SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that, when this House did attend Her Majesty the Queen this day in the Senate chamber, Her Majesty was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

[French text]

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have greatly looked forward to being with you here in the Canadian Parliament in my Silver Jubilee year. Whenever I am in this wonderful country of Canada, with her vast resources and unlimited challenges, I feel thankful that Canadians have been so successful in establishing a vigorous democracy well suited to a proud and free people.

In this historic Chamber surrounded by the symbols and records of generations of Canadian legislators, I am very conscious of what Parliament has achieved—by transforming the visions and ideals of a great country into the enduring law of the land.

[English text]

In ten visits together to Canada spread over a quarter of a century—seven in the last decade alone—Prince Philip and I have met many thousands of Canadians in all walks of life, of all ages, in every province and territory. My happiest memories of our travels throughout Canada have been these individual contacts which have revealed the enormous strength and astonishing diversity of this nation.

A generation of Canadians has been born, and grown to maturity during my reign. I know you will understand when I say that I have a special interest in these young men and women, contemporaries of our own children. They are people made strong by the achievements of their parents and grandparents, but not imprisoned by the prejudices of the past. In their sensitivity towards other people, in their sense of justice, their generosity and good will, lie not only lessons for us all, but also the best and surest hope for unity and understanding among Canadians everywhere. I look forward in meeting more of them next year in Edmonton when I shall have the pleasure of opening the Commonwealth Games.

I have always been full of admiration for what Canada is: the new generation fill me with confidence for what Canada can become.

[French text]

The growth of those young men and women over the past quarter-century has been matched by a rapid expansion of Canada's economic strength and international stature.

Within an evolving Commonwealth, Canada's influence is steadily growing, particularly as an advocate of human dignity, justice and co-operation.

This greater influence has been used by Canada to pursue such critical goals as a more equitable sharing of wealth and opportunity, the enhancement of individual freedom, the conservation of the planet's scarce resources, and the prudent control of nuclear technology.

The post-war period of sustained economic growth conferred great new wealth upon Canada. Productivity and standards of living improved substantially, and the country could afford to provide better economic protection for the sick, the aged, the unemployed and the poor.

But growth produced new sets of problems with which the world community has not yet learned to cope successfully.

High rates of unemployment and inflation are clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies appropriate to simpler times. They are also signals of the urgent need for important structural adjustments in the economies of Canada and other industrialized countries. More than that, they are the symptoms of an illness which can be cured only by a readjustment of our values, and by a re-discovery of the merits of self-discipline and fair sharing.

The process of change will require continued consultation with Canadians, so that there may be a shared appreciation of current problems, and a shared acceptance of strategies for the future.

The government publications entitled The Way Ahead and The Agenda For Co-operation were designed to involve all Canadians in the discussion of how best to adapt to changing economic circumstances.

The changes that are now taking place impose burdens on some Canadians, and the Government remains committed to protecting these individuals.

The Government has recently made new funding proposals to the provinces which will improve the efficiency and flexibility of social services such as the rehabilitation of disabled persons, day care and community development services. The delivery of these services will thereby better reflect varying conditions and priorities across the country. It is hoped that the response of provincial governments will lead to the introduction of a revised Social Services Act during this Session.

The human hardship imposed by the current level of unemployment in Canada is deeply disturbing. It is neither just nor tolerable that in this country there should be so many men and women deprived of the dignity of self-supporting work, unable to meet their financial commitments and plan confidently for the future. It is intolerable that so many are deprived of their right to secure and productive lives, and that their families bear an unfair burden of worry, uncertainty, and deprivation. On a national scale, unemployment now constitutes a very serious obstacle to economic growth.

The benefits of existing government job stimulation programs, such as youth and community employment projects, and direct job creation by government, are visible to all. New initiatives have also been taken to encourage the mobility and upgrade the skills of the Canadian labour force, and to encourage small business. But more must be done.

To stimulate the expansion of industrial activity and create jobs in the private sector, the Government adopted a number of initiatives in its March budget. The investment tax credit was extended and was also increased in slower-growing regions of the country as a means of reinforcing the regional development policy of the Government. Tax incentives were increased for energy exploration and rail facilities. The dividend tax credit was substantially increased to encourage investment; deductible capital losses were doubled; and businesses were permitted to adjust inventory valuations to partially offset the effects of inflation.

Legislation will be reintroduced to effect these tax reductions and investment incentives. But the current unemployment situation obviously requires further action. Therefore, this legislation will be significantly strengthened to provide further immediate stimulus to the economy and to create new employment. The details of these further initiatives will be announced by the Minister of Finance during the course of the debate which begins tomorrow.

Further stimulus must not be allowed to compromise our objective of continuing reductions in inflation. The Government will continue to exercise responsibility in controlling its expenditures. The continuation of the income and price controls program through the early part of 1978 will help to contain inflationary pressures, but controls on prices and incomes must then end. You will be asked to approve legislation to amend the Anti-Inflation Act to allow an orderly process of decontrol, as well as legislation to create a monitoring agency.

The Government is confident that the outcome of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations now underway in Geneva will be of considerable benefit to Canada. Consultations with the provinces and with the private sector will be intensified, in order to ensure that this benefit is shared by all regions of the country.

In preparation for the new trading environment which Canada will face in the 1980's, the Government will introduce measures in this Session to enhance Canada's exports. Further support will be provided to the private sector in undertaking large capital projects in other countries.

In the continuing implementation of its food strategy, the Government will work with the provinces to ensure a co-ordinated approach to agricultural development, making better use of Canada's food-producing potential.

As part of the Government's consultation process, a National Food Conference will be held. It will bring together representatives of governments, producers, consumers and the food industry to work together toward a national agreement on how Canada's food strategy should be further developed and implemented. New initiatives are underway to provide the consumer with readily accessible information on food prices and nutrition. The Government will ensure that the views of producers, processors and consumers are adequately represented on marketing boards and agencies, so that they may operate more effectively.

Several measures will be placed before you to improve the national transportation system. For example, new ports legislation will be introduced which will enhance local autonomy while maintaining the overall national interest.

In the field of energy, it will continue to be the determined policy of the Government to work with the provinces toward the goal of self-reliance, particularly by encouraging exploration and conservation to reduce our dependence on imported oil. Further encouragement will be given to the development of energy saving technology, of renewable energy sources, and of the application of solar energy.

There are encouraging signs that the policy measures introduced over the past few years to promote exploration and development are beginnning to bear fruit. In particular, exploration for natural gas in Western Canada appears to have been highly successful over the past two years. There are also encouraging prospects in the Beaufort Sea area and the Arctic Islands. Petro-Canada, in co-operation with the private sector, is seriously examining the feasibility of delivering natural gas to markets in Quebec and the Atlantic Provinces.

Exploration in the Arctic will be further encouraged by the proposed northern gas pipeline. A Bill will be placed before you to seek your approval for the implementation of the pipeline agreement negotiated with the Government of the United States. This historic agreement—which will launch one of the largest civil engineering projects in the history of the world—will provide immense benefits to Canada through jobs, investment, the purchase of materials and through easier and cheaper access to northern Canadian gas reserves.

You will also be asked to approve a Canadian Petroleum and Natural Gas Act, which will regulate oil and gas exploration on federally administered lands and establish a system of royalty payments.

The Government is committed to ensure that northern development occurs in a manner consistent with the rights of northern native peoples to negotiate a just and reasonable settlement of their land claims, and to participate in and shape such development. Consultations with native groups are continuing. In the Yukon, the Government will propose special measures to ensure that pipeline construction will not prejudice native rights or foreclose opportunities. In the Northwest Territories, the Government has appointed a commissioner to consult with interested groups and advise on the pace and manner of the further constitutional evolution of the Territories.

So pervasive are economic influences on people's daily lives that failure to secure economic stability and justice would, in itself, stimulate a sense of alienation, mutual hostility, and divisiveness among Canadians. In the context of the current national unity debate, therefore, it is imperative that feelings of linguistic or cultural inequality not be allowed to be further poisoned by evidence of economic injustice. Conversely, there is no doubt that the level of uncertainty evident in Quebec has a negative effect on the economy.

Few countries are as blessed as Canada, where a wealth of freedom and of this world's goods is apparent for all to see. Perhaps only those who have come here from less fortunate lands can appreciate to the full the great good fortune of living in a country so favored by nature, and so enriched by its cultural diversity.

Even in the midst of plenty, however, there are Canadians who know they are not receiving their fair share. To cite just one example, in those parts of the Atlantic Provinces where unemployment is particularly severe, some see themselves as an excluded group, able to gaze upon the good life only from a distance. There are many living in the West who have contributed much to Canada, yet believe their voice is little heard by others. There are many living in Quebec who feel deeply that Canada at present does not provide them with the opportunity to fulfill their reasonable aspirations. There are native peoples across the land who are still in search of a better life for themselves and their children.

This discontent in such a wealthy country must find its causes in the human spirit, and it is there also that the unity of the nation must be found. A greater willingness to listen to each other, to understand each other's needs, a greater generosity between individuals and between different parts of the country, a greater willingness to sacrifice so that others may have a chance, to take less so that others may have enough—all these are in the realm of the spirit. All are essential to the unity of the country. Governments, of course, have a special responsibility to both encourage and respond to the spirit of unity by their words and their actions. Canadians are, I believe, coming to recognize the seriousness of the problem. They are recognizing the need to make a new and deeper dedication to mutual understanding and sharing.

The Government dedicates itself profoundly to the re-discovery of the spirit of unity. It wishes to learn from all who are interested in Canada and who have thoughts on how it can be made a better place in which to live. It is prepared, particularly, to work with the governments of the provinces, all of whom have a vital interest in a better Canada.

The Government recently appointed the Task Force on Canadian Unity which is now in the process of canvassing opinion in all parts of Canada. The work of the Task Force should assist Canadians to participate more actively in debate, and to make a greater contribution to the future shaping of the country.

The Government will also be placing before Parliament, and in this way before the people of Canada, later in this Session, a measure that will contain a number of proposals relating to the Constitution of Canada, which it believes will be of particular importance for the future of the country. The proposals will be concerned, among other matters, with the essential nature of the Canadian federation and its objectives, with certain fundamental rights and freedoms which the Government feels should be enjoyed by all Canadians as being essential to Canada's continuing existence as a free and democratic society, and with certain elements of the framework of the Canadian federation that are important to its effective functioning.

It is the hope of the Government that these proposals will stimulate a process of constitutional review in which all governments in Canada will share and in which Canadians generally will have an opportunity to express their views and convictions about the kind of Canada they wish to have now and in the future. We may confidently expect that, from that process, may emerge a new federalism that will receive the support and the devotion of Canadians everywhere.

The question of language rights is of particular relevance to national unity, and the Government has therefore welcomed the historic "Statement on Language" approved at the meeting of provincial Premiers at St. Andrews in August. The Government believes that this important initiative can and should become a basic part of our Constitution and has recently asked the provinces to consider this possibility.

After consultation with the provinces, the Government will amend the criminal code to guarantee the right of accused persons to be tried in the official language of their choice.

The goal of enhancing the rights and freedoms of Canadians can also be pursued through commitment to the principle of open government. An example of that commitment was the enactment of the Human Rights Act, and the recent appointment of the Human Rights Commission and the Privacy Commissioner. To the same end, the Government looks forward to hearing the views of Parliament on the Government's proposals concerning public access to official documents. In the further promotion of open government, you will be asked to approve the establishment of the office of ombudsman to deal with complaints arising from federal administrative actions.

The Government will also propose the amendment of the Official Languages Act, in order to make more specific its provisions respecting the language of work of federal employees, to strengthen the role of the Commissioner of Official Languages, and to clarify the role of the courts in safeguarding the equality of status of the official languages within the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada.

A comprehensive policy for official language minorities will be announced, and initiatives will be taken to ensure its full implementation within federal institutions. In the coming months, the Government will be proposing specific initiatives to be taken in collaboration with the provinces, and exploring ways of assisting the provinces in measures which they propose for ensuring greater availability of education in both official languages to all Canadians.

The unity of Canadians is often judged by the manner in which the federal and provincial governments work together for the benefit of the citizen. It is in recognition of this that the Government has recently designated a Minister of State responsible for federal-provincial relations, so that greater attention can be given to the search for harmony and co-operation between governments in Canada.

Given the new economic realities to which Canada must adjust, and the urgency of promoting linguistic and cultural harmony, it is readily apparent that Canada is now entering a new era.

It can be an era of increasing confrontation, tension and division, or an era of enhanced freedom, co-operation and unity of purpose. Fundamentally, the choice must be made by every citizen every day.

It is apparent to thoughtful Canadians everywhere that this is a time of great decisions for Canada, a time for re-discovering the strength and potential of a marvellously free and caring society.

That re-discovery will require that Canadians rededicate themselves to each other's well-being, just as I dedicate myself anew today to the people and the nation I am very proud to serve.

Members of the House of Commons,

You will be asked to consider budget proposals and to approve the expenditure of funds required for the administration of government services and programs.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May God bless and inspire all your deliberations and decisions.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[Translation]

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. DENNIS DAWSON AND SECONDED BY MR. DONALD WOOD

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by Her Majesty the Queen at the opening of the session.

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the members of the cabinet for giving me the task of moving the address in reply of the Speech from the Throne. That is not only a sign of confidence, which I greatly appreciate, but also an honour to which I am greatly sensitive. That honour I will share with the constituents of Louis-Hébert and the people of my own generation, people under 30, who constitute almost one third of the Canadian electorate. Before going any further, Mr. Speaker, may I join with my colleagues of this House in offering my heartfelt sympathies to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) who has been sadly affected by the demise of his wife.

Since it is the first time that I have the honour of addressing the House, I also take the opportunity to thank the right hon. Prime Minister for allowing me to join his team. It is for me a privilege and an honour to work beside him for the better-being of Canadians. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that on this the 18th day of October, you, as well as my hon. colleagues, and those who are attending, will join me in wishing the right hon. Prime Minister a very happy birthday.

[English]

I also take the opportunity to thank my colleagues for their help and support since my election. Many persons complain about what we used to call the red tape of the administration. Well, I can tell those people that the newly elected member of parliament also faces many problems which he could not solve without the assistance of his fellow M.P's.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the task which was entrusted to me by my constituents of Louis-Hébert, last May 24, is one of high responsibility. I am proud to be the successor of Mrs. Albanie Morin, this great lady of politics, whose self-denial and hard work will be forever engraved in our minds. Mrs. Morin was beloved by everybody and had won the respect and great esteem of all. I owe it to her memory to serve the constituents of Louis-Hébert as well as she did and, during my time in this House, I would like to leave as deep a mark and reach the same level of respectability as she did.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Louis-Hébert is located in the metropolitan Quebec area. It includes the municipalities of Sainte-Foy, Sillery, Cap-Rouge as well as part of the beautiful city of Quebec. At the time of the last by-election, Louis-Hébert numbered over 76,000 voters and its population is of mixed origin. For the next election, my constituency will include what we call the Laurentian district and the township of l'Ancienne Lorette, and consequently Quebec airport. Since the metropolitan area of Quebec City forms a whole, economic and social progress in the riding of Louis-Hébert is closely linked to its development. At the economic level, developing Quebec Harbour and setting up new industries should in my opinion be the two major priorities for government action. The federal government has already agreed with one of our requests when it accepted the projected dredging of the channel in the St. Lawrence river in order to increase its depth from 38 to 41 feet. However, that is only a beginning. As a matter of fact, Quebec Harbour competes with other harbours on the St. Lawrence, in the Maritimes and on the West Coast. Basic rail and highway facilities are already available for fast transportation of freight from Quebec Harbour to major centres. Therefore, we have the necessary potential and it is of a vital importance that we further develop our harbour.

Also, in this period of economic slowdown, the state must become aware of its privileged situation and stimulate the economy. Government action must therefore encourage investments and the creation of new industries. Mr. Speaker, the Louis-Hébert constituency is no more free of the problem which requires immediate government attention than any other riding in Canada. As a member of parliament, I am particularly concerned with the social development of my constituency. I also particularly care for the aged and low income people. I urge the federal government which has already done much in areas to intensify its programs.

Finally, I am happy about the recent announcement by the hon. Minister of Finance concerning the administrative decentralization program of the federal government. In my opinion, the Louis-Hébert riding is an ideal location for setting up federal departments in the Quebec city area. All the required infrastructures are available to help civil servants settle in our region which is at the crossroads of the major communications areas of Eastern Quebec. As I mentioned earlier, this would be the kind of investment that my riding urgently needs.

[English]

Now, Mr. Speaker, having presented you my constituency of Louis-Hébert, I should like to comment on the Speech from the Throne made by Her Majesty, one dealing with the three most important issues our society is facing. Those issues—the economy, energy and national unity, have already been discussed in this House but will be given particular attention during the present session. Those areas are related to the survival of our nation, and to the well-being of all Canadians. They will lead to many important debates in this House which are essential to the continuity of our country. This House, in the past, has been the theatre of many historical debates such as the railway debates and the national flag debates, and has always treated the problems with efficiency and wisdom. Again the House will be called upon not only to discuss but to find lasting solutions to problems challenging the basis of our society and of our country.

Because of the specific nature of the problems it raises and the way it deals with them, the speech that we have just heard is a message of hope. It is truly aimed at the future.

In recent years, Western economy has been faced with an increase of the scourges of unemployment and inflation. Countries which were once economically strong, such as Great Britain, Italy and other European countries, have been experiencing a daily deterioration of their economy without any hope for improvement. Third World countries, especially oil exporting countries, have suddenly become aware of their wealth and are now accumulating large stocks of currencies, which may be a threat to importing countries. Also, productivity, which is an essential prerequisite to any development or economic recovery, has been decreasing dangerously, especially here in Canada. It is impossible not to relate the weakening of the dollar to the constantly decreasing productivity of our industries.

It has often been said: other times, other mores. As was mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, all economic theories currently applied in the past having partially failed, we must find—and rapidly—new formulas to solve the problems facing us. In this task, Canada will still demonstrate the audacity it has shown in the past. The speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will deliver here in the House this coming Thursday evening will contain concrete and efficient measures which reflect the desire of this government to tackle our economic problems as vigorously as those same problems can strike us.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne already gives us an example of the measures which will be put forth by this government. Short and long term job creation programs will attempt to lower an unemployment rate that is already high. Measures meant to spur our economy and increase our productivity will give us the momentum we need to be competitive on external markets. Finally, new legislation dealing with investments will allow us to retain control over our economy.

Mr. Speaker, these are measures which will foster the welfare of all Canadians and whose repercussions will be felt, I am sure, down into my own riding of Louis-Hébert. If the increase in the price of our energy caused us to worry a great deal in the past, our present concern must bear on our future needs in energy supply. Similarly, in anticipation of times of scarcity our efforts must also be directed toward self-sufficiency in the area of energy. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, the message contained in the Speech from the Throne as well as the measures it proposes are unequivocal. The renewed exploration of known sources of energy and the increased conservation of energy that we now have, combined with the efforts of the government and the excellence of Canadian technology, will result in our country becoming a leader in this area.

● (1710)

[English]

We now come to the main subject contained in the Speech from the Throne, national unity. As a matter of fact, nothing can be done, no lasting solutions can be found to our problems, unless we have a strong and united Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Dawson: His Excellency, Mr. Pierre Dupuy, said in his opening speech at Expo 67 that great peoples are formed through continuity. Well, Mr. Speaker, Canada was created through continuity and dialogue and I think that is how it must progress and renew itself.

[English]

Canada, which was created in 1867, is not a country like others. It was not built on revolutions or wars. Among modern societies, our ancestors were the only ones to build themselves a nation that was founded neither on race, nor nationality, nor revolutionary ideology. The Prime Minister of Canada once said:

> The Canadian citizenship is not based on geographic sense. It is not historic, but is more or less spiritual. Canada is not united by geography, ethnic ground, historic or even linguistic background.

The Fathers of Confederation have not followed any of the traditional paths. They created what was then called the "new nationality". They knew that for two centuries the founding nations of Canada had refused assimilation. Each culture worked to survive distinctly, and this new nationality had to be more complete than the traditional nationalities. Our country was built not only of different populations or political entities, but it was built on dialogue. Yet it seems that the dialogue which they were hoping for has had very bad and very sad moments. If we consider the language question of Canada, or the crisis of November 15, we can easily see that the dialogue has not been permanent. The discussions have often degenerated into debates and even conflicts between the different echelons of Canadian governments.

Where we stand now, we must have the same innovative spirit and wisdom as that which prevailed in 1867. On that point, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to quote the Speech from the Throne:

> The Government dedicates itself profoundly to the re-discovery of the spirit of unity.
> It wishes to learn from all who are interested in Canada and who have thoughts on how it can be made a better place in which to live.
> It is prepared, particularly, to work with the governments of the provinces, all of whom have a vital interest in a better Canada.

We must create a climate of mutual understanding to promote dialogue and appropriate solutions to our problems.

On the other hand, our efforts will have to be geared above all to re-arranging our present constitution.

Our constitution was written 110 years ago, and our society and country have since evolved. Perhaps our constitution was not able to adapt to those changes considering the desire by all governments—federal as well as provincial—to ensure in the way they thought best the better-being of taxpayers. It is normal that provinces should fight to keep or patriate powers they consider theirs and that somehow they should want a certain autonomy. As a matter of fact, has not Canada already felt this desire for autonomy from England and now from the United States? I suggest it is perfectly normal on the part of the provinces to claim more powers and to insist on a constant reassessment of the sharing of responsibilities, to reflect the progress of our community as a whole.

On the other hand, I suggest it is also perfectly normal on the part of the central government to keep the powers which are in the national interest and which concern Canada as a whole. All of this should be made part of our new constitution, but its main feature should include the possibility and the capability of adapting to the changes our society will certainly go through in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the coming into power of the Parti Quebecois in the province of Quebec gives us a unique opportunity. It challenges us to a debate on the future of our country; this debate which is essential, in my humble opinion, would have come about differently, had it not been for the November 15th elections. We must approach this debate in a logical and rational way. In the Province of Quebec, we can see presently an unfortunate example of the mistakes caused by passionate behaviour. Therefore it is necessary to approach the coming discussions with complete objectivity and with one single purpose in mind—the well-being of all the Canadian people.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it is also essential that we settle once and for all this matter of Canadian identity. The time and energy we spend discussing our future would be put to much better use if directed to the economic and social progress of our people. That is why I fully endorse the remarks made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) before the Chamber of Commerce of Quebec seven or eight months ago, when he said that time for choice and decision had come. We cannot afford the luxury of another decade of hesitation.

In order to find a solution to our constitutional problem, the government has already taken positive steps, such as the appointment of a Minister of State to deal particularly with federal-provincial relations, the creation of a special commission to issue specific recommendations, as well as the setting up of a task force to study the evolution of the situation. The Speech from the Throne also mentions concrete measures which, in addition to those already taken by the government will form the basis of the Federal Government's endeavour to reorganize the political and constitutional scene in Canada today.

Mr. Speaker, I am one of those Canadians under 30, who represent one third of the Canadian voters. My own future and the future of people of my age will be considerably influenced by the decisions that will soon be taken about the years lying ahead and the development of natural resources in Canada. Consequently, I would like to emphasize the importance of youth in relation to the discussions that will soon take place within and without this House.

If our long term goal is to maintain national unity and progress in this country, we must now make enormous efforts where our youth is concerned. All through my last election campaign I could notice even among my younger supporters, a sense of growing dissatisfaction with our present federalism and in the current state of affairs indeed, such dissatisfaction is justified in my view. It would stem from a lack of understanding of what Canada is all about, and even more from the unawareness of what Canada can offer them. As Canadian members of parliament and as a government, we therefore must keep a closer contact with our Canadian youth, because even if we could be sure of beating the current Quebec government during the referendum campaign, a majority of our young people would still be inclined to adhere to the independence venture. So we must convince them that their greatest opportunities for the future lie in a united and renewed Canada rather than in the separatist doctrine. We should stop trying to destroy the ideal of independence in this idealistic youth, and give them instead a still more challenging one, namely Canada.

In this overture to our youth, we must all do our share and let our young people play a positive role in the building of our country's future. We should be inviting their participation rather than fearing it. Since we represent nearly a third of Canadian constituents, it would be normal to find young men and women below 30 at the highest echelons in the institutions that now make up the country we will be living in tomorrow. In this regard, I would add that the presence of at least one Canadian below 30, or maybe 35, would have been in order on the Pepin-Robarts Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that our youth should be put in complete control, since they are aware of their own limitations as much as I am myself, but that we combine the energy of the young with the wisdom of those more advanced in life. It must nevertheless be kept in mind that our senior citizens, pensioners and veterans deserve respect, for they have greatly contributed to the building of our country so that we may live as we do today. Nor is it a question of sacrificing the past to the present or the future, but rather of giving our young people the opportunity to take a more active part in the building of the future Canada.

I believe that knowing that our young people want to make a greater contribution and relying on the message of hope and renewal contained in the Speech from the Throne that we just heard, we may say after Voltaire: Youth is blessed for it will see great things.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Malpèque (Mr. Wood), that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen in the following terms:

To Her Most Excellent Majesty the Queen, our Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, humbly wish to convey to Your Majesty our gratitude for the gracious speech Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Mr. Donald Wood (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have the opportunity to second the motion of the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson). It has not been long since I first joined my colleagues in this Chamber, and I am therefore grateful for the confidence that was expressed in requesting that I second this motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

This has indeed been a splendid day for parliament and an historic day for Canada in that it represents the second time in our history that our Sovereign has, in person, opened a session of parliament. I might add that it is a tribute to our Queen that she, the most travelled Canadian monarch in our history, is not only the second monarch ever to read the Speech from the Throne, but that she was also the first. It is indeed the energy and the grace of our Queen that have made our monarchy a symbol of adaptability and conscience in a rapidly changing world.

I was most pleased that Her Majesty took time to remember on Sunday night in her dinner speech her visit to Prince Edward Island during our centennial Year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: We indeed remember fondly her gracious presence on our beautiful island. I am sure that my constituents will join all islanders in saying to her that she will always be welcome in our midst and we hope she will soon return.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with you in expressing my condolences to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and his family.

I now want to pay tribute to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert who so eloquently moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I would be remiss if I did not express my appreciation to Your Honour whose impartiality and clear-sightedness were obvious to me in the last session.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: As is the custom, I should like to talk about my constituency and my beloved island home; but first I want to pay personal tribute to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) who represents Prince Edward Island in the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: This is a minister who possesses the common-sense, determination, and the dignity that I like to associate with all Canadians. All Canadians would do well to use this minister as a model in decision-making and moral fabric.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: And, speaking of great individuals, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is celebrating a birthday—Happy Birthday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: When I speak of Prince Edward Island with its natural beauty and peacefulness, I could easily become lost in a rhapsody of nostalgia, but I cannot allow the contemplation of those cobblestones that were the foundation of the past to distract me from looking to the building of the future.

The constituency of Malpeque includes an area that might be considered the west central portion of our province, with the Gulf of St. Lawrence to our north and the Northumberland Strait to our south lapping against our coastlines, with tranquility or with vicious violence. Yes, it is very picturesque and it offers a haven for the summer tourist. In these waters that I mention, lobsters crawl, our famous Malpeque oysters hold fast, and the giant blue-fin tuna join us like the other summer visitors from July to October.

Back on land the crops flourish, because about 90 per cent of my constituency falls into class 2 of the Canada Land Inventory. This is good land. In my constituency of Malpeque over two thirds of the total island potato production is grown, and our farmers are proud that they are able to produce a quality potato that is sought after for seed by many countries throughout the world.

Knit together with the farmers and fishermen are the processing and manufacturing industries and the small business operators that entwine to make up my rural constituency. To keep these operations moving and productive, we have our labour force—a rather unique labour force because this group of workers must depend upon industries that are very seasonal. We cannot survive without our labour force, and yet one needs little imagination to recognize the real problem of a man with a family whose talents are inexpendable for six months of the year and unnecessary for the other six.

We are proud of our products which possess such high quality, but this quality has been the result not only of individual but also of collective effort on the part of people. We have many well-to-do farmers and fishermen and small businessmen, all of whom are free enterprisers in our society. But we have others who are not so well-to-do—they must struggle. This is natural and normal because no democratic country can survive on a one-class system.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we have evolved beyond the theory of survival of the fittest to the theory which I feel best fits our present society, and that is survival of the efficient. People who live from the land and the sea cannot consider work as another four letter word. The word work, for the efficient, still has four letters, but for the efficient those letters are capitalized.

The general attitude toward work has changed as we have moved from a rural society to an urban society. Throughout the past 200 years man has discovered continents, has moved swiftly ahead scientifically, has entered the atomic age and has landed on the moon, and yet no man has discovered anything that can offer any individual more personal satisfaction than the weariness achieved after an honest day's work. The change in attitude from the time when work was a source of pride and joy to the present time when it is too often thought about negatively, occurs in every country as it industrializes.

Rural living and its internal economy, where each and every family had to grow and harvest its daily bread, brought real human dignity. The trend from rural living to urbanization and an external economy has meant that people can no longer associate themselves fully with the finished commodity. It cannot be different because, for instance, how can anyone on an assembly line gain a real sense of accomplishment when each job is such a small part of the finished product?

I concur wholeheartedly with the Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, and yet I feel very strongly that we, as the Government of Canada, have a two-fold challenge when we think and talk about unemployment. Our attitude cannot be that work is a burden to be endured or avoided, but rather is a source of pride. It is our duty not only to stimulate the economy by providing more jobs, but we must also seek the means to create a greater desire in the populace to be employed.

I have mentioned our people and their general attitude toward work, but living in a constituency such as Malpeque where family livelihood depends upon the will of nature means we must approach our daily life in a very positive way. The wind, the rain, and the cold can play havoc in very short order. If we are unable to adjust to prosperity or the lack of it year after year, we are in real trouble. In Malpeque we have grown with the built-in knowledge that it is not the high cost of living that creates hardships, but rather the cost of living high. Perhaps my constituents can offer this little gem of wisdom to all other Canadians.

Our closeness to the land and the sea have left their mark on the heritage of all islanders. And so too have the small communities that bind us together. In my constituency, Mr. Speaker, the largest town has a population of just 1,200 people. Yet it is, nonetheless, a town. Neighbours learn the traits and habits of neighbours. We learn to co-operate and work together, and all of rural Canada has been built in this way. Mr. Speaker, I know what neighbours mean. I am in Ottawa while my wife and family remain in Norboro, a rural community, and yet I live in Ottawa confidently—not that I lack concern for my family, but rather because I have the firm confidence that should the most minor need occur, my neighbours will heed any call for assistance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: In 1975, in his Mansion House speech in London, England, the Prime Minister of Canada expressed it so well:

> The key, as in all accomplishments of worth, lies within the scope of individual men and women. It is found in their attitudes toward others.

More recently the Prime Minister has asked Canadians to re-examine their attitudes. I agree wholeheartedly. We, as Canadians, must learn to cope with less energy, less capital and, indeed, with less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: It is in this spirit that I want to talk of Canada, and tell Canadians from all parts of this country of how Canada has helped maintain the best of our past, while pursuing the best for our future. In Prince Edward Island the Comprehensive Development Plan, a co-operative effort between the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the government of my province, has pursued the spirit of co-operation in a model program to be studied by the other provinces of Canada.

The Government of Canada has helped the people in Canada's littlest province to renew their faith in themselves by assisting farm families building industrial malls to promote small manufacturing and processing industries, and providing marketing support for basic producers. What Canada has meant to us is not just the opportunity to develop as we want to develop, but the encouragement and the help to do so.

Under the long term Prince Edward Island Plan, Mr. Speaker, the federal government pays 90 per cent of the cost, not for projects designed in Ottawa, but for projects designed by islanders and for islanders, with a sense of our heritage and our values. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the premier of our island province has, by initiating the Island Development Plan, allowed Prince Edward Island to confirm that being "little" can well mean being "big". In saying this I would like to note as well that this is not a one-way street. In helping us to make these things happen, and I am sure similar things are happening in other provinces, Canada is truly investing in its own future.

The inventiveness of islanders as they pursue small but satisfying development, is of value to this nation. I would like to challenge any province of Canada to lay claim that it has outdone my little province in the field of resource experimentation, and the recent development of alternative sources of energy from the sun and wind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: Federal-provincial relations are the key. If any province in Canada lacks the foresight to obtain a key to unlock the door of development of its resources, no matter in what aspect of the economy, it is not the federal government that is to blame, for in Prince Edward Island we are keenly aware of the avenues available to us once that door has been unlocked. This is not to say that we have all the answers, for indeed we do not. It is to say, however, that I am proud of my constituents, my premier, and all Prince Edward Islanders and the contributions they are making to this nation, Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wood: It is in this context that I, as a Canadian, take pleasure in seconding the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Louis Hébert (Mr. Dawson), and in expressing to Her Majesty our appreciation for having added her gracious and admirable presence as we begin a new session of parliament to address the future of our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

On motion of Mr. Clark the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Trudeau the House adjourned at 5.46 p.m.

THE LATE MARY STANFIELD

TRIBUTES TO LATE WIFE OF MEMBER FOR HALIFAX

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, all of us appreciate the fine words you spoke yesterday on behalf of all members of this House in expressing the deep regret of members of this Chamber at the death yesterday of the wife of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

All of us who knew Mrs. Stanfield are saddened by her passing, but are sustained by the memory of a vibrant, natural, sensitive woman. Politics is sometimes a stuffy business, and Mary Stanfield would let none of us get away with that. To Canadians across the country she brought a gift of warmth and wit—

—in both official languages. Indeed, it is an expression of her character that she learned the French language here and that she spoke it with verve and pleasure.

[English]

Those of us who were privileged to be her friends knew a charity and a concern for others that went well beyond the call of her responsibilities. She was fresh air in our lives, our party and our country. We extend to the family our condolences at her passing and our gratitude for sharing her with us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of our party, I should like to express our very deep sympathy to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) at the loss of his wife, Mary. To all of us who had the privilege of knowing her, she shall be remembered as a very happy lady who was always eager to share warmth and friendship with all members and their families, regardless of which party they represented. We extend our sincere condolences to my hon. friend and his family, particularly those who were close to her.

[Translation]

And I would like to take the opportunity to say to the House how Mrs. Stanfield was admired when she was visiting French communities in Canada. She was a great lady, very charming and gay. She had really understood, as it is more and more accepted among all Canadians, that it is possible to be a genuine Canadian and, at the same time, have access to both official languages of our country. To Mr. Stanfield and his family, I present my deepest sympathy on behalf of all members of the House.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members of my party, I should like to join with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) to express our deep grievance at the passing of this frank and engaging woman, a woman who brought joy to all who knew her. We extend to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) our deepest sympathies at this time, and we express our hope that the grief which will come from this sad passing will soon be overcome in his life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1410)

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues, I wish to join the representatives of the three other parties in offering our most sincere condolences to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), his wife having passed away. I must point out that last year, when my own father passed away, the Stanfield family and members of my family met repeatedly, which means that we share all the more the pain of those difficult moments. Mrs. Stanfield was acknowledged as a great Canadian lady, and the fact that she could speak French was always greatly appreciated by our group of members of parliament who come mainly from Quebec. Once again, our deepest condolences to the hon. member for Halifax.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTION CANADA BRING QUESTION OF AIR PIRACY BEFORE UNITED NATIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I make this motion in the belief that the seriousness and the gravity of the threat posed by international terrorists to the lives and safety of innocent persons will persuade members of this House to give it unanimous consent. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

Agriculture

That this House commends the West German government for the courageous handling of this week's highjacking and expresses its deepest condolences to the family of the murdered pilot. Further, that this House calls for a positive response to the appeal by the International Federation of Airlines Pilots Association for renewed international efforts to eliminate air piracy and requests that the Canadian government take an immediate initiative to bring this matter before the United Nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require that, to set aside the business of the day for the introduction and discussion of this motion, there must be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ALLEGED INVITATION TO PREMIER LÉVESQUE TO ADDRESS FRENCH ASSEMBLY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the report that an invitation has been sent to the premier of the province of Quebec to address the French National Assembly, an act which would constitute a provocative incursion by France into Canadian domestic affairs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the government to investigate this report immediately and if confirmed, to formally protest this action with the government of France and request its withdrawal.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Jack Horner said "no".

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR QUEBEC FLUID MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the dispute between the Canadian Dairy Commission and the Quebec Federation of Fluid Milk Producers which has delayed the payment of funds to fluid milk producers; considering that those milk producers are experiencing serious financial problems, those conditions giving rise to problems in the milling trade burdened with the credit; since the withholding of funds means that the producers have become hostages pending the settlement of the constitutional dispute, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House recommend that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) authorize the dispatch of funds to producers pending the judgment delivered by the courts on that constitutional issue.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have taken a few moments to permit, at the usual time, the presentation of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, but in the days that lie ahead of us I think hon. members will want to reflect on the fact that these days are to be devoted to the debate on the Speech from the Throne which traditionally, and clearly within our precedents and practices, means that, within reason, any subject is open for discussion. It is therefore difficult, within the language of Standing Order 43, to seriously consider an application to set aside that kind of debate to debate something else because there is no restriction on the subject that any hon. member can raise in participating in the throne speech debate. Therefore, in future days perhaps hon. members might want to be guided by that understanding in making applications to transfer one subject for another in the remaining days on the throne speech debate.

FINANCE

IMPACT ON INFLATION OF DEVALUATION OF DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would he indicate to the House the inflationary impact of the devaluation of our dollar to date?

● (1416)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is quite impossible to give an exact description of the inflationary impact of the devaluation of our dollar. Of course, it is one factor of the problem, but it is impossible to say exactly to what extent the devaluation of the Canadian dollar will influence inflation.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Minister of Finance. Could he indicate if he agrees with his own official, Dr. Hood, who has indicated before a committee of this House that he estimates that every reduction of one cent in our dollar would result in inflation of .3 per cent over a two year period, which would mean that as a result of the 13 cent reduction we already have in the Canadian dollar there is approximately a 4 per cent inflation factor built into our economy for the next two years?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course Dr. Hood expressed his own views, but he also invited hon. members to be cautious. As to his interpretation, he said that all other factors being equal, which is not the case, the effect would be felt over a period of two to three years and not necessarily during the first year. As I said, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely impossible to determine exactly the inflationary effect of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. However, I must admit that it is an inflationary factor.

[English]

ALLEGED USE OF RESERVES OF UNITED STATES DOLLARS TO STABILIZE CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): My question is again for the Minister of Finance. As the minister told us on Monday, "the governor of the bank is not intervening with regard to the floating of the Canadian dollar", and as the Bank of Canada published figures show that our U.S. foreign exchange reserves have fallen 27 per cent so far this year, would the minister indicate where the funds have disappeared if they have not been used in exchange trades?

● (1417)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member has not made the proper distinction. Intervention would mean that the governor would have received instructions to peg the Canadian dollar, and there has been no such thing. Everyone knows that the governor of the bank is involved with the market in order to make sure that the operation of the market is carried out normally. Everyone knows that he is, but he is not intervening in order to stabilize the dollar.

REASON FOR MISCALCULATION OF REAL GROWTH IN THE ECONOMY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Minister of Finance. Given the fact that only six months ago the government predicted that the real growth of the economy would be 4 per cent and that it is only going to be 2 per cent, why was there such a gross error in the calculations?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think everyone knows that the economies of all nations are faced with the same problem. When I was in Washington international organizations like the IMF and the OECD predicted that the growth in the world would be 5 per cent. They have reported to all the ministers that the growth was to be only 2 per cent, exactly the same proportions we are facing in Canada.

ALLEGATION FALSE INFORMATION ON REAL GROWTH IN ECONOMY PROVIDED PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance would take time to check private forecasts, he might find that the degree of error there was much less than that of his own department. This is not an academic question because the provinces have made their budget calculations on the basis of the forecasts made by his department. These forecasts have been very wrong. What is the minister going to do for the provinces which are in difficulty now because they budgeted on the basis of false information provided by the federal government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, every level of government is affected by this problem. In fact, the federal government is affected more than the provinces because of the stabilization programs for revenue. The slow growth of the Canadian economy will cost the Canadian federal taxpayer $400 million more which we will have to accommodate within our budget.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister misses the purport of the question.

An hon. Member: What is that noise?

An hon. Member: Hold it, Jim.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should wait until we get the technical difficulties corrected.

An hon. Member: Your horn is stuck, Chrétien.

POSSIBILITY OF ACTION TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC FORECASTING

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): The problem I am trying to isolate and the problem with which I want the minister to deal is not the fact that the economy has slowed down, although that is the responsibility of the government. Much more importantly, a serious problem has plagued this government for a long time in policy making, and that problem is caused by gross errors made in his department. Since the minister has become the Minister of Finance has he taken any measures to try to improve the technical operations within his department with relation to forecasting and prognostications about the way this economy is operating?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is rather complicated to make predictions on the economic level, and if you look at the predictions made by economists, you will see that they seldom agree unanimously. In any case, to give a specific answer to the hon. member's question, I asked my officials to meet immediately with their provincial counterparts to have the same basis for discussion. A technical meeting on this subject is scheduled for next week.

MANPOWER

UNEMPLOYMENT—POSSIBILITY OF NEW FORECAST

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It too deals with forecasts. The report which was produced by his department and which I released two days ago included a forecast for unemployment levels for this year and next year of 7.3 per cent and 7.6 per cent respectively. Since the actual rate of unemployment for the present year is now averaging 8 per cent, well above what was forecast just last spring, will the minister inform the House if the same group of people in his department have done a new forecast or, if not this group, someone with a little more foresight? Has such a forecast been done and, if so, will the minister tell us the results?

● (1422)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate that officials in the department should have a continuing watch on the unemployment level. If the hon. member will check his figures, I think he will see that the actual figure is about 7.5 per cent, but the figures that are quoted here are 7.4 and 7.6. The 8.3 and 8.2 he is referring to are on a seasonally adjusted basis. The other aspect I would bring to the hon. member's attention is that he was quoted wildly or widely in the press—

Mr. Broadbent: Both.

Mr. Cullen: Maybe both, to the effect that the unemployment rate would increase at a rate of about 2 per cent per year. In fact, that report made reference to an increase in the labour force. I do not know whether the hon. member was mistaken or the press has again made an error in reporting what he actually said.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister must know it could not have been possible that I was mistaken in the statement. I say that with all due modesty.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I now ask the minister if he will answer the question. The question is whether a new study has been done. Whether the report of the study is accurate or not, what is accurate is that the forecasts made in the study have turned out to be false. Unemployment rates are now higher than the forecasts. Has a new forecast been done? If so, will he tell us what it is? Related to that, since the study stated it will cost some $4 billion next year in unemployment insurance payouts, will the minister advise what the new figure will be? It will surely be higher.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I guess we can argue all day about figures of the kind the hon. member mentions, and whether he was quoted correctly or incorrectly in the press. In fact, as a result of seeing the worsening situation, this government saw fit to move from $358 million to $458 million for direct job creation programs. My own department has something like $1,200 million in that particular field which strikes me as a pretty adequate response from one federal department to cope with the problem we have.

SUGGESTED USE OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUNDS FOR JOB-CREATION PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, that is two questions in a row the minister has refused to answer. I now want to ask him a third question. Since the actual level of unemployment in Canada is just beyond 1.3 million and since unemployment in the province of Newfoundland has reached the depression level of 1932, will the minister not agree it makes a lot more sense to spend the $4 billion that has been estimated for unemployment insurance on job creation?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker, if we had received the support of the hon. member's party and solid support for the development use of the unemployment insurance fund, it would have been a positive response and an appropriate use of the money that could be made available for that specific problem. The hon. member says his questions were not answered. Sometimes when you go on a fishing expedition, you do not catch anything.

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR QUEBEC FLUID MILK PRODUCERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Considering the present dispute between the Quebec Federation of Fluid Milk Producers and the Canadian Dairy Commission and given the fact that funds have been withheld on both sides since the month of May, could the minister tell the House whether there are new developments and whether negotiations between both organizations are maintained in order to reach an agreement and give justice to the producers who necessarily need their money to manage their business?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been discussion between the Canadian Dairy Commission and the producers concerned. We have had discussions with the farm organization in the province of Quebec. I want to make it clear that the holdback is equivalent to the skim-off to which we feel they are entitled to contribute. We feel they have benefitted from the subsidy and it is not on the total product they are shipping—it is equivalent to the surplus they ship which goes to the industrial market.

● (1427)

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary. I understand very well the answer the minister just gave the House, but as everyone seems to stand firm on his positions, could the minister tell the House what steps would be taken as soon as possible to come to a settlement, for fluid milk producers in Quebec see that as a matter of jurisdiction, and thus a constitutional matter. So, given the circumstances, may I ask if the minister could tell the House whether he intends to carry on as quickly as possible with the negotiations or whether legal measures will be taken to settle the problem?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Well, at the July meeting of provincial ministers of agriculture held in Victoria, B.C., I, as Minister of Agriculture of Canada, stated on behalf of the federal government that they could make their contributions in any way they wished—we did not say they had to make a levy on whole milk producers; we wanted the equivalent of $12.5 million from all across Canada. We thought this was a reasonable amount to ask them to contribute toward the cost of distributing surplus industrial milk products on world markets. Some provinces have already made agreements—I believe five of them have done so.

FLUID MILK—REQUEST FOR PAYMENT OF FULL SUBSIDY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I think that the government has a legal obligation to pay these subsidies to the milk producers, but I also understand, Mr. Speaker, the difficulties encountered by the Minister of Agriculture regarding the refusal of fluid milk producers to pay back the 25 cents. I will therefore ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he is prepared to enforce this piece of legislation which was passed by his own government and to pay these subsidies to milk producers. The present position of the government is a form of blackmail—if you do not pay back the 25 cents you do not get subsidies. Everybody knows that the milk producers would not be able to win against the government. I simply ask the minister whether he is prepared to enforce a legislation passed by his own Parliament?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's interpretation of the law is different from mine. I suggest he read it again: the law clearly says the government may pay a subsidy—it does not say the government shall pay a subsidy. Some of the provinces have already amended their provincial legislation to comply with the request we made, because they thought it was fair and equitable.

ALLEGED MOVEMENT OF INVESTMENT MONEY TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the past 12 months over $627 billion of Canadian money has been invested in the United States and businesses are openly moving to the United States because of the poor political climate here in Canada. What measures has the hon. gentleman been taking to stop this mass exodus of investment money and the movement of business to the United States which will only add to our unemployment problem here?

Hon. J. H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I should like to thank the hon. member for the question. We enjoy in Canada complete freedom of investment and a free country. I should like to tell the hon. member that in 1975 the Americans invested something like $5.1 billion in Canada, that in 1976 they invested something like $5.6 billion in Canada and that in the year 1977 the Americans will be investing more than $6 billion here. So, we have to accept the fact that some Canadians may want to invest some money in that country.

Mr. McKenzie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would certainly challenge the minister's figures. For the first time in 40 years more money is leaving Canada than is coming in. Since the United States is opening up offices in Canada and holding symposiums in Canada in order to assist Canadian businesses to move because of the political climate here, is the minister saying that he is going to take no action at all in dealing with this serious problem?

Mr. Horner: I would be the first to admit, Mr. Speaker, that we have a very difficult political climate in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I am overwhelmed that the Conservative party has finally realized that, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The root of the political problems in Canada today stems from the fact that a portion of our country, with something like 27 or 28 per cent of the population, expresses a desire to separate. That is creating a somewhat uncertain economic climate in our country and I am glad that the official opposition realizes it.

Oral Questions

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY MINISTERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister I should like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister, whom I presume is the Minister of Finance. My question refers to order paper questions answered Monday which revealed that cabinet ministers have used government aircraft 5,000 times in the last several years at public expense to travel to many places, including to a large extent to their constituencies. For example, the Minister of Agriculture has travelled 188 times to Windsor and back. Will the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the government will issue immediately an order to stop this practice which is costing millions of dollars; if it will not issue such an order, why not?

● (1436)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are well known regulations to that effect, and ministers abide by them at all times. The aircraft are at the ministers' disposal in the performance of their ministerial duties, which may sometimes involve a flight back or to their constituencies. I think the procedure is well known. The regulations very much work to Canada's best interests.

[English]

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister refers to the fact that during the past few weeks the Prime Minister has been saying a great deal about restraint on the part of the Canadian people. Let me ask him this. Will the government immediately stop such flights as the one made by the Minister of Agriculture from his Windsor constituency to the resort area of Myrtle Beach in the Carolinas; and finally, is it government policy that there should be one code of restraint for cabinet ministers and another code of restraint for the Canadian people?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that nor other flights. I know the procedure is well known. Ministers use the aircraft when needed in the performance of their duties. Of course they have been invited a number of times, both by myself when President of Treasury Board and by my successor, to show restraint in the use of aircraft.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which would normally be directed to the President of the Privy Council and which in his absence I will direct to the Acting Prime Minister. Further to the statement of the President of the Privy council to this House on February 4 last, can the Acting Prime Minister state whether or not a chairman of the special committee to review the Public Service Employment Act has been appointed and, if so, whether or not this special committee intends to hold public hearings. If it does so intend, when?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to reply to the hon. member but I will pass his question to the President of the Privy Council. If he is not here tomorrow I will be delighted to give him an answer.

FEDERAL COURT ACT

ALLEGED USE TO DENY INFORMATION—REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Having in mind the emphasis placed in the Speech from the Throne on human rights and open government—somewhat belated but nevertheless appetizing—is the hon. gentleman prepared to submit to a committee of this House the right to inquire into the extent to which the government has made undue use and probably abuse of its powers under the Federal Court Act to deny information to people, particularly to public inquiries, a use which has often resulted, as in the case of Mr. Walter Rudnicki, in the denial of public and civil rights?

[Translation]

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that when a minister on this side signs an affidavit under section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, whether myself or any other minister, he is acting under a statute and authority granted by this Parliament. I would add that there is not only the power but a duty to do so in these circumstances.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members on this side of the House are well aware of the law; what we doubt is the use the government is making of that law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Is the minister, with that usual good humour which he has as an able minister, prepared at least, if he is not going to submit the matter to a committee, to make a statement to this House within a very short time telling us exactly what the government has been doing, for example, in the Laycraft inquiry into crime in the province of Quebec, issues which concern us on this side of the House very much indeed?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Laycraft inquiry there was, of course, an affidavit submitted by myself which has absolutely nothing to do with the subject matter of the inquiry, and I answered questions specifically on that matter before the House. There was also an affidavit, I understand, filed by the then Minister of National Revenue, with questions also asked in the House. As far as the FLQ matter is concerned, I have, of course, filed affidavits under section 41(2), which I consider not only to be a power but really a duty on my part as custodian, in part, of files relating to national security of this country. This is a duty which has been imposed on me or given to me by parliament and I intend to exercise that duty.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL ATTORNEYS GENERAL ON USE OF SECTION 41(2)—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the same topic for the Minister of Justice with whom I discussed this matter last March. At that time he indicated that he had had discussions 15 months before that with the provincial attorneys general about the use of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. Could the hon. gentleman bring the House and the country up to date on whether he has got anything new to report about the excessive use of this regressive section?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my answers earlier indicated that what I had discussed with the provincial attorneys general was revisions of the Federal Court Act, not specifically the particular sections to which the hon. member is referring. Work is still proceeding on revision of the Federal Court Act, including section 28; when legislation might be introduced to this House I am unable to say.

Mr. MacKay: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the scathing comments that Chief Justice Deschenes of the Quebec Civil Court had to make about section 41(2), and in view of the fact that the minister has conceded that it is indeed part of the Federal Court Act, I would expect a more specific answer.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED BUGGING OF ALBERTA ATTORNEY GENERAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General and concerns the Laycraft inquiry. In September of this year the attorney general of the province of Alberta indicated that he believed he had been bugged by the RCMP. That allegation has been known to the Solicitor General since September. Can he now advise the House whether that allegation is correct? If it is correct, can he advise the House whether that bugging was authorized under the wiretap law passed by this parliament in 1974?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I understand there was indeed such an allegation. The commanding officer of the force in Alberta met with the attorney general of that province and I understand the attorney general of that province was entirely satisfied with the result of that meeting. There were no bugs involved and there was no surveillance by the RCMP of the attorney general of Alberta.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN FORCE AND NATIONAL REVENUE—FAILURE TO NOTIFY ALBERTA ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In addition to the question of bugging, the attorney general of Alberta insisted that he was never advised of an agreement between the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP concerning the exchange of information between them with regard to the investigation of crime in the province of Alberta. Can the Solicitor General advise why the chief law enforcement officer of the province of Alberta was not advised of secret agreements between DNR and the RCMP on matters that concern his province?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there was, of course, an agreement which was entered into in 1972 between the Department of National Revenue and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The object of that agreement was to increase the fight or to enhance the possibility of having greater success in the fight against organized crime in this country, an approach which had a great deal of success in the United States and we feel is most appropriate in this country also. Of course, the success of this agreement depended a great deal on the agreement not becoming generally known to the members of organized crime in this country. Once again, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of that agreement was to enhance the possibility of having greater success in the fight against organized crime in this country.

Mr. Leggatt: The Royal American shows have never been described as a part of organized crime at any time, at the time that that inquiry took place. Yet, that secret agreement was used to conduct an exchange of information. It is entirely possible that that exchange of information was illegal under the laws of Canada. My question is this: how does the Solicitor General justify the use of that secret agreement against an organization in which no one, as far as the Laycraft Commission has been able to determine, formed any part of organized crime?

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, of course the hon. member is prejudging the results of the Laycraft inquiry. There is an inquiry ongoing in the province of Alberta at the moment on this matter. However, I should like to refer to one aspect of the case concerning the existence of that agreement between the Department of National Revenue and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. While it was not a widely known agreement, it was known to all people involved in the enforcement of it, both in the Department of National Revenue and in the RCMP.

An hon. Member: How about the Attorney General?

Mr. Fox: The agreement was made public by this government during the course of that inquiry in response to a request by the inquiry. There was never any question of keeping the agreement completely secret.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF COPY OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN FORCE AND NATIONAL REVENUE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, since the agreement of 1972 between the RCMP and the Department of National Revenue has been disclosed in the Laycraft inquiry, and the minister has referred to it here, is he or the Minister of National Revenue prepared to table a copy of that agreement for the purposes of the House?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member has not received a copy of the joint press release which has been sent out by both the Minister of National Revenue and myself. We have issued a public statement to which we have annexed the complete text of that memorandum of understanding between his department and mine. If it is the desire of the House, I am prepared to table copies of it in both official languages for the purposes of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): And supporting documents.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE ATLANTIC REGION—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question could have been directed to the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion had he been here; but I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Given the absence in the throne speech of any new or innovative measures to combat high unemployment in the Atlantic area particularly, can the minister indicate to the House, in order to understand the basis of his intervention later on in the throne speech debate, whether he essentially agrees with the Economic Council of Canada that there is in fact an underutilized economic resource there and that a stimulation would not overly generate inflationary pressures, or whether he agrees with his predecessor that any innovative intervention in this area by using fiscal matters might over-pressurize the inflationary tendencies? Which approach does he intend to use in directing himself and his government's intention toward unemployment in the Atlantic area?

● (1446)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall have an opportunity to speak on that problem tomorrow evening at eight o'clock when I shall address the House of Commons.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RADIO-MUTUEL CONFLICT—POSSIBILITY OF FEDERAL INTERVENTION

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

The Radio-Mutuel dispute has been going on for more than nine months in stations at Trois-Rivières, Sherbrooke, Quebec City and Montreal without a solution in sight, and management seems unwilling to negotiate. I wonder if the minister would inform the House whether his department intends to act in this dispute.

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should advise the hon. member that we have already intervened in the matter. A mediator moved into the situation last Friday, and I hope he will be successful in resolving the dispute.

