 21 under the subject "Important News about Canada Savings Bonds". Who do you suppose put this ad out? It was the Department of Finance. Who do you suppose got the blame? The Minister of Finance. He did not even know it went out. The government wants us to buy bonds. We are in a deficit position. Let me put this on the record, loudly and clearly. In big letters its says:

Your social insurance number is important. This year, your social insurance number will be requested when you purchase Canada Savings Bonds. This number will provide accurate identification of your Canada Savings Bond account and will be a single lifetime account number for you no matter how many bonds you buy or when you buy them. It will thus enable the Bank of Canada to provide you with better and faster service in the event that you write to inquire about the status of your bonds.

The people who drafted these ads were telling the people that, according to the statute, they have to have their social insurance numbers when they go to collect on coupons. They went even further and said that people have to have their social insurance numbers to purchase the bonds. What a bunch of sniping and looking into people's affairs that is! Well, time goes on and the criticism increases.

Just a few days ago, November 14, the Bank of Canada replied. It knew the Department of Finance was catching all the blame, so it came out with a story which it fed to the press through one of its pigeons. According to this paper here are some of the statements it made:

"The social insurance number is a positive and unique identification. No matter how many John Smiths there are, only one of them has that particular number."

The official said the Bank of Canada is adopting a new, highly-computerized system so each person's CSB-holdings can be listed under his or her account number.

You don't have to supply your social insurance number when you buy bonds, "but you have everything to gain and nothing to lose by doing so," the official said . . .

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain).]

That completely contradicts what the Department of Finance was saying. The Department was saying that you have to have them. I suggest that the Bank of Canada rushed into the breach trying to find some rationalization as to why the numbers were needed. The bank gave the examples of all the John Smiths in every telephone book, and of the fellow who lost his bonds in the refrigerator and they went out with the garbage. The only real reason for this new change in our statute law on taxation is that the Department of National Revenue wants to catch that unique person who makes less than $10 on coupon cashing per year, because if your coupons amount to $10 or more the bank always reports that to the department.

The department is after that person who has the colossal gall to put his savings into bonds which yield less than $10 per year, and that person must not be forgotten. If 25 per cent is taken off, that person usually has no income tax papers to make out. Invariably that means that an older person will not get that 25 per cent. The department wants everybody to make out an income tax form. I suggest to the minister that it would not cause any fuss amongst his supporters in the House of Commons on the government side, and all the people on this side will support him, if he stands up in the committee of the whole and says he is prepared to allow a very simple amendment. He would not need any lawyer to draft it. The amendment would simply be that subclause (5) of clause 234 of the Income Tax Act is deleted.

Mr. Chrétien: If we ever get to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): That amendment would get rid of another encroachment on our civil liberties. I have some editorials I was going to read, but I think I will leave that for another occasion because there is another subject to which I would like to bring attention.

I put these ideas forward, hopefully in a constructive manner, because I know that any person holding the job of Minister of Finance must be seriously concerned about the mess our economic situation seems to be in. The Minister of Finance knows that we have a very strong and healthy country, so why does it just go along level as it has been for the two years since we established the so-called anti-inflation controls? The minister must be spending some time thinking about that. He knows that the great majority of people believe that the government is spending too much money. He has done a yeoman-type job over the past years trying to control the spenders in the cabinet, and we have noticed that. However, here we have a situation about which the minister must be aware, and we are all worried about it.

We have today a large number of unemployed. Whether the number is 800,000 or one million is not the point. It is a large number. At the same time we have our plant capacity lying 20 per cent unused all across Canada. This situation is not new or unique. It happens every time we go into a prolonged recession, and it takes a tremendous momentum or a change in momentum to get the situation reversed. Therefore the minister must be worrying about this. He knows that if he does not have some ideas on how to change that, he is going to go the way of every previous minister of finance—out. It is not any matter of satisfaction to me to see some very able people going into that portfolio and getting chewed up, one after the other.

The proposal I am putting forward is not original with me or with this country. There is a precedent which has been used, to my knowledge, only in a western country, and only in one. When I read the history of how that was done, I find that it was very unique.

It so happened at that particular time in United States history that President Kennedy was very anxious to be in the forefront of new ideas, and this applied to the financing of the country's affairs. He had working for him in the Economic Council a man by the name of Heller. They, too, had a huge unused labour supply ready and willing to work. They, too, had unused plant capacity, and the federal Government of the United States was operating as the present minister is operating, under a tremendous deficit.

The natural tradition of all the orthodox economists, therefore, who try to keep their two-bits worth before the president and away from Congress, was to get back to the old fashioned way of doing things—simply raise taxes to get more money, or reduce expenditures to balance the budget. One man, Heller, gets the credit for proposing that the best way to balance the budget was not to retrench, go into seclusion and wait for time and events to balance it—as this government has been doing for three years, waiting for the United States economy to recover. He proposed that this unused labour supply, this unused plant capacity, were a great opportunity for a young, virile president to try the idea. His proposition was that with substantial tax reductions in those areas where you could immediately start tremendous activity in the work force and in the plant, you would create enough new wealth and reduce costs to the point where you would get your money back. This is a layman's description of what we call potential budgeting. There was a potential there.

I will not go through all the activities of the 1962-63 period. In the year 1964, however, President Kennedy allowed himself to be persuaded by his Economic Council even though the federal budget was operating at a great deficit, to reduce taxes in the United States by $10 billion in one year. That would be the equivalent of seven or eight times as much today. When you are already in the hole, $10 billion would seem crazy to the orthodox person who does not want to accept new ideas.

Heller put forth the doctrine that the best, quickest, and most humane way to balance the budget was to get the tax level down on those items that would create an immediate desire to go to work. They did reduce the budget by decreasing taxes in 1964 by $10 billion. The president was assassinated that year and it fell to the lot of President Johnson to receive the great flood of revenue that poured in. The $10 billion in tax reductions was not money that was spent; it was simply money they were not going to take in during the next year. It brought increased revenue because of the number of people who went to work and the plant capacity that started up again. In that one year it produced revenue of $19 billion.

Instead of ending up in the hole by another $10 billion, because of that imaginative and at that time innovative program, the United States came out with a surplus. As President Johnson said, it was able to pay not only for the great society he talked about but also for the Vietnam war. It turned out that he was wrong. Even the United States could not support both for long. I point that out to the minister because the condition in Canada today is very similar.

The only argument against what I have said is that in Johnson's day and in Kennedy's day there was no indexing of taxes or pensions. You can argue that today these things would reduce the amount that would come in as increased revenue from all these people working. Let me deal with that for a moment.

The type of thing that I would like to see, if this approach were to be followed, is tax reductions for those things that the country needs and wants. I will give examples in a minute. New types of production would be brought into play. It is pretty hard to prove, with people running on margin as they are today, that encouraging them to go out and spend will create jobs because plants are already working under capacity.

If you could find a number of things that this country has to do and wants to do and direct our efforts that way, in every case I think this would not be expenditure of money by the federal treasury but simply the statement that you are not going to take taxes if certain things are done. If this new labour force goes to work and the new plant capacity goes to work, and wages and salaries are going to people who before were drawing unemployment insurance and social welfare, you reduce those costs, and with all those people working and paying income tax, and all the money going through the system with a multiplier effect of two and a half or three, a billion dollars of new industry would generate $2.5 billion to $3 billion of new wealth. The $3 billion of new wealth, with the governments getting 40 per cent of it, would bring in more than the new program.

I know that new wealth is divided among the governments, roughly 40 per cent to the federal government, 40 per cent to the provincial governments and 20 per cent to the smaller governments. The fact remains that if the tax reductions were put on the right items, within one or two years the budget would be balanced. We could then begin to do things to encourage people to spend, and we could put out dividends for the extra amounts of money for payment to provinces or in social services.

I am sure this concept is not new to the minister. I am simply reminding him that at this time all the conditions that make potential budgeting work, are present. It will not work if this technique is tried where there is no big labour supply and no extra plant capacity. This is the time to move. This opportunity has been present for the last two or three years, but perhaps this winter is the last chance.

I would now like to suggest to the minister, if he accepts this premise, some things on which taxes could be reduced that would give fast results. I am sure the minister is aware, as are most members, that these days we are moving very quickly toward changing our energy utilization. Documents which project utilization of solar hardware indicate that there is a market right now of $1 billion or $2 billion per year for devices to be used in private homes and office buildings. There is a score of examples.

By the end of this decade I believe that almost every home in Canada will have a heat pump. The cost will be $1,000 to $3,000 for the ordinary home. A heat pump acts as an air conditioner in summer, and pumps heat into the house in winter. They can be manufactured in Canada, and indeed they have been on the market for 50 years. A warehouse in Ottawa is full of heat pumps, all unavailable to people here because it is an American firm waiting for the right time to move into the market in this area.

All through the southern areas of Canada—that covers about 90 per cent of the population—a heat pump would be a good investment. In addition to the hardware, which costs $1,000 to $3,000, there are devices that go along with it for use with solar heat. At the present time the idea of direct solar energy, coming through plates is not too economic. But solar assisted techniques are currently in use by big companies. Governments do not use these techniques because they tend to look at bigger things which cost $200,000 or $300,000.

Referring to little individuals across Canada, some are spending $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 of their money to take water out of their wells and put it in heat pumps to raise the temperature of the water in order to heat their houses. The water is returned to the well, and is warmed up again. The only cost to those individuals is the capital cost of the heat pumps, and the cost of the electricity to run those pumps, which amounts to approximately $100 a year. This is not something in the dream world five years or ten years away from now. This is being done currently.

Some people use the water from a river or a stream which runs by their houses. Other people use water storage. There is a score of techniques which require a certain amount of hardware in order to change it from one type of heat to another. These are not unproven devices. We have the capacity in our plants now to produce these things in the thousands. The government should distribute that information to Canadians.

The Minister of Finance will have a simple role to play. Since very few people have these heat pumps in Canada, and since only businesses are allowed to buy them today, under the direction of the big companies which produce them, if they are told by the minister that they will be entitled to a 100 per cent write-off for a heat pump against their taxes, within three years every householder in Canada will be struggling to get a heat pump. That indicates how big the market could be. All these people will not be able to get the pumps, because that many could not be manufactured quickly enough.

A lot of this information is available in Ottawa. Canada leads the world in this type of information. A lot of it is still in the experimental stage. The scientists and engineers have accomplished well, but the hardware has not reached the production stage. The National Research Council has developed a silent vertical windmill which spins around on the top of its building. Several prototypes have been distributed across the country. All of them work, except for the one in Saskatchewan. Approximately $50,000 has been spent in an attempt to make that one work, and it produced only $2 worth of electricity.

Mr. Paproski: It was manufactured by the NDP.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The Minister of Finance must stimulate the economy by telling people that these productive investments can be written off. This is a type of hard goods for the consumer, which is not being bought now. There would be no loss of revenue, but it would encourage people to buy the correct things and save money in the long run.

If the minister put through a 150 per cent write-off on experimental things such as the vertical axle windmill which runs silently, every farmer, or any person with flat land around his house, would have one of these windmills to get rid of that $100 which it costs to run the heat pump. This type of 150 per cent write-off was done by parliament in 1959.

As one goes down the list of things that can be done, one realizes that, without any expenditure by the government, Canada would benefit by the activity in the employment field, the extra wages and salaries. The government could recover some of its money from income taxes which rates hopefully could be reduced in a couple of years.

Because we are in a mess today and everything seems hopeless, the Minister of Finance has nowhere to hide. The finger will be pointed at him. He will have to indicate that he is not going to be under the thumb of the high mandarins in his department and related departments. These mandarins were taught a doctrine 40 years ago in school and they feel it must be carried out by the Minister of Finance.

Potential budgeting was tried by Presidents Kennedy and Johnson who found out it was the best way to balance a budget. Admittedly it would not work if times were good. It only works when times are bad and you want to restore the confidence of the people. If the minister wants to save himself from the fate which awaits him, he cannot sit and come out with a neutral budget like the last two ministers produced. That is no way to die. He must pick up his sword and go out and swish it around a bit. The hon. minister must remember he comes from Shawinigan. He is not a Montreal or Toronto boy.

Mr. Paproski: Use that hockey stick!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The minister has hair on his chest. He should not let a bunch of well trained, gobbledygook artists in his department run him any longer. He must get on with it. His next budget should take into consideration all the things that can be done which do not cost. These things encourage people to do other things, and the government receives money in the long run. If the minister does these things, he will discover that public servants will like him.

Public servants have a great weakness: they are always proud of ministers if they do the right thing. If the right thing is done, public servants will brag about it. Public servants are human beings who are proud of their departments, but they are so used to pushing ministers around that many of them think it is a God-given right.

Mr. Paproski: If they are Liberals.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): The leaks which have been coming out of the Public Service in the last few years have been caused by the frustration of public servants. The Liberal government has been in power so much in the last 50 years that it is used to taking orders from public servants. Surely the people from Shawinigan have not sunk that low. Stand up, Shawinigan! The country is in a mess. The minister must restore its confidence.

As the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) said, we are dealing with a budget. In regard to the income tax changes, the majority of Canadians agree with the minister. They are small little items that do not do too much. The minister requires imagination and a little of the spirit of Shawinigan in order to do things differently, to direct these fellows for a change, and to take over. The minister was forced to put down the last little report of the Economic Council of Canada. These timid souls are only there for one purpose, and that is to give the Minister of Finance advice which is different from what he receives from his department. But they are so timid that they come out with gentle little statements. This is the second time they have done so. They have put forth the theory of potential budgeting, and they should not be put down entirely.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if he has unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I suppose I sound like a school teacher, but I am sure the minister is aware that I am sincere when I say that these ideas will point the way. Our country is a good country. These people are not all bad. If the minister thinks of the various ways in which things can be accomplished between now and the next budget that do not require the spending of money, but in fact make money, he could come out of this situation as the first minister of finance in ten years who has stood on his feet and spoken for the Canadian people. I would like to see that, regardless of what party is in power.

Mr. McGrath: They would be proud of him in Shawinigan.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the comments which have just been made by the hon. member who spoke before me about the hopes he has put in the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). This is the first time I have had the opportunity to take part in a debate on a subsidy motion since he has this portfolio. Therefore, I understand that he made considerable efforts to sponsor Bill C-11 which contains some provisions amending the Income Tax Act with the purpose of giving certain tax advantages to revive the economy.

I think that all hon. members in the House agree that this revival is very urgent. I think however that the proposed measures are not sufficient and that the economy will continue to deteriorate in several areas of the country. Mr. Speaker, I shall particularly dwell upon the main points of this bill which will have some impact on the people and on the industries in my area, and on Canadian agriculture. The real per capita income has constantly decreased in the last few years and the individuals are more and more indebted, which puts a very large number of taxpayers in the income-cost of living vice which becomes increasingly tight. These are at least the comments which have been made to us every day by people of the working classes.

A few days ago, the Minister of Finance said he was disappointed to see that the cost of living went up again by 1 per cent. Mr. Speaker, each time the cost of living rises, low-income people have less purchasing power when they should actually have more. However, we see the contrary. I think the price and wage control program is a failure when it comes to prices and profits. On the other hand, wage controls were rather successful, which leaves most wage earners in quite a difficult situation.

If we consider the record of our banking institutions, we realize that they have made more profits than any other industry in the economic field. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself has admitted that fact. I have already quoted him in the House on this matter. I hope you will forgive me for bringing up that subject again, but this time without quoting. If these institutions have managed to increase their profits it is because the control regulations did not have authority over them and because the ceiling for interest rates has been abolished in 1967, and God knows how the profits of these insitutions have gone up during the last ten years. I think this is one of the reasons which has put Canada in such an inflationary economic situation.

Those excessively high rates of interest are responsible for the inflation in the prices of goods and services. Rising prices put Canadian industries in an unfavourable position against competing foreign product imports. Finally, the Canadian Manufacturers Association is aware of this situation. This morning, my colleagues met members of that association who apprised us of their worries about the future, the survival of private enterprise, of small and medium-sized businesses which, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has stated in this House, are those that provide Canada with 60 per cent of its jobs. Is it any wonder that the rate of unemployment goes up progressively as those businesses have problems and have to lay off employees? If solutions are not found for the short term, while planning over the long term, I am very much afraid the future of a very large number of those small and average businesses is very bleak indeed.

However, we often hear well intentioned people, I hope, claim that inflation is caused mainly by unduly high salaries. That may be true of some categories of workers and professionals who do not hesitate to ask fairly high fees when Canadians turn to them for their services. But I do not agree with blaming price inflation solely on wage earners. A huge number of non-unionized workers now earn less than the minimum wage.

Speaking of the minimum salary, we are told that it is higher here in Canada than in the United States and that this causes problems for the Canadian industries as compared with American firms. That is true, but the fact remains that today a couple with two or three children cannot be asked to work 40 hours a week for $3 an hour. That is $120 gross, and considering the costs those people have to pay just like everyone else—public services, electricity, telephone, heating oil, in short all the basic needs—it cannot be said that those workers are the cause of inflation, of higher prices. Let us be reasonable. It behoves the state, in difficult situations, to introduce measures to straighten out matters in that sector. I understand that it is normal, when a business is expanding, when it wants to create employment, that it deserves to be given every possible chance of doing so.

But if we really are to give them a chance to expand and survive, we must look at the budgetary operations of these companies which must pay very high interest rates, thus increasing their operating costs and becoming less competitive. I said earlier that the control program had not been a complete success. We are not overly optimistic about the outcome of the recovery program introduced by the Minister of Finance. I understand it has been prepared in a hurry and that the government will perhaps announce more worthwhile measures in the real budget. Life is made of hope. Until then, the new Minister of Finance will certainly have the opportunity to get to the root of the matter and, as the previous speaker said, to twist the arms of those whom may wish to maintain old formulas and to keep on administering in 1977 as we did 25 or 30 years ago. In the Speech from the Throne, we are told this was a failure and that we should use more modern processes. I hope that in the new budget we shall have up-dated and more modern formulas which will enable us to hope for an improved situation.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

The thousands of unemployed who are now hoping are quite prepared to work, thus contributing to the recovery of our economy. We should at least give them the chance to do it. Before I came to the House tonight, the mayor of a municipality spoke to me on the phone for some 20 minutes, and he insisted so that the very well prepared and organized project that he put forward under the program Canada at Work be accepted and implemented in order to give work to the unemployed of his community as early as possible. Of course, I have also commended this project because I think it is worthwhile. Those people are making fantastic efforts, they do practical things, but when there are $3.5 million worth of projects for a budget of only $1,159,000, some of them of course have to be shelved.

This is why I am asking and suggesting to the Minister of Finance, along with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), that more funds be made available to the Department of Employment so that it can sponsor a larger number of worthwhile projects. I am not dealing with meaningless projects; I am speaking only of good projects which do something useful, those projects which please the whole community and from which everybody can benefit.

Mr. Speaker, the tax concessions provided in this bill are there to allow companies to invest more money in Canada and create new jobs. I fully agree with that but I think we will have to exert some surveillance over these companies. I fear that more money will just disappear in the long run, that it will take some other direction. The recent behaviour of INCO and Noranda Mines Limited, to talk only about those two, clearly demonstrates that these large corporations do not give a heck about reinvesting in the country. They prefer to reinvest their money in other countries, looking down their nose at Canadians. This is where the government's authority intervenes. The government must take radical steps, if necessary, to force the companies that have been allowed to make profits here to reinvest these profits in Canada in order to help with more development and enable us to keep up with competition. I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance: I think that rebates made on real investments in Canada might be much more indicated. Of course, these partial rebates could be calculated according to the number of jobs created.

There would then be a reaction between capital and manpower resources. In this optic, I believe that the amendments aimed at increasing tax credits for investment are a step in the right direction. The higher credit percentages for the designated areas should stimulate investments in these areas and contribute to reduce regional disparities. There is no doubt that the Maritimes and the Gaspe peninsula need these special stimulants.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the region which neighbours on the Maritime provinces and the Gaspe peninsula, that is the south shore and east shore of Quebec. The economic situation in the Bellechasse and Kamouraska ridings is far from favourable. Among the many characteristics that these areas have in common, there is unfortunately a very high rate of unemployment. This is why I invite the Minister of Finance to reconsider clause 127(10) of the bill so that the definition of areas eligible for the 10 per cent tax credit for investment be extended to include, in addition to the Maritime provinces, the south shore east of Highway 23 which links Lévis to the state of Maine. Indeed, this is the area covered by the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. Therefore, such an amendment would simply correspond to existing legislation.

For this region to survive and to develop normally, it must be provided with economic advantages by the federal and provincial governments. Why not grant tax rebates on fuel used by businesses which operate on diesel engines?

Mr. Speaker, I have a letter sent to me by a medium size business which echoes its concerns about the rising costs of transportation. I wish to quote from it as I consider this letter very timely and it demonstrates that it is only after consultation with those businesses that I make those comments. So I am told, and I quote:

I respectfully draw your attention on some data concerning the trucking business. We employ between 35 and 50 employees annually, all depending on the transportation industry. We are a medium size enterprise but, nevertheless, hundreds of farm producers of the southern Quebec area depend on us as to transport cattle to the slaughter-houses.

And the operations of those slaughter houses depend on the quantity of animals we deliver to them and so they directly depend on transportation. It means that our service can be considered as vital for the society and the economy of the area. The taxes we pay and the share paid by other transportation firms contribute to a large extent to the construction and use of highways in our area and the province.

As a result, transportation firms are paying more than their share of registration costs but the government would like to increase that share . . .

I understand that this part of the letter concerns the provincial government.

. . . believing that it is insufficient. Is it its intention to reduce the number of trucks on highways or their economic contribution to each area of the province?

The important point is this:

If transportation firms must reduce their number of trucks due to the excessive cost of . . .

—everything they must use in their operations—

. . . it will eliminate many jobs and in some cases those employment losses will affect the economy of a town, of an area depending almost exclusively on that industry.

Mr. Speaker, it is not for nothing that earlier I asked that the possibility of lowering the tax on the fuel used in diesel engines be considered again, be it in the case of industries using stationary engines or in the case of big trucking firms.

I also wish to ask the government to show greater understanding towards depressed areas. It is not our fault if Canada is big and not very populated. This means that all across this country there are Canadians who live and have the right to like their regions but who would rather enjoy former living standards. This is why we have a government, namely to make it easier for all Canadians to enjoy a decent standard of living geared to the economic potential of Canada. Who else than the government can do better to try and establish equity between all regions of the country? These regions, such as the south shore, are not progressing at the same pace as Montreal for example. Yet, we have a human capital quite capable of achieving more than it is presently doing. The number of unemployed is quite high and it is sad to witness such a waste of human energy. There is talk about increasing productivity in Canada. These are the kind of energies that could contribute to higher productivity but no steps are taken to use them efficiently.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I will act as a member from the opposition who is not obsessed only with showing his opposition. When something good is done, I do not mind saying so. I would therefore like to take the opportunity to thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) whom I scolded a good many times in the past, and whom I want to thank tonight as well as his colleague from Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) for the restoration of the Montmagny wharf. I had so often talked about it in this House that it had become a rather embarrassing subject to raise. But, in any event, the matter has been given consideration, the works are in progress and the population is generally satisfied as I am happy to report. I would also like to thank the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) for what is now taking place on Berthier's wharf. A long boat slip is being installed and will be used not only for the benefit of the people of Berthier but by any member of this House who will decide to visit my riding, as I invite them to do. Berthier's wharf is beautiful and now with this long boat slip things will be just fine.

Again I am pressing the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). And I do not intend to give up—

An hon. Member: You cannot have everything!

An hon. Member: Leave something for us.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): We are talking about Quebec. We are told that we do not have our share. When we do I like to say so. When we do not I like to say so as well.

I am asking the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to prepare a specific project for the south shore, within the framework of the Ottawa-Quebec agreements. This region would be recognized as a special area within which we would promote the development of existing industries and the establishment of new plants to absorb a large pool of skilled local labour. I am sorry when I see that the only thing available for those big healthy boys who have been studying or who have a trade is social welfare, not even unemployment insurance, because never having had the opportunity to work they cannot even draw unemployment benefits.

The situation is really serious and if we are not dealing with it now I think we will regret it. This is true not only for the south shore region but for other regions as well. I would like to deal with another aspect of the question, the "employment expenses deduction" which used to be $150 and is now to be raised to $250.

This is a very good start, but in fact it is much below the real costs. Travel expenses alone top the new amount, especially in rural or semi-rural areas where people are often faced with a 40-, 50- or 60-mile commuting distance. The worker who has to commute over those 40 miles has to spend more than $450 a year. In my view, the maximum deduction should be increased by at least $200. Unemployment is severe enough already without penalizing those who are working. They also deserve attention.

And while on the subject of penalties, I would like to stress how ridiculous clause 6(5) is, subjecting the $350 home insulation grant to income tax. A number of members in this House already felt such an initiative was absurd. As far as I am concerned I feel it is very worthwhile, provided taxpayers can take advantage of it. But in the province of Quebec we cannot, and I once more urge the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to press for and accelerate negotiations between officials from both levels of government, so we can one day give an answer to those who would like to take advantage of the program, telling them, yes everything is settled, they can file their applications, have the work done and get paid. I feel I am being very positive and I would like officials to take note of our remarks. We are not fighting them, all we ask is that they find ways, formulas so that Quebecers like all other Canadians may take advantage of that initiative.

Mr. Speaker, there is one way to promote consumer spending, because it has been said, and rightly so, that in some areas consumer spending is too low. We came forward not so long ago with a proposal for a retail discount. I shall amplify that next week if the bill I introduced in this House is called for debate in the course of next week.

Finally, I would call the minister's attention to the possible adverse impact of capital gains tax and I ask once more that the Minister of Finance review that policy. In recent years, acting on an idea by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), a number of family farms were incorporated. It is true that advantages outweigh disadvantages, but the forecasts for capital gains tax will likely put an end to these advantages by unjustly penalizing the father who sells his farm to his son. Even if these farms have been given a corporate status, we should not forget that they nevertheless remain family farms. That is why I would ask the minister to reconsider these measures so that family farms are not subjected to such disadvantages.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize the urgency of adopting truly stimulating measures for the economy. It is not only in the interest of our own welfare but for the welfare of the young generations. They should not have to pay for our failures and those of our present leaders. If this government cannot solve the serious problems facing it, how will we be able tomorrow to condemn their apathy, even their cynicism towards our institutions.

I urge all members and ministers to see to the implementation of that part of the throne speech which was read by Her Majesty the Queen on October 18 last and who said that it was absolutely necessary if we wanted to emerge from chaos to resort to new formulas. The cabinet which is responsible should seriously listen to the suggestions of hon. members, whatever the side from which they originate. I think we are all seriously working together to improve the economy to the country, to settle the problems which are disrupting harmony in Canada.

At times we refer to national unity, at others, to national harmony; I feel it is nicer to speak about harmony. It means a little more love for one another and I think it is the only way to ensure the survival of our country, of Canada as we know it. We need formulas to promote that harmony and if we take care we will attain that aim and the future generations will be happy and pleased with us.

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I think it is appropriate that I begin my remarks in this debate by saying that surely it must be considered as a dual capacity type of debate because it not only deals with actual income tax amendments but it also serves as a budget debate. That was not possible after the minister's mini-budget speech during the throne debate.

I find it indeed strange that our Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should have sent out a news release the day after the debate began—I believe it was November 8—urging all members to avoid unnecessary delay in proceeding with it, after the same kind of bill in the last session, Bill C-56, for the budget of last spring, was given first reading only last June 15 and then was never called for second reading debate during the last session. So this new bill, Bill C-11, which we are debating all of this week, is indeed more than doubly important to all Canadians. My remarks tonight will relate primarily to those aspects of the bill pertaining to small businesses, including agriculture, with special reference to the Canadian cattle industry.

Almost three years ago I took part in the same kind of debate, both on second reading and in committee of the whole. That was on February 4 and February 18, 1975. At that time my remarks concentrated on the impact of the capital gains tax on incorporated family farms and farm partnerships. You will remember that the new approach to our tax structure involving capital gains had started on January 1, 1972.

During that earlier debate, the minister of the day—of course it was Mr. Turner—denied any possibility of roll-over tax provisions that were permitted for individual farm operators for intergenerational transfers of ownership in incorporated family farms and partnerships. I want to take another look at this issue today, almost three years later, and I suggest this is certainly the time for another look at this very important aspect of present-day agriculture under existing tax laws.

Incorporated family farms account for a disproportionately large share of Canadian farm production. Seven per cent of our Canadian farms are incorporated, but they account for 28 per cent of total farm production, and this does not include partnerships. Why did they incorporate in the first place, particularly 15, 20 and 25 years ago? The fundamental reason was to enhance and preserve the family farm as a continuing and meaningful farm unit. Now the exact opposite is taking place, that is, the breaking up of family farm units due to the inescapable requirements of the capital gains provisions for corporate and partnership farms.

In those earlier days governments, both provincial and federal, actively promoted farm incorporations. Then you will recall the Carter Tax Commission. It recommended incorporation for certain size farms, usually the larger size. Perhaps the most immediate reason that appealed to farmers themselves was that wives and family members could be legally involved and paid for their services on the family farm. Our Income Tax Act, as amended back in 1975, as I said, and again now as proposed in this bill, is still not adequate with respect to capital gains tax provisions for incorporated family farms, small businesses, and partnerships.

I want to begin by presenting three specific case histories of actual family farm corporations. All of these have very serious problems involved in a proposed intergenerational transfer because of the inadequacies of our federal tax laws. While these case histories deal with farms and ranches that are larger than average, I suggest the same problems exist for much smaller incorporated family businesses and partnerships.

The first case history is a fairly large cattle ranch in western Canada. It is operated by the third and fourth generation in the same family on the same cattle ranch, and there is a fifth generation well on the way. This cattle ranch has been placed on the market. It was advertised for sale quite recently. It has a value of somewhere between $3 million and $3.5 million. The ranch was incorporated in 1957, that is, 20 years ago. In that interval land values in the area have increased from four to four and a half times. The fourth generation would have a tax liability of three quarters of a million dollars, and the yearly interest on that tax alone is some $75,000. So far there has been very little interest in the advertisements of the sale of this ranch, especially from Canada or the United States. However, there are some prospects from European sources.

This particular family, composed of very studious and capable people I can assure you, reasons that they have no other choice except to sell out. The debt load for the fourth generation is impossible to work out, even over a generation, and particularly after the last three disastrous cattle market years. So we have the incredible prospect of a fourth and fifth generation Canadian farmer being displaced by foreign owners and operators with foreign capital.

The second case history involves another unit in western Canada. This one is a mixed grain and cattle operation that operates on both irrigated and dry land in the western prairies. Two family units are involved in this one operation. It is incorporated, of course, and it contains approximately 9,000 acres. Its assets today total approximately $2.5 million, and the total tax liability, if it is offered for sale or if the capital gains tax comes into play, will be again three quarters of a million dollars.

This family unit that is incorporated wishes to move to two separate family farm corporations. To do so they require a form of reverse amalgamation to roll out the assets of the parent company to the new family units. Again, as in case one, they are faced with the almost impossible debt load which will result from the capital gains tax.

This family unit began with two succeeding and different partnerships which operated from 1945 to 1952, and this was followed by a single limited company which was set up in 1961. Now they find there is no room for members of the next generation, which happens to be the third generation to farm under this corporate structure. The problem in this one is not a transfer of assets from one generation to the next but a roll out of existing assets of a single company to two new companies involving the present family shareholders. To do so, the decision to divide in 1975, and that is when they made this decision, requires the process that I mentioned which might be called reverse amalgamation, with provision in the Income Tax Act to permit such a division. Of course, that does not exist now.

The third case history is a 1,000 acre beef farm in the province of Ontario. It involves two family units, each with a son ready to take over what they hope will be a new family corporate set-up, changing from a single incorporated farm unit to two separate incorporated family units. The single unit was incorporated in 1962. Land values in this case have increased considerably since valuation day, but not as dramatically as the two previous examples from western Canada which I gave. In spite of a half million dollar operating loss due to the disastrous cattle price year of 1976, capital gains tax in this case for only a half share in this family unit is well in excess of $100,000, but the total amount is not yet finalized.

In all three case histories I have reflected on certain severe inadequacies of the income tax which have become quite apparent. Our income tax laws in Canada are responsible in their application for these severe limitations.

Two of the three cases involve intergenerational roll-overs to the next generation, and one requires a division of the existing family corporate structure into two or possibly more family corporations in anticipation of an intergenerational transfer later on. In all three cases none of the families wanted to stop farming or sell out completely. All wished to continue in the same family line. All were incorporated before the start of the new tax policy involving capital gains, which started back on January 1, 1972.

All three cases are in severe difficulties because of the dramatic increase in agricultural land values which has occurred since 1971. Why this great increase in land values? That is at the root of this, plus the interpretation of our tax laws. There are a number of reasons. One is the real increase in farmland values resulting mainly from the re-investment of profits to improve productivity. Another one is the increasing scarcity of farmland, especially in Ontario, British Columbia and, I presume, in Manitoba. However, even now on the prairies this is becoming more and more a factor. Finally, there is the insidious impact of inflation, the most important reason, and this includes the substantial amount of non-agricultural financing invested in our farmlands as a hedge against inflation. I think this is by far the most important reason why we have seen land values increase so dramatically. A combination of these three major factors has caused farmland values to increase anywhere from two to four and a half times, going back seven years, or since the advent of the capital gains tax.

In all three case histories the best available accountants, tax experts, and estate planners were employed for their expert advice by the respective families. The transfer of shares in a family farm company to a son in the event of a death of course results in an immediate realization of capital gains. Tax payments can be spread over several years, but the tax cannot be avoided; hence the increasing number of forced sales, such as that first case history to which I referred, to satisfy the capital gains tax.

While these remarks have all related to incorporated family farm situations, the same can be said for incorporated small family businesses of a non-farm nature. However, we should keep in mind that the capital needs in agriculture as a ratio of gross and net income are much higher than in other small business pursuits, indicating a disproportionate need for a tax roll-over provision for the corporate family farm. This is fully documented in a report of the Food Prices Review Board of March, 1975. This particular report shows that the investment ratio to gross domestic product in agriculture is well over twice as large as the same ratio in manufacturing. The report also finds that investment in land and buildings of Canadian farmers constitutes 70 per cent of the total capital value per farm.

I want now to go back to that earlier reference to the debate on the income tax amendments almost three years ago during Mr. Turner's period as Minister of Finance. I refer to Hansard of February 18, 1975, and also to the proceedings of the committee of the whole. In response to my arguments favouring roll-over provisions for incorporated family farms and partnerships, Mr. Turner had this to say as reported at page 3331:

> We were concerned about persuading more people to stay on the land and produce food. We recognized the difficulty in respect of a family farm in the current economic structure, and we eliminated the capital gains tax on the transformation of a family farm from one generation to another as long as the land remains in agricultural use. The difficulty is that since the land is so illiquid, the payment of capital gains tax on the value of the land is very difficult, particularly in those areas of the country where there might be an artificial effect as a result of suburban sprawl. In this event the land is drawn out of agricultural production because the children cannot raise the money to pay the tax on the death of the father or mother, and it is the land, that is liquidated.
> In the case of an incorporated farm there is not that type of liquidity because the shares, by reason of estate planning, can be transmitted over a period of time within the lifetime of the father and mother, and the same problem of liquidity does not arise.

[Mr. Hargrave.]

A little later he said:

> On the question raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, there is very little logic in segregating the incorporated family farm as a business from any other incorporated business in the country—of which there are hundreds of thousands—so that in fairness, if one were to allow capital gains, free transmission from one generation to another in an incorporated family farm, there would be little argument for resisting that transmission on a tax free basis from one generation to another in any incorporated family business.

With respect to Mr. Turner's last point about the inclusion of any—that means all—incorporated family business for the roll-over provision, I say most emphatically, why not? If ever there was a time in our history when small family style businesses of all kinds needed a shot in the arm it is certainly now when there is such widespread concern over the state of our economy. There is no question we are in a prolonged recession; it is just a matter of definition as to how serious it is. Small family businesses are the backbone of our Canadian way of life. If Britain's strength during the war was part and parcel of being a nation of shopkeepers, then Canada's strength and future relate directly to our private enterprise system and incentive for the small family business. They must have a sure future, including a reasonable process to continue that business, especially as an incorporated family business.

Mr. Turner's comments suggest that a liquidity problem would not exist with estate planning, that is, for incorporated family farms. This is simply not so, and I have already advanced some solid reasons for that. While it is possible for some kinds of estate freezing plans to defer taxes on capital gains until the death of the father, absolute avoidance is, of course, impossible, particularly where the rate of appreciation in value is considerable, which is certainly so now under our continued severe inflation.

Mr. Turner was concerned also about adequately defining a family farm corporation. There are a variety of definitions readily available. I should like to remind the House of three such sources: first, the federal government's Farm Credit Act which defines a family corporation; second, the Ontario government's gift tax act and succession duty act; and third, the British Columbia succession duty act. It should be noted the two Ontario definitions make no distinction between farming corporations and other small business corporations, and further, Ontario recognizes as an adequate definition of a small business the definition provided in section 125 of the Income Tax Act.

To conclude these remarks about capital gains and intergenerational roll-over for incorporated family businesses and partnerships, surely it is obvious some of our tax laws must be modified or changed. Seven years after valuation day and the Carter Commission, surely it is time to recognize what disasters are built into our tax structure and are only now becoming obvious because of the ravages of inflation.

Let us take a look at what can be done in this regard. First, I suggest the easiest, most important and basic solution is to allow the same roll-over provisions for incorporated family farms and partnerships as for the individual units now provided for by statute. Second, let us recognize that some incorporated family arrangements, which were established before valuation day, must now be entitled to a reverse amalgamation process. I have referred to that in the second case history which I cited. Third, why not give serious consideration to a new valuation day which would be much closer to present-day circumstances? Fourth, we could always examine the experiences and tax provisions in the United States where the intergenerational transfer principle has been available for some time now, provided the new generation stays in the business for a reasonable time frame. This is the principle of capital gains forgiveness, as distinct from the roll-over principle.

This principle is recognized already in Ontario and British Columbia succession duty legislation. A condition for such existing legislation is that the new generation continue to operate the farm for at least a ten year period, which is a sensible and reasonable provision. If a specific time frame presents administrative problems, perhaps a more general once-in-a-lifetime roll-over provision could be permitted.

Before leaving this subject, I want to remind the House, during this important debate, that the recent Commission of Inquiry into the Marketing of Beef and Veal received widespread input comment on this subject during their nation-wide hearings. As a result, their recommendation No. 14 reads as follows:

● (2217)

The deferral of capital gains tax, as it now applies to the family farm should be extended to cover family farming corporations.

It did not mention partnerships, but I am sure that the commission would want to include partnerships in that recommendation.

On a philosophical note, I would remind all parties concerned over this tax item that farmers, especially western farmers, have traditionally reinvested their profits, at least most of them, back into their farms and ranches for many generations. This no doubt developed as an aftermath of western pioneer days and, more particularly, as a result of ten years of drought and depression in the thirties.

That was followed by at least another ten years of adjusting to an agricultural economy when farmers had to learn all over again how to use financing and how to use cash money. An entire generation of farmers were affected in this way. It was as a consequence of this phase of western farm history that the observation has often been made that farmers, especially cattlemen, are broke most of the time without knowing it, but very often end up the richest men in the graveyard. There is a very obvious update to that quote today. Capital gains taxation has brought about an abrupt end to that continuing possibility.

I would like to make some appropriate remarks about another aspect of western agriculture that has a direct relationship with the income tax amendment. I am referring to the matter of the continuing and worsening drought across southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan. This House has heard me comment on this subject over the past year on a number of occasions. I suppose it is a sort of labour of love, if one can really love a disaster. After all, the recent news stories of excessive rain in western Canada and the serious threat to our grain harvest, which is now over, most people, especially here in central Canada, assumed that the western drought was over. I must say that over much of the straight grain producing areas it is over, but all across southern Alberta, except, our irrigation areas, and the entire southwest part of Saskatchewan, the serious drought continues and worsens.

We have now had in this area three winter droughts and two summer droughts. In severity, they are at least the equivalent of the three worst years of the thirties, at least as I remember them. That was 1931, 1932 and 1937. That is with respect to soil moisture or more properly, the lack of soil moisture. However, the surface water situation that is needed for stock watering is much worse, the worst I have ever seen.

The cabinet committee of eight ministers that was formed early this year, with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), as chairman, was established last spring as a direct consequence of this widespread and serious western drought.

At various times I was concerned enough to make specific recommendations to this committee and its Regina task force. My personal letters of May 10, June 28, August 11 and, more recently, November 3 are a matter of record. The last one dated November 3 went to the Minister of Finance. I am genuinely pleased to report that a number of my suggestions have been acted upon. But perhaps my most important suggestion, a tax deferral provision, has not been accepted and it would appear it has been rejected.

A fundamental fact of farm life we learned during the drought of the 1930's was that the prudent course to follow was to reduce the number of our cattle, mostly cows, to a level which could be supported on our depleted winter ranges, augmented by local feed supplies, and then to buy back in, or, more often, to grow back in by natural increase after the period of drought was over. This might take years, but in 1977 it is still the prudent thing to do.

Starting a year ago now, cattle have been reduced in number to a considerable extent, and many more will have to move in the course of the next two months in numbers well above normal fall culling. There is no panic selling. After three or four years of disastrous cattle prices the market upturn is now well established. All categories of cattle are selling approximately $10 a hundredweight above levels of a year ago.

There is a very significant difference between this drought and the drought of the thirties. There was no income tax then. Cattle producers had no need to concern themselves about excessively high taxable incomes due to much larger cattle sales. They do now, of course. It just does not make sense to feed hay at $75 to $80 a ton to a $200 cow for five or six months. It will be a long, hard winter, regardless of how mild temperatures may be, because of severely depleted winter grass and feed reserves. Twice the value of a cow could easily be fed during the feeding period this winter. Drastic reduction of cattle numbers is the right course to follow. Cattlemen know this, but they are very concerned about the tax position which would obviously result from much higher taxable incomes, in some cases as much as 50 per cent to 100 per cent higher than in more normal years.

A major incentive for cattlemen to do what they know is right, that is, to reduce the numbers of their herds, would be the introduction of a tax deferral plan along lines which have been well documented and presented to the cabinet drought committee and the tax policy branch of the Department of Finance. Such a plan would have to continue, not only until the drought was over but until grass and feed supplies return to normal. That may take years. Remember the lesson of the thirties.

This tax deferral plan has been fully supported by the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan and I have reason to believe that the tax policy branch of the Department of Finance itself has given it some support. Unfortunately, it would seem that it is the Minister of Agriculture who has rejected the proposal. He has suggested that cattle herds are being reduced only to normal levels and that this is the conclusion reached by a drought task force survey last summer. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, this is not so. I say this most emphatically. Further, I would call attention to the response given to me by the Minister of Agriculture that there is "a rational culling of breeding herds which will serve to bring herd sizes more in line with normal range-carrying capacity."

Mr. Speaker, we simply do not have normal range-carrying capacity at the present time. Our carrying capacity in the drought area is the worst since 1937, which is 40 years ago, and I have been involved in the cattle industry in the heart of that drought area for every one of those 40 years, excepting the war years. In many cases cattle numbers have already been reduced by one half—in my own case it is by one third—and further reductions over the entire drought area will be necessary during the next two months.

I ask the special cabinet drought committee of eight, including the Minister of Finance, with the Minister of Agriculture as chairman, to reconsider the advisability of this tax deferral proposal. It is reasonable and practical; it has very wide support and it could serve as a last resort which would allow cattle producers to survive in a critical drought area. I am sure the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), and the Minister of State for the Environment (Mr. Marchand) are fully conversant with both the subjects of which I speak tonight.

• (2227)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a very brief comment on the cancellation of the plans to tax life insurance policies in the hands of the recipient. I do so because of the heavy mail I have received, and I am sure every member in this House has received somewhat similar mail. This is the main reason the minister, in his good judgment, withdrew the major portions of that bill. I also think we should seriously consider doing away with the other two aspects proposed in that bill, the one on the alleged investment element at the time of a policy loan and the other one, of course, which disallows deduction of interest paid on policy loans.

I am looking forward to the committee stage when Bill C-11 comes before us for discussion in detail, and I hope to participate at that time on the matters which I have raised.

Finally, the father in one of those case histories which I referred to, when I was discussing the details over the telephone, after I am sure a very difficult day at home on his ranch, had this to say after discussing his critical farm situation, "We can handle the cattle physically; we can live with the weather under all circumstances, but when the bureaucrats and politicians move in after four years of depressed markets, what chance have we got?"

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, may I call it 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 10.30 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

At 10.28 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to special order.

HEALTH

PROPOSED ACTION TO PROTECT PRIVACY OF MEDICAL FILES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Given that it is in the public interest to protect the privacy of individual Canadians and that it is in particular in the public interest to protect the confidentiality of medical files of Canadians, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the federal government initiate the appropriate action in consultation with the provinces to remove the obligation from physicians to write specific diagnoses on medical bills submitted to the insurance plan which pays the insurance bill. By this method information on individual Canadians would remain strictly within the confines of the physicians' offices and thereby lead to greater protection of privacy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Presentation of such a motion at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR LIST OF FILES INCINERATED ON JUNE 3, 1977—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Solicitor General said in the House on June 21 that the material burned by the RCMP in Montreal on June 3 "had no value." Two nights ago Chief Superintendent Guy Marcoux head of the criminal investigation branch of the RCMP in Montreal stated about this material, "I can't be sure they didn't contain any evidence of illegal activities by members of the force", with reference to the RCMP. In view of this contradiction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Solicitor General to table a list of all documents that were burned by the RCMP in Montreal on June 3.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

SUGGESTED PROTEST OF EXTENSION OF CUBAN OCCUPATION OF ANGOLA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, in light of published reports that the vice president of Cuba has indicated an additional 10,000 experts will be sent to Angola, and considering eyewitness reports of Canadians repatriated from that unhappy country that the repression there under the current regime is worse than anything experienced under Portuguese rule, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty):

That this House call upon the Secretary of State for External Affairs to protest directly to the government of Cuba and to the Security Council of the United Nations, any further extension of the Cuban occupation of Angola.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. According to Standing Order 43 the presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSION ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE EQUAL COMPENSATION FOR PRISONERS OF WORLD WARS I AND II—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of simple justice I hope the House will agree to a motion I should like to present under the terms of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House urges the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce the necessary amendments to the Pension Act so that the compensation for prisoners of war provided therein will apply to the fewer than 200 Canadian veterans still living who were prisoners of war during World War I, as it does to those who were prisoners of war during World War II.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be made at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INCOME TAX

RELEASE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION TO UNAUTHORIZED PERSONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Canadians are shocked today to discover that their personal and confidential tax information has been given out over the telephone to an individual who is unauthorized, who simply calls the regional tax office, identifies himself as a chartered accountant and gives the tax officials an individual's name and birthday. Has the minister given strict instructions to his staff that such information from the personal and confidential tax files of individuals is not to be given out over the telephone to unauthorized people without the strict authorization of the individual concerned?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): As I mentioned yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we have given additional instructions to all the 28 regional offices and the directors thereof to provide more security in our department. This has been done. This is part of what the hon. member is speaking of and I can assure him that this is the case.

Mr. Beatty: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Speaker, according to chartered accountancy firms this is a practice which has been going on for sometime. Can the minister tell the House why he was not aware of this practice and why he was apparently unaware of the fact that it posed such a serious threat to personal privacy?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the statement made by the hon. member in the first place as to whether or not I was aware of it and, secondly, the fact that accounting firms can get that information; I do not agree with that statement at all.

POSSIBILITY NAMES OF PERSONS REQUESTING INFORMATION FROM TAX RETURNS LISTED

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am astonished and startled that the minister was in fact aware of the facility with which his department's security could be breached and that he did nothing about it. May I ask the minister, has the government kept strict records on all individuals who call in to his department over the telephone to request personal information on the confidential tax returns of individuals, and also the names of both the individuals about whom the information is requested and the name of the individual who is making the request?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, we are aware that people could phone in regard to their own personal income tax paper. We would not give the information out immediately. It is a call-back system that we have been using or mailing the information back to the people in question. However, it is not done in the manner in which the hon. member is suggesting. If the hon. member has information contrary to what I am now giving, I would like him to make a valuable contribution to the Canadian people by giving me that information, along with any other information that members on that side may have. It could be very helpful to the investigation taking place at this time.

● (1112)

NUMBER OF OFFICES INVOLVED IN BREACHING CONFIDENTIALITY OF TAX RETURNS

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister tell us today what offices are involved in this nefarious practice of allowing unauthorized people to get access to other persons' income tax returns?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give out any information with regard to which offices are involved. I am not making reference to any offices because I do not want to interfere with the investigation that is taking place at the moment. I can honestly say that the investigation is making considerable progress. I am very pleased with the investigation that is taking place.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I want to find out from the minister, and surely he has discovered this by this time, whether this program has been going on in all offices across the country or confined to one, two or three offices.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I would say no, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: The Minister of National Revenue is clearly saying to the House of Commons and to the people of Canada that this practice has been confined to only a very few offices of the Department of National Revenue in Canada. That is the statement he made today, that it only happened in a very few cases. Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I never said anything of the kind. I would never agree to the last question given to me a moment ago or to the previous question to the effect that it has occurred in a very few instances. I never said that. Neither will I admit it because it is not the case.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, this is a very, very important matter. The people of Canada are outraged because they thought they had been making confidential returns for their income taxes. The minister has confused the issue. I have a very simple question. Can the minister tell us today whether the breach of confidentiality of income tax returns of individual Canadians has occurred in only special cases in a few offices? Is that what he is saying?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am only aware of the allegation made yesterday by the opposition. That is the only thing that has taken place to my knowledge. I would like to say to you, Sir, that the 1,600 employees of my staff are very loyal, and sincere. They consider their oath of office to be sacred. They are not giving out the information about which the hon. member is speaking.

STATEMENT BY SUPERINTENDENT MARCOUX CONCERNING INCINERATION OF FILES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I hope the very, very clever obfuscations we just heard from the Minister of National Revenue will not be repeated by the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General promised to check out the statement made in Montreal two nights ago by Chief Superintendent Guy Marcoux with reference to the destruction of certain documents in Montreal on June 3. Has he asked his officials in Montreal why documents which might contain information about illegal activities of the RCMP were ordered to be burned on June 3, right at the time RCMP illegalities were being questioned in this House and at the time the government of the province of Quebec was openly considering the possibility of setting up an inquiry into one of these specific acts of illegality?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity of meeting with the officer in question this morning along with the Commanding Officer of "C" Division of Montreal. I went over with them in detail the answer I had previously given to the House on June 21 and received confirmation that it was in essence correct. The reason the documents were prepared at that stage is, as I indicated in the House yesterday, simply because there was an internal audit report which was done within the force between May 16 and 19 in Montreal, a report which was subsequently dated, perhaps in error, May 23 of that year.

• (1117)

Mr. Broadbent: In error?

Mr. Fox: The date may have been in error. As the hon. member indicated yesterday, May 23 was a holiday. During the course of this morning we tried to pinpoint the reason May 23 was actually on the document. It is quite clear that the audit took place between May 16 and 19, and the report would apparently have been typed up on the first working day after that period of time, which probably would have been May 24. Therefore, it is quite possible that the report ought to be dated May 24 instead of May 23.

The reason that the documents were in fact destroyed was that there had been this audit by the audit unit of the RCMP recommending that certain documents in the possession of the special "I" section in Montreal should be destroyed as they were no longer relevant. As far as the rest of the information is concerned, that is contained in my answer to the House on June 21.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister for providing a lot of information that I did not ask for. I would ask him most specifically, when he met this morning with Chief Superintendent Marcoux and whoever else he met with, did he ask them why documents, which he described two nights ago as possibly pertaining to certain illegal activities of the RCMP, were destroyed at the time when members of the House of Commons were raising questions about certain illegalities involving the RCMP, and also precisely at the time that the government of the province of Quebec was talking about opening an inquiry into a specific act of illegal wrongdoing.

Mr. Fox: The answer, Mr. Speaker, is very simple. There has been burning of documents or normal destruction of documents in the force in every division across the country. The burning in question, or the destruction, to use that word, took place on June 3 of this year. While the officer did not indicate that he would want to check with the division officer before answering the question which was put to him by the press, he has now done so and he is satisfied that there was no material, to his knowledge, which pertained to any illegal activities by the force.

This matter having been raised, Mr. Speaker, it will, of course, be open to the McDonald commission of inquiry to determine whether they wish to inquire further into this matter; but at this stage I have reviewed the matter with the commanding officer of "C" Division Montreal, and also with the officer who made the statement. I have seen the internal audit report and there is no indication that any evidence relevant to any illegal activities by the force was burned at that stage. If the hon. member has any information to that effect, we would, of course, be pleased to receive it.

POSSIBILITY MICROFILM COPIES OF FILES DESTROYED ARE AVAILABLE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): The minister said in the House yesterday with reference to an earlier statement that he made that the commissioner of the force had indicated that very strict directives prohibiting the burning of any further files were issued during the course of the inquiries, which indicated that certainly after they had had the initial burning they decided from then on that there would be no more burnings. It seems to me to raise certain legitimate questions about the credibility of all the documents which are going to be available for the two inquiries to consider.

As a final supplementary question, I should like to ask the minister whether microfilm copies were kept of the documents which were burned. If so, or if records of any kind were kept, will the minister undertake to provide to members of the House a list of all the documents which were in fact burned on June 3 in Montreal?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think the commissioner of the force issued his directive that there be no further destruction of documents in order to alleviate any concern that perhaps there was the possibility of destruction of evidence. I think the directive was in fact issued after the initial destruction of documents, which is an indication of the complete good faith of the force in this regard. So far as the documents in question are concerned, Mr. Speaker, much of the material was transferred to other sections of the force. Much of the material that was destroyed related to operations for which the special "I" section of the force had given technical aid to other sections of the force, and of course those documents would be available. Any documents which are in our possession, Mr. Speaker, will be made available to the McDonald Commission.

GRAIN

INQUIRY WHETHER POLICY FOR SUBSIDIES FOR STORAGE IN QUEBEC HAS BEEN DECIDED

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Agriculture, but as he is absent from the House, I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary.

In a news release dated October 17, 1977, the minister announced that an amount of some $28 million would be paid in subsidies to feed mills and other firms in eastern Quebec which are involved in storing grains, to ensure a better supply and prevent the rising of prices like that which occurred when longshoremen went on strike two years ago. Could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture advise the House whether the appropriate regulations resulting from this policy have been established and, if so, whether he could advise hon. members of their content so that in turn hon. members may advise their constituents?

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for directing this question to me. I can advise the House that these regulations are already well known in Quebec. A Sainte-Rosalie co-op which is already taking advantage of this program has obtained subsidies and financing under the program which was announced on October 17 last. I shall be delighted to provide the hon. member with the relevant information concerning the applications from the owners of feed mill co-operatives in areas which are lacking in storage facilities.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his very specific answer. Could he now tell the House whether there is a deadline set for the implementation of that program for the $28 million mentioned? If so, could he also advise us whether after the depletion of those funds there will be supplementary estimates according to the request made by co-operatives or by mills in eastern Quebec?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, that program was set up for eastern Canada and also part of British Columbia for a 5-year period. An amount of $28 million is available under the program for a 5-year period.

ENERGY

CANDU REACTOR—POSSIBILITY PMN OF ITALY WILL OBTAIN LICENCE TO CONSTRUCT

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. While we are honoured with the presence of the Prime Minister of Italy in the gallery, I wonder if the Prime Minister could inform the House if his government, through a major Crown corporation, namely, AECL, has finally completed its arrangements with an Italian state firm called PMN to enable that firm to construct or to licence the construction of the CANDU reactor in Italy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Italy and myself, as well as our ambassadors and officials, have attached great importance to this matter. Although conclusions have not been arrived at, both sides are optimistic that such a project will be brought forth and will be very much to the advantage of the two countries.

Hon. members of the House are aware, apart from the financing and technical aspects, that there was a question of safeguards which has to be finally settled. This week in Ottawa we will have the presence of the director of Euratom, Mr. Bruner. We hope, by the end of the week, that arrangements will be made to permit us to reach a satisfactory conclusion which, on the one hand, will meet our very real concern in Canada about proliferation; and at the same time, will permit co-operation to be extended to our friends in Europe. I am very grateful to the Prime Minister of Italy for the co-operation and leadership he has taken in this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1127)

Mr. Lawrence: My supplementary to the Prime Minister is this: Are the Prime Minister or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources aware, and have the officials in AECL brought to the attention of the government, that PMN in Italy is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Finn-Mechanica with whom the ex-head of AECL now seems to have very strong commercial ties. Has that been a factor in the decision to select PMN as the licensee in this arrangement?

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister could be more specific, but I would like to remind the House that we are only now calling for tenders. The contract has not yet been awarded and the calling of tenders is under way. Surely if other companies wish to tender they can do so. No doubt, however, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can provide more details.

COMBINES

ACTION BY MINISTER TO ENSURE OFFICIALS SUPPLY FULL INFORMATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister is reported in the press as having said with respect to his tenure as Solicitor General, with regard to withholding information, and I quote: "It seems they did withhold information from me and from other solicitors general. Some of them argue and will argue that they withheld it because it was not explicitly asked for. I wouldn't accept that in many cases." Given that the minister was solicitor general longer than most of his predecessors in living memory, and given that he now holds a very sensitive portfolio in the government of Canada and is responsible for reporting to this House on activities, for example, of the Combines Investigation Branch and for the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, is it the hon. gentleman's position—and this raises serious questions, I might add, about the competence of this minister—that he can be misled by people who advise him on sensitive areas of his responsibility? I think, for example, of the advice he received from the RCMP when he was solicitor general.

If this is the case, what steps is he now taking as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to see that he is being supplied accurate information by those whose job it is to advise him, for example, with regard to the Combines Investigation Act? I think, now, Mr. Speaker, of the TELESAT decision by CRTC where the Combines Investigation Act went one way and the cabinet went the other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In so far as the question relates to the minister's previous responsibilities, it is clearly contrary to precedent. However, the minister may wish to express confidence in his officials in his present capacity and to that extent, I suppose, the question has an air of legitimacy. Anything with respect to the minister's previous capacity, of course, is clearly contrary to the rules of the House.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Every step will be taken to ensure that all questions will be fully answered and that all information will be made available to me.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CHARGES BY FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL FORCE WITHHELD INFORMATION—ACTION BY MINISTER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My supplementary question is to the Solicitor General. In view of the very serious but unsubstantiated charges made by his immediate predecessor, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, regarding the RCMP, accusing them of withholding information from the minister and his predecessors, what steps is the minister taking to investigate this situation? If the charges by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs can be substantiated—and I doubt this very much—then it is incumbent upon the minister to take disciplinary action. If those charges cannot be substantiated, it is obvious that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has to do the honourable thing, since he smeared the RCMP, and resign.

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have demonstrated time and time again over the past few months—not only during the past few days as has been the case on the other side of the House—that we have full faith and confidence in the direction of the RCMP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ACCURACY OF INFORMATION RECEIVED FROM FORCE BY MINISTER

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would again quote these words from the statement of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: "It seems they did withhold information from me and other solicitors general." Has the minister satisfied himself that he is receiving accurate information from the RCMP in his weekly briefings, since obviously his predecessor, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, included him in this blanket indictment?

● (1132)

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, in all my dealings with the RCMP I have always found them to be forthright and forthcoming in the reports they have made to me in response to questions I have asked them.

THE MINISTRY

COMPETENCE OF CONSUMER AFFAIRS MINISTER TO OBTAIN INFORMATION FROM HIS OFFICIALS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a supplementary question to try to work a way out of this difficult situation in which the Chair and the House find themselves. If I may speak with the permission of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, who does not speak for the House of Commons, I would like to ask if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would be prepared to make a statement to the House, to which he is accountable, to establish some proof that he is more competent now to obtain information in his present portfolio than he was in the past.

Mr. Speaker: The efforts to obviate all of the agony that I have had to go through in preparing a judgment for today are admirable and ingenious indeed; nevertheless, they are unsuccessful.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ENSURE FAIR DISTRIBUTION OF BOX CARS FOR MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I want to return to an economic matter. All over western Canada many farmers find themselves in the position of being unable to secure any reasonable share of box cars for the shipment of their wheat. In the absence of the Minister of Transport, who is on one of his periodic political trips to the west, I would like to direct my question to the acting Minister of Transport and ask him whether he will immediately communicate with the railway companies, or whoever is in charge of the allocation of transport, to the end that the unfairness in distribution today will end and a reasonable degree of equality will be assured to those areas which up to the present time have been in the position of receiving much fewer cars than other areas of no more importance.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to set right some of the remarks the right hon. member on the other side made in his preamble. The minister is not away on a political trip "out west" as the right hon. member said, but having discussions in Winnipeg regarding grain handling, a matter the minister is quite concerned about. I would also point out that what the right hon. member has been telling us is more a representation than a question.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to point out that no parliamentary secretary has any right to answer questions on behalf of the government. In so far as the Minister of Transport is concerned, if he is about government business this weekend, he has not been in the last several weeks.

PUBLIC WORKS

RIDEAU CENTRE DEVELOPMENT—DATE OF TERMINATION OF COMMITMENT TO RIDEAU VIKING GROUP

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Public Works. Considering the important economic adjustments required in all sectors of the city of Ottawa as a result of the announced programs of decentralization and relocation of employment centres, considering the urgent need for all levels of government in the national capital region to co-operate in co-ordinating plans for economic diversification of our local economy, and considering also the need for stimulating the private sector in order to create employment in the city of Ottawa, can the minister inform this House what is the status of the Rideau Centre development project and, if when he announced the government's commitment to the Rideau Viking group a few short months ago he had in mind a date of termination of this commitment to the Rideau Viking group, what is that date?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member indicated, we have given an undertaking to the Viking group that we will work along with them in an effort to reach a satisfactory conclusion. Good progress is being made. We expect the matter to be completed by April of next year. The only complicating factor is that it involves permits and actions by other levels of government. If they should delay, the date could be pushed along, but our target date is April of next year.

RESOURCES

LAY-OFFS AT FALCONBRIDGE—POSSIBILITY OF STOCKPILING NICKEL

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that Falconbridge Nickel Company of Sudbury has announced the termination of 560 jobs with a possible total reduction of 800 jobs by the end of next year, will the minister tell the House whether his government is willing to aid the hard pressed nickel industry by stockpiling measures until markets pick up, as was done with uranium, or is sympathy all he can offer to these unemployed miners?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that kind of cheap shot is going to help the situation one little bit. The hon. member must know that the government has been doing everything it can to try to assist in a very painful situation. It has met with members of the industry, leaders of the community and with leaders of the businesses themselves. I spent a considerable amount of time yesterday with the chief executive officers of INCO who are also very much concerned about the over-all world situation.

Unfortunately, a stockpiling program is not the answer at this time. If it were, the government would be prepared to consider it, but if the hon. member were to look at the world situation, he would realize that the situation over the last three years has been that inventories have been increasing each year. In other words, there has been a stockpiling system for the past three years, and that has not proved to be the answer for the community of Sudbury.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE TO STUDY LAY-OFFS IN MINING SECTOR

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that despite all the meetings we still do not have any concrete proposals from the minister.

In view of the fact that the Department of Employment and Immigration estimates lay-offs in the mining industry now total 9,000 across Canada and that predictions are that by the end of next summer up to 20,000 workers in the mining sector could be without jobs, will the minister urge the government to set up a special parliamentary committee to examine the mining industry and make recommendations so that we might avoid this impending disaster?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is familiar with the fact that the Ontario government has already set up a select committee to examine the situation with respect to Sudbury and the nickel industry. Undoubtedly, that particular committee will want to call many witnesses. Undoubtedly too, because the province has the responsibility for both environmental controls and mining taxes, there will be measures which the Ontario government can take which will alleviate a very serious situation.

As to the mining industry more generally, the hon. member may recall that in an answer to this House I think some ten days ago I indicated that I thought it might be useful to convene a federal-provincial conference of mines ministers, and possibly finance ministers as well, to look at the constraints and difficulties facing the mining industry in this country. However, before that would take place I think it would be advisable for the leaders of the various mining companies—both management and labour—to meet with the particular provinces concerned, so that when the provinces would meet with us there would be some kind of consensus in which both labour and management would have had a significant input.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, consultations like that would certainly be well and good, but the minister still has not answered my question. The minister is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for Canada, and it seems to me that the Parliament of Canada certainly has the responsibility to examine this problem. Will the minister take the representation that we set up a committee to look into the mining industry of Canada as a whole under advisement?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I have noted the representation.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS WITHHOLDING INFORMATION FROM MINISTER—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I should like the minister to tell the House whether he makes the same accusations against the public servants who are working for him now that he made against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, namely, that his public servants are withholding information from him?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATURE OF CHARGE BY FORMER SOLICITOR GENERAL CONCERNING WITHHOLDING OF INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question to the Solicitor General. There has been some confusion as the House will note as to just what kind of accusation the now silent Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was making outside the House. The Acting Prime Minister yesterday said he had been told by his colleague that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was speaking about one incident. The press reports are very clear that the minister is quoted as speaking in the plural. I should like to direct a question either to the Solicitor General or the Prime Minister, whoever is informed on the matter, as to what exactly the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said outside the House relative to his responsibilities as Solicitor General. Did he make the charge that information had been withheld from him on one occasion only or did he make the charge that there had been information withheld from him on more than one occasion?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition would do well to read what was said. As I read it myself, I think the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs did not indicate that he had been deceived but that he had asked for some information. Information had been given to him and he thought perhaps more information could have been given to him at that time.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question. The precise language, to remind the Solicitor General who is forced to represent in this House a man who will not speak for himself, was, "It seems that they did withhold information from me and from other Solicitors General." In other words, that this was not an isolated practice. Is it the position of the Solicitor General of Canada that that was in fact what the minister said, that the minister was referring to a practice of withholding information or that he was referring to simply one instance of withholding information? Was it plural or was it singular? Do we believe what the minister said outside the House or do we believe what the Acting Prime Minister said inside the House?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, there is no practice of withholding information from Solicitors General within the RCMP.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we are in a very difficult situation in this House. The man who made these accusations against the RCMP outside the House will not say anything inside the House. We are told the only person to whom we can direct questions is the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General will not answer the very simple question as to what his colleague said. What accusations did his colleague level against the RCM Police? Did he say that they withheld information from him on one occasion or did he say there was a practice in the RCMP of withholding information from a series of Solicitors General, singular or plural?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that there is no accusation that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at any point deceived any Solicitor General inasmuch as the way that word is normally used. I think if one talks about deception one talks about wilfully, knowingly, withholding information that one knows ought to be brought forward.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

POSSIBILITY OF HOLDING INCREASE IN EXPENDITURES TO SIX PER CENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his October 20 statement the Minister of Finance indicated that he hopes there will be a wage ceiling of six per cent next year. Earlier this morning he reasserted his belief that inflation in fact will only be six per cent next year. Would the Prime Minister indicate if his government is willing to hold its own expenditures to a six per cent ceiling next year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have, as was visible when the President of the Treasury Board tabled the supplementary estimates some days ago, followed on our undertaking to bring down the percentage of GNP which was accounted for by federal budgetary measures. We have been successful in the past three years and we hope to be successful in the future, in spite of the incessant demands of the opposition for the government to spend more money.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. To hold the six per cent ceiling next year would require no further spending increases beyond $2.7 billion. Would the Prime Minister give the House that assurance that spending increases for fiscal 1979 will not exceed that amount over the current estimates for this year?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we never made that commitment. I think if the hon. member reflects a little bit he will see it would be a commitment very difficult to make and to keep. It is probably not desirable in a time when the country, and even the opposition parties, are asking us to inject more money, more spending power in order to increase consumer demand and to create more jobs across the country.

CEILINGS ON GOVERNMENT SPENDING AND WAGES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance who this morning indicated that if the wage earner finds himself a little poorer because of inflation being higher than six per cent, that is just too bad. Would the minister indicate if he has two standards, one to apply with respect to ceilings in government spending and another to the average wage earner in this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer the question. We have more than probably 70 per cent of the budget, or a very big amount of the budget which is taken up with transfer payments to individuals, the provinces and so on. In order to achieve that target we would have to cut a lot of those programs that have been voted by the House of Commons and there would be an outcry from the other side. We have said we want to keep the ceiling on the expenditures of the federal government within the growth of the CNP and we will achieve it.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

EFFORTS TO CURTAIL EXPENDITURES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. When main estimates were released in February the President of the Treasury Board indicated that government spending would be kept to 7.1 per cent for this fiscal year. Yet, when supplementary estimates came down we saw that government spending for this year is to be increased by 10.3 per cent. Given that there may well be, and probably will be, one more supplementary estimate, what assurance can the President of the Treasury Board give the House that government spending is under control and that some of the projections given by the minister and the Prime Minister in terms of curtailing government spending will in fact be realized?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is using very selected percentage figure projections. We said last year that the commitment to spending in the fiscal 1977-78 would carry a ceiling of $44,450 million which will represent an 8.2 per cent increase over last year. The reason for the difference between 7 per cent and 8.2 per cent is that the 1977-78 dollar figure has not changed and will not change based on our forecast of spending through March 31 where as we came in $1 billion less for last year, fiscal 1976-77 than we had committed. That reduced the base on which the new percentage increase calculation was made. A rather commendable performance I think.

Mr. Andre: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board has just indicated to the House that the estimates of government spending presented to the House earlier of $46.5 billion in fact are not the estimates of government spending but in fact some other figure has been proferred. From whence the minister produces that is not disclosed. Given that the basis of the official government estimate of spending called for $46.5 billion in this fiscal year, representing 10.3 per cent over projected spending last year, not over actual spending of last year, could I ask the minister to explain to the House what new steps will be taken? This is the third year in succession where spending has in fact turned out to be considerably larger when supplementaries have been taken into account than have been predicted by successive Treasury Board presidents when they introduced the main estimates in February of each year.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, on the contrary this will be the third year in a row where the actual final tally of spending will be less than was previously forecast.

VALUE PLACED ON DOLLAR IN VIEW OF INFLATION RATE

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the minister has agreed that the inflation rate is very closely associated with the value of the dollar, I wonder if the minister could state exactly what value he has placed on the dollar in view of the six per cent inflation rate.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, our Canadian dollar is floating. I think its current rate is 90.7. But you will understand that I cannot anticipate what it will be next year. It may be higher or lower.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

POSSIBILITY ACTIVITIES WILL BE SUSPENDED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister put an end to the current speculation in the press by telling the House whether there is any truth to the rumour that the cabinet has plans to suspend the activities of the Foreign Investment Review Agency for three years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGED SURVEILLANCE OF MIDWAYS—POSSIBILITY OF PROSECUTIONS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the highly briefed Minister of National Revenue. I gave him notice of my question. It is with regard to an operation of surveillance which took place this past summer respecting midways in smaller centres and some larger centres in western Canada. Can the minister confirm whether this close surveillance took place with respect to midways in western Canada and whether or not there have been any prosecutions as a result of this surveillance?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I first want to say that the letter I received from the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar only indicated that he had some information. He said he had received information pertaining to surveillance of the midway. No other details were given. However, in view of the inquiry in Alberta at the present time, I am not going to make any statement with regard to that particular aspect of it.

ALLEGED EQUIPPING OF OFFICE PERSONNEL WITH DISGUISES FOR SURVEILLANCE WORK

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid to give the minister too much notice of the question in case he might have the answer. On the other hand, I want to assure him I am not asking about any inquiry taking place at the present time. I am talking about surveillance of midways in smaller centres such as Thunder Bay, Lethbridge, Swift Current and the like. When the minister is making these inquiries of his departmental officials, will he determine whether it is government policy to use office personnel from regional offices in western Canada such as Winnipeg, Calgary, Thunder Bay and Saskatoon, and to provide these office personnel with disguise kits containing golf caps, hand operated counters and wallets to put in their back pockets so that they will be disguised only if they are not standing together.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased indeed with the details just given to me. I want to assure the hon. member that I will look into this important matter immediately.

RESOURCES

PROPOSED FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON MINING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the alarming state of the health of the mining industry in Canada and the catastrophic effects that any further deterioration could have in this sector, and given the fact that this is an industry which touches upon both federal and provincial jurisdictions, is it the minister's intention to attach great immediacy to the federal-provincial conference that he spoke of earlier and to announce the convening of such a conference early in the new week?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do place very considerable importance on such a conference taking place. However, we have to first determine with the provinces whether it is likely to be a successful conference in the sense that they will come prepared and will be ready to discuss what particular measures they would be prepared to take. As the hon. lady has pointed out, the provinces do control the mining rates, the mining tax and the environmental pollution standards. They have by far the largest impact on the climate for the mining industry. I wish it were otherwise, but that is the situation.

SOCIAL SECURITY

NEGOTIATIONS FOR RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT ON PENSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. I am very pleased that an agreement was signed with Italy yesterday concerning reciprocal pension arrangements. Has any progress been made with regard to signing a similar agreement with the United Kingdom, considering that the former Minister of National Health and Welfare stated on March 9 last that they were pressing us to sign such an agreement?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare, I should like to answer the question of the hon. member and say that negotiations with England, the United States and France are still in progress, that the various officials have been holding meetings. I must remind the hon. member that last spring I indicated in my former capacity that I had gone to England personally to encourage Britishers to sign an agreement at the earliest possible time. Their reaction was fairly encouraging but they were facing problems because of the financial implications of such an agreement. We have continued to press the United Kingdom into signing an agreement as soon as possible. As for us, we are ready to sign an agreement without further delay.

PUBLISHING

PROTECTION OF CANADIAN AUTHORS FROM REPRODUCTIONS OF THEIR WORKS IMPORTED FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. It is with regard to the meeting which occurred earlier this week with a number of authors concerned about "the possible collapse of the Canadian publishing industry". This is not the first time a representation has been made with regard to the disastrous situation in terms of the remaindering of a number of Canadian books from American sources. As far back as 1972, the Ontario royal commission on publishing said the customs provision of the Copyright Act is "unworkable in practice and . . . should be reviewed and clarified". Why has it taken so long for the government to move with regard to this threat to Canadian authors and publishers and when can we expect some effective response in this regard?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I had a very useful and positive meeting with the authors. As a result of the representations made a few years ago, there was an implementation of a procedure for listing books in what is called the Schedule "C" process. There has been some concern that while this process was a desirable one, it was not working with as much expedition as desired. There is an undertaking to consult with the Department of National Revenue to try to ensure that this procedure is speeded up to the highest degree possible. We are also undertaking to see if there are means to clarify the meaning of the law about which there is some dispute. The result of the meeting was very positive. I think we will be able to see a clarification of the difficulties in the very near future.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Will the minister indicate whether any significant action will be taken to establish an interdepartmental committee of the relevant departments, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Justice, Revenue and his own department? In addition, did the minister or his colleague give any indication to the authors that they would be prepared to make a test case with regard to this particular situation? Will they in the further meeting which I understand will take place later this month give a definite time commitment in terms of some action to take place within the next few months so that the authors and publishers will not be fobbed off over the next two years as they have been for the past two?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that it was not a question of fobbing off the authors. Both the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and I are aware there is a very real problem here and we are prepared to act in relation to it. We have taken actions in the past and we are now trying to make these actions more effective. As to the specific course the hon. member has suggested, that of an interdepartmental committee, it is not clear to me, at least yet, that there is a need for such a mechanism. We want to explore the approaches we developed with authors who met with us, to explore what they have suggested. It is not at all clear that the mechanism which the hon. member has suggested will in fact prove to be necessary.

ENERGY

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE—INQUIRY AS TO GUARANTEE CANADIAN PIPE USED IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister indicated in Hamilton on Wednesday with reference to the Alaska Highway pipeline, and I think I quote him accurately, that the Canadian steel industry will have to be competitive if it expects any of its steel pipe to be used on the Canadian portion of the Alaska natural gas pipeline. Will the Prime Minister now confirm to the House there is no guarantee whatsoever that Canadian steel pipe must be used in the construction of that pipeline?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been dealt with again and again. Quite honestly, I think I must ask the hon. member to use a bit of common sense on this. Obviously, there is a preference. It is written right into the agreement with the United States. There is a preference for Canadian products and Canadian industry for the Canadian portion of the pipeline, but obviously it would be folly to make this absolutely without condition and an absolute guarantee. I suspect that if the hon. member thought about it, he would not be asking for this. The Canadian industry is a very competitive industry. The workers are very, very capable. The technology is possessed by the Canadian industry. However, we cannot say "You can submit any price, no matter what the cost, and we will take your produce." That would mean Canadian consumers would have to pay much more.

This is a matter of common sense. I do not think the hon. member or his party would want to get that absolute kind of guarantee, that at any cost Canadian industry can be assured of the contract.

• (1202)

Mr. Leggatt: If we are exercising common sense, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister should know that the consumers of that particular product are Americans not Canadians. If the interest of the Prime Minister is to protect American consumers in terms of the construction of the pipeline, I can understand his answer. But the question remains. In terms of determining the value of the bid on that steel, given the nature of subsidies around the world, including the DISC program in the United States through which steel is being subsidized and the massive subsidies applied to Japanese steel, how is the Prime Minister to monitor whether competitive foreign bids which meet Canadian bids are not under some kind of substantial subsidization when the time comes to let contracts for that particular pipeline?

Mr. Trudeau: As to the first part of the question I hope the hon. member realizes, because his party supported the construction of the pipeline, that one of the objects is that Canadian gas will be flowing through it one day and it will thus be of advantage to Canadian consumers. If the hon. member is more interested in the shareholders of Stelco, that is another matter. But we are interested in the Canadian consumers who will benefit from that gas eventually.

With regard to the bidding practices of other countries and the possibility of subsidies, the government is conscious of that aspect. Of course, we will make sure that the bids are competitive in a true sense, and if there is any form of subsidy, hidden or not, we shall ensure that the bids take account of that situation and that there will not be any unfair competition against Canadian prices and submissions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Yesterday questions of privilege and points of order were raised together in connection with the various requests that some action be taken by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to submit to questioning in the House, to make a statement, to appear before a committee, to rise on a question of privilege, or to take a number of alternative steps which were suggested during the various arguments which were put forward. All of them related to the central point which has been referred to, that is, the responsibility of ministers to answer questions, or the limit to which ministers are required to answer questions in the House, depending on what point of view is taken.

In any event, the subject related to the ability of members of the House to put questions to ministers concerning responsibilities not connected with portfolios presently occupied. We have referred to this matter several times in the past, but perhaps I could refer briefly to my ruling in June of this year, which can be found on page 6851 of Hansard:

> That situation, it seems to me, is a long way from covering the one at the present time, which is similar to ones which have arisen many times in the past, namely: Can members ask a question of a minister in that minister's former capacity? The clear answer given time and time again, without any doubt about our practices and precedents, has been no. It is tied very directly to the theory of ministerial responsibility, that the present incumbent of a ministerial office has responsibility which goes back for all time. It does not stop at the time that that incumbent took office. Therefore there cannot be two people responsible to the House in the parliamentary sense for that continuing responsibility.
> If one minister who now occupies that position is responsible through all time for answering questions in this House, that responsibility cannot be shared by another minister who is a former occupant. If it is the wish of the House to change its practices to say that the House ought to be able to ask questions of a previous incumbent, then the House must also be prepared to accept the argument that the responsibility of the present incumbent of that office stops retroactively back at the time that he took office.

I think that is as clear and explicit as language can be made. With respect to the suggestions put forward, that unanimous consent might be sought in order to get around the difficulty and deal with the matter in some way, I would remind hon. members that on previous occasions upon which unanimous consent was sought I went to great pains during the course of the exploration of that situation to guard time and time again respect and reverence for the basic rule I have just cited. In that regard, I would refer hon. members to my statements recorded in Hansard on June 21 of this year at page 6903 and again at page 6923.

Furthermore, I think hon. members will realize that in any circumstances in which it is the will of the House to attempt to get at a problem whose solution seems in some way to be impeded by the rules or practices of the House, unanimous consent, if forthcoming from the House by way of consensus, and presented to the Chair, is one process in which the Chair has always been willing to co-operate and to make every effort to facilitate the wishes of members of the House. But I think all hon. members would agree that it would be most improper of the Chair to take any initiative or to make any suggestions in that regard.

Therefore, before I could be asked to take any position with respect to any situation which might arise from unanimous consent, it would seem to me I would have to be presented with unanimous consent as a fait accompli with which I might then attempt to deal, but not as something in which I should in any way be involved from the point of view of initiative or in the search for that consent.

[Mr. Speaker.]

A further point was raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton and by the hon. member for St. John's East, that members ought to be able to put a question to a minister asking him simply, not for an answer in respect to a previous capacity but whether or not the minister would be prepared to make a statement, or to appear before a committee or to do anything of that sort.

Obviously, the conclusion is that such questions addressed to a minister are quite proper if they relate to his present ministerial capacity. So it is quite in order to ask a minister if he intends to make a statement or if he intends to appear before a committee, provided the purpose of that appearance or statement relates to his present ministerial capacity. It is equally clear that the question is improper, by reason of our precedents and practices, if it relates to a minister's previous capacity.

Some confusion has evidently been raised by my failure to intervene when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was answering a question raised by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby a couple of days ago. I simply want to say to the House that I have checked the record and there does not seem to be specific language about negotiations. However, I thought I had heard a preamble which related to the minister being involved in meetings and reflecting on problems raised in the past about fluorspar in Newfoundland. It seemed to me there were implications about imports and prevention of imports, the raising and lowering of duties, and some possibility that there might have been negotiations or some capacity in which the Secretary of State for External Affairs might have been involved in the prevention of foreign imports, or activity to help the survival of that industry, and therefore I let the question go.

But if it is the view of hon. members that what took place offends our precedents in any way, I would ask them to realize the difficulty I was faced with in those circumstances and not accept it as any indication of my willingness to permit ministers to answer questions in some capacity other than their administrative responsibility, and, in that particular case, certainly not a former responsibility but, rather, one of a geographic as opposed to an administrative nature.

The rule is clear: ministers cannot be asked questions about their political responsibility in this House unless the subject relates to their administrative capacity in that portfolio. The House seemed to me today to react to that principle, to make an effort to avoid questions which I think they rather expected would be ruled out of order, and then to turn to the Solicitor General who is the present incumbent of this office to press the issue as to what exactly was said and, if there was truth in what was said outside the House, to take action within his department, in accordance with his ministerial responsibility, to determine the truth and accordingly to dismiss officials or, upon determination of the falsehood, to take steps with respect to the position of the minister.

All of that is quite correct activity, but it is clear, and I must once again enforce the rule, that questions put to ministers during the question period, and statements made by ministers and questions put to them upon the making of statements within the rules under which we presently operate must be entirely connected with their present ministerial administrative responsibility.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the ruling you have just made. It occurs to me that in the course of your statement you dealt with a problem which has plagued us in this House, that of a minister, outside the House, making direct reference to and castigation of the department he has nothing further to do with, as was the case with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

● (1212)

In view of the constraints which Your Honour has placed upon us in asking questions in this House, and in view of the fact that I know the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was anxious, and indeed has the responsibility, to stand in the House and clarify, if that is possible, his smear against the RCMP which he made outside the House, I would ask Your Honour if this is not the appropriate point at which the House might give unanimous consent to allow members of the House, particularly members of the opposition, the next time we meet in the question period to ask questions of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs directly relating to his accusation made outside the House against members of the RCMP, and the fact that they were not forthcoming with information to him while he was minister, including his predecessor and successor in office.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I covered the possibility of unanimous consent. If the Chair is presented with unanimous consent as a fait accompli, I will attempt to deal with it.

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 41, I wish to table, in both official languages, the annual report of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation for the fiscal year 1976-77, pursuant to section 32 of the Saltfish Act.

While I am on my feet, there have been some conversations with members opposite, and with the consent of the House I should like to move that the document be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Having tabled the document, the minister indicates that there may be some disposition in the House, with consent, to move now to refer the document to the standing committee. Is that the disposition of the House?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. It is therefore moved by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment:

That the annual report for 1976-77 of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order following upon the point of order raised by my colleague from Saskatoon-Biggar, and naturally I shall accept the direction of the Chair as to the procedure to be followed here. However, bearing in mind that the House has just given unanimous consent for the tabling of a document by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and following whatever procedure is appropriate, I should like to ask Your Honour to instruct me as to how we might seek now from the House of Commons unanimous consent to permit the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make a statement on motions at the next sitting of the House on Monday, which would allow him to state in the House of Commons the allegations and charges which he made against the RCMP outside the House of Commons.

As is the case normally with a statement on motions, this would allow members of the official opposition, and perhaps some of his own colleagues, to ask him questions to determine precisely what it was he said and precisely what it is he means to convey in regard to the withholding of information from him, as minister, on the part of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

If it is appropriate, I should now like to ask for unanimous consent of the House to allow the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to make a statement on motions in the House on Monday covering the charges that he made against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police outside the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The reference I made to unanimous consent as a fait accompli is one which I have made in the past. Frankly, I think it is practical—I say practical, but not absolutely necessary—that rather than another member asking for unanimous consent to permit something to be done, the request, if it is going to be put before the House, ought to originate with the member who wishes that something be done which is prevented by the rules from being done. If I were to put the question whenever one member sought unanimous consent for some other member to do something, I think we would continually be stopping the proceedings of the House. I endeavoured to say indirectly during the course of my ruling, as has been the case in the past, that if one faces a situation of this kind the House should begin in some way to deal with it, but the fact is that I am not faced with it.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, with respect to your ruling, on the point of order which has been raised by my leader and also on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, the fact is that in the course of Your Honour's ruling you indicated that we could proceed at any time on the basis of unanimous consent, which is, of course, a practice of the House.

In accepting your ruling, I say, with respect, that as a member of the House I am prevented from doing a certain act, namely, to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs having to do with a statement the minister made outside the House. The only time I can ask for unanimous consent of the House to direct that kind of question to the minister is at the end of the question period, which would mean, of course, that the opportunity would arise during the next question period, which would be on Monday.

Therefore, in accordance with your ruling, I now ask whether there is unanimous consent of the House to allow me to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in the next question period in regard to the statement he made outside the House about the RCMP withholding information from him.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to appear to be obstructing an effort on the part of the House, but the difficulty that we are in is that we have to recognize some procedure whereby members can seek unanimous consent of the House to do something. If a member rises on a point of order to seek unanimous consent of the House for something to be done, then if that is to be permitted—which is an extraordinary thing—and if a member says he wants to do something which seems to be prevented by the rules of the House, we would have to set aside the rules in such circumstances. The rules of the House themselves might be changed, but I think it would be dangerous if we started to do that.

Usually, in a situation like that, a member will get up in the House and, rather than changing the rules of the House, he or a minister would say he wanted to do something or say something to the House which would require the unanimous consent of the House, and he would so ask. If he did not get unanimous consent, then it could not be done. It seems to me that to permit one member to ask for unanimous consent to compel another member to do something would be to extend the practice somewhat. Before I would ever do that, I should like to reserve the matter and explore it further to see whether I might put that question a little later.

Is the hon. member for Victoria rising on the same point of order?

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is a very rare occasion when I get into these legal arguments about the business of the House. But I should like to point out to Your Honour, with respect, that if the government had any inclination to solve this problem and enable the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Afffairs to speak in the House, then the government need only do what it did today, namely, have the Solicitor General stay out of the House and have the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as acting solicitor general in the House, in the same fashion as the Minister of National Health and Welfare was out of the House today and the previous minister of health and welfare was able to answer questions about his performance in that portfolio.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will take all of these imaginative suggestions into consideration to see whether there are any questions I can put to the House on Monday.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, just one last point. There is a very simple way to resolve the problem before the House, and that would be for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs himself to have the courage to get up and to ask for the unanimous consent of the House—which I can tell him we in our party would be delighted to extend to him—to make a statement on motions next Monday so he will have the opportunity in the House of Commons to make the accusations which he made against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police outside the House. That, sir, would resolve your dilemma, it would resolve the dilemma before the House, and I am sure it would meet the desire of any courageous minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Clark: —who is prepared to say things outside the House, to say those same things inside the House. I would simply ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Afffairs to come to the aid of his colleagues here, to help Canadians know what it is that he is saying—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we have drifted a little from the procedural point into some aspects of substance. I think we should get back to our regular practice at this time.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend to statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, of course, to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C-11 and convey to the House some of the views I have and those which were expressed to me during the parliamentary recess we recently completed. I want, initially, to support my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton), on his very sincere remarks of last evening in which he requested the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to take a look at the projected use of the social insurance number.

As some members may know, I had a particular experience with a social insurance number as a result of an application made to me by a constituent to assist him. I am concerned that the Department of Finance is going to extend the use of the social insurance number. I find insurance companies now asking that their clients supply them with their social insurance number otherwise they will not handle the RRSP and other documents. This whole matter of the use of the social insurance number is going beyond its original intent.

A constituent of mine who was about 22 years of age at the time, a student at university, told me of an unbelievable horror story all centred around the social insurance number. He told me his wallet had been stolen. In the wallet he had his social insurance card, driver's licence and birth certificate. The individual who stole the wallet assumed the student's identity by reason of those three documents. He took employment in my constituent's name. He accumulated earnings in my constituent's name, to the extent that when the income tax year ended and my constituent filed his return, as is normal, he was contacted by the Department of National Revenue and told he had not contributed sufficient money; he had not declared all his income because the T-4 slips supplied by such and such an employer had his name, address and social insurance number on them. As a result of this, he was required for a period of two to three years to pay income tax on income he did not, in fact, earn.

In addition to this, the young man was subjected to other types of serious embarrassment. He had his driver's licence suspended, which was no fault of his. The individual using his name bounced cheques across the country and, in fact, used his card as a means of identification. He stole a car, using the young man's name, and was sent to prison. The young man ended up having a prison record, the RCMP had a file on him, and it all evolved around the social insurance number. The identifying item was the number.

I looked into the matter and established, first of all, the fact that his wallet had been stolen. I confirmed that with the local police. I then took him before a notary and had him swear a statement that the evidence he had given me was true. Then I began working from there. However, I was amazed at the difficulty we had getting this matter sorted out. I wanted to have a new social insurance number issued to this man, but it just could not be done. I was told it would take a change in the act to issue a new social insurance number. In fact, when we went to the chief of the central records of Manpower and Immigration, explaining all the details, that it was all on the record and files of the various departments I had contacted, he told me it would not be possible to issue a new social insurance number and the only way this matter could be handled was if my constituent changed his name. Can you imagine that? Can you really imagine a family gathering, where the mother says "This is Tom Jones, this is Bill Jones, this is Harry Jones, but this is Bob Smith"—all because he does not comply with some government regulation.

An hon. Member: He cannot change his SIN.

Mr. Kempling: This experience had all the aspects of Big Brother. The extension in use of the social insurance number frightens me. After about eighteen months, when we finally settled this matter, the Deputy Minister of Manpower and Immigration came to my office and we discussed the question of the social insurance number. He said that it was not to be used as a means of identification. The deputy minister told me that he had gone to a department store in Ottawa and tried to pay for some merchandise with a cheque. The clerk asked him for his social insurance number. The deputy minister replies, "No, it is not a means of identification."

What frightens people is that we have a program set up for social purposes, using it as an identification number, which is going to be suddenly stretched into another area. I was in Montreal the other day attending a conference where we were discussing the new Combines Investigation Act which was introduced in the House just today. A question was asked about the seizure of records by the authorities of the combines investigation branch. We already have wire-tapping legislation. Are we likely to see, in the near future, amendments to the wire-tapping legislation allowing the combines investigation people, aside from seizing our records, to tap our telephones? This is the sort of uncertainty which is brought about by the use of the social insurance number by other departments.

I should like to refer to some other things which happened to this young man whose card was misused. The chap who used his name and identity travelled through the United States committing fraud. He was brought to justice by the state police in Texas. At that time, he revealed to the police the fact that it was not his real name and he was using fraudulent documents. Those documents were taken from him in Texas.

After being released, he returned to Canada. He went to the closest post office and picked up an application form for a replacement card, filled it out, and received a replacement card in the mail. He did that, as well, with the driver's licence and birth certificate. After obtaining these replacements, he started all over once again. He was eventually found in Woodstock, where he had worked at a gasoline station. Actually, I found him in jail because he was charged with a fraudulent act. What was amazing about this case is that nobody on the government side was prepared to do anything about it.

The Minister of National Revenue did not know whether he was responsible, even though the victim was being asked to pay taxes on money he did not earn. The Minister of Justice indicated that it was not his problem. The Solicitor General said that he did not know what he could do about it, but would look into it. I never heard back from him. The young man is a victim of circumstances, because a criminal record will follow him which does not belong to him. We attempted to have that record cancelled. The RCMP argued about this—

An hon. Member: Don't attack the RCMP.

Mr. Kempling: The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs brought a fingerprint card to my office and asked if I could arrange to have my constituent fingerprinted.

An hon. Member: A do-it-yourself program.

Mr. Kempling: That is right, it was a do-it-yourself program. Can the situation be imagined? The police had a file on an innocent man indicating that he had stolen cards, bounced cheques across Canada and had several fraud charges against him. They had a file on this man which contained the man's name, address, social insurance number and a set of fingerprints which did not belong to him. The fingerprints belonged to the real culprit, and that is how we sorted it out.