POSSIBLE RETURN OF CROSS KIDNAPPERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the fact that in the Speech from the Throne there was some suggestion regarding amendments to be made to the Criminal Code, can the Minister of Justice inform the House and Canadian people if there is any suggestion of an application by the Premier of Quebec or anyone else concerning the voluntary exiles who were connected with the Cross kidnapping? If they wish to return to Canada will they go through the due process of law and be tried by courts as to their innocence or guilt?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the apparent request made to the Premier of Quebec has been passed on to any federal authorities at this point. There are outstanding charges and warrants of arrest against the persons involved laid by the authorities in the province of Quebec. If the persons involved return to Canada, I would presume those warrants of arrest and charges would be proceeded with. Of course that would be a decision within the responsibilities of the province of Quebec. When the question was asked, it would appear to me that the indications from this House show that we would all want the province of Quebec to act on those warrants.

In so far as requests for pardons are concerned, there is no provision in federal law for the granting of pardons to people who have not been convicted of a crime. Thus, there is no prospect of ever considering a pardon in this particular case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, if there was an agreement in writing between those voluntary exiles when they left the country because of that crime of kidnapping a foreign representative, would the minister file in the House any agreement between those people and the federal government?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I was not involved at the time of that kidnapping. Whether of not there were agreements made in writing, I am not aware of them. I do not believe there were, but I will inquire into it.

FISHERIES

REASON FOR FAILURE TO MENTION FISHERIES POLICY IN THRONE SPEECH

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the need for an extensive fisheries development plan in Atlantic Canada, which plan would take into consideration the need for improving the inshore as well as the offshore fleet, especially as it applies to the harvesting of those species of fish which we are now giving away to foreigners within our 200-mile zone, will the minister indicate to the House why there was no mention of a fisheries policy for Canada in yesterday's throne speech?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there are many issues which will arise in this parliament and the administrative acts of this government that were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I hope the hon. member does not share the view of some of those who advocate that we give away at the back door or the side door the jurisdiction which we have painfully gained by the front door.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDUSTRY

MINING—REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that policies of this government regarding the mining industry in Canada are creating ghost towns in Canada, and particularly in the Sudbury basin where 4,000 Falconbridge workers just returned to work after a six-week lay-off, where INCO is presently threatening extensive lay-offs and cutbacks and Falconbridge has announced the loss of 500 jobs by the end of December, 1977, is the minister aware of the severe situation in the mining industry, particularly the nickel and copper industries? Can he tell the House what specific steps he intends to take so that we do not end up with ghost towns in the Sudbury basin that not even a taxation data centre can save?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this question and I should like to reveal to the hon. member and to the House the deep concern the government has with regard to the complete mineral industry. As he knows, as I know and as the House is probably aware, the entire world market for minerals today is one we would call very soft. We are exploring every avenue to ensure that jobs are maintained in Canada.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that stockpiling both uranium and gold was used in the past by this government to secure the employment of workers in those industries, is the minister prepared to consider such a program in the nickel and copper industries in order to secure the continued employment and productivity of these workers in the Sudbury basin?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, this whole suggestion is being examined.

GOVERNMENT VIEW OF MEASURES TO ENSURE RIGHTS OF PALESTINIANS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the Speech from the Throne was empty of any reference to Canada's role in international affairs, does the minister support the formal declaration of the United States and the Soviet Union that a new Middle East peace conference should ensure the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been in constant discussion and consultation with the governments concerned on this whole question. As the hon. member knows, there is considerable argument about the specific meaning of words. I do not believe anything would be gained by me emphasizing particular words such as "legitimate" or "homeland". The Canadian position is precisely what it has been all along. We recognize that the Palestinian position must be taken into account in any settlement. We feel that settlement is best arrived at through discussion between all the parties, hopefully at Geneva, and if not there, elsewhere.

Mr. Wenman: In view of the minister's recognition of the importance of the Middle East as the central issue in the United Nations this year and his call for, "short, precise and practical resolutions", is it the intention of the minister to take advantage of Canada's position on the security council to introduce new practical resolution initiatives in the Security Council of the United Nations.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I think the operative words in the hon. member's question are the words with reference to the resolutions being practical. If it appears that some initiative in the Security Council, in addition to those presently underway in various other groups, would advance the situation, then of course Canada would be pleased to do so. It is my judgment at the moment that it is best left to the negotiating parties, for the time being at least, and that if there is to be action in the Security Council it is likely to come later in the present year.

INQUIRY WHETHER FOOTWEAR IMPORTS WILL DECREASE

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. But first of all, I wish to congratulate the minister on his appointment to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Having said so, I want to bring again the attention of the House on the serious problems which our footwear industry is going through because of massive imports of shoes in this country. Would the minister tell us whether imports of footwear in Canada have decreased or will decrease in the coming days?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In answer to the hon. member's question let me say that the whole footwear industry has just gone through an exhaustive study and the department is sifting through that study. I can assure the hon. member we are watching the industry with a great deal of care.

Mr. Beaudoin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Last July the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance introduced an interim report concerning the Anti-dumping Tribunal and footwear imports. Therefore, would the minister be prepared to let us know what progress is being made in these proceedings following the publication of a report by this Anti-dumping Tribunal and what he and his department intend to do to solve the matter once and for all, in order to avoid that too many lay-offs take place in the footwear industry, in the riding of Richmond and elsewhere?

[Mr. Wenman.]

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the footwear industry in Canada through my answer to the hon. member's question that we intend to maintain it. We intend to make certain that it is capable of securing a large portion of the Canadian market and our efforts will be directed towards that goal.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TEXTILES—REQUEST FOR RETENTION OF IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance in his former position regulated quotas for the import of textiles. The present minister seems to be doing away with those, and since there is no mention of them in the throne speech, would the minister, either today or in his speech tomorrow night, confirm that those quotas will stay in place for the benefit of the many people who are employed in that industry, in my area at least?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Everyone knows that I maintain very good relations with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and we are in complete accord on the policies which he will announce or has already announced.

An hon. Member: Which policy?

HEALTH

INSULIN—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON POSSIBLE PRODUCTION CUTS AND PRICE INCREASES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but first I would like to preface it by offering her our best wishes for health and wealth and good advice in her new portfolio. Would the minister investigate and report to the House on the disturbing news to Canadian diabetics about cuts in insulin production and its increased price?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the doctor for his good wishes and those of my other colleagues in the House. As to the serious question on insulin, I will ask the hon. member to give me until tomorrow to present a report to the House.

MEASURES TO AID SMALL BUSINESS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister responsible for Small Business, I would like to put my question to the Minister of Finance. After years of government studies related to the problems of small business the government at long last has come up with a program which basically outlines the government's intention to continue to study the problems of small business. In yesterday's Throne Speech three full words were dedicated to the largest potential employment sector in Canada. I would like to ask the minister whether or not he can assure the small businessmen in Canada that some specific and realistic incentive oriented programs will be introduced forthwith by the government before it is too late for the small businessmen, such as some programs which have been detailed by members on this side of the House on several occasions in the past.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): If I have any announcement to make, it will be made at another time. However, I am glad to note that the hon. member is aware that we have been working very hard to assist small business and that it is bringing some good results.

CRIMINAL CODE

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO OBSCENITY AND PORNOGRAPHY PROVISIONS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Because of concern for the present apparent weaknesses in the Canadian obscenity and pornography laws embodied in the Criminal Code, is the government planning to introduce remedial legislation in this session or, if not, will the government refer this matter to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs so that it can study the difficult problems involved?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): I have been consulting with the provincial attorneys general on possible amendments to the wording in the code and some amendments are under consideration. I cannot undertake at present to say when we will be able to lay before parliament changes in the law. In the meantime, the provincial attorneys general and I have agreed that the best possible way to proceed would be by active law enforcement within the provinces against those distributing pornography and active surveillance by the Department of National Revenue at the border in terms of the customs operation with regard to the importation of pornography into Canada.

Mr. Dick: I thank the minister for his very informative reply and I would like to ask whether or not he would consider and inquire from the attorneys general of various provinces whether their correspondence could be tabled and referred to the standing committee so that the standing committee could also discuss this important matter and perhaps give some assistance to the Minister of Justice and to his department.

Mr. Basford: Yes, I will consider that, Mr. Speaker.

NEWSPRINT—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Canadian share of the U.S. newsprint market has dropped from 80 per cent to approximately 60 per cent, what new initiatives does the minister have to strengthen the Canadian pulp and paper industry which generates about $1 out of every $8 in the export market?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, here again we recognize the fact that newsprint and pulp and paper are in a soft market in today's world and we are doing everything we can.

An hon. Member: What are you doing about it?

An hon. Member: According to you everything is soft.

An hon. Member: And so are you, Jack.

Mr. Horner: We are doing everything we can to assist the newsprint and the pulp and paper industry in Canada.

Mr. Epp: The minister keeps on using the words "we are doing everything we can". What do those words mean specifically?

Mr. Horner: First of all, in doing everything we can, we must recognize the situation in which we find ourselves, and that is more than the opposition does. We recognize that position. We realize that in many cases our industry does not achieve the productivity level necessary to allow it to compete with the United States.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Horner: To some extent it is the wages. Hon. members in the NDP ask why not. It is to a great extent because our wages have been higher than those in American industry. By recognizing those problems we can find the answers.

PRIVILEGE

MR. WHELAN—QUESTION BY MR. COSSITT

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege regarding the question which the hon. member for Leeds asked the Minister of Finance. The hon. member referred to a trip I took to Myrtle Beach. I want to make it clear that I was invited there by the Southern Agriculture Chemical Association for a seminar, to explain the legislation we have in Canada which is the envy of the people of the United States of America.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: Whether intentionally or otherwise, the hon. member intimated that this was a pleasure trip. We were in Myrtle Beach less than 20 hours. No members of my family were included. There were staff people with me on that trip, and that was all. I say emphatically that as Minister of Agriculture, my duty is to serve this country in the best fashion I know. No one can prove that I used government aircraft to do anything other than serve this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the minister has only scratched the surface and given a very distorted view. Therefore, I feel I have a right to make absolutely clear what I said and to ask that he not distort my words in this house. For example, the Minister of Agriculture also went to Miami on February 22 of this year.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Cossitt: I feel that the government is allowing cabinet ministers, particularly the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Transport, and others, to breach the privileges of members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As it arises, the question of privilege relates only to comments which were made during the question period. I think the hon. member for Leeds ought to be given equal time, but he ought to confine himself strictly to that point.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I can only conclude by raising a new question of privilege. If it does not pertain to the point raised by the minister, it certainly pertains to a subject which concerns the minister; that is, that this government is allowing cabinet ministers to breach the privileges of parliament by allowing them to take government aircraft and to fly wherever they wish, living it up big at the taxpayers' expense. No one on this side of the House has that right, and we do not want that right, but I would like to know why it is not a breach of the privileges of parliament when this government goes against what is obviously decent practice and allows its ministers to run all over the place, at public expense, on personal holidays. The minister has made 188 trips to Windsor riding and back, at public expense, to visit his constituents. I cannot do that and no one on this side can do it.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister of Agriculture raised, by way of a question of privilege, whatever dispute he wanted to raise with respect to the insinuations or other effects of the remarks made during the question period by the hon. member for Leeds. The last remarks by the hon. member for Leeds are a repetition of something he said during the question period. It would not be appropriate, now, to carry on and raise that as a new argument, because that was said. If there was any difference or disagreement with it, that might have been raised at the first instance. In any case, the matter has been raised and contributed to by both sides. It does not, by any stretch of the imagination, constitute a question of privilege, and the matter ought to finish there.

MR. BROADBENT—ANSWER BY MINISTER OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a question of privilege pertaining to an answer given in the House on Monday by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the course of a short answer he managed, in my view, to misinform the House very seriously in two important respects.

He was replying to a question by the hon. member for Windsor West concerning developments in the auto industry, which are of concern to Canadians everywhere because we have some 20,000 fewer jobs in the industry than we ought to have. The point and substance of the answer was that Canada was using about 8.9 per cent of the automotive parts actually produced on this continent. I would like to know where the minister got that figure. I interjected at the time and said that it was 12 per cent. The minister carried on with his answer and said, "No, 8.9 per cent".

Subsequently, I checked with the minister's department. An official in his department said he did not know where the minister got his figure, because the department does not have that information. I checked with the Canadian Automotive Parts Association, and it does not have that figure. The figure of 12 per cent which I used is the most recent one. It is for 1975. For a variety of reasons, it is inconceivable to me that the only other figure which might now be available to the minister for 1976 could be anywhere approaching what the minister suggests. As I said, his department suggests that it did not provide the figure. Therefore, I would like to know where the minister got his information, because it is a serious error.

Second, and perhaps even more important in terms of misleading the House, the minister said that, naturally, we in this country would like to see equality of consumption compared with production. He went on to say:

> We are having discussions with the major automotive manufacturers today to see whether that can be done.

I checked with General Motors, Chrysler and Ford. All those companies denied that they had any meeting with the minister or planned to have a meeting that day. I checked with another major automotive association to see if it could have been involved in such a meeting and it, too, denied that it was. It seems very strange indeed, because most of the officials in this industry were at a convention on the west coast. I would like to ask the minister either to correct the record, because I think he has seriously misinformed the House, and/or to offer an apology to hon. members of the House.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying about people who use figures and about what figures really mean. I am not going to dispute whether the figure is 8.9 per cent or 12 per cent. The information I have is that we in Canada use 8.9 per cent of the parts manufactured in North America—

Mr. Broadbent: Source?

Mr. Horner: —and not 12 per cent. I stand by the 8.9 per cent figure I gave the hon. member on Monday. I would like to take this opportunity to point out that I did not read the blues. Hansard indicates that we were meeting with the automotive manufacturers "today". I meant to say that we will be meeting with them throughout this month and next month. The word "today" was misused either by me or by Hansard, and that is the only mistake in Monday's Hansard which I will accept.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise this question of privilege. The minister followed the contribution made by the hon. member. The matter reduces itself to a dispute as to the accuracy of facts. It is now well on the record. That, clearly, is a matter for debate and dispute, it does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a brief point of order with respect to the observation you made at the beginning of the proceedings today regarding motions under Standing Order 43. Your Honour suggested—I take it it was a suggestion only, and I hope it was not a ruling—that hon. members might consider limiting themselves with respect to the subject matter of motions under Standing Order 43, on the ground that they could raise matters during the course of the throne speech debate. The fact is that some hon. members will be able to raise matters at that time, but not all members because of the limitation of time.

The other significant difference—and I say this with deference—is the difference between what is a motion under Standing Order 43 and what is a speech and what matters can be raised. A motion under Standing Order 43, under the terms of our rules, is a motion moved on an urgent basis, and whether or not there is an opportunity for anyone to speak about it, its purpose is to raise a matter which is considered urgent. The Chair can always rule it out of order as not being urgent. However, that is something the Chair has to do. It is only a motion. It is an opportunity for a member of this House to ask the House whether it can come to a conclusion. The difference between such a motion and a speech in the throne speech debate is that there are very few opportunities for motions during the throne speech debate. If we were to conduct the business with respect to Standing Order 43 in the way in which your Honour suggested, the right of members to make motions, as opposed to speeches, would be prohibited.

When a member moves a motion under Standing Order 43, the member is not asking for an opportunity to debate it. What the member is asking the House for, and hopes for, is that there will be a vote then and there on his opportunity, as a private member, to present a motion.

I listened to what Your Honour said. I did not think it was a ruling. However, I wanted to make these observations because I believe that if Your Honour's suggestion is followed, the right of members to make motions, as the rule states, on matters of urgent and pressing necessity, will be limited. Therefore, the rights of members of this House would be limited.

As House leader of the official opposition, I think it is important to bring this matter to Your Honour's attention. It affects not only opposition members but all members of this House who are not members of the government. It is an important right, a right that by tradition has become narrowed. But narrow as it is, it is still there. It ought not to be further limited, and there ought to be no implication about limitation. I say that with great respect.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton raises, by way of a point of order, a request for clarification of what I said earlier in the day. In the course of doing so he has made a misinterpretation of the effect of Standing Order 43, which ought to be cleared up.

What Standing Order 43 does is give private members the opportunity to ask the House to set aside the business of the day in order to debate something else. The motion is debatable. Accordingly, whenever consent is asked pursuant to Standing Order 43, consent is not simply being asked—this ought to be understood—that a motion be taken into consideration and voted upon at that moment; consent is being asked that the business of the House be set aside in order to launch upon debate on another matter.

I have said that in respect of days when the Speech from the Throne is under consideration, and similarly on budget days and opposition days, there seems to be a knee-jerk reaction, when we arrive at the hour appointed for Standing 43 motions, to suggest that the matter before the House, which permits the widest possible debate and discussion, be set aside in order to debate something else.

I want to strees this. It is quite proper for any member, during any day of House business, during the appointed time to introduce any motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. That right can never be taken away by the Chair. I only ask hon. members to consider seriously the situation in which they find themselves and the situation for which they are asking the consent of the House.

When we have a subject before the House which permits the greatest latitude for debate, there ought at least to be a second thought with regard to what the member is doing, that is, asking the House to set aside a matter in order to give that member an opportunity to speak and criticize the government on certain points, when in fact the subject matter before the House gives the member the widest possible latitude to attack the government, if that is the purport of the motion. It is with most.

Some motions would still qualify quite easily for intelligent consideration under Standing Order 43. I was simply asking members to exercise some discretion and judgment when doing so on a day on which the subject matter for debate is of such wide latitude.

Anti-Inflation Act

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order perhaps by way of a correction to Hansard. On Monday last I inadvertently misled the House when I accused the Minister of Employment and Immigration, in a question, of refusing to meet with the manpower ministers from the four Atlantic provinces. I misled the House, at the minister's expense, and consequently I apologize to the House and to the minister. I should have been critical of the minister for his failure to meet with the ten manpower ministers to discuss the national employment issue.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have checked carefully and ascertained that the fault was not that of the Prime Minister nor of his office. However, somewhere along the line a mistake got into the motion that he moved yesterday to reconstitute the committee on television and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees.

Our member on that committee should be the hon. member for Brant, rather than the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. We can make the change through the usual channels, but because it is on the record we should like to have the correction noted.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dennis Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker. I am sorry that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) is absent from the House. As I heard him replying today to questions asking for specifics in terms of action his department was planning to take, I thought the next thing he was going to do was make a distinction between the good industry and the bad industry in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My first serious words, Mr. Speaker—and it is difficult to be serious when referring to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—must be, personally and on behalf of the Progressive Conservative Party, the official opposition, to express our most sincere congratulations to Her Majesty the Queen on the occasion of her Silver Jubilee—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —and also to express our deep gratitude for the time she spent with us in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The outpouring of respect and affection for Her Majesty and for her family, which has been so apparent in recent days, is evidence of the very high regard and affection held for her by all Canadians across our land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have been greatly enriched by her presence among us, and look forward to her early return.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf as well as that, I am sure, of all my colleagues in this House, I wish to express to the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) our best wishes for a prompt recovery. I regret, as do all hon. members, the illness that struck him and express the unanimous wish of all, I am sure, that he can soon come back to take his place among us.

• (1522)

[English]

I should like, also, at this point to express my congratulations to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) on the outstanding way in which they opened the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They will understand, having seen me in their constituencies, that I am not exactly delighted they are here, and that I tried to stop their coming; but I welcome the contributions they made and wish to congratulate them.

I noted that when the hon. member for Malpeque was speaking, he referred to regional development problems particularly as they concern Prince Edward Island. If I might move from one island in that region to another, I would simply draw the attention of the House of Commons to a rare instance of consistency in policy on the part of the government of Canada as applied to the island of Cape Breton. I think that whenever we can find evidence of consistent policy from this Liberal government, it is well worth noting.

I remember, as I am sure most Canadians do, that some 25 years ago a predecessor of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), Hon. Walter Gordon, proposed, as a solution to the employment problems of Cape Breton, that the people of that island should simply get up and leave. Now, in that tradition, the minister has allowed the people of Cape Breton a passport office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: There are one or two matters to which I intend to refer briefly during my opening remarks in this debate. Colleagues of mine will be referring at greater length to other aspects of the Speech from the Throne. I want to make a brief, passing reference in the throne speech to a goal in the field of energy which my colleagues and I believe to be an absolutely inadequate one for Canada; that is, the repetition in the Speech from the Throne of Canada's goal of being simply a policy of self-reliance in the field of energy. In reality, that goal of self-reliance, as defined and pursued by the government, means increased dependence on foreigners for critical supplies of oil. We in this party believe that Canada, with more oil resources than Saudi Arabia, must work toward a policy of self-sufficiency for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This means no net imports of oil or of any other major fuel. I say to the House and to the Canadian people that in the absence of a clear objective of self-sufficiency, Canada will be in very uncertain hands within a decade in regard to its energy supplies.

I want also to deal very quickly with one suggestion made in the Speech from the Throne which is a matter of particular interest to my distinguished colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I refer to the government's professed desire to secure parliament's reaction to the green paper on freedom of information. I say to the government very directly: Don't waste our time with that document. That is not a freedom of information paper; it is a rationale for denying access by Canadians to information which is rightfully their property.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Canadians require much more than pious declarations of openness from the government. They need an end to secrecy, cover-up and lawbreaking by their own government. They need to know where the pay-offs went in the AECL deals. We believe this is something the government could find out if it really wanted to know. We need an independent public inquiry into the uranium cartel, not just a secret inquiry during which one official investigates other officials, without any guarantee that we in parliament or the people of Canada will ever learn the results. We need, also, an end to the secret agreement made by the Department of National Revenue to give the police in Canada open access to the tax files of individual Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We all want more effective action taken against organized crime in Canada. We on this side have been pressing the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) to allocate more resources for this purpose. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) has a fundamental duty to the taxpayers of Canada to protect the privacy of tax files, otherwise we risk very serious abuse of this information. We know from the experience in the United States, unhappily, just where this kind of abuse can lead a free society.

Even though it is part of the parliamentary ritual to extend congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address, it was an exercise in which I enjoyed engaging. But another ritual has developed in recent years which is not so welcome. I wish to observe what has become standard practice under the present government and to take notice of the changes in the ministry since we last met. It is difficult to single out one or two ministers for oustanding incompetence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I think the only difference between the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is that the Minister of National Revenue proved his utter unsuitability to hold any responsible office before he was appointed, while the Minister of Supply and Services has had the opportunity to demonstrate his incompetence in several portfolios.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That minister has disgraced himself and his government so often that it remains an intriguing question why the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) keeps him in the cabinet. Yesterday, the Prime Minister celebrated a birthday upon which all members were pleased to congratulate him. We are not exactly sure of the mark, in years, the Prime Minister has passed, but we do know that in terms of cabinet changes under his administration he has now nearly reached the 150 mark. Indeed, the only thing that is constant about the Prime Minister is that he keeps changing his ministers. I would remind the House that during his administration we have had eight ministers of communications, nine ministers of consumer and corporate affairs, eight ministers of national revenue, eight ministers of national defence, and seven postmasters general.

Mr. Trudeau: How many leaders of the opposition?

Mr. Clark: We have had two leaders of the opposition, and after the next election we shall have a third.

Mr. Clark: The problem with all of this changing that goes on in the shifting of ministerial responsibilities is that it takes years now for ministers to do things that should be done in months, because no one is ever in any job long enough to complete anything. That, sir, is a dangerous feature for Canada. Further to that, it makes a mockery of the fundamental principle of ministerial accountability when ministers are forever shifting to new assignments to escape answering for past actions. That is a remarkable commentary on this government's and this Prime Minister's capacity to manage.

While the government has often been wrong, and too often has been disastrously wrong in particular policies, I suggest that the failure to manage, the treatment of government as a game of musical chairs, has been one of the principal causes for this country losing that sense of unity and that sense of economic momentum which were the gift of this country to this Prime Minister when he first took office in the aftermath of Expo. The fact is that no prime minister came to office with a better opportunity to build Canada and to unite Canadians. Yet whatever was the hope in 1968, the reality today is that after ten years of this administration we are a deeply troubled, deeply divided country.

There is no excuse for this country, which was so united when this government came to office, to be so divided today. There is no excuse for that, but there are a number of reasons, sir, why we have become so divided. One reason—and it is important that these be on the public record—is that it has been the consistent style of the federal government to pick a fight rather than to build a partnership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Many of us in this chamber remember the era of co-operative federalism. Well, sir, that era was replaced by a government which attacks the provinces, which belittles some premiers personally, which attacks business and labour, and which has come to be seen as a bully and as an adversary in almost every region and every sphere of Canadian life.

A second reason why Canadian unity has broken down under this government is that this government has almost as a matter of ideology concentrated power in Ottawa. It has moved in on urban affairs. It insists on control of cable. It uses the federal fiscal power to bully or blackmail the provinces. Its competition policy builds immense arbitrary power into the bureaucracy. As my colleague from High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) said today, small entrepreneurs are buried in paperwork. This concentration of power has come at a time when most of the world has recognized that many of the functions which this government wants to control for itself are far better exercised by provincial governments or local governments, or in so many cases by private, individual Canadians making their own decisions for themselves.

A third reason why this country is so much more divided now than it was when this government came to office is the reason on which I elaborated in the debate on national unity earlier this year; that is, that this government, whatever the merits of a policy of official bilingualism—as the House knows, I believe there are abundant merits and there is abundant common sense to recognizing the requirement, in a country like Canada, to be able to communicate with the government in both official languages—has made a serious mistake in focusing so narrowly on changes in language law as the means to unite the country.

As the election result in Quebec nearly a year ago demonstrated so clearly, a fourth reason why this country is less united now than it was is that the government has consistently ignored the need for economic growth and economic competence. In ignoring that need it has created unemployment, uncertainty and despair which are the seedbeds of division.

There is no excuse for this country, with all our immense potential, to be facing this kind of economic crisis. Once again, there is no excuse, but there are reasons, and I want to enumerate some of the reasons to the House. The most basic reason is that for the past decade the Canadian economy has been drifting, with no sense of direction. Ministers of finance have produced budgets, made tax changes, and then they have resigned. Not one of them has given us a coherent plan for economic development.

Another reason is this government's failure to spell out and abide by its rules for the Canadian economy. We have been without oil and gas regulations in this country for eight years, and for ten years we have been playing around with redrafts of competition policy. Investors, Mr. Speaker, cannot plan in that kind of uncertainty, so they take their money and go to other countries. The jobs that Canadian money generates are generated in other countries because of this legacy of uncertainty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: A third reason for our economic situation has been this government's utter irresponsibility in spending public funds. Throughout its nine years it has had one simple fiscal stance, and that stance has been to spend, regardless of circumstance, regardless of financial controls and regardless of the long-term cost to Canada. Now, sir, its financial accounts are in a shambles, its deficits grow by the week, and Canadian initiative and enterprise suffer under the sheer weight of government incompetence. We have in the throne speech yet another pious promise of restraint. I simply say to the Prime Minister that a deficit of $9 billion this year, and $12 billion next year, is not much restraint.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: If I may speak for a moment, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of restraint, a few days ago on the national TV news the people of Canada were treated to the sight of two government Jetstars on the same tarmac at Calgary, having brought the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) separately to the same function.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: While it may, indeed, be true that the two ministers find each other's company repugnant, it does make the Prime Minister look a little foolish when he preaches about discipline and restraint and then sends his ministers on separate Jetstars to the same event in Calgary.

A fourth reason, obviously, for the state of the Canadian economic climate is the way this government has dealt with controls. First of all, it wasted any trust that the people might have been prepared to give it as a government when the Prime Minister, in a national election campaign and on national television, pointed his finger at Canadians and said, "Zap, you're frozen", and then a year after condemning the program, turned himself completely around and introduced as policy what he had condemned on the way to winning a national election. It is bad enough that the Prime Minister should so absolutely reverse himself and break his word to the Canadian people, but what made it worse was the incompetence with which the controls program was introduced, his refusal to act on the commitments which the government gave for reforms in other fields of policy during the period of controls, and now the continuing uncertainty as to whether, or when, controls are going to come off.

We were told by the predecessor of the Minister of Finance earlier this summer that he expected to be able to announce, by the middle of the summer, a program for getting out of controls. Well, the middle of summer came and went, the end of summer came and went, the beginning of fall came, and the minister went.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We still do not know when, or how, or whether, this country is going to get out of the program of controls which has done so much to destroy confidence in Canada and to drive to other countries money which Canadians and others would want to invest here to create jobs and growth if only they had a government they could trust. We shall resolve these problems only when we recognize that much of what has gone wrong in this country in the past decade is due directly to the policies of the government which has controlled Canada throughout that decade. That will not be easy to do, because it is the practice of this government to blame everybody but itself for things that have gone wrong.

● (1542)

There is really no reason at all for surprise at the fact that this government has lost so much confidence, when you consider that on questions other than the constitution and language their strategy is set, not by a cabinet of ministers but by two advertising men from Toronto, one of whom is part of a company which grows plants without water and the other who is best known as the author of a book entitled "Have I Ever Lied To You Before?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me come to the Minister of Finance and start by saying to him very sincerely that I and my colleagues on this side of the House wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: He, unhappily, inherits from his recent precedessors a legacy not only of failed policies but of total lack of any sense of direction for the national economy. The other day, when this most recent vacancy occurred, I realized that once again in Canada, for the second time in two years, we were without a minister of finance. If you define the job of minister of finance as being to give economic direction and leadership to the country, then we have not had a minister of finance since the right hon. gentleman became Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The challenge for the new minister is not simply to patch up a few holes, but to begin from the ground up to give this country a coherent economic development plan. I say to him quite sincerely that if he demonstrates concrete evidence of willingness to make that kind of change, then there will be co-operation from my colleagues. I say, with some sadness, that there is no indication in the Speech from the Throne, and no indication in anything the minister has said so far, to indicate that he intends any change of that kind of significance.

● (1546)

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian economy is running adrift, without firm guidance from the government. Unemployment is endemic and, far from looking as if it will decrease, seems on the contrary to be headed towards further increases in coming months; while the former minister of finance forecast a rate of inflation of 6 per cent for this year, chances are it will reach at least 8 per cent. Our rate of growth, from very weak that it now is, will probably go down to 2 per cent for this year, in addition to which the value of our dollar is dropping from day to day. The Minister of Finance promised us he would face those problems tomorrow night. I trust the solutions of the minister will tackle directly the problems we face, that they will be more than window-dressing and will live up to the hopes the Liberal government has inspired towards the minister.

But there is one point which, to my mind, is very important, and which I should like to stress. The new Minister of Finance, faithful in that to the policy of his predecessors, seems to want to hold everyone but the present Liberal government responsible for our economic woes. After the Arab sheiks, after the world economy, now the Quebec government is being held responsible for the economic crisis. Let me merely remind the minister that very recently the Wall Street Journal stated that the economic problems in Canada were not the result of the election of a Péquiste government, but that, on the contrary, its election was precipitated by the economic crisis we are now going through.

Mr. Speaker, this government must stop blaming each and everyone for all our problems; it must recognize that it has and must assume prime responsibility for the economy of the country.

[English]

Clearly, the minister has to introduce positive measures to stimulate economic activity. We in this party think there should be a budget now. Parliament should have been called back last month for a budget which would stimulate growth in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We should be moving out of controls now, and not next year. There should be tax cuts now for Canadians earning $16,000 and less. The government should be in active consultation with the provinces about cutting the sales tax in order to stimulate consumer demand. There should be an investment tax credit for Canadians who want to invest in Canadian small business. There need to be other tax incentives to encourage research, innovation and development across the country, particularly in regions of slower growth.

Let us be clear that the economic problems facing this country are much larger and much deeper than short-term tax cuts, important as they may be. We are in an economic mess because Canadians, and indeed the world, have lost confidence in the economic management of this country. This government, in less than a decade, has erased a reputation for economic soundness and stability which had taken Canada a century to build up.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is hardly thoughtful or responsible to try, as the minister has, to pin on the provinces primary responsibility for taking action to meet our unemployment crisis. Certainly, his comments so far on the fall of our dollar have not been marked by much thought or responsibility, I regret to say. The minister's position is that the dollar is floating—just floating, period. If you add $500 million in water wings from the Bank of Canada, you do not have a floating dollar. Perhaps the minister does not understand that, or perhaps he wants to mislead Canadians as to just how serious is this situation. He most certainly does not help that position one iota by talking as if the government does not care to what level the dollar floats. That is an open invitation to currency speculation. The Canadian people expect the minister to take charge of the situation, and not hand it over to the gnomes of Zurich.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me implore the minister not to delude himself and not to delude Canadians into believing that it is good for Canada to have our dollar sliding on world money markets. That might mean short-term benefits for our exporters, but as experience in countries like Britain and Italy has shown, devaluing the currency is no answer to basic economic problems. That idea went to 20 years ago. The minister has to deal with today's reality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: No one speech by the minister, whether he calls it a budget or simply treats it as one, and no one series of tax changes is going to turn that situation around. It has taken this government ten years to ruin Canada's reputation. It will take time to restore it. Ultimately, the only means by which the reputation of Canada can be restored is for there to be a change, not only in policy but a fundamental change in government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: This minister can at least make a start tomorrow night. He has been a senior member of this government for most of the period in which our reputation has been ruined. If he is to be successful, he will need the support of his Prime Minister, just as the nation needs to know in a definite, clear way the views of the Prime Minister on economic matters.

● (1552)

I think it is fair to say that the Prime Minister's musings on television, his casual talk of discipline, his suggestion on Monday that controls might stay for some time as a weapon which the government would want to use—those statements from the head of the government of Canada have had a high cost in confidence for Canadian investors and for the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister cannot shift this burden to the Minister of Finance. The Prime Minister himself is so much a cause of this problem that I challenge him, in the speech he will be making today, to accept his obligations and to address the fundamental economic problems which this country faces, and to spell out precisely his views, as the Prime Minister of Canada, of the Canadian economy, of the relation between government and the private sector in this country, and to spell out precisely and in detail the kind of discipline he is prepared to impose upon himself and upon his colleagues in the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are all concerned about keeping this country together and we are all, I think, beginning to realize now—we recognized it some time ago, and now it is seeping over to the other side—that there is not going to be any permanent means of keeping Canadians together until our economy is in order. We have to address our economic problems as being the most urgent problems on our agenda, even if in the longer term the problem of keeping Canada together turns out to be the more important problem. But the most urgent item on the Canadian agenda now is economic growth. Achieving it will be one of the principal means, perhaps the principal means, of ensuring that Canadians will live together and grow together as a people.

I want to speak about one or two of the other aspects of the issue now called national unity. I begin by saying, just in case anyone believes the Prime Minister is becoming more flexible on federalism, that we have his appointment of the new Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) to prove the opposite. In one move that minister has gone from a position in which 8,000 public servants were reporting to him, to one in which no one else in the government wants to talk to him.

After all, the government has a federal-provincial relations secretariat, a national unity secretariat, and Lord knows what other secretariats. But they all report to the Prime Minister who, as we know, has complete confidence in his Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. The new minister was described by one government official as "a kind of vice-prime minister", which I am sure is interesting news to the new deputy prime minister who has not been seen in these parts since the designation of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations.

An hon. Member: He is ill.

Mr. Clark: I did not realize he is ill, and I apologize. I am not going to speculate on the source of his illness, but I will say that we know the deputy prime minister to be a man and a parliamentarian who is hardy enough to withstand even the designation of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations as vice-prime minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The speech from the throne indicated that a number of proposals would be brought forward later this session. We will be interested in seeing these proposals. We will be interested in seeing the form in which they are brought forward, and in scrutinizing them with care. We hope that in preparing these proposals the Prime Minister and his colleagues will pay particular attention to the agreement that was reached at an historic conference in Kingston in early September, when I had the honour to meet with the four Progressive Conservative premiers of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would have invited all five, Mr. Speaker, but we had to have the meeting before the latest burst in the fortunes of the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I note a little skepticism on the part of the party opposite regarding the pulling together of provincial premiers. I would advise the Prime Minister to do it quickly while there are still some left, and to call together his two premiers. Someone has pointed out to me that his most westerly premier is the premier of Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: More seriously, I think it would be very helpful for the Prime Minister to attach real priority to calling together, on a much more regular basis, the premiers of the various provinces in order to consult with them on a wide range of questions as to the means by which we might work out ways in which to unite the country.

Mr. Speaker, on top of the irresolution and lack of leadership which characterize them, this government now intends to put before Parliament a number of measures aimed at reforming the constitution. My colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) will delve deeper into that aspect of the speech, but I would nevertheless like to point out two particular items which seem important to me. First of all, it should be obvious to the government that no solution to the Canadian problem will be valid unless it is developed in close cooperation with the provinces. Unfortunately, once again conservative in its habits in this respect, the government seems prepared to act unilaterally, without the provinces' agreement or close cooperation. This government must not lose, for short term political gains, the support and co-operation of its provincial partners.

Finally, the government says that it proposes to clarify the role of the courts, particularly in the interpretation and administration of the Official Languages Act. Although I can understand the embarrassment of the government as a result of legal action taken by one of its own members, my party intends to oppose strongly any restriction in the jurisdiction of the courts concerning the administration and the interpretation of the laws of this House. If the government is not satisfied with this legislation, let it have the courage to present another one to amend it but it ought not, through deviated means, try to preclude its administration.

[English]

There is one other matter in the constitutional field with which I want to deal quickly. It relates to the legislation passed by the legislature of Quebec, namely, bill 101. I believe there is every reason for the government of Canada to take the action that only it can take, and to make a direct reference of that bill to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The most important reason for this is that the people affected in Quebec are entitled to know right now, not some years from now, what their constitutional rights are. Last month the government declared that bill 101 will—adversely affect . . . the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians.

They said that the bill is—inconsistent with the federal government's view that no government in Canada should in any way inhibit free movement within the country.

They said:

—a few provisions of the law are of doubtful constitutional validity, while certain other provisions might be found to be unconstitutional depending upon their application in practice.

● (1602)

These are the views of the government of Canada, but this government which has those views does not have the courage of its convictions. It does not have the courage to act on the advice it has received from its own law officers.

Mr. Basford: That's not true.

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) says that is not true. If he believes it is not true, he has a course open to him: he can make a direct reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of bill 101.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: It is obvious that under the circumstances a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is the proper course.

An hon. Member: Make it.

Mr. Clark: Someone, in ignorance of the law, says, "Make it". I cannot make it; only the government can make it, and it should make that reference now. However, it will not do so, and the people of Canada who are affected by bill 101 will wait and wait to know what their rights are, when the government of Canada could obtain a judgment and a decision right now.

We in the official opposition pledge ourselves, at the beginning of this parliament, to make a continuing, positive contribution to the work of this House. We will support positive legislation and actions by this government. We will work to improve its legislation, as we have done, with effect, in the past. We will work to ensure its consultation with the provincial governments, as we have continually urged in the past. However, we will also demand that this government deal directly with the realities of Canada.

Our falling dollar is a symbol for all the world to see. We know, the people of Canada know and the nations of the world know, that this government, through its incompetence, has mismanaged our affairs, squandered our human and material resources, mortgaged our future, generated regional alienation, inspired social and cultural discord, and introduced insecurity into the hearts of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: The throne speech has one prophetic section at the very end. That is where it states, "Canada is now entering a new era". The speech goes on to say, "It can be an era of increasing confrontation, tension and division". That is what we have had, and that is what we will continue to have with this government.

An hon. Member: Finish the sentence.

Mr. Clark: I am prepared to finish the sentence. However, the point I want to make to the hon. member, whose most frequent intervention in this debate is to speak from his seat, is that we have had in this country, almost exclusively thanks to the techniques and methods of this government, a decade of confrontation. That has been at the root of the problems of this country. The hon. member wanted me to complete the phrase. I will be delighted to do so, because the speech also suggests that we can go on to an era "of enhanced freedom, co-operation and unity of purpose". That is what we will have when we get rid of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Prime Minister is fond of speaking about the need for structural reform in Canada. That phrase, "structural reform", appears again and again in the throne speech. To take this country into the new era, of which the throne speech speaks, one fundamental structural reform that is needed—and that, sir, is to fire this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I, therefore, move, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), that the following be added to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne:

This House regrets to inform Your Majesty that the incompetence of Your Majesty's ministers has damaged Canada's economy and undermined confidence in it at home and abroad.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to join the members of the House who expressed earlier to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) their deepest sympathy on the death of his wife Mary. In the last several months, we were all happy to see that she was getting better and we hoped that she would still be among us for us to see, as we had so often in the past, her smiling face and her great kindness at the social gatherings that we had the pleasure to attend.

I would simply like to express on my behalf and on behalf of all members on this side of the House our deepest regret and sympathy at this great loss. I would like to join the Leader of the Opposition who expressed earlier his satisfaction at the fact that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II of Canada has given us, parliamentarians, the opportunity to be associated with her jubilee celebrations.

I would simply like to add once again that we wish Her Majesty and all members of her family a good health and happiness not only in this jubilee year which is coming to a close, but for all the years to come. I am also in agreement with the Leader of the Opposition who congratulated the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is obvious that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) has many qualities which would be quite remarkable in anyone, but which are even more remarkable for a man still in his youth who, yesterday, was able to express clearly, succinctly and convincingly, all the ability that he has gained through his administrative experience as an elected member of various school boards, some very serious thoughts on the economy and the future of our country. I believe that the best tribute that we can pay him would be to say that Mrs. Albanie Morin would have been very proud to hear her successor.

As for the hon. member for Malpèque (Mr. Wood), we knew that he would bring to our debate his knowledge of agriculture and the food industry. We also expected him to show the kind of human sense which is so typical of Prince Edward Islanders, and I must say that we have not been disappointed by his open mind, his warmth and his very great humaneness.

At the very outset of this debate, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in my opinion, at this stage of Canadian history, the future of Canadians and the future of our nation itself hang in the balance. And history will tell which side carries the more weight. Obviously, it will be through the collective will of all citizens that we shall be able to put more weight in the balance and to express clearly and vigorously all the confidence that we have in the future of this country.

At no time in our history has there been so serious a threat to our society, both from the economic and national unity standpoints. Because of this many could be disquieted and even appear despaired as the official opposition often do. But on this side we have every reason to believe that at no time in our history have the Canadian people been better equipped to face the current challenge. At no time has the Canadian public been better informed of the choices to be made, and capable of forging its own destiny in the current world environment. For that reason, and despite the somber and largely accurate picture drawn by the Leader of the Opposition, we on this side have confidence in the future.

To take up on the opposition leader's invitation I would like to indicate my personal thoughts on the economy and the question of national unity. I shall deal with the economic situation.

● (1612)

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) challenged me to spell out my views on the economic situation. I shall do so with all the seriousness that I can command. My analysis of the symptoms may not differ fundamentally from his, but I think, contrary to the position of the Leader of the Opposition, I will have to show the directions the government will follow, not only in my speech but in the speeches which will be made in the course of the present debate. The symptoms have been spelled out rather starkly by the Leader of the Opposition. I need not dwell on them. There is high unemployment in Canada, there is high inflation, and a very serious devaluation of the dollar.

I should like to try to examine, before this House, the causes of this state of affairs and, hopefully, propose remedies that this government sees. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the easiest way to indicate the over-all cause of our present economic state is to say that Canadians generally—governments, federal and provincial, people generally and all economic decision makers—have failed to adjust to external and internal realities in the world. I hate to examine that in too much technical detail, but in the past year we have published two government statements, one called "The Way Ahead", and the other "An Agenda for Co-Operation". They went into our views of the economic revolution in this country at great length.

When I say that we failed to adjust to realities, I suppose the shortest way of expressing that is to say that in a sense we have been the victim of our own successes as a government, as a country and as a nation. The record of economic achievement in this country since 1945, the end of the Second World War, has been very impressive. Canadians have shown that they have the ingenuity, the technology, the determination, the capacity for hard work, to conquer the external difficulties; including the great distances in Canada, including the weather, including all those other externalities which press upon us. Canadians have shown that in spite of those disadvantages, we can, in this country, sustain very considerable economic growth—the greatest growth in a given period that this country has ever known.

Just look at the figures. Since the end of World War II the population in Canada has almost doubled. We had the fastest growing labour force, in this country, of any industrial nation, yet real after-tax income per person more than doubled in this country during that period of time. The real standard of living of all Canadians, on average, more than doubled in that period of time. It is important to note that that was after taxes.

Heavy taxes were levied, by all governments, on the people of Canada—taxes which permitted us to invest in the future and in the present of this country in a way which has perhaps been unequalled in any other industrial society. I am thinking of the advances we made through our tax investments in the area of taxes, in medicare, the assistance we gave to aged people, in family allowances and in so many other areas where the Canadian people, after they had paid taxes to obtain all these social and economic advances, were still twice as well off as they had been in the middle forties.

Where, perhaps, we went wrong, when I say we are the victim of our own success, is that Canadians—their governments, perhaps, first and foremost—began to feel that everything and anything was possible in Canada. On top of all these very far-reaching social schemes, we began to invest more in the quality of life, spending more on anti-pollution concerns, doubling, trebling the number of national parks, subsidizing energy so that Canadians would not be hit by the stark reality which had hit the rest of the world after the OPEC nations formed a cartel.

We still found that we should do more in the area of decentralization. We still found that we should be spending more through the Department of Economic Expansion, and through other departments, in order to give greater opportunity to those regions of the country which had not been favoured by nature or by history. It is very important to say that during that period Canadians showed to the world that they could be leaders in the economic and social fields. Canadians have a right to be proud of their record. That was recognized in the councils of the world and in all kinds of forum—the fact that Canada, through the size of its gross national product and the size of its exports, qualified to be invited to the summits which have been marking the leaders among industrialized nations. All these are proof that Canadians have been able to succeed. However, Mr. Speaker, the expectation which was created by this great prosperity, this revolution of rising expectations which led Canadians to believe there was no limit to the kinds of social, environmental and developmental progress that they could afford, was in a sense the cause of our present difficulties.

It turned out that Canadians, at the other end of this period, began to consume more than they were producing. Once again, consider the figures from the mid-fifties to 1971. The purchasing power of Canadians, after taxes and after discounting for inflation, the real standard of living, doubled. However, during that period there was an increase of goods and services in this country which roughly doubled. In other words, the doubling of our standard of living was matched by the doubling of our productive capacity. From 1972 to 1976, real disposable income continued to rise at that same, almost breakneck speed: it continued to rise in that period of four years by 30 per cent, while real domestic production grew only by 17 per cent.

It is obvious that that could not last, because our standard of living depends ultimately on what we can produce as a nation. We cannot enjoy the fruits of foreign labour, buy their goods, enjoy their services by travelling or holidaying abroad, unless we can produce sufficient goods and services of our own that foreigners are willing to buy at our prices. We could, of course, for a short period of time—in this case, four years—match the difference between a 30 per cent pulling out of the economy by Canadians, and 17 per cent being put into it, by borrowing a certain amount of time and a certain amount of money. However, it is obvious that could not go on forever. We were, in a true sense, as a nation living beyond our means, because our standard of living was not justified by what we were producing as a nation. Other nations would not pay the price for our goods.

That leads me to the third cause of our present economic difficulties. It can be expressed very simply by stating the truth—that our prices are too high. We buy from other nations; we buy their services by travelling, and their goods by importation. They do not buy an equivalent or a sufficient amount of ours to maintain that standard of living. If our prices are too high, what happens? In the case of raw materials, of course, the markets of the world set the prices. We have to lower these prices if we want to sell them. We have less revenue. Having less revenue, we invest less, or close down. That creates unemployment.

There are some cases where we can protect some of our natural resource industries. We have done that through the uranium cartel which is so heavily criticized by the opposition. This is an example of Canadians, in a specific instance, making sure that the protectionism of other countries which affects our ability to sell is matched by an equal protectionism of those countries which are a victim of the first instance.

In the area of raw materials, we can occasionally protect ourselves somewhat. However, we cannot, in a consistent and constant way, set world market prices for the raw materials that we produce, whether they be minerals or renewable resources such as lumber. There again, as prices fall, the number of jobs falls.

In manufacturing, the situation is perhaps even more stark. We must be competitive in manufacturing either by being as productive as the others or, if our productivity is not as great, to have lower wages and lower profits than the others. Alternatively, if we want to match the wages and profits of the other countries in manufacturing, we have to be as productive. We have not succeeded in either of these. It is all very well to wish that entrepreneurs would take lower profits. The NDP in particular have been wishing that for a long while. However, the very simple reality that takes over at this point is that capital is very mobile. If the profits of Canadians are less—

Mr. Broadbent: First year Adam Smith.

Mr. Trudeau: I hear the leader of the NDP dropping names, Mr. Speaker. His education has gone beyond Karl Marx; he goes as far as Adam Smith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: That is as far as you have got—Adam Smith.

Mr. Trudeau: If capital finds higher returns elsewhere, it moves elsewhere. What is left if our productivity is lower, is to have lower wages. But is our productivity lower? Surely Canadians are not unproductive. Workers in Canada are as skilful as those anywhere else. I think it is fair to point out that generally, even in the manufacturing industry, there has been some catching up on productivity by Canadian workers. I believe the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was giving an example on Monday of one industry where that was the case. However, over-all, on average in manufacturing we have not yet completely caught up. As a matter of fact, on average the figures are still pretty revealing. We are only 80 per cent as efficient as the United States in our manufacturing sector, yet during this period about which I am talking, and at the present time, average hourly earnings in manufacturing industries are 7 per cent higher in Canada than they are in the United States. We are 80 per cent as productive—or 20 per cent less productive, if you wish—yet average wages are 7 per cent higher.

An hon. Member: That's a myth.

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member in the NDP says it is a myth. It may be a myth today, but it was not a myth in the second quarter. These are the figures the hon. member can confirm from the Bureau of Statistics. Today, it is a little less because of devaluation. I think probably, at the latest value of the Canadian dollar, Canadian average wages in manufacturing are only, perhaps, about 2 per cent higher than in the United States. But productivity is still 20 per cent lower. So it is obvious that either our prices are too high or our productivity is too low. It is also obvious that the head-in-the-sand attitude of the NDP in these matters—that of feeling there is no limit to what wages can attain in this country—is one of the causes of our economic distresses.

● (1632)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If it is true that our present malaise comes from living beyond our means as a nation, the remedy should be rather simple. It should be to live within our means. Here, again, I am saying that to live within our means as a nation we must produce more if we want to continue to consume as much. I know that our government and other governments in Canada have made the mistake, as I said earlier, of trying to give too much to the Canadian people by way of social benefits, without Canadians being prepared to pay for them in terms of slowing the increase in their real gains. We have in the past two years attempted to correct that situation. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and his predecessor have not only indicated the extent of their commitment in this regard, but have shown they can reduce government expenditure and slow down dramatically the increase in the size of the civil service.

Obviously, though, in a situation of high unemployment more than simply controlling expenditure is involved. We are constantly pressed on this side by our own members and by members opposite to spend more on this or that worthy project. Indeed, on the very first day the House sat this week, on Monday, there were several motions from opposition parties urging the government to spend more in particular areas of the country or on particular sectors of the economy. We have to show restraint, but it is clear that without taking the position of being the employer of last resort or otherwise, the government does feel it has a commitment in the area of direct job creation.

This year we have budgeted $350 million for direct job creation. Recently, that amount was increased by some $100 million and, if I may scoop the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), I have reason to believe that tomorrow he will announce the allocation of a further $150 million in the area of direct job creation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: So this year and next the federal government will spend more than $1 billion on direct job creation. Everyone realizes that jobs can, in a sense, be created by government, but the majority of jobs must, under our system, continue to come from the private sector as a consequence of private investment. In the last budget the government did provide tax incentives for private investment. We did what we could, in that sense, to demonstrate confidence in the economy. But it is absolutely certain that the greatest incentive to investment and economic growth in this country cannot come from government spending on job creation. It must come from a renewed sense of confidence within the business community. This is essential. It could, of course, come from the stable kind of policy for which the Leader of the Opposition is asking, but it must also be accompanied by the belief of investors that there will not be a new outbreak of cost increases since, if my analysis is correct, such increases are among the most serious causes of our present economic difficulties.

So the government acted, and continues to act, to bring costs down. Three areas are worth mentioning: first, the Anti-Inflation Board. We have brought costs down. I realize that the policy of the oppositions parties is to get rid of the Anti-Inflation Board. They have been wanting to do that, in one case, I believe, for the past two years, and in the other for perhaps a year. But we have brought average wage settlements down from 22 per cent in the first half of 1975, before the AIB was established, to 14 per cent in 1976, and to 8.5 per cent in 1977.

We have brought costs down, and at the same time the consumer price index has been going down. If you look at the period of two years during which the Anti-Inflation Board has operated, we are on target. In the first year we did better than had been planned; we brought inflation down faster than the guidelines had foreseen. This was in some substantial measure due to the fall in food costs, as the opposition has always reminded us. In the second year we did not do quite as well, food prices were not as favourable. But on the average, over two years of controls we are just about on target. We have brought costs down and we have brought the consumer price index down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: A few minutes ago we were enjoined by the Leader of the Opposition to get rid of controls. Mr. Speaker, we would like to do that. We would like to get rid of controls. But the fact that we are now bringing inflation down from double-digit figures to lower levels must not lead us into believing that this catching up is sufficient, because we still have the legacy of unemployment which persists from the fact that our cost structure for the past several years has been much higher than that of our competitors.

We have always said we would get rid of controls. We want to get rid of controls. We attempted to get rid of controls last summer, when the minister of finance was working toward the date of October 14. But we would only do so if we had an expression of the willingness of the unions and the employers to co-operate in keeping the lid on inflation. In other words, as we said when we brought in controls in October of 1975, we can only give Canadians the opportunity to express a resolve to co-operate in order to dampen the inflationary spiral. It must come from us. It must be an act of collective will. Indeed, in the past two years in which we have had controls I think we have seen a remarkable amount of restraint shown by Canadians.

The figures for negotiated settlements in the second year of controls were below the AIB guidelines in 70 per cent of those settlements. This shows that Canadian employers and unions have exercised restraint in the great majority of cases in which settlements have been negotiated. It shows that collective resolve can successfully be brought to play. The date of the removal of controls will be announced tomorrow by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. We urge Canadians to understand that it is only because of this change of attitude that we can even consider setting a date. This change of attitude has also been shown in the strike record, which is very considerably improved this year compared with last year—63 per cent less strikes in 1977 than in 1976.

The hon. member for Hamilton is often asking me what kind of discipline is best for Canadians. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a good example of self-discipline, of Canadians beginning to realize that they can do much better in the economic sense if they want to co-operate. Indeed, if we look at the figures showing the trade balance, we see we have done considerably better this year than last year. There is a considerable increase in the surplus of merchandise trade. The figure to the end of August was $2.5 million. It is turning around. It is beginning to show the sense of discipline, of restraint, for which we have been appealing to Canadians.

Of course, we have been helped—and we have to admit it very clearly—by the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. The dollar declined some 12 cents over the past year, Mr. Speaker. This is not something that was contrived by the government. Everyone knows that the dollar is floating and that the money markets of the world were merely giving us a message. They were saying that our cost structure was too high, that Canada was not an attractive place to invest; therefore, this corrective process of devaluing the Canadian dollar on the markets of the world was set in place. The beauty of the mechanism is that as it sends us a message, it also corrects what is wrong with our economy. Because it means—this goes back to Adam Smith, and I am sure the leader of the NDP will understand it too—that when the dollar is worth less, our exports are more attractive and our imports are more expensive.

Mr. Broadbent: Page 321, first edition.

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, the difficulty with the rate of exports being higher, and imports being lower, is that this means higher costs, higher prices in Canada. Therein lies the trap. If Canadians say, "Well, our costs are higher; we are paying more for imported goods or for goods which are substituted for imported goods, and therefore we are going to try and increase our money incomes", then, of course, we have defeated the whole corrective process of devaluation, because then we get higher costs and we can no longer continue to compete.