I received more co-operation from the RCMP than I did from any other department I dealt with. I asked the RCMP to look into this matter and to run a comparison between the name, social insurance number and fingerprints. Lo and behold, the force indicated that the fingerprints on the file did not belong to the innocent party. Because the culprit had a criminal record for stealing a car, I was able to follow up his fingerprints and arrive at his name. Finally, it was all sorted out. The difficulty we were faced with was getting this criminal record cancelled. Eventually, we were able to get it wiped out.

Most of our provinces have legislation which allows you to look into the credit records of individuals. What concerned my constituent, after this matter was sorted out, was that private credit reporting agencies would have criminal records and other fraudulent charges shown against his name for offences which he did not commit. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain indicated, I hope the minister will take this matter under advice, and at the time we are considering this bill clause by clause I hope he will bring forth an amendment to section 5(2), (3), (4) of the Income Tax Act and not allow an extension of the use of social insurance numbers into other programs.

I should like to quote the following from the privacy and computers report to the Department of Communications:

> Two major new income security programs will, if introduced, extend the use of the social insurance number. The Family Income Security Plan (FISP) will, since the cheques will be payable to mothers, require the registration of those mothers wishing to benefit. Proposed old age security legislation will also require the use of a social insurance number. The scale of benefits from both programs will be income-related, and it is expected that stated income will be confirmed by the Department of National Revenue.
> It is possible that a de facto personal identification number will develop in Canada, either through an ever-widening use of the Social Insurance Number (despite its limitations) or indirectly through credit card and bank account numbers. However, it is important to ensure that a single identifying number should not be adopted in Canada, directly or indirectly, without a full examination and public debate of its merits and consequences.

This is the crux of what we are concerned about. If these changes are made, there will not be enough time to debate them. As the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain indicated yesterday, the change was slipped into a piece of legislation last year. It was disguised in very legalized terms so that the members who were under the hammer of closure did not really have an opportunity to examine it very quickly. It was contained in the legislation and subsequently the bill passed. Fortunately, the whip of our party, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) said "On division", because he spotted the matter and realized we should not pass it, thus indicating that we supported the government on this particular measure.

If, in fact, it is the intention of the government to bring in a single identifying number for all Canadians, the matter should be brought forth and debated in the House in order for all of us to express our views on it. I am very much upset about the way we seem to be trapped by more and more regulations which in fact have the force of statutes. The people enforcing them are not responsible to parliament. Of course, the difficulty we face in this matter is that most of the legislation which is brought in indicates, in the preamble, that the governor in council shall attach regulations thereto upon proclamation. Further down in the legislation it is usually indicated that the governor in council may change regulations from time to time as required. Therein lies the problem. We are being regulated more and more, which is costly.

A representative of Bell Canada appeared before a committee last year and informed us that it cost the company $15 million annually to comply with government regulations. Also, we were told that the fastest growing division of Bell Canada was their legal department, because of the massive amount of government regulations which have to be dealt with. Members of parliament have a responsibility to do what they can in order to attain some measure of control over the imposition of regulations on society, and placing in the hands of bureaucrats powers beyond those of the Parliament of Canada.

Having said those things, I should like to turn again to discussing some of the aspects of Bill C-11. I do not intend to get into the details of the bill, because we will be studying it clause by clause, but I want to dwell briefly on the insurance aspect. In its wisdom, the government has seen fit to move away from one portion of the insurance adjustments recorded in the budget speech of last March. When it came to light that it was the intention of the government to tax insurance policies upon the death of an individual, we were, obviously, quite upset.

● (1242)

What particularly upset me was the fact that the government was going to deem that a person had cashed in a policy before in fact dying. In other words, an insurance policy was going to pay a beneficiary a certain sum of money, but in its desire to collect revenue from that policy, the government was going to say that something was done which really was not. The government was going to deem that that policy was cashed in, so that it could collect some taxation on it. At that point I said to my colleagues that I hoped one of the insurance companies would have the courage to test that in the courts, because I do not think any government should be able to deem that something was done which was not done.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): They cannot deem you are dead.

Mr. Kempling: Perhaps they can deem that you are back to life. These fellows will try anything. However, it seems to me that that would be a very unfair way of trying to sneak away with some revenue. When we looked into it, we found that the insurance companies could not have cared less. It was not going to affect them one bit. It was going to affect policyholders, but it was also going to affect dramatically insurance agents who sell insurance, because they sold policies in good faith and would have to go back to their clients to tell them that the policies were going to be taxed.

[Mr. Kempling.]

We asked some officials about this. They could not even tell us how much revenue they would get from the tax. I suppose like many other hon. members, I prepared a little article for the newspaper castigating the government for this terrible deed. I encouraged my constituents to write to the minister asking him to withdraw, and to send me copies of their letters. I received literally hundreds of letters on this matter. I have spoken about it on many occasions. I assume hon. members from both sides of the House have been put under pressure and the government has yielded and withdrawn that feature of the legislation for reason.

However, one thing I am concerned about is that the government still insists on not allowing interest on loans which are taken against insurance polices to be a deductible expense. This is unfortunate. Many small businessmen, particularly those in the retail trade, use their ability to borrow on their insurance to help them in the conduct of their businesses. Many small retailers have a great deal of difficulty obtaining financing. Some of them do not have a very broad financial foundation upon which to base their businesses. They have to keep a large variety of merchandise in order to survive, and many of them have to buy ahead for, for example, Christmas.

They have difficulty getting financing at banks because most of them are in rented premises. Some of them have leased fixtures and some of their inventories are on consignment, so they use their ability to borrow from insurance companies against their insurance policies. I think it is a step backwards to tax these loans. It is rather ironic that if you want to buy a Canada Savings Bond you can go to one of our chartered banks, borrow money from the bank to buy the bond, and deduct the interest charges as an expense; but if you go to an insurance company to borrow $1,000 against an insurance policy, you find that the interest cost cannot be deducted from your income. When we get to clause by clause study, many hon. members will speak about this and, hopefully, we will be able to get the government to yield on that point as well.

Another thing I want to deal with is the whole matter of confidence in the government and in the economy. I am a businessman; I have worked for large and small businesses. I am still involved in a business. Because of those facts, when I am in my constituency or travelling around the country, people in business contact me and tell me about their problems. I am really upset about the number of businessmen who are not sure they are going to make it through the year. Some of them have told me they will be surprised if they survive through the spring of 1978.

That is a deplorable situation. Part of this is due to the competitive nature of business, and part is due to the inability to get adequate financing in order to operate businesses. Many businessmen are looking at their earned surplus accounts and calculating how long it will be before those earned surplus accounts are down to zero and they begin to eat into their capital funds.

As I see it, the difficulty is that the government of this country for the past ten years has spent more time dividing up the nation's wealth than it has in concerning itself with productivity. It is quite evident to anyone involved in any manufacturing process, or in any business at all, that if productivity had remained static over the centuries, man would never have emerged from the Stone Age. The only time we make any social progress at all is when we have a gain in productivity. We just cannot have a social gain unless there is an accompanying, equal gain in productivity.

The government employs more than 2,000 economists, I am told, and I understand that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has more than the Department of Finance. That may be explained away by saying that the quality is a little higher in the Department of Finance than it is in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Increases in productivity result from many factors. We hear people saying that Canada is far down the list with regard to productivity. They look at the OECD scale and see that we are tenth or eleventh behind a number of what we might call emerging countries, in some instances. However, there are many factors involved in productivity: capital, the quality of labour, the quality of organization and management, transportation, taxation, regulations and competition policy. All those factors are present when we consider productivity. If a business has difficulty getting capital and has to pay a high price for the capital it uses, whether it be working capital or investment capital, then that is going to be reflected in its productivity equation. When we look at this factor alone, we find that in the area of manufactured products, last year we had a trade deficit of about $10 billion.

The best information I have been able to obtain so far is that the estimate is there will be a trade deficit of $11.5 billion. If that deficit were in balance—in other words, if we did not have a trade deficit on manufactured products—we would be employing about 800,000 more people, which is about the number of people unemployed give or take 100,000.

I have talked to a great number of people in the manufacturing trade who asked what is going on in GATT. They want to know what we are doing at the GATT conferences. I would particularly appreciate it if the minister would take note of these remarks regarding GATT. When the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald) occupied the finance portfolio, I asked him about the GATT negotiations. His reply was not very complimentary, and I will not repeat it. It is in Hansard. I am not very pleased with what he said. The fact is that most people in the manufacturing trade do not know what is going on at GATT. Many have told me they are afraid they are going to wake up one morning and find they are no longer in business, that the tariffs that protected them have been taken away or altered to such an extent that they can no longer compete.

It is not a happy feeling to have invested in plant and machinery and to have expertise in marketing, and then find you are no longer able to compete because of imported products. The minister has talked about our trade deficit and balance of payments problems. There are two ways to alleviate your balance of payment problem: one is to export more, and the other is to manufacture domestically more of the things you are going to consume. In other words, you export less.

There are two ways to attack that problem. We always seem to be talking about exporting more. Every time we do that, we seem to import more. No efforts have been made, that are evident anywhere, to establish a sound, solid, secondary industrial base in this country. In fact, a succession of ministers, in the years I have been in this House, have even questioned whether we can establish a sound secondary industrial base in Canada. Of course, it goes without saying that if we do not have this, we are certainly not going to be able to employ the growing number of people we have in this country. Therein lies another frustration.

In the few minutes left, I must tell a final story about a constituent of mine whom I met in my riding when I was home last week. He is a stationary engineer, in his fifties—around the age where if you become unemployed, it is difficult to get a job. Although people say they do not discriminate on the basis of age, in fact they do.

This man was ill for about a year, he had recovered and was having difficulty finding employment. He went to the Manpower office and saw a job listed there for a dishwasher. He asked the counsellor where the job was located, so that he could apply for it, because he just had to have something to do. The official said my constituent should fill out a form. The first question was, "Do you have any experience?" He replied, "I have been married for 37 years." That did not matter; they wanted to know if he had any professional experience in washing dishes, otherwise they would not recommend him for the job.

It all seemed rather silly. He asked if there was a training course to show him how to wash dishes, but there was not. He went home and looked in the yellow pages of the telephone book, under the "restaurants" section, and finally found the restaurant that was advertising for a dishwasher. He applied for the job and got it. That whole situation is a pretty sad state of affairs.

Mr. Speaker, when we get to clause by clause consideration of this bill, I shall participate in the debate. At that time I intend to raise several points of controversy in the legislation. With your permission may I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed that we call it one o'clock? If it is not agreed to call it one o'clock, I have another speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this country is facing the most serious crisis it has faced in peacetime since the early 1930s. Last month, on a seasonally adjusted basis, 886,000 people were unemployed—over 100,000 more than in October, 1976.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, this country is facing the greatest crisis in unemployment which it has seen since before World War II and since, as we call them, the hungry, dirty thirties. The situation has been accelerating over the last two or three years. For each month of this year we have had substantially more unemployment in this country than we had for the same month last year. Also, in every month in 1976 there were more unemployed than in the same months of 1975.

In October of this year we had 886,000 people unemployed, compared to 769,000 in October, 1976. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we had more than 100,000 more unemployed in October, 1977, than we had in October, 1976. The rate of unemployment, on a seasonally adjusted basis, grew from 7.4 per cent in October, 1976, to 8.3 per cent in October, 1977—an increase of almost 100,000. Here we have a Liberal government, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who come from the province of Quebec. Both of them have been telling the people of Canada and the people of Quebec what a disaster the whole idea of the separation of Quebec would be for the people of Quebec. If one looks at Quebec's unemployment figures for October, 1977, we see there were 283,000 people unemployed, compared to 234,000 in October, 1976—an increase of almost 50,000.

The seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment in Quebec grew from 10.1 per cent in October, 1976, to 11.4 per cent in October 1977. If one looks at the rate of unemployment among young people aged 24, he will find that in October there were 383,000 unemployed in that age group—almost 50 per cent of the total unemployed. In Quebec, the percentage of young people unemployed is somewhere between 14 and 16 per cent. The Minister of Finance can do nothing more to promote the feeling of separatism than to permit this completely unacceptable rate of unemployment to continue. How can one expect the young people of Quebec to support a country—Canada—in which they cannot find jobs, when they have the best education this country has ever been able to offer? Is this a temporary situation? The Minister of Finance is quoted in the October 7 Globe and Mail as follows:

> Canada's unemployment rate will not go down in the next year and a half because the economy will not grow fast enough . . . real gross national product increases of 2 per cent this year and between 4 and 5 per cent next year will increase employment but not enough to make a major impact on the rate of unemployment.

When the former minister of finance delivered his address in the spring of this year, he predicted an increase of 4 per cent, plus, in the gross national product. Of course, the increase has only been half that amount. The reason for that wrong estimate is that finance ministers have consistently been given incorrect information by their senior advisers in the department. If the Minister of Finance wants to begin trimming the fat off the public service, he should start with the senior people in his department. They have been giving ministers of finance incorrect information for the past four or five years. The minister admitted that unemployment would not decrease and, in fact, could well increase in the next year or so. He was merely repeating some of the forecasts made by all economists with the exception of those made in the minister's department.

On October 25 the Toronto Globe and Mail reported the views of the chairman of the Ontario Economic Council, Professor Grant Reuber, who said:

> Ontario probably will have high unemployment and inflation and slow economic growth during the next ten years—

That opinion is not surprising. That situation has been vividly brought to our attention as a result of the ruthless lay-offs by the International Nickel Company at Sudbury, Thompson, Manitoba, and Port Colborne, Ontario. This will mean a loss of about 4,000 jobs within the next few months. Sudbury will lose 2,800 jobs, Thompson 650, and Port Colborne 375. In Sudbury the payroll will decrease by over $40 million if the cutback lasts for a whole year. In Thompson there will be a loss of about $10 million in wages, and in Port Colborne about $4½ million. In Sudbury, where there is really no other industry, the workers will lose over $40 million in wages. Between $12 million and $15 million of those earnings would have gone to federal, provincial and municipal governments through taxes.

In addition, the workers would have spent money on food, housing, automobiles, stoves, refrigerators, television sets, and so on. That loss does not just mean a reduction of $40 million in wages. The Canadian people will have to pay approximately $560,000 a week—close to $30 million—in unemployment insurance. Therefore, the loss will be almost twice the $40 million figure. Not only will those who have been laid off suffer, but so will the small business people in Sudbury, Thompson and Port Colborne whose livelihoods depend on purchases by Inco workers.

That is not the end of the losses. Last summer Inco hired about 1,100 students, and the summer before they hired about 1,400. Those students, who depend to a large extent on work in the mines in Sudbury in order to continue their education, will in all likelihood not be able to continue unless the federal and provincial governments increase sharply their loans and student aid grants. However, that is very unlikely.

We are not talking about a poor corporation but one of the most powerful in this country. I want to put on record what the federal government and the Ontario provincial government have done for this company which in one fell swoop is laying off almost 4,000 people. From 1967 to 1976, Inco's profits totalled $1.7 billion. This multinational corporation owes the people of Canada $368.9 million in deferred federal taxes. As far as I am concerned, that is an interest-free loan to International Nickel.

This money was used to develop sources of nickel which will be sold in Guatemala and Indonesia. The money used to build these companies was obtained from Canadian workers. It has helped to destroy Canadian jobs. The federal tax credit on machinery and buildings have saved Inco $17½ million in profits. The provincial sales tax exemption which became effective in April, 1975, saved Inco approximately $25 million in the two years, 1975 and 1976. The federal Export Development Corporation has loaned Inco $70 million to help finance its ventures in Guatemala.

● (1422)

The interest rate is kept a secret, but we know it is below the commercial rate: it is probably below 6 per cent. Inco pays its workers in Guatemala $6 a day, and in Indonesia the workers are paid $6 a week, so it is not surprising the corporation would try to develop its nickel production in other countries to avoid paying wages which workers have been able to persuade or force the company to pay here in Canada. Inco benefited further through fast write-off provisions to the extent of some $48 million in 1976. Yet the government proposes to continue to make tax concessions to corporations which will cost the people of Canada $1.2 billion this year.

The lay-offs at Inco are not an isolated case: Falconbridge has announced lay-offs; Noranda has announced lay-offs. It is estimated that in the coming year up to 20,000 people will be laid off in the mining industry in Canada. I would remind hon. members that this is a section of the economy which since the end of the Second World War has received concession after concession to persuade corporations, mainly multinational in character, to invest money in Canada. We have had very little thanks in return from these corporations, which are not interested in providing jobs in Canada as much as they are interested in making profits. As is evident now, they realize it is easier to make profits outside Canada than inside.

Perhaps the most serious aspect of the unemployment situation is the high rate of unemployment among our youth. Almost 50 per cent of our unemployed at the present time are in the age group 15 to 24, despite the fact that we have spent increasing amounts of money year after year to keep our young people in school, to persuade them that, having finished high school, they should go on to trade schools, community colleges or universities. The prospects for our young people are distinctly gloomy. The jobless rate for those of university age, 20 to 24, was 10.8 per cent, and for those between 15 and 19—in other words, for those leaving high school—it was 19.2 per cent.

I do not think I can be as graphic in describing the plight of the young unemployed as was the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) who the other day gave a striking illustration before a conference on youth employment sponsored by the Canadian Council on Social Welfare. He reported that in response to an advertisement for someone to fill a vacancy as a warehouse foreman, 45 applicants came forward seven of whom held Master's degrees in business administration. Could there be a more compelling comment on our failure to deal with unemployment than the fact that seven people who spent five or six years after high school getting a university education should find the job situation so bad that they would be willing to take work as a warehouse foreman?

What is the position presently taken by the Minister of Finance? I suggest the minister is completely at a loss as to what to do. The Globe and Mail of October 24 carried a short summary of comments and suggestions made by the minister during the preceding weekend. I should like to refer to just two paragraphs from that story to show how confused the minister must be. The dateline is "Ottawa, CP Special," and the first paragraph begins, "Canadians should spend more and save less."

In other words we are in trouble because instead of going out and buying products made in Canada, which would then need to be replaced, thus stimulating the manufacturing sector, Canadians are putting too much of their money into savings accounts in banks or credit unions, or buying government bonds, and so on. A few paragraphs later, in the same story, the Minister of Finance is quoted as follows:

The Canadian worker must lower his expectations and start living within his means.

If I understand anything about living within one's means, the implication is that one must live strictly within one's budget, avoid purchasing goods on credit where possible, and so on. It seems to me the minister is telling people they should not spend everything they make, that they should not buy things on credit, and that they should save money.

Mr. Speaker, he cannot have it both ways: he cannot be right when he says both, that we are saving too much and that we are living beyond our expectations. It appears to me that the minister and his advisers have not really thought out their policies. The Economic Council of Canada issued its annual report a few days ago. I would remind hon. members that the Economic Council was set up by the government of Canada to study the economic situation, to present an annual report and to give advice on the state of the union and on what we should do to make things better.

I would remind hon. members, further, that originally, when the Economic Council was set up, it included representatives from labour, from agriculture, from industry, from the universities, and so on. Some time ago the labour members resigned from the council because of dissatisfaction with the government's anti-inflation program. So this year's report has been made by a council on which there are no labour members, no small "l" liberals, no people who are on the left.

I will just read a few of the names into the record so that members may confirm what I am saying: Ian Andrew Barcley, chairman and chief executive officer of British Columbia Forest Products Limited; S. Robert Blair, president and chief executive officer, Alberta Gas Trunk Line Company; J. A. Brown, dean of agriculture, University of Saskatchewan; Roy Fraser Elliott, Q.C., partner in Stikeman, Elliott, Robarts and Bowman, Toronto; James A. McCambly, building and construction trades department, Ottawa; A. M. Runciman, president, United Grain Growers Limited, Winnipeg. I can attest to the fact that Mr. Runciman is not a very radical person, and I know I am being conservative in saying that.

What did the Economic Council propose this year, faced as we are with almost one million people unemployed and the prospect of an increase in the unemployment rate? Let me summarize a few of the proposals made by the Economic Council. They recommend permanent personal income tax cuts of $2 billion, which would be the equivalent of an 8 per cent to 10 per cent reduction in the personal income tax rate and would provide ongoing stimulus to consumer purchasing power equivalent to about $200 per taxpayer per year.

In its analysis of policy options, the council applied a flat 8.3 per cent reduction of taxes across the board and a 25 per cent reduction of the rates paid by the people in the lowest income brackets. This sounds very familiar to me, Mr. Speaker, because the New Democratic Party has been proposing personal income tax cuts, particularly for people in the lower income brackets, for a number of years. According to the Economic Council, a cut of this rate would increase real growth in Canada by about one percentage point in 1978 and would reduce the unemployment rate to 7.7 per cent from the 8 per cent which would otherwise occur. I want hon. members to remember that the 8 per cent which they and others predict, or the 7.7 per cent which the council says will be the unemployment rate if we cut taxes by $2 billion, would still leave Canada with the highest rate of unemployment of any of the western industrial countries of the world.

The $2 billion cut in personal income taxes would be shared, $1.3 billion by the federal government and $700 million by the provinces. The council also believes that provincial sales taxes are an area where cuts could be made, and recommends that the provinces cut their provincial sales taxes by at least one percentage point, except on items such as gasoline, alcohol and cigarettes. A one percentage point cut would mean a tax reduction of about $300 million on the part of the provinces, according to the council. Those are the recommendations of the Economic Council, not a very radical organization. It is a council the members of which, and also the senior staff, have been appointed by the government.

What was the reaction of the Minister of Finance to the advice that was given to him by the Economic Council? Let me read from the Winnipeg Free Press for November 10. I read from the Free Press because I would not want the minister to say he was misquoted or misinterpreted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North. This is what Paul Whitelaw, staff correspondent of the Winnipeg Free Press, says in an article headed "Tax cut plan irresponsible, Chrétien says":

> Finance minister Jean Chrétien says the proposal by the Economic Council of Canada for $2 billion in personal income tax cuts is irresponsible.
> Chrétien told the Commons Tuesday that "to borrow another $2 billion at this time in an attempt to buy our way out of the economic difficulties we are in would not be responsible.
> It is not my belief that irresponsible action on the part of the minister of finance would be of any good to the nation."

It is obvious that the Minister of Finance has rejected the advice of the Economic Council. The acting chairman of the Economic Council, Mr. George Post, in commenting on the minister's mini-budget speech of October 20, has said it will barely prevent the current high unemployment rate from increasing further. The answer of the minister is that Mr. Post and the Economic Council are being irresponsible.

What the Council said, Mr. Speaker, was that without the stimulus of the kind of tax cuts they are proposing, the economy will grow by only 4.3 per cent a year over the next five years; inflation will average 7.1 per cent; unemployment will average 8.2 per cent. Even with the new tax cuts, this dismal picture will not change much. A $2 billion income tax cut and a $1 billion provincial sales tax cut would produce average growth of 4.7 per cent, keep inflation at 7.2 per cent and reduce unemployment to 7.6 per cent. In other words, what the council is proposing is that we trade a small increase in inflation for a drop in the unemployment rate of about 1 per cent. As I say, the minister is not prepared to take the advice of the Economic Council. We can judge what advice he is getting from people in his finance department by the action which he takes, but we cannot know precisely what they say.

However, Mr. Speaker, we do know what another of his principal advisers has recommended. The Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, made a speech to the Calgary Chamber of Commerce which was reported in the Globe and Mail for Saturday, September 17, and I should like to summarize a couple of the points he made. He said that Canada should not attempt to solve its unemployment problem with policies that would involve any risk of a higher inflation rate. We know that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are taking that advice because they still consider inflation a much more serious problem than unemployment. Mr. Bouey went on to say that the inescapable conclusion is that if we want to achieve and sustain high levels of output and high employment, we really have no alternative but to grapple with inflation and with the inflationary practices that keep it going.

That sounds very familiar, Mr. Speaker, for have we not heard the Prime Minister say that we have to wrestle inflation to the ground? Mr. Bouey went on to emphasize his belief that the persistence of high inflationary expectations in Canada is a "serious obstacle" in the way of better economic performance. He closed his address with this admonition:

> Now, considerable caution must be exercised in introducing expansionary measures to stimulate output and employment for fear that such action will give fresh impetus to inflationary expectations and behaviour.

In other words, we are back to the advice of the Minister of Finance that we should not have too great expectations. Every day when I leave this chamber and return to my residence I cannot help but see the glass tower, the office building which is being completed for use by the Bank of Canada. I am told that the cost of this very modernistic and expensive building is between $50 million and $75 million, so I have to assume that what the Governor of the Bank of Canada is saying to the people of Canada is, "Do as I say, not as I do". That, of course, is the attitude we always have on the part of those who have toward those who have not.

Mr. Johnston: What's the heating bill going to be?

Mr. Orlikow: That we can discuss on another occasion. What does one million unemployed mean, in terms of the Canadian economy, Mr. Speaker? A very good economic consultant, Arthur Donner, who writes regularly in the Toronto Globe and Mail, made the following estimate which appeared in his column on August 17:

● (1442)

The accumulated real gnp and employment losses since 1973 are staggering. At constant 1971 prices, the production losses are estimated at $25.5 billion between 1974 and 1976, and assuming the real growth trends projected for 1977 and 1978, this gap rises in the range of an extra $11.5 billion. To place this figure in perspective, this represents about 42 per cent of the real economic activity in 1976.

These are billions of dollars which could, and should, have been produced but which will not be produced. They represent hundreds of thousands of jobs which could, and should, be available to Canadian workers. What is the approach of this government in dealing with this unemployment problem? Its approach is a further continuation and expansion of tax concessions to corporations and investors as outlined in the budget the former minister of finance brought down last March 31.

We heard a number of members on the government side challenge the NDP, especially the members who have spoken before me, regarding our figures and ask where we got the $1.2 billion or the $1,245 million. We got the figure from the budget papers prepared and tabled by the then minister of finance. Let me put them on the record categorically, to show where that money will go: tax relief in respect of business inventories, $300 million; federal investment tax credits, $485 million; enhanced depletion for high cost oil and gas wells, $20 million; increased dividend tax credits, $120 million; increase in limits for capital loss, $45 million; inclusion of capital gains on Canadian securities, $10 million; other corporate and investor tax concessions, $100 million, with the loss in provincial revenues related to the above, $165 million—or a total of $1,245 million.

It has been our argument that it makes no sense at all to try to stimulate investment in Canadian business and industry when industry is now operating at only just above 80 per cent capacity. In other words, industry is not using its existing investment in plant capacity, and no businessman is going to invest in increased and improved production facilities when he is using just over 80 per cent of his present capacity. The time to invest in improved and increased facilities is when industry is working flat out, at full capacity.

The record is clear that the kind of tax concessions the government is proposing for this year, those included in the budget bills which are, and will be, before us, are the same as those the government has tried in each of the last half-dozen years or more. The fact is that we now have over 8 per cent unemployment, or almost twice as much unemployment, in every province in Canada as we had when the Prime Minister took over that position in 1968. That is what we have accomplished with the kind of tax policies the present government has been implementing in the last eight or ten years.

We have consistently suggested there are two ways to reduce unemployment, or two ways to prevent the unemployed carrying the burden of the economic mismanagement to which they have been subjected by this government. As I indicated earlier, the first way is through tax cuts such as those proposed by the Economic Council of Canada, that is, tax cuts on personal income, with the greatest being in respect of people in the lowest income brackets. In addition to these tax cuts we have suggested a system of tax credits which would put purchasing power in the hands of the people who need it the most, that is, the 25 per cent to 30 per cent of Canadians whose income is so low that they pay no income tax at all. That is one way we could deal with the problem of unemployment. The way to get people working in this country is for the government to get into a serious and well thought-out and planned program of public works.

As I listened to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance during their recent expositions of the situation we are in and what we ought to do, I could not help but close my eyes and imagine somehow that R. B. Bennett and Mackenzie King had returned to Canada. What the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are saying this year about dealing with unemployment and getting the economy moving is precisely the same kind of economic nonsense R. B. Bennett uttered when he was prime minister of Canada in—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, when the minister introduced this bill for second reading on November 7, he said the purpose was twofold: first, to implement amendments to the Income Tax Act as announced in his mini-budget, economic statement, or whatever else you choose to call it, as well as those mentioned by the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), in his March 31 budget; and, second, to increase government borrowing authority.

It seems passing strange to me that when we are called upon to debate measures introduced or suggested back in March, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) should suggest we deal expeditiously with them because of the beneficial results that will accrue from the implementation of such proposals. If they are so important now, they must have been important back then and the government has been remiss in not moving forward with the legislation in order to implement the proposals at a much earlier date.

We in the opposition have a number of serious reservations about the government's attempt to bootleg a proposal to increase its borrowing authority by means of an income tax bill. This appears to me to be a trick that has been used on other occasions. That is, whenever the government wants a measure pushed through the House of Commons to which it feels there will be serious opposition, it attaches that measure to some other more attractive proposals in an endeavour to ensure that support for those measures will outweigh opposition to the objectionable ones.

● (1452)

That is precisely what has happened with this measure to increase the government's borrowing authority. It is objectionable to most members of this House, yet it has been placed in the same bill with certain other, long delayed provisions which industry and business have been promised since March 31, along with tax cuts for low income earners. The government hopes this will ensure the passage of the entire legislation.

I need not refer to the fact that we on this side of the House are dismayed by what the government has attempted to do regarding income tax amendments. My colleagues have pointed out very eloquently the shortcomings of the government in many areas over the last few days. Yet I am compelled to refer to some areas where I feel the government has failed Canadians. The sad thing is that so much could be done to effect solutions to our national problems, yet so little has been done.

In reply to questions concerning our economy, government spokesmen have stated there is a serious unemployment situation, a high rate of inflation and many other problems. They stated there is little the government can do. Also, we have been advised that possibly things will become worse before getting better. Yet members of the government criticize the opposition for not making constructive suggestions on how to deal with these problems. A great many important proposals have been made by the official opposition. We believe there are many areas where improvements can be made for our economy, but the government would rather muddle along than accept and implement the proposals made from this side of the House.

I should like to deal with something which would have a beneficial effect upon the needs of Canadians, would increase their purchasing power, would inspire confidence and promote consumption. I am referring to the transportation system. Two years ago last July we debated a measure to increase the excise tax on a gallon of gasoline by ten cents. At that time we pointed out that a hardship would be imposed upon Canadians during a time of high inflation.

Many members felt that the provision would not save even a gallon of gasoline but simply would be another burden Canadians would have to bear. I was happy to hear the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) making reference to this particular tax and suggesting that it should be reduced to three cents per gallon. I would go one step farther than that and suggest it should be eliminated altogether.

It is a rather shocking experience to drive up to gas pumps in Ottawa and see, out of a gallon of regular gasoline which sells for 83 cents to 93 cents a gallon, that the government receives approximately 61 per cent. Out of the 83 cents to 93 cents a dealer receives for a gallon of gasoline, he is able to keep only, on the average, eight cents to ten cents. This is appalling. It is not the cost of gasoline which is so out of line; it is the decision of governments to impose further burdens of taxation upon those who require to use their automobiles in order to carry on their daily activities, commuting back and forth to work and meeting their day to day obligations.

[Mr. Patterson.]

My suggestion is very straightforward and it would help to lower the rate of inflation. I would ask the minister to take this into consideration as he looks at suggestions which have been made. We are told we must move over to rapid mass transportation, but we find in this important area the government has been negligent and delinquent in even meeting the commitments has it made from time to time regarding the matter of urban transportation and a rapid transit system. Right now it does not pay to take public transportation systems; they are expensive, slow, uncomfortable and inconvenient. The automobile is still the cheapest, most reliable and most convenient method of transportation. Until the government sees fit to move in the direction of providing adequate alternate systems, then Canadians should be entitled to maintain their automobiles and operate them at a reasonable rate.

I hope the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission wins out in his struggle with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the vested interests of this country over advance airline charters. This could do wonders for the transportation system in Canada and be a real boon to the consumers of the country.

I should like to refer to another area which is a national problem, and that is with regard to the matter of housing. In the November, 1974, budget the then minister of finance, Mr. Turner, finally saw some light and partially removed the sales tax on building materials. Members of my party knew that this was not adequate. The government saw a little light, but did not proceed too far with it. The result has been that those who desire to construct their own homes are still faced with inordinately high cost because of the continuing tax on building materials.

If the minister reduced the federal sales tax to zero, that is, cut it by 5 per cent, it would mean a saving of some $500 to home buyers. This would have a tremendous effect on the housing market and on the amount of disposable income for Canadians. I should like to refer to a recent press release which reads as follows:

> Progressive Conservative consumer affairs critic, James McGrath, and finance critic, Sinclair Stevens, today called upon the federal government to implement an immediate cut in the federal 12 per cent manufacturing sales tax in order to reduce inflation and create jobs.

This proposal has been made time and time again. It has been reiterated by my colleagues, and I would like to add my voice to it. I am sure a great many members in this House have added their voices to this request and will continue to do so. I agree with the comments of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka who so very eloquently set out our proposals regarding the deductibility of property taxes from personal income tax. There is little being done by this government, and the minister should take this suggestion into consideration.

Also, consideration should be given to allowing interest paid on residential mortgages, up to a certain limit, to be made deductible for income tax purposes. Another matter which is an absolutely ridiculous proposal is the suggestion to make home insulation grants taxable. This is a situation where the government loudly claims their generosity in providing grants for people to insulate their homes in order to conserve energy and then it is made taxable. This is irresponsible and incomprehensible. The minister should take that suggestion under advisement.

We welcome the paltry cuts in personal income taxes announced by the minister. There should be considerably more. After all, this tax will not do much to meet the high cost of living and encourage consumers to purchase goods that are available. The Economic Council of Canada recommended a $2 billion tax cut.

● (1502)

It was very interesting to listen to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) last night when he challenged the government to cut taxes in various areas. That would promote productivity and create jobs. Additional purchasing power left in the hands of consumers would go a long way toward encouraging production and business expansion, thus opening new job opportunities for thousands of Canadians presently unemployed. Lack of confidence on the part of business and industry, as pointed out by the Economic Council of Canada, is one of the major problems we face at the present time.

I would like now to turn to one of the proposals made in the intervention of the Minister of Finance in this debate, regarding amendments to the Income Tax Act as they relate to the sale and the acquisition of farms and/or commercial businesses. As far as they go these amendments are certainly welcome. This has been a matter of grave concern in the agricultural community for many years, and these provisions will do much to assist that industry and to improve its position economically and contribute still further to the productivity of the nation.

Out in the area which I have the honour to represent this will have very beneficial effects upon our agricultural community; I know it will in other parts of the country, and it certainly will in the area I represent. Although there are still clarifications to be made and there are still various matters to be cleared up, I believe the principle will be welcomed by the people concerned.

Likewise, the business community welcomes the amendments but suggests that an extension of the provisions should be considered. In a letter to the Minister of Finance a company in my constituency acknowledged the appreciation of the business community with respect to this measure, but also made some recommendations. It recommended that the proposal be extended to defer from capital gains taxes all moneys received as a result of the disposal of land, buildings, equipment or other assets by a taxable corporation if the following conditions are met: where these funds are used to acquire assets to be employed for the purpose of earning taxable income or where the funds are expended within a certain period of time from the date of sales, possibly a year, or it could be shortened or extended at the discretion of the minister.

It was pointed out that these additional changes will have a beneficial effect. They will provide a shot in the arm for the economy. They will enable individuals or companies to dispose of non-producing assets and acquire additional earning capacity which would enhance the federal tax base. They will be a short-term incentive to corporations, and so forth.

While we welcome these proposed changes, I suggest that there is still a long way to go. There are many additional moves which can be taken in order to make these provisions more acceptable and more effective in meeting the needs of the agricultural community as well as of the business community across our country.

A number of those participating in this debate have commented on the provisions with respect to life insurance benefits. Here again, while appreciating the announced intention of the government to introduce $10,000 deduction from the total taxable portion of all life insurance policies, the fact remains that even the amended provisions leave the government in the unenviable position of taxing moneys left by deceased persons to assist widows—or widowers, as the case may be—and dependants, on the occasion of the most shattering and trying time of their lives.

There have been various communications which point out that it is amazing that any government would come to the point where it would embark on a proposition like this, where it would tax the benefits which assist individuals at the time of their greatest need. I was talking to a friend of mine who is in the insurance business, and he said he has never yet come across a case where the beneficiary had more than enough money to meet expenses and to meet immediate needs following the death of the breadwinner. I have certainly never come across anyone who fits into that category either, and I doubt very much whether the minister or any members of the cabinet have ever come across such a situation. So I say I do not believe that Canadians want their government to act in such a callous and insensitive manner, or to impose a tax upon these benefits.

With regard to policy loans the minister proposes that proceeds of a policy loan be treated as a benefit paid under the policy. Here again, it seems to be a very strange proposal to make. It is an irrational and unacceptable proposal which deprives individuals of the opportunity to meet emergencies.

Perhaps the government would rather force those with modest incomes to fall into the arms of loan sharks. That is what it is doing when it closes the door to the possibility of loans from insurance companies. That door has traditionally been open to policyholders in times of need. The proposal that interest be taxable in the event a loan is obtained, but if the policy is used as collateral for a bank loan it is deductible, is another proposal which is completely irrational. I suggest that the whole package as it relates to taxation on life insurance benefits should be scrapped because those affected are the ones most in need of assistance at the most trying times of their lives.

Commenting on this particular proposal regarding taxation, one individual raised a question as to whether it is the intention of the government to tax widows and orphans to the point of further dependence on our social welfare system. This is something which should be considered. People will have to live and get by somehow, and by imposing this tax individuals might be forced to the point of having to go on to welfare because the government is taxing away that which has been provided by breadwinners for those who survive.

One lady placed herself in the potential position of being a widow in society, and she said she could not understand how a government could even propose such a tax with any semblance of a clear conscience. Whether it is conceivable or not, that is what the government is doing, and we certainly hope the minister will consider the situation and accede to some of the recommendations which are being made in this respect.

● (1512)

There is another objective, as the minister pointed out when introducing these amendments, and that is to expand the government's borrowing authority by approximately another $10 billion. This is a suggestion that will cause tremendous protest across the country. At a time when the economy is in a most precarious situation, at a time when Canada is facing problems of catastrophic proportions, at a time when the economy is in the doldrums, the minister requests that the government's borrowing power be expanded by another $10 billion.

An article in the Vancouver Sun on November 8, by Dave Smith, entitled "Economy Labelled 'Ottawa Priority'" had this to say:

> Marc Lalonde, the federal cabinet minister responsible for federal-provincial relations, said Monday that Ottawa's first priority for attention is the economy, not Quebec.
> Lalonde said the economic outlook was fairly gloomy, but he said that the government would not try to "spend our way out" of the current situation.

Two amazing thoughts are represented here. It is a change in viewpoint of the minister, and certainly of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when they finally get around to acknowledging that the major problem in Canada is the economy. Maybe there is hope now that something will be done but, as my colleague says, it will remain a problem as long as the Grits are in office. I think that should be a real incentive for people to make a change next time around, and I believe that they will.

What amazes me is that the minister said they will not try to spend their way out of the mess, and yet they ask for additional borrowing power. What is the government doing? If we look at the figures, there is a tremendous increase in the budget. Over the last ten years federal government spending has quadrupled. It took about 100 years for the government to reach a budget level of approximately $10 billion in 1967, a figure doubled in the following three years, and doubled again in the next four years to a total of $42 billion last year. The present estimate is about $46 billion. If the government has not been trying to spend its way out, what has it been doing, and what is it doing with all that money?

The national debt stands at over $40 billion, I believe, requiring finance charges of over $5 billion, and yet the minister said they are not trying to spend their way out of this serious predicament. The deficits are estimated at over $9 billion in this one year, and now the demand comes for expanded borrowing authority. I do not know just how much the country can stand, Mr. Speaker.

In a speech in Victoria on June 2, 1977, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said:

> The federal government's borrowing requirements have now become one of the major forces in driving other domestic borrowers to foreign capital markets—and this drives up our total foreign indebtedness as a nation. Canada now has the dubious distinction of being the world's largest borrower of international capital. Servicing that foreign debt now costs us more than two billion dollars a year—more than $300 for each Canadian taxpayer—and more than one per cent of the Gross National Product. Should our foreign debt servicing requirements reach two per cent of the Gross National Product, we could well be beyond the point of no return—where foreign debt servicing alone would become a chronic and debilitating drain on our international payments.

One of the provisions in this bill covers a request for borrowing authority to an additional $10 billion, and this in spite of high unemployment, Mr. Speaker, which we have to recognize as a very real fact. Some people say it is not as bad as it looks, but it certainly looks bad. Figures from the Maritimes demonstrate that and in British Columbia it was 8.5 per cent for October compared to 7.3 per cent a month ago. Indeed in British Columbia it has rarely fallen below 9 per cent in the nine years the Prime Minister has held power. Unemployment rose from 98,000 last month to 99,000 this month, and for those under age 25 it is 14.8 per cent.

I have received many letters from young people endeavouring to find jobs, and from older people, some professionals, endeavouring to find remunerative and gainful employment in order to make their contribution to society as well as providing for their own needs. Yet month after month, year after year, there is an ever increasing rate of unemployment across the nation. There are also regional disparities that have been brought to our attention.

I should like to deal now with one of the problems facing businessmen in British Columbia and in the Fraser Valley. Many processing industries will close very soon if something is not done to bring a measure of justice and compensation to them. I know it is desirable that industries in certain parts of the country should receive assistance in establishing operations, and I am not complaining about that. We find these industries under-selling in the markets that people in my province have been serving for years, however, and this is a major problem.

Because of the lower rates of labour in some parts of Canada, because of the completely unjust and inequitable freight rates, and because of other situations that exist, businesses in my area are going to be forced to close their doors.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that is not fair; it is unjust and it is not desirable because if there are those who are going to be able to produce and transport their products at a lower price than the cost of production in my area, then there must be some government intervention and compensation to assist the companies in my area to survive.

I am not complaining about those that have received assistance to meet needs elsewhere, but I am complaining about the fact that there is no compensation for those in my area that will have to bear the brunt and perhaps close their doors, lay-off their workers, and do goodness knows what else. I suggest that the minister, in considering all these situations, give consideration on the basis of justice to the matters which I have brought to their attention. This is not only true in the agricultural industries, it is true in other industries as well. I brought this to the attention of the government on a previous occasion.

When other secondary industries are finding it impossible to compete in the markets, on the prairies and central Canada, because of the unfair transportation rates existing at the present time, even though the government has said time and time again that it is going to do something about it, it has not done so, and the injustice continues to exist.

We have the continuing high interest rates; we have the shrinking dollar. What amazes me in the face of all these problems confronting the Canadian people is the increasing burden of taxation, national debt and interest charges, and all the rest. The government is going merrily on its way spending more and more of the taxpayer's dollars. I am not going to say it is all wasted or squandered, I am going to say this, however, that a great deal of it is unwise, unnecessary, and it is high time this government and the Minister of Finance came to their senses and looked realistically at the problems confronting the nation. If they do not do this, we will face greater and greater problems in the future than we have up to the present time, and everybody knows that they are bad enough now. According to the spokesman of the government party we can expect them to get worse as the days come and go.

The ministers state—they continue to throw it across the House—that the opposition are not making any suggestions as to what can be done and how to solve the basic problems. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that if they had been listening to the speeches made by my leader, and by my colleagues through these past months, there is plenty of grist there to keep their mills going a long time. If these suggestions and recommendations were adopted and if implemented, they would find a great many of the problems would be solved.

In order to assist in the building up of the economy in the production of jobs, we have suggested that there should be, as I pointed out before, a substantial cut in the federal sales tax on certain products. Sometimes the people of the country do not realize just how much is being charged in the form of taxes. They look at a product and they say, "Surely it doesn't cost that much to produce this thing", not realizing the high rate of tax which is applied on that product. Not only that, but on the various levels—below the manufacturer's level there are others that add a tax, so there is tax upon tax upon tax until a great deal of the dollar is spent not on the product, but in tax paid on the product. Therefore, we suggest there should be a substantial cut in the federal sales tax on certain products. This would assist in the development of our economy, and produce job opportunities for our people.

Another proposal was that there should be restraint in the growth of the government and in government expenditures. I do not have to go back over what I have said before, it has been said so many times in the House now. The government has said that it is going to maintain strict restraints in the carrying out of its functions and in the spending of the taxpayer's money. But the people of Canada are looking in vain for any indication that the government is exercising any restraint in any respect as far as government expenditures are concerned. No matter how much is said about it, no matter how much or how loudly it is trumpeted by the spokesman of the government that they are exercising restraint—by their fruits shall ye know them—and when we look at the records that are before us we cannot see where restraint is being carried out in any respect whatsoever.

There are many other suggestions that have been made. A government formed by the Progressive Conservative party would move in the direction of providing additional incentives to assist the small business community to grow, develop, and provide the services and goods required by the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please, I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the so-called budget that was introduced last spring leaves a great deal to be desired. Yesterday I raised a question in the House in respect of the possibility of there being a committee of the House meet with the negotiators who are going to discuss and advise in respect of what is possible and what is good for the agricultural industry, particularly as it relates to horticultural products. I sincerely hope we receive from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) a positive answer on that question. It is my understanding that it could be very beneficial, and that farming organizations and the Canadian Horticultural Council are quite prepared to exchange information, make recommendations, and to give strength to the negotiators who are going to try to improve the basic business climate in Canada, but particularly as it relates to the horticultural industry.

There were recommendations made to the Tariff Board which was asked in 1973 to study the requirements of the horticultural industry and its processed products, and report to the government. Yesterday part two of that report became available to those interested in agriculture. It reached my desk last night. Four years after the initial reference to the Tariff

Board, the rationalization of their recommendations, in a book of several hundred pages, ends up on a member's desk at the time the Canadian negotiators are supposed to have tabled their basis for negotiation at GATT. That is like this government in many ways. Once again it has closed the door after the horse has been stolen. Perhaps one might say it has closed the door in the face of a very important industry in this country.

There have already been representations made to government. There has been no publicity on these recommendations but they have been firm, meaningful, and based on the economic requirements of the agricultural industry.

This government has been very generous in its international trade negotiations as it dealt away agricultural security in Canada on behalf of who knows what. I guess I am being repetitive for the fifth year in a row in this House. I make no apology. There has been no acknowledgment of the significance of agriculture to our economy in this budget, in a mini-budget, in a real budget, or in any legislation that the government has introduced since I have had the privilege of sitting in this House.

Perhaps the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), or some other minister of government might be interested to note that a headline in a paper this week stated that agricultural implement purchases were down by $1 billion in 1976 and it is anticipated they will be down by more than that in 1977. That represents a lot of jobs to those in the industrial part of Canada.

This ought to ring a bell with some of those who have plants in their constituencies which produce agricultural machinery. However, it seems to fall on completely deaf ears. I mention that because it relates to the tremendous effect that the agricultural industry has upon the total economy of Canada.

I challenge the Minister of Finance, or any of his predecessors or successors, to deny the fact that as you follow the curve of Canadian prosperity in general, you may have a six months lag or six months lead time, but it is basically parallel to the agricultural income that our farmers enjoy.

When our farmers have a declining income, our national economy declines. You can predict the one by the other. Any minister of finance who cannot recognize this when he is submitting a budget is doing a great disservice to the nation. Any minister of finance who allows negotiators to influence him on reductions in duty which one budget after another have introduced into this country, is really defeating himself as he introduces his budget. When will this consumer oriented government begin to protect consumers, workers, and farmers as a total society in this country, by concrete and constructive measures on behalf of all three, because they are a parallel in need and in trend?

Again let me say a billion dollars of agricultural implement expenditures represents a lot of work, a lot of income tax, a lot of revenue, and it contributes to society.

[Mr. McCain.]

I have not read this tariff report which reached my desk yesterday. I just did not have time to read hundreds of pages and intelligently report on it. However, from information provided to me before the report was on my desk, I can tell hon. members what is needed, in addition to what is recommended in that report.

The first thing the Government of Canada should do before negotiating, yielding, or giving anything further in the field of agriculture is examine the tariff walls of our GATT partners as they relate to agriculture and fish products.

The duties that are levied against products going from Canada to the United States are much higher than virtually all of the duties levied by Canada on agricultural products coming north from the United States. There is a number one comparison. If we want to put agricultural products into the European Economic Community, there has to be a famine of a particular product before we can reach their market. The form of the Economic Community strangled agricultural trade between the North American market, both the United States and Canada, and the European Economic Community, saving only those items which they could not produce for themselves or those items which may, in a particular year, be short in their markets, as were potatoes last year and as apples will be this year. I submit there will be some regulation made whereby in the case of a shortage of apples in the European Economic Community, North America can supply them with what they require in a year of scarcity, but only in terms of scarcity.

Let us examine something else. Again I am being repetitive because we are at the door of GATT negotiations. I mentioned these last spring when I spoke in this House. I mention them again. I hope the minister will take note.

Our partners in GATT have built-in protections for industries which are damaged. In the United States it is by legislation. Any tariff structure which may be established is protected by that, with a clause which disallows American negotiators to permit an influx of a product to damage that industry in the United States. That applies whether it be wool, potatoes, apples or any agricultural product, or virtually any other product produced in the United States.

We have not provided our negotiators or our country with a comfortable safeguard. We are protected only by Section 19 of our agreement with GATT. It states that if we do impose something, and we may impose additional duty on a particular product, we in turn must give concessions on another product. Therefore we rob Peter to pay Paul every time we close the door on a particular product which is hurting our industry in Canada.

As we go to GATT this year we could by all means give them the legislative strength so that our trading partners may understand we want and need and will take part of their production, but we do not want and will not take any of their production which is going to be detrimental to our agricultural structure.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: That means legislative protection to back up our negotiators before they leave our shores. If we are to consider agriculture as an important industry, and it is; if we are to consider the treatment which was extended to the textile industry, and I support that; if we consider the support that is being requested for the boot and shoe industry, and they should get some protection; and if we are prepared to protect tens of thousands of jobs in a particular sector of our economy by negotiations with other nations, we are morally compelled to recognize the need of the agricultural industry.

There are tens of thousands of families living on farms, tens of thousands of employees working on farms, and uncounted thousands of people producing the products they produce. We are not looking at the farmer alone. We are looking at the multiplier effect, the purchase of machinery, the processing of food, the transportation of food, the whole item which can contribute to our economy. That is what we are looking at.

Rural and city members have supported the protection of other industries. Agricultural insterests must be protected, and we beseech the city men to move this consumer-oriented group on Your Honour's right to recognize that there are other items besides textiles and boots and shoes which need protection. Those two industries may be in the constituencies of some of those who sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, but so are the farmers. I would support protection for those splinter industries which are in difficulties in this country. I point out again that the hearings which were held to inquire into these matters heard the presentations made to them and outlined the facts.

Consider, for example, the nature of the protection which is presently offered. Unfortunately Canada chose at one point in time to levy specific duties on agricultural products arriving in this country. They ranged from half a cent to 2 cents a pound representing, then, from 15 to 20 per cent ad valorem. At the time they were imposed, these duties provided an excellent level of protection. Our competitors, on the other hand, were wiser. They applied an ad valorem duty to products arriving on their market from Canada. The effect of this is that the amount of duty rises in proportion to the price of the product, and protection is increased accordingly. But what is the average effect today of a specific duty amounting to so many cents a pound? Some estimate that it is as low as .9 per cent. Others estimate that it averages as high as 3.5 per cent. Whatever the actual figure, when it is compared with the ad valorem duties imposed by our competitors it is virtually ineffectual, and it is becoming less and less effective every year as production costs increase.

It seems to me it is useless to make this speech, Mr. Speaker, because for five years I have been trying to deliver this message. For the last 20 years others have been trying unsuccessfully to get it across. I wish to quote in a general way the then minister of agriculture when he spoke to the Canadian Horticultural Council about six years ago. His statement was, in effect: the government of Canada has adopted a cheap food policy; you are not going to get help; you are not going to get protection; if it becomes too hot, get out of the kitchen. That was his closing phrase. Mr. Speaker, it has got too hot in too many instances. Take the example of tomatoes.

About the date that speech was made in 1971 Canada imported 41 million pounds of canned tomatoes—I am rounding off these figures. After that policy had been in effect for six years Canada was importing 96 million pounds of tomatoes. That represents a twofold increase of tomato importation over that period. Well, it got too hot in Canada and some of the producers got out. Our importation of tomato paste went up by six million pounds in the same period, and our importation of juice by two million pounds. Altogether, there was an increase of roughly 56 million pounds in tomato imports consequent upon the fact that this industry in Canada has been denuded of protection. Total imports did not double, but they still hurt.

Go back a little further, to 1962. You will find, Mr. Speaker, that total imports of tomato products amounted to 40 million pounds. In 1976 the total was 151 million pounds. That represents an increase of 375 per cent in tomato products imports during the period this cheap food policy has been in effect. That policy has continued under the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and it is regrettable that this should be the case.

Earlier on I read a large number of figures into the record, but I propose to read them again because we are reaching the gate of the GATT meetings and we must press for consideration and protection. At the present time we are paying altogether too much for tomato products because the level of production on the North American continent is down. Because the Canadian industry has been depressed due to unfair competition from other parts of the world, the number of growers producing tomatoes here has been declining almost on an annual basis.

What has science done to help the industry? In 1949 the average crop yield per acre was 5.84 tons. In 1969-70, the average yield was 17.54 tons. By the use of scientific methods now available to them, growers have trebled the yield per acre. They have been able to maintain part of the industry but they are capable of maintaining another 10,000-12,000 acres, which would mean another 7,000 to 12,000 jobs, and in their presentation have committed themselves to doing so at reasonable prices competitive with those of other major suppliers.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the result of the cheap food policy. I wish some of the hon. members opposite could understand that when Canada becomes dependent on foreign sources for its food requirements those same sources are going to take us for more than they should; they will take us for more than the Canadian farmer would get for producing the product at home, and it is being penny wise and pound foolish to open the door to the United States for strawberries, or to Taiwan for mushrooms, and so on. Agriculture has never asked that it should have the benefit of 100 per cent of the market. But it has asked that it be allowed to retain its historic position.

Agriculture has accounted for $1.3 billion in trade surpluses. It is, therefore, an industry worthy of protection, particularly in view of the fact that the manufacturing industry, as has been stated over and over in this debate, is in a $10 billion deficit position. Agriculture remains one of the few areas where by hard work, endurance and suffering we are able to trade with foreign nations which have a surplus. But the consumer has to pay more for tomatoes than he would have to pay had these tomatoes been Canadian.

● (1552)

Now, Sir, what kind of competition do we have? We need exactly the same type of law—and we need to negotiate successfully to get it—as the one I outlined as existing in the United States. If we do not get exactly the same thing, then we must negotiate without penalty for a position in which the Government of Canada can impose a surtax on imported products which are obviously being dumped, perhaps at a price below cost of production or the price obtained on the market of the country of origin. Perhaps this is done in search of hard currency, which is the basis for the price of many products which are arriving in Canada. A nation needs an element of hard currency.

The Canadian market will take mushrooms, tomatoes, peaches, to name a few products, so that you do not have to hit very hard in order to get by our duties. But having done that, there is no mechanism which can be put in place to protect the Canadian producer and his crop within the crop year in which the product is being imported, and that is the problem. Our mechanism is too slow. We have to contract with our GATT partners for a mechanism which can work immediately. The hon. member who represents the Kelowna district has told the House time and time again what happens to cherries, and the same thing happens to tomatoes, potatoes, and vegetables. It happens all across the board.

According to this recommendation, the potato industry will have a duty of 10 per cent on frozen products and 12 per cent on other processed products. These are considerably below the former levels and substantially below the levels the industry sought. There are some good things about it. For instance, the rate on potato starch is increased, and there is an outside possibility that this will be of assistance.

When the government was approached 10 years ago to give protection to the potato starch industry, potato starch plants were in operation in Canada. Although an increase in duty on potato starch might bring about capital investment, create jobs, and establish a potato starch industry in Canada, like many of the things the government has done, it is too late. The starch plants in eastern Canada are now closed because they were given no protection. There was no surtax, no emergent measure to protect the Canadian market from the flow of European starches as they arrived well below the cost of production in Canada, putting our potato starch plants out of business.

The Horticultural Council of Canada and the potato processors go on to say in their brief that these duties are far below their recommended tariffs for potato processed products. It is virtually impossible to get them into other countries. Our potato processing industry built branch plants and has sent its expertise around the world. Having developed one market after another, our Commonwealth and GATT partners found a vehicle to exclude our processed products from their markets. Consequently, our expertise and our jobs have stayed abroad where they are producing potato products around the world.

Let me now turn to frozen vegetables in general. The Canadian Horticultural Council, in discussing this question with agricultural officials, declared that the new classifications are logical, the specified rates basically acceptable, but again the nop rates are the lowest. They include peas, beans, corn, carrots and mixed vegetables. The rates are far below the level suggested by the agricultural industry to the Tariff Board.

I ask hon. members of the House to stop and think how many of them have peas, beans, corn, carrots or mixed vegetable growers in their constituencies. From coast to coast in Canada, Mr. Speaker, you find virtually every province has one of these industries which are being eroded by competition.

Another very significant duty is that which is levied on fruit juices. We do not have a lot of juice products produced in Canada, but we do have two major items of importance, apple juice and tomato juice. When a housewife goes into a store and finds grapefuit juice, orange juice or any other comparable juice cheaper than apple or tomato juice, it has been proven beyond question of doubt that juices shipped to our market at unreasonably low prices erode our own market for tomato and apple juice. I say the level of duty should be higher than that recommended by the Tariff Board, yet the rate is reduced to 12½ per cent. The Canadian Horticultural Council recommended that the rate should be 20 per cent. I think the committee I asked for in my question yesterday is very badly needed.

There is no change recommended in regard to vegetable sauces, so everything is fine there. The recommended rate on vegetable soups, etc., is 12½ per cent compared to the current rate of 17½ per cent. In other words, the Tariff Board is recommending a reduction.

I believe it is time to adjourn this debate, Mr. Speaker, so may I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills, private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There has been some consultation among members and there might be permission given to revert to private members' public bills for the purpose of discharging a number of private members' public bills which are the subject of pornography and obscenity, and sending the subject matter of such bills to committee. If there is consent, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That Bills C-206, C-207, C-241, C-318, C-325, C-348, C-399, C-400 and C-402 be discharged and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Paproski: That is so agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We also agree to this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that unanimous consent be sought the next time we talk about public bills, likely next Tuesday, when we shall probably be able to give our consent, but I cannot make any commitment today since I have not been consulted on this matter.

● (1602)

[English]

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might also raise a point in this connection. If the parliamentary secretary to the House leader intends to seek consent to move this bill on Tuesday I should point out that it is my understanding there is another bill on the same subject which unfortunately has not reached the printing stage. I regret that this information was just given me a few minutes ago, but I think I might draw that to the attention to of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid), so that probably this one might be bundled in with the others that may come forward on Tuesday as well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There has been no unanimous consent so I cannot put the motion.

Mr. Peters: There may not be on Tuesday either.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Before calling the order under private members' business I should remind hon. members that last Monday at the beginning of private members' hour, following a point of order that had been raised the previous week by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), I opened the door for a procedural debate to take place at this time or, what I had in mind, the next time the motion would be before us under private members' business, and it is at this time that I intended to invite hon. members' comments. However, I notice that the hon. member concerned, the hon. member for Vaudreuil, is not in the House, and with the House leader for the official opposition not being here at this time, I am wondering whether we should proceed with this important procedural debate which I think might have an implication in respect of the operation of private members' hour. I would invite the comment of hon. members representing the parties.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest it would be prudent and wise for the House to follow the course suggested by Your Honour and to put this off until the hon. member who raised it in the first instance, as well as some other hon. members who have an interest, are here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will agree to such a postponement, and I hope this time the unanimity will not be spoiled from the government side.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I agree to the postponement, but I want to give notice to the Chair that I intend to take part in this debate and that I would like it to take place when I am present.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is the difficulty, actually, because I know that the hon. parliamentary secretary is to be absent Monday and the following Monday, and next Friday the present incumbent in the chair will not be available at four o'clock. In any event, perhaps hon. members can agree on another time that would be appropriate and available during private members' business in order that we might raise this question in the presence of all interested participants. In any case, I am sure hon. members will leave it to the Chair to take the initiative on the matter.

This brings us to another problem which is more or less related to the point of order we were discussing, and that is the order of business for today. The Chair is at the disposal of hon. members.

Mr. Paproski: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there has been a disposition to allow all other motions to stand, and that we commence this afternoon with motion No. 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), concerning the advisability of amending section 88 of the Railway Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, without prejudicing our right to discuss the matter at some arranged time, we think we should proceed as has been planned for today.

Mr. Paproski: Perhaps I should add that all other motions should stand at the request of the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in that sense I support the motion moved by the opposition member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: To satisfy everyone and to protect the Chair, perhaps we could accept the suggestion of the government to let motions Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11 and 13 stand and ask for unanimous consent when we call motion No. 13 in the name of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), so that everyone will be protected. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

RAILWAY ACT

SUGGESTED REVERSION TO CROWN OF RAILWAY RIGHTS-OF-WAY

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending section 88 of the Railway Act to provide for the reversion to the Crown of railway rights-of-way, originally obtained as government subsidies, upon their ceasing to be used for railway purposes pursuant to sections 106, 119 or 254 of that Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of presenting my private members' motion, which states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending section 88 of the Railway Act to provide for the reversion to the Crown of railway rights-of-way, originally obtained as government subsidies, upon their ceasing to be used for railway purposes pursuant to sections 106, 119 or 254 of that Act.

I first became interested in railway abandonment when the CPR made an application some two years ago to the Canadian Transport Commission to abandon a large portion of what is known as the Kettle Valley Railway in my riding. This railway has for many years served as a second rail corridor across British Columbia. Its use has been abandoned for some years now. Rail traffic in British Columbia from east to west has been concentrated on what is known as the main line, and both the CPR and the CNR use a similar route for much of the traffic.

If one looks at a map of British Columbia and studies the very limited corridor being used today for rail traffic, he will quickly see it is very vulnerable in many aspects. This may be all right as long as we have the same road links in existence today. However, road use over the years will be dependent on the same type of energy used today, namely, fossil fuels. Rail lines can be reverted to the use of coal or electric energy that can be generated from other sources than fossil fuels.

I became more interested in rail line abandonment when I realized that at some time in the future, maybe not in my lifetime but certainly in the lifetime of my children and grandchildren, we could very well have to return to rail type transportation. I believe the corridors that have been used for railways are necessary for future transportation in Canada. I come to believe this even more when I look at what could happen in a city such as Penticton, B. C., if the railways are allowed to abandon their responsibilities and sell off the real estate in these corridors.

It is for these reasons I asked questions of the chairman of the Canadian Transportation Commission, Mr. Edgar Benson. The CTC, under Mr. Benson, decides whether rail lines should be abandoned. I asked what would happen to the rights-of-way when abandonment was allowed, during a meeting of the Committee on Transport and Communications, and his answer was as follows:

As I understand the situation, once we rule that a branch line or spur line can be abandoned, we have no control over the land per se, but the railway may deal with it as it may see fit. Sometimes when the railway makes application for abandonment, some one will have indicated to them that they would like to use the land for a specific use and the railway will undertake to make land available for that specific use.

I asked in addition why the Canadian Transportation Commission could not make it a condition that the land revert to the Crown on abandonment, and Mr. Benson's answer was as follows:

You would have to put that into the Railway Act so we would have the authority to do it.

I also questioned the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on this and received similar answers.

● (1612)

In order to pinpoint the situation, I decided to draw up a private member's bill, which I put on the order paper last session. I resubmitted it this session, and it stands on the order paper as Bill C-222. As well, I submitted the resolution we are debating today. It was listed as No. 13, and by some stroke of luck we are debating it now, ahead of so many others.

By another stroke of luck, the Hall Commission report was laid on the table. I was pleased to see that Mr. Justice Hall, in the Hall Commission report on grain handling and railways in western Canada, came to a similar conclusion as far as rail abandonment is concerned.

I should like to refer to pages 104 and 105 of the Hall Commission report, which reads as follows:

Upon abandonment, the roadbed, that part of the property abandoned, represented by land—vested in the provincial Crown for disposition as may be mutually agreed to between the relevant province and municipal authority, the CNR or CPR, whatever the case may be, have entitlement to recover and remove with one exception, such of the improvements to the property, rail, ties, other track material, ballast etc. as may in their judgment be warranted, culverts, the removal of which might alter established draining patterns or have adverse effects, would constitute the sole item of improvements to be left in place by the Prairie Rail Authority.

We anticipate some objection that the property disposition formula we have outlined involves some element of expropriation of railway property without compensation to the railway company. This cannot be a valid objection.

Under sections 106 and 259 of the Railway Act, the railways have a legal obligation to maintain service on all lines until abandonment approval is given. In the case of grain related branch lines, the railways ask to be relieved of these obligations taking the position which we do not agree that they are operating these uneconomic lines at a great loss, even when given the branch line subsidies to which we have referred.

In our view, the railways cannot have it both ways. They cannot secure relief from their financial burdens, as we propose and yet retain an undiluted title to the property "in toto", particularly where as we also propose many elements of value in the property ultimately to be abandoned are likely to be in the interim enhanced by some degree of rehabilitation involving new investment of funds.

We deem it, therefore, eminently just and equitable that in return for permanent relief from their legal obligation to continue a losing operation and of having to restore the abandoned right-of-way to its former condition, the privilege of being allowed to abandon should be made conditional upon giving up ownership of the land in the right-of-way. A substantial portion of this land is quite valueless in any event. There should be no crying over the return of rights-of-way to the Crown.

That is what the Hall Commission had to say about railway abandonment, and I agree with them 100 per cent.

There are five major reasons why abandoned railway right-of-way property should revert to the Crown, whether it be to the federal or provincial government: first, the selling of these rights-of-way would effectively close transportation corridors that may well be needed in future years; second, the Government of Canada has made monumental concessions to the railways in this country: land and tax benefits were freely given to the railways in return for cross-Canada transportation service, and now when these lines are abandoned the property should revert to the government as partial payment for those early concessions; third, through a CPR subsidy company, Marathon Realty, large sums of money are being made from the roughly one million acres of land still held which was originally granted by the federal government to the CPR; fourth, the Canadian Pacific Railway's original mandate was to provide transportation on an ongoing basis to all parts of Canada and that mandate is no longer followed; and fifth, through abandonment, the railway companies are making large financial gains selling property at the expense of the Canadian people.

In conclusion, I should like to point out once again that the Hall Commission report, compiled at the request of the Minister of Transport, supports my stand on rail abandonment. Railways are no longer only interested in transportation. For instance, the CPR is not merely a railroad company, but a huge conglomerate controlling a number of enterprises ranging from mining to air travel, from logging to pipelines. Also the company has investments in almost all major industries. One only has to look at the television ads to see this.

It is our responsibility to keep these transportation corridors open. It is a responsibility of the government to the people of Canada. We have to prepare the future for our children and grandchildren. I may never see the end of fossil fuels in my lifetime, but my children probably will. The importance of these transportation corridors will be evident then. We have to get ready for the future.

I appeal to the House to pass this resolution which I feel will correct an unfair situation caused by the attitudes taken by the railways on the abandonment of branch lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my compatriot from British Columbia, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), for introducing this motion, one which has concerned me for many years as a person who lives in the farthest western reaches of Canada.

As he said, the C.P. is no longer a railroad, which is the reason for its existence. In fact the railroad might simply be called a "front" for its exploitation of other interests in this country. The railroad is simply there to further CP's money-making, and I would go so far as to say greed. Like the hon. member, I know the reputation of the railway, specifically the Canadian Pacific, which has taken so much of what should be the property of Canadians. I would rather strongly say it is almost like Scrooge who would clobber Tiny Tim, even after the insight of Christmas future!

I support strongly this motion which could lead the government to amend section 88 of the Railway Act, causing the railway rights-of-way, originally obtained through subsidies, to revert to the Crown when they are no longer in use as a railway and for railway purposes. I would go further than the hon. member and suggest, when they use the lands actively for other purposes, that they also revert to the Crown. The crucial words in this objective are: when they are no longer used for railway purposes.

No doubt in the 1880's it was an undertaking of almost inconceivable magnitude to span this huge land. Even today, with all our technology on land, air, and even in the stratosphere for communication purposes, with jet travel and satellite communication, it is difficult to unite this complex, diverse, huge land mass. It is basic to our present economic health and well-being, and possibly is causing our sociological trauma that we have not as yet succeeded in spanning this land. We have not done it with railways, not with communications, not with air travel. In fact, we are in the midst of fearing a national rupture because we have failed to link this land.

Canada is the second largest country in the world, consisting of 3,851,891 square miles. Our country is almost 4,000 miles across and 3,000 miles from north to south. We know how difficult it is, with a population of only 22 million, to link our country. How much more difficult it must have been in the 1880's in this sparsely populated, harsh, huge, unexplored, and frightening land. There were no great machines and technology then with which to build a railroad, yet a great railroad was built. There was an agreement at that time which, I maintain, as implied in the motion of the hon. member opposite, the CPR failed to live up to. It was an agreement to serve this nation and to give something to this nation in perpetuity.

This motion suggests that following the abandonment of branch line operations after CTC authorization has been obtained, lands originally obtained as a result of government subsidies for the purpose of railway rights-of-way should revert to the Crown. This suggestion runs counter to the Railway Act, but I agree that the Act can be changed.

It is said that this is a very complex problem with which to deal, but dealing with it properly would enrich Canada and solve perhaps even the problem of inflation, which I will explain in a few moments.

I would like to go back to the CPR agreement. The CPR was to provide passenger service to this country in perpetuity. I happened to be on a CPR train on the very day the CPR acted to break this agreement. The service went plastic that day, the people who worked on that train said that the intention was to discourage passenger travel and that the railway would like to enter exclusively into the very lucrative field of freight traffic. We in the west know what freight means. It is very costly. We have always suffered from the discrimination of the railway system and inequitable freight rates.

That day on the train I saw the unilateral ending of the pact. The linen was taken off the tables, and the whole train turned cold. It was a very uncomfortable train, and everybody on that train knew that that was the beginning of the end, at the very time when railway travel could have solved our energy concerns and could have provided effective mass transit throughout this country.

Everyone knows the difficulties involved with that early construction, but the subsidy in the agreement was $25 million, a grant of 25 million acres of land, in alternate sections of 640 acres in a belt 24 miles deep on each side of the railroad. Even then they allowed for deficiencies in the fertile lands which were made up for with extra land. In British Columbia about 3 per cent of our land is said to be arable. B.C. is a rocky part of the country, yet here we gave away so much of that arable land—extra land if it was not arable—to the CPR.

By 1950 the CPR was big diversified business. It has become one of the big businesses to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred in his Christmas message of 1975 when he said that big business, big government, and big unions were destroying the free market system. These big entities control much of this country, and no government can control them. I suspect if we were ever to implement the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary we would find that we are not big enough—not as big as the CPR and all its subsidiaries to do a thing.

CPR has developed and exploited our natural resources. There are steamships, telecommunications and hotels. The CPR operates its track. It is into trucking, ships, airlines and piggy-back transportation. The CPR has modern fleets of container ships and pipelines. It is involved with leasing, hotels and real estate. With regard to real estate we in Vancouver know Marathon Realty very well. The CPR is involved with oil and gas, mining and forest products.

The point I really want to make has to do with land. Marathon Realty has exploited the land it received free to its own excessive profits. It is said that almost all of Vancouver was once or is owned by Marathon Realty. That was the free land the railway received from Canada. Today Marathon Realty is building condominiums where once there were golf courses and green spaces. Not one inch of that would Marathon return to the citizens of Vancouver or Canada or to the citizens of the other communities where Marathon now owns land. Marathon is without social conscience. It charged the full price to the city when the city wanted a little strip of green space out of Marathon's developments. This has happened throughout the city and throughout this country. For example, in one condominium development—which is on free land—Marathon charged $56,000 per unit, and I am sure land in Vancouver makes up half or almost half the cost of any real estate development. Within three or four months these units were selling at $83,000, a profit of $27,000. There had been no labour increases. There had been no real inflation in materials, in lumber, etc. yet the prices went up. These same units are said to sell for $110,000 to $132,000 now, only three years later, and not an inch of land has been given back to the community.

That is more than just abandonment. It is use of property for non-railway purposes. The CPR is a railway, and I hope the day will come when there is action to retrieve the land before it has all gone into real estate development. With the housing developments in the west and their charging of unnecessarily high prices—considering the free land—Marathon Realty contributed greatly to inflation in the city of Vancouver. When prices go up to that extent, it is a contributor to inflation.

Mr. Yewchuk: Have you lost your page?

Mrs. Holt: I do not read my speeches. Some of you do.

I want to close with one thought. I had to look for the thought because it is not my own. I have no trouble finding my own thoughts. It is more difficult to find other people's thoughts. Theodore Roosevelt once said that a man who has never gone to school may steal from a freight car—this is appropriate to a railway debate—but if he has a university education, he may steal the whole railroad. A big business like CP can steal the whole land.

This whole country rose up against the Prime Minister and said he was trying to destroy the free enterprise system when he warned in December, 1975, that big business, big unions, and big government were destroying the free market system. They should have said "go to it," because at that time we saw that big business, oil cartels, coffee cartels, Marathon Realty and CPR were manipulating our whole society. That great labour union leader Joe Morris was going to call a national strike to stop the country for a day for his own purposes. We saw that beyond this Chamber, small business was—and is—being controlled and manipulated through big government regulations. We saw all that, and instead of misleading the public on what the Prime Minister was saying, we should have fought together to have all that changed, and stopped the power of the "Bigs". This motion at that time would have been part of the important change which is essential to Canada.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the consent of the House to go back to a motion I proposed a few minutes ago. I believe I owe the parliamentary secretary an apology, because of all the people in the House he is the only one I forgot to consult.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from bringing back the motion that he tried to get unanimous consent on before, but I want to make sure that there is complete consultation and that no member has gone out of the House who would not approve it. I will ask whether there is unanimous consent for the hon. member to revert to his motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has asked permission to suspend the debate temporarily and revert to the consideration of private members' bills.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That Bills C-206, C-207, C-241, C-318, C-325, C-348, C-399, C-400 and C-402 be discharged, and the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on a point of information, I am advised that these bills do deal with the matter of pornography and I am quite in favour of having them referred to that committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we still agree with the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members can see, the negotiations have been speeded up and instead of waiting until Tuesday to discuss this important subject, we shall begin this evening.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will revert to consideration of notice of motion no. 13.

RAILWAY ACT

SUGGESTED REVERSION TO CROWN OF RAILWAY RIGHTS-OF-WAY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending section 88 of the Railway Act to provide for the reversion to the Crown of railway rights-of-way, originally obtained as government subsidies, upon their ceasing to be used for railway purposes pursuant to sections 106, 119 or 254 of that Act.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, this must be Friday fever. First we have a motion that everyone agrees to, except the parliamentary secretary to the House leader who does not know anything about it and therefore feels obliged to object. If he had talked to his boss or anybody else he might have been better informed, but I guess that has to be done publicly.

In this very special debate we have been treated to the socialistic idea that if a private company does not live up to its obligations we take our largesse away from it. This must be Barrett fever in British Columbia. I can tell those two hon members, whom I consider to be very right-wing members, that I have attended NDP conventions where you could not be assured that this kind of motion would pass without considerable discussion. It was enlightening to listen to the conversion that has taken place, and I hope it lasts for more than a Friday afternoon.

We are certainly very happy to agree to this motion and are of the opinion that it is worth while. We were not only surprised that the two members who have just spoken suggested that abandoned lines should revert to the Crown but that the last speaker went on to say that the Canadian Pacific Railway has abused its position. It was given a great deal of land across the country, and although that land may not have been too valuable at the time, it is now of immense value. That should be given some consideration in terms of its current performance in operating a railway. For both members to indicate that view gives me a great deal of confidence that something will be done about the railways.

I agree entirely with the member who said that when we gave the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific the right to huge tracts of land to be used for a transportation facility across this country to carry passengers and freight, we anticipated that is just what they would do. The mover of this motion indicated they have done it to a degree, but I believe they have done more than that. They have used that money to buy mines and airplanes, they have built airlines and hotels and all those things you see on television. They have husbanded the assets we provided very well, but they have done less well in serving the Canadian public.

As the previous speaker said, they have abused their privileges. Maybe we should not now have linen on the tables and flowers on the tables and silver in the railway dining cars. That custom grew up in the days of the steamers and passenger trains across the country. Perhaps she is right and those things should have gone. But they did not go as an economy measure, rather as a symbol of their decision to end the whole passenger service and the facility for which we had provided the assets.

Not long ago I made a presentation to the Canadian Transport Commission which was considering whether Canadian National should be allowed to drop its line from Toronto to North Bay. I wholeheartedly supported the proposition to drop the passenger service, and indeed I went further and supported the idea of dropping the line from Toronto to North Bay. The service has been so bad on that line that passengers have given up, but everyone looked askance at me because everyone knew that there had to be rail transportation from North Bay to Toronto. In applying to drop that service their idea was that the public would pick up the cost of the line, that people would say, "If you do not drop it we will pay all the operating losses and expenses." In effect that is what they wanted, and that is an abuse.

If the Kettle Valley Railway is going to be nationalized, and even if they take up the rails and drive cars along the rail bed, I think Mr. Herridge, who used to represent one of the Kootenay ridings, would be very surprised at his friends for advocating that. He did not get much support in the years he advocated it being nationalized and used for the common good.

I wholeheartedly support the argument because we gave the ground for these transportation corridors, and we have the right to take it back if it is not being used for the correct purpose. I would think there would be some in my party who would not go so far as to say we should take away the 640 acres on both sides of the line; some of my colleagues may own some of that for all I know. I am not just too sure what that would involve, so I am not sure that I would go quite that far. Maybe I am not as far to the left as some of my colleagues in other parties. I would certainly go so far as to say that where the facility is abandoned we should retain the corridor for which we gave them that grant.

It seems to me that it is very interesting that the railways got all the best corridors through the mountains. In fact they got the only way you could ride through with a horse even in the early days. They looked for the only way to get through the mountains and built a railroad on it. Since then we have tried to get over those mountains and, as my friends have said, we have had to fly over them, there is no other way through them. So if you are going to take the rail line out and eliminate the possibility of hauling passengers, at least let us drive our cars through on that right-of-way, and I wholly support this.

I would have to look at the ramifications. This is the kind of speech my Conservative colleagues usually make. They would have to look at all the ramifications of the nationalization of the Canadian Pacific in the light of accomplishing this particular purpose of retaining rights-of-way. I don't know whether in the end it would be wise to take away their steamboats, their airplanes, mines, factories, their connections with television and satellites in the sky and all the other things in which they are involved. But I am very pleased that the hon. member from the Kootenays, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) lived up to the traditions that have been long established in both of their ridings by socialist predecessors in wanting to nationalize the Canadian Pacific Railway. Even this small step will make the former members, one from Kootenay East and the other from Vancouver-Kingsway, very happy I am sure, and I hope we can support it for their sake as well as for those who remain.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on the motion before us, and to do it briefly. I think there is another aspect of it which ought to be brought forward. The purpose of the motion is to provide for the reversion to the Crown of railway rights-of-way which have been abandoned, if those rights of rights-of-way had been acquired in the first instance through a subsidy procedure for the building and operation of the railways.

It seems to me, following the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), that reversion to the Crown would not indeed ensure that those rights-of-way were retained as rights-of-way for possible future transportation corridors. I took that to be one of the purposes the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker) put forth. In fact they might well be disposed of, but there is no provision in this motion which would ensure that any proceeds from a disposal would go back into the operation of the railway. I think there are further refinements of this whole procedure which are worth pursuing.

I want to say to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary that I, too, support the basic principle involved in his motion. I think it is a very sound one. I would prefer to support his Bill C-222 which is coming up, possibly before we recess at Christmas, because in doing so we would get that bill over to committee and then we can look at all the ramifications that really arise. My friend from Timiskaming said he would like to look at the ramifications. He appropriated what he thought were the socialist inclinations of previous speakers, but he abandoned them very soon afterwards by going to a Conservative position. If he wants to maintain both positions it would be better to send the bill, coming soon, to the committee.

An hon. Member: Nationalize Bell at the same time.

Mr. O'Connell: I know the NDP want to nationalize Bell Canada, but I want to say to them they are exceptionally wrong in this particular case of Bell Canada—and not to divert from our bill in front of us—Mr. Speaker, the government to a very large extent accepts the principle in the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: I am not speaking for the government in an official sense, but I want to read what the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) has said recently which would lead me to the conclusion that the government supports the basic principle in a specific instance. We all know that the Hall Royal Commission on Grain Handling and Transportation reported in the middle of May this year, and it recommended a certain amount of abandonment of branch lines in the three prairie provinces. I looked at what the Minister of Transport said ten days later, and I am quoting from a commentary he made on May 27 of this year, at page 6:

Where any line is in fact abandoned, I want the roadbed property to revert automatically to the federal Crown.

There is our Minister of Transport supporting the principle, but in a specific instance of abandonments authorized by the Canadian Transport Commission.

He said, in addition,

The Government of Canada would then, after consultations with the provinces, offer that land to the provincial Crown involved, for ultimate disposition to a local municipality, or we would offer it for sale as soon as possible to adjacent farmland owners;

I think some of us would like to ensure that any proceeds would go back into the railway operation, if that is our ultimate purpose. I will repeat again what the minister said in August on the same point in responding to the brief of the three prairie transportation ministers. I quote from page 4 of a document dated August 15, 1977:

Abandoned Right-of-Way

Where any line is in fact abandoned, the roadbed property should revert automatically to the federal Crown. The Government of Canada would then, after consultation . . .

And so on. There twice is reiterated the position of the government in support of the bill.

It seems to me we would be more prudent to have the committee consider what the ramifications are. We have a way of doing it and I intend to support the bill that the hon. member is bringing forward, Bill C-222.

Here are some of the considerations that I think cannot be met in this House in the broad scope he has given to the motion. I know he is interested in the Kettle Valley line. It is a specific instance again, but supposing all of those properties revert to the Crown, what would be the burdens on the federal government in maintaining the properties in the meantime? Would it in fact wish to sell them off? Would any sales be consistent with long term planning in a municipality, or even a requirement that there be a federal/provincial agreement on long term transportation corridor needs? We don't know and can't know unless we have much more information.

What are the city properties worth in, say, downtown Toronto, if put into convention centres or hotels or non-railway uses what hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property would automatically revert to the Crown if we accept the motion? We ought to know in some detail the amounts of money involved here and if, in fact, the railways would lose the opportunity of sale of those properties, would they also lose the financial capacity to reinvest in rail networks?

● (1652)

The implications are serious enough that although we can say quite frankly to the hon. member that he has a good principle here, and I think the government is in basic agreement with it, as I have quoted from the minister, however, there is too much involved simply to support the motion. I will indeed support the bill when it arrives.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is rather heartening to hear the hon. member opposite speak as he did. As he pointed out, there are a multitude of interests involved in both the bill to which he referred and the motion presently before the House.

It is of interest to the Canadian public that the money which may be realized from what was in many instances granted land for the purpose of the construction of railroads should accrue to transportation. At the moment, it is being deflected by both our major railroads into rental property and sales, and any other venture that can take place, or it becomes a free piece of land for the construction of a very commercial venture without charge to that venture, whether it be an hotel, shopping market, or whatever else may be constructed.

The transportation interests of Canada are getting short-changed in a very major way with rentals, property sales and so on as a result of the other uses made of granted land, whether it be the New Brunswick Railway Company, CPR, CNR, the Kettle Valley or any other railroad.

All members on this side are very heartened to be assured of some support for the bill which will succeed this motion. I do not think it would really be bad at this moment if this motion were allowed to pass pending the outcome of the bill. I think it should be passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I want to add at least a few observations to the ideas contained in the motion before the House today. I myself introduced a private bill during the last session and again in this session concerning the use of abandoned railway lines. I think their use represents a huge potential, during the summer for bicycle paths, and during the winter for cross-country skiing or snowmobiles. In addition, their use could be very important for recreation, and we should not yet allow the railway companies to continue abandoning them without due concern for the public interest interest in the areas where those lines are located.

Something happened recently in the Eastern Townships where, I think thanks to the intervention of the provincial government, it may be possible that a line abandoned by the CP near Brome Lake will be used; on the other hand, I do not think the present situation should be allowed to last because we should probably allow some compensation for those lots. If they have little value, then we could grant the public a right of way which could mean a lot for the future of recreation. In any event, I think we should do the most sensible thing.

[English]

I do not want to take away from the time of another hon. member who has indicated he wishes to speak on this. Before sitting down, I want to state that the idea is an excellent one. The railroad should be obliged at least to offer to public bodies, provincial and municipal governments, these sites before taking steps to get rid of them and selling them piecemeal. A means should be provided whereby they can be protected for future public use and the recreational use of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that there are only a few minutes left because I would have many things to say about such an interesting subject. Knowing that a bill will be debated after the study of this motion is over, I have no scruples at all in using the remainder of the time allotted to me to express my point of view on this motion even if I have to watch for the time when that bill comes up for debate.

As for the motion before this House tonight, it aims at amending the Railways Act which may seem in itself a rather simple matter at first sight, but which is in fact so complex and full of implications that it would not be appropriate to pass this amendment. Theoretically, section 88 of the Railways Act gives the railway companies the right to dispose of lands which have been acquired as subsidies from the Crown in the manner they deem appropriate. According to this amendment, rights-of-way acquired by railway companies through subsidies would revert to the federal government. Although this proposal is undoubtedly well grounded, the identification of the subsidies and these lands obtained through these very subsidies is truly a complicated matter. The Hall Commission report recommends that following any abandonment of railways, all such tracts of land revert to provincial governments. However, this bill recommends that they be turned over to the federal government, a matter which upsets the provinces. In short, we are still studying the impact of the Hall Commission report, the concerns of the provinces and the consequences stemming from the transfer to the federal government of lands abandoned by the railways. Given the complex historical process of land acquisition by the railways, the concerns expressed by the provinces and the delays necessary to ensure a fair sharing of these lands, it does not seem appropriate to solve these problems through legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House would amend the Railways Act so that rights-of-way originally obtained through federal subsidies would revert to the Crown.

It is a complex and gigantic task to try to determine which rights-of-way were originally obtained through federal subsidies and the nature of railway construction at that time as well as the various forms of subsidies given to an unbelievable number of small railway companies, several of which have now disappeared, while others exist only on paper. To follow up this motion, one would have to—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion which I hope would have the unanimous support of all hon. members of the House. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That this House commend the President of Egypt and the Prime Minister of Israel for their courageous and positive initiative in beginning a direct dialogue toward the establishment of a peaceful relationship between their two countries and express its sincere hope that this initiative will be extended to achieve a just and lasting peace throughout the Middle East.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF URANIUM CARTEL AGREEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion relates to the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to the press on October 14, 1977 which purported to set the record straight on the sorry tale behind the government's uranium cartel. In view of the fact that the minister's press release made several highly contentious and completely unsupported statements, including an assertion that the operations of the cartel were not conducted in secret, and with the background now of Chief Justice Evans' recent decision with respect to this matter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That this press statement, which was given outside this House, be referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works and that the said committee be given a full mandate, adequate staff and resources to inquire fully and publicly into all matters concerning the uranium cartel.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMPENSATED DISCOUNT SYSTEM FOR CONSUMER PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since prices are increasing much faster than wages, thus reducing the small wage earners' purchasing power, and since the maintenance of anti-inflation controls only creates more imbalance among various classes of the Canadian society, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House consider as early as possible the opportunity to set up a compensated discount system of consumer prices mainly to lower consumer goods prices to the purchasing power level now available to consumers and, by the same token, stimulate the economy of the country as a whole.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

REASON L. J. BENNETT LEFT FORCE AND CIRCUMSTANCES OF HIS LEAVING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity pertaining to the RCMP Featherbed operation and matters related thereto. My motion is as follows:

That the Solicitor General advise the House of circumstances surrounding the RCMP career of Leslie James Bennett, formerly head of "E" Branch, "I" Directorate, Security and Intelligence, specifically why this man was pensioned early on condition he forthwith leave the country, whether or not he threatened to reveal contents of the Featherbed and Tachereau files in order to escape, and finally whether the Prime Minister gave an order that the Tachereau files remain indefinitely in the custody of Major Lemieux of the Privy Council office when they were about to become public information and were seized by the PCO-PMO instead.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

EDUCATION IN QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR DECLARATION UPHOLDING RIGHTS OF IMMIGRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the resolution of the Quebec Liberal party this weekend stating that access to English schools in Quebec should be restricted to Anglophones and in view of the fact that Mr. Michel Robert, chairman of the policy committee is reported to have said that it would not be realistic for Liberals to go back to free choice and that the motion reconciles the division between those in the party who want freedom of choice and those who want to limit enrolment in English schools, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges):

That this House calls on the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations to make a statement on motions at his earliest convenience guaranteeing to all new Canadians and immigrants that their rights under the constitution and the Bill of Rights will be upheld in all cases by the federal government.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REFUSAL OF MINISTER TO PAY SUBSIDY ON TRAWLER "CAPE SAMBRO" BUILT AT MARYSTOWN, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact the government of Newfoundland was encouraged by assurances from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) that federal subsidies totalling 35 per cent of the cost of the vessel Cape Sambro would be paid if that stern trawler was built at Marystown shipyard in the minister's district on spec in order to ensure continued employment at the yard and in view of the fact that the trawler was built at a cost of $4¼ million, but the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) refuses to pay the normal 22 per cent subsidy on the fishing vessels amounting to $935,000, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the House direct the Minister of Fisheries to pay the 22 per cent subsidy, approximately $935,000, to the Newfoundland government with reference to the building of the stern trawler Cape Sambro in accordance with the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that there is a moral obligation to take such action.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

URANIUM—REASON GOVERNMENT ACQUIESCED IN CARTEL ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In promoting the uranium cartel, the government has represented that cartel activities would not apply to the consumer markets of Canada, yet we now have clear evidence that this was not true. For example, the Gulf Minerals contract of 1974 with Ontario Hydro was described by Gulf to be in line with other cartel arrangements, and as such would yield a 50 per cent profit to Gulf on a $98 million contract. Will the minister indicate why his government acquiesced in this activity bearing in mind Gulf represents that their Ontario Hydro contract not only met cartel requirements but had "protection from government action".

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the real question in my mind is whether the hon. member is serving Canadian interests or whether he is acting as an agent of a foreign corporation that is contending with Canadian regulations. We are all aware that the issues which he has been promoting are the issues which Westinghouse of the United States have been promoting because they are looking for a defence for their own mistakes. The Canadian government adopted a system which was aimed at trying to prevent the extinction of the uranium industry in this country. The hon. member and some of his associates have made it very plain that they are not interested in that. We are, Mr. Speaker.

URANIUM—POSSIBILITY MINISTER REVIEWED GULF-ONTARIO HYDRO CONTRACT AS IT RELATED TO CARTEL ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who seems to be stoutly defending Gulf U.S. for reasons I am not sure of. My supplementary to the Minister is very simple. Has the hon. gentleman reviewed the Gulf-Ontario Hydro contract and has he determined whether it was not only meeting the cartel requirements but was, in fact, more highly priced than the cartel minimums?

● (1417)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have noted carefully the comments of Ontario Hydro with respect to the contracts they have entered into for the supply of uranium. I have not seen any complaint by Ontario Hydro, the consumer and buyer, that it was forced to purchase uranium at a higher price as a result of the so-called cartel arrangements, which exclude the Canadian market.

URANIUM—PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CARTEL ARRANGEMENT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My final supplementary to the minister is twofold, Mr. Speaker. The minister has just indicated that the cartel arrangements excluded the Canadian market. Would he go further and indicate whether he received any commitment from any Canadian producer that they would, in fact, exclude the Canadian market from cartel pricing? Second, if the minister is interested in hearing Ontario Hydro's position on this important matter, will he follow our request and make a reference to the appropriate standing committee of this House, at which time we can hear Ontario Hydro, Gulf Minerals and the minister concerning this entire sorry mess?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): If the hon. member would care to read the directives which were issued by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Atomic Energy Control Board he would see it was made very clear in every directive which was issued that the United States was excluded and that the domestic market was excluded.

ALLEGED ADVANCE KNOWLEDGE OF CARTEL ARRANGEMENT WHICH GAVE RISE TO INSIDER TRADING—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): My question is also directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and refers to reports that certain members of the investment community in Toronto were aware at least three months before the orders-in-council came down that the cartel was being formed. It is reported that there was a degree of insider trading taking place of shares of certain firms who were associated with the cartel. May I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to investigate these reports of insider trading?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to believe that these allegations are true, but if they are true I am sure the responsible agency, the Securities Exchange Commission, or other Ontario government or stock exchange institutions would be well placed to examine the kind of allegation the hon. member has made. I put it to him that if he feels as strongly as he appears to indicate by his question, he has a responsibility to draw these allegations to the attention of responsible exchange commission officials.

Mr. Gillies: On August 23, 1973, when the minister of the day stated:

> I have today issued a directive to the Atomic Energy Control Board covering such aspects as minimum selling prices and volumes of sales to export markets. Because of the nature of uranium export contracts it would not be in the public interest to disclose further contract details at this time.

Would the hon. gentleman tell the House how it was possible that details of these contracts got into the hands of investment analysts in the securities business in Toronto almost immediately? What was the leak in his organization which allowed such a thing to happen?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member is asking me to speculate on the sources of information of some analysts. I do not have the source of that information, but perhaps the hon. member does have some information. If he has any information which he would like to give to me I would like him to do so.