I have given earlier figures showing that average wage rates in Canada were 7 per cent higher than those in the United States just a few months ago. Now they are only 2 per cent higher. What has happened in the interval? The dollar was devalued and we became suddenly more competitive. But we must not miss the signal, Mr. Speaker. We must realize that if we do, if we just seek a higher money return to offset these higher costs of what we are importing, we will have lost the opportunity to expand and to create new jobs. In other words, we will not correct the economic situation; we will only put higher inflation on our backs.

There is another area which I must mention, but only briefly in view of the time constraint. That is an area, as the Leader of the Opposition has reminded me, about which we have talked abundantly in the Speech from the Throne, the area of structural change. As early as October, 1975, when we were bringing in anti-inflation controls, we said that we would have to bring in structural changes in areas such as housing, energy, food. We have brought in changes in these areas which have produced results in the form of multiple-dwelling units, for instance, increased energy exploration and increased conservation measures. These will be commented upon in some detail by the respective ministers. The Speech from the Throne indicates the other structural problems which we will address, and how we intend to adapt to this changing world environment through the market system and through the government's creating a climate for change in a way which will permit balanced growth.

The last remedy which I wish to mention in the area of the economy is that of consultation. We again talked in great detail on that subject in the Agenda for Co-operation. I just want to mention—and it is suggested in the Speech from the Throne—that we will need to set up an agency for monitoring and consultative mechanisms, if indeed we want to control our economy. There is no assumption that consultation is a substitute for action, but it is obvious that proper action—non-confrontation action, to reassure the Leader of the Opposition—must, and can, proceed from consultation. I think the northern pipeline decision was a good example of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members can remember a few years back when that appeared to be an incredibly divisive policy. At least potentially, that was an area where we would see the country divided against itself—east versus west, north versus south. But because there was this long consultative process, because there were so many people involved in reflection upon this, it was possible for the government to come up with a policy which was roughly that, I believe, of the main opposition parties in this House. The result will be some $4 billion spent on Canadian goods and services. Nearly 100,000 man-years of employment will proceed from that project. This does show that what is needed is not so much a new economic theory, a new Adam Smith, a new Karl Marx, a new John Maynard Keynes—

Mr. Broadbent: A new government.

Mr. Trudeau: What is needed is a simple decision on the part of the Canadian people to cooperate, to keep their costs down, to live within their means, to act together in a spirit of cooperation in every area of the economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The government said this quite clearly in the Speech from the Throne yesterday. I will just read a short phrase which is to be found about half way into the Speech from the Throne:

> This discontent in such a wealthy country must find its causes in the human spirit, and it is there also that the unity of the nation must be found.

We have seen, from listening to the Leader of the Opposition—I am sure it will be true when we listen to the leader of the New Democratic Party—that there are no economic signs that will tell the industrialized nations how they can improve the situation. We will see it is not a new Cain which is arising and telling us what must be done to create jobs, to reduce inflation. We see that even in the ranks of the opposition parties, within the same party, some will have one theory, others a contrary theory. It is not a new economic theory which we need; it is a new spirit, a new national will.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that in the area of national unity the same spirit of cooperation rather than confrontation is required. I am receiving lessons from the Leader of the Opposition who feels that there is too much aggressiveness on this side of the House. The analysis of these solutions can therefore show whether this is true. But I would be in total agreement with him if he was suggesting that in the area of national unity, progress will more surely come through cooperation than confrontation. Going through the history of our country, it is certain that it does not show of heavenly perfection. Obviously compromises were made all along between the various forces. Obviously these compromises never were final nor completely successful. But obviously they allowed our country to progress for 100 years, and made us one of the most privileged countries in the world.

We are what we are, Mr. Speaker, not on account of external powers and obligations laid on us, but because we have chosen our fate. Nobody has forced confederation on us, our federative system did not originate in Great Britain, France or the United States. Canadian federalism has been the creation of a properly Canadian genius and in the same way, Mr. Speaker, the new federalism which we are trying to set up must be devised by us. It must be adapted to present circumstances and answer the real problems confronting us today. How could I specify them, Mr. Speaker? I cannot dwell too much on the various social sectors, the different geographic areas giving rise to dissension.

If we consider the Indians, the Metis and the Inuit, it is certain that we must eradicate the cause of their alienation by giving them some time and also the financial means to find in their own mind their sense of direction, the place which they want to take in Canada, give them the opportunity to make legal and historic research which will enable them to gain satisfaction and obtain fair results. Again, as an example during the pipeline debate which lasted a few years, the Indian and Eskimo people of an area of the country have at various times, been able to express their objection to the Mackenzie solution and indeed, Mr. Speaker, this pipeline has not been built. Therefore, in this area as well as in others there must be a long process of consultations and exchanges.

The Atlantic provinces hold grievances dating back 100 years because their hopes have been frustrated. They believed that Confederation would provide them with more industries, more jobs, better transportation systems. What they are asking for is the possibility to be a little more self-reliant, self-sufficient, the opportunity to choose their own economic destiny, the opportunity to keep their own people at home instead of seeing them expatriate themselves to find employment elsewhere. It is true that succeeding governments, ours and others before, did face such problems and tried to solve them.

One only needs to consider the area of equalization payments, for instance. In the last nine years, some $5 billion have been paid to the Atlantic provinces in order to bring the standards of their public utilities more or less up to the national level. As a matter of fact, almost one fourth of those provinces' budgets comes from equalization payments. In the last eight years, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has injected some $1,300 million in that part of Canada to create jobs and promote industry, for an average of about $77 per capita for the Atlantic provinces compared to a national average of some $17.

Therefore, it is clear that successive governments have looked into this problem, but that it is yet to be resolved. Mr. Speaker, why are we hopeful on this side of the House that these problems will be resolved? Because here is now, I dare hope, a climate, a public opinion which is ready to make structural and other changes.

Decentralization is already well on its way through the action of my colleague, the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the development of energy resources, the tapping of marine and sub-marine resources, the establishment of a 200 mile off-shore limit, the federal-provincial agreement on the tapping of sub-marine resources, and I might add the increasing awareness by all Canadians of the fact that we must really provide that underprivileged part of our country with a greater equality of opportunity, something which is now evident to all of us.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), at the Kingston Conference, which he deigned to refer to as historical, has taken up position in this respect. That is a thing, Mr. Speaker, we had proposed as early as 1971, at the Victoria Conference, but the people of Canada, and certainly the Leader of the Opposition, were not aware of that. All this, I believe, gives us grounds for hope, Mr. Speaker, that we will at last be able to resolve those problems in a spirit of courage, initiative and sacrifice.

Western Canada has problems which are not parallel, or identical, but are problems nevertheless. It was practically in a state of wilderness at the beginning of Confederation. Now it is one of the fastest developing areas in the world, one of the most confident in its future, and yet its people are frustrated. Why? Because in that part of our country they feel they are not given enough opportunity to participate in setting up a national policy. They feel they are too remote from the central government in Ottawa, and left out of the centre of decisions which were traditionally made in Upper and Lower Canada. The government addressed itself to these problems in the "Western Economic Opportunities Conference" in 1973 but as recently as this summer, the four western premiers met in Brandon and published a document entitled "Task Force on Constitutional Trends," which indicated that, in their views also, the problem was a constitutional one.

There are the economic problems, but in the provinces, even in the very prosperous ones such as Alberta, there is concern about constitutional matters, thought is given to the constitutional set up. In other words, Mr. Speaker, when the government addresses those problems, despite the fact that the Leader of the Opposition chides us for being too concerned about the problem of unity and not enough about the economy, well, we are only doing what the provincial premiers do, who feel that the two are of equal importance, who feel that the constitution, and the problem of unity are in a sense as important as the economic problem. One cannot be solved without the other, one depends on the other, and the solution of one depends on the solution of the other.

That is how we see the problem, Mr. Speaker, namely that of Quebec: and in dealing with it, we naturally also talk of the constitutional situation. We did not invent that: the Quebec government, the Péquiste government itself has put to us the fundamental question of national unity. We would be playing ostrich if we claimed that it did not behove us to deal with it because the economy is too important, because we have to deal first of all with the economic problems. So, Mr. Speaker, in that matter as in all others, we are willing to tackle the problem.

To make my statement clearer, I will consider the province of Quebec and the problem it raises under two aspects: On the one hand, the province of Quebec is unlike the others. Obviously, because of its language and culture, it differs very deeply from the other provinces with a majority of English speaking population but, on the other hand, it is also a province like the others in that all provincial governments are trying to bring about constitutional changes which would give them more control over their own destinies. Of course, all governments think they would be better equipped to deal with their problems if they had more money and a wider jurisdiction. This is not only true of provincial authorities, but also of our own government.

As I said Mr. Speaker, I would like to consider this problem under those two aspects. First, the general one which is common to all federal systems, I mean the tension between the provinces, and it is through this creative tension that both levels of government are often faced with problems.

If, for instance, we look at Quebec's demands for an extended jurisdiction in the field of communications, what do we see? We see that Saskatchewan, Manitoba as well as other provinces would like to have more powers in that particular field. The same goes for immigration. Quebec would like a broader jurisdiction in that area. Some say that Alberta has the same concern and also wants to have some kind of control on its immigration. Quebec would like more powers in the field of social security, namely through more percentage points. So does Ontario.

It is in this sense, Mr. Speaker, that when people talk about a special status they are only fooling themselves. We know that if a province, Quebec for instance, obtained more constitutional powers, the other provinces would like to have approximately the same powers. As a proof, when I made a proposal to all the provincial premiers early last September, people were up in arms because they felt I was offering a special status to Quebec and they said: But the same thing has to be offered to everyone.

That was a misunderstanding, naturally, because I was not offering a special status to anyone. I was using a formula that has been in existence for several years, the "opting-in", but in any case, Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that a special status is absolutely unrealistic in a sense that if we stretch that notion, each province, if it wants an absolute control over its own development, be it industrial or economical for instance, should have jurisdiction on monetary, fiscal, tariff and even foreign policies. This is obviously impossible in a united country. It is obviously impossible to give the provinces all the jurisdictions they might need either directly or indirectly in order to follow a given political destiny, a given economical path. So, how was this problem solved in Canada, this problem of existing centrifugal forces on the one hand, and of centripetal needs on the other, if you will allow me the expression, which will allow a country to act in a united manner?

The traditional answer in this country has been that all the parties have sought to get representatives elected from all across Canada. Traditionally, the cabinet formed by the central government has tried to include representatives from all the regions. Traditionally, the members of the federal parliament have done their best to be acknowledged by their respective voters as their representatives, as first-class representatives not second rate. All the elected members have tried to see to it that the federal government would appear in each of their ridings as the "important government".

Those are so many traditional ways by which the central government has tried in the past to match those centrifugal forces. This has also been done through federal-provincial conferences, through those very numerous federal-provincial institutions which enable the federal and the provincial governments to negotiate almost on diplomatic terms in order to work out compromises between the parties concerned so as to reach some kind of equilibrium. This was done by maintaining provincial autonomy on the one hand and federal autonomy on the other hand. They met in sectors in which both were involved and arrangements were sought. That is the history of Confederation.

There are other approaches. We see, for example, that the American and German constitutions have followed another direction. A new federalism, a different federalism in any case. In such a system of government for regions, provinces, lander and states in the case of the U.S.A., there is some kind of involvement in the central government and administration by the election in the United States of an equal number of senators for each state in Washington, while in the case of German lander, the regional governments appoint representatives to the Bundestag in Bonn. It is a different style of federalism where effectively the regions are somewhat represented in the central parliament or Congress. What are the results? Well, the central government has no longer much to negotiate with the provinces, the States or the Länder, for they are in a way part of the central administration. The federal government could also show its flexibility if the provinces wanted to be present in some way on Parliament Hill. We have already proposed changes to the Senate with this purpose in mind. We are still willing to do so. Our position, as I have often indicated, is that any changes are possible. Everything is possible, except of course in the matter of civil rights protection and for any solution which would tend to destroy Canada as a united and single entity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Our position is that everything is possible in the constitutional field, and that we are willing to negotiate, provided that this does not result in weakening the fabric of our country and does not infringe upon the basic individual liberties.

Mr. Speaker, there is a cliché, a trite expression which is commonly used at this time, particularly in my province, namely the status quo. As the cliché goes, this government is bound to the status quo, is rigid and shall not move. The simplest proof that we are not bound to the status quo might be to look somewhat closely at the constitutional proposals we have made from 1968 to 1977. These proposals were aimed at changing the Constitution, in other words the status quo, to demonstrate that federalism has changed and can go on changing.

I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker. Because the proposals are numerous, I shall refer to the headings only. Even before the Victoria Conference we put forward significant changes concerning the Canadian Senate, spending power, provincial fiscal powers, social security and social services, financial institutions and capital markets, the administration of environment problems. In Victoria, we proposed a number of changes concerning political rights, language rights, section 94A, social security, and also equal opportunities, and notably the insertion in the Constitution of a provision concerning regional disparities and the offsetting of such disparities, the need for annual meetings on the amendment formula of the first ministers, federal and provincial, and the federal government proposal to get rid of the rights of denial and qualification.

I shall not read all of the new proposals that were made in March 1976, but there were two in particular which concerned the protection of the French language and culture within a new constitution. Again in January last, I included in a letter to the premiers a proposal to increase the number of senators from the various provinces, and proposals with respect to consultations prior to taking certain action.

I cannot list nor dwell on all those proposals, Mr. Speaker, but I believe that I have said enough to show that the myth of the status quo is truly a myth. There is not and there has not been any status quo. The Canadian constitution has incessantly been changed and made to adapt to reality and in the course of 8 or 9 years, we have suggested many changes to the so-called status quo. If anybody may be identified with the status quo, Mr. Speaker—and I say this with some regret—it may probably be the governments of Quebec, the present one in those that preceded it. We should remember that since Mackenzie King, the federal government has been looking for solutions for repatriating the constitution in Canada. Each time we have come close to finding one, that is a solution as suggested by a provincial government, such as the most recent ones, the Fulton-Favreau and the Victoria formulas. These were both developed at the request of Quebec government, and yet they were the ones who said no at the last moment, indicating that they prefered the status quo to the change that they themselves had suggested. We should therefore realize who represents the status quo in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

While I am on this subject, I would like to address myself to another cliché, that of the third option. Mr. Speaker, it has become somewhat fashionable to say: "I am not for the status quo, I am not for separatism, but there should be some compromise, a third option." I would simply like to warn my fellow-citizens not to fall into this trap, Mr. Speaker, because we never did invent this third option, the alternative to separatism and federalism—I am not saying status quo, but federalism. There is something called sovereignty association. I see that the Leader of the Opposition has something to say. Perhaps he could say it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is meant by this association? Are they trying to square the circle or what? How can it be defined? Obviously, the PQ party could not and will not define it; so that the burden of the proof, if we fall into the trap of the third option, will not rest with the PQ party which will not take the responsibility to define the third option between independence and federalism, or to define the association of sovereignty. It will be up to us, federalists, to come up with a definition.

And we all know very well, Mr. Speaker, that the PQ government will not accept any proposal for change. No proposal for a constitutional change will be accepted by a party whose goal it is to break the country.

So, Mr. Speaker, I submit respectfully to everybody, including members of my own party and of the Pepin-Robarts Commission, that this third option business is a trap we should not fall into. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the general problem of Quebec within Confederation.

I would now like to address myself to the specific problem of the specific needs of Quebec in the area of language and culture. Well, our policy in that area is as follows: there are in this respect two fundamental and inseparable dimensions. The French language and culture must be preserved in the province of Quebec, but it must also be preserved among the French-speaking minorities in the other provinces, in the same way as we suggest that the English-speaking majority in the other provinces must of course ensure the preservation of its own language and culture in the province of Quebec for the English-speaking minority. Why? For a very simple reason: if the problem of minorities is not resolved, we are once again caught in the trap of separatism, be it from Quebec or elsewhere. Why? Because if Quebec is going to be unilingual in French and the other provinces unilingual in English, if the minorities on both sides are not protected what is going to happen? We will have two solitudes, two nations, two political groups more or less homogenous each looking for powers and a status to protect their majority, unmindful of their minority. That is why these two dimensions are absolutely essential. If we choose those easy solutions as: Well, let Quebecers speak French and let people speak English in the other provinces, I say this is potential separatism, separatism in the short term, Mr. Speaker. And that is the reason for all our initiatives as a Liberal government with regard to the French fact in Quebec as well as in the other provinces.

We recognize and we are willing to recognize that particular case and, as I said earlier, we have proposed to do so in constitutional arrangements, by special guarantees. Especially in March 1976, I proposed to all provinces certain arrangements to guarantee in the Constitution that the French fact will be inalienable in Quebec by any government, any administration, any federal Parliament. That is why we said that certain provisions in Bill 22 and Bill 101, tended to recognize in the province of Quebec some values essential to the protection of the French language. We have condemned and we still condemn those bills because generally speaking, they are inspired by a restrictive sense of public liberties. However, we have recognized the validity of Quebec aspirations expressed by all provincial governments in Quebec over a long period of time, that the French language and culture should freely develop in that province.

That was our first attitude concerning the particular case of Quebec. As I just mentioned, the second is that we must absolutely protect the minority's rights, and that is why as soon as the historic agreement of St. Andrews, where the nine prime ministers of the English provinces agreed to help their French-speaking minorities, that is why at that time, I tried to find a way to permanently guarantee that agreement. But the Prime Minister of Quebec had himself proposed some agreements, some arrangements between the provincial governments. It was not bad for a start, and it was a way to obtain immediate arrangements which would guarantee the rights of French speaking people in the other provinces against a similar guarantee for the anglophones in Quebec, but the obvious flaw was that these arrangements were only temporary ones. This is the reason why, Mr. Speaker, I suggested that the government keep advocating and this is part of our policy, that the rights of minorities be written in our Constitution, so that they become definitely inalienable, and cannot be abolished through a whim or arbitrary decision by any government.

I have neither the time nor desire to dwell on the proposal in detail at this time but I would be very pleased to do so in a subsequent debate if, as I think, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) does not see the merit of this constitutional proposal right now.

Now, our third approach to this particular problem is the Official Languages Act and the federal official languages policy which aim at placing French and English on an equal footing. I regret that in this area we have not reached an agreement yet with the Official Opposition and especially with its Leader. If I am not mistaken, in his speech about the national unity debate which took place on the 5th of July, he said more or less that bilingualism does not unite Canadians.

● (1722)

[English]

Bilingualism does not unite Canadians, it divides, but we must build unity despite differences and not on bilingualism.

These are sincere points of view which must be respected but which I cannot help denounce. On our side, we do not consider bilingualism, or the Official Languages Act or the policy of equality for the official languages as a necessary evil. On the contrary we consider it as a goal to achieve, as something positive that enhances Canada, as something our country cannot do without. History could have been different, but it was not.

This country was, in its origin and in its existence, actually founded on the reality of two linguistic communities. Reality could have been different if history had been different, if Jacques Cartier had landed somewhere else than Canada, but since this reality exists, we on this side of the House say that Canada cannot exist without this equality for both languages. Furthermore, we are made for bilingualism, if I can put it that way, Mr. Speaker. Not only is it not an evil that must be endured, but it is the very condition of our existence.

In early July, the Secretary of State made in Ottawa a speech that I noted, that dealt in detail with this problem. He gave an example which I often like to use: Since humanity has been created with both sexes, then for us sex is not a necessary evil, it is something which is rather essential to reproduction.

• (1732)

Mr. Speaker, in some other system or humanity, virgin birth might be a possible and desirable thing but that is not the present reality. The fact is that mankind is made up of both sexes and it must not be regarded as a necessary evil. It is exactly the same thing for Canada. There are two linguistic communities. This is not a matter for division; on the contrary, Canada exists because they can and must get together. It is the government position.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Either the translation or the mind of the hon. member is slow! I would not know. I would like to speak about the problem arising from the election of the Parti Québécois last November 15. I would like to add a few words on the strategy and tactics that we are preparing on this side of the House because I think it is important that Canadians in general and members of parliament in particular be made somewhat aware of the reason for some of our actions. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that as early as November 24, I said on television that, in the final analysis, the solution had to come from the Quebec voters, that they are the ones who eventually will have to get rid of a government that wants to break up this country, the PQ government. I even said a week or two later in an interview on the English network that come referendum time, we had to clobber the PQ.

Well, that was our strategy, and it still is. What we need after all is to win that debate, win it at the polls, win it by convincing the people in Quebec that they will be happier, that they will be able to develop more fully culturally, economically and socially within Canada than outside Canada. That is the basis of all our actions. That is quite simply the reason why we refused to use our power of disallowance when urged to do so by English-Canadian groups, particularly from the province of Quebec, who asked us to disallow Bill 101. Others suggested that it be referred to the Supreme Court, as did the Leader of the Opposition. They took the position that the way to get rid of bad laws, of a bad government, was on the authority of either the Supreme Court of Canada or the government in Ottawa. I know that view is not shared by all members of the party of the Leader of the Opposition.

I believe the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) expressed himself rather clearly in the month of September. One of the only two French Canadians in the party of the Leader of the Opposition is in disagreement with the Leader of the Opposition on that point. He said quite clearly before the press that he did not believe that referring the bill to the Supreme Court was the solution. Well, we agree on that. Why? Because I believe that the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) understands, as we do on this side, that a case referred directly to the Supreme Court cannot give the desired results. If the Supreme Court decides that the act is ultra vires, well, of course, the Parti Québécois would be quite happy and that would take away from Quebecers the indignation they now feel against that law and their desire to have it changed through the democratic process. Should the Supreme Court decide that the act is ultra vires, of course, independentists of every ilk in the province of Quebec would certainly say: You see, once again it is a court made up of a majority of English Canadians who want to interfere with our educational system.

Mr. Speaker, from the beginning we had no hope of winning. At first, had we applied the solution proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, we would probably have given the Parti Québécois the pretext they need, the one they were always looking for to call an election and blame the federal government for the resulting confrontation. This was not understood only by the government and the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), but I also saw it very clearly stated in an editorial which I find remarkable in the Vancouver Sun, in which a very forceful argument was made against referring Bill 101 to the Supreme Court. In a word, they say we should not try, as the opposition leader suggests, to solve this problem too hastily.

This problem must be settled before the courts of the province of Quebec. The Superior Court, the Appeal Court of the Province of Quebec must rule on these problems before appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada. It will give Quebecers time to think about the unacceptable aspects of Bill 101 instead of being distracted by a political manoeuvre, a defence manoeuvre against the federal government which is trying, through confrontation and interference, to overrule legislation approved by the Quebec majority and passed by a democratically elected government.

The people in Quebec, and particularly French Canadians in Quebec, must realize to what extent this Bill 101 is encroaching upon their rights. From a cultural point of view, it is obvious since this bill deprives them of a freedom of choice, the freedom to send their children to an English or a French school, according to what they think is best as parents. Even from an economic viewpoint, Quebecers must realize how harmful this legislation is.

I think it is perhaps too soon to give definite statistics on the economic situation of Quebec, but already there are some fairly conclusive indications that the November 15 election is turning into an economic handicap for Quebecers. I am thinking in particular of Montreal. Montreal is my hometown, and I can say a lot of good things about it, it is a great city. It is a city which, because at its location, its human resources and its financial resources has been a great city and can continue to be a great city because of its urban as well as industrial infrastructure.

But it must be said that the figures we have for the last year indicate that Montreal's economy is now stagnant. Why? Simply because the coming to power of the Péquiste government and such measures as Bill 101 rob Montreal from a part of its calling. Let us look first at these figures. If we compare the first ten months of the year 1977, from January 1 up to now, with the first ten months of the year 1976 until the election of the Péquiste government, we see that unemployment increased by 10 per cent in Canada, by 20 per cent in Quebec et by 30 per cent in Montreal.

If we compare the third quarter of 1976 with the corresponding quarter of 1977, we find that the growth rate of unemployment in the province of Quebec, about 80 per cent, occurred in Montreal.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, an act such as Bill 101, a mentality such as that of the Péquiste government cannot but be detrimental to the industrial development of the province of Quebec. Montreal is cut out to be a transshipment center, an industrial city, a service center, a financial, banking and management service center. So, when you start telling people who want to come to work in such a management, banking or corporate center, that their children will not be allowed to attend English schools, then it is clear that one of the main callings of that great city vanishes. Clearly, such a stand can only lead to economic stagnation. That is why I say that, in the case of Bill 101, it might not be a bad idea for Quebecers to have a chance to reflect on the qualities, on the harmful aspects of that measure.

One word only to complete the picture from the point of view of our strategy. So, we say: the Péquiste government is dividing the provincial electors; so it will have to go. What are the tools available to that government? Well, that government will have to hold provincial elections, as well as a referendum.

On this side of the House, we want the very same tools. Being able to meet the PQ on as favourable a federalist ground as they want a separatist ground. That is why I believe when the next federal elections are called, all parties in this House will campaign for national unity. In that regard, there will be no problem whatsoever. But we too, during this session, would like to have a legislation on referendum so that the federal government may also appeal to the people of Canada, and Quebec in particular.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I hope that in that field we will get the cooperation of opposition parties. Naturally, in due time, we will give them the specifics of the referendum. For the time being, we only want to advise Canadians that we do not want to be taken aback by this PQ instrument called the referendum. It is really a plebiscite, but the PQ are talking about a referendum. We also want a similar instrument. We want the federal government to be able to consult the Canadian people, the population of all provinces on a certain amount of problems affecting national unity. Those who claim that the problem of the independence of Quebec only concerns the people of Quebec are like the surgeon who would tell a patient who is going to have his arm amputated: well, I am going to amputate your arm without consulting you because once it is cut it will no longer be part of the body.

We also look at separatism in a similar manner. We believe that we cannot take such an essential part of Canada as the province of Quebec from Canada without the whole nation being concerned. Once again, this is the reason why we are going to put before the House a referendum proposal.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, you have before you a government which is not rigid, which does not seek confrontation, which says that everything is possible and which proposed in September to the provinces a constitutional arrangement which would meet the objective sought out by all the premiers at the historical conference in St. Andrews.

Now, in brief we are going to discuss whatever subject we wish on this side and on the other side of the House, whatever subject the provinces wish to discuss; as a matter of fact, only one subject is excluded, namely a proposal which would attempt to break up, to destroy Canada; we are not willing to sit down and discuss that.

[English]

I apologize to the House for the length of my remarks. It is often said that I do not speak enough in the House of Commons.

Mr. Broadbent: We won't say that again.

Mr. Trudeau: But I did want to make this point at some length—

An hon. Member: You did.

Mr. Trudeau: —because I feel it is important not only for opposition members but for the country to understand the basis upon which they would have to make some very fundamental choices in the economic area and in the area of national unity.

I confess I am somewhat mystified by the fact that in the past few years Canadians seem to have lost a sense of perspective about the country. They seem to look more often at what is wrong with the country than what is right with it. We have demonstrated an amazing capacity to close our eyes to the great things which exist in this country, to the human achievements, to the privileges which our freedom and wealth confer upon us. So many seem willing to see only the supposed injustices inflicted upon us, and forget to realize that in many countries what we describe as our problems would be regarded as unattainable luxuries by nine-tenths of the population.

I have attempted today to show that we will not close our eyes to the real problems we face. I attempted to do what Canadians did 110 years ago when they created confederation. They did not close their eyes to the inequities which existed in the country, to the tension which existed between the different colonies, the disadvantages which the various native peoples faced. They did not ignore potential future conflicts, but they did realize that by uniting themselves they could be strong and could resolve those conflicts.

The Fathers of Confederation could have decided, just as Canadians could decide today, to do nothing but to let these problems overwhelm them, to let inertia condemn them to continue their isolation and to miss the opportunities open to them. But the Fathers of Confederation did not do that—and we must not. They chose to pool their resources. They chose to create a constitution and to invent a great country. To those who say that confederation is a failure, I reply that it brought about a stable democratic system of government, it protected cultural and regional identities, it opened the door to geographical expansion, it provided liberties and rights, brought about an effective system of social justice, led to economic growth, to the establishment of a strong financial system, and to a respected position among the nations of the world.

To those who call this a failure, I say I hope that we, in our time, in our efforts to renew our national spirit of community, can fail so well. But we shall not fail, Mr. Speaker. We can succeed, we must succeed, and we will.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, having heard their weekly sermon, the Liberal backbenchers are now preparing to leave, and we wish them well. Back in September, 1968, I returned to speak at a high school in Oshawa which I had attended some years earlier as a student. In the course of meeting with the students a fellow at the back of the assembly got up and said, "Mr. Broadbent, I understand that you studied at the London School of Economics. Is that right?" I said, "Yes, that is right." He went on, "I understand that a fellow named Trudeau, the new Prime Minister, also studied at that institution. Is that right?" I had to say, "Yes, he went there as well." Then this student turned to me and said, "How is it you came back a democratic socialist and he came back a Liberal?" I said, "Well, the Prime Minister always was a poor student."

An hon. Member: No wonder the backbenchers are leaving.

Mr. Broadbent: If the people of Canada with the most elementary education in economics could have listened to the first half of the diatribe we heard this afternoon, they would have agreed 100 per cent.

• (1752)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Just listen. We listened for an hour and a half; now it is your turn. For an hour and a half we listened to a sermon which contained only two new items. Firstly, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) scooped the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) by announcing the government is going to spend $100 million on some job creation program. He was so scared stiff that the rest of the hour and a half of his speech would put everyone to sleep that he had to mention that at the outset. He then trotted out all the old stuff. Some of it we will agree with, and I want to deal with the points he raised. For better or for worse, I have thrown my speech away and I will try and engage in some serious debate on the issues.

The Prime Minister continued for an hour and a half, and then near the end of his speech made another announcement. He said the government is going to bring forward a bill covering federal referendums. I happen to think that that is a good idea. That is something I was considering, and I seriously thank the Prime Minister for it. Why did the Prime Minister do that? He spent no length of time justifying the referendum at all. Nor did he elaborate on the $100 million which is going to be spent on job creation. He knew that the people sitting in the press gallery and those who may see some of this debate on television, hear about it on the radio or read reports, would have learned absolutely nothing new this afternoon, so he trotted out a couple of announcements.

I want to deal as seriously as I can with the economics argument, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that the Minister of Finance or some Liberal backbenchers will take up this argument tomorrow. What do we hear? First of all, let me say that the end of his speech was the sort of culmination of a series of insults. The Prime Minister had the audacity to say to the people of Canada that somehow they were at fault. At a time when, compared not with the poor countries of the world but with The Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, West Germany, Japan, our economic performance has been deplorable, the Prime Minister had the nerve to say that Canadians are a bunch of bitchers. That is what the culmination of his speech amounted to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: One point is to be made about the unemployed, Mr. Speaker. I have just come back from Newfoundland, and I can tell the Prime Minister that the unemployment level in that province is the same as it was in 1932. Let me remind the Prime Minister of a little economic history: 1932 was the depth of our depression. I do not know whether the Prime Minister is going to go to Newfoundland and say to the people in the fishing communities or in St. John's, "You're a bunch of bitchers, fellows. The fact that there is no job for you is somehow your own fault". Perhaps he will tell those Newfoundlanders with a 30 per cent unemployment rate, "You're soft", as he said to Canadians in general. Or, "You're lazy; you are not out there trying hard enough".

The other day, in London, the Prime Minister said that Canadians simply did not want to work and that was the reason we had unemployment. He said that they were soft. I want to list some of the points he made today. He said that the problem with the Canadian economy and with the Canadian people is lack of productivity. He said that we were outpricing ourselves in world markets. He said that earnings in Canada are 7 per cent higher than they are in the United States, that they are more productive than we are.

A number of these generalities, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to contest. I am not going to say that a number of the statements the Prime Minister has made and which I have just quoted are wrong. He may be right. But I should like him to narrow down the sectors and to tell us which ones are not productive. That would be serious work. The impression that he tried to leave with us in the House today and with the people of Canada is that somehow his government, the Liberal party, has been non-existent in this country for the past ten years. If ever I heard a banal political sermon, Mr. Speaker, it was this afternoon.

People like Helmut Schmidt in West Germany, or Olof Palme in Sweden, or even the President of France who is not a social democrat, or the Prime Minister of Japan who is not a social democrat, are people in very divergent economies who do not sit back and say that their people are at fault, that somehow they are not being as productive as they should, that they are being outpriced in world markets, and then convince themselves that they have made a brilliant argument.

I said to the Prime Minister that he was hurling banal platitudes when he was making his speech, and I repeat that now. There is no argument there. There is a mere assertion of claims, a mere rattling off of statistics. In all seriousness, I say that if we are now in this state in Canada, if we are in the kind of economic situation we are in—as indeed we are—there is only one group in this country which must bear prime responsibility, and that is the government over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In asking, Mr. Speaker, where they have been for ten years, I go back to last spring's budget. I do not go back ten years, but just a few months. Where is the economic competence? The Prime Minister sort of hurls at the official opposition and the NDP, "Who are you guys to really know what you are talking about?" The government produced a budget last spring which is a disgrace in the modern world. If the Prime Minister and his cabinet had any integrity, they would get up and say, "We were dead wrong; we made serious errors". Because they did. Every economic indicator, their forecasts of unemployment levels, their forecasts of the rate of inflation and their forecasts of job creation, were dead wrong in that budget. Their economic analysis was that the manufacturing sector was operating at 80 per cent capacity.

My party does not object to profits, but we do not accept the simple-minded argument of the Prime Minister. If you have a private sector, of course you accept profits. Again I urge him to talk to the social democratic prime ministers of Western Europe. Instead of producing a budget which recognized that we had only 80 per cent capacity being utilized in the manufacturing sector, and saying that the economic conclusion which you deduce from that is not to expand your capital facilities but to expand consumer demand, he did the opposite. He offered a $1.2 billion tax incentive to the corporate sector to overexpand.

Businessmen are not stupid, Mr. Speaker. If General Motors has already 20 per cent unused capacity, you can be damned sure they will not overexpand some more to have 40 per cent unused capacity. So we said then, and I repeat now, that that $1.2 billion tax concession to the corporations is objectionable to us, not because it was a tax concession to the corporate sector—anyone in his right mind in the modern world knows that you have to have a tax policy for corporations—but because it was the wrong policy at the wrong time. If it was wrong last spring when we were operating at 80 per cent capacity, it is equally wrong this fall when we are operating at only 83 per cent capacity.

From the throne speech yesterday we learned that the government is going to bring back again that piece of economic nonsense. A legitimate question posed rhetorically from time to time by the Prime Minister is, "What would you do, you wise guys over there who make all your criticisms?"

The economic issue bothers me, and I will get to that. In his argument today, the Prime Minister very deliberately contrasted the economy with national unity, which is his traditional fashion. On the one hand we have national unity which is a problem, and on the other hand there is the economy, according to the Prime Minister. They cannot be separated in that way. If I understood the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), he was saying the same thing. One involves the other.

The Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport), the hon. member for Skeena (Mrs. Campagnolo), said to me, when we were talking about unemployment last night, that in her riding in the province of British Columbia there is 30 per cent unemployment. I am not giving away any secret. In northern Ontario, 4,000 or 5,000 are laid off in Sudbury. In southern Ontario, from community to community—and I mean from Windsor in the west right through to Ste Thérèse, Quebec, in the east—some 20,000 additional jobs could be created for Canadians. Some 20,000 jobs could be created, and not on the basis of some airy-fairy, long range scheme but simply on the basis of this government doing its job. If it lives up to the requirements of the auto pact if it did not give over $300 million in write-offs to the automotive companies—which was done in the last few years—and if it did not fail to meet the job requirements, we might have 20,000 jobs.

You can move in every province in Canada, sector after sector, and find problems. I should like to say what we can do with some of them. The Prime Minister, in the Speech from the Throne, was so disturbing to me—and, I am sure, to hundreds of thousands of Canadians—because there was no indication that the government recognizes what is required in some sectors. For example, there is fishing in Atlantic Canada. Why do we not establish what the fishermen have been calling for down there—a national marketing board for fish? If it is good for our wheat farmers in the prairies, and if it has produced sales for our families in the prairies in the agricultural sector, surely a national marketing board is good in the fishing sector. The fishermen of the east coast want it. Why do they not get it?

Dealing with the textile industry, 60 per cent of the workers in Canada live and work in the province of Quebec, and it is in trouble. We say that what you should do in that sector is to put a freeze for at least three years on the level of imports as they were coming in in 1975. Three years would give us time to modernize the industry and do something about it to create long-range jobs.

With regard to shipbuiding there is an obvious solution to us. Sixty per cent of the ships being constructed in our shipbuilding industry today are sold in export markets. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) kept saying about every other sector today, it is a soft market. We have calculated that the number of jobs currently threatened could well be maintained if the government, in its own departments, would make advance orders now and let the shipbuilding firms, the private sector firms, know what line of ships they need to enforce our 200-mile limit, on the one hand. On the other hand, it would produce new shipping and boats for our fishermen. If there were co-ordination between government departments, something could be done in terms of their own requirements.

The Prime Minister talked in general terms and came out with platitudes, without recognizing that what is required, and has been required, is a very different kind of economic policy from the government of Canada. Canadians are beginning to know that we are running into the problems we are now experiencing in this country because of a policy established back at the time of the Hon. C. D. Howe. The reason we are having problems is that every village and town across the land, in one sense, has had a false economy which was built merely on the exporting of raw materials.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It has been built on the exporting of raw materials, and they are running out. Raw materials are running out, and when the world demand goes down, we suffer the consequences.

What is required, in general terms, to deal with this situation? If the government of Canada will not listen to the New Democratic Party of Canada, then I plead with it to talk to the Japanese, the French, the West Germans and the Scandinavians in order to find out that in all those countries they have investment planning, which is hardly a revolutionary idea. All those countries have a major, national governmental input into economic decision-making, particularly at the investment control level.

For years our party has talked about national economic planning. If the government of the day does not want to steal this idea from us, let them go abroad and claim they are getting it from someone else. That kind of planning is essential if we are to get out of the serious mess we are in.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We require a real and solid commitment in terms of job creation. I do not pretend it can be done overnight. We have presented a short-run program of three or four points which would, if carried out over a period of 12 months, create between 250,000 and 300,000 jobs. To achieve unemployment at the 3 per cent level will take three or four years. That should be told honestly to the people of Canada. If we do not start now to do the kind of planning all industrial countries have done for the last 10 or 15 years, we will not get it in three or four years, nor will we get it in three or four decades with the kind of policies of the Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: On the very important question of national unity, the economic aspect of it, the need for national policies is essential in terms of overcoming regional inequalities and overcoming inequalities which exist between regions. That has worsened in the last ten years.

I should like to make a point about the constitution because there is a myth which is being increasingly accepted across our land. It is a very serious myth and it is being propagated by provincial premiers, by certain academics and certain politicians. The myth I am referring to is that we have to give our provinces more power in terms of economic activity, either by changing the constitution or by evolving further tax points.

I believe very strongly that any further movement in that direction will destroy this country, if we move any further in a world as competitive as ours. We have to deal with Japan, which has a national economic control system controlled out of Tokyo the like of which is unknown in almost any other country. We also have to deal with the indicative planning in France and a form of planning in Sweden, West Germany and all other industrial countries. Canadians are dreaming in technicolour if they think we can give our provinces more financial power and have more control taken away from Ottawa. We need national direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Canadians in our Atlantic provinces must keep that in mind. Even though Canadians in Saskatchewan and Manitoba may be wealthy now, they will see what can happen to regional economy after a year or two of bad crop failures. Then they will see the need for a strong, national economic policy and an effective government in Ottawa.

Another myth which is receiving some credibility is more power being given to the provinces. Ultimately, it will mean that Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia will do well, but no one else. The other approach which is proposed is to take Canada and its five economic regions and somehow develop a new constitutional framework in which those five regions would have new and increased powers. People who are saying that can understand that real worlds and real political communities are dreaming in technicolour. If we have a prairie economy, a British Columbia economy, an Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic provinces economy, then we are not going to receive co-operation because each of those sectors will set itself up in competition with the others.

The people of our prairies would say, quite legitimately, from time to time, "Let us import everything from Japan or the United States, in terms of industrial goods", and the people of our industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec would say now, "Let us import our agricultural products from over the border, from the United States". The more you create semi-autonomous economic regions, as seems to me to be the essence of what those people who are mindlessly calling for five economic blocs mean, the more you set the framework for tension in the country. That, too, is no solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The solution at the federal and constitutional level, in my view, is really very basic. There is almost no move which we can make in terms of devolving federal powers to the provinces, and we should stop the talk that somehow we will remake Canada by remaking the constitution. That is just nonsense. The federal government needs that economic power, particularly, I repeat, in the modern world where competition with other nations is becoming tougher, not easier, and we need national direction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The devolution of power is not the answer; the devolution of administration is. I do not want to exaggerate the point—I have made it before. We can move forward considerably in our country by having national programs, whether in housing, medicare or hospitalization, and having the federal government raise the funds but turn them over to the provinces to administer. I see no problem in that. Let them set their own priorities, whether it is with regard to acute care hospitals or nursing homes. Let each province decide that, but let us maintain the national programs which are essential in getting a certain, high, common standard in Canadian nationhood from Prince Edward Island in the east to Victoria, British Columbia, in the west.

So we want no further decentralization in power, but some in administration. Above all, what I am saying—and this is central to my argument—is that in economic affairs we need economic leadership, a sense of national direction, a sense of national purpose emanating from here, emanating from the benches on the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in the context of making the economic argument, I want to say something about the cultural reality as well because it is important in a country, whether it is our country or any other. There are two broad ways of looking at society. There is the way of the people who produce their goods and services, our farmers, our fishermen, our steelworkers and our autoworkers, that is, the economic aspect of life, and there is another aspect. You cannot radically separate it from the economic aspect, but you can do so analytically. I am referring to our cultural life.

I think that in Canada there are two vital cultures in existence. There are many subcultures, but there are two vital ones—the English and the French cultures. I want to say something this afternoon first about the English language culture because I am of the generation that does not turn to the United States, to England or to continental Europe for what I respond to in terms of the English language creativity. I do not have to read Saul Bellow. I like Saul Bellow, but I can turn to people such as Atwood, Mordecai Richler, Graeme Gibson for fiction and poetry. We are at a higher level of creativity now than in any other period in our history and at world standard levels.

I am speaking of my culture now, the one from which I come, the English language culture. In terms of music, an English Canadian can be proud. He can listen to Maureen Forrester or Glen Gould, musicians of world renown, and he can listen to Oskar Morawetz in terms of creative composition. The point I am making is that there have been a lot of positive things said about Francophone culture, and I agree with them, but in the last decade and a half there has been a sense of pride and accomplishment, in English Canada, in English Canadian creativity which is second to none in the English-speaking world, and I am proud of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Perhaps on a personal note—I do not make personal observations too often—I think there is something different about the mental framework, and I hesitate to make this point as well, but those under 45 or 40 years of age, as opposed to other Canadians perhaps—this I do not know—had, as I did when I was a student in the early 1960s, the opportunity to study abroad. I was in England and I had the choice to make whether to stay in England and study for an English Ph.D, or come back to my own country. There was no conflict for me; I saw no lowering of standards if I came back to Canada.

So I decided I would study where there was the best person in the world in my field, and the best person in my field happened to be at the University of Toronto, a man named Macpherson. So I studied in Toronto and did my Ph.D. there. The point I want to make is that there is a change going on in our land, in our generation. We no longer feel we have to go to Harvard or to LSE or to Oxford to get our degrees. In fact, we are now exporting our scholars. As the Prime Minister well knows, the fellow who is heading the political science department at Oxford now is a man named Charles Taylor, a very distinguished Canadian.

Mr. Broadbent: The point I am making is that there is great vitality in our land, there is a high level of creativity in the English Canadian culture, in the English language. In the cultural domain something exciting is going on in the province of Quebec. If great things are happening in English Canada, they are also happening in Quebec. We have heard a lot about that recently, but we have not always responded well. They do have their writers, they do have their poets, they do particularly have their song writers and their singers. There is a joie de vivre in that province that should make all of us proud as Canadians.

What I am asking is, what can we do, as the federal government, in the cultural domain in this national unity debate in which we are involved? I can state quite bluntly that there is little that I see we can do in terms of legislation. Most of the areas of cultural control in the province of Quebec or in other provinces are within provincial jurisdiction. René Lévesque or any other premier in the province of Quebec has control over the educational system. They have the opportunity to use cable television, and we need to make certain amendments to our legislation to open up to all our provinces the exclusive control of 80 per cent of 90 per cent of the cable outlets. There is no reason why they should not have it. It is good for Quebec and it is good for all the other provinces, so long as we keep a few networks national.

The essential point I want to make in the national unity debate vis-à-vis the provinces, and particularly the province of Quebec, is twofold. First, we should not say to Quebeckers that they have to choose, that in their psychic make-up they have to be either Québécois of Canadian. I say that the attitude of the Prime Minister—and I respect it because I know it is honest—has been, in my understanding of his career in politics and his political writing, to say to Quebeckers, "You must choose. You must renounce your nationalism. You must renounce your sense of being a Québécois and be a Canadian, or the other way around".

An hon. Member: Oh, come on; that is not so.

Mr. Broadbent: The Liberals say no.

Mr. Prud'homme: Not the Liberals; the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Give us an example.

Mr. Broadbent: I am asked for an example. I will give the hon. member an example. It was not the former leader of the Conservatives or their present leader, nor was it my predecessor, who said of Quebec nationalism that it was a form of tribalism. It happens to have been the Prime Minister. There was no attitude on the part of the leadership on this side of the House of any of the parties that Quebec nationalism was unacceptable.

I repeat my argument and I welcome any challenging of the facts. The prime Minister was honest in his argument. He has always seen nationalism in Canada, as well as elsewhere, as being regressive, reactionary, as being an oppressive force, and he believes that with conviction. I say he is wrong. Nationalism need not be regressive; it can be creative. What we have needed in our country is not the repression of Quebec nationalism but a heightened sense of nationalism elsewhere, so that we can bring the two together to do something in our land.

The question of Quebec nationalism or cultural life is not primarily a constitutional matter; it is very much an attitudinal matter. Those of us in federal politics must open ourselves in a spirit of equality to our fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec and say to them that they need not choose between being Quebecois or Canadien. They can be both. We must understand that their historical, cultural and linguistic roots are very deeply embedded in their province, but there is no contradiction between living that cultural reality as a Quebecois and being a Canadien.

I do not know if we are going to win that battle, because if there is not cultural vitality going on in English Canada—no question about independence—there is, indeed, that going on in the minds of Quebeckers, and any one of us would be dishonest if we did not address ourselves to that question. If I understand my Quebec friends well—indeed, if I understand my wife, who shares that culture—there is an identity problem, and the Quebecker is going to be trying to sort out, in this period in history, whether it is sufficient to work it out within a federal framework and whether a Quebecois can really make it as a human being within the Canadian structure.

I do not know in advance the answer to that question, but I do know that all we at the federal level can do on that important issue is welcome that attitude in Canada which says that we want Quebeckers to feel part of our land and that we are going to do everything we can. That does, indeed, include minority language rights right across the country. I agree with the Prime Minister on that, but where I disagree with him and his analysis about the significance of that, is that for me, as I understand what is going on, establishing rights for Francophone minorities in other provinces is not what will ultimately persuade Quebeckers to stay within our union or to depart.

I plead for serious understanding of that point, if I am right. Those rights are important, but for Quebeckers what is really important is not the welfare of minorities outside the province of Quebec; what is important for Quebeckers in 1977 is to be convinced that their homeland, the province of Quebec, is a place which can continue to exist as a vital and creative Francophone community within the union.

That, to me, is the issue which has to be sorted out, fundamentally by Quebeckers, and if I understand the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) correctly, that is his argument too. He says that minority rights are important across the country, and certainly they are in the long run, but in dealing with the Quebecker as he or she is now, we have to persuade the Quebecker that it is within the province of Quebec, basically, that he or she can live as a Quebecois.

In the great debate which is going on with regard to the cultural domain there is not a lot we at the federal level can do except be persuasive and perhaps modify cable television legislation. We must win the hearts and minds of the people of Quebec on that issue. However, there is also something we can do in the economy. I have repeated that with considerable emphasis in the past year. I have not disregarded the cultural domain, by no means, but the cultural domain ties into the economy. I was in Trois-Rivières and in Sept Isles on a trip not long ago. Quebeckers there told me that they wanted jobs. They were concerned about textile policy and about shipbuilding policy. They said they would respond just as Canadians in Newfoundland, British Columbia or Sudbury, to a national government which wants to deal with the national economy.

So if we want to deal with national unity, it is not a matter of separating something called national unity from the economy. Both go together. What we need, particularly now in our history, is a sense of national purpose. We need to recognize that what is going on in French Canada and in English Canada is very similar to what is going on in Western Europe. Ordinary people on both continents, in advanced industrialized societies, are saying that they want a greater say within economic enterprises. They want more liberty in terms of economic institutions and in terms of controlling their own destinies. They are saying they want a greater degree of equality in terms of the output of those economic institutions.

If this is happening in both Quebec and English Canada—and I think it is—we must remember why Quebeckers voted for the PQ. Overwhelmingly, studies show they were voting that way because they wanted practical reforms of this kind. English Canadians want the same kinds of reforms. So if the Prime Minister wants to show national leadership—because he is in a position to do it; he is the Prime Minister—he should bring to this country a sense of great national purpose, a revitalization of the expectations of English and French-speaking Canadians alike, and establish anew in this land the belief that jointly we can pursue the age-old goals of liberty and equality, at the same time remaining Francophone or Anglophone in our basic culture.

I now move an amendment to the motion which has been moved. It has some bearing on what I have just said. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House regrets in particular the announced intention of the government to reintroduce the $1.2 billion in tax concessions provided in the March budget to large corporate interests, it being the view of this House that at a time when manufacturing is operating at only 80 per cent capacity, what we need instead are tax cuts for middle and lower income earners and an increase in direct job creation programs as requested by the premiers of all the provinces of Canada.".

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, as is the custom, I would like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. During these two days, yesterday and today, we had the opportunity of seeing the political game at work. One day we listen to the Speech from the Throne and we hear one thing about one subject and, the day after, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) comes here to tell us the exact opposite of what was said yesterday in the speech. Today the Prime Minister started his remarks, in the short section he reserved to that issue, by saying that we did not need new economic theories, new economic stategies, whereas in the Speech from the Throne it was said, I quote:

High rates of unemployment and inflation are clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies appropriate to simpler times.

Therefore, we must change our methods. I was pleased to note that the throne speech gave us that new image, that new philosophy or at least the awareness that the economic systems of the 16th century should be altered to apply modern economic systems to our contemporary problems. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister turned right about today and said that we must not proceed too quickly, that we must have a national conscience. There is no problem. Well, the problems due to unemployment are ascribable to the unemployed.

Foreign countries and not this government are responsible for the problem of inflation. Imports and other countries such as the United States, France and others are responsible. We forget to improve the well-being of the Canadian people and the blame is put on external causes. The same thing is true about the debate on Canadian unity. No, this government once again is not responsible for the problems. It is not an economic issue, but the Parti Québécois is to blame. If there are some unemployed in Montreal, if Montreal is experiencing a financial crisis, the Canadian economy has nothing to do with that, it is due to the election of the Parti Québécois. It is as if we would say that New York is on the verge of bankruptcy on account of Negroes in the southern states. This emotive game is used to divert attention from the fundamental and central issue which is the economic problem and new solutions and theories to be applied to the economy. If Quebecers are not satisfied with Confederation and returns received from the federal government, it is not because the federal government spoke English or French but because economically they do not feel as if they were entitled to live honourably as others do throughout Canada.

When I travel in British Columbia or in the Maritimes and I meet someone who is poor and there are many in each province; in some they speak English, in the province of Quebec they speak French. Therefore, it is not a linguistic problem but an economic one. The problem is the following: some people cannot live in their homes the way they like. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said: Oh, yes, things are going just fine. Everything has doubled since 1945. Production has doubled in Canada, doubled here and doubled there. But he forgets to say that the cost of living has doubled and even quadrupled since 1945.

They claim they are improving our situation! Indeed, modern technology and the inventive skill of man are there to create automation and make the burden of the workers easier, but thanks to an economic system the right hon. Prime Minister refuses absolutely to change, these workers are made to suffer, because the inventive skill of man has created something to help them.

While, in this day and age, technology can improve productivity both quantitatively and qualitatively, it penalizes workers by depriving them of their right to work and the power to buy the end product of the machine. Here they say they are improving the situation! The government knows how to play with words, but as evidenced in the Speech from the Throne, the government is striving to lay the blame on somebody else's doorstep, refusing to assume its responsibilities. One cannot help being impressed by a phrase such as this in the Speech from the Throne: On a national scale, unemployment now constitutes a very serious obstacle to economic growth.

Now if growth is not as expected or does not move fast enough unemployment is to be blamed. Unemployment is a consequence of mismanagement and lack of economic growth, not the cause of the lack of economic growth. That problem is created to begin with. Reference is made to an era of leisure, but the new developments which could give people the purchasing power to buy the production of machinery are overlooked. There are now very few slaves, but still we hear that there is too much unemployment, and then, investments are made in automation that indirectly creates unemployment; and whereas we give them more leisures, whether they be called unemployed or otherwise, nobody wants to give them the purchasing power which could be used to buy all that is machine-produced.

That is precisely one of the basic problems. When the government says: Well, we cannot do anything else but borrow in order to finance our development. But as long as loans are made, the finance people are not unemployed. When has the government ever mentioned that? Never. The government is willing to go on, unbridled, borrowing money, unconcerned with the interest rates, with the country being in debt, borrowing more to finance our own development, borrowing money in the United States or somewhere else in the world, that we can afford to do. There is to be no restriction on that, and we can even go further. In the Speech from the Throne, it is said, that as of today, we have to help our private sector undertake abroad projects requiring large investments. What is going to be saved by that?

How will this solve the unemployment problem, the economic problems of Canada, of Quebec, or of the other provinces? Absolutely nothing. Our companies are now being encouraged to invest money elsewhere, like Noranda Mines is doing, to cease production in Northwestern Quebec, and after reaping profits in Northwestern Quebec, they want to spend or invest this money in Brazil to the tune of $325 millions. Indirectly, we are paying for this.

However, as soon as we try to change this system, we create inflation. Social Credit members have been telling the government for the past 35 years that the present economic system is creating inflation and unemployment at the same time. Day after day, prices are hiked and workers demand higher wages. If we grant them higher wages, prices will have to be raised and, finally, we put in a machine that can produce twice as much as 10 employees.

Those employees are laid off; they are out of work and therefore are no longer entitled to live.

Full employment was suggested at one time. This is precisely where we must make a choice. Do we want full employment or do we want a system that respects the individual? If the government wants to solve the problem of unemployment, there is an easy answer. Tomorrow morning, let us hire the unemployed and have them dig holes and move mountains, and if there are too many machines around, we can always give the workers a pick and a shovel and have them work manually, and if there are still too many unemployed, they can use teaspoons; this will give work to more people. But this is ridiculous.

If man had the intelligence to create a machine to replace him on the production line, our government should have the intelligence to find the way to distribute the production of this machine to meet the needs of Canadian consumers. This is a solution. But for this, we would need new theories or techniques which are not being applied at this time. Governments are more at ease imposing quotas and stopping production. At some point they told producers that their output was too high. There is one group of starving unemployed—I see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is here—who would very much like to have milk on their tables. They cannot because it is too expensive and they cannot afford it. And in the meantime our dairy farmers would be quite happy to produce what is needed to help them. But they cannot, because of the quota system. At the same time we go on importing from other countries. Last year we imported 46 million pounds of cheese, representing some 500 million pounds of milk. That milk was not produced here, it was produced in the countries whose cheese we imported, while we were telling our farmers they were producing too much milk. And we curtailed production. Such is the government's policy.