● (1422)

Mr. Gillies: I might say to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that people on this side of the House are sick and tired, every time an issue is raised which affects very seriously and deeply the integrity of the operations of the government of Canada—and we have heard about this for weeks now—to be told by the government: "Why don't you look into it?" I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether he had asked the Attorney General of Canada to make inquiries whether or not there were leaks from his office of information that allowed insider trading which apparently took place. It is very much his responsibility to make that inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, members of the House have been all too aware recently of allegations coming from the other side of the House, allegations which have been unsubstantiated. I think the time has come for members of the Conservative party, if they have allegations to make, to make them to the responsible institutions which can deal with them, and to back them up.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS TO OBTAIN MORE BENEFITS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the very positive Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: You fellows opposite are right on cue. The minister said on television last night that Canadians are tired of watching news reports every night informing them of the bad consequences of his government's misgoverning, and in that regard I agree with the minister. Does the minister have some specific good news about the automotive industry for next year, in light of the fact that we have had a net loss of some 15,000 jobs in that industry as a result of the mismanagement of the Canada-United States automotive agreement? Can the minister tell us about new commitments for new jobs next year?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly glad that question has been asked, because as I look at the facts I find that the automotive industry has enjoyed its fourth consecutive year of growth of profits and success in Canada. We are holding talks with the industry regarding development of additional capability in manufacturing parts in Canada. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the House that those talks look to me as if they will be very productive.

Mr. Broadbent: That is precisely my point, Mr. Speaker. The minister referred to profits, and as he probably knows, the profit margins of the "big three" in Canada are such that two are more than twice as high as their profits in the United States, and the third is not quite twice as high in Canada as in the United States, although in the United States much more proportionately is being put into new investment.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member and all hon. members of the House that the government takes no evil view at all of profits; we believe they are necessary. I want to assure the hon. member that my department is aware—

Mr. Andre: You don't expect us to believe that.

Mr. Horner: I do not believe the hon. member for Calgary Centre, either. I believe in profits, and I believe the argument that the automotive industry has had four good consecutive years in Canada, profitwise and otherwise, as I have said. We are using this to encourage them to expand their parts industry in this country and we believe that our talks will be successful. That is all I can say.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that four ministers of industry, trade and commerce in a row have said that, and considering that we have had a net loss, I repeat, of 15,000 jobs in the last half dozen years under the pact and that the president of the Ford Motor Company about 10 days ago denied what the minister has said, namely that the Ford Motor Company had committed itself to expanding next year, is the minister in any position to give us a specific commitment, short of the general verbiage which he has just repeated this afternoon?

● (1427)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it abundantly clear to the hon. member that I do not accept, for one minute, his figure that we have lost 15,000 jobs.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not expect you to.

Mr. Horner: Thank you. I am glad we can agree on something—not to accept your figures. We are agreeing on that. At least we are agreeing on one thing, that we do not accept your figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The other point is: jobs will be created, and we will expand parts manufacturing within this country.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Horner: I am quite hopeful with regard to our talks.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAD DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC ON APPLICATION OF PROGRAM TO SCHOOL TAX INCREASES

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Given the fact that several regions in the province of Quebec have been advised lately that school taxes will be increased by more than 75 per cent, would the Prime Minister tell the House whether or not discussions have been held about that with the province of Quebec in relation with the Anti-Inflation Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if any discussions have been held lately on that but the hon. member should know that the province of Quebec, that is its present government, has decided to abolish the Anti-Inflation Act as it applies to the private sector which is under its control. So, as far as salaries in the public sector are concerned, including municipal employees, Mr. Speaker, one has to look to the present government which has lifted the controls and allowed that result.

FINANCE

SUGGESTION GOVERNMENT GRANT MUNICIPALITIES INTEREST FREE LOANS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that school boards and municipal authorities have to go on the money markets to borrow money at prohibitive interest rates in order to administer their budget, as it is also the case for provincial governments, is the Prime Minister prepared to advise his Minister of Finance to allow interest free loans to public bodies to ensure adequate management and to save the money of Canadian taxpayers, as it is done through the Islamic Bank to all the countries which are under the jurisdiction of this bank. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to do the same here in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we would be prepared to consider this kind of interest-free loan to school boards as soon as the leader of the Social Credit can find enough citizens willing to provide loans without interest to the government, for example through saving bonds, without claiming the interest. This would give us a good fund and we would be quite prepared to re-lend without interest. So we are waiting for the leader of the Social Credit to take action.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is telling us how to proceed, I am ready to give a lecture if he is willing to attend. When would he be free to attend a lecture on Social Credit to understand at last that Canadians need interest-free loans as is done in other countries.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for a lecture. I said that when the government is issuing saving bonds, as it has just done, it is borrowing from the citizens at a rate of about 8½ per cent. If the hon. member could find us a number of purchasers who would be prepared to make interest-free loans, we would lend those funds to municipalities. I am not asking for a lecture but merely a list of individuals ready to make interest-free loans.

ENERGY

URANIUM—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADOPT TWO-PRICE SYSTEM OR MARKETING BOARD

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of repeated statements that the government was concerned with Canadian consumers and with keeping down the domestic cost of uranium, will the minister tell the House why the government did not go to the legal two price system for uranium, as was done with Canadian wheat? Will he tell the House why the government did not bring in an uranium marketing board with specific provisions to safeguard Canadian consumers and industries?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will take a look at the record, he will realize that Canada took a number of actions. The first action was to make very strong representations to the United States when they imposed an embargo on Canadian uranium sold to that market which represented 70 per cent of world markets at that time. There is a whole series of Canadian positions which are on the record with respect to U.S. action.

• (1432)

The second action we took in Canada was to try to persuade the consuming countries of the world that it would be in their interest to join with the producers, and it was the producer-consumer arrangement which would attempt to stabilize the supply and demand price of this country, in much the same way perhaps as the international tin council is an association agreement of producer and consumer countries. We were not successful although we tried right up to the very last moment with a major initiative by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the United Nations in New York.

As a result, we formed an agreement with the other producing nations, Australia, France, South Africa and ourselves, aimed at stabilizing the market. I believe that this arrangement was successful for the first year perhaps, or even the first year and a half of its existence, but with the OPEC price increase of 1973 and energy values generally escalating out of all proportion to previous experience, the real need for that arrangement ceased to exist. That is the record, Mr. Speaker, and those are the reasons Canada moved into this particular arrangement because the major market on which the Canadian industry has relied, the U.S. market, was closed as a result of an arbitrary decision by the United States.

Mr. Gillies: Not true.

URANIUM—REASON FOR FAILURE TO SUPPLY ONTARIO HYDRO WITH CHEAPER STOCKPILED MATERIAL

Mr. Ron Huntington (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer, although it hardly answers the two questions he was asked on the legal approach that the government might have taken. I will ask him this: As shipments will be made from the Canadian government's stockpile of uranium concentrates to Spanish electric utilities in 1978, will the minister tell the House why the Government of Canada has not offered to sell Ontario provincial utilities, uranium concentrates purchased at $4.75 to $6 a pound with Canadian taxpayers' dollars, I might add, rather than leaving them exposed to world prices? To be more precise, why should Ontario Hydro pay world cartel prices for uranium mined in Ontario when foreign utilities are provided from a government stockpile program undertaken with Canadian taxpayers' dollars?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I have always made it very clear that the so-called cartel arrangement excluded in every way the relationships between the producers and consumers of Canada. The Canadian government's position from the very start was that the consumer utilities of this country should make their own arrangements with Canadian producers, and that was the basic policy.

As to the second aspect of the policy, that is to say the stockpile to which the hon. member alluded, that stockpile, I believe, was a very important safety measure for Canada to ensure that at all times there will be adequate back-up supplies for Canadian consumer utilities, given the interest in our export markets. As the hon. member knows, we have a policy which secures Canadian consumers on the basis of 30 years, but additionally we have the back-up of the stockpile.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

EFFECT OF COURT DECISION ON URANIUM CARTEL REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice with respect to that matter. It arises out of the decision of Mr. Justice Evans which effectively precludes people in the industry, people with knowledge and others, from disclosing to any investigation carried out under the Combines Investigation Act facts rather than allegations of what the facts may be. Has the Minister of Justice considered the effect of this provision and will he tell the House what he intends to do to rectify the situation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): We are considering the matter, but I am not in a position today to reach a conclusion on that. Obviously, it would be very difficult if impediments were put in the way of the director of investigation and research.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Would the Minister of Justice consider very quickly changing once again the gag order that has been placed on this matter as the time for an appeal with respect to the action in which the Minister of Justice must have a great interest, particularly because of the attitude of full disclosure, brought by six people in the Supreme Court of Ontario is running out this week, would the minister let this House know whether or not it is his intention, as chief law officer of the Crown, to use as one primary vehicle an appeal of the judgment which clearly renders toothless and useless the combines investigation which the minister is setting up with respect to this matter?

[Mr. Huntington.]

Mr. Basford: I think that the remark of the House leader of the opposition carries the judgment far beyond its intent and I would not want to adopt that language at all.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Let us look at the judgment to refresh the minister's mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There may be an argument at other times. I will permit the hon. member a supplementary question now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I have a simple supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister of Justice intend to appeal the ruling of Mr. Justice Evans with respect to the right of the people inside and outside the industry and people with direct knowledge of what happened within the cartel to give evidence and come clean before the combines investigation which the government has set up? Will he appeal that order?

Mr. Basford: I want to ensure that the director is not under any impediment.

ENERGY

URANIUM CARTEL—AVAILABILITY OF FILES TO COMBINES INVESTIGATORS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the necessity of ensuring that there will be absolutely no impediments put on the director of combines in his investigation, may I ask the minister what steps he has taken to ensure that there are no impediments. Is he, has he, or will he make it possible for the director of combines to produce documents which he has in his possession, and will he also ensure and direct that all pertinent and relevant files within his department are opened to the Combines Investigation Branch?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): We made it very clear that all the files and all the information we have are fully available to the director of investigation and research.

COMBINES

URANIUM CARTEL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF FULL INVESTIGATION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): My question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the potential conflict of interest that seems to be arising here, since one of the parties under investigation by the Combines Investigation Branch is in fact the government itself, and since the director of the Combines Investigation Branch answers to the government, what steps is the minister taking to ensure that the Combines Investigation Branch will have a full, complete and unimpeded investigation of this whole affair? In that regard, can the minister assure the House that all documents and all files relating to the unfortunate affair, with its potential for a consumer rip-off with the government being party to that unfortunate situation, will be made available and that there will be a complete and unimpeded investigation of this whole sorry affair?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): If the hon. member had read the Combines Investigation Act he would know that the director of investigation and research has a full and independent status given to him by statute and can be in no way impeded by the government or by the minister. He has all the tools necessary to do a complete job.

INDUSTRY

MANUFACTURING—MEASURES TO IMPROVE SITUATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Prime Minister. As manufactured products are the ones that produce jobs and as the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has just forecast that this year Canada will have an adverse trade balance, a deficit of $11.5 billion in manufactured goods, up 15 per cent from the record $10 billion deficit of a year ago, will the Prime Minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what specific new initiatives the government intends to introduce in the very near future to change this very serious and steadily deteriorating situation which is so adversely affecting Canadian employment?

● (1442)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, those figures contradict information I have. I wonder if the hon. member has garbled them a bit.

Mr. Hees: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. I received those figures from the President of the Canadian Manufacturer's Association at a luncheon here last Thursday.

Mr. Trudeau: That proves my point.

Mr. Hees: I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the very vague and completely unsatisfactory non-answer of the Prime Minister, I wonder if he would consider this: When he is answering these very serious questions about matters important to this country would he use facts instead of so much of the commodity of which he is amply supplied on the cattle ranch of his Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

ENERGY

OPPORTUNITY FOR SMALL BUSINESSES TO PARTICIPATE IN PROGRAMS ON RENEWABLE FORMS OF ENERGY

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources regarding solar and other renewable forms of energy. It is my understanding that the programs accepted by government are those from large institutions and those that have been assigned. I wonder if the minister has any intention of opening up the program for those forms of energy to small businesses, small organizations and individuals who might have a superior proposal?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the thrust of the program, is to make available to industry and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—and my colleague I am sure would be pleased to provide additional information on this—information on the opportunity posed by the challenge of solar energy to bring into being very much more activity in the private sector and small business in particular. Some consumers have complained that we have left the tariff on solar equipment and components, and have argued that if we were to take it off we would be able to get lower costs on solar energy for Canadians. That may be true, but it would also of course have the effect of discouraging the kind of indigenous enterprise we are trying to provide around this new kind of technology.

INDUSTRY

ELECTRONICS—MEASURES TO PROTECT CANADIAN MANUFACTURERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the Canadian electronics industry which is in dire straits. Since 1965 the electronics industry in this country has grown by some $2.8 billion. Of this amount only $1.1 billion has gone to domestic producers, or only 38 per cent, while 1.7 billion or 62 per cent has gone to foreign importers, the result being that in the last three years the number of persons employed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member would put his question without further preamble.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —the number of persons employed has dropped by 17,000. I should like to ask the minister if he has looked into this situation and if he can tell the House what the causes are, what steps the government is taking to see that Canadian manufacturers of electronic products get their fair share of the Canadian market?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my officials and I have met with representatives of the electronic industry. We are very much aware of their concern for future growth within their ability to meet the Canadian market and world markets. We will bear that in mind in the MTN agreement negotiations and do everything we can to facilitate growth of this industry in Canada. We recognize it is a high technology employer and therefore very important to the high technology within our country.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. I notice that Mr. Terry Matthews, executive vice-president of Mitel Corporation has pointed out that this year according to Statistics Canada, of a domestic market of some $3 billion, imports are taking $2.2 billion, whereas Canadian exports are only about $600 million. This represents a very serious threat to the jobs of many thousands of Canadians. Surely the minister can give us some more satisfactory answer than that. The government has taken steps with other industries to effect some type of quota system or method of protecting Canadian producers and Canadian jobs. What steps does he intend to take to protect the Canadian market for Canadians?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, first of all we recognize the industry of which we are speaking is a highly technical industry and vastly changing. The technological advances made in the electronics industry in recent years make it very, very difficult to apply any degree of set permits or import permits to our country because of the continual change taking place within the electronics industry. For that reason we have been reluctant to consider that approach. As I said earlier, however, we will do everything we can to allow the industry within Canada to meet export capabilities and to serve the Canadian market to a greater degree.

PULP AND PAPER—EFFECT ON CANADIAN INDUSTRY OF LOANS TO FOREIGN COUNTRIES TO ESTABLISH PLANTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the pulp and paper industry is suffering from lack of markets, I wonder if the minister would advise the House why the Export Development Corporation, which falls within his responsibility, is making loans to European countries which are taking away the markets of Canadians and causing serious loss of jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the difficulties in the world market of the pulp and paper industry. I should like to say that the Export Development Corporation has made a loan for development of a pulp and paper industry in Poland. In making that loan they do not believe the Polish industry would serve any of the markets our industry is now serving. We also believe that a loan made to them for procurement of pulp and paper machinery in this country would create jobs which are needed in our manufacturing sector.

[Mr. Horner.]

LINERBOARD MILL IN NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO AVOID LOSS OF JOBS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Dealing with the province of Newfoundland in particular where the pulp and paper industry and the linerboard industry are basic to the province and which are being seriously hurt, has the minister consulted with the provincial government of Newfoundland with respect to the difficulties of the Labrador linerboard mill where 2,100 jobs were lost. Would the minister follow that up?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the linerboard mill in Newfoundland I would not like to reflect on any dereliction of duty on behalf of the government of Newfoundland but I believe they did discuss this with my predecessor and members from Newfoundland. It was only after lengthy Cabinet discussions in Ottawa that they believed no additional help could be made to keep that linerboard mill open.

NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE—USE OF CANADIAN PIPE IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister regarding what I call that great sellout by this government in terms of the northern pipeline and the evasive answers given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and others. Given the fact that Dr. Stuart Smith, Leader of the Opposition in the province of Ontario, has indicated by way of a letter to the Prime Minister that he is very, very concerned about this matter and that there should be guarantees in the agreement, and given the fact that there are no guarantees, could the Prime Minister advise Dr. Stuart Smith, this House and the people of Canada, what his reply will be to Dr. Stuart Smith who has registered the same kind of concern that we have in face of the apathy of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret, I have not seen Dr. Stuart Smith's letter yet but I can assure him I believe the matter is a very important one and I shall pay every attention to his representations. I must say it is typical of the Conservative party to describe as a sellout a negotiation between Canada and the United States, very ably conducted by ministers on this side which has meant some 100,000 man-years of work for Canada and some $4 billion to be spent in Canada. If that is a sellout we would like to see what the hon. member for Hamilton West would do.

INDUSTRY

STEEL—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADIAN PIPE USED IN CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN GAS PIPELINE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I want to thank the Prime Minister for that unwanted lecture. I know all about the $4 billion, I know all about the 400,000 man-years of work and all about the one million tons of steel. Let me go to the other minister who knows something about this matter, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I resent the evasive answers that this minister has given and the one the Prime Minister just gave.

● (1452)

Is the minister aware of the fact that there is a substantial lobby now in place not only by steel producers but also by unions, enhanced by Senators Jackson, Stevens and Durkin, who do not want any preferential treatment going toward Canada? If he is not aware of it, would he kindly get on the ball and go to his counterparts in the United States and advise them of the concern which has been registered around here and ascertain from them just how he is going to assure and guarantee Canadian content? Is the minister aware of that concern, and before he brings in legislation, which is almost on the books, will he see his American counterparts and follow the suggestions I just made?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the concern of Senators Jackson and Stevens and others in the United States with regard to having as much work done in the United States as possible and to receiving gas as cheaply as possible.

However, let me explain just briefly the basic criteria which is now to be decided. First, there is the matter of pressure. The Americans want to build a pipeline with a pressure of something over 1,600 pounds. We say there is no pipeline yet built in the world with that amount of pressure. We want to build the pipeline with a pressure of less than 1,200 pounds. That pressure determines the thickness of the wall of the pipe. That decision is for Canadians to make, not Americans, so hon. members can readily see that we are in the driver's seat with regard to the size of the pipe, whether it be 48 inches, 52 inches or 54 inches, and with regard to the thickness of the wall. If we make the right decision in that regard—and I have no hesitation in saying that I am fully confident that we will—then we will make available to Canadian suppliers the opportunity to produce the total length of the pipe.

When we make that opportunity of producing something in the neighbourhood of 3,000 miles of pipe available to Canadian suppliers, we ask them to be competitive because we do not believe we entered into an agreement with the United States so that we could force them to pay for a pipeline built in a non-competitive environment and because in the end American consumers are going to have to pay for the building of the pipeline. It would be foolish of us to think that their government would enter into an agreement with us which would allow us to build a pipeline in an environment which is not competitive.

So I assure the hon. member that Canadians will get every possible opportunity to supply the components for that pipeline. Of course, we are asking Canadian suppliers to remain as competitive as possible to meet the challenge.

Mr. Alexander: That answer means absolutely nothing to me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: All the minister has said is that he is going to give an opportunity,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: I was just going to get to the question.

Mr. Speaker: Rather than express an opinion I wonder if the hon. member would put his supplementary question.

Mr. Alexander: In that I have expressed my opinion, regardless of the possibility of bidding, all I want to know is what the minister is going to do to guarantee Canadian content. That is the basis of that agreement, and I want to know whether the minister is going to go to the United States and advise his American counterparts and all those involved that he expects preferential treatment for Canadians. Does he intend to guarantee that? Is the minister going to do that, or is he going to sell out to the American consumer at the expense of Canadian steelworkers and jobs for Canadians? That is what I want to know from the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The question in its form is a repetition of the one asked earlier.

Mr. Alexander: He has not answered it.

Mr. Speaker: Further, it is a repetition of questions answered on two occasions by other ministers.

Mr. Alexander: With all due respect—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

CIRCUMSTANCES SURROUNDING DEPARTURE FROM FORCE OF L. J. BENNETT

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether the government is prepared to reveal the mysterious circumstances surrounding the departure from Canada of Leslie James Bennett of the RCMP, and was one of the conditions that he not reveal the contents of the Featherbed file?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Would the hon. member ask the question again.

Mr. Cossitt: Would the Prime Minister reveal the circumstances surrounding the mysterious leaving of Canada of Leslie James Bennett of the RCMP on condition, apparently, that he not reveal the contents of the Featherbed file?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard the name before. I will refer the question to the Solicitor General.

POSSIBILITY PRIME MINISTER INTERFERED WITH FORCE IN SECURITY WORK

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister how he was able to tell the House last Tuesday in reply to a question of mine that he had never heard of the Featherbed file and yet the next day the Solicitor General told the House that the file existed and was known to the security committee of the cabinet of which I believe the Prime Minister is a member. Therefore, I would like to ask the Prime Minister pointblank—a yes or no answer—has he in any way directly or indirectly interfered with the RCMP in pursuing the matter of national security in this country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to answer the question if the hon. member would say he would take my word for the answer.

Mr. Cossitt: The Prime Minister says he will answer my question if I am prepared to accept his answer. That is a hypothetical situation. I am certainly prepared to consider whether his answer is true, but he cannot ask me in advance to accept his answer when he will not even tell the House what he has to say. I can see too—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's West.

ENERGY

NEWFOUNDLAND'S OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS REGULATION—POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT ON QUESTION TO BE PUT TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister no doubt knows, on October 24 the province of Newfoundland proclaimed its own oil and gas regulations for the offshore area off the east coast and set out its case with regard to offshore mineral rights. The minister of mines and energy of Newfoundland said that the province of Newfoundland is prepared to go to the Supreme Court of Canada on this question if two matters can be settled first. The first is whether the province can have access to certain documents in the hands of the government of Canada relating to the so-called thirty year rule which applies to confederation, and second, whether the government of Canada will agree that both sides have to agree on the terms of the question to be asked the court. Can the minister advise the House whether those two points will be met by the government of Canada, whether disclosure of these documents will take place and whether both sides will have to agree to the question?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know there was a favourable decision taken in principle on these matters some months ago, and I do not understand why the Newfoundland government has not been able to move more expeditiously.

NEWFOUNDLAND'S OFFSHORE OIL AND GAS REGULATIONS—POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING INTERIM JOINT MANAGEMENT COMMITTEE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): The minister is poorly briefed, but I cannot brief him here now. The minister of mines and energy of Newfoundland, realizing that there are now two sets of oil and gas regulations in force in that area, has said he is suggesting to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that the two governments set up an interim offshore management committee so that there will be a forum for discussion and co-ordination and so that the industry will know where to go to get answers in this matter of disputed jurisdiction. Has the minister received that submission, and what will be the reply of the government of Canada to this suggestion?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think that is an interesting and constructive suggestion. I would be very pleased to consider it. I have to point out, however, that at no time has the Newfoundland government taken us into its confidence. It published these new regulations without showing them to us. Nor did I within a week or some days of their publication receive a copy. I hope that the Newfoundland government and the minister in particular will see that it is in their interest to collaborate. I can assure him of our wish to co-operate.

FISHERIES

PACIFIC SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM—REASON FOR ASKING FISHERMEN TO BEAR COST

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. It concerns the salmon enhancement program in British Columbia. The study done by his department in September of this year indicated that the major cost of the salmon enhancement program would be borne by a fishermen's licensing arrangement. Would the minister advise the House why fishermen should begin to bear any of the cost of that program before the returns come to them? There is about a four-year lead time after the hatch gets out to sea. Why is the minister now suggesting that commercial fishermen immediately have to bear the cost when they do not have any other returns?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, first, the hon. member seems to forget that the fishermen are already getting a considerable return from some $30 million worth of investments which have created the technology required for the salmon enhancement program. The other point which the hon. member did not make in his question—and I thank him for giving me notice—is that not just fishermen but all sectors of the industry—commercial, sports fishermen and processors—are expected to carry part of the cost of what is a program not open to citizens generally but to a specific group.

It has been the policy all along that users in cases such as these—for example, airport licence fees, airport landing fees, the post office and other users of government services—should be requested to pay some of the cost.

● (1502)

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, there is one group that the minister did not refer to in his answer who are apparently bearing no costs. These are the people who have polluted the rivers and dammed them. It is the CPR which has blocked the Fraser River. They apparently are not going to bear any of the cost of what is not essentially a salmon enhancement program but a salmon rehabilitation program. We are trying to bring those runs back to the condition that they were. Why is there not a program whereby those who have been responsible for degrading the fishing capacities of British Columbia are required to pay some of the cost of reinstating it?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, one of the features we tried to design in this program is simplicity. I suspect if we were to try to do what the hon. member is suggesting, it would turn out not to be a simple matter at all. For example, how would he charge the cost of the landslide of 1913 which almost wiped out the Fraser River salmon runs?

PRIVILEGE

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: On Friday last, several requests were put to the Chair to seek or to explore the existence of unanimous consent for the purpose of extending some of the provisions of our Standing Orders and precedents of the House in order to permit either a statement by a minister, subject to questioning, provision of an opportunity for a minister to raise a question of privilege, or simply for clarification of the right to put questions to ministers.

Over the last couple of days I have ruled as clearly as possible on the reinforcement of our practices with respect to the limitation on questions which can be put to ministers, that is to say, respecting their own administrative responsibility at the present time. However, I did indicate I had some concern about the opportunity for the House to try to explore by one member that which would take unanimous consent by way of an action on the part of another member, in this case particularly, a minister.

I indicated then that I thought it would be unwise to attempt to extend our practices in that way. Having examined the matter over the weekend, as I undertook to do, I have no reason to change that opinion. I am concerned that we really are not able to take, by way by point of order, in any regularized way an application for unanimous consent, but we do it in circumstances in which it seems that a member who wishes to do something for the benefit of the House feels constrained by the rules and seeks to ask the House to set those rules aside in order to permit him to do that.

If we were to extend that proposition to permit regular applications under points of order for unanimous consent by one member for another member to take such action, we would be inviting regular applications at three o'clock every day for an application for unanimous consent; for example, that the question period be extended indefinitely. We would be opening up the practice to tremendous flexibility. I say that particularly in view of the fact that in the way we have been using Standing Order 43, the Chair has tried to stay out of discussions or disputes as much as possible about the content of applications pursuant to Standing Order 43. In some cases they have been flagrant and I have not put the question to the House.

However, bearing in mind in the procedures we have arranged, because we take such applications at the beginning of the day and because they are, therefore, self-policing in terms of abuse of the rule, since they must stop in order to permit the start of the question period, it has given the Chair an opportunity to take a somewhat passive stance with regard to such applications. That adds a kind of flexibility to applications for unanimous consent pursuant to that Standing Order.

In view of the fact that members do enjoy the opportunity to put these kinds of propositions for perhaps setting aside the Standing Orders for a particular purpose or a particular day, I feel we ought to take a rather tight rein in respect of applications of other sorts for unanimous consent for the setting aside of our procedures, and that I ought to continue to confine the kinds of cases we have discussed to those where the initiative comes from the minister involved.

I want to remind the House that there is one outstanding question of privilege; that is the one related to the decision before the Supreme Court of Ontario. I have given a preliminary indication of the position that I felt the House was in with regard to any outside definition or circumscription of our privileges here. However, the Minister of Justice indicated it was his intention to make an intervention with regard to that matter. I am, therefore, holding that question of privilege open until such time as the Minister of Justice comes forward with that intervention, which I hope will be as soon as possible.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of meeting, since then, with the President of the Privy Council who is studying the matter. He will want to respond to the question of privilege as quickly as he can. I hesitate to speak for the President of the Privy Council—

Mr. Clark: Jack Horner does.

Mr. Basford: —but I hope the President of the Privy Council will make his intervention quickly on it.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is the first day the President of the Privy Council has been back in the House. He has been very ill. All of us welcome him back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I am sure his colleagues welcome him back even more fervently than we do. Because of the issues involved and the question of time, I wonder whether the President of the Privy Council might tell us now when he plans to reply. There is a question of considerable urgency involved in this matter. It affects the basic privileges of the House. I think the minister realizes the urgency. Does he have a time he can tell us as to when he will be replying?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —may I thank the hon. member for his expression of welcome on my return to the House of Commons. I must say I had an opportunity to observe my colleagues from a distance. I want to assure them that they all appeared to me as statesmen, but of course they know better. I also want to ease my way into the atmosphere of the House by expressing appreciation to the opposition for ensuring that not very much happened in the House of Commons during my absence.

Mr. Alexander: It didn't take you long to get back into form.

Mr. MacEachen: In reply to the question by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, I will attempt to reply to this question of privilege just as soon as I have had an opportunity to examine the various aspects of it. I undertake to do it certainly before the end of this week.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It relates to the ruling Your Honour just made which, naturally, all of us on this side of the House are quite happy to accept. I simply want to rise at this point to say that if the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would like to seek unanimous consent of the House to make, in this House, the charges which he made against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police outside this House. In the interests of having something happen in this House of Commons which the government House leader just referred to, we on this side would be quite prepared to grant unanimous consent to allow the minister to make the accusations against the Mounties in parliament that he made outside parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. STEVENS—URANIUM CARTEL—REPLY BY MINISTER

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice of what I believe is a question of privilege. In reply to a question put by myself to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources today touching on the consumer consequences in Canada of the uranium cartel activities, the minister replied, as far as my notes and recollection are concerned, as follows; "The real question in my mind is whether the hon. member is serving Canadian interests or whether he is acting as an agent of a foreign corporation that is contending with Canadian regulations. We are all aware that the issues which he has been promoting are the issues which Westinghouse of the United States have been promoting."

I would like to give notice that I believe this involves a clear question of privilege. I would like to be able to check Hansard, the official record. However, at this point I want to assure all members that I am here to serve primarily the York-Simcoe constituents, and the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member feels he has some basis on which that statement constitutes privilege, I will be interested to hear it. I must say I do not see anything in it initially. However, the hon. member has given notice.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It has some aspects of a question of privilege. Under the rules of the House, I think this deals with the rights and responsibilities of all members. I would refer to two citations in our rules. Standing Order 65(2), which relates to the practice of establishing standing committees provides:

> Each of the said committees shall elect a chairman and a vice-chairman at the commencement of every session and, if necessary, during the course of a session.

It is well known that when each session commences, the listing of members on committees takes place within a very short period of time. Then, when references are made, the committees are supposed to be constituted immediately. Standing Order 58(15) makes this clear when it says:

● (1512)

> Supplementary estimates shall be referred to a standing committee or committees immediately they are presented in the House. Each such committee shall consider and shall report, or shall be deemed to have reported, the same back to the House not later than three sitting days before the final sitting or the last allotted day in the current period.

I raise this matter because we find ourselves in a very difficult situation. A number of miscellaneous estimates were referred to committees on November 9 last. As I understand it, all the standing committees have been established by now, with the exception of one, the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. Two announcements were made in the course of the past two weeks that this committee was to be organized; on two occasions it was announced it would meet for organizational purposes. Yet on each occasion, shortly before the time announced for such meetings, and in one case only half an hour before, they were cancelled, as I understand it, on the instructions of the government whip's office.

These estimates—I refer particularly to those under the umbrella of the Department of the Secretary of State and the Department of Communications—involve some $140 million in public expenditures. Expenditures for which the Secretary of State is responsible represent the fifth largest supplementary estimate. Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge that this committee will ever be established prior to the expiration of the time available, which is due on some date in December.

I am told informally that the committee might be organized on Thursday of this week, which would, in practice, mean there would be no meetings to discuss matters of a substantive nature until next week. This would leave the committee with little more than a week with which to deal with budgetary items having to do, for instance, with bilingualism, new initiatives in the area of national unity, the activities of a number of Crown Corporations, including the Canada Council, the CBC and the National Film Board. Then, turning to the responsibilities of the Department of Communications, we find the CRTC which was the subject of considerable debate this session.

Mr. Speaker, as the presiding officer of this House you are the protector of the rights and privileges of members. The Standings Orders make it very clear, in Standing Order 58(15), that supplementary estimates shall be referred to a standing committee or committees immediately. We now have a ridiculous situation in which, although the reference was made on November 9, meetings of the committee, after they have been scheduled, have been cancelled unilaterally by the government whip. In effect, this means the committees are unable to meet and do their work.

To my mind, this situation calls for a clear directive, perhaps pursuant to an agreement among the House leaders, which would set dates for these meetings in a binding way. As things are at present, the government whip can cancel meetings for reasons which are unknown to us, and this makes our job even more difficult.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think the question raised by the hon. member for Egmont is one of legitimate concern, and I hope it will be resolved through discussion among the House leaders. Having regard to the timeframe he mentioned, there is no doubt all hon. members would like to see this matter dealt with at the earliest possible opportunity, and I can assure the hon. member that as deputy House leader I shall look into the matter to make sure it is dealt with as quickly as possible.

POST OFFICE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, at the stage of statements by ministers, I am pleased today to deal with a subject which I feel is fundamental and essential to the administration of my department.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, as I conceive my responsibilities as Postmaster General, they are twofold. First, I must provide a communications service to all Canadians and, second, I must manage postal operations on a business-like basis. This is a mandate which has been and continues to be difficult to discharge. Because 23 million Canadians are able to communicate daily on an instantaneous basis, they expect, and are entitled to, the most reliable delivery service we can provide in the case of packages and written communications.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, for reasons beyond the control of the Post Office, its management and work force, expenditures have continued to outstrip revenues. Inflation, rising material and labour costs, competition, and labour-management relations are some of the factors that add up to some very somber reading along the bottom line of our balance sheet. Rapidly rising costs have outstripped the growth in revenue. Our deficit is growing larger by the year. It reached $90.9 million in the fiscal year 1972-73; in fiscal year 1976-77 it had risen to $568.8 million.

[English]

This deficit is heavily financed by you, by me and by every other taxpayer because it comes out of general government revenue.

Hon. members will recall that the blue book defines the object of the Post Office as "to provide postal service to the people of Canada at reasonable rates and at a standard of service adequate to meet their needs without incurring subsidization from general taxation." But now, Mr. Speaker, the taxpayer is paying a higher percentage of postal costs, and the postal user is paying less. It is time we began to restore the balance by reducing the cost to the taxpayer, while increasing it to those who are actively using the service.

I should like to take a few moments to give the House a quick rundown of some of the reasons which have led to the present situation and then indicate what we are doing about them.

[Translation]

First the costs. A substantial portion of these does not vary with volume. While the mail volume might drop, the number of points of call we must serve will continue to grow. This gives rise to further requests for Post Office services. And as the number of new addresses grows, our costs grow in a way unrelated to income. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, successful federal policies have created the growing number of homes which makes our task that much more difficult.

A further cost factor is transportation, due largely to the rising cost of fuel. It takes a great deal of transport to move six billion pieces of mail a year. That transportation network runs on diesel fuel, aviation kerosene, diesel-electric locomotive fuel and gasoline. We now spend about 20 per cent more on transportation than we did five years ago.

[English]

Then there are wages. The Post Office employs about 63,000 people, second only to the Department of National Defence in its total of employees, and salaries account for more than 70 per cent of the operating costs of the department. Since 1968, wages of postal employees have risen by 120 per cent. Over the same period, postal revenues have risen by only 107 per cent. Thus, personnel costs outstrip revenues.

● (1522)

I should now like to turn, Mr. Speaker, to revenues. They are determined by two factors, mail volumes and postal rates. Volumes are continuing to grow but, disappointingly to us, at a slower rate than we once thought they would. Indeed, current volumes at just under six billion pieces a year are historically high, but are approximately one billion pieces short of our prognostications. In terms of parcel delivery, we find that volume is down as well. We are presently at the level we were 20 years ago, having suffered a 22 per cent decrease in our parcel volumes. Service disruptions, coupled with aggressive competition from other forms of communication, are the principal causes of this shortfall.

[Translation]

In the area of first class mail, our volumes are continuing to grow, but the mix in the mailstream has changed greatly over the past few years. Today we are heavily dependent on the movement of things like bills, cheques, statements, and so on, especially with the advent of those plastic credit cards, Mr. Speaker. This material now makes up about 40 per cent of all our mail, making us highly vulnerable to any changes in this market.

Also, electronic funds transfer is already undergoing embryonic growth, as members can see for themselves when they do business at their local banks.

[English]

With consequent adverse effects on revenues, mail volumes are threatened on several fronts. A further depressing effect on revenues exists with respect to the postal rates themselves. If the Post Office is to survive as a public service and to grow with the rest of Canada, it must solve the problems I have outlined and reverse the trends which are making increasing demands on scarce government resources. I want to emphasize, however, that we are fully committed to fighting inflation and we are already moving in the directions open to us. But we must seek new initiatives now and in the future if we are to improve control over our costs and increase our revenues. I have confidence in the Post Office management, which I consider is doing an excellent job in most trying circumstances.

[Translation]

Mechanization is an important ingredient for success, as is public acceptance of the postal code. I am happy to report that business and the general public are now using the postal code on more and more of their mail. At the end of September more than 70 per cent of the national mail stream carried the postal code.

Of course, the most important elements in this equation are postal people. To make mechanization work and to maintain consistently high levels of service, we need full cooperation from all postal employees and their unions who in return, and I want to stress this, Mr. Speaker, must share in any gains achieved by mechanization.

[English]

Last month, Mr. Speaker, we signed a new contract with the Letter Carriers Union of Canada. In many ways this was a landmark settlement, because both parties approached the negotiations with a positive problem-solving attitude. Mr. William Dickie, one of the most professional conciliators in Ontario—and indeed Canada—said that he had never seen such a group of people on both sides who were so well prepared, who so fully understood the issues, and whose working relationship was so positive. We will continue our efforts to persuade all postal workers that their own interests lie in co-operative efforts to give the public the best and most economical postal service.

[Translation]

Better cost-control measures, increased productivity, and greater mail volumes will help to improve our financial position. By themselves, however, they will not arrest the growth of the deficit. To make any real impression they must be coupled with rate action that will bring in more revenue.

Mr. Speaker, the Post Office is sensitive to the effect of pricing on business-planning, as well as on the private pocketbook. One of the commitments we have undertaken in the past is that we try to give adequate time between pricing announcements and the implementation date, to allow business and the public to adjust to the new rates. Although I would have liked to have given a longer period of notice, I would hope that the more than four months we are providing in this case will prove to be sufficient.

[English]

We intend to implement a broad range of price increases to virtually all domestic and international rates, to become effective—and I stress, "to become effective"—on April 1, 1978. The basic first-class letter rate will rise to 14 cents, and there will be appropriate increases in other postal classes and services. Details of the new rates will be spelled out in a news release from my department to be issued today. Postmasters will be given details of the rate revisions immediately.

We estimate that for the fiscal year 1978-79 the increases will bring in about $126.5 million in additional revenue. Along with cost control measures and other revenue-generating initiatives which I outlined earlier, they should make a substantial impact on the current deficit without imposing undue hardship on either business or the general public.

[Translation]

Both the federal and provincial governments have agreed as general policy that possible price increases for their goods and services only reflect the pass-through cost increases since the anti-inflation regulations came into effect in 1975 and that absolute subsidy levels remain constant. Our prices are lower than what they might have been.

Even with these price increases, Canadian postal rates will still be among the lowest in major western countries. Expressed in Canadian dollar equivalents, Australians pay 21 cents for a first class letter and so do the French. It costs the British 16 cents, and Americans 14 cents.

[English]

Of course, the price increases still will not cover the total cost of sending a letter. Unlike private companies that can restrict their operations to areas and routes where cost and volume levels guarantee that they can operate at a profit, we as a public service must provide a national service at a uniform, reasonable price.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members will recognize that no one, least of all yours truly, will shoot to the top of any popularity poll by announcing postal increases. But at least I hope I have been able to demonstrate today, in the short period which has been available to me—although I will be able to give further elucidation following questions hon. members will put to me—that if the Post Office is to maintain its present level of contribution to Canadian society, it must establish a better correlation between postal rates and the cost of providing postal services.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to hear the questions of hon. members from both sides of the House since they are all interested in the Post Office Department, regardless of party.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, if hon. members were to ask all the questions which were close to their heart with respect to the Post Office Department, I am afraid they would be here not only today but tomorrow and for many days ahead, because this is one of the most controversial of government departments. The Postmaster General has indicated that his mandate is to provide postal service to the people of Canada at reasonable rates and at a standard of service adequate to meet their needs without incurring subsidization from general taxation. The immediate response from the official opposition is that the standard of service is not adequate, nor are the rates reasonable for the quality of service rendered.

• (1532)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sure the Postmaster General is aware that there are complaints that come rolling in, not only from the Canadian public but from his own workers and from management. There have been public complaints in Toronto, where a good percentage of the mail is handled, from high levels of management, and one of the more moderate leaders in the Canadian Union of Postal Workers resigned there recently. I feel this constitutes a rather severe setback in the continuing attempt to establish more cordial labour-management relations.

Also, of course, the complaints of the postal users are proverbial. As the opposition spokesman, I spend a great deal of my time dealing with those complaints which come from all parts of Canada. Even the Prime Minister joined the chorus when he uttered that classic criticism which everybody knows "The postal service is lousy".

An hon. Member: I say the same thing.

Mr. Dinsdale: Some of the criticisms have turned to good-natured humour—and humour can be the most effective criticism. I suppose the general public, as they face another postal increase, will come up with the old observation that obviously the increased rates are the result of the increased storage costs.

The Postmaster General said that for reasons beyond the control of the Post Office, its management and work force expenditures have continued to outstrip revenues. I hope to demonstrate how we can bring about improvements in the Post Office Department which will restore the efficiency and high morale which once made it one of the best government departments. Primarily, I wish to point out to the Postmaster General that what he is doing is illegal. He knows it is illegal because the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, in a unanimous report issued last May, stated that the Post Office Department had illegally increased first-class postal rates. Notwithstanding that admonition from a very important parliamentary committee of the House of Commons, and also from repeated comments of the Auditor General, the minister persists in this illegality.

Some hon. Members: Shame on him.

Mr. Dinsdale: In his statement, Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General said, "I must manage the postal operations on a businesslike basis." This, unfortunately for the people of Canada, is precisely what the hon. gentleman has failed to do. The postal operation is an industry, and as an industry it is not operating efficiently. As a result, it is not providing an efficient, reliable communications service to all Canadians, which is another point in the mandate the minister outlined this afternoon.

Malaise in the Post Office—and the word "malaise" is one of the favourite words of the former postmaster general, the hon. Bryce Mackasey, for describing the growing problems within the Post Office Department—has been pointed out many times in this House and in other forums across the nation. The Post Office Department itself went so far as to publish a book at public expense in June, 1976, which was a compilation of the speeches of the former postmaster general, under the pessimistic title "What's Behind the Lemming Urge". Unhappily, nothing has happened since that time to change the Lemming-like rush of the Post Office to self-destruction that Bryce Mackasey describes so vividly in that book.

An hon. Member: "Lemon" or "lemming"?

Mr. Dinsdale: Lemming. Little creatures all proceeding rank upon rank toward the precipice of destruction. I am going to quote from the minister's comments today to demonstrate that what I am saying is confirmed by some of the points he made. The Postmaster General said that there is a growing deficit in the Post Office Department, with decreasing revenues, and decreasing volume.

The decline of one million pieces in the forecast volume of mail, and the drop in parcel volumes to the level of twenty years ago, are symptoms of major problems in the Post Office. Surely they are indices that something is drastically wrong, when parcel post service is down to the level of twenty years ago, notwithstanding merchandising gimmicks such as postpak and mechanization at the Gateway plant at Mississauga that was supposed to increase volume and thereby improve the financial position of the Post Office Department.

I suggest to the Postmaster General that infusions of additional cash by frequent increases in postal rates is dealing with the symptoms rather than the disease.

Along with internal malaise, the postal service is faced with serious external threats. The Postmaster General refers to electronic communication as already undergoing embryonic growth. That is the phrase which I abstracted from his statement today. Surely he must be aware that this technology is now in place and Canada is poised for the great leap forward. If permission were given to allow electronic fund transfers, such as bills, cheques, bank statements and transactions of that kind, both in the private and the public sector, 70 per cent of mail volume would be lost—and already the forecast volume is down by one million pieces. Surely this is a state of affairs in the Post Office Department that requires more than periodic rate increases, as has been the action taken under the mandate of the present incumbent.

An hon. Member: Go back to the pony express.

Mr. Dinsdale: I further point out, Mr. Speaker, that this technology is in operation in West Germany, as I discovered during a fact-finding visit to Germany in September, along with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. We also discovered another significant piece of information with respect to Canada's problem. Because of the boom in electronic communication which the hon. gentleman says is in its embryonic state in Canada—I am sure he does not mean that—West Germany has frozen further mechanization and automation in their service. They have only five or six plants automated, because they have stopped the whole process of automation and mechanization.

An even more disturbing piece of information we gleaned was that they have sold to Canada some of their surplus Telefunken equipment which was intended for domestic use in Germany. Canada has been moving post-haste—if I can use that word with respect to the Post Office—in recent years to totally and completely mechanize their postal operation. I am sure it occurs to the hon. gentleman that Canada can be locked into an expensive program of mechanization and automation just at a time when electronic communication has rendered that program obsolete. It is going to require a lot of sober second thought with respect to the solutions which management must decide upon in order to solve the growing problems of Post Office service.

It should be noted that one of the major reasons for confrontation in labour-management relations is the automation program which was foisted upon the inside workers without prior consultation or knowledge. The information was passed on in the form of Comteam bulletins, but that was after the fact. In the United Kingdom they were unable to proceed with mechanization until labour and management were brought together, along with the postal users, thus proving that these tremendous challenges being felt in all democratic countries can be solved constructively and positively.

Our attitude has been positive throughout this long, continuing debate. In face of the forces which are threatening to destroy Canada's postal service, the Postmaster General was scheduled to make a speech to the postal users' conference last year. It was the best of his speeches I have read, and I wish he would accept its authorship. He recognized that the current trends will be insurmountable unless we come to grips with them very quickly.

We in the official opposition believe it is possible to restore the Post Office to its former efficiency. From time to time we have put forward specific recommendations. From what has been said here today, it is obvious that an independent investigation of the Post Office must be undertaken immediately. Surely that is elementary. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers called for a royal commission last spring. Almost simultaneously the official opposition recommended a parliamentary committee investigation which would achieve more immediate results.

The problem is so urgent that immediate decisions must be made. The investigation should consider the issue of transforming the Post Office into a Crown corporation. This change would make it easier to introduce modern industrial relations into the Post Office, thereby helping to avoid the confrontation which exists between CUPW and management. This is one of the main causes of the deterioration of the postal service. This fundamental and essential service cannot face repeated strikes without destroying the reputation, efficiency and reliability of the Post Office.