My colleague from Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) referred today to another problem in that area. Instead of our farmers being paid subsidies, a conflict between various agencies is being fought on their backs because of the federal government. They are denied the possibility of expanding at home, of creating jobs at home. People are capable of creating jobs for themselves when they have an opportunity to do so. In a free enterprise situation they are capable of going a long way. But there is every tendency to belittle them, to deprive them of that potential through all sorts of regulations.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) stated earlier that federal control should be increased. The tendency is to squeeze the lemon. Unfortunately, there are here in Canada a whole lot of lemons that are sick and tired of being squeezed. Now about import quotas. In Quebec as in the other provinces, the textile industry is going down the drain, the shoe industry is in the process of being stamped out, but this government has been allowing massive imports: fifty-four million pairs of shoes were imported into Canada last year. This means roughly two pairs of shoes and one pair of slippers per capita. In the meantime we are plagued with unemployment. In the shoe industry, more than 50 per cent of the people lost their jobs. In 1968 there were 208 shoe manufacturers in Canada. In 1977, 150. Then people say: We have so many problems. What will we do?

The Speech from the Throne tells absolutely nothing, apart from phraseology like: If we have unemployment, blame it on the unemployed; if our economy does not work well, it is because the unemployed are idle; if the unemployment rate is so high, that is the unemployed's fault, not that of the economy as such.

On the other hand, the government can reduce taxes for financiers. As I was saying a few minutes ago, the government never had any qualms when it wanted to grant loans abroad in order to stimulate development in Canada. They never thought about imposing wage and price controls on that, no, no. When it comes to financiers, there are no controls, they are free to charge the interest rates they want. No discussion about that. Go ahead, boys, interest rates do not matter. They even go so far as telling financiers in the budget speech that they will give them some extra help, that they will get tax cutbacks. That is all right!

Those people get help; their taxes will be reduced. However, the poor little taxpayers, those who can hardly survive today, are not mentioned. It is dangerous to help them. They must be kept in extreme poverty because it is easier to control them. This is the position of the government.

What does the Speech from the Throne reveal on the whole? Absolutely nothing. Simply an attitude which has never changed. We could hope for a change in the economic position of the government until the speech of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). After his speech, we understand that he wants absolutely no changes. He even gave us statistical data to demonstrate that we were in the best of all countries, in the best of all worlds, without any problem. There were several snags but they do not depend on the government. No. They are never concerned. Everyone is concerned except the federal administration.

The dollar has even been assessed today. We have been told that it has reached its lowest level since 1930. But once again it is not the fault of the federal administration. No! It is the fact of the other countries. If we have failed to maintain adequate productivity, if we have failed to encourage entrepreneurship by taking measures to stimulate individual creativity, if we have failed to do all that, it is not the fault of our government. No, it is always the fault of other countries. So the dollar is devalued and then we are told that now we will be able to export more. But I ask what will we export? Our manufacturers and our manufacturing industries have been ruined by imports during the last years and again this year. And what shall we export then? Our natural resources like we did before? This does not solve the problem, not at all.

We hear about energy. We must save our energy! We are going to build a pipeline to carry our oil products from the north to the Americans, and also a little for us in eastern Canada. Fortunes will be spent at that. In the meantime, one after the other the ministers tell us, just like the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne: Canadians will have to learn to tighten their belts, otherwise they will be forced to do so. That is the attitude of the government. On the other hand, has anyone been bright enough—and this is not the first time I have told them—to go and find out about the patents or registrations of new inventions meant to conserve energy, to decrease consumption of various sources of energy?

For instance, I refer here to gas in automobiles, or fuel for heating homes. In 1973, I told Minister Macdonald, who was then with Natural Resources: Have you had the decency—instead of telling Canadians to lower their thermostats and close their doors in winter when the weather is cold so that too much energy is not wasted—have you had the decency to go and see at the patent office if there might not be new inventions that could be used to save energy? No! he had not had the decency to do so! He does not have any more today, even after having changed departments and all that. On the other hand, excuses are found. In a question on the order paper it was asked whether, since 1940, the patent office had received applications for registration of inventions meant to reduce the consumption of gas in automobiles or fuel for home heating systems? How many had been patented and rejected? Why? When? What savings were expected from those patents? The government, who is oh! so concerned about the economy, about reducing the consumption of energy, of pollution, replied: There have been 4,900 patents.

Second question: How many were accepted? How much was saved? It is estimated that it would cost about $10,000 and several man-days. It is absolutely ridiculous! We spend more than three million a day for oil products but we figure $10,000 is too much to try to find some ways to reduce gas consumption for automobiles.

In 1956, I drove a vehicle which could run 65 miles to the gallon as a mechanic had added some part to the carburator. He had obtained a patent. To protect the multinationals, at that time, they sent the RCMP to smash the "device" so that it would not be registered. That was dangerous! Today, nothing has changed. They do not look for a solution. They talk, they write down speeches from the Throne but when the time comes to solve the problem, they flatly refuse. And they try to blame Canadians. Tighten your belts, but you companies, keep wasting as ever!

Again in the Speech from the Throne, the federal government is saying that it will create a royalties' program for petroleum products. That would be better than the income tax scheme we have now. The only taxpayers who cannot hide their incomes are the wage earners. Maybe the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), but outside that... People who really have a high income or companies, let us not worry about them, they find a way to conceal their revenues. We would like the government to establish a royalties' program as Alberta did in 1935. In that way, the province of Alberta managed to straighten her economy cashing royalties on natural resources in Alberta.

On national unity, we heard all kinds of talks today, from every side, before it was finally conceded that this is an economic issue, which involves the rights of individuals—to a decent life—may I, as a Quebecer, as a Canadian, live in my province or in my country as a human being or should I starve in this country? The same question arises in different provinces, in Alberta as well as in Quebec. That is in the final analysis the issue of national unity. So what does the government have to do in this? It has to create a favourable economic attitude to the satisfaction of the people of a province or of the provinces or Canada as a whole. Then there will be no talk of separation and all that. When people are satisfied, see that they have the right to live at home as they should, they will accept the economic basis that they will be given by the government.

I also read in the Speech from the Throne:

This discontent in such a wealthy country—

An hon. Member: Are you a federalist?

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Yes, I am a federalist but not of your kind.

When I hear the prime minister say that they do not want the status quo, I say the status quo is not in the suggestions he made, it is in his attitude toward the provinces—that is where the status quo is. A new constitution where the provinces will decide among them what they want to put in common and what they want to keep within their own jurisdictions, in the way the present Confederation was formed. The federal did not create four provinces; four provinces created the federal. Until we come back to that spirit of confederation the problem of national unity in Canada will never be resolved. Not with attitudes of confrontation as the prime minister showed this afternoon. Not at all! Through arrogance such as the liberal party is now using across this country, never! It will be through the respect of the entities that form this country and letting them decide among themselves how they want to discuss what they want to put in common and what they want to keep under their provincial jurisdictions. Once we have accepted that, this aspect of the national unity problem will be resolved.

It is strange that when the province of Quebec—and I do not want to defend Quebec in this regard—introduces a bill, Bill 101, which restricts education within the province and its jurisdictions, the Federal government should react in this way since in the past, it did not take such a stand against provinces like Alberta or British Columbia when they denied French speaking children access to school. Once more, they try to blame someone else for the lack of administrative leadership by the Federal government in the past eight years. It is not a matter of confrontation but of frank and honest discussion, not the kind that can be found in the Speech from the Throne. They say that status quo is maintained by the Prime Minister and the Liberal Party, whose attitude is to dictate, try to boss everyone instead of sitting and discussing with people, laying out some bases and saying we should discuss from these bases. This is where the problem lies.

And in the Speech from the Throne, it is still not clearly specified.

. . . the government will be proposing specific initiatives to be taken in collaboration with the provinces . . .

The government is not prepared to sit and discuss with the provinces. On the contrary, they are prepared to take specific steps and this is an example of the status quo which is referred to and of this government's present attitude.

So, on the whole, what is there in the Speech from the Throne? They have tried precisely to put the blame on everybody's shoulders and failed to assume responsibility for their mismanagement. This mismanagement is not hard to prove; ten or 15 years ago, when you told Canadians about inflation, that the present economic system was creating inflation, that when they bought a house at a 10 per cent interest, it would take 10 years to double its price, ten years ago perhaps the people did not understand that very well, but today, they realize that inflation is at their doorstep, that their dollar cannot buy them a dollar's worth of goods. As I said in a question to the Minister of Finance and in a speech: the Canadian dollar is not even worth 18 cents of production.

The then Minister of Finance, Mr. Turner, stood up suddenly and said: "No, it is 22 cents". But this is where he made a mistake: Whether 22 or 18 cents, the Canadian dollar does not have the value of a dollar of production. That is the problem. If you want to buy products, your dollar does not have the value of those products so you have to give two or three to buy one dollar's worth of products. What we recommend is that the government base the value of money, of credit and of the bulk of Canadian purchasing power on production. It will then solve the problem.

When finance ministers tell you openly that one dollar is worth 22 cents of production, there is no need to look very far to see where the problem lies. It keeps on growing as time goes by, since we leave the financial community increase its rate of interest and since all this fuels inflation. Twenty years ago, one could buy a house at 5 per cent interest. Today, it is 10 per cent. At 5 per cent interest it took 20 years to double the price; at 10 per cent it takes just 10 years and at 12½ per cent, as it is the case today, it takes eight years and even six years and a half in certain cases.

After that we are told that inflation does not come from somewhere else, that it is created in our country by the financial system, the economic system, and that we cannot do anything about it. From the outset they say we have to find new economic methods, but they hesitate when they have to sit down and discuss to try to put them in force. They do not want to go too far, they are afraid and they refuse to admit it.

Funny how things have changed everywhere. Cars are not what they were 20 years ago; there have been important changes in the production of food stuffs; everything has changed everywhere. Clothing has changed, construction has changed, techniques, aircraft, everything has changed. One thing that never ever changes is the economic system. You do not touch it. You must not touch it. It would be highly dangerous to touch it. We hoped, and here I conclude, that the Speech from the Throne would reveal a new attitude on the part of the government. Unfortunately, that attitude has vanished with the paper the speech was written on. It no longer has any worth. The government's intents were very well outlined by the Prime Minister this afternoon when he said that they want to make the guidelines, that they do not want to consult people. They still want confrontation and in the final analysis we see, as I have mentioned several times, that we still are confronted with Mr. Trudeau's and the Liberal party's status quo, that is arrogance in not being able to discuss honestly and honourably with a population. What they want is to back them up to the wall and then say: Well if you are stuck, we are your saviours, listen to us, follow us, we will help you. So I think that Canadians have understood that attitude and I think that on the whole—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. Unless the House gives its unanimous consent to allow him to complete his remarks, I will declare that it is six o'clock. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): In conclusion, I would like to say that Anglophones across the country understand—and I have felt it during my trips out west—they really understand that through discussions and not confrontation, it is possible to solve our problems. And I am pleased to repeat what our former leader, Réal Caouette, used to say across the country: I do not believe that by teaching French to an Anglophone he will become a Francophone. No. I do not believe that by teaching English to a Francophone, he will become an Anglophone. No, but, I think that by communicating together, by listening to one another or working together, it is possible to be and to become true Canadians; but again, we must have the decency to sit together, to discuss problems honestly and not through the use of the confrontation system. In meetings held throughout the country, the people readily agreed to discuss, to express some ideas and make concessions on different matters and issues. It remains for the Canadian people to sit down, as I said earlier, and discuss, analyze and work out a constitutional solution in a co-operative mood rather than in a spirit of confrontation as the government is doing at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being past six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 7.07 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PROPOSED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CASE OF SANT P. SINGH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I move, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the government cease its persecution of the public servant, Sant P. Singh, an economist with the Department of Health and Welfare, for his political beliefs and abide by the decision of the adjudicator, J. D. O'Shea of the P.S.S.R.B. who ruled that Singh was improperly disciplined for his political activities, suffered financial loss because of the department's incompetence and that he be entitled to the pay raise which the adjudicator found ought to be paid to him and that this whole regrettable incident be referred to a parliamentary committee for an investigation.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EXISTENCE OF ALLEGED ADVISORY GROUP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. My motion concerns the revelation that there exists within the government a conflict of interest advisory group. In light of the mystery which surrounds this group, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the President of the Privy Council make a statement on motions about this group and further deal decisively with certain apparently spurious reports that the conflict of interest advisory board consists of Senators Austin, Davey and Giguère and Messrs. Goldfarb and Coutts.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON QUESTIONABLE TRADING PRACTICES OF CERTAIN COUNTRIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the tremendous economic problems in the country which are undoubtedly being exacerbated by the dumping of certain types of stainless steel from Japan, West Germany and South Africa, as has been pointed out by the Department of National Revenue, and in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and his predecessor were asked some time ago for a status report on the importation of cheap railway axles which could undermine the position of the only Canadian manufacturer of these axles, namely, Hawker Siddeley of Trenton, Nova Scotia, and no reply has yet been received, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce make a statement on motions outlining to the House the position and activities of countries which are using questionable trading practices vis-à-vis Canada, so that the House and the country may be apprised of the government's stand on this issue.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF PROGRAM "THE TAR SANDS" TO STANDING COMMITTEE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity dealing with the serious implications of the manner of presentation of the subject matter of the CBC program "The Tar Sands", seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). I move:

That the subject matter of the CBC film "The Tar Sands" be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of any such motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO DISCUSS INDUSTRY PROBLEMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering the depressed state of the agricultural industry—for example, declining grain and commodity prices in many cases falling below the cost of production—the ever increasing cost of farm inputs, further aggravated by serious and adverse weather conditions, and the complete lack of government leadership, generally and particularly in the agricultural industry as demonstrated in the throne speech the day before yesterday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That the Minister of Agriculture immediately convene a meeting of the provincial ministers of agriculture to discuss all possible methods to alleviate these serious and pressing problems, such as a deferral of all payments of principal and interest on farm loans held by those producers experiencing harvest difficulties as a result of adverse weather conditions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I made some remarks yesterday about the use of Standing Order 43 during the throne speech debate. I must say that this kind of motion seems to be asking us to set aside the throne speech debate in order to debate the throne speech. I think that is an improper use of Standing Order 43 under the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), I move:

That this House welcomes the assurance of the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the Minister of Public Works was not expressing government policy when he called for a curtailment with respect to family allowances and old age security, and this House calls on the government to extend these and other social programs as a means of distributing more equally the wealth that is produced by this nation as a whole.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ELECTIONS

SUGGESTION POLITICAL PROMISES IN CROWFOOT RIDING SHOULD HAVE CABINET APPROVAL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that political promises are being made in the province of Alberta to try to win one Liberal seat, namely, that of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That all future promises be backed by cabinet approval since the people of Crowfoot lost faith in individual Liberal promises years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REFERENDUMS

TYPE AND SCOPE OF LEGISLATION PROPOSED

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who, perhaps to the surprise of his colleagues, referred in his speech in the House yesterday to a matter relating either to a referendum or to a plebiscite. There was some confusion in the language of the Prime Minister. He referred to a plebiscite, which allows an expression of opinion, and to a referendum, which has binding legal effect. I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell the House whether he is talking about a referendum or a plebiscite and what precisely he proposes? What is the general effect of the legislation he proposes to introduce to the House in that regard?

● (1112)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what we have in mind is a referendum, and I think that what the province of Quebec has in mind is a plebiscite, accepting the distinction the Leader of the Opposition just made. We would introduce enabling legislation in this session if we could get the co-operation of opposition parties. I would want to make sure that it was brought in as a multipartisan bill. I would want to consult with the leaders of the opposition parties and, if possible, with the provincial premiers on this referendum legislation before it is actually brought before the House.

Mr. Clark: Since the Prime Minister is interested in consultation on this question, is it the intention of the government to have this legislation refer exclusively to one question, or does he propose enabling legislation which will apply to a wide range of questions including perhaps abortion, capital punishment and, if we are to believe the words of the Minister of National Defence, perhaps even conscription? Is it to be a broad referendum proposal, or is it to apply particularly, specifically and narrowly to one question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the proposal of the government is to have enabling legislation, but on a very restricted basis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Of course, if the opposition has different views, we would be prepared to consider them.

Mr. Fraser: We want to know what yours are.

Mr. Trudeau: You will know them, if you listen and listen intelligently.

Mr. Fraser: That means you have to speak intelligently.

Mr. Trudeau: The enabling legislation would not be intended to change in any sense our parliamentary system. I still think the responsibility for legislation and policies should rest in parliament. We live under a form of representative democracy, and we do not intend to change that. In this sense we would not want enabling legislation which would permit any government at any time to come forward with referendums to solve problems that the House of Commons or the government find too hot to handle. In this sense it would be a tool used perhaps only for a limited number of years to permit us to deal with constitutional questions and questions of national unity.

Mr. Clark: Since by his own words the Prime Minister is proposing to change the traditions of the parliamentary system and to change them in a way that the government of Quebec is not proposing to change them, is it the intention of the government to have this referendum apply simply to one question relating to unity, or are there other categories of questions which might relate to other broad matters which will also be included? In other words, will the legislation deal specifically and narrowly with one question, or will there be the possibility of moving into other areas?

I gather that what the Prime Minister was trying to do in his earlier answer was exclude questions like capital punishment, abortion or conscription, in which the Minister of National Defence is interested, but is the legislation to be drawn so narrowly that it will focus only on one question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I just answered that. I just said that the question or questions in a referendum would be on the matter of national unity or of constitutional problems, not on other matters such as those which the Leader of the Opposition mentioned.

Mr. Clark: That remains a fairly broad area, and we will have to look specifically at the legislation when it comes.

Was the announcement of the Prime Minister yesterday made on the basis of discussion within the cabinet of Canada, and did it reflect a decision taken by the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this question is relevant.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: You just answered it. Thank you.

DISCUSSION OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Prime Minister. Given that this proposal has very important ramifications for our Canadian parliamentary system, has the Prime Minister had an opportunity as yet to discuss this matter with the other partners in confederation, namely, the provincial premiers? If not, what is his intention?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question in my first reply. I indicated that before giving this legislation first reading I would want to consult with the opposition leaders in the House and with the premiers. I have indicated that I will be visiting with all the premiers in the next month and a half and this is one of the subjects I want to raise with them.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE IN 1977

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We know of the Prime Minister's interest in consultation with the provincial premiers which was spelled out at the Victoria conference in the proposal he put forward at that time when he said:

> A Conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the First Ministers of the Provinces shall be called by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once a year . . .

Given that this is the first year since Victoria that there has been no meeting of first ministers and given that the premier of New Brunswick and the premier of Ontario have both in recent days asked the Prime Minister for a meeting of first ministers to discuss questions of national unity and questions of economic recovery, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to convene a meeting of first ministers in 1977 or has he indeed abandoned that proposal which he enunciated at Victoria?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. lady will recall that was a proposal we put forth at Victoria for a constitution which would be repatriated and which would have an amending formula. The hon. lady will recall also that this proposition was not acceptable to all provinces and therefore was not proceeded with. Therefore, in that sense there is no obligation to have these conferences, but in the sense that I always convene a conference when the premiers of the provinces want to have one with me as first minister of the federal government, the intention is still there. I have just indicated that I will be visiting all the premiers in the next several weeks. I talked to them on Sunday about this possibility and they have agreed. Of course, in the course of my visits if it appears that we have to have a meeting before the end of this year, we will have one; if not, we will have one next year.

CLOSING OF ALCAN PLANT IN ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister knows, the unemployment level in the province of Newfoundland has just recently reached the 1932 level, which was the depth of the great depression. As the minister also knows, the Alcan corporation which had profits of some $85 million in the first six months of this year, has decided to shut down an operation in St. Lawrence which employs 175 people. Since the announced date of the shut down is February of next year, does the minister intend to take any action to stop the company from laying off people, which they have done now in advance, and from selling off parts of the property in the community to other businesses?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government is fully aware of the problem Alcan presents to the province of Newfoundland and to Canada. We are trying to get together with the company to see whether the whole Newfoundland operation can be sold or the ownership change hands so that it can stay in business.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Considering that in a speech made in the community in May of this year the Secretary of State for External Affairs promised that the government of Canada would bring all its moral pressure to bear on Alcan to stay in operation now, and since they have already begun to phase out, including layoffs, will the minister not take steps within the next 24 hours by getting on the telephone to the head of the corporation to say that the government of Canada recognizes the company made millions of dollars of profit in that community in recent years and so has an obligation to stop the shutdown immediately?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have written a letter to the hon. member concerning this whole problem and have sent a copy of the letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We are doing everything we can to keep that plant in operation.

Mr. Broadbent: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have a copy of the letter which arrived from the minister this morning. There is no assurance whatever in that letter that the government is going to take immediate action to stop the company from moving out holus-bolus before a committee that he said has been set up to look into the situation can even make a recommendation. In view of the seriousness of the situation which will demoralize a whole town dependent for income on the company, will the minister take immediate action with the company to stop the shutdown pending the report from that committee?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, feldspar is an essential ingredient in the manufacture of aluminum. As the government of Canada, we have many ways of persuasion and we are doing everything possible to have that company remain in business in Newfoundland or to sell out to a Canadian company that will keep the plant in operation.

REFERENDUMS

REQUEST FOR DETAILED STATEMENT ON POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. He indicated in his speech yesterday that legislation on a referendum could be passed. I would like to ask him whether the legislation would deal with the control of referendums or provide directions on referendums which could be held at other government levels or whether it would set forth a procedure to hold a referendum on the constitutional issue?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. We do not want to intervene in a legislation at the provincial level, but the federal government could hold a referendum on the matters which I have indicated in reply to the Leader of the Opposition, namely the fields related to the constitution or national unity.

POSSIBILITY OF NEW BUDGET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. As the stock market, which is a very accurate barometer of business and investor confidence, has fallen by more than 10 per cent since the introduction of the last budget, is it the intention of this government to introduce a new budget in the very near future to try at least to restore confidence to the point where it was before the last budget was introduced or if possible, improve it further, and in that way rejuvenate the economy and make jobs available for people who need them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to think that Canadian budgets have very far reaching effects because the markets of the world have fallen also since last April. The answer to his question is that the Minister of Finance will be speaking in this House tonight. If the hon. member can bring himself to be here, he will have the government's views on the economy and on what we propose to do at this time. There will be six more days left in the throne speech debate which will permit the opposition to indicate its views on the economy. I think this is ideal. We are telescoping the budget debate into the Throne Speech debate in order to save the House time.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the Prime Minister not listening when the Leader of the Opposition yesterday outlined some of the things he suggested would get the economy moving? I can assure the Prime Minister that I will be expressing my views tomorrow as to what should be done, if he would like to be here, and I can assure him that I will be here tonight and that "Big Brother" will be listening.

INCOME TAX ACT

ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF PRIVACY PROVISIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue and I want to wish him success in a very taxing portfolio. In view of the concerns of many Canadians that the privacy provisions of the Income Tax Act, section 241, are possibly being violated, with police having access to returns, and in view of the practice which has been revealed in the Laycraft commission of inquiry of police trading off wiretap information, which may be in violation of section 170 of the Criminal Code, what can the minister say today to reassure the House and the country that the traditional and statutory safeguards that Canadians have always relied upon with respect to the confidentiality of their income tax returns are being upheld and respected?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that they are being upheld. In regard to the other wiretap information to which he is making reference, I can say in this particular case a big "no". In any case, everything is kept very confidential in the manner designed by the legislation.

Mr. MacKay: Perhaps the minister could elaborate on that answer, the big "no", when he answers this question. In view of the revelations that have come from the Laycraft inquiry in Alberta, and the skepticism that has greeted some of the evidence, particularly that of Mr. Schwartzak as to the veracity of what was said in the inquiry and elsewhere, will the minister assure the House unequivocally that he will be making a statement on motions outlining precisely the extent to which the Department of National Revenue shares its information with other agencies and departments?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, though it was decided not to talk about the agreement, it was not a secret.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It was discussed many times, with British Columbia in 1975 and with the Quebec revenue department in 1974-75. Further to that, the RCMP initiated the investigation to which the hon. member refers in 1974-75 into a suspected fraud which led to a suspicion of tax evasion. It had been the responsibility of my department to look into that. My department was quite properly asked to join in the investigation, which they did. Surely it is the department's job and the job of the RCMP, who certainly should not notify—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Surely it is my department's job and the RCMP certainly should not notify my department of suspected tax evasion solely when they suspect major organized crime. In other words, my department acted properly in all instances.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF PRIVACY PROVISIONS—POSSIBILITY OF CHANGING AGREEMENT WITH MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue on the same issue. Since he has become minister, has he had opportunity to check, particularly in view of this trade-off of information between the RCMP and his department, the procedures under which his department and its officials have operated pursuant to the agreement that he mentions? If he has had that chance, does he propose to change those procedures, particularly because of information revealed to the Laycraft Commission and the possible violation of those two extremely important sections of two important statutes?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part is yes, and to the second part no. We will not change it. We will carry on as we have done successfully in the past, doing the job we were called upon to do, benefiting Canadians.

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING PRIVACY PROVISIONS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): In view of the answer of the Minister of National Revenue, I will direct my question to the Solicitor General. I would like him to tell the House and Canadians whether it is his position or view or the intention of the government of which he is a member to introduce amendments to the Income Tax Act, particularly Section 241, or the Code, Section 178, or both. In other words, is it his view that amendments are desirable to give efficacy to the relationship that has existed pursuant to that agreement. Will the minister be more comfortable or will Canadians as a whole be better served with enabling legislation because of this possible violation that has been revealed recently?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to which possible violation the hon. member is referring. The agreement was entered into between the RCMP and the Department of National Revenue. The whole matter was then etched. A legal opinion was sought from the law officers of the Crown. The law officers of the Crown advised us that the agreement entered into between the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP was a valid and legal agreement. As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, it is extemely useful to promote the fight against organized crime in this country. I sometimes find it odd that, following a very general debate on the importance of fighting crime which took place in this House last year, the opposition members to a certain extent are attacking agreements which are proving extremely worthwhile in other jurisdictions, particularly the United States.

REASON FOR PUBLISHING AGREEMENT WITH MOUNTED POLICE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. If, as he says, this agreement, dated April 2, 1972, was disclosed at hearings with regard to British Columbia in 1975, and again in Quebec, why is it felt that at this time the department had to publish what was hitherto claimed and proved to be a secret agreement between his department and the RCMP?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Far from being a secret agreement, it was never secret. The so-called secret agreement has been blown out of all proportion. This is a memorandum signed by the officials and is concerned with administrative arrangements. As to the question whether the department has given tax information to the RCMP, the answer, when the department wishes to use the RCMP in connection with the enforcement of the Income Tax Act, is, yes. Communication of such information for this purpose is allowed under the law and we acted accordingly.

REQUEST FOR DEFINITION OF "ORGANIZED CRIME FIGURES"

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): The press release dated September 29 of this year, and referred to by the Solicitor General yesterday in reply to a question stated: "The purpose of these investigations is concerned with the accumulation of unreported and illicit wealth amassed by organized crime figures". I would ask the minister for a definition of "organized crime figures". If there is not to be an unwarranted extension of this agreement and the appointment of RCMP as authorized persons in the case of any taxpayer in this country.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): I would like to give the hon. member an answer with regard to the definition he requested, and I would like to say that the definition in the department is in terms of any person or persons obtaining income from illegal activities. This is, naturally, a more narrow definition than I would expect the police to employ since their interest would go beyond the earning of income.

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENTS WITH AGENCIES OTHER THAN MOUNTED POLICE FOR EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister now tell us whether there are any other agreements between himself as minister, or any previous minister, or any administrative officials such as deputy ministers, with regard to the exchange of information obtained through income tax returns? I have in mind, for example, agreements with the Unemployment Insurance Commission or with the Minister of National Health and Welfare with regard to the use of social insurance numbers and cross-checking to determine whether there is any fraud involving unemployment insurance or for any other purpose.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, after a good discussion with the officials of my department I should like to tell hon. members that all my officials acted properly and conscientiously, and that everything was done quite in order within the terms of the law.

An hon. Member: Answer the question!

INQUIRY WHETHER ROYAL AMERICAN SHOWS LINKED WITH ORGANIZED CRIME

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Would the Solicitor General have any evidence that Royal American Shows are connected with organized crime?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is, of course, a matter to be looked at according to the facts. I know that following an investigation of Royal American Shows something like 105 charges were laid in connection with the operation. I should like also to refer hon. members to an act which they all voted upon before the end of the last session, Bill C-51, which happens to contain a definition of organized crime. I suggest hon. members should take a look at it.

Mr. Paproski: That is not what I asked.

AIRPORTS

INQUIRY WHEN ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE WILL BE PROVIDED WITH FACILITIES

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Is he in a position to inform the House and particularly the impatient people of Îles-de-la-Madeleine whether he has received a report from his department's officials responsible for the study concerning the construction of an airport at Îles-de-la-Madeleine? In the affirmative, what are the findings of this report and when can we hope to see the achievement of this needed project which is long overdue and is essential to the economy of this region situated in my riding?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): I have received an interim report on the nature of the work being done and on the good meeting which was held in the area. However, I do not yet have a final report and recommendations. I will certainly keep pressing for them and I will make sure that the hon. member is informed as soon as they are available.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE NO CURTAILMENT OF BENEFITS FROM PROGRAMS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? Is the Prime Minister in a position to confirm the statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the effect that the Minister of Public Works was not expressing government policy when he called for certain curtailments with respect to family allowances and old age security benefits?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not seen such a statement by the Minister of Public Works. The Minister of National Health and Welfare does not seem to have seen it, either. I would want to see what that statement was before stating whether it represents government policy or not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the fact that most of us know what the Minister of Public Works said, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he can assure the people of this country that families with only one child will not have their family allowances discontinued and that other curtailments will not be placed on family allowances or on old age security benefits? In other words, does the government stand committed to the principles of these two pieces of legislation as enacted by parliament?

Mr. Trudeau: As enacted by parliament and presented by Liberal governments in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is certain that we stand committed to the principles of this legislation. We have in the past and we shall in the future continue to consider ways in which legislation in all areas can be improved, and if there is any way in which we can curtail expenditures and have a better system while abiding by the principles we shall, of course, consider it.

INCOME TAX ACT

ALLEGED CONTRAVENTION OF SECRECY PROVISIONS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): My question is to the Minister of National Revenue. Does the minister agree that the secrecy of the agreement between the Department of National Revenue and the RCMP, kept as it was from the knowledge of the chief law enforcement officer of the Province of Alberta, would, in all logic, have precluded the attorney general of Alberta from making inquiries as to its existence?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): I can only repeat that my department acted legally and if there is any particular question which the hon. member wishes to raise I would refer him to the Department of Justice.

Mr. Malone: In view of the fact that the attorney general of Alberta does not subscribe to the position which has just been enunciated, will the minister be making a statement on motions outlining his own particular initiatives to improve the efficiency as to the very important department at the present time, causing the Canadian people so much apprehension in their modus operandi?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Somebody was criticizing me a while ago for reading an answer, but I can see the hon. member cannot even ask his question properly even though he is reading it.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

CLOSING OF FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John Crosbie (St. John's West): A question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister yesterday announced a job creation program involving $150 million but 400 jobs are to be lost at the fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence. Will the minister advise us why he and his predecessor had failed, up to several days ago, to answer letters of July and October 11 from the government of Newfoundland asking the minister either to impose a tariff on fluorspar imported from Mexico, which is now cheaper than St. Lawrence fluorspar or to restrict imports of fluorspar in order to keep that mine operating? Were these letters answered and, if not, why were they not answered? Does he intend to accede to these requests?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter to determine whether or not we have got an answer away to the government of Newfoundland as requested. Both the options which have been mentioned are available to us and I can assure the hon. member they are being considered.

Mr. Crosbie: I would point out that people have already been laid off and that people are being laid off, now. Moreover, the miners in this industry have a terrible history due to radiation problems. When can the minister give us an answer? The first request came in July from the government of Newfoundland but the minister, or his predecessor, did not reply. How soon can an answer be expected?

Mr. Horner: Very soon.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE IN CASE OF MR. SANT SINGH

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It involves a public servant by the name of Sant Singh employed in the hon. lady's department who was denied advancement in the public service because of his political beliefs—he happened to run as a candidate for my party in the riding of Pontiac.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not my judgment. That is the judgment of the adjudicator for the Public Service Staff Relations Board. The government has now decided to appeal the finding of that adjudicator, Mr. O'Shea, to the Federal Court of Canada. Can the minister tell us how she can justify beginning her tenure of office as the head of the department by continuing this persecution of a public servant and why she does not personally intervene in this case, as the humanitarian she professes to be, one which has been brought before the Federal Court on improper grounds and is really a persecution of Mr. Sant Singh?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My first comment is that if the assumption put forward by the hon. member were right, it would be obvious there had been enough political interference for me not to continue such interference. The assumption is wrong, as far as I know, and I do not intend to interfere in any way with the process established by regulations concerning the behaviour, classification and promotion of civil servants. The hon. member said it very clearly. A notice of appeal of the adjudicator's decision has been filed in the federal court, and it is absolutely not the time for a minister to interfere.

• (1142)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, what the minister is saying by her answer is that a deputy minister in the federal public service now has the unfettered right to destroy the career of a public servant.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This can be done by actions which have been found by adjudication to be contrary to the spirit of the public service statutes, namely, the right of public servants to participate in political activity.

My question to the minister is: will she not reconsider the impropriety of her answer today and the position she is taking today? Will she not look to her constitutional duties and step into this persecution so found by the adjudication arm of the government? The minister is taking a dreadful position, and she ought to be ashamed of herself.

BEEF IMPORT QUOTAS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF INTENTION

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the uncertainty which exists with respect to the future of import quotas on beef coming into Canada, has the minister yet been able to give his personal attention to the question of the development of more precise and permanent import control laws along the lines suggested frequently by such organizations as the Saskatchewan Stockgrowers' Association and recently in a report published by the agricultural committee in the other place?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yes, we are giving close attention to this problem. Before any announcement is made, we should like to discuss the whole question with the Americans, Australians and New Zealanders.

COAL—OPENING OF NEW MINES IN CAPE BRETON

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In a recent speech to the Canadian Conference on Coal in Alberta, the minister dealt at length with the sale and increased production of coal, among other matters pertaining to the industry, but regrettably, according to the press account of the Edmonton Journal, only made pronouncements on the further development of the western coal fields. May I ask the minister if he is prepared to address himself to the subject of the eastern coal reserves, with particular reference to the opening of new coal mines on Cape Breton Island which would provide much needed employment?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to send a copy of the speech I made at the coal conference to the hon. member. I dealt with the entire problem of coal development and exports. Certainly, I am aware of the problem with the deep mines in Nova Scotia and the strip mining, and I will encourage the development of both.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has a rather strong voice in cabinet and as my former seat mate he is familiar with the problems we are confronted with on Cape Breton Island, would he assure the House that he will do his utmost to have the necessary funds allocated to the Cape Breton Development Corporation, thus enabling the corporation to open new coal mines which, as the minister said at the coal conference in Edmonton, would create additional employment and an additional source of energy for this country?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, my long association with the hon. member has made me very, very aware of the problems in Cape Breton. He can rest assured that his representation will be noted and remembered.

SWORDFISH—EFFORTS TO REGAIN UNITED STATES MARKET

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. I am sorry he had to leave, but I will put it on the record and perhaps the minister would be prepared next week to give us a report on any progress being made to restore Nova Scotia swordfish to the American markets. I hope he is not asking for the support of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who could only be expected to stick the front end of the fish into somebody important.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, indeed I will take the representations made by the hon. member.

An hon. Member: About the fish?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Why do you not ask the fish?

An hon. Member: Stick it.

Mr. Anderson: I will bring it to the minister's attention. It has been the policy of this government to give due consideration to all fishermen, not only on the east coast, but also on the west coast of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSPORT

DATE OF ESTABLISHMENT OF PRAIRIE RAIL AUTHORITY AND RATE PARITY FOR RAW AND PROCESSED PRODUCTS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Having regard to the fact that the Speech from the Throne referred in a broad general way to the problems of transportation, could I ask the minister specifically if we can expect any government initiatives in acting upon two of the major recommendations of the Hall report, namely, the establishment of the Prairie Rail Authority and any move by the government to introduce the application of the parity principle on freight rates for processed and raw products?

I ask this question in reference to the fact that this particular issue has placed a very severe hardship upon the rapeseed crushing industry in western Canada. The application of freight rates is very important to the continued viability of that industry in western Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the question of the creation of a Prairie Rail Authority is receiving very close attention within the government, and also we have asked the prairie rail action committee to give that item some priority in its own consideration. I will be having further discussions about the Prairie Rail Authority idea and the very many financial implications involved in it with various producer groups, as I have already begun to do.

In the meantime, we have provided $100 million of new money to ensure that the rail rehabilitation program does get under way without any delay. In that way the maximum fiscal improvement which can take place is presently taking place in the prairie rail branch system. On the question of equity, this is a matter of serious concern to us, as we have expressed over the years our belief in the need for greater equity in freight rates between processed and unprocessed products. There are very significant financial implications. We have been discussing this with the provinces in an attempt to reach some rational conclusion about what processing should take place, because the natural advantage in the prairie region does take place there. At the same time there has been special action like the subsidy supporting rapeseed crushers in the movement of oil and meal. Also there is the special subsidy to pay for the differential in stopoff charges between eastern and western Canada. We have tried to minimize the problems in the interim period. We do recognize it, however, only as an interim measure.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that the minister has outlined certain initiatives which have been taken with respect to the further development of the rapeseed crushing industry, there is still much to be done with respect to the Prairie Rail Authority. Having regard to the fact that Judge Hall has indicated that the establishment of the Prairie Rail Authority is the key to the entire report of the Commission; and having regard to the fact that the provincial governments of western Canada have been less than satisfied with the initiatives and the actions that have taken place to date in regard to the establishment of the Prairie Rail Authority, can I ask the minister if he intends to meet with the western ministers of transportation in the very near future to ensure that the progress is stepped up? Can he assure the House that this very important element of the Hall Commission will in fact be implemented?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it should be borne in mind that the Hall Commission recommendation of the Prairie Rail Authority was an interim measure. That authority, according to his recommendation, was to disappear from existence by 1990. There are some among the producers organizations in the west who believe that a quicker and clearer resolution of the future of the rail lines involved is actually advantageous. I have been meeting with those producer groups and I must say that I have been receiving from them practically total support for the exact course of action we have been following. Whether I will meet with provincial ministers may depend upon the rather exciting exchange of correspondence which is going on, but it is significant that while the producer groups are saying essentially that we should proceed in the way we are doing, the only ones who think differently are not only the provincial ministers of transport but serious political opponents.

NORTHERN TELECOM—REASON FOR LAY-OFFS IN VIEW OF PROMISE MADE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On September 30 I wrote to the minister asking for an investigation into the fact that Northern Telecom, a subsidiary of Bell Canada, will have laid off 1,000 workers by the end of the year despite a promise to the government that, in return for $140 million loan to Turkey by the Export Development Corporation to purchase telephone equipment, Northern Telecom would create 860 man years annually for the next five years. Can the minister explain why Northern Telecom is laying off workers instead of creating jobs with this government's assistance?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I take this question as notice. I am not up on the Northern Telecom matter.

Mr. Symes: I would like the minister, in his reply at a later date, to also answer the following: In view of the fact that the federal government over the past few years has given Northern Telecom over $1 million in duty remissions, $10 million in grants and $44 million in deferred taxes, why are there no guarantees demanded by the government that in return for this largesse the company be obliged to create jobs rather than lay off workers?

Mr. Horner: I will look into that, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATION OF NUCLEAR SAFEGUARDS AGREEMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the importance to Canada of uranium mining in terms of jobs, exports and trade, can the minister say if he has been able to negotiate a nuclear safeguards agreement with the European Economic Community and Japan so that shipments of Canadian uranium which have been curtailed since the start of this year can be resumed?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, since I discussed this matter in the House prior to adjournment there has been a succession of meetings, the most recent having taken place last week. Progress is being made but so far we have not reached the point where we could resume shipments. I am hopeful that the parties concerned, the customer countries, will be agreeable to meeting the conditions which Canada requires and we are working towards that objective. I hope it can be resolved. I am aiming for some time before the end of the present year.

SMALL BUSINESS, FARM AND FISHERIES LOANS—REASON FOR FAILURE OF BANKS TO PROVIDE FUNDS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. During the last session of parliament this House passed amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and we were told at that time by the minister's predecessor that discussions would be held with the banks so that loans could be made by the banks under these acts. I am advised that practically no banks are offering loans to their customers under these acts, and I wonder if any discussions were carried out and whether or not these loans would be made available very soon. This is especially important because of the economic conditions in the country today.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter right away. I have not been informed that there is any problem there, but I will make sure that the law is applied and that the loans are made available by the banks.

HOUSING

REASON FOR FAILURE TO PROTECT HOME BUYER

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Because of the indecent haste of the former minister in that portfolio to push AHOP programs, people such as those in the Bear Creek estates have been ripped off by fly-by-night contractors, as I have discussed with the minister on numerous occasions, and by the government directive that housing inspectors inspect only for the security of the money lenders, while the home buyer is left out in the cold. I would like to know why there was nothing about housing in the Speech from the Throne and why there is no protection for the home buyer.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if all ministers had been allowed to include paragraphs on programs concerning their respective departments, Her Majesty would still be reading the Speech from the Throne. I do not mean that my department has no precise programs on housing to provide Canadians with the houses they need. The program referred to by the hon. member is precisely intended to help people acquire a house, that is low income people who receive important grants to buy their first house. I know the particulars referred to by the hon. member. We have discussed that question many times. We have asked our officials in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, mostly those from British Columbia, to verify inspections more closely and correct possible deficiencies in that particular program referred to by the hon. member. This work has been done. We hope that past mistakes will not be repeated in the future.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is the first Thursday in the session and I suppose I should ask my first House business question. In the absence of the government House leader I want to recognize and congratulate the deputy government House leader who has assumed that responsibility with his new portfolio. If I may say so on this point of order, what has disturbed me and a number of us is that we have now followed the precedent that was begun last year of not having affixed to the Throne Speech a list of the legislation that the government intends to call, which indicates to me that the government may well not be prepared. The minister could drive that suspicion out of my mind if he could undertake to table later this day with our consent, or perhaps tomorrow, a list of the legislation which the government intends to call during the session. I say to him it is important because I believe it can facilitate the work of the session. Is such a list available and can he table it tomorrow?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, first of all I deeply appreciate the kind words of my colleague opposite. I look forward to working closely with him and others in the House to expedite the business of the House.

With regard to the list of proposed legislation for consideration, I am not in a position to indicate that I can do that at this time. Quite clearly, next Thursday, which is a week from now, we will be in a much better position to do that, I think. I can assure the hon. member and all members of the House that indeed we are prepared with legislation for this session and I will make announcements at that time if the President of the Privy Council, the House leader, is not here. So I think that will have to satisfy the hon. member. In the meantime we will continue with the Throne Speech debate, uninterrupted until next Friday.

• (1202)

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his undertaking that he will be producing a list of legislation next Thursday. With respect to this list, which I look forward to receiving, can the minister tell us whether some bills which appeared on the order paper of October 17, beyond the ones which were extended by order of the House, will be appearing on this new list of legislation? In other words, to what extent will the list he produces indicate the extent of the carry-over of legislation from the order paper of the last session?

Mr. Cafik: I should draw to the hon. member's attention that I did not indicate that I would be producing a list next Thursday.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I thought you did.

Mr. Cafik: What I did indicate is that by next Thursday we will have an opportunity to discuss this matter further in a co-operative way, I am sure, and hopefully all hon. members will be made aware of the plans of the government with respect to House business by that time.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question of privilege with respect to the political speech containing no direct question but addressed to me during the question period by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). With television now in the House, such a practice is misleading to the public. I very deeply resent the hon. member's accusations to the effect that as Minister of National Health and Welfare I am personally continuing the persecution of a civil servant in my department. The hon. member should know that the case of Dr. Sant Singh has to do with a promotion beyond the highest pay range in the ES group of employees and has nothing to do with his participation in any political activities which according to the facts were approved by the Public Service Commission.

I would like the hon. member to display more trust, respect and confidence in the judicial process of this country. Notice of appeal of the adjudicator's decision has been filed with the Federal Court of Canada. I do not intend to interfere with the judicial process. I would like to add that when I was a civil servant I understood that I was in the service of Canada. Now that I am on this side of the barrier I will continue to do so in the name of the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I intend to stand here all day or until the rabble over there stays quiet in order to answer what is a spurious question of privilege.

First, I did not accuse the minister of personally pursuing Sant Singh, a public servant who is in fact being persecuted by the attitude of the government of Canada. What I did say about the minister is that in what is happening to Dr. Sant Singh she is not pursuing him; in fact, she is neglecting him because of the persecution he has undergone. That is the first thing I want to make clear. The minister cannot pass this off either to the courts or to her deputy minister in this offhand way. She is the minister responsible here for the operation of her department, and she is responsible to the people of Canada and to her public servants. That was the reason we went through the whole matter of decentralizing authority within the public service of Canada. That is point number one.

The second thing is that I do not like that minister talking about my advocating interference with the judiciary. I do not like a minister of this government suddenly taking such a pious interest in the judiciary when the government stands against the judiciary in terms of refusing to allow it to review requests for information, which are to be denied under the government's freedom of information proposal. The government has no reason at all suddenly to become a defender. These are the facts, and I have to reply.

On the merits of this case, it was found by Mr. O'Shea, the public service adjudicator, that this public servant was not allowed to see his file, which is contrary to the law.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The second thing that that adjudicator found, and I am referring to page 33 of the judgment, was that the circumstances of this case are not only suspicious but they also lead to the conclusion that matters other than the grievor's departmental performance were improperly considered. That is the other aspect of it.

Before Your Honour rules on this question of privilege I commend to you a reading of this judgment by Mr. O'Shea. The essence of this judgment is that this public servant was interfered with within the department, aided and abetted by a deputy minister, for his political involvement, this by a government which professes and takes credit of passing a statute which is supposed to permit public servants to engage in political activity. If anyone has a question of privilege in this House it is not the minister, it is I and the public service of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Miss Bégin.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has been extended what is a custom of the House. During the course of the question period remarks are occasionally made or matters are raised in such a manner as to give rise to possible questions of privilege. Therefore, it is the duty of the Chair to hear the participants in those discussions. The minister has been given the opportunity to point out to the Chair the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) and which she found offensive. The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has been given an opportunity to reply.

I did not permit an answer to the question because the question was argumentative. It was an argument and not a question. However, that is a procedural matter. It does not accord with my recollection that the remarks which were made did raise a question of privilege, and neither has anything raised in this discussion to this point raised a question of privilege. Therefore the matter should stop there.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On October 17 last in Hansard at page 8213 there appeared an answer to a question put by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert). The hon. member asked, and I quote:

In the past five years, how many public servants have been dismissed for waste, extravagance or misuse of public funds?

Unfortunately, the composite answer given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) does not reflect the answer I provided to him. I wish to read the reply submitted by my department as follows:

In the past five years, 489 Post Office employees have been discharged for various types of misconduct. Records do not allow for a breakdown by "waste, extravagance or misuse of public funds".

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It pertains to the decision of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to allocate, with magnificent generosity, about half an hour later today to members of the opposition parties to have access to the details of proposals he will be making in the House tonight. The news media are to be permitted access at least half an hour earlier. The question of privilege I raise is a very important one as it affects all hon. members of this House, particularly in view of the presence of television in the House of Commons.

What we have is the following situation: The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has decided to televise the minister's speech. No one objects to that. The reason for that is that members of all parties have supported the access of television to the House of Commons to provide the people of Canada an opportunity to see what goes on here. There is a very serious concern, however, if we have a complex matter—really it is a substitute budget we are getting tonight, if we are to believe the publicity of the government—which affects the operation of the House of Commons. When we have had complex measures before, such as a budget, then the responsibility of the government has been adhered to by permitting opposition spokesmen access, not a half hour but two to three hours in advance, to such measures upon which they are supposed to express a judgment within a minute or so after the minister finishes.

If the government expects co-operation not only in this matter but in other matters that affect the House of Commons, then I say most seriously to the Minister of Finance that he had better change that decision and change it fast. He is not going to have as an unqualified right the opportunity to manipulate the news media—because that is what is involved—and at the same time expect to get co-operation on this matter or other matters in the House of Commons from opposition parties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The minister knows as well as any other member of parliament that this place just will not function unless he behaves in a civilized and decent manner and respects the rules of fair play for both sides of this House.

So I say to you on this question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, that the minister had better change that decision and change it fast or the normal working relationship between the parties in this House is going to break down and break down completely.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will hear the minister's intervention in a moment. I will recognize the minister on a point of order as it reflects on proceedings later in the day. I think I should establish clearly, however, that what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has raised may indeed touch upon co-operative arrangements for the better and more intelligent debate of events that will take place later in the day and throughout the debate on the Speech from the Throne. It relates to co-operation between parties, however, and there would be no requirement that the Chair could refer to or no obligation in any circumstances of consultation with other members in respect of any speech by the Minister of Finance during the debate on the Speech from the Throne. I could not, therefore, begin to classify it as a question of privilege. The point is made, however, and I am sure the minister would want to contribute to it by way of a point of order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member became so aroused. I talked with his House leader earlier who asked some very reasonable questions. I told him that I would allow critics of his party to come to my office. I wanted to be courteous enough to have the critics for the opposition in my office to discuss that beforehand.

Mr. Broadbent: Half an hour before.

Mr. Chrétien: I thought half an hour was enough. If it is felt they need more than half an hour, that is all right. Everyone knows me; my speech will be very short. It is not going to be an hour and a half speech; it is going to be 20 minutes. I would like it to be short, precise and to the point. I was led to believe that the critics of the Social Credit Party and of the Tories could understand it in half an hour but if the critics of the NDP need an hour, I can have them in my office an hour earlier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a question of privilege involving an independent member who does not belong to any of these so-called political parties. If a document is going to be presented to the leaders of the parties, I think there should be fair play to the independent member of parliament. There should be some equality. If there is a question of co-operation here, then I think there should be co-operation toward a person who does not belong to a party. I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker and I think Cabinet ministers should start to recognize this privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, the hon. member raises a point that may have to do with co-operation but it does not have to do with the regulations precedents or practices of the House. There is nothing to which the Chair could refer to as a basis for deciding the hon. member's point would constitute a question of privilege.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dennis Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, sometimes sitting here as a member of parliament can be a depressing and frustrating experience. Sometimes I get fed up hearing the complaints of the greedy minority and the demands of those who feel they are not getting their fair share. It is a broken record. I am tired of hearing about the excluded group from the Atlantic provinces, the unheard voice of the west, Quebec aspirations, native peoples' search, amendments to the Official Languages Act, equity of status of the Official Languages Act and policies for official language minorities. These are not the real, deep and genuine concerns of Canadians today.

It is time to start talking not only about these issues but also about the will of the majority of Canadians—Canadians who are fed up because the current government of Canada has over-spent, over-taxed, interfered, over-regulated our lives, debased our currency and all but bankrupted our nation. Perhaps they are angry also because industry is grinding along in bottom gear, with falling profits, which means that more men and women are unemployed in Canada today than at almost any other time in our history. Canadians are tired of being bought with their own tax dollars. Canadians today want only one handout—the government's hand out of their pockets.

What does taxation at a rate of 43 per cent of the gross national product really mean to Canadians? It means the average Canadian—and that is the Canadian you and I represent here today—earning $15,000 per year will pay $7,000 of it to the government in a multitude of hidden and not so hidden taxes. It means the average Canadian who starts work at nine o'clock in the morning will work until 1.30 in the afternoon each and every day of the year before he earns any money that he can call his own. It means the government has increased its spending by 377 per cent since this Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took over the government of Canada.

During the same period wages increased by only 89 per cent. I ask you, my constituents and the people of Canada, during this tremendous increase of taxes by 377 per cent, have the services the government has provided improved by 377 per cent—300 per cent—200 per cent—100 per cent—zero, or have the services seemed to diminish? I leave that question to you but I know that in the minds of my constituents it is clear that the government of Canada has taxed and taxed and that services have decreased and decreased.

When the Prime Minister became leader of the government, the over-all expenditure, including servicing the debt, was $10.9 billion. By its own estimate the government intends to spend $41.1 billion of the taxpayers' money this year and it has already over-spent by many billions. The government's budgetary deficit for 1976-77 totals $6.3 billion, an absurd growth rate of more than 50 per cent from the previous year. This completely unwarranted deficit is almost as much as the government spent in total during its first year in office. The total direct debt of the government amounts to $12,500 for each of the 9.6 million persons employed in the economy or $5,217 for each of the 23 million people living in Canada. The cost of servicing this debt amounted to $7.9 billion during the past year alone and represents $822.92 per person employed or $343 per capita. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the average Canadian with a family of four does not want to carry $20,000 of debt at a cost to his family of $1,372 a year in interest charges. Given the choice, any family man in Canada would not have incurred this debt on behalf of himself or saddled his unborn children and grandchildren with such a long term burden.

Instead of promises, this government should outline some new policies, policies which will restore our personal freedom, promote economic welfare and achieve a greater degree of social justice. The Prime Minister, when talking to a group of unemployed in London, Ontario, stated: "Our costs are too high and we are taking it too easy; Canadians have to get that message". He and his government should take his own advice. Continually the Prime Minister talks of the unrealistic expectations of Canadians. In his remarks yesterday the Prime Minister commented, as reported at page 40 of Hansard:

> I confess I am somewhat mystified by the fact that in the past few years Canadians seem to have lost a sense of perspective about the country.

In truth, it is not Canadians who have lost their perspective about their country; it is the Prime Minister who has lost his sense of the achievements of which this country is capable. The Prime Minister of this country will have to carry the burden of destroying Canada's vision of itself.

This year's favourite phrase in Canada seems to be that Canada is "an economic mess". Even the finance minister has said frankly that there will be another large gap between the number of jobs which open up in the country and the number of people entering the work force this year and in the near future.

What policies—not promises—have been brought forward to inject some life into the economy? The fledgling finance minister likes to say that our 90 cent dollar will stimulate the economy. To date that economic respite has not occurred. What the finance minister so blithely ignores is what the experience of Britain and other countries whose currencies have been depreciating has shown—that a falling exchange rate tends to start a self-perpetuating slide. A falling exchange rate speeds up the cost-push cycle and erodes whatever benefits are associated with the deflated dollar.

In British Columbia people I talk to are amazed and angered that the federal government cannot seem to perceive clearly the economic and social conditions of the nation's regions. They shake their heads in disgust when they hear of the antics of Ottawa. They know that average Canadian incomes have increased 142 per cent since 1968 and they like that. However, at the same time consumer prices have gone up 85 per cent, and most shocking of all, consumer taxes have increased 239 per cent, almost double the increase in incomes. That money has supported the financial atrocities of CIDA, payoffs to middlemen who sell our nuclear reactors, keeping our public service the best paid in the world, the construction of office towers in Hull so that the ones in Ottawa can remain half empty, and the relocation of federal office buildings in Liberal ridings. Of course, I do not have to mention the disgrace of the division of Canada Works funding. In my constituency we are talking in terms of $100,000, a constituency with many times the population of that of the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), which receives $4 million compared to $100,000.

Mr. McKinley: That is Liberal justice.

Mr. Wenman: That is typical. That is the just society which the Prime Minister has been talking about for so many years. That is the kind of giveaway, the kind of handout, we have seen. As I said earlier, the kind of handout that the people of Canada want is the government's hand out of their pockets.