The Postmaster General pointed out that co-operation has been achieved between management and the Letter Carriers Union of Canada. They are not in the front line of the impact of mechanization because they do not work directly in the plants affected. The same spirit of co-operation which is now being achieved under very responsible leadership by the LCUC can be achieved, also, with respect to the Canadian Union of Postal Workers provided there is a deliberate and concerted attempt to indicate that management will deal with some of the fundamental problems and criticisms. The Postmaster General has an opportunity to accomplish that, because negotiations are currently going forward. This is a golden opportunity.

Because of the mixed-up state of affairs in the Post Office Department by reason of the failure of the government to recognize it as an important industry, the Postmaster General has been unable to come to grips with the continuing labour problems. The mixed-up state of affairs in that department brings together the following: the Treasury Board to handle wage negotiations, Public Works to handle decommodation, and Labour to handle labour problems. Even Supply and Services gets into the act on mechanization. Post offices in other democratic countries have had to face the same problems confronting Canada today. While they have raised postal rates because inflationary circumstances demanded that post offices have some increase in revenue, they have also made fundamental changes in administration. This has taken place in the United Kingdom, the United States and West Germany where management, labour and the postal users are working together for an efficient, modern postal service.

These groups must sit down together. The process of Comteam communications is not enough. There must be co-determination, and they must sit around a table face to face. There must be personal confidence established between the individuals taking part in the dialogue. The process of co-determination must be used to make decisions for resolving postal problems. They must sit down together in order to resolve some of the problems referred to by the Postmaster General. This is industrial democracy that will be required to overcome the problems of Canada's postal service.

Finally, I should like to strongly emphasize that the Postmaster General is making a fundamental mistake—which I am sure he realizes—by arbitrarily announcing substantial increases in postal rates. He has indicated that we have been given ample warning and by April 1 the users will have overcome the shock. By this time he should realize that there will be the usual protests from small businessmen, book publishers, senior citizens and other Canadians who are totally dependent upon a postal service at reasonable rates.

The Postmaster General has failed to go through the basic consultative process that is necessary to prepare for a development of this kind. I will be kept busy in the next weeks dealing with publishers and independent businessmen in an attempt to explain what makes the Postmaster General tick, which is a difficult job for a member of the official opposition. What the government is doing is illegal, as was indicated by the Standing Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments last May 11.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would inform the hon. member for Brandon-Souris that the hon. Postmaster General took 14 minutes, and the hon. member has exceeded that time. When will the hon. member close his remarks?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am in my final paragraph. Your Honour has a very good sense of timing in realizing that I was coming to the climax.

It is illegal, as was pointed out by a standing committee of the House of Commons. Last May 18 we asked the Postmaster General to refer the issue to the Supreme Court for a definite opinion. Today I ask him, once again, to defer the proposed increases until the Supreme Court has expressed itself on the matter and the necessary amendments to the Post Office Act can be brought in. On this issue, surely the government can operate within the law.

● (1552)

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, first I want to express my dissatisfaction with the fact that although, apparently, the Postmaster General mailed the text of his remarks this afternoon to my leader and to my House leader, as of now we have not yet received a copy. I think that to use the mail service to deliver copies of documents to members is doing a disservice to members. This has been the case so far as our party is concerned.

There is certainly no doubt in the minds of Canadians that something is wrong in the postal service of Canada, and I am glad to see that the minister has at least put his finger on the problem in the following statement as it appears on page 4 of this borrowed text of the minister's speech: "Of course, the most important elements in this equation are the postal people. To make mechanization work and to maintain consistently high levels of service, we need full co-operation from all postal employees and their unions who must share in any gains achieved by mechanization."

There is no Canadian who is not fully aware of the fact that something is wrong in the state of Denmark. Surely the minister has heard it stated often enough in this country that the whole question of mechanization within the Post Office has created a great many problems for those workers who are directly affected by it, namely, members of the Canadian Union of Postal Employees. This dissatisfaction with technological change in the Post Office has led to wildcat strikes and to lengthy strikes.

When the previous postmaster general, Bryce Mackasey, brought in the same goals as are in the Canada Labour Code into the contract with the postal employees, he said the government had the answer. Obviously, we do not have the answer because we are still bogged down with the same problems in honouring that clause in the contract, namely, clause 127. The Post Office management is still trying to run around the ends of the very clause they put in to eliminate problems with respect to technological change.

So the people of this country are fully aware of the fact that there are management-employee problems. Even though the Postmaster General said, on taking office, that he does not know much about industrial relations and negotiations, very soon afterwards he became an expert on the subject, and now suddenly he is carrying the can for management. There is another problem as well which the Postmaster General has identified. It seems to me that it amounts to a miscalculation on the part of the Post Office Department. For example, they have admitted that the electronic funds transfer is undergoing an embryonic growth, as hon. members can see for themselves when they do business at their local branches, they have all the high-priced help in the Post Office Department, all the economists and planners needed, yet they do not look down the road to see that electronic funds transfers will be introduced and will affect the department.

The Postmaster General admits that there has been a miscalculation in the volume of mail in the Post Office. What are we paying our bureaucrats $40,000, $50,000 and $60,000 a year for? It is a waste of the taxpayers' money if they cannot do better forecasting than that. The minister admits all this. He says, "We have miscalculated" and, "We have a human problem in the Post Office". But what do we get? He announces an increase in the first-class mail rate from 12 cents to 14 cents. I suspect that one cent out of the two cents is for sending mail to the RCMP headquarters so they do not have to go to the Post Office Department to open it.

The minister increased the first-class mail rates by 17 per cent: I worked it out. It seems to me that by doing this he has exceeded the guidelines that we have set for the workers. We have a 17 per cent increase on first-class mail, but what is the increase on junk mail? The minister says: "... there will be appropriate increases in other postal classes and services. Details of the new rates will be spelled out in a news release from my department to be issued today. Postmasters will be given details of the rate revisions."

That is also one of the problems. We are carrying a lot of these newspapers, junk mail, catalogues and the rest of it. The taxpayers are subsidizing all this. Again, the little people are being asked to pick up the 2 cents increase on first-class mail. The Post Office Department officials have miscalculated their revenues, and it is very convenient now for the minister to run to the House and announce an increase in the first-class mail rate. This increase is totally unacceptable to the NDP because, in effect, we are bailing out the Post Office Department.

The people are aware of the fact that there is a problem. The postal workers have called for the establishment of a royal commission to look into the department. Every commission that has studied the Post Office in the past, and every previous postmaster general, has recommended the transformation of the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation. An indication of the state of affairs in the department is that there have been five postmasters general in the last seven years. That is certainly an indictment of the department and an indication that it is topsy-turvy.

If ever there was a need to streamline the Post Office Department by making it into a Crown corporation which would be accountable to parliament, it is now. Now, is the time to do it. Every time the Postmaster General comes here and grabs two cents more on first-class mail, or makes any other increase in mail rates, we avoid making the tough decision and taking a close look at the way in which the Post Office is run, making recommendations and following them through to ensure that the Canadian people get the best possible service for the price they pay.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised to hear the speech of the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). I did receive a copy of his speech in both official languages delivered by hand, not by mail, before coming to the House, and I thank him for it; that is probably why I received it and the representatives of the New Democratic Party did not. But, on the other hand, as usual the Post Office is mixed up and consequently the paper was sent to the office of my colleague, the hon. member for Villeneuve, rather than mine although it was addressed to me.

We see once again—and the minister explains it clearly in his mini-speech—that the Post Office is not administered on a businesslike basis. The minister can say that it should be administered that way but he then goes on to prove that it is not being actually administered on a businesslike basis. We knew, and the minister said, that in 1972-73 the deficit stood at $90.9 million. Logically speaking, a businesslike attitude would have meant trying to reduce the deficit, not passing on the cost of the lack of administrative capability of the minister and his predecessor. And in 1976-77 we have a deficit of $568.8 million—and that is the minister's figure. He thinks the department is being well administered, administered intelligently, and so it will not look too bad this year because the anticipated deficit is $717 million. They say they are going to reduce this 1978-79 deficit by increasing first class rates once again from 12 cents to 14 cents hoping to go and get an additional $126 million.

On the other hand, the same paper says that an increase in mail volume had actually been anticipated which did not materialize. That is quite understandable. This cannot happen with the service offered by the Post Office when it takes a week to send a letter from Ottawa to Rouyn in the riding of Témiscamingue; in many cases, it takes a week and a half to send a letter from a parish in Témiscamingue to Ottawa. They can complain that prices went up, that gas went up, that it costs more to send mail by train than by plane. Now we realize that generally speaking the department is not trying to solve the problem. We do not get the kind of service we were used to in the fifties when we could expect a letter mailed in Montreal for Ottawa to arrive at destination the next day or the day after that. But today we can hardly rely on the postal service. It is so bad that, as some members have indicated, for urgent matters it is better to forget about the postal service and turn to private enterprise instead.

The minister says that the department is trying to reduce the deficit and is still investing money and he talks about sound management; I can give him an example of sound management on the part of his department. Last year the government decided to increase—as it plans to do this year—the postage cost for a letter sent first class mail. This became effective in April, and not so long ago, at the beginning of the year, on March 16, 1977, a communiqué from the Post Office Department to its employees, the postmasters of the entire country, clearly said: Prices are being increased and you should not expect—I would like to read the second item of information sheet SF-7717 dated March 16, 1977. For the minister's information, this communiqué said: Rolls and booklets of the new 12 cent stamps will not be available for at least one year.

Prices had just been changed. This year, the rates will be increased from 12 cents to 14 cents, but the post offices in northwest Quebec have not yet received the 12 cent stamps. And this is called a good service and a healthy administration.

It is easy to see how the Post Office is administered. Enormous deficits are accumulated. What is the minister proposing to solve this problem? I do not want to know what the minister is asking of Canadian taxpayers to pay for the deficits accumulated because of his bad management; I would like to know what he intends to do to reduce the excessive cost of the Post Office Department and to improve the service provided to the entire country. Then, people might be interested in paying a bit more for the stamps that they will stick on their envelopes.

The minister says that his experts are shocked at the decrease in the number of mail items. This is understandable since they are asked to pay twice as much for four times less service. This will continue of course, but it is always the small municipalities which suffer. In the release attached to his speech the minister says that it will be possible to save 50 cents on postage for a ten-pound airmail parcel or $2 on a 50-pound airmail parcel sent from Montreal to Toronto. It is all very well for those cities. But it is the peripheral areas which make a massive use of the mail service that finally have to pay the cost of bad management in the Post Office Department. In major centres, as the minister says in his speech, there is electronic communication for banking transactions; of course, in large cities, there is a mail service between businesses and industries. Why? Because the Post Office Department does not provide adequate service. But it is the people in peripheral and far away areas who must shoulder the heavy losses resulting from this administrative chaos. As I was saying a while ago, a letter needs from a week to a week and a half to get to the next parish, because automation forces it to pass first through a distribution centre, then through a sorting centre, then to return to the distribution centre and finally from there to the next village. That is what automation has meant in addition to a $568 million deficit.

We are not satisfied with the minister's decision generally, and I am anxious to see the minister rise and hear him tell us of the way he intends to solve the administrative problems afflicting his department, instead of always burdening the taxpayers who are the users of the postal service with the effects of wrong decisions.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that all hon. members are interested indeed in the Post Office, as he said as he was about to conclude his own speech, and so are those who are using the Post Office as a means of communication within our constituencies, namely, the people who are entitled to adequate services throughout this country and who are not getting them.

As the minister said, we still find some places where they have to open new offices, while in some remote areas, with 10-year lease contracts, they have to renew those contracts, and pay increases to people who rent those premises. That is still under discussion. Those things cannot be paid. There are some delays and they said: We have to increase prices to cover expenses, but in many cases, they do not pay for expenses and they delay payments.

Then, generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, that is simply acceptance. The minister stated indirectly today that he knows his department is badly administered but that all he is prepared to do is to overtax postal service users as much as the others who will have to pay taxes. All this party did since they are in government is to let things get rotten and they continue to charge and to blame Canadian people.

• (1602)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is the kind of statement which is an announcement of a change that is going to take place at some time. Therefore, I realize there should be questions asked today, but they ought to be of a general nature. Opportunities ought to arise to pursue the matter in detail on other occasions, but I think it appropriate to recognize two or three questioners today.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the minister has announced an increase in the first-class mail rate and has said, if I follow him correctly, that a press release will be issued by his department announcing what the increases will be in other categories. It has been my experience that successive postmasters general have been very quick to point out the deficits in first-class mail and increases in the rates, but have been somewhat reluctant to give the House information about the deficits incurred in carrying other classes of mail. I think particularly of—

• (1612)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Junk mail.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): —junk mail and advertising on the basis of household deliveries, some newspapers and other advertising material. It does not seem to be satisfactory merely to tell us that the cost of first-class mail will go from 12 cents to 14 cents, and leave it to a press release from his department to give us the other information.

Can the minister now tell us what the deficit has been in the other classes of mail and, by comparison, what the increase in the costs of these other categories of mail will be and what that increased cost will do to reduce the deficits in those various classes of mail? If he does not have the information with him now, will he undertake to present it by way of a statement on motions or by asking permission of the House tomorrow or the day after to have it included in Hansard?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the information the hon. gentleman requests is very detailed. I can tell him that this is the first time in the history of new rate proposals that the total rate structure for all classes of mail is being changed upward. As I indicated, the increase for first-class mail is 2 cents, likewise for third-class, addressed mail; and for second-class mail the increase ranges between 24 per cent and 25 per cent. That is for publishers' mail, publications, newspapers, etc., which come within the second-class classification. The hon. gentleman will recognize that there is a very wide range of rate changes in each one of the classifications, and it is very difficult for me to start analysing each and every increase for the benefit of hon. members. I thought it would be more informative for me to make available to hon. members and to the public generally the exact nature of those rate increases by way of a press release.

In terms of the question of deficits in the various classes, here again the deficits vary in accordance with the individual rate which is being sought. As the hon. gentleman knows, in terms of second-class postage it is a highly subsidized rate. The Post Office has been carrying the can as part of government policy in terms of printed material and the distribution of published material, including daily newspapers and weeklies. We are incurring deficits which we can properly identify, but with some difficulty, as the hon. gentleman might well imagine. We are trying to minimize the deficit in terms of first-class mail, but as I indicated in my address, a deficit is still going to be experienced.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred very impolitely to commercial mail. I call it advertising mail. It is revenue-producing and it is generally on a cost recovery basis save and except in those areas where we are still competing and trying to increase our market. We are doing that as a business initiative to attempt to enter to a greater extent into that particular market in order to increase our revenue in the long term.

I do not want to elaborate too much. I am sure the hon. gentleman will have on his desk tomorrow the press release giving the specific increases in rates for all the various classes of mail.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): One of the features which disturbs people, in addition to the cost of mail, is the whole question of the confidentiality of mail. I wonder why the minister has not made a statement on motions similar to the statement he made to the press last week in which he said the Post Office had lost control of the issue because no one in the Ottawa headquarters knew of the collaboration with the RCMP. He went on to make a great many other statements, which I will not bother to quote at this time. But it seems to me this whole question is something on which the minister ought to have made a statement at some time.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Speaker: That is a valiant effort to raise another subject. However, I think it falls outside the ambit of this particular statement by the minister. The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Postmaster General admitted that his department miscalculated in terms of electronic funds transfers, and in view of the fact that electronic communication is certainly changing the whole aspect of mail service, can the minister tell the House what studies have been undertaken, or if there have been any, by his highly paid bureaucrats with respect to the future of communications in this country? Because we have already invested $1 billion in machinery to move mail quickly, can the minister tell the House whether there are any studies, and is he prepared to table the studies so that members of parliament can see the great forecasting of his department?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member for Nickel Belt was interested in the Post Office. If he were, he would surely have seen a number of public statements I have made. I flatter myself in believing that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris reads every speech that I make. He quotes from them widely. I would have hoped the hon. member for Nickel Belt would have been doing the same. Evidently he has not. I have said on a number of occasions that we are, indeed, concerned about EFTS, and we are monitoring activities not only to ascertain how EFTS is proceeding but also to ascertain the vulnerability of the Post Office.

If I might be permitted, I would like to use the hon. member as a channel to some of his friends—who are not in this House but with whom I have dealings, although not as cordial as the dealings I have with my hon. friend—to advise them that EFTS is a serious threat. The hon. member recognizes that it is a serious threat and that we can lose, not 70 per cent of our volume, which would indeed be fatal, but up to 40 per cent of our volume unless we can obtain the co-operation of the CUPW membership. I have said that quite often. I have recognized that mechanization is a process which is irreversible. I have recognized that any increase in productivity has to be shared with the workers. The hon. member has agreed with me on that.

Having said that, and having recognized the intentions of the Post Office, I ask the hon. member to solicit the co-operation of CUPW so that we can improve our services, increase our efficiency and identify those areas where we can accelerate our service in order to compete effectively and efficiently with the electronics media. This media includes digital computer transfer of messages, EFTS and other electronic means of communications which are now taking great amounts of the potential earnings of the Post Office. That interference with our revenue has been aided in the past not by just one union but by the general labour relations atmosphere in the Post Office, which I have been trying with every effort to correct since my appointment. I have been successful with reference to all but one of the major unions within the Post Office.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris was speaking of industrial democracy a while ago. I fully agree with him. I am attempting to get our feet under a table together with CUPW, not necessarily for negotiations but for finding solutions to some of the problems which are making us more vulnerable to electronic means of communication.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I am always very interested in the speeches of the Postmaster General, but he is cancelling out the speeches he made in Sault Ste. Marie and Nickel Belt. I want to assure the minister that I have spoken with my friends in CUPW, and I say to the minister quite honestly and frankly that if he is prepared to honour the agreement he signed with CUPW, CUPW is prepared to sit down at the table and negotiate a new contract.

● (1622)

In view of the fact that he has correctly identified the major problem in the Post Office as being one of management-worker relationships, is he prepared to have management stop harassment of this one group of workers, CUPW, in terms of posting on their bulletin boards material which is already public knowledge? Why does he persist in having management interfere with the rights of workers on the job, creating friction which is not necessary, at the time they are attempting to negotiate a new contract? That is the first question. Will he assure the House that management has been instructed not to interfere with the communication rights of the leadership of CUPW with its members?

Second, now that first-class and other postal rates are being increased, will he assure the House and the people of Canada that the Post Office management will honour the contractual agreement signed by his predecessor with regard to technological change and the required notice when changes come into effect, and stop trying to run around the end of the agreement?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question of the first undertaking, I wrote to the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. I agreed that it had always been Post Office policy to permit communication between union representatives and the members. I think the hon. member is a bit exercised about one instance in Winnipeg—one instance in 8,600 postal establishments. I suggest that the exception proves the rule. If all that hon. member can call to my attention is one instance in the more than two months since I made that declaration, I think we are doing very well indeed.

In terms of the second undertaking, the collective agreement that is now in force and which, in effect, was supposed to have come to an end on June 30, as the hon. member knows, we have honoured that collective agreement, although there has been some difficulty in interpretation. Now, when parties are negotiating a new collective agreement, is the time, to try to iron out any disagreements that arise as a result of difficulties in interpretation. That is exactly our intention. Indeed, I point out to the hon. member that, in the negotiations with the letter carriers we not only negotiated the contract, but in order to avoid any misunderstanding we also negotiated interpretative guidelines for that particular contract. Indeed, there is no danger, with the letter carriers, that we can have any sort of difference in terms of how to interpret the various clauses.

What we are attempting to do during these negotiations is to improve the labour-management climate with CUPW in the hope of smoothing out any differences there may be in interpretation. We are having some success. It is slow, but, as I indicated to the hon. member, we are eminently patient. The union seems to be patient as well. Our own postal negotiators, not Treasury Board negotiators—because the Post Office is delegated to negotiate all its collective agreements—are meeting with the union as often as possible in order to sign as many articles as possible. To date, save for a few exceptions, the attitude and the atmosphere of the negotiations have markedly improved. We are going through this Christmas period without any threat of strikes. I am hopeful that by very early in the new year we will have a collective agreement signed with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think we ought to conclude questioning with the hon. member for Villeneuve, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and the hon. member for Gatineau.

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two questions for the Postmaster General.

First, given the fact that he has asked for an increase in postal rates, can he tell us if once and for all he is going to satisfy the claims of citizens of remote areas such as northwestern Quebec where the post offices have become inadequate or obsolete due to the demographic increase or the rising volume of mail produced there.

My second question is as follows: Is the Postmaster General going to yield to the demands of some postmasters who, for eight, nine or ten years now have signed long term leases, and have asked for an adjustment of the lease prices since they are doing all they can to give better service to the public?

Mr. Blais: I am very pleased to be able to give an answer to the hon. member for he has mentioned areas of Canada which, as he identifies them, truly demonstrate the national character of the postal service. As you know, Mr. Speaker, what happens is that our competitors are looking for revenue in each of the big urban centres and in so doing compete with the Post Office while our national postal service is trying its best to provide services for the whole of the Canadian population.

Last Friday, I participated in the first issue of a new stamp and I had meetings with Inuit people in the northeastern Arctic region, which is an area administered by the postal region of the province of Quebec. The hon. member is certainly well aware of how difficult it is to provide a service to the northern regions such as those located north of the 60th parallel. However, the same principles as elsewhere apply regarding the postal service that we provide in areas such as Témiscamingue, Abitibi and the whole northwestern part of Quebec as well as the northeastern part of Ontario. I am quite aware of that.

Now, as for the problem of postal stations, I cannot make a general statement dealing with each one of the postal stations within the member's riding, or generally speaking within the Abitibi region, but I am prepared to listen to the representations he would like to make to me in order to see what kind of flexibility could be reached within the framework of our existing contracts and regulations in order to provide for the needs of the postal contractors of that region. I can assure the member that profit is indeed not our prime motivation in the Canadian north but rather the concern to provide a public service. All Canadians must be aware that we are trying to carry out our responsibilities as best we can and that in providing services in those regions, we cannot expect a sizeable revenue given the volume of mail and the distances to be covered.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I have already asked my question. I had hoped the Postmaster General would have responded. It was asked in the form of a suggestion that the minister should refer the whole question of increases in postal rates by order in council to the Supreme Court, in light of the strong, unanimous condemnation in the report of the Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments that was issued earlier this year. I know that he has misgivings with regard to the legality of what he is doing. I know he contemplates amendments to the Post Office Act so that any possible suggestion of illegality will be removed.

I suggest that referring this question to the Supreme Court is one way of getting a decision, or he should bring in the necessary amendments to the act. That would make it possible to assure the public of Canada and this House that increasing rates in this way is within the law. Perhaps even more important, why does he not proceed to the fundamental changes that are becoming increasingly obvious with regard to Post Office operations? Other countries faced with the vexing problem of inflation have been able to get around it without too much protest by setting up commissions on postal rates and commissions on postal rates set comprising representatives of labour, management and postal users. They sit around the table and decide, in light of all the factors, whether an increase is necessary. The postal users conference has not really become an official organization, but the Postmaster General meets with it at least once a year—

● (1632)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to permit the hon. member to make a further response to the statement. I understood he was asking the minister a question.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I am constantly amazed at the selective analysis the hon. gentleman derives from his own experience. He would, surely, be the first to admit that the commission concept with respect to the establishment of postal rates is a lousy concept and that it is not working. The commission is having more difficulty in making up its mind to increase postal rates than the hon. member had when he was postmaster general.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was never postmaster general.

Mr. Blais: I thought you had been. When the opposition was governing the country, it did not dare to increase postal rates. It was not taking its responsibilities sufficiently seriously. I might point out that there is a monstrous deficit today in the United States, where the government has created a public corporation and established a commission. They are finding great difficulty in getting a decision from their commission with respect to increases in postal rates. The post office there is facing huge, ongoing deficits, yet they cannot get the commissioners to move. As a result, there is increasing pressure from the elected representatives who say: Restore the old control system, because we have to pay for the post office yet we have no control over it.

In terms of the legality of my proposal, here again the hon. gentleman is making a very selective analysis. The statutory instruments committee never said the use of section 13 was illegal. I am satisfied that the use of section 13 of the Financial Administration Act is legal. I am acting under that legislation. If the hon. gentleman is serious in suggesting that the statutory instruments committee has indicated there was illegality, may I say this to him: I recall that the report was tabled in the House and that it was not subject to futher debate. It died on the order paper. If there was an issue which ought to have been raised at that time, why was that not done by the hon. gentleman, who seems to have a great deal of interest in what I am doing today?

Mr. Dinsdale: The Postmaster General paid me the compliment of suggesting that I am an avid reader of his speeches. There was one of his speeches a copy of which he did not send me, but I have seen it reported in the press. It was a speech made in his constituency, and obviously he was discussing some of the ongoing problems in the Post Office with some of his constituents who were rather unhappy about the situation. They asked him when he was going to introduce into the management of the department the fundamental changes which are necessary. The minister replied that they would be forthcoming, but not until after the election. Why not proceed before the election?

Mr. Blais: That must have been a meeting in camera.

[Translation]

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General mentioned in his statement as the main reason for the increase in postal rates the deficit his department has been facing for many years and particularly from 71-72 to 76-77.

Could the minister also announce other revenue opportunities and particularly some developments as regards parcel delivery to compete with the private sector? We know very well that seven or eight years ago parcel delivery by the private sector was almost unknown. Now it is a business competing with the Post Office department.

Could the minister also tell us what steps have been taken to compete with that business. Could he also tell us what will be the effect of the postal rates on small business and the economy in general as it has been mentioned that it could also represent an additional cost for individuals and senior citizens?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, of course there will be an impact on the small businessman, but on the other hand we want to eliminate the subsidies we are granting directly to every Canadian taxpayer. With the deficit we have to face, it means that every Canadian must pay $25 a year in taxes to maintain the postal service. There are very few businesses, small businesses or individuals that are spending as much money on the Canadian postal service as on private enterprise service.

As concerns small businesses, we are trying at the same time that we raise our rates to improve our communications with them, to encourage our postmasters in various communities to discuss the improvements that should be made in services and to inform small businesses on the best way to use the postal service and to provide them with a more efficient means of communication. Mr. Speaker, I might say that among all post office users, small entreprises are the ones most adversely affected by service interruptions caused by strikes or other work stoppages.

Therefore, I have always considered as my duty since my appointment to suppress those interruptions and, up to now, there has definitely been success and I hope that in the future we will eliminate the word "strike" from our postal vocabulary. I sincerely hope the hon. member will support us in this respect. Concerning the second part of his question, we are competing as effectively as possible with private enterprise which is providing services in parcel delivery. We are opposing an application made by the American UPS which wants to extend its parcel delivery service in Canada. We are now in court. We were successful in opposing them before and we hope that eventually they will decide to go back home and stay in Germany because, as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) just suggested, what happened in Germany is that close to 50 per cent of parcel revenues were lost to the organization called UPS. From there the postal service went into, not a study, but the establishment of an express delivery system between major centres where there was a need for it.

We have recognized that the service must meet the increased demand in the marketplace for additional services never before offered by the department. Heretofore this had been covered by the intrusion of and swarming by private courier services in that market, but we are now doing a very aggressive penetration to take away from them as much business as we can. We have established the service referred to by the hon. member, that is between major centres like Montreal and Toronto, Calgary and Edmonton. We are now joining in the competition for the so-called Premium Mail Service, and we hope we can eventually increase our revenues by competing more efficiently with private enterprise in the marketplace.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke of strikes. What progress has been made in the way of reducing differences in the postal sector, because each work stoppage or strike, entails increased expenditures for the department?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), we have established an inter-group system very much in the spirit of true industrial democracy, under which there must be two channels of communications with employees, that is delivery men and postal officers. The negotiations channel we obviously enter into each year is also a channel of consultations at every level, national, regional, district and local. Employees, that is delivery men and their supervisors, meet with management to discuss their problems and eliminate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to interrupt the minister, but I have turned down other members who have tried to get into areas other than the Post Office. We are now branching off into labour relations, which I think is a new subject.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, that was a long wait! Let me try to carry on from where I left off on Friday. I want to cite specific cases where the Tariff Board made recommendations, and compare those with the recommendations of Canadian agricultural organizations. Let me start with mushrooms. The industry asked for a 20 per cent duty on mushrooms, and the Tariff Board recommended 20 per cent. However, the Tariff Board excluded dry mushrooms from its recommendation, recommending 10 per cent for that item. A 10 per cent duty on dry mushrooms gives a great opportunity for substitution of this product and brings about tremendous competition from fresh mushrooms or other types of mushroom products. They can be substituted one for the other, and therefore one undermines the other to the detriment of the mushroom industry in Canada.

Let me go to canned vegetables. The recommendation which the Tariff Board brought in is lower than that requested by the industry. This might have been acceptable if it had not been for the fact that, as I understand the report of the Tariff Board—and I have not had time to study it in great detail—they included canned peas, beans, beets and carrots in the category known as the n.o.p group, and that particular rate is too low. Therefore, with too low a rate on canned products, the first item in their recommendation, fresh products, is sabotaged.

Let me return to potatoes, the processed product. The industry recommended a 20 per cent duty on frozen and n.o.p items. The Tariff Board recommended 10 per cent and 12½ per cent duty, respectively. This represents a 2½ per cent reduction in duty on these items, which in many cases have come under extreme pressure recently.

The rates on n.o.p. frozen vegetables are also too low. This category includes virtually all vegetables frozen in Canada. This, again, is detrimental to the industry which grows the product and processes the frozen product. It is useless to protect a product in part only; there must be consistency in the various duties recommended by the board throughout the entire line of products which come from a particular vegetable or vegetables. There has not been this consistency. Therefore, as a result of unsatisfactory recommendations regarding frozen peas, corn, carrots and mixed vegetables, vegetables as a whole are given very serious competition. Some of these products can actually arrive on our market duty free, or nearly so. Again, they can be substituted for the fresh product. Our competition for the fresh product at any time when the product is in demand is stiff, and thus the Canadian price is depressed.

I want to leave individual items, because one can go through an almost endless list of products regarding which the industry has recommended to the Tariff Board one level of duty and the board has come up with something that is almost satisfactory, but by virtue of the introduction of new classes, or by changing the duty on certain processed products, the board have really negated all the favour they initiated by their recommendation with regard to fresh products. However, I shall not dwell longer on that matter.

I mentioned, perhaps at some length, on Friday that we must be in a position in Canada to impose a surtax at the time damage is done to a Canadian product. The least our negotiators should ask for is a codicil to the agreement. This codicil should trigger automatically when import prices become detrimental to a particular Canadian industry producing fresh, frozen or dried products. If action is not taken immediately, the flow of products can destroy the industry for the entire season.

Let me give the House one example. In 1957 I recall that the inventory of frozen peas in the United States was well in excess of any possible market that they could see. Therefore, they decided to get rid of 10 per cent of all frozen peas in the United States within a period of one or two weeks. The flow of frozen peas into Canada would have totally destroyed the market for the next 12 months had it not been that the government of the day imposed an immediate surtax on imported peas from the United States, thus protecting the small amount of production we had in this country at the time but which has grown since then.

Therefore, an immediate surtax capability, not on any particular or specific basis but on a sliding scale which is applicable at that moment in time when it is needed, must be put at the disposal of the Canadian government in order to protect our agricultural industries. This is the very least that we must have. It will be ruinous for processors, farmers and all those who work for combined industries if we do not get it.

As Canadians, Mr. Speaker, we recognize that there must be an element of liberalization of trade which will remove it from the straitjacket in which we once found ourselves, where nothing moved across an international border without a duty being applied. That, sir, is part of our life in the world today. We must also realize that we can only participate in the liberalization of trade up to the point where our industries, and we as a nation, can survive. Agriculture has never asked for 100 per cent of the total market; but it has asked that it have a fair share of the market on a viable basis. The only way this can be obtained is to recognize the needs of the industry when our negotiators conduct their negotiations.

In dealing with the United States, we are dealing with industries which in many instances have farms adjacent to Canadian farms producing the same items. We are dealing with a country which has economy of scale in production and processing. We are dealing with a country which has lower capital costs. If we are to protect our industries, we must have protection at least as great as that which the United States affords its industries. Or, in many instances, we should have an additional 5 per cent to make up for some of the additional costs which our producers experience. It is on this basis that we should negotiate with them.

But as I look at the potato products we seem to be on a unilateral binge to reduce the duty as they come from the United States, without any return in reduction of duty from them. Our negotiators should obtain from our principal trading partners, such as the United States, the European community and Japan, an opportunity which would increase our marketing capability in those countries. I have neither seen nor heard anything from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or anybody else which would indicate we are seeking additional markets in other sectors of the world for our products, that we are seeking the removal of duty barriers or their reduction, or that we are seeking removal of the artificial trade barriers which keep us out of many markets.

We are going down a one-way street. We must get value in return for the things we have given away. In view of the fact that we have had unilateral reductions in duties in several budgets in my short period in this House, I am afraid, sir, that we are going for unilateral reductions again and our industry will once more be stripped of part of the protection which is absolutely necessary for a healthy consumer market, for a healthy agricultural industry and for employment in our processing industry. These are subjects of real importance to this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely unacceptable that we give anything more in respect of agricultural tariffs, if we do not in turn obtain better trading opportunities with our trading partners. This has been our history. Absolute trade-offs and straight line reductions on imports coming to Canada cannot be tolerated and must not be given. Do not yield until you receive. If necessary, increase the protection on items which are particularly vulnerable to dumping—very low-cost items.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) will exert all the pressure possible to get the committee in place which I proposed the other day. I think it is imperative that the farmer, the negotiator and the parliamentarian sit down around the table to exchange ideas on the needs of the potato industry, the vegetable industry, the fruit industry, the meat industry and the grain industry, so that when those people negotiate they will understand the consequences.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is their unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain).

Mr. McCain: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I think our negotiators, who are not familiar with agriculture, should be impregnated as best they can be with full knowledge of the consequences of reductions in tariffs on any agricultural product. They should be aware of the consequences of no quota structures for the importation into Canada of meats and other items. They should be aware of the economic importance of agriculture, its employment opportunities and its basic industrial opportunities as an employer in Canada before they negotiate anything away.

The farmers will be able to convince a committee that it is in the best interests of all of Canada's economy, including the consumers, that we produce more, that we process more and consume more Canadian agricultural products under favourable trading conditions in order to create a viable agricultural industry.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, it is very close to five o'clock, and if possible I would like to have my speech in one place in Hansard. I wonder if it would be permissible to call it five o'clock at this point and proceed with private members' hour?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

Item No. 2, the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay): shall the item stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Stand at the request of the government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

SUGGESTED HOLDING OF NATIONAL REFERENDUM TO OBTAIN PUBLIC OPINION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of holding a national referendum for the purpose of making a survey of public opinion on the issue of capital punishment at the time of the next federal election.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I put this motion before the House approximately a year ago. As a matter of fact, we debated it on November 14 last year and, as members will recall, the following day was a very historic one in Canada because it was the day of the provincial election in Quebec. When we debated it a year ago, a number of government members spoke against the motion and it was marvellous to hear the casuistry with which they argued against it.

I recall very clearly that the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), chairman of justice and legal affairs committee, stated unequivocally that we could not have this kind of a referendum brought to the Canadian people because it would be a violation of parliamentary procedure. He said—and I think I quote him accurately—that we could not have a referendum unless we had in mind a plan to change the whole system. On the same day the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) spoke against my motion for a national referendum on the issue of capital punishment. In speaking against it last year, he said:—the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock is using colourful means to fight the issue of capital punishment—

I would like to underscore this. He said:

—because the hon. member is attempting to alter our whole parliamentary system of government merely because we retentionists lost.

Since that time, as I have already said, we have had a very important, landmark election in the province of Quebec. Just this year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in this House, during the throne speech debate—and all members will recall the one hour and fifty minutes' torture chamber we were in during that time—suggested that one of the things we could do would be to have a national referendum on the issue of national unity.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has put his imprimatur and his blessing on the concept of a referendum, so I thought it would be advisable, good and maybe a wholesome experience of purgation if government members were given the opportunity to debate the subject again, now that a referendum has been sanctioned, as a matter of policy, by the Prime Minister—and who could be a greater authority than the Prime Minister? I know that all his backbenchers would like to stand behind the Prime Minister on all the key issues in the country, and since he has said we can have a referendum on an issue of great national importance, such as national unity, surely the government backbenchers would like to support the Prime Minister on such an important issue. It would be a good experience for me and for government members to have another opportunity to debate this issue.

It need not even be the issue of capital punishment, but as I said last year—and I repeat now—probably 80 per cent to 84 per cent of the Canadian people have expressed themselves very clearly on this issue. As I said then, this is one issue on which all of us knew where Canadians stood, yet because of government pressure the bill carried and the issue of capital punishment lost.

Now that the Prime Minister has given his sanction to a policy of holding a referendum, we should be able to bring the question back to the country and give the people a personal and individual opportunity to express their wishes to parliament. As the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville pointed out and as the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out, if there is a referendum, the decision after that vote is binding upon parliament and legislation would have to be brought forward. I agree with that.

I am attempting to open the door for all government members to stand behind the Prime Minister on this issue. They should agree with me that we have a national referendum on this important issue. Since Canadians have indicated that they want capital punishment in our statutes, government members should come forward and support me in this motion, allowing the government to bring forward a referendum on the question of capital punishment.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, not only was this motion debated a year ago in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen); it was debated, also, in this House on May 2, 1977, in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie). The debate is reported in Hansard commencing at page 5193. At that time I spoke in the debate, and I have in no way changed my opinion. I was one of the hon. members on this side of the House who voted against the government, which was a difficult thing for me to do. It was difficult because it involved a basic question of principle which I had a great deal of difficulty resolving in my own conscience.

After consulting my constituents in a poll of 16 per cent or 17 per cent of householder responses received by my office, I came to the conclusion that something over two-thirds of the voters in my constituency were solidly in favour of capital punishment. This raised the basic problem which any elected body has to face from time to time. I am referring to what extent we follow that famous maxim of Burke which was cited ad nauseum, or do we follow another quotation from someone like Tom Payne who said that you have to represent the people who voted for you?

Eventually I came to the conclusion that in a democratic society where there is a basic concept of moral conscience on issues which are firmly held and not lightly held—and there is no question of majority opinion—the elected representatives had to take some note of that opinion or else they would bring the whole process of law-making into disrepute.

A law which is not accepted by the majority of the people to whom it applies can never be a good law. I have not changed that opinion, although I hope the trend of our times would be toward less and less severity of the sentence, more and more emphasis on rehabilitation and the possibility of rehabilitation, and a reduction of the number of circumstances in which punishment of this order would even be considered.

I would hope the ultimate penalty would be reserved for those who were totally unmanageable in the present context of our prisons, the repeat murderers, those whose guilt is established beyond any question of a doubt, and those about whom it can be said that the circumstances were just about as brutal as the human mind could conceive. There are not many such cases—perhaps 1 per cent of the murders that take place.

Presently in the United States there is one man who has committed four murders of other inmates and prison guards since being incarcerated under a life sentence. I do not think our prisons are capable of coping with a substantial number of such persons incarcerated within them. The concentration of 15 or 20 of such persons within a single institution strains the situation. The lives of other prisoners are in jeopardy, as well as the administration of the institution itself, which brings disrepute upon our society.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in Weekend magazine dated November 19, 1977. It cites the result of a poll which was taken in 32 urban centres. A total of 1,078 people were questioned. They were asked: "Do you think there is ever an occasion when it is all right for society to execute a criminal?" The article indicates that 73 per cent said yes, 14 per cent said no, and 13 per cent said they had no opinion.

Those who said yes, that the death penalty should apply, were asked what kind of crimes it should apply to. Here is the table: for child murder, 72 per cent said yes; mass multiple murder, 71 per cent said yes; premeditated murder, 67 per cent said yes; killing prison guard, 62 per cent; murder during a crime, 53 per cent; child rape, 42 per cent; terrorism, 34 per cent; treason, 28 per cent; hijacking, 28 per cent; kidnapping, 26 per cent; drug trafficking, 25 per cent; child abuse, 21 per cent; child molesting, 21 per cent; rape, 19 per cent; and manslaughter, 19 per cent.

This is an issue which cuts across traditional allegiances. The people who took the poll noted that the lowest and highest income groups were most favourable to capital punishment: 86 per cent of those earning less than $3,000 a year and 84 per cent of those making more than $25,000 a year favoured the death penalty. Men were more likely to favour it than women.

[Mr. Francis.]

The figures were: 79 per cent of the males favoured the death penalty, and 68 per cent of the females. Understandably, females in our society were more in favour of the death penalty for crimes against children.

There were regional differences across the country. British Columbia was the province that most strongly favoured the retention of capital punishment. Perhaps some recent happenings in the prisons of that province had something to do with that. The Atlantic provinces and the province of Quebec were the areas least in favour of capital punishment. Only 70 per cent of Quebec residents favoured it. In terms of age groups, those who were examined between the ages of 30 to 34 were most strongly in favour.

I have no reason to reject the results of such a survey, nor do any other members of this House. The resolution before us requests the government to consider the advisability of a referendum on the subject. There is no question what popular opinion on a referendum would disclose. I suggest to Your Honour, and to the members of this House that this poll is substantially correct. As far as my constituency is concerned, all I know of the subject is consistent with the results that are revealed.

We have to ask ourselves, as law-makers, what our responsibility is. The thing which bothers me most is to what extent we are free, or should we reflect upon decisions which have been taken by this House? A decision has been taken as a result of a long, free debate. The suggestion on previous occasions that there was not a free exercise of conscience for members on this side of the House is one I firmly repudiate.

I was not alone on this side in voting against the abolition; many of us stood and were counted. It was a free vote of members of the House of Commons, freely expressed, and I believe that any decision on a matter as fundamental as this should stand for an adequate period of time to test the validity of the decision. I do not believe that we serve our own purposes or those of the nation well if we take a decision one day and reflect on it by some action the next.

I have not changed, in any respect, the views I held at the time I rose in my place to cast my vote in the House, but I do not believe that the process of consultation, referendum or plebiscite can be used ad infinitum or for a large number of purposes without reflecting on us. We have, it is true, a proposal before the House which was made in the debate on the Speech from the Throne by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for a referendum on the subject of national unity. I believe that the term sophistry, casuistry or some other fancy term was used by the mover of the motion to suggest that because the Prime Minister had agreed to a referendum on national unity, it was perfectly in order to have this additional one, and that if we were opposing it we were doing something which is somehow less than straightforward or honest.

An hon. Member: Inconsistent.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member has modified his adjectives somewhat. Let me recap what has happened. The prime minister of Quebec has proposed a plebiscite in that province on the question of secession. The wording is not yet established. The details of such a referendum are by no means clear. In reponse to the initiative on his part, the Prime Minister said, and I think correctly, that this is not just a matter for the Parti Quebecois, through the government of Quebec, to resolve in the language they choose in a plebiscite of their timing.

The Prime Minister said that he reserved the right to a federal initiative in this matter, and it is a initiative which I, for one, am pleased to support. The referendum held under federal auspices would, I am sure, be worded much more fairly and in terms which will be more generally accepted as being objective. What the results of such a referendum would be, time alone will tell, but the Prime Minister has not closed the door on the possibility of other parts of Canada being invited to express their opinion on events which possibly might take place in that province.

I find it hard to believe that the mover of this motion could be serious and could suggest in good faith that an issue involving national unity, an issue as fundamental as this and a federal initiative to respond to what might come from the province of Quebec, should be cluttered, obscured or denigrated by the holding of other initiatives at the same time. Surely the question of national unity is a more important issue before us and before the House at this time than any other issue, with the possible exception of matters relating to the performance of the economy.

We all have to establish our priorities. I think we have a very serious responsibility to the people of Canada in regard to national unity, to the state of our economy, to the control of inflation, the creation of jobs and employment and the distribution of incomes. According to my scale of values, the issue of capital punishment is below these other issues. I hope that an expression of national purpose and national will could be achieved, if it is considered appropriate, without having too many side issues on the ballot at the same time. I consider this to be a side issue in relation to other matters. I am sure the hon. member would not want to have a clear response in regard to national unity, for example, obscured by a debate, which would be very partisan and very bitter and which would reflect very strong feelings in many parts of Canada, on the issue of capital punishment.

I am one of those who believe that this issue may well be reviewed by parliament, but I would hope not before something like five years, when we would have had the opportunity to judge what the effects would have been of a measure which was adopted by parliament, namely, the abolition of capital punishment, a measure which I voted against at the time and would do so again if I had to vote now. I believe our responsibility is still to allow a reasonable period of time to elapse before we reflect on a vote which was taken in this place, and that we do not at the time of the next federal election bring in other issues which could obscure the results which are most important on the basic issue of national unity should a referendum be held on that subject at the time.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion put forward in private members' hour by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) which calls for a referendum on the subject of capital punishment for the purpose of making a survey of public opinion on the issue. I would go even further than the motion and would propose a referendum on the subject of capital punishment, not just a survey of public opinion. I would do this because of the feeling of the people in my riding and other people throughout Canada to whom I have spoken.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) read into the record the results of a very good survey that has been taken. It reflects the opinion of Canadians both before we held the last vote on capital punishment and afterwards. The people of Canada do not agree with the results of the last vote on capital punishment. It has been said that it was a free vote, but people realized fully that it was not free when they saw the solidarity of the cabinet members who all voted with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He made sure there was a sufficient number of members voting for abolition. However, the vote was against the wishes of the people of Canada.

This summer I had a very good opportunity of meeting many of my constituents when I was trying to canvass their support for my nomination for the next election. They were mostly disappointed with the way in which the government had handled the issue of capital punishment. They want capital punishment. They do not agree with the way it has been settled. The hon. member for Ottawa West says we should have some time, a moratorium if you wish, because we have already had a vote, and that we should hold off for the next five years. But that is not the wish of the people of Canada. It is not the way they want capital punishment handled. They are in favour of capital punishment and have not changed their opinion since the last vote.

The question of national unity is certainly very important, probably one of the most important for the country. But before it came along there was the question of capital punishment, which is so important to the people of Canada that they should have an opportunity to be heard. They have not had that opportunity so far, Mr. Speaker. They were in favour of capital punishment, but parliamentarians felt they knew better and voted against it. This is a very important issue to the people, and they want to be heard.

I do not hold that we should have all kinds of referendums. The issue of capital punishment has been debated four times in this House in the last ten years, and the vote has always gone against what the people want. It is time now to hold a referendum and let them decide the question. It is not necessary to have precedents for important issues. If a referendum were held on capital punishment, it would not mean that one should be held on every other subject. Each issue would be decided on its merits and, according to the people of Canada, the government should allow a referendum on the issue of capital punishment.

I know that my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock, has good reason to move that a survey only be made at this time. I support that motion very strongly, and I know that the people in my constituency support it as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is often said that one of the functions of the House of Commons is to consent to proposals respecting the law. I entered this House in 1965, and before that was here in an executive assistant capacity. During that time one of the topics most frequently debated on the floor of the House of Commons has been capital punishment. There have been three major debates, and I recall innumerable discussions within party caucuses. The record shows that the subject has been well canvassed over 14 years and that there have been opportunities for members to express opinions and, more important, to cast votes.