Back in the 1960's the powers-that-be took hold of the belief that some kind of federal budgetary program or federal regulatory agency could be designed to deal with almost any problem that faced Canada. We had the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, the guaranteed income supplement, medicare, the unemployment insurance program which was made the world's most generous. Family allowances were tripled and then indexed; post-secondary education grants were quadrupled. Every aspect of Canadian life has now been infringed upon and infiltrated. A federal regulatory agency is sticking its nose into everybody's business in Canada, to the point where our individual freedom is being eroded.

Mr. Hargrave: "Big Brother".

Mr. Wenman: "Big Brother", that is the same one. Some functions of the agencies could be justified on economic grounds, but in large measure the notorious "Big Brother" principle still supports their existence. The policies of successive Liberal governments have led to a general malaise which everyone in this country perceives. Everyone knows there is something wrong; everyone has that feeling.

The Prime Minister said yesterday, as reported at page 35 of Hansard:

> This discontent in such a wealthy country must find its causes in the human spirit, and it is there also that the unity of the nation must be found.

Flowery words, good words, true words. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has once again enunciated the problem and even the solution; but the solution will continue to evade him and he will never be able to accomplish or move the nation closer to this type of unity until he is able to remove the discontent from his own human spirit. The nation senses that his human spirit has yet to find the unity that flows from inner peace. The human spirit of our Prime Minister is in a turmoil that is reflective of the world around him. He is weak. Unfortunately, he knows not where he leads himself, and is therefore not fit to lead this nation at this time in his life. What a classic tragedy for the man. What a classic tragedy for this nation of Canada. Anger, bitterness, hatred, greed, idleness, fear, distrust, dishonesty—these are the elements of discontent. Love, joy, peace, compassion, wisdom, kindness, goodness, faith and hope, giving, sharing, working, laughing, loving—these are the replacement values so lacking in the human spirit not only of our Prime Minister and our nation but in fact of the world. The ebb tide has swept our Prime Minister far out into the sea and the nation waits in turmoil and confusion looking to the flow of a new tide. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) speaks of a new vision, of a place to build and to grow. He has yet to be tested with the exercise and weight of power, but Canadians are beginning to sense in him a new growth and strength of human spirit.

The Prime Minister was right. It is in this depth of human spirit that the unity of this nation must and will be found. Canadians are beginning to focus upon a new era. Canadians across the country are angry and frustrated, and that anger and frustration are beginning to recognize the urgency, the necessity, of changing the government of Canada, a change that will see a redefining, a classification, a grasping and a reaching for new and renewed values. Through these values a new trust of confidence can establish a new pattern of growth and building that will once again rekindle the spirit of Canada.

In his remarks yesterday the Prime Minister said that the federal government will introduce its own legislation to permit and control national referendums. Obviously, he is planning, as he said today, to hold his own national unity referendum. In February of this year I placed a motion on the order paper. It declared:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of holding a national referendum on the issue of separatism in order that Canadians may be given the opportunity to reaffirm their faith in national unity.

If the Prime Minister had taken some action on my motion in February, much of the uncertainty which pervades the country today and the resulting hardship stimulated by the PQ victory would never have had a chance to build up to the level it has. It is a hallmark of this administration that it continually acts too little and too late. Because the Speech from the Throne was empty of mention of Canada's role of international affairs, I would like to turn to one of the most important issues facing the world today.

The situation in the Middle East is so difficult, so complex and so volatile, that it has erupted in serious wars twice within the decade, and a lasting solution continues to elude the whole world of diplomacy.

It is not within our ability to settle their war and the actual conditions and details of a peace settlement between Israel and the Arab states must be left in the hands of the parties themselves. At the same time, we must recognize ourselves to be part of the global family which suffers so long as there are hostilities anywhere on this planet. The cause of peace is not only a responsibility of the federal government, it is a privilege.

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada recognizes the state of Israel without qualification or reservation and regards its continued existence as right and beyond any question. As one of the few remaining democracies in the world, Israel deserves recognition and support from all those states mutually committed to this basic common ideal. A just settlement must recognize Israel's legitimate concern for security and support Israel's determination to have defensible borders.

Further, demilitarized lines or zones supervised by credible neutral forces such as the United Nations peacekeeping force may have to be established. Such lines or zones may or may not initially conform to legal, permanent and recognized boundaries but might rather reflect the geographic-political realities of the area. While in the future the appearance of ground-to-ground missiles, supersonic fighter-bombers and other sophisticated instruments of modern warfare may in part cancel out the emphasis of strategic depth and topographical barriers, overall security will best be assured through bilateral and multilateral non-aggression pacts backed and guaranteed by the super-powers. Current military capacity and strategy, however, attaches considerable importance to limited territorial concessions.

On the other hand, we must also recognize the existence of the Palestinians and support the continuing desire of the Palestinians to develop the kind of social, political and economic status usually found within the security of a full or associate state status. Such sovereign or associate-state status would establish the apparatus of statehood which would, in turn, see the despair of the Palestinian people diminish and their creativity and responsibility increase. The legitimate grievances and aspirations of the Palestinians must be determined, recognized and resolved.

In actively promoting peace, there are three principles from which Canada must not depart. First, while we can understand the frustrations which have led people to resort to violence and terrorism; we cannot condone it. Such activities—whether in the form of terrorism, sabotage, or open aggression—are unacceptable from any source. Second, equally, we decry any exploitation of people or prejudice directed against any racial or ethnic group; the manipulation by some countries of the United Nations, and the threats which accompany the Arab boycott must all be resisted. Third, we must continue to insist that the Palestinians and the Arab states recognize Israel's right to exist, and at the same time we must continue to express concern regarding Israel's establishment of permanent or semi-permanent settlements in occupied territory.

Almost all the prime movers in the Middle East have expressed the hope that 1977 will see real progress toward peace, and, more specifically, that the Geneva conference will reconvene later this year. Visiting MP's of the Progressive Conservative special committee on the Middle East returned with strong feelings of optimism that 1977 can be an important year, yielding considerable progress toward a settlement in the Middle East.

[Mr. Wenman.]

In every country except Iraq, there was a climate of hopefulness that a course of action leading toward a peaceful settlement, if it is ever to be found, would be best initiated and activated in 1977. Even rejectionist front Iraq, while continuing to support the PLO and stockpile arms, seems to be pursuing a wait and see role by not speaking against peace initiatives by other member states of the Arab league.

The economic burden of maintaining massive modern military machines is weighing heavily on both the Arab states and Israel as a tragic waste of both human and financial resources. While massive arms purchases from both the western world and U.S.S.R. may serve the function of recycling oil dollars and balancing trade deficits, surely the transfer of technology and improved physical and social conditions could provide a more productive and positive vehicle to accomplish the same objective. Tremendous economic opportunities in the field of technological capacity transfer exist in the Middle East for Canadian enterprise and these have scarcely been touched. There are massive capital surpluses accumulating in the Middle East and substantial production facility slowdowns and unemployment in Canada. In view of the current economic situation in Canada, why hasn't our government been more aggressive and successful in bringing the two together?

Beyond diplomatic rhetoric and political grandstanding in traditional world forums and conferences, calm and rational threads of compromise are beginning to come to light. Cautious statements of potential compromise, even when viewed cynically because of their multivested motivations, seem worthy of further investigation and support as the seeds of a preliminary settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict.

Recognizing the interests of all men in the cause of peace, Canada should remain open to the possibility of being a conduit for peace, ready and willing to offer any assistance to bring about a settlement. Canada should therefore be willing to maintain or, if requested, expand its highly respected and competent peace-keeping role in the Middle East.

Although not unanimous, the spirit of Resolutions 242 and 338 of the United Nations have received broad general acceptance and should, therefore, in their original form be the basis of the framework upon which to build a lasting and just settlement in the Middle East. 1977 has become a time most appropriate and conducive for the reconvening of the Geneva convention. Canada should therefore pursue this objective with an aggressive thrust in all international forums, through all diplomatic channels and by all means bilaterally and multilaterally available to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and more important through the vehicle of parliamentary committee and parliament itself.

Since Palestinians must be heard and seen to participate in discussions affecting their future, we must call for mutual recognition. The PLO must recognize Israel's permanent right to exist and Israel must recognize that the Palestinians have a right to political self-expression and some form of territorial sovereignty.

In order to maintain stability during a period of transition, the Arab states should accept that a temporary and credible United Nations presence or demilitarized zone, or both, may have to be established. In order to assure mutual non-belligerency, the superpowers should guarantee through bilateral and multilateral agreement the mutual security of recognized national sovereign borders. The developed world should be prepared to provide substantial international assistance and guarantees that will assure economic stability in the region.

In the face of the vast economic power of the Arab bloc, Canada, while expanding its long-neglected relations with the Arab countries, must reaffirm that it will never sacrifice principle or its sense of humanity to financial expediency. Goodwill and closer cultural, commercial and diplomatic ties with the Arabs do not, nor should not, presume any diminution of our friendship and support of Israel. A political and administrative vehicle must be found which will assure freedom of worship and freedom of movement for three of the world's great religions in Jerusalem.

In view of Canada's important role on the Security Council during this important and significant time, Canada's permanent representative should have prompt and regular access to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Therefore, a minister or associate minister should be appointed who could give efficient political leadership and guidance for which he would be answerable to the cabinet and to the House of Commons directly.

An amendment to the Bank Act to prohibit any Canadian company, person or bank from supplying information for commercial purposes indicating the racial or ethnic origin, the religion or political affiliation of a Canadian citizen should be presented to the House of Commons.

As long as the Middle East crisis remains unresolved the world continues to confront a powder keg with a fuse of unknown length. Unless international leadership captures, and acts upon, the current positive mood and opportunity for peace it will certainly pass and the cynicism of the rejectionist front position will begin to re-establish its credibility.

The Iraq government's position—that of the leader of the rejectionist front—is that a settlement in the Middle East cannot be found through peaceful negotiation, but rather through force and a final confrontation which will see the re-establishment of a democratic Palestine and the demise of the United Nations created State of Israel.

The world, let alone the Middle East, cannot allow this confrontation that could escalate to Armageddon. The Canadian government's weak initiative in this area is at the best inadequate and inappropriately non-aggressive. For us, as an opposition, to fail to urge our government to positive action in the resolution of the problems of the Middle East would show us not only as derelict in our duty to the Canadian people, but as derelict in our obligations as citizens of the world.

A reconvened Geneva Conference could have positive results if all sides approach the table with a spirit of goodwill and a capacity to compromise in a way that stresses co-operation rather than confrontation and mutual respect for each other's pride in their deep-rooted cultural identities.

We are all peace-makers. We all want peace and I hope we shall dedicate ourselves today to a concern with the issue of the Middle East in the name of all mankind.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to divide my remarks in this debate into three categories. I should like to speak initially on questions relating to the state of the Canadian economy. I then propose to address a few remarks to the subject of the gap which so obviously exists at the present time in the area of what we might refer to as national understanding across our great country. I should like also to address a few closing remarks to the existing and greatly increasing energy crisis which is now facing Canada.

Let me deal, first of all, with the state of the economy. I was not in the House yesterday when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) spoke in this debate. I missed his contribution and accordingly I searched today through the record of Hansard to see whether I could find any really cogent remarks he might have made on the subject, particularly for any carefully-reasoned recommendations which he might have put forward. Such recommendations were largely absent and I found this somewhat surprising, because although he did indicate that other speakers on his side of the House would deal with other aspects of the Speech from the Throne, it seemed to me that in view of some of his public utterances around the country we might have expected him to take the earliest opportunity to direct his remarks in the House to those recommendations which he and others in his party have been working on to cure the ills which they discerned in our national economic affairs.

We note that the distinguished member for Rocky Mountain criticized the government for its deficits, indicating that these seemed to be growing by the week. In the next breath, though, he was proposing recommendations which in his view would help cure some of our economic woes, and among those recommendations was a proposal which would result in less revenue flowing to the government. I do not wish to argue the merits of the proposal itself. Indeed, it might at times be in order to increase the amount of a deficit already running at a substantial figure. The point is, he cannot have it both ways. He cannot make a solid argument criticizing deficits in government accounts while on the other hand putting forward recommendations which would result in substantially reduced revenues to the treasury.

I do not think the Canadian people are entitled to expect that a leader of the opposition should be deeply versed in economics or accounting theory, but I do think that in a country with a budget running to some $40 billion one might anticipate that those who occupy such an important position as that of Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition should at least have a basic understanding of what it means to create deficits and the effect reduced revenues would have on those deficits. How can one advance a recommendation which would have the result of reducing revenue while at the same time arguing that deficit should be reduced? Everyone who operates an ordinary bank account recognizes that when the flow of income is reduced the deficit position, if there is one, will be worsened. I mention this only because it seems to illustrate the lack of depth of understanding of members opposite. This is so often evident in the comments and proposals to which the Canadian people are subjected, either in the House or outside it—a real lack of understanding of how economy operates and how the system of government expenditures and revenues form a part of it.

It seems to me further that this kind of irresponsibility is all too typical of so much of the negative criticism which has the effect of creating increased pessimism across the country. Yet this is the type of criticism we continue to hear from the opposition benches, criticism which is not accompanied by careful, rational suggestions for improvement. I say the Canadian people are entitled to more from those who occupy a key opposition role in our governmental system. We are hearing a great deal these days and months as to how poorly Canadians seem to be doing economically. This is enhanced to a large extent by the irresponsible statements coming from senior people on the opposition side. This, in turn, creates more and more sensational headlines. It results in leaving with Canadians a greater sense of insecurity and concern than is justified to some extent, under the circumstances. This leads to a position where many members of the public create in their minds fears and concerns which are quite unwarranted.

Some substantial Canadian financial publications of recent date have indicated that there is a turn coming in the economic picture in Canada. Some of these things may result from government actions. Later today we will hear from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who will give Canadian people, hopefully, some indication of how the control system is eventually going to be phased out and what methods will be used to accomplish this. In a sense this will provide a blueprint for the next several years and will give Canadians, both businessmen and consumers, an indication of what form of continuing regulation they may anticipate, if there is to be any at all. This will assist business to make investment decisions of a long term nature, as well as assisting ordinary Canadians to make their personal business decisions and investment plans.

The pipeline decision was made by this government some time ago. It was satisfactorily negotiated with the United States. Hopefully it will come to fruition in Washington in the near future. It will be a new major incentive to the Canadian investment program, and it will spill over to many, many other areas of the economy. As I indicated during the debate on this issue, the potential effect of this pipeline on our economy in all parts of Canada is going to be a very significant boost, not only to the actual dollar picture, but to the general morale of Canadians. Attitudes are improving in the country. The pessimism which seems to have prevailed in our business community as recently as several months ago is waning. It is waning in the face of hard information to the extent that any business forecasts can be hard information. The best economic minds are now indicating that improvements are on the way.

The opposition knows, although they will refrain from mentioning it because it is not in their political interests, and most Canadians know that the economy of Canada does not operate in a vacuum. It is dependent on what goes on in the western hemisphere, particularly with our neighbours to the south. Generally the signs of a turnaround are coming. A new onset of capital spending is anticipated in the second half of next year. By 1978 housing starts are anticipated to go up to 255,000 units, compared to some 235,000 units this year—a significant increase.

There are areas in this country which will continue to have troubles which may well worsen as we move into the 1980s, regardless of how strong our economy becomes. I am referring to the balance of payments situation, that is, the amount of cash going out of the country as compared to the amount of cash coming into the country. Cash goes out not only for the purchase of goods and comes in not only from the sale of goods. Every time Canadians travel abroad and people from abroad do not travel in Canada, we have a double effect on the balance of payments picture. In other words, Canadian dollars go out of the country and foreign money does not come in. I hope we never have to discourage Canadians from travelling where they wish, but we must do more to encourage people from outside this country to come and see what we have to offer in Canada.

In Europe today the cost of living and the cost of travelling for a tourist is far more than it is in Canada. During this past summer I witnessed that. There is a tremendous opportunity available to us to encourage people to come and see Canada. Frequently Europeans hear about the United States, but Canada does not tell them enough about our great country and the facilities we have. This would be of interest to them.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, when I spoke before the luncheon adjournment I mentioned that one of the ways in which we might be able to help our balance of payments situation would be by encouraging further inflows of tourists from abroad, and I mentioned in particular the European continent where the cost of living and the cost of travel is fantastically high. In fact, it far exceeds the cost in this country. I believe that this country could offer a bargain to prospective European travellers in that respect.

At the same time, while not recommending any form of control measures which would prevent Canadians spending money outside the country, I think we should encourage Canadians to do much more travelling within their own country. That encompasses a great deal, including measures to reduce the cost of transportation facilities—it is frequently cheaper to travel outside the country than within it, which seems unreasonable, and including the kind of accommodation facilities that are available to ordinary Canadians as they move across the country. I suggest that this is a very important aspect, not only for our balance of payments but also in promoting greater national understanding, a matter with which I will deal in a moment.

To conclude my comments on the economy, I would like to refer again to the optimism with which I believe Canadians should be viewing the future. At the same time, I think we must be concerned about the problems which have given rise to such a serious situation in the last few years, to our increasingly high rate of unemployment and, in particular, we must take a much closer look at our secondary manufacturing industry—whom should we be protecting, and whom should we not be protecting; whose jobs should be protected, and whose should not?

I am somewhat concerned about the negotiations that are apparently under way in Geneva relating to GATT, as a result of which we may find ourselves accepting increasingly freer trade practices. My real concern is that as we "give" in some areas, in terms of lessening our import restrictions or customs duties, we should obtain freer access to those markets where non-tariff barriers are creating a problem. I refer, for instance, to restrictions on government spending policies of other countries, whether they will buy from outside as well as inside the country, and other types of measures that are of great concern to the Canadian manufacturing industry which is attempting to enter these export markets.

Other areas in which we have seen encouraging signs in the last few years include that of wage settlements. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) referred yesterday to wage settlements. According to my notes, they amounted to 8.8 per cent for the year ending the first quarter of 1977, which is a vast improvement over prior years—and this in an area where we continue to be told that we are quite uncompetitive with our neighbours to the south. Control over rates of inflation will continue to be important. We will have to convert many of our savers into buyers. I am sure Canadians will move into that pattern, but they will do it with care and caution. As a government, we must show the leadership that will help them.

I conclude these comments on the economy by referring to a recent address by Mr. Rowland Frazee, president of the Royal Bank of Canada and president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, in which he said that we, as Canadians, should not lose our perspective, that we have many natural technological and human resources which are a real bounty to us, and that our institutions are strong. He suggested that we should be concerned, but not alarmed, and that hard work and a sense of purpose are qualities which Canadians must foster anew in themselves.

There will be trade-offs, as the Prime Minister has mentioned, in such areas as what percentage we are going to own of our Canadian industry versus jobs that might otherwise be provided, as well as various other areas. But we must not put the blame on others for our situation; we must look to ourselves and realize that an increased standard of living is simply not a God-given right for every Canadian.

I should now like to address my remarks to the need for a greater degree of national understanding in this country. Here I purposely refrain from using the term "national unity" because, frankly, I do not really understand just what that term means. I have a certain concept of national unity which I am not sure is shared by other colleagues in the House from other areas of Canada. I feel, however, that national understanding—understanding among the peoples of various regions of the country—is a very important factor. A large gap exists there. In fact, I suggest that the election of the Parti Québécois government last November 15 is largely the result, on the one hand, of 110 years of misunderstanding and, what is worse in my view, of 110 years of completely inadequate measures by governments at all levels and by citizens generally to try to overcome this problem.

We have as yet no separatist government in the west or in the east, but it is conceivable that this phase could develop. The situation in Quebec was, perhaps, brought about by factors that we may not find in other regions of the country. Nevertheless, we are being told over and over again that the alienation of people in various regions of Canada is very real in terms of their relationship with central Canada, and the over-all problem is by no means restricted to Quebec.

Unless we tackle the problem for what it is, and not for what we might like it to be, in my view ultimately we shall be faced with a potential break-up of this country into various segments, each of which will ultimately seek its own destiny. We shall, indeed, have let down our sons, daughters and grandchildren if we allow this mentality to develop. That is to say nothing of letting down past generations, starting with the Fathers of Confederation, who looked upon this country as one in which they had a very strong belief.

Even if over generations we may have been guilty, to a degree, of a sin of omission in not doing our utmost to promote a greater degree of understanding across the nation during our maturing stage, the point to bear in mind is that the real issue we are facing is not a Quebec issue but a Canadian issue. As members of parliament, I feel we must look at the problem and tackle it with this attitude in mind. It is as serious a Canadian problem, that adults in one section of Ontario recently poured scorn upon the concept of an all-French teaching institution in a neighbourhood where French-speaking Canadians form a significant nucleus of the population, as it is a serious problem that the government of Quebec has told residents of the province that instruction in the English language in future will be available only to a small, privileged class whose numbers will steadily decrease in the years ahead.

We must somehow move beyond the early, adolescent stage at which our country has arrived. We must cease to be referred to, and refer to ourselves, as hyphenated Canadians. A Canadian is a Canadian. In my view, that must be the byword for our future. We may, indeed, be Canadians whose mother tongue is one of the two official languages, be it English or French, or we may be Canadians of one of the many unofficial mother tongues. These are prevalent languages which are frequently heard across this country, many of them in my own community and in my own riding. These people came to live in Canada and to adopt it as their home. Their immediate roots are in other areas of the world.

If we continue to fail to understand one another adequately, we will be unable to keep this great country together. I think the problems we have faced and are now facing in Quebec will tend to rear themselves in other areas over the course of the years. We must tackle them in a positive way. It is unacceptable that we should wait for yet another separatist government to be elected somewhere else in the country, before doing something. We must take some responsibility for ensuring that our children receive a form of education which will include a far greater exposure to both official languages and cultures than has been the practice in the past.

Without proper education in these areas—and it has been woefully inadequate over the last century—there will be no real development in bridging what I refer to as the understanding gap in years to come. There will be no significant closure of that gap, and without that closure I again say it is doubtful if Canada will be able to endure in any meaningful way over the long term. Constitutional conferences, patriation and amendment of the British North America Act—perhaps these things are important, but most important is the development of a substantially increased degree of understanding among Canadians. This is something which does not have any replacement, and that factor cannot be overlooked.

A great deal is being said about national unity and national understanding. As members of parliament, I think we will be drawn into this debate more and more. We have a responsibility to talk about it in our ridings, to encourage citizens to talk about it, and to do all we can to encourage the intermovement of people between the areas of concern and the areas in which they live. If we come from an area which does not seem to be concerned about the issue, we must put the matter on the table and seek together, as Canadians, ways in which to develop solutions which will be acceptable. I am sure that with a proper, mature outlook we will be able to develop solutions which will be acceptable, if not to all Canadians, at least to the majority in each region of this great country.

In my opening remarks I mentioned that I wanted to make a few comments on the energy situation. I choose to do so at this time because it seems to me this is an extremely complex matter. Many Canadians still feel that they are completely uninformed. Therefore, I would like to put on the record a few facts which I think are important. World demand for energy by the year 1990—13 hears hence—expressed in equivalent barrels of oil, will be roughly 160 million barrels per day, compared with 85 million barrels today. This figure is roughly double. Our situation is really no different and the increase has substantially reduced from that forecast in the early part of the 1970s. The forecast includes the assumption that conservation programs will be meaningful throughout the world, particularly in Europe and North America where there is a massive use of energy.

We do not know what the price of oil will be by 1990. A very informed source mentioned the other day, in conversation, that in his view the price could go to $25 a barrel. That is probably on the high side. On the other hand, we must understand that every time we spend a dollar on imported oil, that contributes to our balance of payment problem. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was somewhat irresponsible in his comments yesterday relating to the economy. In my view, he was definitely irresponsible in his comments on the energy situation when he said in his opening remarks: "This means no net imports of oil or of any other major fuel". I belive he was referring at some point earlier to the year 1985. That may be an ultimate goal. If it is an ultimate goal, I suppose it could be realistic, but it certainly is not realistic if he was referring to 1985 or 1990.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He didn't say that.

Mr. Martin: Canadians will be faced with increasingly heavy imports and an increasingly high bill, and the analyses I have seen by the most prestigious authors indicate no real impact by solar, wind, biomass, geothermal or other sources of energy by the year 2000.

Nuclear energy will be coming in in a bigger way, along with all the problems associated with it; but we must accept that this is probably an alternative which will be unavoidable. More and more, Canadians must address themselves to energy problems. They must discuss them in the way I hope they will discuss, more and more, our problems of national understanding and the economy. The energy situation cannot be segregated from any one of these problems. It has an increasingly high profile and it must occupy that position in the minds of thinking people in this country.

I shall conclude my comments which have dealt with those three areas. I have dealt with the state of the economy, the concern I have about the lack of adequate understanding among the various regions and peoples of this country, and the need for us, as a federal government, to attack those problems directly. That means doing something to encourage the provinces more and more in the field of education. We do not have rights in that field, but we certainly must have some kind of persuasive power. We are elected representatives, too. I have dealt with the energy situation. I solicit more and more concern and attention on the part of the government and Canadians to this increasingly significant problem, which will be very serious within the next 15 to 20 years.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the throne speech debate in this Silver Jubilee, or twenty-fifth year of the reign of our sovereign Queen, Elizabeth II. We were very fortunate to have Her Majesty present for the opening of the new session of Parliament, and I join with all hon. members of this House who wish her good health and a long life in which to carry out her many and manifold duties.

● (1422)

Mr. Crouse: The Queen is the living symbol of all that is good for Canada and for the Commonwealth. All of us present in this chamber are part of Canada. What Canada is and what Canada will be depends upon how much you and I and all Canadians participate in and contribute to making it a Canada of which we can all be proud.

At this point I wish to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for the capable manner in which they moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The presence of Her Majesty at the opening of parliament was significant at this point in our history, for it gave visible evidence of the fact that we have in Canada what is known as responsible government under a constitutional monarchy. Gathered in the Senate—or the other place—were not only the elected members of parliament but also the senators and Her Majesty the Queen. The three, together, constitute the Parliament of Canada, and no single authority can work without the other two. We can pass bills in this House after three readings, and they can be given three readings in the Senate, but they cannot become a legal enactment until they receive royal assent, or the approval of the Queen. This is a fact which, unfortunately, is not readily recognized even today by all members of parliament or by all those who have been granted the temporary right to serve as premiers of our provinces.

Ever since the election of the Parti Québécois under René Lévesque, the question of Quebec separating from the rest of Canada and the need for strengthening national unity has been in the spotlight. It has been under discussion and in the hearts and minds of Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We can no longer pretend that the stunning separatist victory is not splintering our country. No matter how many of the voters who turned to the Parti Québécois in despair over an inept and corrupt provincial Liberal government do not really want to leave confederation, the fact remains that they have put in power a party whose very reason for existence is the establishment of a separate Quebec state.

With a solid Parti Québécois majority in the National Assembly, the real question no longer is, "Will Quebec separate?" The question is, "When, and how, will it happen?" The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) maintains that he has no mandate to negotiate any form of separation with any province. That is correct, but unfortunately it does not mean very much. He had no mandate, either, for imposing wage and price controls. In fact, he won an election by ridiculing such measures. Having destroyed his credibility, the Prime Minister cannot expect to be readily believed even if what he says is what people really want to hear.

Yesterday the Prime Minister said that he is going to put before the House a proposition about a referendum. Unfortunately, Canadians have to learn the hard way that what matters is not what the Prime Minister says, but what he eventually does. What he does depends upon the requirements of the "new society" jigsaw puzzle that he is putting together. He, and he alone, knows where to fit the pieces.

For quite some time during the Quebec quiet revolution the Prime Minister and Mr. Lévesque shared basic political ideas and aspirations. Both fancied themselves then—and do today—as democratic socialists dedicated to the structural transformation of our society and its institutions. In this sense their goals remain similar if not identical.

The Prime Minister wants to restructure Canada from coast to coast, while Mr. Lévesque limits his new society blueprints to Quebec for the time being and uses Francophone nationalism for establishing his own sphere of operations. Neither has, as far as I know, renounced his ideological base or his objectives. This means that they disagree only over methods and not over substance.

In his political essay, "The Practice and Theory of Federalism", Pierre Trudeau, the writer, said:

> Radicalism in different parts of Canada must be implanted in different fashions.

He also said:

> Perhaps even parties with different names may preach the same ideology in different provinces.

Mr. Lévesque and his Parti Québécois are doing exactly that. The Prime Minister's only objection concerns Mr. Lévesque's selection of nationalism as the principal tool of socialism. This is not far-fetched speculation on my part, for Mr. Trudeau, the writer, said:

> I should like to see socialists feeling free to espouse whatever political trends or to use whatever constitutional tools happen to fit each particular problem at each particular time.

Mr. Lévesque could argue that he is following the Prime Minister's advice, and he does—except for his separatism plan, which violates the Prime Minister's injunction, stated as follows:

> —federalism must be welcomed as a valuable tool which permits dynamic parties to plant socialist governments in certain provinces from which the seed of radicalism can slowly spread.

That is the only point on which these two French Canadian socialists really clash. It is also the point on which Mr. Lévesque parted company with the Liberal party in Quebec just at the time the Prime Minister was beginning to exploit his switch to the Grits from the impotent New Democratic Party—where both he and Mr. Lévesque belong. Neither the Prime Minister nor Mr. Lévesque is likely voluntarily to give up his chosen approach to the building of socialist strongholds in Canada. It should not be impossible, however, or even too difficult for them to work out parallel and even mutually advantageous courses of action if given sufficient time.

I mention these facts because there are, obviously, still some people in Canada who believe that the Prime Minister is the only one capable of dealing with his separatist colleague in Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: I hear some applause from the other side, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Very little.

Mr. Crouse: Because of the sameness of their ideological backgrounds, nothing could be further from the truth. To follow this type of logic can only be compared to the thinking of the passenger on the Titanic who moved his deck chair from the lower level to the upper deck for greater safety.

The Prime Minister knows that the present language laws of Quebec are unconstitutional. He also knows that the quickest way to settle the legal status of the legislation is to refer it to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling. This action can only be taken by the Prime Minister, and although it may not be politically popular in the province where he said he would live if it separated, it is an action that he should take if he would assume his full and proper responsibilities as Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: In my opinion, if the Prime Minister is not prepared to carry out his duties as they apply to all Canadians, then he should have the common decency to resign his position and let someone take over the office who is willing to govern fairly and equitably Canadians in all parts of this country.

There are a number of sections in the British North America Act which substantiate my statement that the Prime Minister and his government are not facing up to their responsibilities. I shall not quote all the sections, but I read them backward and forward this summer during the recess and found that section 93, for example, is relevant. It reads as follows:

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—
> (1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union—

Subsections (2) and (3) of section 93 spell out clearly that all the powers, privileges and duties conferred by law at the time of Union shall be the same for the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec. Subsection (4) of section 93 states quite clearly that in case no provincial law which guarantees equal rights is made, then the Parliament of Canada—I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the Parliament of Canada—may make remedial laws for the due execution of section 93.

● (1432)

I ask you, sir, why has this not been done? Why has section 93 of the British North America Act, along with a similar section, section 129, been ignored? We are also ignoring, today, section 133 which guarantees the right to speak English or French in the Parliament of Canada as well as in the legislature of Quebec. Why have we gone beyond this requirement in the British North America Act? The throne speech states that we can expect new measures relating to the constitution. I ask the Prime Minister and any minister in his cabinet, if they do not respect the present laws in the British North America Act, how can we expect them to uphold any new changes that may be made in the constitution?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: I submit that the Prime Minister and his government, by deliberately sidestepping their responsibilities as spelled out in the British North America Act and in the Canadian Bill of Rights as assented to on August 10, 1960, are guilty of carrying out the most massive "con" job on the Canadian people that we have ever witnessed in the history of this country. How many Canadians today can stand and say, in the words as written in the Bill of Rights by that former great prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker):

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, not too many in the Liberal caucus today can stand and repeat those words. The members of the government party have been muzzled. They have conformed only too readily to their leader's description, when he wrote in Cité Libre, to quote the Prime Minister in an earlier day "the Liberals are a bunch of idiots" and "a spineless herd that run like animals to the trough". That is what the Prime Minister thinks of the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: How else can one explain the silence of the Liberals, who are today the governing party in Canada, and their denial to some Canadians of their basic human rights? The Bill of Rights provides, among other things, the right of the individual to equality before the law, the protection of the law, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and association, and freedom of the press. There is more, Mr. Speaker, but I would point out that already some of the guarantees of the Canadian Bill of Rights have been abridged by this government which has failed to carry out its responsibilities.

This failure to govern justly and in accordance with the law has been excused by the Prime Minister and his colleagues as being necessary, for to do otherwise, they say, would affect our national identity and national unity, which they claim is our biggest problem—bigger even than unemployment, inflation, lawlessness, violence, moral decay and the general social breakdown which has occurred in Canada under nine years of the Trudeau administration.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that the paramount issue of our times is not inflation, unemployment and the resulting social unrest caused by these two evils. Serious as these problems are, they are not insurmountable. The discomfort, unrest and concern that they cause will eventually force people to act and to put things straight, provided that the reform machinery of the democratic system has not been too badly damaged or destroyed during the Trudeau years.

In my opinion, the paramount issue of our time is, therefore, the preservation of our democratic system. This means the preservation of our basic freedoms which we tend to take as our birthright and which are threatened today as never before by the sanctimonous hypocrisy of the present Liberal administration. Unfortunately, most Canadians take their personal and political freedoms as much for granted as the air that they breathe. This may be due to the fact that through an accident of history or geography we are located in one of the most sheltered and secure spots on the world map. It is no exaggeration to say that had our southern neighbour been a country like Germany or Russia, Canada may not have emerged from the colonial stage as a separate political entity. It is, therefore, rather obvious that Canada exists today as a self-governing, free country only because it is lucky enough to have democratic America as its big neighbour along the longest undefended border in the world.

Moreover, as I view the new wave of totalitarianism which is clearly under way, it is equally obvious that the one and only real safeguard of the freedoms we take for granted is America's strength. Alone, Mr. Speaker, we are defenceless. Whether we like it or not, whether we admit it or not, it is a simple and self-evident fact that only the United States among the democracies still has the power to make a direct attack on any member of the Atlantic alliance too risky. It is that power, and nothing else, which has kept the armies and the tanks of the Soviet Union behind the iron curtain under what is called détente. For years the primary objective of communist strategy has been the splintering of NATO and the isolation of the United States. Under the present government, Canada has been a willing pawn in this power play. We have reduced our contribution to NATO. We have reduced our armed forces to something like 72,000 people.

Mr. Danson: It is 78,000.

Mr. Crouse: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) has corrected me; he says it is not 72,000, but 78,000. That is only four times more than the communist forces that we are indirectly helping finance in a war of aggression in Angola. It is a shameful participation in NATO and in the détente that we share in enforcing throughout the world. I say to you, sir, that we are facing dangerous times.

None of these acts by the present administration has gone unnoticed by the United States, whose leaders can well recall that it was our Prime Minister who went to Moscow and ranted about American threats to our identity from a cultural, economic and perhaps even military point of view. Just imagine where those words were said, Mr. Speaker. "Please come in and save us from the threat of American aggression"! Nationalism, therefore, as it is presently being—

Mr. Danson: He did not say that.

Mr. Crouse: The Minister of National Defence can make his own speech, but I happen to have the Prime Minister's address in my office. If the minister does not happen to have it, I will supply him with a copy, which states very clearly the words I have repeated. I took those words from the Prime Minister's speech; I just copied them, and they are exactly as he uttered them when he was in the Soviet Union. So let us not have any foolishness on that score. I know that the Minister of National Defence is quite capable of taking care of himself, but I have quoted to this House and to the people of Canada the words of our Prime Minister. If the minister is ashamed of them, he can make his own defence of the Prime Minister at another time.

Nationalism as it is presently being practised in Canada through its Quebec separatist version, with the underhanded approval of our Prime Minister and his government, is as destructive today as it is out of date. At stake in this abrogation of responsibility by the Prime Minister and his cabinet is not our identity—as he implies—but, rather, our total freedom. That is what is at stake.

Faced with these facts, faced with the mismanagement of our economy and our blundering nationally and internationally, Canadians do not need to wonder about the loss of confidence in our country by Canadian and international investors. Our dollar has dropped from a peak one year ago of something like $1.03 to 89 cents the other day. And is it any wonder? What else can we expect when Jean-Luc Pepin says publicly that it may be too late to save Canada? This buttresses my contention that he and his colleagues should never have been appointed to lead the Canadian unity debate. This work and most of our royal commissions should be under the chairmanship of someone in the Canadian Senate. After all, some four former premiers sit in the Senate as senators, yet one of them has so little to do in the Senate that he has time to draw his full pay as senator and also draw his full pay as president of Dalhousie University.

I believe that the Senate should be retained, but I also believe that it should be put to work in the manner I have described. We could then put some of the best business and legal brains to work on some of our major problems. As we are all well aware, these problems are manifold, and the words in the Speech from the Throne are the clearest admission to date by the Trudeau government that its economic policies are not working and must be changed. Business failures, with the consequent loss of millions of dollars, are taking place at an unprecedented rate across Canada this year and are expected to continue at an accelerated pace in 1978 and beyond.

The latest figures show that as of August 18, business failures reached 2,612—an increase of 29 per cent from what was a record figure last year of 2,030. At this rate, bankruptcy losses by the end of 1977 could easily reach $600,000 or more. This is why Maclean's magazine, in its September 19 issue, carried as its headline "Big Mac's Big Mess". In fact, the article pointed out that neither Walter Gordon, Mitchell Sharp, Edgar Benson or John Turner, "Big Mac's" predecessors, were capable of coming even close to predicting the budget deficit.

Headlines state this year's deficit could be a record $8 billion, so it is understandable why the finance minister resigned. The whole government should resign, along with the high-priced bureaucratic advisers who have got us into this financial mess. You may well say, "It is easy to criticize, but what do you propose as an alternative?" I just made one proposal—put the senators to work. That would cut down on the money being wasted on royal commissions. That is as good a place as any to start.

The ad hoc measures which have been the hallmark of this government must cease. This country is crying out for leadership. This applies to our citizens whether they are engaged in agriculture, fisheries, forestry, mining, or whether in large or small business. What seems to be lacking is a sense of direction, a forward plan. We need, at the very least, a three-year plan, with an immediate objective in the field of economic management, to strive for stable economic recovery in order to stabilize employment. The present economic situation simply cannot be allowed to continue.

Confidence is lacking. In fact, confidence in Canada has been destroyed. No sensible individual or company will take a chance by investing capital in any industry in Canada when governments at all levels—federal, provincial and municipal—are now spending $84.2 billion a year, which works out to almost 42 per cent cent of our $202 billion gross national product. Twelve months ago, 60 per cent of the economy was still in the private sector. Now it has shrunk to 58.4 per cent. Whether we like it or not, we simply must cut back on the frills. We must cut down unnecessary government spending and rearrange our spending priorities in a manner that will stimulate the private sector.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: No more Mirabels.

Mr. Crouse: As one of my colleagues has stated, no more Mirabels, no more $500 million blunders.

In Atlantic Canada, the fishing industry is crying out for a definite government policy that will encourage its gradual expansion. Despite the declaration of a 200-mile limit on January 1, 1977, some 70 per cent of the fish caught off our coasts is still harvested by foreign fleets. Our packing and processing plants are not operating at capacity. Our fishermen, given the proper equipment, could harvest an estimated $1 billion a year crop, but they are handicapped by government rules and regulations and by lack of investment capital. There is a growing feeling in Atlantic Canada that the federal government is intentionally delaying the regrowth and development of our fishery in order to accommodate foreign fleets whose countries serve as a market for western wheat and central Canadian industry.

Obviously, the present fisheries minister does not want the Canadian fishing fleet to be rebuilt, because this would require the phasing out of foreign fishing efforts, an action the present government is not prepared to take. How can the present government and its apologists explain the fact that the fishing industry and a development policy for the industry is not even mentioned in the Speech from the Throne? Since we do not have one single Canadian registered ship capable of catching and freezing roundnose grenadier, silver hake, argentines, squid, capelin or offshore mackerel—all species of fish which are soft in texture and which must be frozen as quickly as possible after removal from the ocean—our unemployed citizens are asking why this absurd situation is allowed to continue.

Our unemployed shipbuilders are asking why suitable ships cannot be built. Our unemployed contractors, electricians and plumbers are asking why cold storage facilities cannot be built. They are required right now in places like La Scie and Twillingate, in Newfoundland, and Vogler's Cove in Nova Scotia. Our businessmen are asking why marketing and sales machinery cannot be established, and why fishermen and other required specialists for this new fishery cannot be trained.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) has stated in the press, over television, and yesterday in response to my question in this House, that it is useless to consider rebuilding the fleet at this time, since Canadian ships would simply be replacing foreign ships in depleting the fish stocks on our continental shelf. This is nothing more than nonsense. It is incorrect and untrue. Canadians cannot deplete the species I mentioned, for we do not have one ship of our own with the capability of catching and freezing these fish. However, the foreign fleets have this capability and they also have the markets. While the minister sits in his seat, wrings his hands and tries to make political hay and says nothing can be done, the foreign fleets still continue to denude our banks of fish, while our two major "industries" in Atlantic Canada, namely, welfare and unemployment, continue to expand at an accelerated pace.

The minister and his colleagues are seemingly unaware that if we had started yesterday on the construction of at least two freezer trawlers which are a minimum of 240 feet in length and have a capability of operating in distant areas, it would be two years at least before one new ship would be delivered. In the meantime, our fishermen should be trained to operate freezer trawlers so they can learn the new technology that is required in order to be successful.

To encourage new ship construction or replacements for old ships, we should consider establishing a system of investment allowances as a form of tax remission. To put it briefly, under this system—and this is only to illustrate the principle—if a ship cost $100 built in Canada, it would be set up on the books at $175 for depreciation purposes. Investment allowances is a method used extensively in Europe. Because it must be earned, used by the same company and subject to recapture, it costs the government nothing directly.

The same rule of thumb could apply to our inshore fishermen on the Atlantic coast and the British Columbia coast who also require new ships in the 45-foot to 65-foot class. Since these ships are generally built of wood, an inshore fleet development plan would spark a chain reaction in the production of jobs throughout the whole of Atlantic Canada and, indeed, in all parts of Canada. Since the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, through the banks, does not seem to be working, there should also be set up a central mortgage and shipping corporation to provide fisheries development funds at special rates to fishermen desirous of upgrading their boats and equipment.

The same lack of planning is seriously affecting the development of agriculture in my province. Due to mismanagement of the entire economy, approximately 35 cents out of the average Nova Scotian's food dollar finds its way back to the farmer. The rest is gobbled up by freight charges, shipping charges, processing and packing charges between the time commodities leave the farm and are purchased by consumers. Even though agriculture in Nova Scotia is one of our oldest basic primary industries, after centuries of farming there is still no vehicle available to producers which provides them with a suitable income for an honest day's work.

Canada has always had a cheap food policy, but what the farmer receives today for his labours and what the consumer pays for his products bears no relationship one to the other. As a result of this situation, the ratio of farmers to the population is declining. While they are producing more food than ever, we have to ask ourselves whether or not we want the agricultural industry in Nova Scotia to continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Crouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will only be another minute. The capital investment in the average farm for land, equipment, buildings, feed and other expenditures is massive, and some form of stabilization program has to be worked out to enable our farmers to remain in business.

In closing, I say to this House that if the economic problems of Canadians are resolved, there will be an easing of the political and social difficulties throughout Canada. However, if our economic problems are not resolved, our social and political problems will compound. The longer the delay, the more severe will be the adverse consequences of that delay. For all these reasons I intend to support the amendment moved by my leader, which clearly states that we no longer have any confidence in this government.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address for their contribution to our proceedings, one which, I am sure, augurs well for both of them.

I should like to deal with two major areas: first, bill 101 and the tactics of the government of Canada with respect to it, and then with some of the problems of the national capital region.

[Translation]

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal). I have read and reread the speech he delivered in this House on October 19, 1976. He discussed minority rights and everything that happened in the province of Manitoba in the 1890's.

[English]

A year ago in this House my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Joyal) dealt most eloquently with the injustices which were perpetrated on a minority language group in the province of Manitoba. His words today reflect a sincerity and conviction which for me carried just as much weight now as they did then. I differ from my hon. friend in my views respecting many areas of his speech, particularly with regard to the treatment of public servants, but I stand with him on the question of minority language rights, along with other members of the House. I welcomed the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that bilingualism is to be the very cornerstone of our approach to national unity and that it will have to be written into the Constitution of Canada in some way so as to guarantee absolutely the equality of the two official language groups from coast to coast. There is no question in my mind that this must be the ultimate objective.

It is perhaps worth while reviewing the events which took place in Manitoba in the years following the action of that province in 1890. When my hon. friend from Maisonneuve-Rosemont first spoke on this matter, my reaction was to think, "This was a long time ago, and I cannot atone for the sins of my forefathers. Nevertheless, I am quite prepared to admit that an injustice was done and to do all I can to correct it." Someone has said that a nation which cannot learn from the past is doomed to repeat it. In 1890, the government of Manitoba abolished, by resolution, the use of the French language in the legislature. It then proceeded to enact legislation abolishing separate schools. Both the Anglicans and the Roman Catholics appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and then went to the Privy Council, where lay the ultimate decision as to the constitutionality of the legislation. The bulk of the legislation was held to be valid and constitutional. Then the minority group in Manitoba appealed to the federal cabinet under section 22(2) of the Manitoba Act of 1870. That section is parallel to section 93 of the BNA Act under which a similar appeal would still lie. The cabinet of the day listened to the minority appeal, but Sir John A. Macdonald died in 1891 and in the five years following his death four ill-remembered men succeeded him as prime minister. It fell to Sir Mackenzie Bowell—

—the leader of Canada's Orangemen, the then Prime Minister to stand for minority rights. The Conservative government introduced measures in Parliament for the protection of minority rights. The 1977 Liberal government must do the same to protect minority rights.

[English]

Mackenzie Bowell said they would ask the Privy Council whether an appeal by the minority lay with the cabinet of Canada. The answer was yes. There were public hearings, and the government of the day introduced a remedial order instructing the restoration of the separate schools. The government of Manitoba did nothing. Then the government of Canada, under Sir Mackenzie Bowell, introduced a remedial bill which was debated at great length. It was filibustered, and failed to pass by the time the life of the parliament expired in 1896.

When Laurier came to power with the Liberals in 1896, a compromise was negotiated with Manitoba which for the first time provided a legislative base for the instruction and use of the French language in the schools of that province. It was an act of shame by the province when, some 20 years later, that right was abolished. However, we can be proud that it was subsequently restored and has been enlarged and strengthened by the province in recent years.

As a result of that situation, when the government of the day realized it could not disallow a bill which was clearly within provincial competence, Blake introduced a resolution in the House of Commons in 1890. The resolution said the government should have the option of going before a court of the land to determine the constitutionality of the bill. Sir John A. Macdonald supported the resolution and it was passed after debate, becoming the basis of section 55 of the Supreme Court of Canada Act.

I sincerely hope that a matter as delicate and as fundamental as this will not become the subject of partisan political politics. I welcome the statement by the Prime Minister with regard to a referendum. The leader of the New Democratic Party said there was no reason for a referendum. One very good reason would be that it could be conducted in the two official languages. There is no reason to think that the referendum of the Parti Québécois will be conducted in the two official languages. The federal initiative on a referendum is a very wise and good measure which I am pleased to support.

I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that a flexible attitude will be maintained with regard to federal-provincial negotiations. It is my sincere hope that there will be a testing of the constitutionality of this provision. It is significant that the sections of the Manitoba legisiation which were tested related to schools and not to the abolition of language rights. They were not tested untii 1909 and 1916, 19 years and 26 years after the legislation, respectively. It is not the right thing to leave private parties at their own initiative and expense to test piecemeal before the courts, over a long period of time, before constitutionality can be established. Machinery was created as a result of the previous experience which allowed an option for the government to examine.

A great bulk of the legislation in Bill 101, which I have read carefully, will be declared constitutional; some sections will not. But I hope there will be an orderly testing of those sections which are not constitutional. One cannot count on the actions of private parties to initiate these matters. If the government were to refer the question to the courts, the argument would run that there is no way in which the country would win. If the legislation were found constitutional, of course, that would set the seal of approval upon it. If it were found unconstitutional, it would be an Anglophone court which would impose this upon the province. That would give Mr. Lévesque an election issue.

The legislation is either constitutional or it is not. If it is constitutional, a reference to the courts will not change anything. The argument is that an Anglophone-dominated court is going to do it. The superior courts of Quebec are Francophone-dominated. One could also argue, "How are the Anglophone minority groups in the province of Quebec going to get a fair hearing?" The argument is that the Federal Court cannot test it because it is dominated by Anglophones, but meanwhile all the testing is by courts dominated by Francophones in the province of Quebec.

If the courts were to declare the legislation constitutional, there would be an option available to the minority, under section 93 of the British North America Act, to make an appeal to the federal cabinet. That was the parallel option which the aggrieved minorities in the province of Manitoba utilized so effectively following the legislation of 1890 and the decisions of the Privy Council. I hope the answer of the government of the day will be, if minority groups were to appeal to the cabinet, "We will do as much for you as the Conservative government did in 1895 for minorities. We will give you a fair hearing. We will consider the remedial measures." I hope the cabinet would not say, "This is coming to mother for things you should not come to mother about". Confederation means just that, that there is an appeal to some kind of central authority which will assume responsibility for minority rights across the country and is prepared to take the consequences of taking a stand for minority rights.

I am not sure I understood the Prime Minister's remarks correctly. I should like to quote from Hansard of October 19, 1977, page 38, as follows:

> The French language and culture must be preserved in the province of Quebec, but it must also be preserved among the French-speaking minorities in the other provinces, in the same way as we suggest that the English-speaking majority in the other provinces must of course ensure the preservation of its own language and culture in the province of Quebec for the English-speaking minority.

Is it the responsibility of the other nine provinces to preserve the English language and culture in the province of Quebec? The Prime Minister said that if this is not done, we will have the two solitudes; we will have a province speaking only French and the rest of Canada speaking only English, and there is no future. I agree. But what is the business of confederation all about on the fiscal front, the civil rights front and all fronts, unless an aggrieved minority can come to mother whenever it has a problem?

My good friend and colleague, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont, made an eloquent statement with respect to what happens to a nation if it does not respect minority language rights. I hope he will agree with me that the crisis of language rights in respect of a minority in Quebec is as serious today as it was in 1895 in the province of Manitoba, where Francophone rights were very abruptly, unjustly and wrongly abused by the government of the day.

I know there are others who will participate in this debate, and I realize the Speech from the Throne gave a general outline on the matters we should be concerned about. I should like to refer briefly to two or three matters which give me concern. The Speech from the Throne of September 30, 1974, reads in part as follows:

Amendments will be proposed to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The Speech from the Throne of October 12, 1976, reads in part as follows:

Measures will be proposed to improve the collective bargaining system in the public service, to reduce the adversarial nature of the process and to ensure an equitable relationship between compensation levels in the public and private sectors.

In 1974, the Finkelman report was made public. It was an excellent document prepared by the former chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board. It was referred to a joint committee of this House and the other place. A report was brought down in January, 1976, recommending very extensive improvements to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. Then, when we had a strike of the air traffic controllers this summer, this House had to legislate to bring them back to work.

I did not participate in that debate because I had to wrestle with my conscience on the balance of responsibility, whether I should participate, extend the debate and extend the strike, or whether I should defer my comments to a later date. I chose the latter. There will be more strikes, there will be more disruptions, and there will be more trouble if the government does not come to grips with the Public Service Staff Relation Act and the Public Service Employment Act.

On February 4, 1977, the president of the privy council made a statement to this House announcing a special inquiry on the Public Service Employment Act. I have endeavoured to catch Your Honour's eye in order to ask questions relating to whether a chairman has been appointed to this special inquiry. It is now 8½ months later. There were two individuals named: the one on the official side was Mr. Brittain, and the one on the employees' side was Mr. Davidge. I have had no indication of any public hearings or activity. This inquiry is long overdue.

I should like to say a word or two about the National Capital Commission. In 1974, we had the benefit of two reports prepared by Mr. Douglas Fullerton, a former chairman of the National Capital Commission. These were extensive as a result of an inquiry conducted at public expense. While I did not agree with the conclusions, I felt the analysis was exhaustive and the point of view was refreshing. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) found the bulk of the recommendations to his liking. While I had some differences, I respected the very careful work and preparation which had taken place.

That report was referred to a special joint committee of this House and the other place. The committee held very extensive hearings. The Premier of Nova Scotia appeared before the committee as a witness, as did the finance minister of Saskatchewan, other provincial cabinet ministers, heads of regional governments, and, representations of all regional councils. There were public hearings with citizens' committees. That committee undertook to do an extensive and thorough job, but unfortunately it completed its hearings close to the end of the session.

It is my sincere hope that the committee will be reconstituted in order that it can prepare a report for the government. The government could stand just a little advice as to what could be done to improve relationships among regional municipalities, provincial authorities, provincial members of parliament and federal members of parliament. Some of us who have observed events over a period of time have views as to how matters can be improved. I have the honour of representing Ottawa West. There are problems in that constituency as well as in neighbouring constituencies.

I am referring to a problem in adjusting to a series of moves which appear not to have been too well co-ordinated. In 1975, the report of the National Capital Commission suggested that 25,000 jobs would be moved out of the Ottawa-Hull region as part of the government's decentralization program. That program has been implemented in various stages. There was the recent announcement by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicating perhaps the latest stage in this program. In addition, there is the relocation to Hull. Perhaps 15,000 to 20,000 positions are being moved to that city. The net result has been the abandonment of some six million square feet of office space in the city of Ottawa, two million square feet of which represented temporary structures which could be demolished, and four million square feet of which was privately leased accommodation. That accommodation is now available at bargain rates for office and commercial accommodation for anyone who wants to locate in the national capital.

On top of this we have restraint on the hiring of public servants, which is long overdue and perfectly justified, there is no question about it. But what does the National Capital Commission advise, with all these streams of information in its hands—the body with the experts, the body whose duty it is to advise the government what to do? Its advice is to go ahead with two satellite communities of 100,000 people each, one in the Carlsbad region, in the southeastern section of the city, and the other in the Aylmer region in Quebec, with a transportation corridor linking them.

They published a document called "Invitation to Dialogue". Dialogue should have taken place between one arm of the NCC and another arm before they published the document, because they just did not put A and B together and they did not draw conclusions as to the growth of the national capital. As a result, the province of Ontario acquired several thousand acres of land for a land bank, and there has been a little friction over this misunderstanding. The province does not feel it can proceed and that, indeed, it has been induced to acquire land which it cannot turn to any useful purpose at this point. This is an understandable reaction, Mr. Speaker.

Although I welcome the new chairman and the new minister, both of whom are fully aware of their responsibilities in this area, the expression of federal interest in the national capital through a Crown corporation has, even by its concept, certain limitations. The Auditor General has made a number of observations on the conduct of the affairs of this corporation, observations which are not complimentary. A number of other events have given us reason for concern, and I know the new chairman is taking stock of the problems he has inherited. I look forward to a much better relationship between the minister, the new chairman and the regional municipalities. The problem has been compounded on the Quebec side by the developments since November 15 and the election of the Parti Quebecois government——member Jocelyne Ouellette, the minister responsible for the region, who simply dislikes the federal government and simply says that she intends to give them the boot.

[English]

The minister who has been elected has adopted a very belligerent and hostile attitude toward any federal activities in this area. The task still remains of sorting out the respective responsibilities of the Department of Public Works, the Department of Transport, the NCC and the various arms of the federal authority in this area in order to develop rational and reasonable long-term plans and present them to the regional planning board in a co-operative way—not a dictatorial way; not by threats such as, "You must do this" or, "You cannot cross federal lands" in an attempt to lay down, in an unco-operative and dictatorial way, to the regional municipalities and their elected officers what they must or must not do.