What is so important about the exercise is that all these votes have tended to be non-partisan. By that, I mean votes cast irrespective of party policies. Members had an oportunity to vote as they saw fit according to their conscience or the conscience of their constituents. This brings up an interesting point about votes on capital punishment. It is an interesting dilemma to be faced with the kind of pressure that many of us felt from our constituents, where it was clear from the beginning that the majority of the people who elected us to this House wanted some form of capital punishment left on the statute books.

I recall quite vividly that in the 1972 election in my constituency the question of capital punishment and the way I voted was one of the main issues. I defended the position I had taken and, rightly or wrongly, was re-elected. I cannot claim, however, that the argument I made at that time was particularly the one espoused by constituents, but I was re-elected whether they agreed with my position or not. Although my constituents did not agree with my position on capital punishment, apparently they agreed with the position I took, or that my party took on a whole host of other matters. It seems to me that had they wanted to switch to someone who thought as they did on the issue of capital punishment, they would have chosen one of the other two candidates.

We had a choice in this House, and those of us whose thinking led us to one set of conclusions voted as we saw fit, while those who believed they should vote the way their constituents demanded, whatever their conscience, did so. There were, of course, those who faced no such conflict—those who believed in capital punishment and had no difficulty in accommodating themselves to the wishes of their constituents who also believed in it, and then those who believed in abolition and whose constituents felt that way as well. The latter two groups were, indeed, happy people. They had no difficulty with their conscience or with the opinion of their constituents. They had no difficulty in deciding how to vote.

The first two groups had a real problem, however. In our constituencies we had pressure from people who felt there ought to be capital punishment, and here we ran into a very difficult problem. While there is much agreement that there ought to be capital punishment, there is no agreement on whom that capital punishment ought to fall.

I recall, when drugs became a problem in Canadian society about 1967, constituents were telling me that we must do everything possible to get rid of them. When it happened that it was their son or daughter or a friend who became involved, however, they felt the law was perhaps too rigid and that the courts and the police were not taking all the circumstances into account. It was clear that while people generally felt the law was correct as it applied to drugs and other things, apparently its application was not correct.

There are other circumstances where people have got into difficulties with the law and, of course, have felt that full implementation of the law was not called for in their circumstances. It is not always justice we seek; most of the time we seek mercy. Perhaps that is at the heart of my difficulty in interpreting the views of my constituents as to the appropriate response to demands for capital punishment. From a series of circumstances I know it is not capital punishment just for the sake of bloodthirsty revenge that is demanded.

I also know, from speaking to people who have served on juries at murder trials, to Crown attorneys and police, that the situation is not as simple as it seems. Any honest Crown attorney will tell you that he has presented cases where he has been absolutely certain that the accused was guilty. However, the jury was not certain, and therefore the person was released. That is because if a jury makes a slight mistake, there is no way to bring a person back from the grave.

If there is no capital punishment for first degree murder, there is a greater chance of getting a guilty verdict because people are then not so concerned about the absolute taking of a life, from which there is no coming back. There are aspects which have to be considered in that way.

● (1732)

I want to go back to the question of the nature of the votes we have had in this House on the question of capital punishment. I go back to that because it seems to me that they were unique votes. Parties were split, with the sole exception, I think, of the Social Credit Party, which voted en bloc. I believe there was a small split in the New Democratic Party, and there were significant splits in the Conservative party and in the Liberal party. That indicated that the vote was a genuine free vote and that members had an opportunity to make decisions.

Mr. Friesen: Come on, John.

Mr. Reid: If we examine the breakdown of the vote, we find that there was a greater proportion of Liberals who voted against the abolition of capital punishment than there was in the Conservative party, and if one wanted to draw an analogy, one could say that the party leadership in the Conservative party put on greater pressure to follow one particular lead. I think it was significant, however, if we consider leadership as defined by the positions held by the party faithful, that three out of four party leaders voted for the abolition of capital punishment.

The leader of the Liberal party, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau); the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), all voted for the abolition of capital punishment. That indicated an interesting trend in Canadian society where obviously the leadership of the parties had some difficulty coming to grips with this problem and, by and large, the leadership of the three major political parties decided that it was worth taking a gamble to vote for the aboliton of capital punishment.

Whether we agree with the decision they took or not, I think Canadians can be proud of the leadership of their political parties for having had the courage, under very difficult circumstances, to take a stand. That stand was not widely supported throughout the country, as I believe most of us in this debate have admitted, but I believe it says a great deal for the leadership of the Conservative party, the NDP, and the Liberal party that they supported the motion. The motion carried in spite of the fact that all of them had to deal with splits in their parties, which indicated that there was not 100 per cent agreement in their parties that this piece of legislation ought to have been passed. I believe that is significant and very important.

I say that the last vote was very important because we can go back 14 years to when the debates on this matter in the House of Commons in the modern era began, and the result of those debates really culminated in the last vote when the motion carried by a very narrow margin. I believe that it carried by only a narrow margin because there were significant splits in the various parties.

We had an all-party consensus that abolition should take place, and that is what took place.

Mr. Friesen: Come on!

Mr. Reid: I point out to the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) that if it had not been for the leadership of his party voting for abolition, it would not have carried. The margin was that close. All we have to do to prove that is go back and count the votes, and I think the hon. member does himself, his party, and the position he takes, a disservice by not admitting that the fundamental fact is that this is an issue which has split parties. That is why the leadership of the three major political parties were prepared to allow free votes.

Quite frankly, I cannot think of any other matter in the House of Commons in the 12 years I have been here on which the whips have been off. Only on the issue of capital punishment have the whips been off, and while members of parliament are quite free to vote against their parties at any given time, and to take the consequences which apply, this is the only issue upon which the leadership of the parties have seen fit to remove the discipline which normally applies.

I think the question of abolition of capital punishment has a unique legislative sanction which is not given to many other pieces of legislation which pass on a divided party vote. I put this in a position which I would rank second highest in terms of my concept of the kind of consent the House of Commons gives to legislation. The first, of course, would be legislation receiving a majority consent, which most legislation in this House receives. The fact that abolition took place in the face of party splits gives a profound voice to the abolition of capital punishment.

Members of parliament have obligations, and one of those is to give leadership to ensure that, even though there may be many things we are unable to agree upon, there are things that we can bring to a conclusion, and there are things upon which we can make a decision. It is not always easy for many of us to make the necessary compromises between our own opinions, our own interpretations of the facts, and what the folks back home, our constituents, feel. However I believe in this particular set of circumstances significant numbers of members were able to look into their consciences and say, "I am elected to the House of Commons for what I am, and I will cast my vote for what my understanding of the facts is". I think many members of parliament made their decision on that basis. At the same time, I do not in any way want to denigrate those who voted the other way, according to the dictates of their consciences, or those who voted the other way because their constituents wanted them to do so. I believe that either of the two positions is appropriate for a member of parliament to take. However, I want to let it be known that in any case I always vote the way I see things, and I am prepared to accept the consequences from my constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. Armand Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today on the motion introduced by my colleague and give my full support to his bill.

I had the opportunity to hear the previous speakers say that the only party which was unanimously in favour of the death penalty was the Social Credit Party of Canada. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that members of the Social Credit Party of Canada were unanimously in favour of the maintenance of the death penalty in our country. Why? We have always felt that we were the representatives of the people in Parliament. All the members of this party made an inquiry in our constituencies to see whether our electors wanted or not the restoration of the death penalty. This is why it is easy for us today to take position in support of the bill, since we have been asked by our people to say to the government that they wanted the restoration of the death penalty.

We are referring today to a referendum. We also agree because I remember that the late Réal Caouette said on many occasions that we should hold a referendum for the guidance of all members of Parliament on that serious issue of the death penalty. I also heard the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) say that we should try out the measure we adopted last year for a period of five years. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that we should put it to the test, but not for five years. In 1973, Bill C-2, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, was introduced in the House of Commons. It attempted to add some provisions to the present act to provide that only murderers of policemen or prison guards would be charged with capital murder. Today, the hon. member is asking us to wait for five years, and this same government has not been able to wait for five years to find out the results of the law we adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is important to listen carefully to the demands of our people. Here, in Ottawa, I heard today in the news that policemen's wives from the city of Ottawa were circulating a petition precisely to force the government to hold a referendum or to restore capital punishment. How many policemen and prison guards have been killed since we abolished capital punishment? Unfortunately, I do not have the figures, but a great number of policeman and prison guards have been killed since we abolished capital punishment in Canada.

We also heard some hon. members tell us earlier that the first vote on capital punishment was a free vote. How strange it is; I discussed with hon. members on the government side whom I shall not name and who said that people asked them to restore capital punishment when we were examining this piece of legislation. How strange that these same hon. members voted once again for the removal of capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that the House, once again for the benefit of the Canadian people and for the security of honest citizens, support the hon. member's motion asking for a referendum, to follow a guideline which will be set up for us by the Canadian people. I am sure, Mr. Speaker that, after this referendum and several inquiries like those I made in my constituency, and where 89 per cent of the population said they are for the restoration of capital punishment, again 89 per cent of the population will want to be able to walk quietly and securely in the streets. Mr. Speaker, I would not like to be told this evening that I have been the one who talked out the hon. member's motion.

Mr. Speaker, I end my speech by urging all hon. members in the House to support the hon. member's motion, to give once and for all the Canadian people the right to vote on this serious problem of capital punishment.

[English]

● (1742)

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I support unequivocally the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), with regard to the necessity of a referendum on capital punishment.

I do not think there is anything so dastardly to the thinking of Canadians everywhere than to have a murder committed that was either premeditated, planned, a hired murder or murder committed in the pursuit of a crime, than to have one who commits such a murder not pay the supreme penalty as the laws of Canada provided and insisted on prior to the passing of the legislation which abolished capital punishment in 1976.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) stated that voting at that time was a free vote. I agree that it was certainly a free vote in every respect from this party's point of view, that it was indeed a free vote in our party. However, I must say that the hon. gentleman exaggerated beyond extreme when he stated, I think with tongue in cheek, that it was a free vote on the government side.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) prior to the taking of the vote whether he could confirm if the vote was to be a free vote. I remember being in the House at that time. The Prime Minister's answer was so inaudible that I do not think anyone got the right answer. I do not think he made any kind of answer. In any event, no audible reply was made by the Prime Minister.

The solid vote by the Liberal cabinet for the abolition of capital punishment was not an accident. You can take from that what you will. I feel sure that if some cabinet ministers had voted as they privately wished to do, the vote would have resulted in the retention of capital punishment.

The murder of our policemen in the carrying out of their duties in ever increasing numbers, six this year alone, is having a most unfavourable reaction among all our police forces from one end of Canada to the other. It has had serious effects on their morale and desire to carry out their duties, or even to continue in their careers.

I suggest, despite all the opposition to capital punishment, that it is a deterrent. Its re-establishment in our laws will be once again a step forward to a greater respect for our laws by all criminal elements. It will give our law enforcement agents the tool that they so desperately need to carry out their duties with zeal and determination. That zeal is now somewhat lacking because of the murders of their brothers in the pursuit of their duties by assailants who know that, if apprehended, they will only have to serve a few years for their crime and then be free to commit murder and other crimes again.

In conclusion, I support my colleague's motion for a referendum. The government should go along with the desires of our country as expressed in many polls. More than 80 per cent of Canadians want a return of capital punishment.

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate with mixed feelings. During the prelude to the capital punishment debate, I wished for a referendum, yet I knew that many of us here were acting as representatives of our constituents. In order to represent our constituents and their wishes on issues that they have extremely strong feelings about, as they did in the capital punishment debate, a vote must be completely free.

I say to the hon. member who just spoke that there was not a free vote on either side. Those who subscribe to his leader's wishes on abolition followed him. I know there was pressure of various types on members, the worst kind of pressure—the feeling that you have to vote with your leader to get ahead.

I do not subscribe to what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) said. He was supporting the theory of an arch-Tory, Edmund Burke, who said that we have to make our own decisions in the House. Edmund Burke did not represent many people, only a few hundred like himself. He could not hear the voices of the people because he was too far away. Two hundred years ago travel was very difficult.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to say there is no truth in the assertion by the present speaker that there was pressure on members to vote in a certain way. That was certainly not the case in my party.

Mrs. Holt: I did not refer to our party at all. I know that the cabinet voted party solidarity. Perhaps it was a coincidence.

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is about time we straightened out the matter on which the hon. member is speaking. There was absolutely no pressure on anyone to vote in a certain way. It was a completely free vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say that the hon. member is speaking about something of which the Chair is not aware. The Chair is to rule on the operation and functioning of this House in accordance with our Standing Orders. It is not in order to criticize a vote that has been taken. I do not think the way the hon. member has been speaking about votes has reflected on this House. She is speaking in general terms. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) is more a point of disagreement. Whatever influence the hon. member is referring to is very intangible and is really not perceptible to the Chair.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear I am not reflecting on the way in which people voted in this House, but I do favour a totally free vote ultimately so that as members of parliament, we can represent our constituents fully as a whole House when they make their feelings clear on major issues.

I would like to discuss the question of a referendum and answer the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) when he mentioned the statement of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), who is a very respected member of this House, who is the chairman of the Justice and legal affairs committee, an outstanding member and certainly well versed in his law. Several times he corrected the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock who implied that he, the member for Windsor-Walkerville, favoured a referendum. He made it quite clear, for the second or third time for that member opposite, on October 21, 1977, as reported at page 152 of Hansard. He was discussing the third point in his speech, and he said:

> I am pleased, by the way, that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) who I am sorry is no longer in the House, introduced my position on this with so much fanfare. I owe it to him that he read enough of my remarks from the previous occasion to indicate that I did say that there could be a referendum when our very system itself was at stake. I am not sure he appreciated the significance of those words, but what I was saying then is precisely what the Prime Minister is advocating now. When the country's government or the country's future itself is at stake, a referendum, of course, can be extremely appropriate. It was matters of ordinary policy which I was suggesting should not be taken from parliament and handled by way of referendum.

It may be of interest to the hon. member to know that his own leader, during the question period on October 20, 1977, seemed to be concerned that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was proposing—and this is his statement—what he called a change to the tradition of the parliamentary system and to change it in a way that the government of Quebec is not proposing to change it—to have this referendum apply simply to one question relating to unity. Of course that is what the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville stated, and whenever you see referendums in many countries of the world, it is always when major issues involve the whole state, its structure, its very existence. You can look at other countries, not just our own. A referendum is held when martial law is to be introduced. In Europe there was a referendums on whether a country should enter the European Common Market.

Mr. Friesen: On a point of order, I find it necessary to correct the record that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) is making. Or perhaps the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) referred loosely to his memory of a year ago when he entered into the debate. But when I read from that record here on October 21, I quoted accurately what he had been saying a year ago. Perhaps on October 21 the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville did not clearly remember what he had said a year ago, but I do want to read back into the record precisely what he said a year ago and state correctly, for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, precisely what he said. I read, as to be found at page 143 of Hansard:

> I find it hard to understand that hon. members can rise in this House and urge us to change our whole parliamentary system merely because they are not satisfied with a particular vote.

That is exactly what he said, and it is definitely different from what the hon. lady has just read.

Mrs. Holt: I don't know, Mr. Speaker, because I have not gone back to that portion of the record. But he certainly cleared up the record on October 21, and he also said:

> All we are talking about now is the power to have such a referendum; we are not making a decision to go ahead with it.

The Prime Minister himself said the referendum would be concerned with the issue of national unity, a constitutional problem, and he discussed it in the context of enabling legislation that would make it possible, in the case of an emergency, to hold a referendum on the question of unity.

While I do not often quote Macleans, because I really think it is a pile of garbage and is very seldom accurate—in fact they have a great problem with their own prejudices and hates, and therefore cannot get their record straight—but there is one writer for Macleans occasionally, whom I do respect very much, Peter Desbarats. On October 3, 1977, during this very discussion in the House, Mr. Desbarats wrote an article on Quebec's supposed legislation under the heading "What Will a Referendum Mean?" I think his thoughts on this subject are very useful to the House. He wrote:

> One of the most destructive aspects of the referendum, and the reason why many Canadians find it almost irresistible, is its counterfeit air of being conclusive. It pretends to be an honest and straightforward way of making a choice—Yes or No. It panders to the eternal Canadian yearning for an ultimate solution to our most vexing internal problem and it reinforces the illusion that there is an easy answer.

He points out also that in an era of public opinion polls the result is a foregone conclusion. He argues that far from revealing public opinion it prevents its orderly development—it becomes a political weapon, an interruption and distortion of our political process and, at worst, an entertainment.

I certainly would have found it much easier to have been in the House during the debate on capital punishment if there could have been a referendum. I would not have had to stand here and vote as I had to do. I would have been happier to serve my constituents and my party at the same time. But had I not been able to vote as my people wanted me to in Vancouver-Kingsway I would have voted their way, and resigned. That is how strongly I feel that I am a representative—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—POSSIBILITY OF IMPORT QUOTA FOR BEEF IN 1978

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the question which brings me into the adjournment debate tonight is one I had hoped would be replied to by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). That, in turn, relates to my question of November 16. But first I want to say that I appreciate the written response I have received from the parliamentary secretary to the minister who, I presume, will respond to me tonight. My question on that occasion dealt with my concern, and the concern of the Canadian cattle industry, over the possibility that there may not be control by quotas over beef imports in the coming year. I refer specifically to imports from Australia and New Zealand.

● (1802)

I remind the parliamentary secretary that the current quotas which have been in operation all this year, particularly so far as Australia and New Zealand are concerned, are now almost filled. As at the week ending November 5, combined totals of imports of beef from Australia and New Zealand amounted to 109 million pounds as against an allowable quota of 120 million pounds. This means that about 11 million pounds still remain. These were the figures two weeks ago, so probably by now the quota is almost filled.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he knows when this quota might be filled. Usually there is some indication when a quota will be filled once it reaches near completion. With rather plentiful supplies of beef from the major exporting countries of the world, particularly Australia and New Zealand, there have been only very slight downward adjustments in world supplies of beef available for export.

Canada's cattle industry needs to know now before the end of the year that somewhat similar quotas will be in effect for 1978. I think it is important that these quotas be announced before the end of the year. Can we expect somewhat lower quota levels for Australia and New Zealand in view of the currently plentiful domestic supply in Canada? The fact that current quotas are going to be nicely filled by the end of the year, or before the end of the year, is a clear indication that these quotas have worked very well this year and that they should be continued through 1978.

An early or interim announcement would be appropriate since the new beef import legislation will not be available until early next year. I refer to the speech of the minister during the throne speech debate as reported at page 298 of Hansard for October 26. He said:

> If necessary, I have been authorized by the government to look at the possibility of the passing of a Meat Authority Act, provided I could be assured of very close collaboration of the opposition.

After three years of persistent support for this legislation, both personally and by almost every cattlemen's association across Canada, this is very welcome news. We in the Conservative party, cattlemen's associations, stock growers organizations and many other livestock groups across Canada, will certainly give our close collaboration on such legislation. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the parliamentary secretary on that, provided the new legislation is reasonable and does the job of serving as a long-range beef import policy for Canada. I urge the minister to act quickly so that we can take a look at this new legislation.

● (1807)

What does the word "authority" mean? He should tell us that very shortly. I find it somewhat ironic, after pressing for such legislation in a very personal way for three or four years and being most emphatically turned down by the Minister of Agriculture and previous ministers of industry, trade and commerce, that now we have the strange situation where both the Minister of Agriculture, and the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), are indicating support for this long overdue legislation. Could it be that the new Senate report on beef imports was responsible for this turn-around by the government? If there is competition between cabinet ministers to bring in this meat import legislation, all I can say is, it is about time. The only important issue is that it be good and reasonable and long range so that our cattle industry can see an end to short-term, ad hoc, crisis-type legislation. We will support that kind of legislation.

On the other item which I raised in that question last week about the current cow-calf stabilization program for this year, that is, for 1977, when will those pay-out details be announced? Hopefully by now the parliamentary secretary may have some further information. Every calf producer, every calf seller in Canada, I am sure, is anxious to hear details about that program. Will it be announced especially before the end of the year? Last year, of course, the details of the federal fed cattle support policy were not announced until the end of January. We hope it will be a little earlier than that this year. Further, would he hazard a guess as to whether or not there will indeed be a pay-out, since there is the probability that because of higher calf prices there may not be a pay-out under the cow-calf stabilization program for this year.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to try and reply to the question the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) asked concerning Canadian meat imports for 1978. As the hon. member indicated, the government has provided financial assistance to the beef industry and thus achieved stabilization of cow-calf imports for the past few years. I suggest therefore that the problems faced by the beef industry have been overcome.

As the minister indicated to the House through the throne speech, he will be authorized if necessary by the government to introduce legislation to limit meat imports, already assured of the opposition's co-operation. The government will soon come to a decision concerning beef and veal import quotas, following consultations with the other traditional exporting countries, a decision which the government will make public later.

We anticipate that quotas for 1978 will be approximately the same as in 1977. We have some reasons to maintain quotas as they were in 1977. Under their legislation governing meat imports, the United States will increase their quotas on a minimal quantity with no secondary effect on meat exports from Canada. In addition, meat consumption in Canada for 1978 will likely remain at the same level or even below that of 1977. Therefore it will be necessary to maintain Canadian beef exports to the United States in 1978. Aware of the situation which is confronting the beef industry in Canada, the government is prepared to take the necessary action to help that very important Canadian industry.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the cow-calf breeder program is concerned, regulation on subsidies granted for calf and cow meat will probably be announced next December.

I was happy indeed, on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), to answer the very important question from the hon. member for Medicine Hat and I hope he is satisfied with that answer.

SOCIAL SECURITY—NEGOTIATIONS FOR RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT ON PENSIONS WITH UNITED KINGDOM—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question on Friday concerning the reciprocal agreement on pensions with the United Kingdom. I directed my question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and it was answered by the former minister of national health and welfare (Mr. Lalonde) in his position as Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare that day.

I asked the question because I received a press release the day before. It was not one of the ones from the Prime Minister's office, it was merely a red headline; the really important ones come out with gold print on them. This one pointed out in the view of the Minister of Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) what she thought was going to happen due to the signing of the treaty on the reciprocal agreement with Italy. I should like to quote as follows:

● (1812)

> The minister stressed that before the agreement can go into effect, Canada and Italy must agree on the detailed arrangements for administering it. Officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare will begin working on these arrangements shortly with their Italian counterparts . . .

On November 18, 1977, I asked the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare the following:

> Has any progress been made with regard to signing a similar agreement with the United Kingdom . . .

In part I received the following answer:

> . . . that negotiations with England, the United States and France are still in progress, that the various officials have been holding meetings.

What is the difference between the situations in the United Kingdom and Italy? In both cases officials are holding meetings, and not much else is happening. The minister's answer in the House is similar to the press release—"We are not making a great deal of progress".

There is confusion in the minds of everyone interested in this subject as to exactly what procedure should be taken to make this agreement effective. It took one and a half years to pass the bill in the first instance, and we were assured it would be in effect quickly. There was no mention of a treaty at that time. Now we have a media happening. A media happening has no intrinsic value of its own, but is available because the media are there to cover it.

We have had a recent treaty signing between the President of Italy and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), the result of which is we are exactly where we are with the United Kingdom. This is a game which is being played by politicians to get publicity for an otherwise sterile visit. When the Italian agreement comes into effect, Canada will be faced with some difficulties.

I should like to refer to the press release from the Prime Minister's office, which reads as follows:

11. Q. When will the Canada-Italy agreement go into effect?

A. The agreement must be ratified in both countries after it is signed. Also, administrative arrangements must be agreed upon by both countries before the agreement can be put into effect. Discussions for these administrative arrangements will begin once the agreement is signed.

The agreement has been signed, thus they are beginning their discussions. The agreement will be extremely difficult even when it is working. I should like to refer to the press release from the Prime Minister's office once again, which reads as follows:

9. Q. On what basis can totalizing and prorating under the agreement be applied to acquiring or receiving an OAS pension?

A. A person may add residence in Italy to residence in Canada in order to meet either the ten-year minimum requirement for payment of an OAS pension in Canada, or the 20-year minimum requirement for payment of the OAS pension abroad. The amount of the benefit would be one-fortieth of the OAS pension for each year of residence in Canada only. For example:

(i) 1 year of residence in Canada after age 18 plus 9 years of residence in Italy equals one-fortieth of an OAS pension payable in Canada;

(ii) 15 years of residence in Canada after age 18 plus 5 years of residence in Italy equals fifteen-fortieths of an OAS pension payable in Canada or abroad.

I caution old age pensioners to seek counsel. I hope the department will provide expert advice to these poor souls who are supposed to wander their way through this jargon in which these questions and answers are phrased.

In closing, may I say the bill was first introduced by the minister of health and welfare a long time ago. We were clearly informed that the United Kingdom was pressing us to sign such an agreement. In answer to a question put to him on June 21, 1977, as follows:

● (1817)

Have some countries indicated an interest in having reciprocal social security agreements with Canada?

The then minister answered:

Italy, the United States and the United Kingdom have been pressing for an agreement with us.

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that this bill was put through the House under false pretenses. I would like to know when and if the government intends to sign an agreement with the United Kingdom.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Caron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to answer the question of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon), as the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare stated in the House last Friday, November 18, negotiations have been going on with the United Kingdom since July. We still did not get any formal answer to the agreement proposal which has been discussed by the officials in July and was subsequently the subject of discussions between the Minister of Welfare of Great Britain and the Minister of National Health and Welfare of Canada.

All I can say now is that the technical problems will likely be solved and that Canada has asked the United Kingdom to give British pensioners living in Canada the same pension increases as are regularly being paid to British pensioners living in the United Kingdom. Naturally, it is the prerogative of the authorities of the United Kingdom to determine whether they will agree to give these raises to British pensioners who live in Canada as they have given them to British pensioners living in other countries with which the United Kingdom has signed social security bilateral agreements like, for instance, Turkey and Spain.

We believe that because of the strong links that exist and have always existed between the United Kingdom and Canada and because Canada automatically gives all people who are entitled to old age pension benefits and who live outside our frontiers all the increases in the pension benefits, which include the periodical readjustments linked to the cost of living index, the United Kingdom will want to treat on an equal basis all its retired nationals in Canada and in the United States, for instance, as well as those who live in countries which have signed social security bilateral agreements with the United Kingdom.

The hon. member for Victoria can rest assured that the government of Canada will do everything possible to convince the United Kingdom to sign as soon as possible an agreement which will be fair for British pensioners who have chosen to retire in Canada to live their old age near their children and grandchildren. As for us, we are ready to sign an agreement without delay. In reality, however, it takes two to negotiate. Even though the economic situation in the United Kingdom seems well on the way to recovery, our British counterparts tell us they have much difficulty finding the needed funds to meet Canadian requirements and give British pensioners in Canada equal treatment with British pensioners in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been withdrawn. I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

Motion withdrawn.

At 6.21 p.m. the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-11, to amend the statute law relating to income tax and to provide other authority for the raising of funds, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on Bill C-11, amendments to the Income Tax Act, I feel it my duty to express the views of those whom I represent that have been expressed to me in personal conversations, by letter and by telephone. If I did not rise in my place and make representations to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) I believe I would be derelict in my duty. I know I rise to speak to the considerable impatience of the government side of the House because just this afternoon they gave notice of a closure motion to limit debate. I believe it is completely wrong to muzzle debate in this House. Members should have every opportunity to put forward the views of those they represent.

The government would never have been in this bind if the Minister of Finance had been honest and had brought forth his amendment to the Income Tax Act in a proper budget address, with a time limit on debate according to the rules of procedure of this House. Had that been the case there would have been no need for the closure motion that now hangs over our heads. I make no apology to the government, therefore, if I take some time to express my views.

Canadian taxpayers view with alarm the continuous and oppressive increase in taxes. The percentage of tax Canadians pay in relation to the gross national product or total income is reaching the point where the economy is in grave danger. The government is like a giant octopus with tentacles, and hands at the end of the tentacles reaching into the pockets of taxpayers across the country. It severely cripples the right of citizens as individuals and of small companies to manage and determine their own economic destiny.

The government's attitude seems to be "Big Daddy knows best." He knows best how to spend our earnings! The federal government has the broadest tax base of any level of government in this country and therefore must bear the greatest responsibility for the increased tax burden on the citizens of Canada. So many government programs are those promised by politicians at election time and not programs sought by the citizens of this country, but rather are thrust upon them. It reminds me of the advertisements on television that try to sell things to people that they do not need. We have a government budget and government expenditures passing all reason.

I think the situation is set out very well as a fair warning to Canadian taxpayers in the July 7 edition of the Simcoe Reformer. An editorial refers to the opinions of Arthur Smith, a native of the town of Simcoe and former chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. The article began:

> Canada is becoming an over-governed nation whose spending policies, if allowed to continue at their present rate of increase, could gobble up all income in a few short years.

Later, the article continued:

> Discussing key Canadian policy issues last week, Smith said the danger signs were being recognized by both the public and government sectors which can see that neither individual freedoms nor collective interests were necessarily served well by bigger interventions by government. The question is: will government slacken off from its relentless pursuit of Canadians' incomes, resisting pressures prevalent within and without governments for more legislation and regulation?
>
> Smith saw some hope for a pullback resulting from growing public opposition to tax increases brought on by increased government expenditure. He anticipated governments looking uncertainly inwards in questioning their capacities to assume rapidly expanding responsibilities.
>
> Unless governments call a halt, a terrible price will be paid, Smith predicted. If governments maintain their rates of tax-grabbing and spending at the level of the past 10 to 15 years, simple mathematics demonstrates that all income will take the form of taxes and all spending will be by governments—federal, provincial and municipal—well before the end of this century. Taxpayers should take note and intensify their opposition to further intrusion on their pocket-books.

● (2012)

I think that is a pretty serious statement, and it was made by a man who commands some respect in economic circles in this land.

I want to turn to certain, specific interests in the government tax structure, and I want to discuss for a few moments the capital gains tax as it applies to family farms. First let us look at the history of the capital gains tax. It was introduced in 1971 following a presentation in a government white paper on tax reform.

The capital gain tax was explained in great detail. At the time the measure was debated here in the House of Commons the official opposition made a very urgent and eloquent plea to the government that the family farm should be exempt from capital gains tax. The government refused. It was adamant in its stand. It did make one minor concession, and that was a deferral of capital gains tax where a farm is sold by a father to a son and the farming enterprise is to be carried on. Then a few years later the government made another concession in the face of demands by Canadian taxpayers and of representations made on this side of the House, namely, that there should be a roll-over provision which would allow a farmer to sell his land and use the proceeds in one year to relocate in another farming enterprise. That was all well and good.

I think this makes one point very clear, and that is that the government does not have all the answers, nor does it understand fully and completely the plight the farmer finds himself in with respect to the capital gains tax. The government did make those two concessions, and we appreciate that. As I said, I think that simply tells all of us that government legislation is not always perfect.

The result of the capital gains tax program as first implemented was undue hardship and unwarranted debt loads for farms expropriated or under threat of expropriation. A sale had to be made, and made before the roll-over provision was enforced. The proceeds of sales were diminished by the capital gains tax so that in order to buy similar farms of equal economic viability it was necessary to go head over heels, as we sometimes say, into debt to get back into business again. I admit that has been partly remedied, but there are still hardships for the family farm owner. One of these is that instead of being owned by fathers or sons in partnership, many farm operations have been incorporated into closely held family farm limited companies. Because they are held by members of immediate families I can see no reason why the government should not treat this in the same manner it treats a family farm held by the head of the family, usually the father. However, up until this date the government has refused to give closely held family farm corporations this privilege. This is one of the hardships about which I am talking.

Another thing which should be pointed out is that the government does not seem to recognize that, as they go through life, farmers invest their profits and incomes from their farms back into their farms to improve buildings, to buy equipment, to buy more land and so forth. We sometimes say they plow back their earnings into the farm business. The same applies to the small businessman. He just does not have money or cannot raise money for major capital expenditures. The only way he can do this is to put his profits back into the business year after year. At the end of his years of operation, a farmer or small businessman sells his farm or business and hopes that this will be his retirement income or his pension.

A farmer or small businessman cannot keep his farm or business in a form that is saleable unless he keeps it up to date and puts to work the expenditures of which I spoke. When he does sell and hopes to have a retirement pension, what happens? The government steps in and takes a big slice by way of capital gains tax. By the time he buys a home in a town or village where he intends to retire, he has nothing left with which to earn a decent pension or upon which to retire and live out a decent life in his twilight years.

I think the matter was put pretty well in a letter I received from Mrs. Don Petheram of R.R. 5, Waterford, Ontario, which reads in part as follows:

> Most farmers and their wives work hard to pay off mortgages and to keep the farm going. A farmer doesn't have any retirement plan like other workers, whatever money he has left over after all expenses are met is put back into the farm to keep the business going.
> When the farmer sells his farm and retires it takes a good portion of the farm sale money to relocate and either build or buy a ready built house. The remainder of the money has to be put aside to keep the farmer until his death. By the time the government takes the large portion in capital gains tax it is demanding, what has the farmer left to retire on?

I have spoken about this in previous speeches here in the House of Commons and to various ministers of finance, and the answer I got from the ministers or their parliamentary secretaries was that the farmer has the same privilege as any other citizen of registering under a registered retirement savings plan. But he does not have that kind of money. As I pointed out before, he uses all his profits to re-invest and to keep his farm a viable operation. What I have said applies not only to farms but also to small businesses.

There is another unfair aspect of the capital gains tax, and that is the unfair and unjust way it is applied. Most of the argument is about the way auditors of the Department of National Revenue arrive at the valuation day value for a farm operation or for a small business. There is a continuous dispute. I receive numerous letters and phone calls from people who dispute the way government auditors arrive at fair market value on valuation day.

Many government auditors who come out to farms have no knowledge whatsoever of farm operations and what it takes to keep them viable. They learn their work from a textbook. They are instructed on how to value a farm and that they must not go beyond certain limits. In any event, they know nothing whatever of what value means to a farmer.

It seems to me that the government would be well advised to employ retired farmers or men who have had some experience and who know what a farm operation is. A man I know very well is well qualified in this regard. He is a retired farmer. He did valuation work for the Ontario government. He applied for a position with the Department of National Revenue and was refused. I simply could not understand why he was refused, because this man had some conception of what a farmer is up against.

Too much attention is paid to the speculative value of farmlands. The evaluator wants to value farms at the price which was in effect back on December 31, 1971. However, since that time inflation, and speculation by real estate people buying and selling land in the neighbourhood, or encroachment of metropolitan areas have put the price of the land out of all proportion to its value as farm land. This is a value that these auditors want to put on the value at the time of the sale. The discrepancy is far too great.

● (2022)

I want to again quote from the same gentleman. He has used some figures to illustrate what I am talking about. I will just quote that part of the letter which applies to this subject. I quote:

> Land was selling at $1,000 per acre and up prior to 1971 in this area, now the government is only valuing land at $350 per acre. If land did sell at a low price of $350 per acre in 1971, it was for estate purposes or financial reasons and does not mean the rest of us would sell for such a low price.
> Our houses we are told would be worth more if in town. A great many people prefer country living, and as for the cost of a house it costs just as much for materials and labour no matter where one builds. Why then is the assessment on our homes placed at such a low value? We trust you will reconsider this capital gains tax and at least put a fair value on our land and buildings.

The letter was written to the Minister to Finance and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Apparently they did not pay too much attention to it.

I have a note that I made during an interview with a farmer who came to talk to me about this problem, Mr. William H. Rittenhouse, of R.R. 2, Dunnville, Ontario. He found the same situation. The person who came to put the V-Day value had no conception of farm values or what a farm could earn. As a result, the farmers had a very high capital gain and resulting gains tax.

This man had a very novel proposal. In order to remedy this situation, he suggested starting with the sale value when the farmer sold his land and deducting 10 per cent each year, which roughly represented inflation, back to 1971. This would give a reasonable capital gains tax. I believe this proposal is worthy of consideration. It should at least be looked at by income tax auditors when determining value for capital gains tax purposes. If that formula is not adequate, there should be some other formula which will take into account the effect of inflation on the value of farm land.

I have made a major criticism about the capital gains tax and the way it is applied. There is a simple remedy to solve this. It would not cost the government all that much money. The Minister of Finance and the government should simply remove capital gains tax on family farms or small family businesses or a once in a lifetime sale. That is not unreasonable.

In addressing myself to this subject a year ago, I found that the amount of money the government realizes from capital gains tax on farmland is rather minimal compared to the administrative cost of calculating capital gains tax. I have made this proposal to successive ministers of finance, but it has always fallen on deaf ears. I hope the present minister will consider it. It has been suggested that a young man from Shawinigan Falls is out to make his mark in finance and economic affairs. Here is a novel proposal he might accept. He can then forget about the advice of the mandarins in his department. One simple step could solve all the hardships I have mentioned.

Another partial solution to this problem has been put forward by previous speakers on this side of the House. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) made an eloquent plea that closely held family farm corporations should have the same benefits in the roll-over privileges as are now enjoyed by the single farm owner. That makes a lot of sense. I will not expand on it because previous speakers from this side made a very formidable argument as to why this is entirely in keeping with fair taxation practices.

I now wish to turn to an entirely different topic, income tax on life insurance. I congratulate the government for giving up its intention to tax a portion of the death benefits. I am sure members from all sides of the House have written to and talked with the minister. He has at last seen the light. Because of that, I have great hope that he will pay some attention to what I said previously.

I am sure members of all parties have received letters from owners of insurance policies, and in particular from agents who sell insurance. I think I can take some credit for this. Modesty prevents me from taking full credit. However, there are two injustices that still remain.

A tax paying policy holder who takes out a loan on his insurance policy is taxed on that loan as though it were a portion of his income. That is nonsensical. If you make a loan from a bank, a trust company or a private individual, that is not counted as income. It has to be repaid. The same is true of an insurance loan. Most people who take out loans against their insurance policies repay them. If by chance they fail to pay them back, the amount is deducted from the proceeds when the policy matures.

There is no justification for that type of tax policy. If that is to be counted as income, it is reasonable to count as an expenditure the interest the borrower must pay on the loan. However, the government will not go along with that. It is beyond comprehension. After receiving representations from all sides of the House, I am sure the minister will listen to reason. The minister has gone part way. He must now be completely fair and just.

To point out some of the arguments in favour of that, I want to quote from a letter I received from the insurance industry. They wrote, and I quote:

> Unfortunately, two serious problems remain. I refer to the budget proposals (a) to tax the policyowner at the time of taking out a policy loan, and (b) to disallow the deduction of policy loan interest as an expense in any circumstances.

They then list some of the reasons why this is patently unfair, and I quote:

> A policy loan should be regarded as such because the loan is repayable out of the insurance proceeds if the policyowner does not repay the loan at an earlier date; > the policy loan provisions are a long established and valuable feature of life insurance as a form of property and it is discriminatory to deny the normal tax treatment for such loans;
> policy loans are normally taken in times of financial need or emergency which is a highly inappropriate time to levy an additional tax; . . . particularly hard hit would be small businesses which the government is committed to helping; life insurance policies are often the best or only source of ready cash for small business operators since the money can be obtained quickly at modest rates with no questions asked and no further collateral demanded;
> the use rather than the source of funds governs the deductibility of loan interest for income tax purposes; this proposed disallowance of policy loan interest is blatant discrimination against one source of money, namely, life insurance.

That is so reasonable and obvious I cannot understand why the minister will not take a sensible look at the problem.

Mr. Alexander: It is because he is bullheaded.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): I now want to deal with the federal sales tax that is levied against equipment used by public utilities in the various muncipalities across this country. I am referring to equipment used to keep the utility operational, to make installations and so on. I will not expand on the argument any more other than to read what was written to me by a municipal council in my area. The Dunnville Public Utilities Commission in the town of Dunnville passed a resolution. I believe a copy of this is in the hands of members on all sides of this House. This resolution sets it out better than I could do.

● (2032)

> Whereas exemption from federal sales tax and excise tax is provided for municipal water main material; whereas water and electric utilities supply essential services to the same clientele; whereas tax on equipment and materials used for electrical distribution contributes to the increasing cost of servicing housing subdivisions; whereas the benefit of tax reductions would ultimately benefit the end customers, be it resolved that an appeal be made to the Minister of Finance to consider legislation to exempt municipal electric utilities the federal excise tax on electrical distribution material and equipment.

You see, Mr. Speaker, what is good for one section of the public utilities industry is surely good for another, and there is no earthly reason why the government should not see its way clear to do this very thing it is being asked to do. After all, the tax which is presently imposed increases the cost of electrical services to those who purchase them.

I want to turn, now, to another subject and join in representations which have been made by a number of other speakers in this debate in connection with the inordinate amount of paperwork which has to be attended to by taxpayers, more particularly by small businessmen. They are snowed under by the number of government forms they must complete, and surely it is not beyond the ingenuity of public servants in the various government departments to simplify these forms greatly or to do away with them altogether. The income tax forms themselves are so complicated that small businessmen need to hire accountants to assist in their preparation. Even the ordinary taxpayer finds he cannot get all the deductions to which he is entitled unless he employs an expert to give him advice. I say: do away with the forms presently demanded by Statistics Canada, the Unemployment commission, and so on. There must surely be a way to make these procedures more simple.

I should like, now, to read into the record part of a letter from Mr. K. W. Jones of Caledonia, Ontario, who has, I believe, a legitimate complaint with regard to the government's proposal to tax fringe benefits which certain people enjoy. The letter speaks for itself. Mr. Jones writes:

> I am employed by an insurance company whose practice is to provide a mortgage to eligible employees as a company benefit. This benefit is taken into consideration when the company reviews the salary of an employee and is a method of keeping the salary at a lower level. I therefore believe that taxing us on this benefit would be grossly unfair and would also force the employer to review the salary.

Listen to what he says now:

> Many different occupational groups enjoy benefits which are not taxable. Employees of department stores receive discounts on purchases; airline and railway employees receive free passes, as do their families; superintendents of apartment buildings receive free accommodation; government employees receive free bus passes—

I should not have read that. That is not true.

> Members of parliament, to the best of my knowledge, receive free airline tickes, non-taxable, to be used in the course of their duties. These are only a few examples of the benefits received by employees.

I think my correspondent has put up a good case. If, as an employee, he can get a mortgage at a little below the usual rate, why should he be taxed on that amount, particularly when, as he says, other employees enjoy benefits with respect to which they are not taxed?

My final point has to do with a segment of the agricultural industry which is very important in the area I represent. I refer to the tomato industry. This industry faces a major crisis in Canada, indeed the threat of virtual extinction due to the importation of large volumes of tomato solids, usually in the form of tomato paste. The single most important barrier in the way of supplying current domestic consumption from within Canada is the continued over-exposure of the industry to dramatically fluctuating world market prices and conditions. Put very simply, the industry is threatened by the dumping of cheap tomato paste from countries where labour costs are very low.

Canadian tomato growers have the ability and technical competence to produce consistently all the tomato solids required by Canadian consumers at reasonable prices. However, they have been reluctant to commit themselves to capital expenditures on processing facilities because of the uncertainties which exist in the world market. What is required is some assurance that the industry here will not be forced into bankruptcy by unscrupulous dumping. Such an assurance can be made available to the industry if the government would impose an ad valorem tariff rate of 17½ per cent to become effective immediately.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

The situation was explained earlier this afternoon in terms more eloquent than I can command, by the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain) when he was dealing with this subject. Not only would such a duty as I have mentioned help the producers and the processors to expand, but it would mean a more stable price for Canadian consumers—they would not find a certain price quoted at the supermarkets one week, to be followed the week after by a price 50 per cent higher, with a subsequent reduction. Even more important, perhaps, is the number of new jobs which would be provided, not only on the farm but in the processing plants. The vegetable growers marketing board estimates there would be many thousands employed in the food industry, not only on the farm but in the processing industries.

I have tried to give the broad picture, Mr. Speaker. I have touched on a few aspects of the tax program of the government. I have talked about the inordinate, unfair, and ever-increasing tax burden of the taxpayers, and have pointed out that we will soon pass the point of no return. I have also touched on the capital gains tax, insurance, and protection for the farmer and processor of certain market garden crops. I hope what I have said will have some impact upon the Minister of Finance, and that when he sits down with his officials and makes some amendments shortly in committee of the whole, some of the matters I have raised will be taken into account.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity of speaking on Bill C-11 for a few moments. I will be one of the last to have the opportunity to speak on second reading since the government, in its usual, courageous way, has introduced closure. Since we have not had a budget debate it seems to me shocking that the minister is sneaking in this mini-budget. I found out this evening that not only is the government invoking closure, but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is putting conditions on the terms under which he will appear before the committee to debate economic policy. I have seen the Minister of Finance in the committee only once so far, and I would have thought that given his performance that time that he would want to come back to the Committee as often as he could in order to learn something about the portfolio that he is trying to administer.

I find it quite shocking that there should be a trade off between the number of times the Minister of Finance is willing to appear before an appropriately established committee of the House of Commons and how fast the opposition will put legislation through this House. It has never been intended that this sort of thing should happen in the House of Commons, and it is a shame that it is happening now.

I do not intend to dwell upon the details of Bill C-11. Rather I want to talk about one or two things which have become apparent as one examines the legislation before the House and, more important, as one listens to what the Minister of Finance has to say about it.

It has been pointed out many times the serious nature of the economic problems of this nation. We have the highest unemployment in Canada since the depression in terms of absolute numbers. We have continuing inflation. If it were not so serious, Mr. Speaker, we could laugh at the joke of the government talking about a 6 per cent inflation rate next year. There is no likelihood that inflation will be at that level. We also have one of the most serious balance of payments problems that we have had in our history.

What was so disappointing about the remarks of the Minister of Finance when he introduced the bill and talked about a minor tax cut was that he gave no indication whatsoever that the government was going to take a new approach to managing the economy. The direction in which the government is moving is so wrong, Mr. Speaker, and the policies the government has been pursuing during the last few years are not working.

How much evidence of this do we need? Unemployment keeps increasing. Inflation keeps increasing. Our balance of payments position keeps getting worse. We have always measured our economic performance against that of the United States and there is usually a six months' lag between what happens in the Canadian economy and what happens to that of the United States. We are out of that relationship now. Surely the government must see that its approach to economic policy-making in Canada is not working any longer.

One had hoped that in the mini-budget presentation of the Minister of Finance we would see at least a glimmer of some new approach to economic policy making, but that was not the case. This is very sad, Mr. Speaker, and it is not really the political consequences of this which are important. What is really important is that one million Canadians are not going to find any work this winter and our economic situation will continue to deteriorate.

How can it be that a country which ought to be one of the richest in the world, that has so many resources, keeps becoming poorer relative to other countries? As my hon. friend from York-Simcoe keeps telling the House, in terms of per capita real wealth in our country has slipped from second place in the world to tenth place. The countries of the world which are improving their economic position are the Middle East countries and other countries with resources. We have resources. Why are we mismanaging our economy so much that we are going in the wrong direction so far as economic activity is concerned?

One of the greatest myths presented to the Canadian people is that they are told that we cannot do anything about our economic performance, that we have to suffer through what we are experiencing today. It is not true, as the Minister of Finance alleged in committee the other day, that nobody knows how to solve the economic problems of the world, that we are all suffering to the same degree. This is just not so. Many countries around the world are improving their economic performance, while ours is getting worse.

Our trouble, Mr. Speaker, is that the Department of Finance is locked into a budget-making policy that no longer works. The department is still taking the position, as the Minister of Finance himself said the other night, that we can operate on old fashioned, Keynesian, gross expenditure economic policies of the sort we operated on in the early 1950's and 1960's. I say we cannot. A few years ago economists in the United States council of economic advisers and some economists in Canada were saying that we could fine tune the economy to determine how much unemployment and how much inflation we were going to have by adjusting gross tax revenues and gross expenditures. Well, we have given that up because it just did not work.

More important, Mr. Speaker, we have to give up the whole idea that we can manipulate levels of unemployment and inflation in this country by changing gross expenditures and adopting Keynesian theories. The reality—and this is the message I want to get across to the people of Canada this evening, and particularly to the Minister of Finance—is that if the Department of Finance continues to pretend that by making changes to the tax structure only or making extensive changes to expenditure patterns only we are going to solve unemployment and inflation and our balance of payments problem in Canada, then it is absolutely dead wrong. If the deparment continues to adopt this line, this nation will suffer even more tragic economic problems than it is facing at the present time.

It is calamitous to continue saying that we cannot solve our economic problems. We can solve them, Mr. Speaker, but we need a totally new approach. The totally new approach that the Minister of Finance and his department have to take begins with recognition that in a large country such as Canada, with its great regional differences, you cannot now use these former policies. Budgets and economic policies must now be designed to meet the needs of the various regions and sectors of this country.

For example, I find it unnecessary that in this country we have a fishing industry which is not one of the most productive in the world. How is it possible for the government to spend several years negotiating a 200 mile jurisdictional limit off our shores, and yet today we do not have as much as one refrigerator ship which is able to harvest the products of those waters? How is it possible that we are willing to accept 20 to 25 per cent unemployment in the Atlantic provinces and yet not develop a fishing industry? We have one of the largest coastlines of any country in the world, and yet we don't have an international fishing industry. Why don't we? Why hasn't the government done something about this? Why doesn't it start making its budget decisions in such a way as to make certain that we have one of the most competitive international fishing industries in the world?

How is it possible that in Canada between 1970 and 1975 we imported twice as much mining equipment as we exported? How can this be necessary when we have one of the major mining industries in the world? Why is Germany one of the leading countries in the world in the exporting of mining equipment? Why haven't we developed an industrial strategy that is based upon the resources that we have, and develop, for example, a mining machinery manufacturing industry in this country which is competitive with such industries all over the world. We import more pulp and paper manufacturing equipment than we export, which certainly should not be the case.

We have the incredible situation that we have an energy strategy in this country, if we can call it that, which calls for us in the 1980's to import a portion of our oil needs. We have the largest known reserves of oil in the world and yet, we are going to be net importers in the 1980's. Can you imagine the Japanese being in such a situation? Can you imagine the Germans? Instead of being a net earner of foreign exchange, we have so mismanaged our economy, and have so neglected our resources, that we are going to be net importers of oil in the 1980's, and which, by the way, we don't know now how we are going to pay for it. And so it goes in area after area.

There is no chance that our economy will start moving forward again unless the Department of Finance and the Minister of Finance take a look at the various industries we have in this country in the various sectors of the economy and bring forward tax policies and development policies that make it possible for such industries to operate efficiently and profitably.

Equally important, as the former minister of finance, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Sharp), said at a meeting the other day we must have a new way of making decisions about budgeting. The budget-making process in this country must become open. What we need to do right now, and if the Minister of Finance is serious in saying he wants to bring certainty back to the economy, what he should be doing is calling in leaders from the various industries around this country, and asking them what they need to make them efficient and competitive. From this information he should be starting to establish policies that will be effective in getting the country moving again. Budget-making must be brought out of the closet. It most be open, so that the people of the country, the businessmen of the country, the entrepreneurs of the country know what the government is planning.

The government must also have the courage to make its forecasts about employment, unemployment and inflation public so that business can make plans according to these estimates. Moreover, if the estimates are wrong the minister should come before the House of Commons or before a committee of the House of Commons, and explain why they are wrong.

I don't think Canadians realize the full extent of the economic problems with which they are faced. We have seen the dollar decline. The Minister of Finance has claimed that we have a floating dollar, and I would agree with him that the government has not tried to stabilize the dollar at 90 cents, or 92 cents, or 88 cents, although it has had to use a great deal of foreign exchange to keep the dollar from going down further than it has. There is no way that the dollar is not going to decline more if the government maintains the same sort of economic environment as we are operating in at the present time. The Minister of Finance has a real responsibility to change that environment so that the dollar will not go much lower. Every time the dollar drops we get more inflation, and every time we get more inflation we get less investment. Every time we get less investment, we get more unemployment. Unless we do something about this situation we are going to have a never-ending problem that is precisely the same as the one the British found themselves in in the 1950's and 1960's.

If you examine those countries that have prospered since World War II and those countries which have not, the countries which have prospered have devalued their currency the least. The countries which have had the greatest amount of difficulty are the ones which have devalued their currency the most. How sad it will be if we are now following the British in terms of the management of our economy, and yet that is the direction in which we are going. The constant decline of the dollar will not solve any of our problems.

One of the things I find quite remarkable in Canada in the last decade, is the changing view which is held by the Minister of Finance about his responsibility, and indeed the way in which the press measures the success or failure of the Minister of Finance. It used to be that a minister of finance almost took for granted that he was politically expendable. The reason for this was because strong ministers of finance were always willing to take those actions that were important for the country, regardless of the political consequences which might result. We don't find this happening any more. When have we had a minister of finance in the last few years who has really been willing to take the tough actions that are necessary to turn the economy around? The characteristic feature of the way in which the economy has been managed, and of the way in which ministers of finance have operated recently, has been that they have talked strong and done nothing.

An hon. Member: Travel to Florida!

Mr. Gillies: Nothing has been done. We may, this winter have a $1.5 billion to $2 billion deficit in the travel account. We haven't heard a word from the government of doing anything about this. Why not? Because it is an unpopular topic.

When can we have some action on the part of government to start solving some of the problems that we have before us? Business cannot do anything if the government does not provide some leadership and policies. And yet government is unwilling to provide leadership on issues which are so important. Part of the tragedy of the last few years in economic management of this country is that politics has always taken precedence over economics. As long as this happens, as long as we have a situation where the government is afraid to take tough action to try to bring the economy back into shape, we are doomed to continue our decline.

We have other very peculiar situations. I was interested in reading the speech the other night of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, talking in the House of Commons. Here is one of the men with the levers of economic power in this country, who doesn't understand that it is the amount of money that is put into the system that causes inflation. He did not understand the fundamental, basic, underlying causes of inflation that are examined in any elementary economic text. This senior minister of the Crown is supposed to be responsible for some of our economic management, and he does not understand what is going on.

Any Canadian who has listened to the debate on this bill, and particularly any Canadian who has watched what the new Minister of Finance has said and the manner in which he has dealt with the economy so far, has to be very, very apprehensive. The Minister of Finance has said nothing in this Chamber, or in committee, or so far in this debate to indicate that the government is prepared to take a fundamentally new approach to the management of the economic policy of the country. Yet the evidence is in. How long do we have to go along with increasing unemployment, inflation, and a deteriorating balance of payments before knowing something is wrong with the policies utilized by the government?

The former minister of finance, Mr. Turner, did a great disservice to this nation by going around and saying nothing could be done. That is wrong. And it is not enough to say that our problems are the result of the world situation. It is just not true. The problems are within ourselves and arise because we are not prepared to change the direction of our policies, away from something which served us well in the fifties and sixties but which started going wrong in the seventies.

If the Minister of Finance wants to make a great contribution to the well-being of this nation, he will start immediately to scrap the way in which our budget-making has been done in the past. He will move to analysing the various sectors of the economy in order to find out what has to be done in each of these sectors in order to make them prosperous once again. He must deal with the people who are managers in those areas. He must bring them to Ottawa and start constructing the budget from the knowledge that they bring. Then we will have a reasonable chance of making progress in this country.

If a budget is brought down in the spring which is built around a fundamental economic policy and theory—a macro-approach that general cuts in taxes, and changes in expenditures will solve our problems—it will not work, and we will be faced with an even more devasting situation than we have now and it is not sufficient for ministers of finance to hide behind politics, because the problems are too serious.

Mr. Chrétien: Let us vote on it.

Mr. Gillies: For far too long ministers of finance in this country have been judged on their political skills and not on their economic capabilities. We know what the difficulties in the nation are. We hope the new Minister of Finance will appreciate what we are losing with one million people out of work, increasing inflation, and the falling dollar. We hope the Minister of Finance will have the courage to come up with a new, open system of budgeting which will help make this country prosperous again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) and other Conservatives, I sometimes wonder if this is not an Alice in Wonderland place.

Mr. Paproski: Go ahead, Alice.

Mr. Rodriguez: Here we go again.

Last March the former minister of finance brought down a budget wherein he accepted 8 per cent unemployment and a million persons unemployed. Now the Conservatives criticize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for saying we have to live with one million unemployed. Mr. Darcy McKeough, the treasurer of Ontario, that darling of the Chatham Chamber of Commerce, indicated that Mr. Macdonald was a brave man and that he supported his budget. He was prepared to accept 5.3 per cent unemployment in Ontario as full employment. How can they suck and blow at the same time? That is completely beyond me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Hon. members can make all the smart remarks they want, but I know when I touch a sensitive point.

About nine months ago, in February, I recall we had a similar tax bill. I spoke for some time opposing that particular tax bill. If some of the Conservatives had pulled their weight, perhaps there would have been an important change in the tax bill, rather than people ending up being screwed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what Liberals do when they bring in a tax bill. Nine months ago I opposed that tax bill on the basis that it did nothing with respect to the question of unemployment. Here we are nine months later dealing with a similar type of tax bill, and I oppose bill C-11 as well.

Whenever Conservatives and Liberals talk about the unemployment problem they have consistently refused to take any positive action with respect to it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the cabinet ministers opposite have indicated that we cannot create employment in this country and that we have to leave that to the private sector. They have indicated that this is the way we have to go—the private sector or the free enterprise system will save us. Either that or we are waiting for the American economy to pick up. We are waiting for the bugles to blow and for the American cavalry to come over the hill and save us.

Mrs. Pigott: We need to make more friends.

Mr. Rodriguez: There is the "Cookie Monster" again. Members opposite have indicated that the private sector will create employment opportunities, but we have to give them tax breaks and concessions in order for them to accomplish that. They say we have to provide the wherewithal for them to create employment opportunities.

Just a couple of summers ago the government wiped out the Opportunities For Youth program and indicated that it would no longer get involved in the business of creating youth employment but would leave it to the private sector. That summer youth unemployment reached very high levels.

As recently as Tuesday, November 15, in answer to a question in the House, the Prime Minister said that there are measures before parliament in Bill C-11 that will increase productivity, and that somehow or other we have to increase productivity. Also he indicated that tax concessions will have to be given in order to increase productivity, and that jobs will flow as a result of increased productivity. What are these measures which the government indicates will create increased productivity in the country?

The Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers were talking about a $1.2 billion give-away in Bill C-11, to the corporate sector in order to increase productivity, and the hope is that some jobs will be created as a result of that. The fact of the matter is there is no evidence to indicate that any kind of tax concessions in the past to the private sector created job opportunities to help solve our unemployment crisis.

The government knows very well that over the next ten years the economy must create 2.5 million jobs, and when we put that together with the present 1.5 million unemployed, we must come up with four million jobs over the next ten years. But according to all the estimates of all the experts, the major capital programs that we have going in this country, such as the Athabasca tar sands, the James Bay project, and the pipeline program, can only create about three million jobs. So we will still be short about one million jobs ten years down the road. Has the government developed any kind of economic strategy to deal with the problem? Has it developed any national economic strategy to deal with the economy? Absolutely not.

We on this side of the House, the NDP, have been urging national economic planning for as long as I can remember, since I joined this party and long before I joined it. We say that economic planning must take place in this country. But both Liberal and Conservative members have always looked on economic planning as some sort of communist bugaboo. They think that only communists plan, and the minute you start talking about economic planning, they think you are some sort of communist. They seem to have only one solution to the problem, and that is free enterprise. Indeed they use that term in much the same way that Aladdin used his lamp. They seem to believe that if they repeat the phrase "free enterprise" often enough, somehow or other all the problems in the economy will disappear. But nothing is disappearing; the unemployment problem is not disappearing, and that is a sad fact indeed.

In December of 1975, the Prime Minister in his conversation with Bruce Phillips put his finger on the nub of the problem when he said that the free enterprise system was failing. In effect, he said that the government should involve itself more in the economy. You should have heard the news media, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the Conservative party react to those words. You would have thought that the heavens were falling when the Prime Minister said that the free enterprise system was failing us. The Prime Minister and his cronies on that side of the House ran for cover when the flack started to come. In effect the Prime Minister got to the nub of the problem, but then he backed away from the solution.

Mrs. Pigott: It is the government that has failed us.

Mr. Rodriguez: Both the government and the official opposition support the free enterprise system, and both are failing the country.

Mr. Alexander: That is why you have only 16 seats.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: One always knows when one has touched a sore spot. Here are the defenders of the free enterprise system.

Mr. Martin: Would the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) permit a question at this time?

Mr. Rodriguez: I always welcome questions from the other side. If the hon. member wants to put a question, let him go ahead.

Mr. Martin: In view of the hon. member's comments on the free enterprise system—he seems to be condemning both this side and the official opposition for supporting that system—I should like to ask him if he is firmly committed against all forms of free enterprise.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is a delight to answer that question, and as I go through my speech this evening I will unfold before the hon. member the socialist alternative.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: The alternative to the laissez-faire free enterprise system.

An hon. Member: Skip that speech.

Mr. Rodriguez: They can call out all they want, Mr. Speaker, but the fact remains that they have given every single thing to the private sector. What more can you give? They have given tax concessions, they have given grants, they have given them all sorts of tax breaks, but where are the jobs? Just answer that question.

Now I will present to you the socialist alternative. Here we have in Bill C-11 further give-aways. We have here a $1.2 billion give-away to the corporate sector. On what analysis of the economy is that based? Is there any strategy, is there a sector by sector analysis of the economy with respect to what is wrong with the mining sector or the manufacturing sector?

Have ministers delineated those sectors and examined them? Is the mini-budget they presented in Bill C-11 designed with that sort of analysis in mind? No, it is not, not at all. It is just dropped in a vacuum because they have to win back the corporate sector in terms of electoral support. There is an election coming up next spring so their bagman has to go around collecting money from the corporate sector.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) has been tripping through northern Ontario. He is the guy who has to bring back three NDP seats. They had him tripping to INCO and Falconbridge, but nobody told him they are supposed to be in economic trouble and cannot contribute much. What this bill is doing is again giving $1.2 billion to the corporate sector, with no kind of strategy. It is dropping that sum of money into a vacuum.

The Prime Minister said we must stimulate productivity. The manufacturing sector in this country is operating at only 80 per cent capacity, so why are we stimulating the economy to produce goods we cannot sell?

Coming close to home, a couple of weeks ago INCO laid off 3,400 people effective in February of 1978. Under Bill C-11 INCO will get $10 million to stimulate productivity. I suggested that they should stockpile nickel, but the Prime Minister said that stockpiling is not the answer because one has to sell the nickel. But I ask you, will giving $10 million to INCO help sell the nickel that is stockpiled now? If it would help sell nickel, I would give them $40 million so we could keep the jobs. But I know it will not sell the nickel, and yet INCO will take the $10 million.

Here we have a government that will hand out $1.2 billion in complete isolation, regardless of whether those sectors need the stimulation or not. Everybody gets it, it is carte blanche, it is a blanket approach which has not worked in the past, will not work now, and in fact will never work.

The problem raised by the INCO lay-offs is very important because it brings into focus the problems with respect to the economy of Canada, it brings them effectively into perspective. Here you have a resource economy. You have here a country that has depended for a long time on taking resources out of the ground and selling them. We have never looked on the resources of Canada as the key to unlocking greater sources of wealth. I see here the hon. member for Don Valley, the man who made a great speech in Toronto and said we should not be ashamed to be known as hewers of wood and drawers of water, and we should sell those resources.

Mr. Gillies: I never did.

Mr. Rodriguez: That was the Gillies give-away stand. We have never looked at those resources as the key to unlocking greater sources of wealth for our country. What we have done with the handouts and tax concessions given to companies like INCO is to speed up exploitation of the resources in the ground. This is called high grading. They have taken the highest ores out very quickly and made money. Then they move beyond the borders of Canada and establish what is called in the corporate world, "market dominance" in other ores, especially lateritic ores.

• (2122)

I recently appeared on the "Sunday Morning" CBC radio program with the president of Noranda, Mr. Alfred Powis. He said that if INCO had not gone to Indonesia and Guatemala some other country would have gone, and asked me if it was not better that INCO should go. I was amazed to open a newspaper a few days later and see that same argument made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). I relished the opportunity to respond to that type of question, Mr. Speaker. As I said to Mr. Powis, that is a legitimate goal for INCO. If I were on the board of directors I would want to establish market dominance in lateritic ores in Indonesia and Guatelama. But the question must be asked if that is a legitimate goal for Canada.

Does our government exist, does our tax system exist, does our economic system exist to give INCO, Falconbridge, Noranda and Alcan market dominance? Are we monkeys on the corporate string? I say we are not, and anyone in this Chamber worth his salt as a Canadian would say that is not acceptable. That has not been said, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members opposite have crawled and purred like tabby cats. When the catnip is whipped in front of them they purr and do not say anything to INCO.

Are the goals for INCO the goals for Canada? Are we saying what is good for INCO and Falconbridge is good for Canada? I say they are not. We have been caught, however, and have to continue giving them tax concessions because they hold a sword of Damocles over our heads and say they will close down completely if the tax concessions do not continue.

Just to point out how phony some members on the Liberal benches are, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a speech made on behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) in Yellowknife when he said:

> It is clear from recent experience that anticipation of major projects is fragile footing for economic development. It is also the case that even when a major project does proceed, local benefits may be few or the local economy ends up dependent on a single economic activity. Look at Sudbury today or the Yukon during the Anvil strike and you'll understand what I mean. For the long term development of a northern economy, we must avoid hanging our hopes solely on the development of non-renewable resources.

The Liberals have been selling out this country for the best part of 50 years and this member admits it. They have sold us down the drain. Their policy depends on the exploitation of our non-renewable resources without any concept of how that policy fits into a national economic plan or strategy. A national economic plan is the first thing we have to look at, and then consider the role of resources within that strategy.

When INCO came to Canada it was the last of the J. P. Morgan enterprises that was not broken up. He moved the operation to Canada in 1928 because at that time the United States government was starting to break up monopolies. He is reported to have said that Canada was a sanctuary from high taxes and the threat of anti-trust. Forbes Magazine could have added a further description of Canada, namely, no interference from Canada's elected representatives, either provincial or federal, in terms of economic planning and social accountability.

Where is the social accountability in INCO laying off 3,400 workers? There is no social accountability whatsoever in the way corporations operate in this country. What more could we have done? Under the government's policy of non-interference what more could we have done for INCO? Their taxes have already been deferred to the tune of $378 million, and the Economic Development Corporation gave them low interest loans of $70 million in order to move into Guatemala and Indonesia. They have been given depreciation allowances, "Roads to Resources" grants, postponements and alterations of their pollution abatement programs, and even a pollution abatement grant of $15 million to INCO for the "super stack", but there is no recourse for residents whose property has been damaged by pollution from the two operations in Sudbury to obtain compensation.

The company has been notified when government inspectors were coming to see the premises to ensure that they complied with the safety laws. The province has allowed a suspension of overtime certificates, and so the company could have the workers on overtime to accumulate the present seven-months' stockpile of nickel at Port Colborne and Sudbury. Bill C-11 is a $10-million reward to INCO for eliminating 3,400 jobs in the Sudbury Basin, Thompson, and Port Colborne.

We could not have done anything more for them in terms of handouts, and how did they show their gratitude? The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) told this House that he was only notified the night before the public announcement, of the layoffs. The minister of labour in Ontario was also informed the night before. So INCO did not even take the federal and provincial governments into their confidence.

In an interview with a Toronto Star reporter the vice-president of INCO, Mr. W. Curlock admitted that there is no doubt that third world countries like Indonesia and Guatemala are much more likely to act against INCO if it took measures which would seriously affect their social and economic development programs.

They would not even try that stunt in those countries. We have always criticized third world countries as being banana republics, but we have become the banana republic of North America. We have allowed them to come here and operate in any way they want. We have consistently stood on the sidelines and said, "free enterprise, free enterprise, free enterprise". Now we find ourselves having given away our resources and mortgaged the future of the country, and we have no jobs to show for it all.

None of the bulk of research and development for INCO is done in Canada. It is done in the United States and Great Britain. None of the research and development in Falconbridge is done in Canada. We have not reaped the benefits we should have with relation to our resources.

And when these companies do not get their way we get threats. For example, I attended a luncheon where Mr. Jack McCreedy, President of INCO, Canada, spoke. He said there were three factors affecting INCO in Canada. That remark was made months before the announced lay-offs. The three factors he put forward were the following. He said that the federal and provincial governments were taxing INCO to the hilt. Second, he said labour costs had a nullifying effect on the company's ability to sell its nickel. Third, he said there was pressure being brought to bear on the government by interest groups in society with respect to environmental clean-up in the mining industry. He said this was forcing the company to put out extensive amounts of capital to improve the environment and clean up pollution at INCO plants. He said these were all negative factors with respect to the carrying on of business in this country. That was a very clearly implied threat.

Then we have the speech of Mr. John Bonus, who was speaking to the Association of Mines' Ministers in Quebec this past summer. He said there was close to $2 billion in mining development and expansion projects involving the creation of 18,000 new jobs. He said they were ready to begin, provided relief was given to company taxation rates. Mr. Bonus is the managing director of the Mining Association of Canada. He was saying there were 18,000 new jobs on the drawing board and $2 billion in mining investment, and all the government had to do was come up with the appropriate tax breaks and concessions and these plans would be implemented. Does this government really know what is taking place in the mining sector of the economy?

We have charged that there is an inability to plan the economy. Because there is a lack of any kind of national economic plan we find that the government is unaware of what the reserves of nickel and copper in this country are.

Why is it that we find that we have to import processed nickel from the Philippines for the mint in Winnipeg to manufacture coinage?

Why is it that nickel carbonate has to be imported from the Philippines, unloaded at Vancouver, and sent to the Sherritt Gordon Mines at Fort Saskatchewan for refining? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said that the process at the Sherritt Gordon refinery at Fort Saskatchewan is different in terms of the kind of nickel carbonate produced in the Sudbury operation. Chemical engineers tell us that that is a lot of malarkey. Nickel carbonate is nickel carbonate, and there is no reason in the world why the Sherritt Gordon operation cannot use nickel carbonate from the Sudbury operation. Keep in mind Sherritt Gordon closed its nickel mine at Lynn Lake last year and laid off some 300 workers, yet we find that the same company is being allowed to bring in nickel carbonate to this country to process at their smelter at Fort Saskatchewan.

Why is it that Falconbridge is permitted to ship nickel matte from its operation in the Sudbury Basin to be refined in its refinery in Norway, while at the same time the INCO refinery at Port Colborne is laying off workers because it cannot keep up its refining capacity?

There is only one logical conclusion, and that is that there is no strategy. The left hand does not know what the right hand is doing with respect to the various sectors of our economy. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was very surprised to find out that the Japanese have had a temporary import tariff on processed nickel into Japan. At least the Japanese are well aware of the need to protect their refining sector with respect to nickel and copper. We in Canada seem to be the only ones in the world who believe in free trade. The Japanese have had a temporary tariff of 13 per cent on imported processed nickel for years now, yet we have no such tariff.

Then we have the spectre of Alcan closing down in St. Lawrence and laying off the whole work force of that town. The whole town is dependent on the Alcan mining company which closed down. Where did it go? It went to Mexico to get the fluorspar it needs for its operations in Canada. Who do you think owns the fluorspar mine in Mexico? Noranda. Mr. Powis admitted that Alcan had a contract with Noranda to buy fluorspar for use in Alcan's Canadian operations.

They must think we are the stupidest people this side of Wonderland. We have allowed them to prostitute us with respect to our resources. We have allowed it. It is not rape, because we have consented to it. We have allowed them to operate in any way they have wished. They shift capital around. And we have no currency control. We have Noranda and Falconbridge laying off workers, and yet those companies just entered into a contract with the Chilean junta to invest $1 billion in Chile to exploit the copper resources there. We say that our currency can go wherever the multi-nationals want it to go.

This government is liable and culpably responsible for the unemployment problem in this country. The government opposite sits there in its arrogance, without responding to the need to say to corporations that the people elected a government, and that the government will set the rules and plan the economy for its people. The government should determine how these corporations are to operate within our system. The government has refused to take that kind of position.

Mrs. Pigott: There is a good company up in Timmins.

Mr. Rodriguez: The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) talks about Timmins. We have the Lang-Muir mine which just laid off 350 workers.

Mrs. Pigott: Not that one.

Mr. Rodriguez: It closed down completely.

Mrs. Pigott: What about the one Canada owns? We haven't had a lay-off there.

• (2142)

Mr. Rodriguez: We have a Texas-Gulf operation in which the CDC owns shares.

Mrs. Pigott: We have not had a layoff there.

Mr. Rodriguez: Texas Gulf is coming. They are moving northward. It is obvious that the natural resources of this country are mortgaged against short-term political gains. One of the sad facts is that once this system gets going, we are caught up in the treadmill of giving and giving.

In 1976 we had a deficit as a result of Canadian funds flowing out of this country in direct investment abroad, mostly in mining. In effect, the government wants to balance that. The only way to do it is to encourage foreign investment in Canada. In effect what we do is get caught in the vicious circle of encouraging more foreign ownership in the economy and all that it entails. The minister can nod her head from behind the curtain like a Punch and Sauvé show.

I was on a T.V. program recently—

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Considering the conditions in this House, the bright lights and the noise, I would like to move a motion that we have a quorum of one in this House because this is very hard on us.

Mr. Alexander: What kind of nonsense is this?

Mrs. Holt: I thought maybe the present speaker could stay to make his speech. He has been going on very long. I think he has gone beyond his time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would miss the hon. lady. Maybe we should carry on the way we are doing.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is typical of the arrogance of Liberal members. When the heat gets too much, they want to leave the kitchen. That is the Liberal coward's way out. I was on a program the other day with the hon. member for Matane (Mr. De Bané).

Mrs. Holt: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said something about our place being in the kitchen. One of the members suggested that our place is in the kitchen. I think we are doing very well in the House of Commons and can do without that kind of chauvinist remark.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will repeat my remark. I said that is typical of the arrogance of Liberal members, and whenever it gets too hot they want to get out of the kitchen. If the hon. lady does not see herself in the kitchen, that is fine. She can stay here and participate in the debate.

I was on a program not very long ago with the hon. member for Matane, a Liberal member. In response to a question by the interviewer as to what can be done about the economy, he said in a very doleful manner that there is nothing that can be done because the government has lost the will to do anything about the economic problems of this country. At least there is one honest Liberal.

As if to confirm that, on Wednesday, November 16, the Minister of Finance responded to a question from my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). My leader asked the following question:

I want to get it very clearly from the finance minister. Is he saying that this corporation can respond in this way, a corporation which is making hundreds of millions of dollars profit annually and which has benefited from the labour of the people in that town for many, many decades, and that there is nothing the Government of Canada can do in face of that action by the Corporation?

The minister replied:

The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

That is typical. They cannot do anything. They just sit on their hands and warm their seats. If they had any kind of intestinal fortitude, they would call in the president of INCO and the president of Falconbridge. They would tell them not to lay anybody off. They would sit down with them to find ways and means of reducing their production levels of nickel and copper. They should be told that laying off 3,400 workers is not in the best interest of Canada and Canadians, that they should keep on those workers. Then should follow an economic strategy for that sector of the economy.

We in this country have always socialized the losses in the mining industry, never the profits. It is time the government started thinking in a serious way about national economic planning with an investigation, sector by sector. It could then design a budget that fits the needs of that particular sector and present that to parliament, rather than this sort of ad hocery in a vacuum.

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, in view of the closure motion put forth today by the government, I do not intend to take my full time allotment to participate in this budget debate on Bill C-11. I am certain there are many members, if not on the other side, certainly on this side, who want to put forth suggestions and recommendations. That is their obligation and duty as they represent their constituencies.

Sustained opposition to tax measures should not be muffled by a closure motion. Indeed, when warranted, such opposition is necessary and should be encouraged. Sustained opposition has paid dividends in the past, and it would be no problem to recite many examples of them.

For example, the provision for the deferral of capital gains tax on family farms would not have been brought forward by the government in 1972 or 1973 if it had not been for many members of this side making continuous representations. On that point we are convinced that the deferral which now exists on family farms should be extended to partnerships and to farms that are incorporated.

Second, the deferral of a capital gains tax provision, if reinvested in a similar business, would not be in this Bill C-11 if it had not been for members on this side of the House making representations. Another example is the deferral of certain moneys received from compensation payments if reinvested within a two year period. I am convinced we would not have that measure if it had not been for a number of members on this side making representations to ministers of finance. I am certain that provision could be and should be extended to apply to all forced sales.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

We on this side certainly talked a great deal also about the need to provide incentives to business.

Another example is the removal of legislation to tax earned income payments on death benefits from insurance policies. I recognize that the government has backed off somewhat on that provision. I am certain that over the past number of months members from all sides have received representations from their constituencies. Some may say that many of the representations were from insurance companies and insurance salesmen. I checked my file of correspondence. Although some representations were received from insurance companies and salesmen, many have come to me from a number of policy holders.

This provision has been of great benefit to a large number of people, particularly in the small business community where their only source of backing in a good number of cases is the fact that they hold a fairly good insurance policy and they can rely on that. As far as we are concerned, the government should back off completely from that measure.

Another evidence of the way in which sustained opposition has provided great benefit to the Canadian people is the fact that the gun legislation ended up by being much less offensive than the government had intended.

With regard to the recommendations of the standing committee in connection with the election expenses bill I am sure that if anyone examines the record he must accept the fact that it was members on this side, particularly our leader—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Wise: An hon. member asks "Which one?" There is no question which one. There has only been one, and with any luck the hon. member who made that remark will be on this side of the Chamber after the next election and the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will be Prime Minister of Canada. A great deal of credit is due the Leader of the Opposition for getting the government to realize the shortcomings of that piece of legislation.

These are but a few of the gains made by the country as a result of sustained interest in debate and because of a vigilant opposition. Many of these gains are still inadequate. Nevertheless, all have been made possible by continuous representations on the part of members on this side.

I shall not quarrel with the incentives offered by the minister to the business community. It is hoped that sufficient stability can be achieved in our economy and that business will be in a position to take advantage of these measures. So far it has not chosen to do so even though most of the incentives available appeared in the budget of March 31. The future does not look particularly promising with controls still in effect, record government spending, a record government deficit, the 90-cent dollar, and continuing confrontation between government and the business and labour sectors.

On the other hand, I must seize this rare occasion to applaud the Minister of Finance upon the introduction of the provision allowing for deferral of capital gains taxes in cases where farmland is sold and the money is subsequently used to purchase similar land. I recognize that this principle applies also to transactions engaged in for the improvement of a business. We in the opposition have been promoting this change for many years. It will enable some farmers to stay in business, and assist others to make improvements which are vitally necessary to the continuance of their operations.

In the past, as hon. members know, farmers have been unable to make what would amount, virtually, to a simple exchange of land to their mutual benefit because of the effects of the capital gains tax upon the transaction. This new provision will assist producers who wish to expand their operations but who were previously reluctant to do so. In addition, perhaps, a few smaller operators will be encouraged to hang on and not to get out of business completely. Unfortunately, this may well be another case of too little too late.

Many of the smaller farmers and operators have already been driven out of business by inequitable tax laws, and I believe the trend to larger holdings will be very difficult to reverse. We on this side do not support the idea that bigger is always better. It will certainly take more than this partial concession by a government which seems bent on destroying family farm operations to bring an end to recent developments. In fact, even in this matter of reinvestment, the new tax provision does not go far enough.

A once-in-a-lifetime exemption from capital gains tax on the sale of farm property could go much further in encouraging producers to expand and improve. It is certainly not too much to ask, and it is far from a radical request. I might remind the minister that there are some in the farm community whose demands stretch further than this. What they are suggesting is the complete elimination of all capital gains tax on the sale of food lands. I should like the Minister of Finance to undertake a study of the financial ramifications of such a move. I am certain the results would indicate massive savings to the industry and a very minor loss to the treasury in terms of total revenue.

Capital gains taxation has resulted in sharp increases in land prices. In most cases, land prices do not really reflect the real value or revenue producing potential of the property concerned. On this subject of capital gains I want to point out that the application of this tax to farm land has resulted in an inflationary increase in the price of that land. Many landowners find, at some point, that they have to sell for one reason or another. Before doing so they usually check with the local office of the Department of National Revenue to determine just how much they would have to pay in the form of capital gains tax consequent upon the sale. Suppose the property were selling for $100,000 and they found they would have to pay $10,000 or $12,000 in taxes on the sale of the land. Automatically they add that amount to the price they are asking, and the net result is an inflationary increase in the price of the land.

All of us have been very much aware of the effect of inflation upon the economy. But the government has certainly failed to recognize the effect inflation is having on the farm community. People in the primary sector of the agricultural industry are very heavy spenders. This is not because of any human failing but because of the demands of their operations. They have no choice. But no adjustments in the area of capital gains tax and the like are made to compensate the industry for the increasing inflationary trend. Small businessmen are adversely affected in the same way.

If capital gains taxes are to remain, I would suggest an upward adjustment of the base value of assets in accordance with an inflation factor to end the taxation of illusory capital gains. It is obvious that in an inflationary economy some or all of the capital gains are illusory in real terms because of the declining real value of money. In Canada unfortunately, I might add, it seems to be declining at a rate faster than most of us can keep up with. What I am suggesting, Mr. Speaker, is an end to this kind of taxation. This position, the minister might note, is winning increasing support among the business community and has already been endorsed by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the joint taxation committee of the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants.

Another related issue to which I and other members have alluded previously is the plight of the farm spouse at tax time. It is almost impossible to believe that such a grossly unfair situation can be allowed to exist in Canada in 1977. Surely our society has progressed further than this. Where else can a person work seven days a week, often 12, 14 or 16 hours a day, yet receive no remuneration whatsoever? For example, the farm wife often makes a very important and crucial contribution to the success of the farming operation. More often than not, her knowledge, influence, and many and varied day-to-day functions are invaluable, yet under our present law a farmer is able to hire and to deduct as an allowable expense almost everybody except his wife. A farm operator can hire his neighbour, his neighbour's son or daughter, even his neighbour's wife, and treat such expenditure as an allowable expense.

The only way that a spouse or other family members who work on the family farm can be entitled to payment is if the farm incorporates. This is often a very long, expensive, and complex procedure, but if this is done they pay lower taxes on the first $100,000 and pay their legitimate labour fees on the farm. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a catch; if they should choose to pass the farm on to the next generation, then they lose the tax deferral provision under existing tax laws.

This represents further evidence of the government's seeming prejudice against family farm operations. We have heard stories about the rage of the farm wife at income tax time, and I am sure we all share that rage. I call upon the government to terminate immediately the perpetuation of such gross indecencies and to put forward some meaningful changes to the tax laws.

I also call upon the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and the Minister of Finance to set up meetings immediately in order to address themselves to these difficulties. If the Minister of Finance and Minister of Agriculture have some problem getting together, I suggest the Minister of Finance should meet with the leaders of the farm organizations of this country, because I am certain both would have a great deal to talk about.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has listed many suggestions covering both substantive legislative changes and the correction of the many inequities now present in our Income Tax Act. I heartily concur with the federation's recommendations, some of which I should like to review at this time for the benefit of the Minister of Finance and his cabinet colleagues. For instance, let me consider the provisions to enable a farmer to assign land to an appropriate form of retirement savings plan so he may retain his funds for investment for use on the farm. We have talked about this many times. I know that my colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), has brought this idea forward many times in debates in the past, and I am certain such provision could also be applied to farm income. The result would be an independent, self-financing stabilization plan.

The agricultural industry needs an increase in the present $1,000 per year capital gains exemption on farms to $2,000 per year in order to recognize at least a percentage of inflation since 1971. Provisions are also needed for a statistically determined upward adjustment of valuation day values for farm land, particularly when valuation day coincided with a demonstrable period of abnormally depressed prices. I am certain that many examples could be cited to justify this request. Once again, my colleague from Norfolk-Haldimand made mention of this again tonight.

The government should extend to all grain and livestock producers arrangements for deferral of receipts as now applicable to western grain farmers. It should provide that where the taxpayer lives off the land but continues to operate his farm, and this situation exists on many occasions, his accumulation of $1,000 principal residency option should continue. We should have a provision that if a farmer sells his lands but retains his residence, he should, at his option, be able to take the accumulated $1,000 annual exemption at that time.

We also require a provision for a statutory right for a taxpayer to file an amended return up to two years after the original filing to protect against losses of rights in cases of overpayment of tax. I would ask that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay), who is here, along with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, take seriously some of these recommendations. Incidentally, they are not my personal recommendations, they are the recommendations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which we certainly support. They include a prescribed annual forgiveness of capital gains for land retained for family farming. I have made mention of that earlier this evening, but I am not going to list all of the recommendations of the federation, although I am sure we could easily support all of them. I just hope that the Minister of National Revenue could take time out of his busy schedule to check some of the recommendations that have been made to the government time and time again by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

These are but a few of the recommendations, and these recommendations are worthy of serious consideration and, indeed, support. I think it is time that the government began to become aware of the concerns of the average Canadian, particularly of those in the agricultural industry who have been continuously shortchanged for as long as I can remember.

I conclude by saying that when this bill is before the House on clause by clause study, because of the fact that the government has brought forward a closure motion, that will be the only opportunity for many members to make recommendations on some of its provisions.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on this bill. I should follow protocol and complement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on his appointment, although I must admit I am torn whether or not I should do so, because I think he was a lot more comfortable in his previous portfolio. The way the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been grinding people through this portfolio, I see he is going to be in some difficulty, if not within his portfolio, probably in his health in a little while. I say in all honesty I have always liked this gentleman, and I do not like to see him tortured in this particular portfolio the way I know he is and must be. As a matter of fact when I saw him tonight I thought he already looked excessively tired. I can understand that; it is probably the most difficult job in the government. It is certainly a more difficult job than the Prime Minister's because I think he takes his job more seriously than the Prime Minister does.

I was in the House the other day when one of the members was addressing himself to the problem that last spring we passed a measure in this House whereby people who hold bonds now have to give their social insurance number in order to cash those bonds. If they do not have insurance numbers, or they choose not to give them, which is highly unlikely, the bank is required by the government to deduct 25 per cent from their coupons. As far as I am concerned, that is a bad measure. Aside from that, I noted the attention the Minister of Finance gave to the suggestion that the government should take away that provision in order for people to be able to go to the bank and clip the coupons, without suffering the penalty of a 25 per cent deduction. Perhaps the Minister of Finance may be imprisoned by the system in which he finds himself. By personality and conviction, he is a sensitive person. He would like to do what he can in these kinds of exigencies in which he finds himself. I am sure he will look for ways to delete the provision which penalizes these people.

The minister should be complimented for removing the threat of taxation on insurance policies. The government has been flailed continuously for introducing that measure in the House. The government was rightly flailed for that. The government received many representations from our side of the House indicating that this was a bad thing. Perhaps also it received letters from constituents saying that the government should not reach its icy fingers into the grave in an attempt to get money. That underscores the essential problem faced by the government. It sees taxation powers as an opportunity to tax as much as possible, rather than as little as possible. In that the government spends as much as possible, rather than as little as possible, it can easily justify a philosophy of taxing as much as possible. When the government realizes it has missed an opportunity to tax, it looks upon that as a loophole.

Until now insurance policies and their interest have not been taxed as accrued savings. Now the government considers that to be a loophole. Surely everyone is justified in plugging a loophole, which is acceptable if in fact it is such. Over and over it has been demonstrated by the government that part of its philosophy is to tax as much as possible.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Friesen: I would permit an intelligent question, but I am not sure I will receive one from this hon. member.

Mr. Young: Mr. Speaker, I can provide the hon. member with an intelligent question. I was interested in his comments regarding the necessity of having a social insurance number when cashing in coupons or Canada Savings Bonds, and the fact that a person would suffer a 25 per cent deduction if he has no social insurance number. I should like to indicate that not all Canada Savings Bonds and coupons are held by the proper holders. As I am sure the hon. member is aware, some get lost and some are stolen. The fact that a person would be required to have a social insurance number in order to cash his bond or coupon could make it possible to trace the cashing of a lost coupon or bond. I am putting a question to the hon. member. Does he not agree that there are benefits? I am putting the question to him.

• (2217)

An hon. Member: Then be brief.

Mr. Young: I will be brief, and I will tell the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) that I can give him a specific case in point which would have been quite easy to prove.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should stick to the question.

Mr. Friesen: If that is a question, then I would hate to see the hon. member make a speech.

Mr. Young: Answer the question.

Mr. Friesen: It is plain to see, if that is a question, why he is still a bachelor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: That was a low blow.

Mr. Friesen: Yes, that was a cheap shot, but I could not resist it.

Mr. Alexander: We apologize on this side.

Mr. Young: Answer the question.

Mr. Friesen: The question of the hon. member—

An hon. Member: You have forgotten the question.

Mr. Friesen: The time has come for us to be serious.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: The trouble is that the government takes all of its taxation powers very lightly and it taxes so glibly that it does not mind walking all over the people in the process. The hon. member raises a very good point, but anybody who has had experience with bonds knows that they must be countersigned. At the same time there is no certainty that you will eliminate all the injustices in society. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) looks at me. I think he is saying that I am right and that what I am saying is true, because he has had experience in the Department of Employment and Immigration and knows that we cannot build a wall high enough to ward off all injustices.

Let me come back to what the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young) raised, that is, the matter of the coupons. He knows very well that there are elderly people who have never had a social insurance number. Will they now have 25 per cent taken off those bonds? It seems to me that it is trying to kill a mosquito with a steamroller, which is hardly justified.

I want to raise another point, and I hope the hon. member for Niagara Falls will agree with me on this one. I received a representation from a group of firemen in my constituency some time ago which raises another important point with regard to taxation policy, that is, that the government very easily, sometimes through oversight, makes money on inflation through its policy on deductions. In this case I was asked if I would make representations to the Minister of Finance to have section 5(1)(viii) on the subject of income revised. The section reads as follows:

Such part of the aggregate of allowances received by a voluntary fireman from government, municipality . . . as does not exceed $300.

That was put into the Income Tax Act ten years ago. Since that time allowances to volunteer fireman have at least doubled, if not tripled and quadrupled in some cases depending on the municipality, and yet the deduction is still $300. Inflation has put a burden on these people because the deduction has stayed the same but the tax has increased. Here is where I take some heart from the nature of the Minister of Finance. I believe he listens and he wants justice for the people of Canada. I hope he will take this as a representation that the deductibility be raised from the present $300 to at least $1,000. It would make a lot of volunteer firemen very happy. They take their lives in their hands at a fire, and are then penalized by the tax department for volunteering. I hope the minister will increase the deduction so that there will be greater benefit for them and they will not be punished for volunteering in the first place.

• (2222)

The third point I should like to make is that this country has fallen behind the United States in the matter of insurance on moneys on bank deposit. At the moment the ceiling in this country is $28,000 and that sounds a lot, of course, to people who do not have a great deal of money. We need to encourage the lending companies in this country, however, to enlarge their investment pool. In the United States the insurance on savings has been raised to $40,000 to keep up with inflation. We have not done this, and I suspect there is a great shift of savings from bank accounts into such things as coin collections, antiques, stamp collections or property. This takes money out of the liquid pool which could be used for reinvestment and for keeping the economy moving. People are doing this to avoid the hazard of investing in a lending institution that does not have adequate insurance. Only an insignificant increase in premium would be required to raise the level of insurance to $40,000. Certainly many people would feel more secure about putting money into savings accounts if they knew the insurance was keeping up with inflation.

The fourth point I come to was raised by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) and also by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), and that is the tax on farmland that is passed on to another member of a family. British Columbia has had experience with land freezes, and in the last four or five years the cry has been "save the farmland." It was a well-intentioned but nervous cry. However, it was also accurate as more and more farmland is being put into non-productive uses. In too many cases the land that could be most easily developed was good farmland and it was subdivided for residential or industrial properties, a further loss in the food production that we are going to need in future. We will be sorry in later years that we have done this.

The cry has been to save the farmland, but it seems to me that approaches the problem from the wrong direction. If this government focused on saving the farmer, we would not have to worry about saving the farmland. If the farmer could make an honest living we would not have to worry that he might look forward to the day when he can subdivide his farm and retire on the income that produces. We would not have to worry about that. If farmers could get a fair living out of it—and we know they are honest—they would not worry about looking to the day when they could subdivide their property and live off the money they would get from that subdivision, and we would not lose it to the land developer. We have to address ourselves to that problem. I agree with the hon. member for Elgin and the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand that if the government would take away the capital gains tax on land which is passed on through the family and protect the family farm in that way, we would go a long way toward saving the farmer, and we would not have to worry so much about saving farmland.

• (2227)

There are many other reasons why the farmer is finding it difficult. I think of tariffs. I think, for example, of mushroom farmers in my constituency who are facing an inundation of very cheap, high quality mushrooms, which are being imported from Taiwan and Korea. There is no way, considering the labour force in those countries, that our farmers can compete, except on the fresh mushroom market. The same is true with regard to wax beans, green beans, and all those vegetables which are being canned at almost dumping prices in those Far Eastern countries. Those vegetables are being brought into our country at not much more than half the price for which those same domestically grown vegetables are being marketed, and we are expected to save the farmer. We must get serious about looking after the farmer, and then we will not have to worry about looking after farmland.

I see that it is one minute before 10.30. I wonder if I may call it 10.30 and carry on tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it 10.30?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being 10.30 p.m. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.