Those of us who visited Washington were impressed with the federal agency in Washington, the National Capital Planning Commission, which is not permitted to own an acre of land and which is kept in a purely advisory capacity, in great contrast to the situation in Ottawa. I think the government of the day could profit from a report by this committee, putting together the evidence it has acquired and presenting it to the people of Canada and to this parliament for appropriate action.

I do not like to sound negative, because one does not achieve very much by doing that. I hope that what I have said has called to the attention of the government some measures that are urgent and essential to the good government of this country through the public service and to the good government of the national capital through the instruments that it chooses to exercise.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, to read the throne speech one would think that Canada is the whole world, that wrestling with the economy and the national unity question has exhausted this government. Despite our position of influence on the Security Council of the United Nations, the government has no international initiatives to offer. Apparently we do not even need to think about the international scene. When our house is in order, then we will be able to live happily ever after.

How different is reality? Terrorism, international murder, skyjacking, are direct frontal attacks on modern society—as we have seem in Europe this week—yet the government ignores these new realities.

Human rights violations are spreading, and political prisoners are increasing, but the government has nothing to say, not even a word of congratulation to Amnesty International which deserves the commendation of all members of the House for being awarded the 1977 Nobel Peace Prize for its efforts to free prisoners of conscience and abolish torture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: The list of global problems is awe inspiring. There is the rapidly escalating arms race, the increasing danger of the proliferation of nuclear weapons, racism in Africa, shortages and maldistribution of food, population pressures, the threat to the environment, the persistence of massive poverty, the competition for control of marine resources, the complex problems of energy, the dwindling supplies of non-renewable resources, and the whole spectrum of international economic ills from inflation, unemployment and indebtedness to problems of unstable commodity and money markets.

Does the government actually think that this conglomeration of problems poses no danger to Canada? It is time for the government to wake up. Canada's interests extend beyond the excessive introspection that characterizes our present stance. What has happened to the vision of Lester B. Pearson who recognized that Canada has a meaningful role to play in international affairs? The exertion of creative leadership in the world community would, in my view, contribute to the solving of our internal problems by giving us a renewed sense of purpose. But the Pearson vision is gone, obliterated by a government which cannot even lead Canadians, let alone the world community.

As Professor John Holmes notes, we have entered middle age as a nation; we have lost the enthusiasm of ideals without having acquired the solid purpose of maturity. Mr. Speaker, new Canadian policies of enlightened internationalism are urgently needed, for modern events tie us more closely than ever to the rest of the world. Our energy future is directly affected by decisions made in the Middle East. Our grain sales depend, in part, on the fields of China and India. Our economic viability as a nation depends on our ability to compete in growing markets abroad. Our security, both physical and spiritual, depends increasingly on the capacity of the developing nations to provide economic and social opportunity to the one billion people who now live in misery. I would have excused the government for saying that all this is too much to solve within the confines of one throne speech. I cannot excuse it for blithely ignoring the real interests of Canada in a new, interdependent global community.

On September 26, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) went to the United Nations General Assembly to make his annual speech. Tired of the customary platitudes, the minister attacked the UN for its poor performance and warned that the world body was heading for oblivion unless it showed itself to be more effective. This attack may have given vent to the frustrations of the minister about the UN, but his speech would have been much more helpful had he encouraged, rather than scolded, the UN.

The chief value of the UN is that it is gradually building the framework for a legal system to preserve world order. This is a long process, exacerbated by the long confrontation between east and west, and now between north and south. We have the UN's specialized agencies and a string of world conferences on food, population, human settlements, industrialization, the deserts and water—to name just a few—to thank for our new understanding of the limits and constraints on human life and behaviour on this planet. National governments are learning that they must co-operate because of the physical and economic interdependence of the whole planet. But it is a hard lesson and it calls for patience, not short tempers.

The UN cannot force governments to adopt global strategies. It can only use its power of moral persuasion. That is why international consensus is so vital, and why Canada ought to be more aggressive in working to build a consensus which will lead directly to a safer, more just world.

When he was at the UN, the minister announced that, subject to parliamentary approval, Canada would donate $7.5 million in food grain—roughly 50,000 tons—to an emergency grain reserve. The throne speech does not even refer to this commitment. Similarly, the minister chided the UN for not discharging fully or effectively its responsibilities in the field of human rights. Could the government not give the human rights issue its proper priority by raising its voice in the chorus of international concern? The government limits its concern about human rights to the very real cases of family reunification, but that is too narrow an interpretation of this deep, deep issue.

Rather than criticizing the UN, the Canadian government ought to be building world opinion to support the UN Special Session on Disarmament to be held next May and June in New York. The spectre of nuclear war, insists UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, "is unquestionably the most terrifying potential threat to us and to future ages". At least six nations now have atomic capability, and two dozen or more are at the threshold, producing as a by-product of their energy programs the starting kit for several thousand atomic bombs, if they so wish.

Arms spending has now reached $350 billion a year. This magnitude is almost impossible to grasp, but it can be expressed as two-fifths of the combined gross product of all Third World countries. Military uses of science now consume the research work of 400,000 highly qualified scientists and engineers. Exotic names are attached to each new invention and they are always presented as a further consolidation of deterrence. But a single-minded attachment to deterrence has trapped both nuclear powers, the United States and Russia, in a vicious cycle. Each side is now engaged in a technological race for the maximum improvement or perfection of its deterrents.

Bad as the present situation is, it is bound to become worse as nuclear capacity spreads. The possibilities of accident, misinterpretation of orders, theft of nuclear weapons, nuclear terrorism and blackmail would be greatly multiplied in a proliferated nuclear world, the kind of world we are heading into. Whatever value the doctrine of mutual deterrence might have in a bipolar world or in a world of many nuclear powers with great differences in their geopolitical, military and technological positions, those values are now changing. Our world is becoming a more dangerous place because of the spreading military technology which has led the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute to conclude: "The probability of a nuclear world war is steadily increasing".

The scandal of arms is not confined to the nuclear threat. Although the superpowers and the other major industrial nations are the big spenders, the number of Third World countries with highly sophisticated conventional weapons is growing. The Third World's share of world military expenditure has risen from 5 per cent in 1955 to 17 per cent now, but much more dramatic has been the increase in the Third World's share of the international arms trade. About three-quarters of the current global trade in arms is now with the Third World. In fact, military spending of Third World countries in the past decade—I think this is probably the most shameful fact which can be brought before the House today—has increased twice as fast as their economic base and now exceeds the total amount they spend on education and health combined.

The international arms trade links eager sellers and eager buyers, as revealed by the 18-month Lebanese civil war which killed 40,000 people. Arms were smuggled and purchased by both sides, from all factions: east and west, communist and capitalist, idealistic and greedy. The lucrative arms trade around the world not only undermines disarmament talks but is also a direct threat to development because it is an invitation to coups, grotesque overspending on imported weapons, and misplaced priorities. In both a nuclear and conventional sense we are on a path to destruction.

We know what needs to be done to avert a calamity. Efforts to achieve progressive worldwide disarmament must be aimed primarily at balanced mutual arms reductions on three levels: first, on the level of the superpowers where the goal is to lessen, if not eliminate, the danger of holocaust; second, on the level of all would-be members of the nuclear club, with the containment of horizontal proliferation as the objective; and third, on the general level of all states, large and small, in order to reduce the chances of war and violence by limiting the amount and destructiveness of arms transferred in international trade.

The Special Session on Disarmament is an attempt to focus world opinion on the arms question. Kurt Waldheim predicts that "it will be the largest, most representative gathering ever convened to consider the question of disarmament". The substantive issues will be a comprehensive test ban agreement, strategic arms limitations, non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, and reduction of the arms trade.

A great amount of preparatory work is under way. Some 45 countries have already given their views about the agenda. The U.S. submission states that if effective disarmament is to be established, the difficulties of definition, balance, verification, conflicting political purpose and insecurity must be addressed. The Canadian government wants the session to produce a basic final political declaration that would lead the way to a further session to actually implement a new co-operative approach to arms control and disarmament.

Already there is concern that the raising of public opinion not create false expectations that would only lead to more public disillusionment and frustration. The best that can be hoped for is that the special session will reach agreement on general principles for effective disarmament measures that will be negotiated at a future date. Even this modest agreement, measured against the present chaos, would be a major accomplishment. It is to this end that I urge the Canadian government to raise its own priorities of involvement in the disarmament session and the preparation for it. For all of this will enable broader studies of comprehensive disarmament programs, including both nuclear and conventional weapons, of reciprocating measures of unilateral restraint, of across the board budget reductions, of the impact on the arms race and disarmament, of the explosive questions of the link between disarmament and a new world order.

I quote a statement made by a famous man a few years ago. He said:

> Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired, signifies, in a final sense, a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, from those who are cold and are not clothed.

It was President Eisenhower who said that while he was still in the White House. The joining, then, of disarmament and development problems into a single theme is not a new notion. But we now have a better understanding of how the arms race is literally stealing from the poor of the world. Five presidents later, in his foreign policy speech in June this year at Notre Dame University, Jimmy Carter declared:

> We can no longer separate the traditional issues of war and peace from the new global questions of justice, equity and human rights.

[Mr. Roche.]

Nowhere is the new, positive value of interdependency that characterizes the global village more compelling than in the struggle for justice. The acceleration of scientific and technological developments has opened up the possibility of maximizing the physical, mental and social well-being of everyone. But it is only from the reduction of military expenditure that the vast resources needed for development can be obtained.

Philip Noel-Baker, winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, maintains that the torrent of funds poured into defence should be diverted into the more fruitful waters of development. He said:

> Since 1945, the arms race has led governments to spend vast resources on armaments, resources which ought, on grounds of morality, on grounds of equal human justice, on grounds of enlightened self-interest, to have been given instead to ending world poverty. That is how world armaments are the cause of world poverty.

When countries from all regions and at all stages of development are involved in major and minor arms races, little time and less money can be devoted to improving the lives of ordinary citizens. The violation of humanity represented by neglected education, inadequate or non-existent health services, malnutrition and repressive régimes which are shored up by arms from the factories of the rich is a destructive power that seems less devastating than war only because its true magnitude is not easily measured.

Barbara Ward has estimated that the money required for a full program of development of the poor countries over the next decade is only one-half the world's annual bill for weapons. Of course, beating swords into plowshares is a challenge of epic proportions, requiring governmental policies of enlightened internationalism. That is why Canada has a duty to lead and to show the Canadian people by its actions that it is leading.

It simply does not follow that reductions in arms expenditures will automatically divert money into development channels, though it is clear that such reductions are a prerequisite. A public commitment to a "new growth" world community is needed to unleash new and dynamic economic forces that would stimulate creativity, innovation and economic activity across a broad front. If expenditures on war, which are inherently wasteful, can be a stimulus to the economy, how much more value to the real capital stock of our society could be increased production of the goods of life.

Exploring the linkages between disarmament and development requires a moral approach deep enough to reflect the full spiritual and human dignity that every individual derives from his humanity, and responsive enough to cope with the interrelated and interlocking world crisis converging at this moment in history.

The special session of the United Nations offers the world a new opportunity to ensure survival. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Canada could make a special and distinctive contribution to the success of the special session by convening a panel of all living Nobel Peace laureates to help stimulate public discussion.

We could help to develop a better understanding of the link between disarmament and development by encouraging public research into problems of converting defence industries into civilian ones, by linking development assistance policies to Canadian policies on disarmament, supporting the efforts of the non-governmental organizations, and by working more closely with other countries on the disarmament issue.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to recover for Canada an important role in world affairs, it will be necessary to raise our sights. Enlightened internationalism demands a discernible spirit of co-operation. That is a simple word, but a difficult accomplishment. For example, we have not been co-operating in the development of a safe world community by selling nuclear reactors which increase the risk of horizontal proliferation and impose an inappropriate technology on developing countries. Nor does the government build a true spirit of international co-operation by forming a uranium cartel which drives up the world price of uranium through illegal action. We could do much more to co-operate with the United States, our best friend and our best customer. Finally, we could produce a better spirit of co-operation within Canada by clearly establishing priorities for world peace and justice.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate my colleagues, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood), the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, for their thoughtful remarks. As they noted, we in Canada are at a decisive turning point in our short history. We are at the kind of turn that is leading us back to the very beginnings of our country. There we find ourselves face to face, as did the founding fathers, with the fundamentals of a constitution, of economic life and, above all, with the most fundamental of questions for us—the terms under which free citizens, Francophone and Anglophone, will live together in the same homeland.

Some seek to improve the mechanics of our relations through constitutional changes—for example, by entrenching official minority language rights—while others want to press down on the accelerator of economic growth.

● (1542)

There are, indeed, many necessary mechanisms in our relationship that do need improvement. Let us improve them soon. The Prime Minister, for his part, has pointed the way to greater unity through essential changes of these kinds and with specific proposals in economic and constitutional fields.

But he has always insisted on the fact that mechanisms will be pointless unless Canadians everywhere in Canada strike at the root of the evil. Truly, the root of that evil is not the constitution, nor the sharing of powers, nor the economy: it is a matter of dignity, the dignity of man.

As for me, I also feel that the ailment which afflicts us too often in Canada is a meanness of spirit. That disease, that lack of generosity of spirit prevents us from dealing with our Francophone compatriots on an equal footing, or from recognizing in them a community worthy of our respect, and from giving them the place that is rightfully theirs in all parts of the country and in all spheres of activity in our society. The challenge for us, at this critical point in our history, is to create with them, everywhere in Canada and Quebec itself, a relationship based on dignity and respect. We will have to show that generosity of spirit, to which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) invites us, and without which no mechanisms will work. I feel optimistic about a better future, because that generosity of spirit is obvious in an ever increasing number of Canadians, despite obstacles, despite our problems.

[English]

Yet having that right spirit without taking the necessary concrete measures will not be enough, either. The leader of the New Democratic Party, for example, does have, indeed, in full measure the spirit of accommodation. He has always shown that generosity of spirit with respect to Canadian Unity. But is he not missing the point in his speech when he suggests that the challenge for Quebeckers is to be able to live in Quebec as Quebecois? They do that with confidence and vigour. Surely, the challenge is to live in Quebec as well as outside Quebec as Canadians, as equals, welcomed and accepted and seen as equal, full Canadians, whether in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or elsewhere. A concept of "equal but separate" is not the question for us. It cannot be the question for us. "Equal together" is the question.

I would appeal to the leader of the New Democratic Party, whose dedication is beyond reproach, to give greater weight than he appears to be giving presently to essential constitutional change and to minority language rights across the country—he does give them weight; it is a matter of balance—in his strong and legitimate focus on economic questions.

With respect, I would like to say I think he missed another point of balance in attacking the Prime Minister's concept of nationalism which, he alleges, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) views as always a regressive, oppressive force in society. With respect, I think he is wrong in this. The Prime Minister's position on nationalism, as I understand it and as I think we in the Liberal party understand it, does not deny that nationalism can be a creative and progressive force. What the Prime Minister does deny is that every nation, every people, must be sovereign. He asserts, and our own history proves him right, that different peoples can live in the same state and in the same homeland, and he asserts that our own federal state has adapted to this great and enriching end. Let me quote the Prime Minister in an article entitled "Le Fédéralisme et la société canadienne française":

[Translation]

What is regressive is not the idea of a nation, but the concept that a nation must of necessity be sovereign.

[English]

That is his position on nationalism. To continue the Canadian federal state as a Canadian reality, we do have to refashion some of the Terms of Union as urgently as we must solve our economic problems. Solving economic problems alone will not do it. After all, the movement of independence grew over the past 15 years in Canada during one of the periods of our greatest economic growth and development. It grew in good times and in poor economic times. Restoring economic growth, beating inflation, building new homes and curing unemployment will indeed remove causes of discontent and divisiveness. But more fundamental causes are pushing us around that historic corner. It is a turn we can negotiate successfully provided we face the basic issue square on—I do not say that the leader of the New Democratic Party does not face it—and not run after every traditional or standard-type issue in front of us.

In his speech yesterday, the Prime Minister noted that in the 20 years between 1951 and 1971 the real income of Canadians more than doubled; that is, that after considering inflation and taxes, the standard of living, of purchasing power, or however we express it, real income doubled. The point I want to make is that we can do it all over again. It is well within our potential, but not under present industrial policies. We do not yet have the full policy framework to do this all over again, nor the best type of industrial organization to do it, and it is these questions I should now like to address.

The Canadian industry, and more especially the manufacturing sector, is confronting a serious problem more alarming and persistent than an economic cycle and more disturbing than the high rates of inflation and unemployment contributing to its worsening. I am referring to that deep and long-term erosion of forces, erosion which will not be checked by controls over the inflation rate, nor by the thorough development of resources, nor by the construction of a pipeline, nor by launching extensive projects in the field of energy, nor by the higher growth of our service industries which is already quite considerable. That weakening is translated by a constant decrease in our competitive power at the international level due to the high cost of goods, a lack of productivity—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said so in his speech yesterday—and also on account of an overly great reliance on technique. This decline is reflected in a constant flagging on the internal market as far as the products derived from both current and advanced technologies are concerned.

We shall not be able to solve the fundamental problems by imposing price and wage controls, by creating new budgetary incentives or reducing the value of our dollar, although these measures may conceal the deep tendencies. In the present economic situation, we cannot admit this downward trend in the industrial sector. In the coming months, we shall have to establish an economic strategy which will start the transfer of the major part of the manufacturing industry in Canada to a more efficient technical base. Only the improvement of this base will enable us to continue and to win the fight to increase our productivity and to deal with the rising costs while maintaining our competitiveness on world markets.

• (1552)

[English]

The Science Council of Canada concludes that Canadian manufacturing is in a cul-de-sac. It is in relative long-term decline. It is in a phase of de-industrialization. A committee of this parliament's Senate found that the "general weakness" of Canadian manufacturing has reached "crisis proportions". I would like to propose to my colleagues in the House some elements of an industrial strategy, looking at these issues over the next decade. First, the government and the country must set themselves the goal of an expanded manufacturing sector, viable in the world's economy. I do not think we have that goal today. This means a reversal of present industrial weakness and decline.

It is for the national government to set out within the year a policy framework to support such a commitment. This will require consultations with the provinces, labour organizations and business as urgent and as far-reaching as those under way with respect to the political situation of the country.

In Canada we devote a smaller share of our total economic activity to manufacturing than any other industrialized country. Yet there is little doubt that the potential in Canada for improving productivity by expanded trade in manufactured goods is unsurpassed by any other industrial country. The policy framework and industrial reorganization to achieve this and to set us on that path of doubling our real incomes over the next two decades has yet to be developed by governments together with the main economic partners.

Second, we have to select industrial sectors with the promise of life in them, and concentrate on them. This is not to neglect the other sectors, but it is to concentrate and push forward in selected ones. The most evident ones are transportation, communications, telecommunications, new oceanic industries, resource processing, petrochemicals, plastics and energy, to mention the most evident.

How do we ensure the emergence of internationally competitive units within these industries? Often this will require amalgamations or consortium arrangements, as is happening in the white goods industry. It will require concentration on fewer products and lines. It will mean specialization for the benefit of longer production lines. These are not unfamiliar goals. The point I am making is that the policy framework is not conducive to their realization in the near-term. To encourage this kind of reorganization, government policy must ensure Canadian processors and workers a sufficiently large share of our domestic market in chosen sectors so as to provide the base load for optimum scale production and for specialized production.

An assured market is, moreover, the springboard for expanded trade. In turn, expanded trade reassures occupation of the domestic market. Above all, large-scale specialization based first and foremost on the domestic market is the foundation for research and development and for the resulting engineering of product innovations which alone enables firms to stay competitive.

The home market is crucial, yet it is being eroded. A variety of policies will be necessary. Let me illustrate the variety. In textile fibres, where scale is important, retained tariffs and vigorous anti-dumping action will be one component of appropriate policy. In apparel, where scale is not important but low-cost imports are, quotas are the only way. For selected industries or sectors of industry, tariffs should be retained and related to minimum threshold size or base load as one part of over-all industrial policies.

A policy objective, therefore, for Canadian policy-makers and trade negotiators is to ensure that greater home market interaction and complementarity between and within industries in Canada is supported in accord with industrial strategies by selective tariffs and quotas. Protection or support should reduce after a reasonable transition and development period.

Assuring the home market for Canadian producers requires recognition that the industrial process is made up of many interdependent links from raw material to the finished product. This means that some intermediate stages in manufacturing processes, for example plastics producers, makers of components for other enterprises, constitute the crucial domestic market for raw material producers. In turn, such intermediate products need further home market outlets in the form of derivative or other products. Good examples are found throughout the manufacturing sector and are easily illustrated in the petrochemical industry, where large-scale production of basic materials requires domestic markets for base loads, which in turn require further home markets for processing derivatives—for example, ethane, ethylene, polyethylene, polyvinyl chloride.

These linkages and interdependencies throughout the home market are often denied in Canada by the impact of U.S.A. tariffs escalating against the export of such processed intermediate products surplus to the Canadian market. European and Japanese tariffs have a similar impact on Canadian industrial expansion.

A "Buy Canada Act" should be adopted for a transition period of at least ten years, to require in some instances, and encourage in others, the purchase by governments of Canadian products. The industrial policy purpose here is to collect the market or aggregate it in chosen sectors and within criteria to ensure optimum scale and specialization, thus supporting employment and providing the base for product innovation. Such an act should be based on federal-provincial agreement in order to include, for example, provincial hydro systems, and be patterned on the present policies of the U.S.A., Great Britain, Switzerland, Japan and others. This is an objectionable, though necessary, non-tariff barrier designed to support the transition period during which the strategic goal is an expanded, technically efficient, innovative and internationally competitive manufacturing sector.

A further major policy objective for us should be to encourage more Canadian multinationals, like the success stories represented by Massey-Ferguson, ATCO Industries, Northern Telecom, Noranda, Polysar, McCain Foods, Wajax Industries, Dominion Road Machinery and Electrolyser Corporation. What is the point of encouraging Canadian-based multinationals? It is partly to attain scale, partly for the broad base upon which to specialize production by plant and by country, and partly to expand production through trade based on this successful form of industrial organization.

The most important lesson to be learned from these Canadian multinationals is that they do their research and development and their resulting engineering for product innovation here in Canada. In fact, all multinationals reserve their principal research and development and product innovation for the home country, thus giving the parent company a world edge in new products as well as weight and influence in determining world market shares for its subsidiaries. On the other hand, subsidiaries are starved of technological development capability and, like much of Canadian industry, become trapped in the cul-de-sac of technological dependency at the very time when domestic ability in product innovation turns the key to international competitiveness. The source of success of Canadian multinationals is their Canadian-based capacity to innovate.

The recent Senate hearings make this point in case after case. ATCO, for example, established a new world industry for remote region housing and other buildings during what Ron Southern calls "a great innovative period" in that company. Northern Telecom became a world leader in telecommunications technology and innovative manufacturing based on Canadian research and development when court action in the United States forced it to separate from its U.S. parent and sink or swim in Canada.

Massey-Ferguson lead the world as the result of innovations in the design and construction of combine harvesters; the Canadian steel companies lead North America through innovations based on their domestic research, development and engineering. Dominion Road Machinery of Goderich, a Canadian-owned firm, is the world leader in motor road graders, based on its own research and development, on its innovations in design and manufacturing and on strict product specialization. All do not merit roses. The subsidiaries of a few foreign multinationals in Canada do well, but most do not because of dependency on parent company technology. This weakens Canadian capacity.

The testimony is clear. It takes size, export markets and, above all, an assured sizeable domestic market to succeed. But it is the related research and development and the entrepreneurial innovation that is central to the whole industrial process in today's conditions. The critical weakness in much of Canadian manufacturing is its lack of capacity to innovate. The branch plants of foreign parents are useless so far as innovation goes. The more developed subsidiaries of foreign parents have mixed records. Canadian strategy must, therefore, promote Canadian-based multinationals in order to ensure a home base for research and development and for innovation. Without this, general incentives for research and development will prove ineffective.

Encouraging multinationals really means encouraging Canadian companies to establish their own subsidiary assembly, processing and manufacturing plants in foreign trade areas as well as joint ventures with companies in host countries while retaining research, development and product innovation in Canada. Such foreign subsidiary operations lead to major benefits to the Canadian home market in terms of components shipped to subsidiaries abroad or in additional head office employment, as well as the attraction of top managerial talent and the valuable research, development and innovation advantages. Multinational activity fosters specialization and, indeed, obliges innovation, thus ensuring the maintenance of position in the home market and expanded opportunities in foreign markets.

New guidelines should be issued through the Foreign Investment Review Agency to align its decisions with the industrial policy objective of building Canadian-owned and controlled firms in chosen sectors with the capability to attain size, specialization and innovation.

A key element of industrial strategy is the adoption of policies for further processing as far as the market permits, and even further for transitional periods when strategic goals are being pursued. For example, there is further scope for the manufacture and export of fabricated metal products. Asbestos processing has become a major objective of Quebec industrial policy. Food and other agricultural products' processing is an objective of western Canada, as is the further processing of petrochemicals, uranium, heavy oil and forest products. In the Atlantic area, the processing of fish, agricultural products and forest products is central to the objectives being fostered, as is the development of new marine industries to take advantage of the 200-mile economic zone.

Significant impediments to processing are United States, Japanese and European tariffs as they escalate against each further stage of processing. Nevertheless, we should set the processing goal in front and centre and adapt our trade initiatives, freight rate policies, regional development policies, domestic market shares and other policies to reach the goal.

Another element of strategy is to ask parliament for a special small business act to highlight and focus the policy commitment to serve the needs of the small owner-managed sector. The act would consolidate existing programs and generate a coherent set of policies ranging, for example, from manpower training and management training to small business consortia, new venture formation, a fair share of procurement for small independent firms through set-aside programs, and access to financing. The sector singled out here is composed of small and medium sized but independent business firms formally represented by a single plant. This sector is usually more labour-intensive than capital or energy-intensive. It is often community-oriented, or serves regional markets. Many play a substantial role as subcontractors to large firms. They cover some 95 per cent of all businesses in Canada and are estimated to provide over one-half of all Canadian jobs. Their productivity, cost competitiveness and capacity to innovate are important to trade and to import replacement.

The expansion of these firms and of this sector is a valid objective of good social and community policy, of good regional development policy, as well as an offset to the industrial concentration necessary in other sectors. Moreover, their healthy development is a necessary condition for an industrial policy that also fosters larger scale, more specialized and competitive firms. The two go together; and the small owner-managed sector with employees up to, say, 200 to 300 persons, must be brought in from the periphery of policy to its very centre.

I do not have time here to discuss the role within an industrial strategy of a ventures capital corporation, of measures for providing incentives and financial assistance to private inventors, or the establishment within the public service of the principle of fair comparison with selected outside employers as the guiding principle for public service collective bargaining. But what I am suggesting is that in such revised industrial policies as I have sketched here will be found important keys to a more unified country.

Present industrial policies are changing too slowly to relieve an accumulated frustration with blocked economic development in most of Canada's six economic regions. Inter-regional tensions are unnecessarily high and persisting. Stronger inter-regional ties are not only attainable through a revised framework of industrial policies with obvious benefits to national unity; these ties or linkages are the very foundation for industrial development advantageous to all. An important point to recognize is that Ontario and Quebec, forming the industrial heartland of Canada, are in serious long-term economic difficulties. In Ontario this is only now becoming apparent. The two provinces have entered a period of relative weakness and decline—

● (1612)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue if he has the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. O'Connell: I thank my hon. colleagues for allowing me to continue. I should reach my conclusion in approximately two minutes. These two provinces have entered a period of relative industrial weakness and decline, particularly evident in many sectors of manufacturing. To the extent that weakness and decline have set in, and to the extent that the present policy framework will not lead to a transition to a more technically efficient and internationally competitive industry, then grave implications arise for national unity. Such an uncorrected trend, if prolonged, could result, on the one hand, in less willingness to share with other regions through equalization or other disparity related programs and, on the other hand, in greater pressures from strong provinces for a more decentralized federal system so they can better look after their own economic interests as they see them.

The problems of the industrial base in Ontario and Quebec mean that this economic region, too, as well as all the other regions, now has good reason and all have joint economic cause to come together again, as they did 110 years ago, with their joint and several difficulties, to reassess together their economic interdependence and to find in redesigned national policies a path out of the cul-de-sac in which most now seem to be caught.

The central thesis of my remarks, then, is that the remaking of the regional economic framework of this country ranks in stature with the remodelling of its political constitution. This will require that same generosity of spirit to which the Prime Minister called our attention again yesterday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF PRESIDENT OF REPUBLIC OF GABON

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Before recognizing another hon. member, and undoubtedly with leave of all hon. members, I have the honour and the pleasure to call attention to the presence in our gallery of the President of the Republic of Gabon, His Excellency El Hadj Omar Bongo.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dennis Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, as is traditional, it is my pleasure to congratulate the mover (Mr. Dawson), and the seconder (Mr. Wood), of the Speech from the Throne and their replies to Her Majesty. They did so with a lot more aplomb and self-confidence in their maiden speeches than I did in mine. I congratulate them accordingly. Also, I should like to congratulate the speaker who preceded me, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: I have always enjoyed his contributions to debates in this chamber and have found them very erudite and worth while. Given the paucity of talent in the cabinet, it has always struck me as strange that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has kept him out of the Privy Council since his election in 1974.

An hon. Member: He agrees.

Mr. Andre: I should like to direct a few initial remarks to the comments of the hon. member for Scarborough East. I am pleased to learn that he has read the very excellent report of the Science Council dealing with Canada's manufacturing industry. He has clearly adopted many of its observations and recommendations as his own. I presume that within the workings of the Liberal party there will be an opportunity to communicate those observations to some who are in a position to make decisions.

I hope the hon. member will not mind if I remind the House that during the 1972 election campaign the then minister of industry, trade and commerce of the Liberal government promised a new industrial strategy for Canada. That was one of the election promises. He said that this was being worked on and would be revealed to the nation soon after as the policy framework which would deliver us to the new utopia.

When the House returned, after considerable questioning by those of us on this side, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was moved to indicate that while it was too much to expect an all-encompassing industrial strategy, they were working on a sector plan which would soon be revealed. Further questioning revealed that if the sector plan was coming, it would be a long time coming. Subsequent ministers of industry, trade and commerce have dropped the language entirely from their statements and comments. It was not until the Science Council's report that the subject was raised again. It is far more vital now than it was in 1972 when it was first announced.

I should like to deal briefly with some of the aspects of an industrial strategy. Basically, I agree with the points raised by the hon. member, but he could have raised a few more. For some time he dwelt on the question of Canadian multinationals being important to the development of an indigenous Canadian innovative capacity in research and development. He is absolutely right in that sense, but that is only a part of the problem. As was diagnosed in 1970 by the special Senate Committee on Science and Technology, Canada spends less on industrial research and development in science technology than any other western industrialized nation. The Canadian government supports research and development less than any other western industrialized nation. Out of the research it supports, it spends more on basic research, rather than applied or applicable research, than any western industrialized nation.

Whereas the hon. member has properly identified one problem, he did not get to the root of the problem, which is the commitment of this government to the value of science and technology as an important ingredient in our future industrial development. This has been articulated in huge volumes of studies and analyses by virtually every economic group within the country that has looked at this problem. The failure of this government to respond positively to these recommendations which have been coming forward in great volume since 1970 is one of the major reasons we are in such a difficult position today.

The hon. member could have added to his list of points, more direct incentives for Canadians to invest in the manufacturing sector. As it is now, there are very few investors, if any, who are interested in pursuing investment in this area. Something direct has to be done by way of tax incentives. Something must be done to improve the labour relations atmosphere in the country. Investors are faced with conflicting opportunities for investment in capital-intensive industries or labour-intensive industries. They opt for the capital more often than not, even with a lesser return, in order not to put up with the hassle which comes with trying to manage a labour-intensive business in today's atmosphere.

Also, something which should be an aspect of industrial strategy is simply to reduce the burden of paperwork and bureaucratic hassle which falls upon the industrial community. Several years ago the Financial Post carried out a survey of Canadian industrial leaders and came to the conclusion that something like 35 per cent of executive time in Canadian business was spent dealing with government-initiated requests, and so on. That represents a tremendous waste of high-priced talent and a tremendous cost of doing business. Also, it is a tremendous disincentive to industrial activity. It should be removed.

Before getting on to major area that I wanted to speak about, I compliment the hon. member on his address. His eight-point program could be augmented by the three or four points which I have mentioned. I might re-emphasize that it is not this chamber which needs the education, so much as his own colleagues within the Liberal government, since they have been promising an industrial strategy for many years and they seem to bring it out only at election time and when they need that sort of support.

This is the fifth throne speech I have listened to since my election in 1972, and it is the first one I have heard delivered by the monarch. With due respect to Her Majesty, let me say that it was the most fatuous of the five throne speeches I have heard. Her Majesty—and I am sure she is too gracious a lady to ever admit it—must have been a little puzzled at having been brought all this distance to read that empty speech. I am sure the people of Canada expected a little more. Douglas Fisher, in a column in the Toronto Sun issue of Wednesday, October 19, described it as follows:

> Throne speech a giant yawn of banal observations.

He went on to say:

> In 20 years of scanning federal speeches from the throne, I can't remember one that matches this year's in slightness of content or in the flood of banal observations; 3,600 words in 49 paragraphs which we all will mercifully forget tomorrow.

Ronald Anderson, writing in the Globe and Mail issue of Thursday, October 20, describes the throne speech as follows:

> As an agenda for action, however, the speech is more than customarily deficient. It deals almost exclusively in broad generalities and pious hopes. The government has used the speech from the throne as a means for giving itself a royal pat on the back, rather than as a vehicle for outlining the way in which it proposes to deal with the problems facing the country. The elegant prose fails to conceal the muddled thinking and the policy vacuum that exists in Ottawa.

These are some of the things that have been said. Traditionally, the throne speech is the opportunity and the occasion upon which the government, Her Majesty's ministers, outline to the House of Commons the government's intentions for the coming session. It declares what it has in mind by way of legislation, its program of action for the coming year. Given the thrashing that a lot of our traditions have suffered under this government, it is not surprising to see this tradition of the throne speech disappear and to see us end up with the throne speech of this year which, as Douglas Fisher described it, was full of banal generalities, and a giant yawn.

There are two possible explanations for this dull, bland and banal throne speech. The first is that we have a tired, worn-out, weak government which has no plan of action and which had nothing that it could put into the throne speech by way of a program. In this case, those who subscribe to this view, I presume, would include the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who described this as the worst cabinet in 30 years. Certainly, I think the evidence would indicate that this explanation is most likely. However, let me say in fairness that there is a second possibility. That is the explanation given by the Liberal apologists who state that the Machiavellian gurus in the bowels of the PMO and the PCO decided that they did not want to waste the publicity that comes from giving the good stuff to Her Majesty, and will save the meat for the Prime Minister and other cabinet ministers, so as to maximize the public exposure and publicity that comes from it.

Anyone who sat here, or dozed through the Prime Minister's speech yesterday realized that that theory does not stand up to close examination, because the speech of the Prime Minister was easily as banal and fatuous as was the throne speech the day before. In fact, in terms of new initiatives being announced, there were only two possible items of news within the Prime Minister's very lengthy speech: one which was stolen, as the Prime Minister admitted, from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), which dealt with an additional $150 million for job creation—I expect we will get a rerun of that tonight—and the second which dealt with the proposed referendum. As was clearly indicated in the question period this afternoon, that was a last-minute addition which the Prime Minister had not cleared through cabinet, and indeed a previous committee of the cabinet had discarded the idea; but presumably the gurus in the bowels of the PMO, after observing the reaction to the throne speech, thought the Prime Minister had to have something to say, so this was dug up and thrown in.

That is tragic, because the problems which the Prime Minister spoke about in his speech are real. What the country needs now is leadership, not an election lecture. But a lecture is what we got, a long lecture on the problems of the country with no solutions offered whatsoever, no recognition of who caused the problems.

There is a third possible explanation for the banal throne speech, and it also comes from the Liberal apologists. Basically, it is the thesis which suggests the problems are so horrendous that no solution is possible; that if there were a possible solution, then the geniuses in the Liberal cabinet would have discovered it and would have expressed it in the throne speech. That is the school of thought articulated by W. A. Wilson, among others. It is simply hogwash, because there are solutions to the problems—excellent solutions.

Part of the solution to the difficulties within the manufacturing sector was expressed earlier this afternoon by a member supporting the government. All that is required is some leadership from the government and from the Prime Minister and the cabinet to examine the variety of approaches and different solutions available to these problems and to select those which are best, given the circumstances. All that is needed is that that kind of leadership be given, that an intention be declared to pursue certain courses of action, to present them in the throne speech and then to submit them for debate here in the House. That is the kind of leadership that is desperately needed today, because at the basis of all the complaints, frustrations and difficulties which exist in the economy is a real desire for leadership and for a sense of direction. Canadians would like to know that somebody is in charge, that somebody is concerned, that somebody is taking action to try to get this country turned around. There is no evidence of that in this government. If it is not to come from the federal government, pray tell us where is it to come from?

Possible solutions to the economic problems of this country and avenues for government action have been articulated by my leader. They will be articulated by other hon. members speaking on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party. They have been articulated by scores of business writers in the nation's media, and by experts within various economic organizations. This morning's Ottawa Today contains a column by Carol Goar which gives the advice of several recognized experts, economists in Canada, in terms of action the federal government should be taking. There is ample advice, if the government would simply assume its responsibility and heed it.

Another cause of our weak economic position is government spending. In this regard, I think the Prime Minister has at least partially recognized that the spending of his government is at the root of the problems the economy of Canada is facing today. At page 33 of Hansard for Wednesday, October 19, the Prime Minister is reported to have said:

> If it is true that our present malaise comes from living beyond our means as a nation, the remedy should be rather simple. It should be to live within our means. Here, again, I am saying that to live within our means as a nation we must produce more if we want to continue to consume as much. I know that our government and other governments in Canada have made the mistake, as I said earlier, of trying to give too much to the Canadian people by way of social benefits, without Canadians being prepared to pay for them in terms of slowing the increase in their real gains.

As I indicated, that is a partial admission of the fact that the spending habits of this government over the last decade are very much at the root of the problems this country is facing today. The Prime Minister went on to say that his President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) has grasped the seriousness of the situation and is trying to deal with it. Well, there is precious little evidence to indicate that that is the case.

I think it is worth while—and I would like to ask the indulgence of the House to do this—to deal in some detail with the question of government spending, why we have reached the level of spending we have reached today, of some $45 billion per annum, and what can be done and should be done in order to change this situation. We must reduce the tremendous take of government from the people of Canada and leave within the pockets of Canadian taxpayers more of the money they earn, so that they might pursue the activities which are necessary to get the economy rolling again.

It has to be admitted that there are tremendous pressures on governments to spend. There is no question that governments are under constant pressure from this group and that group, and from this region and that region to spend more and more. However, that is the price of leadership. Governments must resist and make reasonable decisions in the face of these pressures. That is what governments are supposed to do. While I admit that there are those pressures on governments, I also submit that it is the responsibility of government to deal with them and not to submit to them automatically.

The second reason is that the revenue-producing system used in Canada has a high degree of elasticity built into it. There is an automatic increase in government take as the economy grows, even though there is no increase in taxes. The government take increases faster than the economy as a whole, so the government is in such a position that if the economy grows, its revenues grow at a much faster rate; therefore, it has additional revenues which it can, and does, spend.

A third very important reason that government spending has increased is inflation itself. Here I do not restrict myself to talking about the increased cost of the services and products governments must buy; I refer to the increased revenues which accrue to governments as a result of inflation. Governments have a vested interest in inflation. In fact, given today's taxation structure, if the economy were to increase by zero per cent in terms of real growth, but inflation were to increase by 10 per cent, government revenues would increase by 16 per cent.

Governments get an automatic, real increase in revenue from taxes taken from our pockets as a result of inflation, without any growth in the economy at all. That could, and should, be changed. That inflationary factor should be removed from the total taxation system. Governments have a right, a need and an obligation to tax, but it should be a real tax which is out in the open and imposed with the knowledge of the people. We should not have the sneaky kind of taxation which governments impose as a result of inflation.

It must be admitted that it is politically easier to spend than to save or be thrifty—and this government is well known for its willingness to take the politically easier path. In looking at his career or at his political credentials, each minister likes to point to the great, multi-billion dollar programs he has introduced during his reign in whatever department. That is a political reality. I suppose we have to live with that, but it should be resisted by a responsible government.

The fifth reason for high government spending is the fact that the federal government can print money. This privilege is not open to many other people. If people in the private sector are caught at it, they are thrown into jail. However, it is something the government does, and has done with incredible frequency over the last few years. This is another type of sneaky taxation. As the government goes to the Bank of Canada to sell its bonds, for which it is paid in freshly printed notes, it debases the currency we carry in our pockets. In other words, the government taxes us again in another sneaky way.

A sixth reason for increased government spending is the poor example set by this cabinet, and by the Prime Minister in particular. How can one, with a straight face, try to impress upon the civil service the necessity of conserving, being thrifty and looking after each penny, when ministers fly all over the country—sometimes for business and sometimes for pleasure—running up horrendous transportation bills? The Prime Minister spent several hundred thousand dollars to renovate and improve 24 Sussex Drive. Ministers spend tens of thousands of dollars to decorate their offices. They put up wallpaper worth extraordinary amounts of money per yard and then tear it down because the colours clash a little with the couches they choose. These things have a very important, over-all effect on the mentality which exists within government circles. It is impossible and impractical to expect people to operate under a system which is basically, "Do what I say; don't do what I do. Do what I tell you to do; don't follow my example". Yet that is what this government has been practising, and it has much to do with the attitude which has existed within governments, the attitude of spend, spend, spend.

The seventh reason for the incredible increase in government spending has to do with the poor administration of the trust that the cabinet, and particularly the President of the Treasury Board, is supposed to administer. I will not go into detail here except to repeat just one phrase from the report of the Auditor General of last November. It reads as follows:

> Based on the study of the systems of departments, agencies and Crown corporations audited by the Auditor General, financial management and control in the government of Canada is grossly inadequate. Furthermore, it is likely to remain so until the government takes strong, appropriate and effective measures to rectify this critically serious situation.

If words like "critically serious situation" appeared in the audit of a corporation in the private sector, they would cause that corporation to be de-listed immediately from any public stock exchange, because if that did not take place the stock would fall through the floor and would cause the dismissal of at least the president and the chief financial officer, if not a call by the shareholders for the dismissal of the entire board of directors. Yet we have this kind of statement from the Auditor General of Canada about the people who are spending $45 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money in a haphazard, shoddy manner.

What has the government done about those recommandations? One of the key recommmendations of the Auditor General was the establishment of the position of comptroller general. At first the President of the Treasury Board made many pious statements about this proposal conflicting with ministerial responsibility, and so forth. However, seeing that there was a basis to this recommendation, the President of the Treasury Board finally conceded that a comptroller general should be appointed. That was on April 25 of this year. On May 30, in answer to a question in the House, the minister said he was actively searching for a comptroller general and expected to appoint one soon. It is now October 20, more than 11 months since the Auditor General first made that recommendation.

We have no comptroller general and we have no evidence that any changes have been made within Treasury Board or any other department or agency of government to implement these recommendations of the Auditor General. As far as we know, the government's financial management is as shoddy, improper and inadequate as it was a year ago when the Auditor General first reported on this matter. That is absolutely intolerable.

The eighth reason government spending has increased so fast is sheer deceit on the part of the government. I will give an example of what I mean. On February 19, 1975, the then president of the treasury board, in introducing the main estimates for 1975-76, said that $28.24 billion was only an 11 per cent increase over the previous year. He claimed it was a very modest increase. We pointed out that the change between the main estimates, year to year, was 30 per cent. He said that was not a fair comparison. The people of Canada were told by the minister, through the media, that the government was being very careful in holding government spending down to an 11 per cent increase, when the supplementary estimates for the following year showed that the increase was actually 27 per cent.

Precisely the same thing happened the year before and the year after—and the same thing is happening now. This is outright deceit on the part of the government. They are apparently unwilling to tell the people of Canada honestly, how much of their income is being spent and by how much it has increased over previous years.

In the spring of this year, for example, when new estimates were introduced, the government boasted that there was only a 7 per cent increase over the previous year. The former auditor general of Canada, Maxwell Henderson, then pointed out what the president of the treasury board failed to admit; that in fact a great deal of this so-called reduction in government spending was merely a transfer of responsibility to the provinces, and that when these factors were taken into account the rise in spending was closer to 10 per cent than 7 per cent.

If the government would correct its actions in these eight areas, Mr. Speaker—and in particular the last one—to be more honest with the people of Canada, that would go a long way toward controlling government spending. As the Prime Minister indicated, lack of such control is at the root of many of our economic problems. Certainly, that question must be addressed if we are to solve the over-all economic problems which exist in the country.

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I hope I have your indulgence to say a few words of a personal nature. You well know, Mr. Speaker, that since early May I have been absent from the House due to illness. During that illness I had much time for reflection. So often during that reflection the bonds and friendships made in this House came to my mind, and I want to say that any illness a member suffers is, in one way, an advantage. It gives one an opportunity to renew perspectives and reflect upon the friendships formed in this House with other members, irrespective of their political persuasion. It is at such times we realize how deeply are those bonds of friendship which we form, and how much they mean to us. With your permission, I should like to thank my colleagues for their concern about my health, for their kind words, and certainly for their prayers. All of these were helpful, very comforting and satisfying to me.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roy (Timmins): I would be remiss if I did not include my constituents in my thanks. At such a time their sympathy and concern for their member of parliament is very much appreciated—whatever they may think of him at other times.

Referring now to the Speech from the Throne, I am very pleased that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government concentrated on the two major areas which present problems to Canada at the present time—the economy and national unity. I think we would be neglecting our duty, and quite possibly derelict in our duty, if we spent too much time on other issues in this session. Unless we spend most, or all, of our time on these two issues I think we will have failed the constituents we represent here.

There was substantial mention of energy in the Speech from the Throne, but in my view energy is just one element of the economic problems of this country and of the world. We all recall that the energy problem precipitated the crisis in world economies that we see today. I am not a professional economist, Mr. Speaker, but I know that, historically, trade was originally done by barter. Goods were exchanged by one country or one group with another country or group. As trade expanded, a better method of exchange was needed, so goods were bartered for hard currency—gold coins and silver. As trade expanded further, the currency exchanges were too bulky and inefficient, so there came about simple transfers on books of account of goods from one country to another.

This vehicle of currency for international trade became so important that it was actually more important than the exchanged goods. Indeed, in today's international trade there are countries which cannot operate at capacity or cannot sell their goods because the countries which need those goods do not have the funds, credit, or debt-creation capacity to buy the goods. The currency vehicle has thus become more important than the goods themselves, to the point that we now have fantasy currencies. The special drawing rights are what I term fantasy currency, because their only backing is agreement between countries that these special drawing rights are acceptable for trade. In the last 10 to 20 years trade has expanded to the degree that even these special drawing rights do not permit the reasonable exchange of goods or the expansion of trade between countries, so we are looking for new structures. Hopefully, heads of governments and people charged with this responsibility will find a new way of permitting the expansion of trade between countries.

In the area of international trade, no country is more vulnerable than ours because of the large volume of goods we produce and export. Indeed, no country can find itself so easily in difficulty because of world trade crises or slowdowns in world economy. For that reason, I think the throne speech pointed out that there must be structural adjustments, especially in the international economy. But this, I am sure, will reflect on adjustments that will be necessary within the internal economies of countries such as ours. I think the throne speech intimates that to make possible these structural adjustments, to make the people accept the consequences of these adjustments, there must be a change in attitude, one that would say that the people of Canada should take less and sacrifice more, rather than expect and demand more.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I want to present to the government of Canada for its consideration, and I hope eventual implementation, a practical proposal which would make it less difficult to accept those changes, a proposal that would make it more easily acceptable to take less, to make more sacrifices. I am asking the government to consider a massive "Buy Canadian" campaign. I think that if we could change the attitude of the Canadian people by making a special effort to encourage the purchase of Canadian goods which they need, instead of buying imported goods we would be well on our way to regaining the economic strength that we had in the past ten years.

I do not mean that Canadians should change what they purchase. If a person needs a refrigerator, he needs a refrigerator. However, the country of origin where the refrigerator is produced has a great deal of significance for the Canadian economy. Some people might say that it costs more to buy Canadian, and in some instances it might, Mr. Speaker. But, surely, the cost to Canadians is not simply the price tag that is put upon an article in a merchant's shop. Surely, the cost of unemployment at the present time, the cost of our presently stagnating economy, is reflected in the cost of that article in the store. So if we can eliminate unemployment and a stagnating economy, we can also eliminate the difficulty in purchasing Canadian goods as compared to imported goods.

The beauty of buying Canadian goods is that it has a double effect. If someone buys a $100 article imported from a foreign country, $100 Canadian goes to that foreign country. But if that person buys a similar item which is produced in Canada, he is putting his $100 into the Canadian economy. So in that respect, by buying Canadian instead of an import he is really spending $200 in Canadian funds rather than $100. How quickly we would turn around the imbalance or the deficit in trade which the Prime Minister spoke of yesterday; I refer to the 15 per cent imbalance between Canadian production and Canadian consumption. I feel this is certainly a good way to start completely turning around that imbalance.

Some say that this would not be fair to other countries. Surely, Canadians have a right to exercise their own judgment as to what type of product they purchase, whether it be locally produced or not. Surely, when a Canadian buys a car he has the right—I would say, the responsibility—to ensure that that car is built in Canada and not in a foreign country. When he buys a can of tomatoes he should have the right and responsibility, if he wants to be helpful to the Canadian economy, to make sure they are Canadian tomatoes and not some foreign product. If he needs a piece of furniture, he has the right, in his judgment, to buy a Canadian piece of furniture rather than an imported piece of furniture.

Some people might say that this is not the way to help the Third World countries. I have no intention of recommending to the government that we stop helping the Third World countries. Surely, the bulk of our imports, possibly in the nature of 80 per cent or 85 per cent, come not from Third World countries but from countries whose economies are presently as strong as, or even stronger, than our own. So there is no argument in that respect. How can we possibly continue to help the Third World countries if our own economy is stagnant and deteriorating? We need a strong economy to provide the funds that are necessary to help these Third World countries. The economies of West Germany, the United States and Japan, for example, are strong. When the slowdowns are finished, because those countries have their own large internal markets they produce goods for their own internal markets. The percentage of their exports compared to production, while substantial, in absolute figures is way below that of Canada.

In Canada we have the reverse situation. We do not produce for our own internal market. We import too many products for our own internal needs. Our exports are 25 per cent of our production, the highest in the world. Our imports are also, percentagewise, the highest in the world. Not only are they the highest in the world, but sometimes they are quite substantially greater than our exports. So in this situation the benefits we derive, in terms of our standard of living, from our exports are neutralized, and even to some degree reduced, by the substantially greater imports which are brought into Canada.

My "Buy Canadian" proposal would have the reverse effect, Mr. Speaker. Surely, exporting is necessary. But the reduction of the number of imported goods, the buying of our own goods in Canada for our own needs, is essential to our own survival. So again I implore the government to consider instituting a program to encourage Canadians to buy Canadian goods at any time this is possible.

There are many methods of doing this. I do not propose to give the details of how it should be done today, Mr. Speaker, but it is surely easy to find methods of doing this. For instance, what is wrong with having large posters in every purchasing agent's office in Canada, reminding him that he should be looking for Canadian goods rather than imported goods? What is wrong with having the same type of posters in stores, shopping centres and supermarkets all over Canada so as to encourage and to influence Canadians to look for Canadian goods on the shelves? What is wrong with having clear identification of Canadian goods, and by advertising encourage the purchase of those goods? What is wrong with using large government advertising budgets for such a program? Much of the advertising budget provided Canadians today by the government is, in the opinion of many people, of very little use. I suggest it could be very much more wisely used by encouraging Canadians to buy Canadian goods.

What is wrong with the Canadian government making a special effort to purchase Canadian goods? I do not want to lay the blame on anyone, certainly not on the Chair or the Chair's officers, but when I came into the House of Commons on Monday I saw that the microphones for the new TV system in the House were manufactured in Austria, and that the television sets in the lobbies were from Japan.

I have no axe to grind with regard to the Austrian product on my desk or the Japanese products in the lobby. However, I am sure we have the electronic technology in Canada to put together a television system for the House of Commons that is made by Canadians for Canadians. I thought I should mention that.

It would be very easy for the government to form some sort of body constituted of merchants and consumers to formulate and put into practice a policy which will encourage Canadians to buy Canadian.

● (1703)

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to miss this opportunity to say a few words about that second important problem, not because it rates second rank in importance, but because there are two problems. Canada is experiencing at present a problem of national unity. This problem exists also in my constituency which has 42 per cent of French-speaking inhabitants. We can understand the anxiety of those people concerning the PQ government and the issue of independence. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I adhere to the Prime Minister's statement and I rely on him. In my opinion, there is no other individual in Canada who has a better idea of what Canada should be. I know or I have met no one else before or since I was elected to this House who wields as much skill or ability to solve that serious problem as the Prime Minister.

When I hear the speeches delivered in the House and note the positions taken by the opposition leaders, without wanting to criticize them, I wonder how those people can have such inaccurate ideas and be so badly informed about Quebec and Quebecers. I therefore intend to do the utmost to support the Prime Minister in his efforts. I had already begun to do so in April, but due to illness, I had to slow down a bit. However, I intend to continue in that direction since my health has improved.

There are two small things I would like to mention today. First, I would like to address the people of Quebec and particularly the PQ government leaders. I would like to ask them—and I appreciate they might not be pleased with or pay any attention to my suggestion—but I would like to ask them—please refrain from distorting facts about French Canadians outside Quebec. I know a little about that because I am of French expression and I come from a French community in Ontario.

To hear Premier Lévesque, other ministers and PQ sympathizers in the province of Quebec, it looks as if we were totally oppressed people, whose rights are openly encroached upon, who have major and unsolvable problems in the province of Ontario. I want to make it clear to the people of Quebec and mainly to those in the government of Quebec that it is totally erroneous. I have good reasons to believe that in some communities where the number of French Canadians is very small, they might not enjoy all the rights they are entitled to. However, the great majority of French Canadians outside Quebec live in areas like mine, Timmins, like Hearst, Sudbury, Ottawa, all areas where we are absolutely and perfectly entitled to all the rights that we need and that we desire, and with these rights we can live our life in our language, in French, without neglecting the rest of the community. Quite the opposite, we participate in the life of both the local community and the greater community of our Ontarian neighbours, even though they are not of French extraction.

I wish the Parti Québécois would stop misleading the people of Quebec. And if my colleagues of Quebec want to ask me to go in their region to explain how things are where we live to Quebecers who are not aware of the situation, I shall be happy to do so. I had the honour to be a member of the committee on the Constitution a few years ago, as you may remember, Mr. Speaker, and everywhere I went in Quebec, I said for instance that in Timmins, there are at least 5,000 or 6,000 students in French elementary schools, that there are at least 2,000 students in a French secondary school—not a bilingual school but a French school— and all that under a public board—not a French board, but a multilingual public board—with all the subsidies and the rights of all other public schools. When I told this to our good friends and our colleagues, then to my cousins—because my father and mother were born in Quebec even though I myself was not—people were quite surprised and even astonished. They said: "This cannot be." It certainly is!

I ask my colleagues to invite me if they have an opportunity to do so, and I shall be happy to explain the situation to the people of Quebec. Of course, I have not the linguistic ability of my colleagues and perhaps of many Quebecers, but I believe I can make myself understood. I would say that in Ontario, in the areas where there is a substantial French population, we have certainly stopped living in the past, living in history and living ideals. For our part, we would rather live in the present and for the future. I believe that unless our friends in Quebec do the same, it will be very difficult to solve the problem. I believe there is a recommendation I can make which would be very helpful.

Without mentioning the present Parti Québécois government which, I am convinced, will not be there for long, I would invite Quebecers themselves to come to Timmins, to come to Sudbury, to come to North Bay and see what is going on over there and learn who are the liars, who is spreading lies among the population. They will be in a position to judge whether it is the Quebec ministers, or the PQ members or us, who come from these areas, who live with this situation and who can say exactly what it is all about. That is why I invite all these people to come and visit us. When you come to see us, you will certainly be welcome and I can say that you will feel at home.

I take as an example, Mr. Speaker, my own riding. Last spring, Mr. Bérubé, the Quebec Minister of Natural Resources, announced a new aid program for mines, for the operation of mines or at least the exploration of sites to develop mines in northwestern Quebec. We applauded this program because it was long overdue. I believe the minister or the government should have long before taken the initiative of such a program. That is why we applauded. But when the minister made a statement to announce this new program, I was terribly upset by the lies and falsehoods the minister spread about in advance to justify this new program.

First, he spoke of Texasgulf which is located in my city, in my riding. He claimed that the federal government was playing a game, and depriving Quebec of jobs to give them to Timmins in the province of Ontario because, he added, the federal government, through the Canadian Development Corporation, in fact controls Texasgulf. Therefore, the federal government had decided, for Texasgulf, that it would build a processing plant in Timmins rather than continue sending the ore to the refinery in Noranda to be processed.

So there we are, Mr. Speaker: Mr. Bérubé claimed that the province of Ontario restricts producers or refiners of ore to operating in Ontario, which is completely false. According to the Ontario law, 50 per cent of the ore must be processed in Canada, not in Ontario, but in Canada. Naturally, that is why Texasgulf could, until now, send 50 per cent of its production of copper ore to Noranda. An agreement was signed between the two companies, an agreement which benefitted both economically, which is why that agreement is still in force.

He further said that Texasgulf was controlled by the Canadian Development Corporation thus by the federal government, which is once again completely false, as the Canadian Development Corporation controls 30 per cent of the shares of Texasgulf. The shareholders allowed the Canadian Development Corporation to have three directors out of 13 on the board of the company through a gentlemen's agreement. Thus, if the matter had been put to the vote among the shareholders, the corporation would not probably have even three directors. Therefore the government of Canada does not control Texasgulf as they have only three shareholders or directors out of 13. Again, this is false.

He also said that the closing down of the Noranda refinery in the near future was due to the fact that Texasgulf was building its own refinery in Timmins and that the company would begin refining its own products itself in a year or two. Mr. Speaker, the materials coming from the Timmins plant of Texasgulf represented only 15 per cent of the refining work of Noranda. How can you justify the closing down of a plant such as the refinery of Noranda when only 15 per cent of the materials to be refined have been removed? A little later, I read in the newspapers that Mr. Bérubé stated that it has always been difficult to find a job in the private sector in Canada, especially in businesses where transactions were made in English.

But I can see now or I could see then, Mr. Speaker, that it was not because the company was English, but that the man was very dishonest. I do not think Canadian companies are in search of dishonest people just for the sake of it. So I reiterate my invitation to our Quebec friends. I would like them to come to our part of the country to see for themselves that we Franco-Ontarians, from Ottawa, Timmins, all over—and I shall restrict my comments to our province because I did not visit with all French-Canadian communities across Canada—I invite them to see for themselves that we are not being denied our rights, that we live the life that we choose, that we shall continue to do so and that we will always be happy to do so.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I fully trust the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to solve that problem and I urge my constituents as well as all other Canadians to follow his lead. If we follow his example, a fair solution for all Canadians shall be found.

[English]

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to take part in the debate on the address in reply. I should like to say, first of all, that we on this side are very glad to see our colleague, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy), back in his place and looking so well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: We hope he will have a good session and that the illness which kept him from us will not recur.

I should like to pay tribute to the mover and to the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both these hon. members acquitted themselves very well and I wish to add my respect to the remarks made by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), about the gracious and talented lady, Madam Morin, who served in the House of Commons before he did. She will be long remembered and greatly missed and, as the mover said so frankly, he has a great example when following in her footsteps.

The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood), also made an excellent speech. I thought perhaps it would have been appropriate for him to have mentioned his predecessor, the Hon. J. A. MacLean, a man who nobly served in this place with great distinction, a man who served his country in time of war and in time of peace. I think he, too, realizes he has a very big pair of shoes to fill as he sits in the House of Commons to discharge his responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I personally would like to say that we appreciate the way in which Your Honour guided our deliberations here in the House of Commons in the pre-television era. We assure you that your television image is just as good as your parliamentary image and we look forward to your distinguished guidance in a new era in the House of Commons.

Sir, I have to say in all honesty that I found the Speech from the Throne a disappointing document. It really does little to reassure Canadians that the government has any new initiatives with which to guide the country through what is bound to be a very difficult period. I am going to read an excerpt from the Speech from the Throne which I found rather surprising:

> The government dedicates itself profoundly to the rediscovery of the spirit of unity. It wishes to learn from all who are interested in Canada and who have thoughts on how it can be made a better place in which to live. It is prepared, particularly, to work with the governments of the provinces, all of whom have a vital interest in a better Canada.

Mr. Speaker, under whose auspices was this spirit of unity, which the government now seeks to rediscover, lost? That is what strikes me so forcefully. What has happened during the past ten wasted years—wasted in the sense of helping this country proceed to its destiny? Is it logical that a government which claims it has national unity as its greatest objective should say that it is dedicating itself profoundly to its rediscovery? There is something very much at fault in a statement like that.

It seems to me, looking back with the benefit of hindsight, that having a prime minister, in this particular case from Quebec, who would naturally be assumed to have a special understanding of Quebec problems, was not as advantageous to the country as one might have logically expected. It is ironic but true that sometimes people who come from a particular region are not necessarily qualified to speak for it. It is interesting to note, for example, that the most profound work on American democracy was not written by an American; the man who exhibited the best understanding of the situation in America as far as democracy was concerned, and whose work is still a classic, was Alex de Toqueville. The man who wrote the best work on racial problems in the United States was a Swede, Gunnar Myrdall. His book was "The American Dilemma".

It seems to me there is a case to be made in saying that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who is undeniably a bright man, spent a great deal of his time attending the London School of Economics and Harvard and going off on esoteric pursuits, which was his undoubted right to do, while his contemporaries stayed back in la belle province and coped with life and perhaps have gained a far greater and more profound understanding of the basic issues in Quebec than the Prime Minister has demonstrated. At least this is judging by the results, which have seen a separatist government elected in la belle province for the first time in our country's history. And let us never forget that it was under the present Prime Minister that this occurred.

There is another thing which disturbs me and disturbs my constituents. It is the lack of leadership as far as economic development is concerned. In the words of my leader, if having a finance minister means having a minister of finance with ideas for economic direction in the country, we have not had a finance minister for a long time.

I have to think back to Walter Gordon as being perhaps the last minister of finance in this country who came up with any original ideas. It is not that we agree with all of his ideas, but it was interesting that when he travelled across the country he had the initiative to note that the Canadian domestic market was quite small. Thus, he promoted the idea of the auto pact. He decided Canadian investment was not substantial enough, so he promoted the Canada Development Corporation. He felt that foreign investment was becoming immense, and he decided it would be a good idea to advance the concept of FIRA, the Foreign Investment Review Act. He also recognized that it would be desirable to have tax reform. Thus, he backed the Carter Commission. These things did not come to pass in the time of Walter Gordon. Some of them have been mismanaged, and some of them have only come into effect fairly recently. Can you think of any other initiatives comparable to what this man put forward that have been delivered by his successors? I certainly cannot. This is part of what is wrong with the country.

The reason why a lot of hon. members opposite who are sitting in the cabinet have not had the opportunity to develop any expertise or to develop any reputation in their portfolios is that they have not been in them long enough. They have been playing a game of musical chairs. This is not good for themselves, not good for the government, and not good for the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: The throne speech further indicates that "you will be asked to approve a Canadian Petroleum and Natural Gas Act which will regulate oil and gas exploration on federally administered lands and establish a system of royalty payments." Surely the government must be embarrassed by having to put this forward once again. We have been years and years without proper regulations in this sphere. While we have been vaccilating, the United Kingdom has been proceeding to pass regulations and extract vast quantities of oil and gas from the North Sea, deliver them, and have its economy restored by them. Here we are in this country still putting forward the same lame excuse in the Speech from the Throne, that we are going to get around to doing this. The government must surely stand indicted by this particular passage in the throne speech.

Another thing that concerns me in my constituency is the government's record as far as protecting the Canadian domestic manufacturer is concerned. This has national ramifications. I dealt with it today in a Standing Order 43. In my constituency we have a very important keystone industry for Nova Scotia called Hawker Siddeley. This particular industry is unique in the country because it has the only Canadian capacity for manufacturing railway axles. It is unique also because it is the only industry in Canada which maintains a full time export development marketing team. Also it is unique because it has been getting one of the shabbiest deals from this government of any large corporation in Canada. In any event, on its behalf, I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in August, I wrote to the then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in September, and I wrote to the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) a week ago. I have received no answer from any of them.

I expressed great alarm at the situation where cheap foreign railway axles are being imported into this country under conditions which may very well contravene fair trading practices. It was interesting to note in Tuesday's edition of the Globe and Mail that this practice is not confined to railway axles. The particular article read as follows:

> National Revenue says only that stainless steel plate from the three countries and hot rolled and some grades of cold rolled sheet from Japan and West Germany has been dumped. It does not release details on quantities involved.

The article continues as follows:

> Dumping of certain types of stainless steel from Japan, West Germany and the Republic of South Africa has been found . . .

These are the types of situations the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) should look into. This particular industry has been a good industry for Nova Scotia and a good industry for my constituency. It employs many hundreds of workers and has a very good record for exports, and a fine record of manufacturing railway rolling stock for Canada and the United States.

It is inconceivable to me that this industry is not getting more support. I understand that of the $100 million western railway rehabilitation plan, about which I wrote the Minister of Transport last August, he has seen fit to give an order for 100 cars to Hawker Siddeley and an order for 806 cars to National Car in Hamilton. By coincidence, that is an area where there is far less unemployment. I hope the minister will take this as a representation to give Hawker Siddeley the order for the remaining 150 longitudinal hopper cars, which has not yet been announced. Also, I hope he will make certain that these cheap foreign axles, which may be coming into this country in contravention of anti-dumping procedures, will not menace the possibility, and indeed the certainty of this industry getting the order to supply the railway axles for the entire order for this western railway rehabilitation program.

One of the things the people of Canada expect from this government, at a time of economic difficulty, is at least one comprehensive plan to do something constructive for the country. It is significant that the United States of America is prepared to spend billions and billions of dollars to transport non-renewable resources such as oil and natural gas from the north down to the United States, and we in Canada have not exhibited a similar willingness to spend money on the basis of a great national project to bring down from our north a treasure which is far, far greater ultimately than any non-renewable resource, that is, to generate and bring down into the provinces where they can be must conveniently utilized in a national power grid the hydro resources from this country's north. If they are properly utilized, it would make Canada highly competitive in energy with something which is not, like oil and gas, non-renewable.

Just to cite one example, I have been told by knowledgeable people that Artillery Lake in the Yukon, which is approximately 700 miles from Edmonton east of Yellowknife and part of the Lockhart River system, is a natural power site. This particular site could be developed. The electricity could be brought down with little "Line Loss" into some convenient place in Alberta by direct current (D.C.). It could then be stepped down to alternating current (A.C.) and fed into a national power grid which would provide tremendous benefits for the entire country. Indeed developments such as those that are now under way or completed in Kettle Rapids and Long Spruce in the Gilliam area of northern Manitoba are also able to be utilized in a national power grid.

Everyone is aware of the fact that there is surplus power available in Churchill Falls, Newfoundland and in the Bay of Fundy. It boggles my mind to think that in an energy starved era a country with a disproportionate amount of fresh water and unprecedented hydro resources would not at least make a national effort to utilize the greatest and best technology in order to get this renewable energy down to parts of the country where it will do the most good. It is particularly incongruous that in eastern Canada energy costs are so high that any good the DREE program has been doing has been surely wiped out by the tremendous cost which industry faces as far as electrical energy is concerned.

I hope the government in the next little while will realize that in order to get the country united, and in order to give us a sense of pride in being Canadians, we have to undertake some great national projects for the material benefit of our people and for the ultimate prosperity of our nation. We must develop coal mines. We must develop eastern coal mines, as the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) said today. We must concentrate on storing feed grain in eastern Canada so that our farmers are not impeded by the fact that, as in so many other instances, we do not have rail cars to transport feed grains when we need them.

It is incongruous indeed that there is probably less rolling stock on the railways than there was ten years ago, and yet there are unemployed people in factories in this country who could be making railway cars, instead of drawing unemployment insurance benefits, and doing something for their country and for themselves.

As far as taxation is concerned, I mentioned it a few moments ago in connection with the former minister of finance, Walter Gordon. What we got in 1971 was not a realistic taxation reform. What we got was simply taxation obfuscation or taxation confusion and difficulty, not reforms. I remember quite well when at one point the government was determined to impose capital gains taxes on the family farm until opposition pressure and, we hope, their better judgment prevailed. We need equity investment and I fail to see why the government, if it does not feel like removing capital gains taxes entirely, does not treat them in a more equitable and sophisticated manner. Why should Canadians who buy equity in Canadian corporations for purposes of educating their children or for retiring, be treated, when they sell these securities, sometimes after several years, in the same fashion as people who bought them the previous month to make a quick buck? What is the justification for this? Why does the government not recognize that for all the net gain it gets out of capital gains taxes, which after administrative costs comes to considerably less than $100 million a year, the very existence of these taxes is doing far more than $100 million worth of damage to this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: As a matter of fact if it got rid of Petro-Can and stopped spending money in that sphere, it would save itself far more money. It would be in money if it did that and if it abolished capital gains tax entirely because, as so many of my colleagues from western Canada particularly have said, we have yet to see any oil or any resources discovered by Petro-Can. It is very interesting that Maurice Strong's first attempt to generate some business was when he went to Hanoi and tried to get a joint venture to get some sort of exploration going off the coast of Viet Nam. They are doing a lot of exploring, but have they discovered anything yet?

An hon. Member: Why don't you give up?

Mr. MacKay: It is not a case of me not giving up but of the people of Canada giving up on this government unless its members change their ways.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I was interested—of course I am always interested—in the Prime Minister. He is a talented man and he has a certain amount of tortuous logic on his side when he speaks. After listening to his speech, which was very erudite and replete with patronizing references as to how well we are coping in this country with unemployment and inflation, how much better we are, relatively speaking, then we were before, I have come to the conclusion that, as usual, the Prime Minister is taking the debate up to a very high plane, he is dealing with relatives and absolutes. He points out that in some ways we are relatively better off than we were before because we have slowed down the rate of inflation and the rate of strikes. However, he is rather slow to concede that in absolute terms we are, of necessity, worse off than we were in past years. We are worse off because our nation's debts are higher, for example, and our dollar is lower, and we suffer unprecedented unemployment. So I would say to the Prime Minister, to sum up his argument in his submission charitably, that probably his speech indicates that things are relatively bad and absolutely terrible, in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: People are concerned as well about another very basic failure of the government, and I speak parochially here so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, because we are not getting any proper joint federal-provincial initiatives in agriculture. In Nova Scotia 80 per cent of all the food we use is imported. Clearly this is most unsatisfactory. Feed grains is an area where we can be more independent but, according to Mr. Charles Hubbard, president of the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture, little research is being done in this area.

The Nova Scotia government has flatly stated that the federal government's 1977 dairy program, which put a 25 cent per hundredweight levy on fluid milk, will cost the Nova Scotia dairy industry $700,000, and reduce the individual dairy farmer's income by approximately $1,000 a year. The levy is clearly too high, and we believe that we should have a long term dairy policy. There should be no necessity for the raising and lowering of quotas buffeting farmers around at the government's whim. This is exactly what has been going on.

The fishing industry in Nova Scotia has not shown any signs of being revived, despite the 200 mile limit that this country finally put in effect at the same time as did the United States.

Again speaking about my constituency, which is a very important priority so far as I am concerned, I do not see any indication that badly needed bait freezing storage and facilities are being installed federally, provincially, or on a joint basis. I do not see any initiative to improve things in this industry, and this is another thing that is disappointing to me because the Speech from the Throne does not contain any mention of fish so far as I have been able to discover, despite the fact that this industry was one of the reasons why this country was discovered, and still is one of our greatest natural resources.

I say, let us get back to basics in running the country; let us pay attention to developing our fisheries. There are only 800,000 people in Nova Scotia and with some intelligence and the development of primary industries—we would not need large industrial projects—we could get along very well with our fishing, our farming, and our forestry. Yet there appears to be no leadership emanating federally or provincially in this important endeavour for our province.

Another point that I wish to make in the context of this debate is with regard to the fears that Canadians have been expressing about what is happening to some of our national institutions. It has not been a pretty sight to see some of the things that have come to light about AECL, Polysar, National Revenue, Statistics Canada and some of the other agencies that were noted in the past for their integrity.

For example, anyone who has been following the proceedings of the Laycraft Commission of Inquiry and has followed the cross-examination of a man by the name of Edmond Swartzack, an official of National Revenue, the cross-examination by Mr. Pitfield, counsel for RAS, and the cross-examination by Mr. Berger, counsel for Mr. Justice Laycraft, is struck by the evasiveness and by how perilously close to perjury this man has come. The contention made in the Chamber and elsewhere by representatives of this government that this agreement between Revenue Canada and the RCMP was perfectly legitimate, and not secret, does not stand the test of logic. How in the world, for example, could the chief law enforcement officer of the province of Alberta know enough to make inquiries about this agreement if he did not even know of its existence? How is it that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), an erudite man, could say here in the House of Commons that if we want to know the definition of organized crime, for purposes of this agreement, we should refer to a statute that was only passed a short time ago when this agreement, which did not even define organized crime which it was supposed to combat, was put together in 1972? I just do not understand the basic logic exhibited by the government in not co-operating fully with provincial royal commissions.

Another thing that I think will have to be faced pretty soon is what we are going to do about this inequitable section of the Federal Court Act 41(2), which I and other hon. members have discussed at various times with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford). Mr. Justice Deschênes of the Quebec Superior Court dealt with this in a very erudite and scathing way last year when he was discussing the case of a couple of young girls from Quebec in whom the Quebec Civil Rights Association showed some interest. They took their case to the Federal Court to find out why these girls were discharged from their jobs. Once again section 41(2) was brought down and frustrated the attempts of these young ladies to find out the truth. In the Laycraft Commission of Inquiry it has been used, and it has been used in other inquiries. It has been used over and over again, but what is the basis for it? If the Americans had this type of legislation, I submit they would never have been able to get to the bottom of their difficulties in Watergate. Just listen to this section in the act. It reads:

When a minister of the Crown certifies to any court by affidavit that the production or discovery of a document or its contents would be injurious to international relations—

That is a very curious thing in relation to a couple of Quebecoise. It continues:

—national defence—

That is incongruous too, for two girls!

—or security, or to federal-provincial relations, or that it would disclose a confidence of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, discovery and production shall be refused without any examination of the document by the court.

That is the basic keynote, or principle, by the court! Why should a cabinet minister of any government substitute his judgment, biased as it must inevitably be by political persuasion and self-preservation, for that of a Justice in the Federal Court of Canada? The only mandate of a judge is to do the right thing for society. Politicians cannot always do the right thing because of all the political pressures. Lawyers cannot always do the right thing either, as we all know, but a judge is supposed to do the right thing. That is his job, his mandate. Why must we have the situation where even an acting minister, for example, can sign an affidavit which takes away the right of people to have a judge examine the efficacy, the honesty, and the appropriateness of what the Crown is saying and what the litigants are saying? Why do we need it? Section 41(1) is a much more proper section. I will not read it. It is long, but in that particular case a judge does have right and duty of perusal.

I do not want to go on at great length. I think the point has been made. I believe that the Minister of Justice himself recognizes that this is a matter of concern. He said so in the House when he said that the whole Federal Court Act was discussed by the various provincial attorneys general some months ago. That was last March. I urge the government very strongly to take into account the effect this section has and to remove that kind of section, or amend it, so that a judge of the Federal Court does have the right and duty to peruse what a cabinet minister says shall be forbidden to be released.

I hope that as a result of some of these unfortunate revelations which have come out in the past months concerning some of the institutions which people in this country had always trusted the government will make a strong effort to clean up its act and to restore a sense of confidence in the agencies I have mentioned, and in some others as well.

I do not wish to go on too long, but there are a couple of things I would like to say in conclusion. The message I want to leave on behalf of my constituents in this throne speech debate is simply this: I want the government to show some capable management or manpower capability, for a change. So far, mismanagement has been its hallmark. I suggest most respectfully that the government should stop playing musical chairs with the cabinet to the point where ministers are not in their portfolios long enough to develop expertise. I would like to see the government demonstrate some principles for a change because in recent years the Liberal Party has become no longer a party in the federal scene. It has become simply an alliance for power; its credo is expedience; its purpose is to provide avenues for opportunists. The result is that the whole country has lost faith in politicians generally.

The government has left a heritage of cynicism for many Canadians who, as a result of some of the events which have taken place in past months, no longer believe in politics or politicians. The Prime Minister must recognize that billions have been wasted by his government through mal-administration, misadministration, boondoggling, and useless and grandiose projects. Indeed, one might say with some justification that the Prime Minister, among his other attributes, has an edifice complex.

Therefore people in my constituency will be watching with interest to see if the government has learned its lesson and if some of the things it has put forward in the Speech from the Throne, including an opportunity to develop a more open and honest administration, are brought into legislation. They will be looking for the results of more positive management of the economy. The people in my constituency, like all Nova Scotians, are fair, and if the government can exhibit this type of conduct I know they would want me on their behalf to support the government's efforts.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peter Elzinga (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to begin with the traditional congratulations to the individuals who moved and seconded the motion which began the throne speech debate.

On behalf of the constituents of Pembina I wish to convey sincere thanks for the kindness the Queen bestowed upon Canada by sharing her presence with us in her Jubilee Year. We look forward to having the Queen with us once again in Edmonton when she and Prince Philip will be there to participate in the Commonwealth Games next year.

One could not help but notice yesterday when listening to the debate—when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) participated and then the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—the excellence of the speech of the leader of my party. The Leader of the Opposition did such a superb job that the Prime Minister had to bolster himself by scooping the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and by telling the Canadian people that there would be an additional $150 million spent under the Canada Works Program. This was not supposed to be announced until this evening, and it was obvious that the Prime Minister was fully aware that he had been upstaged by the Leader of the Opposition.

When we participate in the throne speech debate I think we should review some of the things the Prime Minister has done over the past ten years. The present administration has set many records, and I would like to review some of them. Today we have record inflation because of the administration sitting opposite us. We have record unemployment, record mortgage rates, record interest rates and record government spending, and when we review the last ten budgets the government has brought forward, we find that nine of the last ten budgets were deficit budgets. Because of that dubious record we now have our highest level of foreign borrowing. Our dollar is sinking. We on this side of the House were hoping that the throne speech would provide a redirection at the economic level, but nothing was forthcoming.

A great deal of importance has been placed on the national unity issue, and that importance is merited, but it is obvious that if economic trends continue for the next ten years as they have for the last ten years, we are not going to have a country worth saving. Our Prime Minister is so preoccupied with the linguistic issue that he has let everything else slide to the side. Hon. members on all sides of the House have stated the importance of leadership in government. We saw yesterday the type of leadership the Leader of the Opposition can give to this Chamber and to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Elzinga: This leadership is also exemplified in the way the Leader of the Opposition has approached Bill 101, which has been passed in the Quebec legislature. Under the British North America Act, the Prime Minister has two avenues open to him in his approach to the legislation passed in Quebec. The approach we have advocated is a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to test the validity of the legislation.

The second avenue the Prime Minister has open to him under the British North America Act is that, if the federal government so desires, it can disallow provincial legislation, as long as it does so within one year. The Prime Minister has not seen fit to take either avenue, and we wonder where is his leadership in this issue. It is obvious when we travel through our constituencies that the two main issues in Canada today are national unity and the economic policies of our present administration. We have stated what we would do, in the event that we were the government, with regard to Bill 101, but let me share with the House why I feel the Prime Minister will not take this approach. I feel that the Prime Minister himself is in support of Bill 101. René Lévesque and our Prime Minister are in bed together.

Mr. Crouse: The odd couple.

Mr. Elzinga: When the sheets are pulled over their heads they are holding hands and laughing at the gullibility of the Canadian people on this issue, but when the sheets are pulled back they have a mock pillow fight simply for public consumption. Bill 101 is a fine example of that, and I hope the Canadian people will realize just what is going on between their Prime Minister and the leader of the government party in Quebec, who is dedicated to the break-up of Canada. There can be no doubt in the mind of anyone who has heard our leader speak in the national unity debate before this parliament recessed, about where our party stands on this issue.

• (1752)

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Elzinga: If the hon. member had listened to what our leader said he would be aware of where we stand. He should read Hansard, or listen to the debates.

We saw the government bring in wage and price proposals. We hoped that during the period wage and price controls were in effect the government would re-think its economic policy. In the 1974 election campaign this party stated that wage and price controls should be a temporary measure in order that we could realign the economic policies of the government if we should take power. The government has not taken advantage of the time available to it while wage and price controls were in effect.

When I speak of realigning the economic policies of the government I would point out that it is essential that it curb government spending and that there be a realignment of fiscal policy. This is what we advocated in 1974.

Traditionally a country grows according to its leadership. It becomes obvious not only to those who are sitting in this Chamber but to Canadians at large that Canada has been deprived of leadership for the past ten years. Canada is begging, searching, for leadership. In 1968 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took the reins of power with this government, very little was said about separation. Now in 1977 we have the government of one province dedicated to its separation.

I have dealt briefly with the economy and the national unity debate, Mr. Speaker. There is one other issue that I wish to share with you, however, and I do so with a certain amount of reservation. One is elected to parliament to express the views of constituents and often one feels rather hesitant about baring one's heart when aware of one's shortcomings.

This country was built by pioneers who had a deep dedication not only to their country, Mr. Speaker, but also to God. That is what is lacking today from parliament even in the direction that this country is going. We lack the moral idealism that is essential for a country to survive.

Let me just close by sharing with you the thought that it is time that we, as members of parliament, realized that governing Canada is expressed in the words over the doorway to the Parliament Buildings—"God shall have dominion from sea to sea."

Let us strive to show Canadians that we have set that example for them here in Ottawa.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith).

• (1756)

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

There is hardly two minutes left and we agreed with each party's representatives to adjourn the debate at six o'clock to allow the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to have the floor at eight o'clock. The minister would be followed by a speaker for the Progressive Conservative Party, one for the New Democratic Party and finally one for the Social Credit Party of Canada. The agreement was that the previous speaker—the one who just spoke—would close his remarks at six o'clock. Since it is now a few seconds to six, I ask that the House call it six o'clock to comply with the agreement we had reached.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is the case. There are two and half minutes left and I understand that the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) wishes to speak and will complete his remarks by six o'clock in order that the arrangement the parliamentary secretary has mentioned can go ahead.

• (1758)

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Under these conditions, Mr. Speaker, and since we will come to nearly the same results, I have no objection to the hon. member speaking for one minute and three quarters or so.

[English]

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak before six o'clock but the events of today have brought drastic consequences to the nickel mining industry of Canada. International Nickel has announced that effective January, 1978, in Sudbury and that area, 2,800 people will be laid off, and at Thompson, Manitoba, in my constituency, 650 people will be laid off before the middle of 1978.

I think this is only the beginning of what is going to take place in the mining industry. In the budget the government made no reference to stimulating the mining industry and I should like to ask that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) immediately convene a meeting with the mining industry of Canada to see if we cannot keep the mining industry in business until such time as they at least have an opportunity to look at the projected layoffs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2001)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me first express my warmest congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and Malpeque (Mr. Wood). They performed their task with the excellence that is traditional in the Canadian Parliament.

This is my first speech to the House of Commons as Minister of Finance. I would like to thank members from all sides of the chamber for their good wishes on my appointment. I know they join me in extending my best wishes to my predecessor, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald). He has set an example to all of us in his sense of duty and his service to this country.

I have been fortunate in being able to attend two major international economic conferences and to discuss the problems of the world economy with finance ministers from many other countries. We all face difficult problems at this time. I was also glad to meet with my provincial colleagues recently. We had a good, frank discussion and I thank them for their advice.

I want to use this occasion to speak on the economy, on controls and on taxes. This is the first possible opportunity to inform the House of my decisions and to get rid of uncertainty. I also want to give the House the opportunity to pass the incentive measures of the last budget and any additional measures that I will be proposing tonight as quickly as possible.

[English]

Let me report on the economic situation as I find it.

We have made some progress in bringing down the rate of inflation. Wage increases have slowed down. Increases in non-food prices have been reduced steadily since the start of the controls program. But there have been some setbacks this year because of higher food prices and a weaker Canadian dollar. We have a long way yet to go.

Output has not risen in the last few months as we had hoped. Even if we do much better in the second half of this year, total output in 1977 is only going to be about 2 per cent higher than it was in 1976. Independent forecasters are calling for gains of only 4 to 5 per cent next year. That is not enough to bring down the rate of unemployment.

More people are at work in Canada. Indeed we have already just about achieved the goal set in the last budget of 250,000 more jobs. But the numbers of Canadians wanting to work has increased even faster. Unemployment has risen to 8.3 per cent for Canada as a whole.

We must find more jobs. I will not be satisfied until everyone who really wants to work can find a job. But I cannot promise any miracle solutions. It will take time and effort to overcome our unemployment problems. No one should think that there are any easy answers.

Our balance of payments situation is unsatisfactory. It is true that our exports have risen as a result of the recovery in the United States and elsewhere. This is giving rise to a trade surplus of over $2 billion this year. But we need an even larger surplus. We have had a large increase in our tourist deficit. Furthermore, the deficits on interest and dividends and other services are large and growing. These facts have made the Canadian dollar vulnerable, and it has declined in value.

Finally, the revenues of the federal government are growing more slowly than expected. As a result, our cash deficits are now so large that room for manoeuvre is very limited.

These are the facts we have to face. They stand in sharp contrast to the potential for growth in this country. We have the resources, the land, the skills and the tradition of hard work. We have grown faster than most other countries in the past and there is no fundamental reason why we should not do so in the future.

I do not want a temporary surge which cannot last and which will start the process of inflation all over again. But I do want sustained growth of between 5 and 6 per cent in order to bring unemployment steadily down. The expansion should be led by exports and business investment. We need to improve our trade balance even further and to reduce our tourist deficit in order to put our balance of payments into better shape. The business community should be planning now the new factories which will be needed to produce more in the future.

Government spending should grow less rapidly, but consumer spending can and should grow in line with the economy as a whole. It is this growth, together with higher exports, which will reduce the excess capacity in the economy and create the demand for more capital investment.

What is holding us back? I think there are three things.

First, our markets abroad have not grown as fast as had been expected. World prices of wheat, wood pulp and base metals have been disappointing. All countries need to do what they can to get the world economy going again.

Second, we are paying the penalty for letting our costs get out of line.

This is part of the reason why imports have taken an increasing share of the domestic market away from Canadian producers, why there has been such a sharp fall in manufacturing jobs, why we have lost ground in tourism, why new plants are being built in the United States rather than in Canada. Wages are not the only source of these higher costs, but they are the larger part. With controls we have seen new wage increases come down from 20 per cent in 1975 to 8 per cent recently. So we are no longer losing ground compared to the United States. But we have not made up for the ground lost in the past.

We have had to give more protection to some of our weaker industries like textiles by restricting imports. But this is only a short-term solution. We need lower—not higher—trade barriers here and around the world if we are to build efficient manufacturing industries and increase our productivity. The drop in the value of the Canadian dollar has helped in restoring our competitive position. But this is not a fundamental solution to our problems. A falling exchange rate pushes up many costs and prices in Canada. The answer must be found in getting the rate of inflation down, in bringing our costs into line with those of our main competitors.

The third thing holding us back is a loss of confidence. In part this is a result of inflation, slow growth and high unemployment. But the present wave of pessimism seems to have gone too far. It gives too little weight to the progress we have made in wringing out the excesses of the past and building a better basis for future growth.

In part this is a result of political instability. People are concerned about whether Canada will remain a united country and that concern has added to our economic difficulties. I have no doubt whatever that the people of Quebec overwhelmingly believe that Canada is their country. Quebec will not separate from Canada. But until separatism is defeated, it will impede the economic progress not only of Quebec, but of the rest of the country as well.

I want to do all I can to dispel uncertainty—by speaking for a united Canada, by standing firm against inflation, by keeping down our spending and our taxes and by announcing clear-cut decisions on controls and the economy.

But I need the help of all Canadians. Government cannot do everything itself. A healthy economy is dependent upon a healthy private sector. Consumers must be able to spend more and the private sector must be able to plan its investments with more certainty.

As I have said, there are no miracle solutions to our economic problems. Progress will be slow and it will require hard work, more productivity, lower expectations and greater responsibility on the part of all Canadians.

To stimulate demand without increasing the danger of inflation, I am announcing tonight:

1. A phase-out of controls beginning on April 14, 1978.

2. A personal income tax cut of up to $100 for low and middle income taxpayers.

3. Further job-creation programs.

4. An employment credit for job creation.

5. The maintenance of strict restraint on government spending.

I turn now to a discussion of these proposals.

● (2012)

[English]

The key elements of the anti-inflation program launched two years ago were price and income controls, a gradual slowing down in the growth of the money supply, restraint of government expenditure and wide-ranging improvements to the structure of the economy.

We continue to give full support to the Bank of Canada in reducing the rate of growth of the money supply and we remain committed to expenditure control. It is our firm intent to keep the increase in our spending within the growth of the economy. We have achieved considerable success, as have the provincial governments.

Our expenditure ceilings are coming under very heavy pressure. Slower growth of the economy is costing us more in unemployment insurance, in payments to the provinces and in interest on the public debt. We are faced with higher outlays as a result of lower wheat prices and the very bad weather during this harvest. Despite these pressures, we will do whatever is necessary to stay within the ceilings set by my predecessor last March.

The controls on prices, wages and other incomes have contributed greatly to checking the inflationary spiral in our economy. But they should not be a permanent program because the government does not believe in excessive intervention in the marketplace. While controls cannot be removed immediately, phased decontrol will begin on April 14, 1978, two and one-half years after the program began.

The further period of control will enable us to make more progress in bringing down the rate of inflation and in reducing inflationary expectations. In the next few months we will amend the Anti-Inflation Act to ensure effective administration of controls during the period of transition and to minimize the risk of a bulge when controls come off. We will also proceed with establishment of an agency to monitor and report upon price and cost developments.

In the phased process of decontrol beginning next April 14, employees will be free of controls for their guideline years which start after that date. Business will be free of price and profits controls for their fiscal years which begin after that date.

Changes are being made in the guidelines for the third year of the program. They are fully explained in the Supplementary Information I will be tabling. Briefly, the basic guideline for wages and salaries will be 6 per cent. The experience adjustment factor will continue to apply. Dividends will remain under control. The permissible increase will be reduced from 8 per cent to 6 per cent, the same amount as for wages and salaries.

We have no choice but to keep slowing down the increase in costs if we are to get the economy going again and reduce unemployment. Barring unforeseen events, the rate of inflation will come down below 6 per cent next year, so the lower guideline will not lead to a fall in real incomes. Furthermore, I am taking steps to ensure that the take-home pay of lower and middle income workers will increase.

In fact, in the last two years, we have been right on target. We were two points lower in the first year. This year, because of the circumstances I have explained, we are two points higher. That totals exactly the same.

If we had left the regulations unchanged, the guideline would have been about 8 per cent because the consumer price index has gone up by more than the price target this year. But I would like to emphasize that the first two years of the program taken together were just about on target. We did better than the target by almost 2 per cent in the first year and seem likely to fall short by about the same amount in the second year. This was due to two main factors. First, food prices fell in 1976 and then rose sharply in 1977. Second, the Canadian dollar remained quite strong through much of 1976 but has since fallen quite sharply. This has pushed up the prices of the things we buy abroad.

There is no way in which we can protect Canadians from the loss of real income caused by higher import prices. If money incomes were allowed to rise correspondingly, the inevitable result would be still higher prices and we would be worse off.

I turn now to fiscal measures.

While my room for manoeuvre is very limited because of large deficits in our accounts, I believe we can do more to stimulate the economy. The measures I have chosen will serve several purposes. They will offset the cut in the wage guideline for low and middle income wage earners. They will stimulate consumer spending and housing. And they will create jobs.

First, I am cutting taxes for low and middle income taxpayers by $100. I propose to do this by increasing the minimum amount of the 9 per cent federal tax credit from $200 to $300.

This will apply only to the 1978 taxation year. The value of this additional $100 cut will be more than $700 million.

To provide quick stimulus, the reduction will be concentrated as much as possible through the January and February deductions at source. The take-home pay of millions of employees will increase by $50 in January and $50 in February. Many will enjoy a holiday from federal income tax in those two months and some for the whole year.

[Translation]

Here are some examples. A typical married taxpayer with two children and an annual income of $15,000 will see his federal tax reduced in January and February by the full $100. If his income is $10,000 or less, he will pay no federal tax at all in these two months. If he earns about $8,500 or less, he will have a holiday from federal taxes for the year as a whole.

Over 7,500,000 taxpayers will benefit from this tax cut. About 6 million will receive the full $100 cut.

I also wish to announce that the indexing factor for the personal income tax for 1978 will be 7.2 per cent. This means that the basic personal exemption will increase from $2,270 to $2,430. For a family of four, total personal exemptions will rise by $360 from $5,120 to $5,480. In total, Canadians will pay $850 million less in taxes next year as a result. I only regret that the importance of indexation is so often forgotten or ignored in public discussion. That is why I am pleased to repeat it this evening—taxpayers will benefit from an additional $850 million exemption in the early part of the year.

I now turn to our measures of direct job creation. We have already allocated a total of $450 million this year for Canada Works, Young Canada Works and the other job creation programs. These programs will be maintained at this very high level for 1978-79. In addition, we are providing $150 million for work projects with a high employment content. These will be focussed on high unemployment areas beginning immediately. In total, for the current and the next fiscal year, the government will be spending over one billion dollars for direct job creation. All of these funds are being provided within the expenditure ceilings to which we are committed.

The new funds, the additional $150 million, come from the budgetary cuts made by my distinguished colleague the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras).

Mr. Speaker, I also expect to introduce shortly a new program of employment credits for private business firms. This will be a new approach to job creation in Canada, and I have to give careful study to alternative ways for carrying it out efficiently and effectively. I fully expect, however, that legislation will be introduced to initiate this new job credit plan early in 1978, at an approximate cost of up to $100 million. Last, I am taking this opportunity to announce some other tax changes. I will be extending by regulation the fast write-off for anti-pollution equipment until 1980. I will also be extending by regulation for another year the special provision permitting taxpayers to offset against other income their losses on rental housing generated by capital cost allowances. This will maintain the incentive for the construction of multiple unit residential housing. I am bringing the capital cost allowance on wood-frame buildings into line with other kinds of buildings. Furthermore, tonight's Notice of Ways and Means Motion includes changes relating to life insurance, corporate surplus and loans by companies to their employees. As a result of representations from members on all sides of the House, I will not be proceeding at this time with the measure for taxing the investment income realized by a policyholder on the death of the person insured. Details are provided in the supplementary information.

[English]

Members will recall that the March budget proposed $1.5 billion in tax reductions to stimulate the economy. It included a tax reduction for middle and lower income families of up to $50 for each child. It also increased by $100 the employment expense deduction. There were significant measures to improve profitability and encourage business expansion. The investment tax credit was extended and increased. A 3 per cent inventory allowance was introduced. The dividend tax credit was enriched. All these measures are being reintroduced in the Notice of Ways and Means Motion tonight.

Long delays in passing tax bills add to uncertainty. We should move swiftly to enact the measures proposed in the last budget and the new measures I have proposed tonight.

Finally, I want to say a word about the exchange rate. The policies we are following of getting our costs down and our employment up are directed at our fundamental problems. With such policies, our balance of payments will improve. We have operated in the market to maintain orderly conditions. This has involved some loss of reserves during the recent period of decline in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. However, our reserves remain substantial, and we have the capacity to supplement them substantially should the need arise. We will continue to follow our floating exchange rate policy. I am convinced that confidence in the basic value of the Canadian dollar can best be promoted by sound domestic policies, and not by artificialities.

I should like to repeat, now, something I have said before. There is absolutely no idea in the mind of the government of imposing exchange controls. I know there was a story which was printed and widely circulated and which created some problem, and I know that unfortunately many Canadians have perhaps moved money out of Canada because of that story. I think it is extremely regrettable because it could cause some problem for the Canadian dollar. That is why I want to state tonight we have no intention at all of imposing exchange controls in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would now like to table the Notice of Ways and Means Motion, projections of the government's revenues and expenditures, supplementary information on the controls program, the text of the government's statement of July 29 to business and labour on decontrol and post-control arrangements, and details of the tax changes. I shall ask that the Notice of Ways and Means Motion be appended to today's Votes and Proceedings.

Even though we are holding firm to our expenditure ceilings, our total financial requirements are now forecast to increase from $5.5 billion in 1976-77 to $8.5 billion in 1977-78. They will be even larger next year, mainly because we will be paying off $2 billion in accrued interest on Canada Savings Bonds. In these circumstances, to attempt to do even more at this time through fiscal pump-priming would clearly be counterproductive.

With all these measures at work, we can expect the economy to grow in real terms by 5 per cent next year. To do better than that will require a concerted strategy of change and improvement in the structure of our economy extending over the medium-term period ahead.

We have made a start on important elements of that strategy. In the critical energy area, for example, wide-ranging policies on pricing, taxes, and joint private and public investment are helping to develop new sources of supply, improve distribution and economize on use. In the housing area, we are well on the target of a million more houses for Canadians over four years. Federal funds and support are being increasingly channelled into assisted home ownership and rental for people of modest income. We have successfully proclaimed the 200-mile limit for fisheries jurisdiction, to assure effective management and conservation of that valuable resource. For business generally, we are making progress in diminishing unnecessary regulation and filing of statistical forms. The need for efficiency and higher productivity is increasing as we move closer to the hard bargaining of the multilateral trade negotiations.

In all these, and many other areas, much more has to be done by investment policy and basic structural changes. We intend to promote such changes, to seek the active co-operation of the provinces, and to engage as widely as possible in consultation with business, labour and other economic interest groups.

Mr. Speaker, we must realize that these are difficult times for Canada both economically and politically. But these are also challenging times because Canadians must rededicate themselves to the building of a stronger, more prosperous and more united country.

The solutions to our problems are not easy and they will not all come from government. We must realize not only that the resources of government are limited, but also that we do not want in Canada the type of society where everything comes from the state. Therefore, there will not be any large new social programs nor greatly increased government spending. To maintain our standard of living, all Canadians must learn to work harder, to be more efficient and to be more productive.

While we have serious problems, we should not exaggerate them. Franklin Roosevelt once said that the only thing to fear is fear itself. I am not afraid. I will not trade the problems of Canada for those of any other country in the world and neither will any member of this House.

In building a country, we have had to cope with all the problems inherent in developing a new land, in fighting a vast geography and a harsh climate, in experiencing severe economic depression, in accepting international responsibilities, in living in an age of great complexity and tremendous change, and we have succeeded.

We must adopt once again the spirit of those who built this country, a spirit of adventure and initiative, a taste for risk, and the determination of the explorer. This is the challenge we must meet.

• (2035)

This country has been too good for too many of us to let it be destroyed! I know that the vast majority of Canadians want to roll up their sleeves, use their imagination, create, and produce in the manner of those who came before us. Each of us has his own contribution to make. Let us do so with enthusiasm. This is the only way we can leave to our children the heritage which we have received—a country rich in the diversity of its people and its natural resources, vast, generous and tolerant, a country which has been, which is, and which will be the envy of the entire world.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: As I am sure all members are aware, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was granted some leniency in terms of time when he was making his rather major statement. Certainly, if the occasion arises, the same courtesy will be extended to those who respond to him on the other side of the House.

In order for the minister to append a notice of ways and means to the Votes and Proceedings, an order of the House is required. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in joining in this debate this evening may I also add my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Dawson) and the seconder (Mr. Wood) of the motion, who spoke to us earlier. Our time is limited tonight, and first I should like to say that I feel the budget which was delivered tonight, because it is really a mini-budget, has some good in it and some bad.

Some hon. Members: Right on!

Mr. Stevens: Let me tell you what was not in the minister's statement tonight.

An hon. Member: The truth.

Mr. Stevens: The government offers little hope for those one million Canadians who will be looking for work in the cold wintry months ahead.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: There is little hope for the youth in our country who will be seeking their first job opportunities in the midst of the worst economic conditions in at least the last 30 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: For those out of work in our five eastern provinces and for those out of work in all of those high unemployment areas of Canada, let them not look to Ottawa for help, judging from this statement tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Sure, hon. members will recall that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) only yesterday, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) tonight, spoke about $150 million for the unemployed. What is that in relation to the million unemployed?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Nothing!

Mr. Stevens: It is $150 per unemployed person in this country.

Mr. Paproski: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: Expressed another way, that $150 million may mean 16,000 fresh jobs—with one million out of work in the country. That is this government in action!

Before this evening we had one million unemployed in Canada and we were heading toward our worst winter since the dirty thirties. Having heard the minister's statement tonight, I would suggest we are still heading for that type of winter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: As I have said, there is some good in the budget tonight, and some bad. Frankly, I am pleased that the government has responded to our constant demand to reduce taxes, as far as the personal income taxpayer of this country is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, two budgets back we first raised the significant point that Canadian taxpayers were being overtaxed, and we asked that there be a substantial reduction in their favour. At the time the budget was tabled in March, 1977, we renewed our request, and only yesterday the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) asked once again that there be a considerable tax reduction for those earners, especially below the $16,000 a year level.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I am pleased that at long last the government has responded to that request. I only wish in future it would respond a little more quickly for the sake of Canadians when we request something.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: When we speak about significant tax cuts—and I wish to touch on certain other tax breaks which I think the Canadian public is entitled to—let there be no doubt that we are simply suggesting not a greater deficit, but less federal spending, because we believe if this government were less wasteful there could be a significant further tax reduction for the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: How many of us still remember how startled we were, speaking about waste, to learn that last year alone the government spent almost $1 million on cab fares getting around Ottawa?

An hon. Member: Shame!

• (2042)

Mr. Stevens: And yet they tell us they do not know where they can trim the fat.

An hon. Member: Participaction.

Mr. Stevens: Before this evening we had an inflation rate of more than 8 per cent and the almost certain prospect of a higher rate in the months ahead. Having heard the minister's speech, realizing that he predicts a 6 per cent rate for next year, I would suggest that we will not attain that rate in that there is already a 4 per cent built-in inflation on the devaluation of the dollar over the next two years. It is the minister's own officials who have said that that will be so.

Frankly, I would suggest that one further tax cut that the minister neglected to make was a substantial reduction in the sales tax that is charged to Canadians from coast to coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Why should the federal government, for example, make more in the sales tax alone on every car sold in this country than the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer, or any provincial government? That fact is true of many other articles as well. The saddest thing of all is the use, as I have said, of the money that the government receives. Speaking about how it spends that money, I wonder how many Canadians were pleased to learn that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) flew on government aircraft a total of 361 times during the last three and a half years, surpassing even the rather staggering record of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Let me point out to the Minister of Finance that, surprisingly, in his statement, no meaningful reference was made to small businessmen. Certainly any hope that they will have less bureaucratic control evaporated with the statement which we have just heard read into the record. It is disappointing that this sector of our economy which produces most of our jobs continues to be ignored by this government which loves bigness for the sake of bigness. The small businessman is ignored by this government which is more concerned about arranging $100 million loans for a corporate few than about helping small businessmen who sometimes ask for a few thousand dollars to help create jobs.

I have said that there is some good and some bad in the minister's statement. One of the good things was the dropping of the proposal to tax life insurance proceeds that were going to beneficiaries in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Imagine, if that legislation were allowed to pass through this parliament it would have meant that Canada would have been the only country in the world to have found it necessary to tax money that was literally payable to widows and orphans out of life insurance proceeds. Let there be no doubt as to why the government backed down from that taxation proposal. It was because of our insistence on this side that we did not want such retrograde taxation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Only a month or so ago the leader of my party sent a personal letter to the Minister of Finance asking him to reconsider that tax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I could go on, but let us first remember why the government needs these funds which it has shown us tonight are growing further in the form of tax revenues. It needs the funds because it has expanded its spending at such a rate that its deficit in this year alone is estimated to be $9.2 billion.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Stevens: To put that deficit into perspective, let us remember that $9.2 billion was almost the size of the total federal budget when the Prime Minister took power in this country. We are told in addition in the minister's statement that not only are we faced with $9.2 billion this year but that next year we have to budget for an additional $2 billion in the form of accrued interest on the debt that this government has run up.

When we speak about tax reductions such as the lower sales tax to which I have referred, let there be no doubt—and I underline this—that we believe $1 billion could be slashed from the government's spending plans with no trouble at all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: We are not talking about bigger deficits, we are not talking about bigger federal outlays, we are talking about less. In short, we say: restore the income base of Canadians, limit government spending, and we can all enjoy less taxation in this country.

Before this evening our economy was virtually standing still with at least one fifth of our productive capacity sitting idle. Having heard the minister's speech I would suggest that we are still facing that kind of stagnation. Before this evening our dollar had plunged to 90 cents because the world had lost confidence in the government. Having heard the minister's speech, we doubt if that confidence will be renewed tomorrow. In short, only the face of this ministry has changed in the person of the new minister. We have had ten years of economic mismanagement and the government apparently does not learn quickly. In short, it is a government which has systematically demonstrated that it is incapable of managing the Canadian economy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: You will recall that only yesterday the Prime Minister started to change like a chameleon. Now that his spending spree has caused such harm in the country, we find that the Prime Minister is starting to run with the hounds after having run with the hares. He certainly tells us, you will recall, that we must now be disciplined, that we have grown too soft. But he scarely glances at his own government's lack of discipline. Now he tells us that the goals that we rightly thought attainable in this country—and I suggest most members of the House would agree—are now unattainable. He tells us that our expectations are too high. Imagine, our per capita average income when he took power was second in the world and now it has fallen to tenth, and he tells us that our expectations are too high. Just guess who is ninth? Luxembourg!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: In view of his new demand for harsh discipline I would like to remind the Prime Minister of a statement he made at the Ottawa Canadian Club in 1972. Probably he does not like to be reminded of this, but I will quote him: He said:

> Well, this tremendous growth which is within our grasp is really fantastic. It really boggles the mind to think that one half of our productive base is only beginning to be built now—the productive base that we will have in 1983. Now this, I submit, means the revolution of rising expectations can be very high indeed and still be capable of fullfilment.

● (2052)

Now the Prime Minister tells Canadians they should not have any expectations at all. Frankly, those expectations can still be attained in this country with proper direction from Ottawa, and we would be pleased to deliver it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: We can be once again not just number two but number one in the world, but we have a Prime Minister who, when he cannot attain certain goals, is a bit like a hockey player. Not being able to put the puck in the net any more, he says, "Widen the net".

[Mr. Stevens.]

We have been told tonight that there will be a phasing out of wage and price controls beginning on April 14 of next year. Frankly, I wonder whether the minister can be believed when he speaks about ending wage and price controls. We had the Prime Minister telling the country on the weekend that we must accept a new discipline, and then he came into the House and said that an example of the new discipline he had in mind was the controls program.

Let us not forget that it was the Prime Minister who, in the 1974 election campaign, promised the Canadian public that he would not institute wage and price controls, and then did so after his election. Can they be believed when they suggest that they are going to go into a decontrol phase period by April 14, 1978?

Some hon. Members: No way.

Mr. Stevens: The frank truth is that we have a Prime Minister who believes in state intervention. He believes that he and his mandarins know better how to run our lives than we do ourselves. In short, he likes controls for others. That is why I suggest to this House that while we are to go through an apparent decontrol program, if the present Prime Minister should ever gain re-election with a majority, we will be stuck with controls for an indefinite period, and that is the truth.

On another occasion I should like to outline some of the plans we would like to see instituted which we feel would restore the momentum of the economy and which would make us once again a viable country. However, I know our time is limited, and I would like to give some time tonight to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) who, I know, is anxious to speak in this debate as well.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, to begin with I should like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I should also like to thank the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) for giving me at least a few minutes of his time.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and wish him well. He is a man who is very likeable, and for that reason it is a grave disappointment to see the kind of mini-budget he brought in tonight. It is a disaster of the greatest proportions. At a time when the country desperately needs measures, or an understanding of the crisis we face, the minister gives us more of the same things which have brought us to the condition we are in now. We hoped for more from this minister. It is not that we expected he could pull some rabbit out of a hat or work some miracle in the four or five weeks he has occupied his ministry, but that he would at least have some understanding of the kind of serious situation we face in Canada. He read his speech well, but having read it well does not change the fact that he just had platitudes and banalities to put forward.

The minister says that there is no fundamental reason why we should not continue to grow. We have grown faster than most other countries in the past, and there is no fundamental reason why we should not do so in the future. The evidence is quite clear that not just Canada but other countries in the world cannot expect the kind of growth which has taken place in the past, and that the sooner this government gets down to recognizing that something important and fundamental has changed in our society, the sooner we are going to come up with answers.

There will be a few dollars thrown around to do one thing or the other, but we are never going to come to grips with any of the problems. The minister is trying to carry water in a leaky bucket, and until he fixes the leaks in that bucket he is not going to have much effect. It is one thing to admire his industry and his running back and forth with his leaky bucket, but it is another thing to accept the results. What is disturbing to me, and to many people like me, is the kind of complacency and unawareness we see on the government side with respect to what is going on in this country.

Mr. Benjamin: Like Herbert Hoover.

Mr. Saltsman: My colleague is right. Herbert Hoover sounded like a sage compared with the kinds of things we heard from the minister tonight. As I said earlier, I did not expect the minister to come up with all the answers, nor do I anticipate that I can put forward all the answers and find a solution to the problem, but the troublesome thing is that the minister is not even asking the right questions, let alone coming close to any kind of solution. There are changes taking place in our society which I think should be evident to everyone. There simply will not be enough jobs to go around, and it is not just a matter of throwing more money into creating more jobs. The system is not working.

A couple of years ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a speech which horrified his colleagues. He said that the market system was breaking down. He was closer to the truth then than he has been since. The market system is in fact breaking down. Things are not working. Certain things which are supposed to have one effect are not having an effect at all, or they are having a contrary effect. We will look at some of those things.

Over the last number of years there have been tax cuts of various kinds, very much like the mild tax cuts or the indexing system that the government is proposing tonight. Those tax cuts were supposed to stimulate consumption. During that period when those tax cuts were taking place—and they included sales tax cuts—consumption declined, and nobody asked why. One of the reasons is obvious. Whether they are tax cuts or tax credits, they go to the wrong people. Sure, some of it trickles down, and whenever it does the relatively less well off people receive benefits from our taxation system, but the maximum benefits go to those who already have a great deal.

The minister seems to be very proud of his announcement about how much money is going to be saved by indexing. Some money will be saved, and the amount will be substantial, but let us take a look at how those savings take place. A married taxpayer under 65 with two children under 16 and earning $5,000 a year—that is the government category—saves $1. However, a member of parliament, or someone who earns over $30,000 or $20,000 a year, saves $195. That is some justice. A person fortunate enough to be making $50,000 a year saves up to $537. And then we wonder why these tax cuts that have been made over the years are not having any effect.

If you look toward the savings package it is quite clear what is happening there. At the same time that these tax cuts are being instituted, the government is providing other benefits. Those who are well off and can put their money away in Registered Retirement Savings Plans or Registered Home Ownership Plans do so. They do not put their money into consumer goods.

The truth of the matter is that for many people in our society, tax cuts do not stimulate the consumption that is supposed to provide jobs; they simply go into savings. The people who have needs, who are not saving, who cannot save—the people who would buy stoves, refrigerators and houses, do not have the money. They are not even in the tax system. This whole business of looking toward tax cuts as an answer to our problems has to be seen as an obvious failure, yet the government continues with this kind of approach reinforced by my friends on the right.

Very often the government tends to pick up the ideas of my friends to my right—whenever they pick up any ideas that is where they look. The indexing system was an idea put forward by the Progressive Conservatives, and I think we are paying very dearly for the indexing of income tax. It is one thing to index at lower levels where it gives a more fair distribution of income. When you index at all levels, however, there are very substantial tax savings for the very rich.

The government budgeted for a deficit of some $5 billion—an unheard of deficit—and now finds itself with an $8 billion deficit which is having virtually no effect on stimulating the economy. That was supposed to work. Large deficits were supposed to provide stimulus to the economy and to provide jobs. They are not providing jobs. The tax cuts were supposed to provide incentives to consumption, which was again supposed to provide jobs. They are not providing jobs.

It should be obvious that the system is failing, Mr. Speaker. The system is not working, yet what we have seen tonight from the Minister of Finance is the same old patchwork on the same old leaky bucket. He seems to expect the country to see this as something of value or benefit.

Mr. Woolliams: There is no water in the bucket.

Mr. Saltsman: Some of it stays in, but not very much. If we examine one of the proposals the government has put forward tonight, it can be conceded that it cannot be wrong about everything. Here it is on the right track. It suggested putting $150 million into federal spending for job creation. What we would like the government to consider—and we have an amendment to this effect—is that the $1.2 billion in tax incentives to industry that appeared in the last budget should be wiped out and added to this $150 million in order to provide jobs.

It is all right for my friends to the right to say the government should get out of business and that the government should get out of the economy. That is exactly what the government has been doing in the last few years in response to the suggestions from my friends in the Progressive Conservative party. It has been cutting back on government expenditures—or trying to; it has been responding in a more conservative way than the Conservatives themselves. What has been the consequence? It has been high unemployment. The theory has been that if the government gets out of the economy, then private industry is going to rush in there and create jobs. They say "free private industry—unfetter the hands of private industry to create the jobs." Private industry has been unfettered, and we have fewer and fewer jobs.

Just this morning my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), told me the very sad news that something in the neighbourhood of 3,000 people in Sudbury and 650 in Thompson are to be laid off. That is unfettering the private sector, Mr. Speaker!

I do not blame the private sector for not being able to create jobs. If the world market for nickel is depressed or if other factors are involved, they cannot be blamed for creating this situation. The point I am trying to make is that they are not in a position to provide jobs despite the fact that mining incentives have been given and tax write-offs have been given. The government has foregone $1.2 billion of tax revenue and that has to be made up by someone else. Despite all this, there are fewer and fewer jobs in the private sector. It is not that the private sector wants to be contrary. If the demand is not there—if foreign countries are not buying the resources that unfortunately we were too dependent upon for too many years, if people are not buying goods and services in our economy, then business cannot respond. In a modern society the stimulus comes from government and no longer from the private sector.

The private sector is certainly a very useful part of our society and should be encouraged. I for one have no hang-ups about that. Many of the groups in the private sector do a good job, but they are no longer in command of the situation. My friends to my right and perhaps across the way might say that is because Canada has become very socialistic. I think the usual phrase is, "business has lost its confidence in the economy, has lost its confidence in the government". I see there is agreement from my friends in the Progressive Conservative party on that statement.

Mr. Bawden: It is the first correct thing you have said.

Mr. Saltsman: Then how do you explain the fact that the United States is also going through a recession? Are they socialists?

Mr. Bawden: Their dollar state is better than ours.

Mr. Saltsman: Their dollar is dropping very, very dramatically in relationship to the British pound, of all things.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

While the government can be blamed for a lot of things—and I think in relative terms we could have been better off than Luxembourg—if you really look at what is happening in western society you will see that what we are going through is something virtually every society in the industrialized world is going through. There is inflation all over the world; even in countries where unemployment has been unknown for 30 years there is now unemployment. There is a crisis of some kind in the west. In many ways, and what I was going to say is annoying but it is more than annoying—it is sickening—

Mr. Alexander: Repugnant.

An hon. Member: Revolting.

Mr. Saltsman: The adjectives are coming from all sides of the House from people who have a way with the English language. This is what is so disturbing, having listened to the minister tonight—nowhere in the speech is there any kind of thinking, any kind of clue or assurance that he understands the problem we face. It is always more of the same—"things are a little tough but they are going to improve".

If we look at the history of western society in the early thirties—I am not predicting a recession of the kind we went through then—I see the same set of attitudes, the same kind of blindness, the feeling that prosperity is just around the corner. I see the same kind of oblivion to the fact that society had broken down. It took the preparation for war and the war itself, ten years of misery, to extricate the western world from the mess it got into.

We have gone through that. We had Keynesian economics. We have had a relatively high level of prosperity in all the western world for 25 or 30 years, but again the free enterprise system, the market system, is facing a crisis. It is a crisis of a different kind, however. The crisis in the depression was one where there was not enough investment, enough stimulus, enough consumer buying power. To some extent that is the same as now, but with this difference—that during those times you had a tremendous, pent-up demand for virtually everything. By government pump priming you were able to get the economy going.

Certainly the determination of Canadians following the Second World War to make sure that we would not go into the same recession that we went into after the World War I gave us prosperity with Keynesian economics. It taught us that if the private sector does not invest then the public sector has to invest, and to that extent the situation is similar today. The private sector is not investing, and why should it invest? It is not a question of consumer confidence; it is not investing anywhere. The point is that plants are idle in many cases, though perhaps not totally idle. They are operating at 80 per cent of capacity. So what is the incentive to invest? The only way investment will take place is if the demand is there. I do not think the private sector would invest any faster if my hon. friends on my right were sitting on the government benches.

Mr. Fraser: Let us just try it.

Mr. Saltsman: That would be a very heavy risk to run. That is really what we have to face, Mr. Speaker.

What is happening? I think one thing that is happening is that the causes of growth have changed. We are no longer in the same kind of world we were once in, a world in which growth was fueled by new frontiers or war. We do not want war or revolution to fuel growth. Growth was fueled by large numbers of children, family formations following the Second World War and for years afterwards. New households were formed, and this called for houses and for all kinds of other goods and services.

Growth was also fueled by immigration. Immigrants who came to this country, contrary to what some people think, created more jobs than they were supposedly to take away. They created a boom in our economy. We went through that, but now we have reduced immigration. There was a pent up demand that was there. There were inventions, such as radios, television. All kinds of things were invented. Now, rather than these inventions spurring on demand, they are creating such automated processes as to wipe out jobs. Many of the incentives which we provide for investment at the same time are destroying jobs that we are supposed to be creating.

This is something that will be on for a long time. I am not suggesting for one moment that we bring back the Luddites and smash up machinery; I am simply suggesting that we have to face the reality of a changing society. There was a time when we had cheap energy. We could do all kinds of things because we never worried about energy. But the days of cheap energy are over.

There was a time when people polluted the atmosphere. They did not care about the environment or the consequences of pollution. You had great productivity and you dumped all your waste into a river. We will not stand for that any more. You cannot live off nature in that particular way; things have changed.

There are many hon. members who have been thinking about these problems in the way I and my colleagues have been thinking about them. We have to face the fact that there are not going to be enough jobs to go around, certainly not with the kind of proposals which the government is putting forward. Even if the government were to listen to us, and I think it should, and it took the $1.2 billion in its last budget which it is going to give away as tax incentives, and put it into direct job creation, the situation would improve. If it is going to get 50,000 jobs—although I think that is high—out of $150 million worth of investment, Mr. Speaker, you can calculate how many more jobs it would get if it would put those incentives into direct job creation. The incentives have not demonstrated that they have been effective anyway; they have just been giveaways and have done very little good in terms of creating employment.

If that is the case, then we have to be thinking along some new lines. I see from this morning's paper that the American Congress and Senate have both decided to remove their clause stipulating compulsory retirement. We should be going the other way. We should be reorganizing our old age pensions to make it optional for people to retire at an earlier age, in order to provide jobs for young people coming into the labour market.

In principle it sounds like a great idea to say no one should be forced to retire at 65—until you start to look at it. Who are the ones who are hanging on to their jobs at the age 65? They are the executives, the guys with the cushy jobs and the seniority, and they are not letting the others in.

Mr. Fraser: Some have brains and talent too.

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, they have brains and talent too. My colleagues should not get so excited, because any one of us may be forced to retire before 65. I know that the guy who works in the factory and really slugs it out, whether in an auto plant or in a textile mill, does not want to work after he is 65. He wants to get out of there and get something out of life for all those early mornings he got up, and for the hours of slugging that he put in, and he should be able to do that. I am surprised that my friends on the right took this as personal criticism because I did not intend it that way. I know I have some colleagues who are absolutely irreplaceable, and I would not dream of retiring them at 65. But they are the exceptions.

We are in danger of creating two classes of people in our society. To some extent this is already visible. We have those who have a job and are working, and those who do not have a job now and, unfortunately, in many parts of this country have no prospects of a job. Unless something dramatic happens, they look forward to a jobless youth, and perhaps even a jobless middle age.

What we do at the present time to take care of the situation, to the extent that we do take care of it, is not to provide jobs or look at ways of providing jobs. Rather we have something called the unemployment insurance fund. My leader has made it very, very clear that what this party wants are jobs, not welfare. Those people who are working, whether they understand it or not, are being taxed very, very heavily to pay for those who are not working. How much better to share that work to find a way of providing more employment, to create more of the good things through more people working. If we have to reduce the work week in order to do this, then we should be thinking about it.

Some people say, "Those terrible socialists! If we ever listened to them, they would want to have a very sharply graduated income tax; they really want to hit those guys at the top hard". In some ways that is true. We think that the guy at the bottom has had a rough deal for a long, long time. We think that rather than tax cuts, which do not help him very much, or only marginally, there should be tax credits or, as my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would argue, demogrant payments, direct payments to everyone.

Mr. Woolliams: But he won't retire.

Mr. Nystrom: He will in 10 years.

Mr. Saltsman: The example that is put me is that a doctor is not going to work 60 or 80 hours a week if he has to pay more in taxes. I say that a doctor should not be working that many hours. Or it is argued that somebody is not going to work overtime if he has to pay too much tax. I say he should not be working overtime when other people do not have a job at all. It is that kind of thinking we have to come to grips with if ever we are going to find an answer to any of our problems.

I was very shocked when I picked up the paper the other week. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) had made a speech in Brantford. He indicated that the federal government was considering some changes in the family allowance. I am sure that will have a lot of support from my friends on the right. One thing they are considering is eliminating the family allowance for the first child. I know the minister has children. He must realize that the first child is the most expensive. Until you have that child, it is virtually like being single. You do not really have any expense. It is the first child that costs you money. That is when you buy the crib, when you need the bigger house, and have many other things to consider.

The minister went on to suggest that they are considering untying the cost of living benefits from the family allowance. That is shocking. The government today talks about how much it is going to do for people in terms of additional tax room, and then it comes along and takes it away with this.

What is particularly shocking about untying or removing the cost of living benefits so that they do not escalate with the cost of living is that the pensions of members of parliament and of civil servants have a full cost of living allowance. It is a strange set of values to discuss it in these terms. I presume the minister was flying a kite for somebody thinking about doing it, and did not want to take the responsibility upon himself.

I see you are getting restless, Mr. Speaker. I want to conclude by again expressing my disappointment with the measures brought before this House tonight, and in particular my disappointment in realizing that the government, despite the terrible experience of the past few years and the horrendous forecast of unemployment for this winter, does not seem to have learned a darn thing.

● (2125)

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, first of all, like all my colleagues who have heard the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I wish to congratulate them for their first experience in this House and wish them all the best in their parliamentary function. I also want to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for acceding to this portfolio and wish him well, particularly in the area of finance as we know it in Canada. He certainly deserves to be encouraged to perform somersaults as unbelievable as those we have witnessed tonight.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

At least in his speech tonight he made a few attempts and we already feel a coming election, which will probably take place in 1978, and we realize that the minister has made efforts in this regard because his speech was of a somewhat electoral nature. He tried to demonstrate in his statement that the federal government, through the Department of Finance, tries to promote an economic recovery. But if we read his speech seriously and look at the words and their meaning, we realize there are not too many real facts. He announces some income tax exemptions of about $1.5 billion whereby individuals who earn $15,000 or less would pay $100 less in income tax during the year 1978, which means also a decrease of about $700 million in federal revenues.

He has also told us about the savings which Canadians would achieve under the indexing system whereby the government will allocate $850 million less under this item. However, we have noticed that the minister has made a guess in this regard because no one knows at present what will be necessary in terms of indexing by the federal government in 1978 to cover the amount referred to in its estimates.

Mr. Speaker, I must emphasize that there are some kinds of double talk and electoral promises in this speech. I would draw your attention to page 10, for instance, where the minister got loud applause from his colleagues. He said, as one can read on page 10:

> As a result of representations from members of all sides of the House, I will not be proceeding at this time with the measure for taxing the investment income realized by a policyholder on the death of the person insured.

This is nothing more than a promise, Mr. Speaker: I will not be proceeding at this time with the measure for taxing . . . Well, if elections were held in 1978 and if the Liberal Party were returned to power, what would happen to insurance policies, when the minister has been unable to give the House an official guarantee that there will be no taxing of insurance policies. Therefore, we can be sure that if the Liberal Party is still in power following the forthcoming elections, we shall have to cope again with this measure which the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Macdonald) had introduced in his last budget. When we examine the paragraphs which make up the minister's speech one after the other, we find that he is playing on both sides of the fence in order to win elections and return to power.

For instance, in his speech he deals with job creating measures which are still unknown. So there is no way we can find out tonight just how much the government has earmarked for this job creating scheme. There is something which surprises me very much in this budget, and it is that the government will grant $1.5 billion in income tax exemptions, while foreseeing a deficit of some $8.5 billion. This means that the Canadian people will get a deficit of $8.5 billion at the same time as a profit of $1.5 billion. Mr. Speaker, if these are simple, straightforward and just economic principles, this is beyond me.

Further on, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out another electoral gadget on page 51 of the fiscal statement about the home insulation program and I quote:

. . . $350. These grants are to be included in the recipient's income. If received by a married individual, the grant will be included in the income of the spouse with the higher income.

Mr. Speaker, is this not another election trick or gadget to try to take in suckers? If we read that statement at leisure, if we reread it once or twice, we note that there are more words than facts. The $100 allowance for any taxpayer earning $15,000 a year or less is emphasized. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing this evening in that statement for those in Canada who earn minimum wages. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in tonight's budget for all those who do not pay income tax in Canada. Tonight's budget does not mean anything for all those in Canada who live on welfare allowances. For handicapped, disabled and retired people the budget is next to nothing. Mr. Speaker, we know that 20 per cent of Canadian workers live below the poverty line. Mr. Speaker, tonight's budget is not for them.

It made me laugh a while ago, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) began reading his budget, to see that my hon. friends from the official opposition accused the Liberals of stealing the Progressive Conservative ploy, the $100 deduction for every individual earning $15,000 or less. If Progressive Conservatives have only the $100 deduction ploy up for grabs the Liberals did not steal much. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance wants to fight inflation by creating employment.

He wants to create jobs just as fast as the present system turns out unemployed people. He reminds me of someone who keeps adding water to a bucket or a pail with a hole in it to try and maintain the water level while the hole at the bottom is getting bigger and bigger every day. The Minister of Finance wants to increase the speed of jobs creation in Canada to ward off rising unemployment by borrowing money from financiers and making it available for various jobs creation programs. His right hand wants to create jobs while his left is turning out unemployed people every day.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot explain, and it is an open secret in Canada, why Canadian industries and private enterprises, in spite of being victimized, as the socialists say, by the harmful results of the federal government's monetary and economic policy, reduce their personnel to go and invest their capital elsewhere or simply close shop. They go and invest elsewhere to set up industries and get cheaper production costs. Tomorrow those very industries will export into Canada products that they could have produced here in Canada yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government, through its shortsighted financial policy, is itself contributing to create multinationals that it will no longer be able to control tomorrow in forcing Canadian companies to expatriate instead of expanding in Canada, for they have to go and find elsewhere a better and more favourable economic climate and favourable economic conditions which the government has so far failed to give them to be able to produce more cheaply.

The problem in Canada, Mr. Speaker, is that we are out of step with international competition. Our industries in Canada cannot produce any more. The present economic system and the government economic trend are forcing companies to grow into multinationals.

I am thinking here of the case of several Canadian shoe manufacturers who can no longer compete with the imports, especially as a result of the economic and financial policies of the government which has practically managed to destroy both the shoe and textile industries in Canada. These are now in the process of setting up shop elsewhere, where labour is less severely taxed and consequently where production is less expensive for the industry. Tomorrow, those formerly Canadian companies will export to Canada goods that could have been manufactured in Canada had they stayed here.

The federal government, through its financial and monetary follies, is forced to tax individuals to such an extent in order to meet its budgetary extravagances that today Canadian taxpayers have to earn $15,000 a year to live, after having paid all the direct and indirect taxes of the government. But if they were taxed less heavily they could live with $7,500 a year and buy the same production with the same dollar having the same purchasing power which would allow us to produce and compete elsewhere after first keeping our own domestic market. Nowadays Canadian businesses which have not yet become monopolies and must meet competition are stifled by taxation and bureaucracy. More and more they want to abandon any proposed expansion because they have realized that the federal and other governments—without taking any risks or investing—are drawing more revenues each week from those industries than the profits essential to the good operation of the whole industry that wants to progress and improve.

Those industries are left with the solution of remaining in stagnation before closing their doors and going elsewhere to invest while reducing their activities in Canada. All private enterprise wants in Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a favourable economic climate that will allow it to breathe and not force it to go somewhere else to do what it could normally do in Canada. The Canadian companies that go abroad to invest by participating in the financing of existing industries abroad will be exporting to Canada tomorrow commodities they should have been exporting from Canada if the government did not always wait for industry to close down or lay off most of its employees before waking up.

The Minister of Finance through investments in job creation programs wants to invest with the right hand, and tonight's budget proves it. He wants to invest $5 in job creation with the right hand but with his left hand he takes $30 out of the pocket of the Canadian taxpayer thus reducing his purchasing power which inevitably increases unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, when you distribute $1.5 billion out of $8.5 billion that means you are taking $1 for $6 because the $8.5 billion deficit is the responsibility of Canadians, money which one day will eventually be taken out of their pockets. So you take $8.5 billion out of the pockets of Canadians on the short or the long run and give him $5 today. You take $30 away from him to give him back $5. Mr. Speaker, the left hand of the Minister of Finance is quicker than his right hand with which he gives. His right hand is paralyzed because it is distributing $5 while the taxpayer is being deprived of $30.

The fiscal system in Canada performs better and faster than the job creation system. More money is taken out of circulation as taxes of all kinds than invested. When the banks, for instance, loan $10 million they are repaid $20 million after six and a half years. How is it possible to repay $20 million if the loan is $10 million only? This is mathematically impossible. According to orthodox economists, it is a simple enough thing to borrow $20 million after six and a half years to repay the original $10 million. But the $10 million original debt that has become $20 million after six and a half years will become $40 million in another six and a half years. This means that within 13 years a $10 million loan will require four times the initial amount.

This is the type of system that has created and is still creating inflation. Workers are being insulted, everyone is being insulted, everyone is victimized but the true culprit, the financial system that puts $10 million in circulation and gets $40 million after 13 years. This automatically creates inflation, pushes prices and wages up, and puts us outside international competition.

In the remaining few minutes, I would like to say a few words about inflation, that legalized theft. Our ancestors had to cope with a lot of law-breaking citizens. One of the most popular crimes was coin clipping. As far as we can go back into history, this was a serious crime, so much so that convicted clippers had their hands cut off, both as a punishment and a deterrent from future wrongdoing. Such was the way to rob individuals.

At that time, nearly all coins were made of metal and devaluation was achieved simply by reducing the size and weight of the coins whatever they were: pounds, crowns, florins, shillings or pence. All things considered, the result of this was inflation of the type produced by our present vast devaluation operations.

In a free society like ours, every blow to currency is serious because it affects the way of measuring the value of exchanges between men, which is the very basis of our economic life. If we were to give the same punishment as in the old days to those who are responsible today for devaluation or inflation, I think, Mr. Speaker, that we would have to cut off the hands of most members of this government, including the Treasury Board, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Finance and other officials both on national and regional levels. The persons who are responsible for the devaluation of the currency we use in our everyday life are those very same people we elect and hire to govern us. Certainly the union leaders, who every year set in motion the same old mechanism by exerting pressures to get higher wages for union workers, are also part of this group.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

This coming winter, Mr. Speaker, we will have more than 1.5 million officially unemployed people, which really means at least two million people who are actually unemployed. Also these figures do not include welfare recipients, all those people who are not formally registered as job-seekers. Unemployment is on the increase and will continue to increase because our present monetary system is so designed. Inflation is on the increase and will continue to increase because the monetary system is so designed. Deficits are on the increase in all areas, as evidenced in the budget. In the 1976-77 budget, our deficit will be close to $8.5 billion. What that boils down to, Mr. Speaker, is that in less than three years we have accumulated an international deficit of $40 billion.

At the present time, our trade deficit is $30 billion. Still we won the war while West Germany lost it and built up a surplus of exactly $40 billion. We won the war and we have a trade deficit of $40 billion. Germany lost the war and has a surplus trade balance of $40 billion.

Mr. Speaker, this means that when we are told that the methods are obsolete, the high unemployment and inflation rates show clearly that the economic methods of a less complex period are not doing anything more today. We deplore the evil. We begin to realize that our systems are obsolete, that they are outdated but there is no solution and we continue in the same system.

Peter C. Newman, a distinguished Canadian reporter wrote in chapter 3 of his book, The Canadian Establishment, what Social Crediters have been saying for 35 years, and I quote:

● (2142)

[English]

Administering more than a hundred billions in assets the men who run Canada's banks rule the nation's economy. They decide who will succeed and who will fail acting as arbiters of the system—the fiscal father confessors of us all.

[Translation]

While people are getting thinner and running into debt, banks are growing fat and thrive. Mr. Speaker, while we are racking our brains, looking at inflation, unemployment and deficits both inside and outside Canada, there is an organization in Canada which does not make any deficit, where the average interest rate was 6 per cent in 1968 while it reaches a high of 12 per cent today.

REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO AID BASE METAL INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. The announcement by INCO metals company that at a time of record high unemployment in this country 4,000 workers will lose their jobs in Thompson, Manitoba, Port Colborne, Ontario and Sudbury, Ontario raises serious questions about Canada's industrial strategy, her future trade balance and the foresight of the Government of Canada. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That, in the opinion of this House, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance should meet immediately with representatives of the Canadian base metal industry to discuss means by which jobs and export potential could be retained and report back to the House by way of a statement on motions to explain what action will be taken by the government to repair the damage caused by its scandalous negligence of the industry and its workers.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSED PROGRAM FOR STOCKPILING NICKEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, it is with anger tinged with sadness that I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity. I seek the unanimous consent of all hon. members of this House.

In view of the fact that yesterday, the day on which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced his bootleg budget which is supposed to stimulate job creation by the private sector, INCO announced its Christmas gift to the Sudbury Basin in the form of 2,800 lost jobs, and in view of the fact that these lost jobs will cost the federal treasury in excess of $30 million, not counting the loss in human terms to the many young families which will be affected, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the government of Canada immediately to set up a program of stockpiling nickel and copper in the same fashion as wheat, butter, uranium and gold have been stockpiled in the past to save both communities and workers from disaster until such time as world markets improve.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to Standing Order 43 can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT NOT AID THOSE CHALLENGING LEGALITY OF QUEBEC'S BILL 101—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move an important motion of pressing necessity.

Considering that the Prime Minister has announced that some assistance would be forthcoming to Quebec or Canadian citizens who wish to bring their grievances before a court in connection with Bill 101 establishing French as the only official language in Quebec; considering that this concrete assistance would be paid out of public funds by all taxpayers of the country; considering that this financial help of the Canadian government means that Quebec citizens who are mostly in favour of that legislation would pay out of their pockets their own prosecution; considering also the preposterousness of such an unjust and ambiguous situation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the Prime Minister and the government forgo any financial or other contribution to help the citizens or groups of citizens who decide to bring before the courts their dispute about Bill 101 duly passed by the Quebec National Assembly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ANTI-INFLATION PROGRAM

REDUCTION IN MAXIMUM WAGE INCREASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro) indicated in Oshawa recently that it would be wrong "to ask workers to take less than the increase in the cost of living", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House condemns the cruel unfairness and hypocrisy of last night's announced change in the controls program which will reduce to 6 per cent the maximum wage and salary increase permitted under the controls program at precisely the same time that increases in the cost of living are running at an excess of 8 per cent; such unfairness being totally repugnant to the Canadian sense of decency.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

CONGRATULATIONS ON RECEIVING NOBEL PEACE PRIZE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 on a matter of importance to our nation.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House unanimously extend its congratulations to Amnesty International for having received the recent Nobel Peace Prize.

Mr. Speaker: The provisions of Standing Order 43 require the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my question must affect a number of departments and ministers it must be directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the rather ruthless decision of the board of INCO metals limited communicated to the world yesterday—a decision, by the way which has rocked the metal production and mining industry of the world today—that over 4,000 families in Canada alone, spread through northern and southern Ontario and northern Manitoba which is going to have very tragic repercussions in this initial phase only in respect of this massive layoff at INCO, I should like to ask the Prime Minister when the government of Canada received notice of this decision and what is the government doing about it? Have they set up a special Cabinet committee? Who is on it? Why in the world are they waiting until next Tuesday before they get any public reaction to this momentous decision?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was informed of this very serious decision yesterday morning.

An hon. Member: For the first time?

Mr. Trudeau: I immediately conferred with the Minister of Employment and Immigration and officials, and ascertained that they were already proceeding to organize meetings with the INCO people in the Sudbury region and seeking to find alternative solutions to this very serious unemployment problem.

Mr. Lawrence: Come on, now. Mr. Speaker, surely this House and the country have the right to know what specifics the government of Canada is proposing in relation to a solution to a problem that in its initial phase only is going to have very tragic repercussions throughout Canada, not just northern Ontario or northern Manitoba but in the Niagara region as well. If the Prime Minister is unaware of what his ministers are doing or what the specifics are, let us hear from one of the many ministers who should be involved in this. What is the government of Canada proposing to do about this economic tragedy? Surely, at a time when the federal government had more notice of it than any provincial government and yet the provinces seem to be moving much faster on it, we should have more than a general evasive answer such as the Prime Minister has just given.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I gave the hon. member my answer a moment ago. The fact that I was informed yesterday morning does not mean my ministers had not been informed before that. They had met the night before with the INCO people. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Labour tells me that as long as two weeks ago he was discussing contingency measures with the INCO people.

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my final question must be directed to one or other of these ministers who have been involved for so long in this matter. How about the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources? What is the government doing about this tragedy in the mining industry and the metal industry in this country? What specifics does the minister have or what does his government have? What are you proposing to lay before the meeting next Tuesday? The Ontario officials met with INCO management last night, met with the Sudbury labour people this morning, and right now, today, there is an emergency debate in the Ontario legislature about this matter. Why the foot dragging at the cabinet level? What is the minister proposing specifically?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when I hear the hon. member ask a question of that nature, it seems to me he is more interested in coverage than candour.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member indicated, first of all, that we are dragging our feet.

An hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Paproski: That is exactly what you are doing.

Mr. Cullen: In point of fact, the minister of labour for the province of Ontario called my office and asked if they could participate in the meeting we had arranged with both management and labour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is an admission right there.

Mr. Cullen: Second, I met with two members from International Nickel who spelled out for us, the night before the announcement, the action they proposed to take. At that time I discussed with them some possible alternatives about how we might ameliorate that very, very serious situation. I indicated to them that in addition—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What about Gillespie?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. members opposite want to listen, I will tell them. The INCO people are prepared to listen, the union is prepared to listen, so surely the opposition should be prepared to listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: All the members opposite want is coverage.

Mr. Paproski: Pierre, you are an old sly fox.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I spelled out to management that in the new Bill C-27 there was a provision dealing with work sharing. It struck me that this was a textbook case for the application of that provision.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The INCO officials expressed very serious interest in this, because they were looking at other alternatives themselves. One example is a four day work week, as well as other mechanisms and machinery. I will discuss that with management and with labour.

In addition to that, we have notified all our Canada Manpower officers that they are to focus in on the Sudbury and Thompson areas, and any vacancies or job opportunities which occur in the mining field. Also in addition to that, we are carefully cataloguing those opportunities that are available to see if these individuals at INCO, most of whom have approximately two or three years seniority in that particular operation, are more mobile and would be in a position to move. It is unfortunate that they may have to move. Some of them will move, some of them will not move. We will do everything we can to accommodate them. Also, in addition to that, under our Canada Works program, we are going to look to spending more moneys—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Well, the hon. members say: "oh, oh", but the hon. members from Sudbury seem to indicate that it is not a bad alternative. In addition to that, we will be looking at using the emergency feature of the Canada Works program in the interests of assisting.

The hon. member has referred to foot dragging. The company has to give the union 16 weeks notice of this particular lay-off. On that basis, we have time to work. We do not believe in operating the way the hon. member is suggesting. We have to look very carefully at a most serious problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE SITUATION AT THOMPSON, MANITOBA

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It appears we are dealing with a government that cannot see much further than the end of its nose. Just a few short years ago, during his flower years, of course, the Prime Minister said that those who are unemployed should go to Thompson for jobs. Yesterday massive layoffs were announced by INCO metals. The Minister of Employment and Immigration neglected to mention the Thompson area when he referred to creating some stop-gap employment. Thompson is seriously affected with 650 layoffs. Will the minister advise what contingency plans he has for the 650 people laid off who live some 500 miles north of Winnipeg and who do not have the means to move to other jobs. As the minister knows very well, jobs are very scarce in northern Manitoba. We just received the biggest grant of any constituency in Canada of $4.6 million under Canada Works. Is the government just going to keep adding Canada Works projects in a country that is alive with resources? What immediate action is the minister going to take to assist these 650 people?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, obviously the measures that I have indicated are equally applicable to Thompson. One aspect of the Thompson situation is—and I have discussed this in some detail with International Nickel management—that the turnover rate there is about 600 in the course of a year, which is about the work force affected. To some extent, attrition will play its part in that particular operation. The hon. member indicated that we recognize the difficulties in northern Manitoba. That is why his constituency received the $4.6 million. We would also look at the application of the emergency fund aspect of Canada Works and conceivably add to those figures if it will do anything to ameliorate a very serious situation, not only in Sudbury, but in Thompson as well.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): The other day the Prime Minister said that Canadians are soft and will have to toughen up. I say to him that Canadians living in Manitoba want jobs. They do not want stop-gap programs such as the minister has been announcing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS WITH BASE METAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): I wish to ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to indicate what Canada's industrial strategy is, if in fact we have one. When was the last meeting held with the base metal industry of Canada? What are the future plans to meet with the base metal industry in Canada in order to keep it alive?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are meetings all the time with the base metal industry in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: You people—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Gillespie: —do not seem to be very interested in the answers because you are just making noise. It seems to me if you had a little more concern for the workers involved, you would be prepared to listen.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

FINANCE

REASON FOR FAILURE TO LINK JOB CREATION TO TAX CONCESSIONS TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, this belated concern for the workers coming from the minister is very touching indeed. I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In the budget of last March, the government provided more than $1 billion in tax concessions to large corporations without requiring specific job creation to entitle them to receive the benefits. Since among those receiving benefits were Northern Telecom which became eligible for millions of dollars as a result of the budget of last March and has recently laid off up to 1,000 people, and since INCO corporation, which yesterday laid off some 4,000 workers, has received more than $10 million as a result of the same budget, I should like to ask the minister why in heaven's name he reintroduced last night the same provisions as contained in the budget of last March instead of taking an equivalent amount of money and spending it on direct job creation?

• (1127)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the government should take upon itself to settle all problems. I believe it is important to give the corporate sector the possibility to develop by creating a favourable situation in the area of taxation so as to enable them to invest in Canada. Investments are important to Canada. It is impossible for the government to solve all problems. We need a sound private sector.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: The minister's answer, I must say, is just stupid. They are not investing to create jobs. INCO got $10 million out of the budget of last March. But instead of creating jobs they are laying off thousands of workers. INCO corporation recently received from the government of Canada some $378 million in tax deferral benefits. It has received this year from the federal government via the Export Development Corporation $40 million in special assistance which it has used to create jobs in Guatemala, Indonesia and New Caledonia. If the minister is really serious about using the private sector to create jobs, why is he using the taxpayers' money to give to the corporations so that they can create jobs in other countries in competition with Canadian workers?

Mr. Chrétien: I am not sure whether the figures used by the hon. member are correct, but we in Canada are involved in export and we export Canadian technology, something we are doing very effectively. It is extremely important that we continue to export the technology available to us when it is needed elsewhere. We cannot run a closed shop operation. We have to live in the world. It is important to secure market accessibility elsewhere. The incentive given to industry was not to create jobs elsewhere; it was for development in Canada. I think that, as usual, the hon. member is confused.

SUGGESTION MINISTER SEEK DELAY IN LAY-OFFS AT INCO

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I shall be checking the minister's statement with care and I am sure I shall be rising later on a question of privilege. The minister has said these firms are not using in countries abroad the tax benefits to which I have alluded. I can demonstrate clearly that he is wrong. They are. If they are getting $300 in Canada and investing abroad, what does it matter in terms of bookkeeping entries where they get the money if they are spending it abroad? If INCO corporation is getting all these benefits from the taxpayers of Canada, including those in the present budget, will the minister have enough sense to call the head of that corporation to Ottawa and insist that the corporation reverse its decision to lay off workers, at least until some alternative course can be worked out?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I do not believe the hon. member is very aware of the situation. The INCO corporation has already stockpiled reserves sufficient for seven months. The problem is that the world market is very soft. There is a cutback around the world at this time; it is not only in Canada. We have to live with that situation and the people have to realize the situation. We have to compete with other nations and if we are not in a position to compete we are losing jobs. That is a fact. The hon. member can put his head in the sand as much as he wishes but every country in the world is stuck with that situation and I cannot do anything if the hon. member cannot cope with reality.

HOUSING

INQUIRY WHETHER SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDS AVAILABLE FOR RENOVATION OF URBAN DWELLINGS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

In the last few months, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been refusing applications made by parishes and villages in designated areas by saying that such applications cannot be accepted before 1981 or 1982, within the framework of renovation of houses. At the same time, in the regions already designated, home owners have sent in applications a year ago and in some cases two years ago. Those are also refused and applicants are told that perhaps next year their applications may be analyzed. Following the minibudget introduced yesterday by his colleague the Minister of Finance, can the minister inform the House whether supplementary funds will be earmarked for this urban renovation project?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The budget for the program the hon. member is talking about has been tripled over an eighteen-month period. On the other hand, I would like to make a correction concerning the statement of the hon. member to the effect that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is the one that refuses to give municipalities the possibility of assistance for urban renovation. That decision falls exclusively to the provincial authorities and all the municipalities whose applications were not accepted but were turned down by the Quebec government.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

Contrary to what the minister has just said, the letters from the Quebec departments and the Quebec Housing Corporation say that the province of Quebec accepts that they be designated. Follows a letter from the department of municipal affairs supporting the application, and the blame is put on CMHC. In fact, the replies followed meetings with the CMHC in my area, the Val-d'Or region. I should like to know whether the minister is to check the facts and give instructions or at least additional funds to an area such as ours which is very much underprivileged, or perhaps I should say blessed with unemployment?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is willing to send me the correspondence, I shall be pleased to look further into the matter and see exactly what the situation is. I am convinced that if the Quebec authorities are willing to designate some municipalities as eligible for assistance under the housing renewal program, CMHC will be only too eager to go ahead and set up a program in the designated communities.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am prepared to admit that the provincial government accepts that but there is still a problem since there are no funds. That is the answer given to municipalities. We should know, therefore, if the minister has sufficient funds or if the Minister of Finance granted him more money so as to make it possible to designate those areas?

Mr. Ouellet: We have the necessary funds to satisfy demand, and I would like the hon. member to tell me what municipalities have received information from the Quebec government to the effect that they were recognized for renovation purposes. The moment I receive this information, I will gladly check to see if there was indeed correspondence between the government of Quebec and my department about the designation of those municipalities.

ACTION TO REGAIN CANADA'S SHARE OF NICKEL MARKET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the minister directly responsible for maintaining and increasing industrial production in this country, I would ask him whether he has been in touch with the management of INCO to ask them very strongly whether they would maintain production and employment at its present level? If so, what was the response of management? Would he also advise the House what he and his department have done specifically to try to regain the huge share of the world nickel market which Canada once held and which has been reduced from 85 per cent to 30 per cent under this present government. In answering these specific questions, would the minister give specific answers instead of the vague generalities he has indulged in so far this session?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I say my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration has clearly stated that he has been in conversation with management and the union. The problem with INCO is, as the hon. member has already stated, that most of its production is exported and it is meeting severe competition from new minerals and mines in what I might call the third world countries. We have gone out of our way to assist INCO in meeting world competition in every possible way.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What have you done then, Jack?

Mr. Horner: We have assisted in the export of equipment used in mines. I might say to the hon. member for Simcoe North that, on the one hand, he wants the government not to intervene, as I heard him last night, yet today he wants us to intervene. If he could make up his mind on which side of the fence he is, it would help considerably, but he cannot have it both ways. As I was saying, we have gone out of our way to assist. I might add for the hon. member's information that production is off in both Guatemala and Indonesia.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is obvious from what the minister has said that this government does not intend in any way to try to maintain production at the INCO plant in Sudbury but is relying solely on make-work projects which everybody knows are not the answer to our industrial problems in this country today. As this government only seems to be interested in allowing jobs to be exported by international companies such as this instead of trying to increase our exports of the products which we produce in this country, is this not an example of a policy of defeat and nothing but?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Horner cannot answer.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED EXAMINATION OF TAX STRUCTURE OF MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, but the Minister of Finance shows such a misunderstanding of the problem that I want to get back to the Minister of Finance. I am sure the minister must realize that Canada had 92 per cent of the world market in nickel only 15 years ago. Today it has 42 per cent of the world market in nickel and Sudbury has 33 per cent of the world market in nickel. The problem in the nickel industry in Canada is not that of a short-term variation in world demand, but the fact the Canadian mining industry has become non-competitive, and one of the major reasons it is non-competitive is the tax policy of this government. What I want to know, Mr. Speaker, is whether the Minister of Finance is willing to re-examine the tax structure of the mining industry so that it can become competitive and compete in the world markets?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member is very much aware of what is going on. In fact, there is a corporation in the United States called Amex which is selling at this time below cost of production. This is what has depressed the market to the point it is today. This is a fact of life that we have to recognize. Perhaps the only way to get around it would be to form a cartel to fight this depressed market. Then, after that hon. members would tell us that we are doing too much to protect Canadian producers. So they will have to make up their minds about this problem.

Mr. Gillies: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the government wants to go in the direction of a producers' agreement, then they ought to bring it into parliament and not do it behind everybody's backs. Do it legally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO DEVELOP MARKETS FOR CANADIAN NICKEL

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): I should like to ask the minister of external affairs what the Government of Canada is doing to help Canadian nickel get into world markets in a more effective way. What is the government doing in negotiating at UNCTAD to get our nickel into world markets? Has he said anything to Japan about buying our coal as well as taking nickel at the same time? What is Canadian government policy in external affairs in regard to developing markets for nickel? That is where the problem lies.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. gentleman but I say to him frankly that I did not hear the question. There was so much hub-bub going on that I just did not get his point.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, the question I asked the minister of external affairs is, what is the Department of External Affairs doing to try to get our nickel into foreign markets? That is the heart of the problem—to make us more competitive in our dealings in UNCTAD and our dealings with other countries which are buying our products. Are they in fact trying to make tied arrangements or doing something to induce foreigners to buy more of our nickel? For example, what are we doing about selling nickel to Japan which wants our coal in such great quantities? What is the policy of the government in this respect?

Mr. Jamieson: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are moving on virtually all of those fronts that the hon. member talked about.

Mr. Hees: But you are moving backwards, Don.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it is better that we are moving backwards than be like the hon. gentleman who does not seem to have moved at all in the last 20 years and is still uttering the same vacuous comments that he was when he first came to the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: You badly need new life, Don.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I started to answer that we are moving on a number of fronts and have been for some time. Within UNCTAD and the various meetings that have been convened in connection with the north-south conference we have been talking about various forms of commodity agreements, price stabilization and market access. It is a very complex subject. I think some of the documents have been published. I will be glad to make available what we can provide additionally.

● (1142)

In addition to that, of course, there are also our bilateral negotiations with countries such as Japan and the European Economic Community. We have been seeking in these markets to get greater access for our raw materials. I should also remind the hon. member that while this problem is pressing as of this moment, we have also been seeking, with the general encouragement of hon. members opposite, to develop a kind of commodity strategy so that indeed we will not continue to be simply supplying raw materials but will also be able to get into a sectoral approach which will give us some outside markets for our finished and semi-finished products.

If I may be permitted one other comment, Mr. Speaker, another most important area where we are very active at the moment is in connection with the Law of the Sea Conference and the potential impact insofar as seabed mining is concerned on land based mineral operations. This is as comprehensive an answer as I can give in the question period, but I will be glad to expand on it.

Mr. Gillies: I am delighted with this dissertation but I would have liked an answer to my question, which is: Is Canada taking the leadership in the development of a producer's agreement in nickel? We do not want to be surprised.

An hon. Member: You broke the law and you know it.

An hon. Member: You gave us no answer.

Mr. Chrétien: This is exactly the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

EXTENSION OF CREDIT TO INCO TO DEVELOP INDONESIAN OPERATION—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN JOBS

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since INCO has invested $850 million in the first stage of its new Indonesian operation and the Export Development Corporation has provided a total of $90 million in credit, can the minister say whether there was any consultation within the government to ensure that priority is given to protect Canadian jobs before external commitments are made?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure that full weight was given to the impact of our assistance to overseas countries in terms, as the hon. member has put it, of the protection of Canadian jobs. But if I am not putting the wrong interpretation on the hon. member's question, I find it reflects the same kind of inconsistency in that on the one hand he asks us to do everything we can to protect jobs within Canada but on the other hand the hon. gentleman, who is the main spokesman of the party opposite, is asking us to help developing countries to get on their own feet and to assist them in those areas where they can have economic development. This, I believe, is one of the great difficulties. I do not recall at this precise moment what discussions went on as to the effect of Indonesian developments on the Canadian market, but I have no doubt that this was a consideration.

Mr. Roche: The minister is bold enough to quote inconsistencies, but nothing is more inconsistent than the foreign policy of this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: May I ask the minister to explain to the House his reference on the national television three days ago to the effect that, with respect to foreign policy, Canada intends to carry a big stick and speak with a loud voice. Can he explain how that fits in with the whole question of commodity agreements, which is also at the heart of the answer he attempted to give to the hon. member for Don Valley?

Mr. Jamieson: In the first place, I did not say what the hon. member has attributed to me.

An hon. Member: I wrote it down.

Mr. Jamieson: It was a conclusion drawn by the interviewer, and if the hon. member wrote it down, then I would like to see it. I would be prepared to make a total and abject apology to the hon. member if I am wrong, but I ask him to do precisely the same thing if he is wrong, and I suggest he is 100 per cent wrong.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): This does not help the workers in Sudbury.

Oral Questions

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF STOCKPILING NICKEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but obviously the minister does not think these questions so important and he has left the chamber, so I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the fact that 2,800 jobs will be lost in the Sudbury Basin, 600 jobs in Thompson, Manitoba and another 700 in Port Colborne, and in view of the fact that the loss of those jobs will be a loss to Revenue Canada and, in terms of unemployment insurance pay-outs, will exceed $50 million, as well as in view of the fact that the minister has said that INCO has a stockpile of seven months and we know that the government has stockpiled uranium for seven years to save the community of Elliot Lake, is the government now prepared to make an announcement to give confidence to potential investors in the Sudbury Basin, in Thompson and Port Colborne—and I wish the minister would make it—in which the government will undertake to stockpile nickel and copper until the markets improve which, according to some projections, will likely take place late next year or early the following year?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we considered this possibility when we met with INCO representatives here two days ago, but setting up a new nickel stockpiling program would be unwarranted at this time because it could cause the market to deteriorate even more. The buyers would then be in a position to offer prices which would be lower still, which would indeed compound the problem. The company refuses to move any further in this direction and does not request governmental assistance in this area.

I believe the best solution just now is that which was put forward by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, because he has already started negotiating with the unions and the company with the hope that, maybe through the introduction of a reduced four-day week and with government assistance, the families of the laid-off workers might still have incomes, though on a reduced scale because of the additional day off. These workers would be entitled to compensation from the government, but they would be working at least four days a week. The solution is probably more in this direction than in a stockpiling program, because the latter solution would be counterproductive at this time.

SUGGESTION MINISTER REQUEST DELAY IN INCO LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Not accepting the preamble to the minister's answer, and keeping in mind that we have stockpiled in this country wheat, butter, uranium and gold for years and years to save these industries, and in view of the fact that the minister said that the government will discuss the alternatives to the situation in Sudbury, Thompson, and Port Colborne, may I ask the minister whether he is prepared now to get in touch with the INCO chairman of the board and to suggest to him that he rescind the order for lay-offs until after he has discussed the alternatives so that they can find some modus vivendi for the industry because the latest developments have affected it so disastrously?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the company has notified us because it gave a 14- to 16-week notice to its employees, which will enable us to find a solution. It has to do so, and I think that until now both the company and the union have shown goodwill; so if everybody keeps calm, we hope to be able to find a solution. I think that the proposal the hon. member is making now is not really the solution, I am sorry to say, but we are always prepared to discuss the matter with the company.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

EFFECT OF LOANS TO MULTINATIONAL COMPANIES ON EMPLOYMENT IN CANADA

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Export Development Corporation lent PT Indonesia, which is a subsidiary of INCO, $100 million at interest rates less than commercial—indeed this is very secret and we cannot find out what that interest rate is—and in view of the fact that all these subsidiaries that have sprung up in Indonesia, New Caledonia and Guatemala are subsidiaries of the International Nickel Company and are in effect competing against themselves, is the minister prepared to drop the clause in the Export Development Corporation Act which permits that bank, using the taxes of the workers of Canada, to make loans to multinational mining companies at less than commercial rates of interest to create the eventual unemployment of those workers?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I think that if we were to follow that type of policy and not give opportunities to developing nations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: —when they are involved in such operations, then we would not be exporting goods and materials produced in Canada. If we do not participate in these ventures, the development of the mines will take place anyway but there will be no Canadian participation. I am not ready to say to the nations of the world that when there is potential growth in developing nations, Canadians will run away. We have international responsibilities, and we have been blessed with natural resources, but we should not do anything which would hurt the poor nations of the world, especially Latin American nations, about which the hon. member is always very keen to talk. We are preoccupied with creating some growth for the poor around the world.

TRANSPORT

INCREASE IN TOLLS ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—EFFECT ON NIAGARA PENINSULA

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport or the acting Minister of Transport. At a recent meeting between members of parliament of the Niagara Peninsula and the Regional Council of Niagara Chambers of Commerce dire prophecies were made that the peninsula economy would suffer disastrously if tolls on the seaway, particularly the Welland Canal, were raised at the end of this year and that this would cause a great reduction in canal traffic and diversion of freight to other modes of transport. I do not share this opinion, but I would like to ask the minister if he would make a statement which would justify the raising of tolls and doubling them on the Welland Canal, a statement which would reassure the people of our constituencies that no economic hardship will result from this action.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on August 4 last, the Minister of Transport announced this raise in tariff for the seaway but of course we are prepared to listen to the hon. member's representations, and I shall personally put to the minister's attention this important matter which has been raised this morning by my hon. colleague.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF $100 MILLION EMPLOYMENT CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, and it deals with the minibudget of last night which has been received by the outside market with a 5 point drop on the Toronto Stock Exchange. Would the minister be willing to elaborate a little more fully on the $100 million employment credit program to which he referred last night? Specifically, what has he in mind to put in place with respect to that type of employment credit, and when will it be felt, in view of the high unemployment we are now experiencing?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to make final decisions regarding that bill during the next few weeks. We hope to be able to introduce it in the House before the end of this year so that it may be enacted in early 1978. The hon. member will at that time obtain the answers to his questions.

INQUIRY AS TO PLANS TO RAISE MONEY OUTSIDE OF CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): In view of the fact that it was disclosed last night that there will be a new federal cash requirement in the current fiscal year of $8.8 billion, would the minister indicate where he plans to raise that amount of money, bearing in mind that in the March 31 budget the former minister of finance outlined where he planned to raise the financial requirements, which were $2 billion less at that point? Specifically, is there any plan to raise money outside Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): At this time, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member has some grounds for complaining, but had we followed the recommendations made by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech concerning a tax reduction and a lesser deficit, had we followed that particular policy, we would obviously have had many more problems. As to the way we will raise and borrow money, my officials tell me that no problem will arise. We will use the usual avenues.

INQUIRY AS TO DATE OF INCOME TAX BILL

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Last night in his statement he said on page 10 and I quote:

> Long delays in passing tax bills add to uncertainty. We should move swiftly to enact the measures proposed in the last budget and the new measures I have proposed tonight.

Considering the concern of businessmen and taxpayers in general, and since the bill arising from the last budget was shelved at the close of the second session, could the minister advise the House of the approximate date when the tax bill will be tabled?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill will be ready within ten days and it will be introduced as soon as it is ready. I certainly hope the House will cooperate to ensure speedy passage in November, so that the financial community and all Canadians may be fully aware of the incentives announced by the Minister of Finance last spring, as well as the incentives I announced in yesterday's minibudget.

POSSIBILITY OF CONSULTATIONS WITH ORGANIZED LABOUR ON TERMINATION OF CONTROLS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. In August Mr. Morris of the CLC said that there would be no further economic consultations between labour and the government until the end of controls. In view of the fact that controls are to be gradually lifted beginning April 14 has there been any communication between the minister and Mr. Morris as to whether consultations will be begun at that date, or will that depend upon the ending of the collective agreements which will carry on past that date, which means there will not be any effective consultation for at least another year?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should indicate that the leadership of the labour movement has just had an opportunity to read the statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday. After they have had an opportunity to study all the implications of that statement, I will be more than anxious to consult with them to see if they are prepared to meet again and to enter into discussions relative to certain advancements we wish to proceed with relative to the omnibus bill on the Labour Code, of which the hon. member is well aware, and other initiatives of the government relative to easing the burden on the unemployed in this country.

REASON FOR CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE TOWARD ENDING CONTROLS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, on August 31 the minister said: "In the absence of agreement on voluntary restraint the government intends to keep the controls in force". In view of the fact that there is no agreement for restraint on the part of labour, what caused the government to change its mind?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): I think it is clear what the policy of the government now is. We feel that the inflationary situation is very serious, and it has a severe impact on the organized worker. The treatment we are affording the problem is not one with which the leadership of the CLC agrees. However, as the hon. member may know, it certainly has a large degree of support amongst the rank and file, if the Gallop polls in which the hon. member and his party seem to have considerable faith, are any indication. Our approach is supported in various sectors as far as workers are concerned.

Now that we have indicated we are prepared to move into a decontrol period in April of next year, I hope that we can enter into further discussions with the labour movement relative to controlling the inflationary situation after we move into decontrol and after we are completely out of controls. Those discussions would concern the interests of labour, the business community and those of the government. That being the case I cannot see why we will not be able to get discussions underway again soon.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF REMOVING CAPITAL GAINS TAX— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that succession duties and capital gains taxes mitigate against the acquisition of family farms or family owned businesses by family members, does the minister intend to take the lead of the newly elected government in Manitoba, which has committed itself to the removal of succession duties? Would the minister indicate whether he favours the removal of capital gains taxes as a result of transfers of family farms or of small family owned businesses to close family members so that young Canadians especially will be able to carry on with the enterprises of their families?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I made my announcement regarding tax measures yesterday. Any new suggestions by any hon. member will be taken into consideration, and when I present a budget I will deal with those suggestions at that time.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege has to do with the broadcasting of last night's sitting after eight o'clock on the CBC French network. The millions of dollars which were authorized by the Parliament of Canada for broadcasting the debates should serve the whole of the people. To do that it is essential that when a minister has a statement to make which is as important in nature as the one that was made last night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) entitled Economic and Fiscal Statement the period of live broadcasting by CBC should be extended for as long as necessary to allow a representative of every party democratically represented in this House to make his point of view known on the minister's statement. Now, last night, the live broadcasting by CBC enabled Canadians to see and hear the Minister of Finance, the financial critic of the official opposition, and for a few minutes the representative of the New Democratic Party. Unfortunately, the public was unable to see and hear the representative of the Social Credit Party who also had interesting things to say. That injustice vis-à-vis our party shows that the media people want to continue to make Canadians believe that there are only three active parties in this House. It is a form of injustice against which I take strong exception, and I ask the chair to have the matter referred to the committee of the House appointed to supervise the broadcasting of the debates. I warn this House that a repetition of injustices of this kind will not be likely to promote good harmony in this House as well as national harmony. We have people to serve and we do intend to use the same tools as the other parties in this House to discharge our responsibilities. Parliament and Crown corporations must set the example in practicing justice. I hope we will not have to come back on this again. I hope the point is well noted.

Mr. Pinard: If I may be allowed to make a short comment at this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that the terms of reference handed down to the committee appointed to supervise the implementation of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees provided for the introduction of television in this House without determining or seeking to determine what the media should do. I do not think we should want to limit the freedom of the press in Canada, and if the media chose yesterday to broadcast in part what went on in the House of Commons I think that in a country where freedom exists that is still their privilege. I understand the hon. member's disappointment that his party should not attract more attention than necessary at this time but that is not the fault of the House of Commons.

In my opinion, Canada enjoys a freedom of the press which must be respected and, as far as we are concerned, our duty as members of the TV and radio broadcasting of proceedings of the House and its committees is to see to it that everything said in the House be taped to form a kind of electronic Hansard available to all people, be they Social Credit members, citizens or news broadcasters.

In the past, Mr. Speaker, the journalists used to choose what they wanted to report from Hansard, so I would humbly submit that they did the same yesterday when broadcasting what they found to be most proper or most interesting in what went on in the House of Commons.

On the other hand, as a member of the committee I am prepared to discuss the question and I feel this is a privilege we have; but unfortunately we did not have time to look in depth into that question on account of the urgency and of your dispatch in presiding over this committee in order that the TV and radio broadcasting of the proceedings of the House could begin six months after establishment of the committee and at the very beginning of this session, last Tuesday.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Never would I have thought a French Canadian could abet injustice to that extent!

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to report that a Crown corporation which is allowed by the committee of the House of Commons to film the debates in the House of Commons systematically refuses to report the position of a political party which was elected the same way any other political party in this House was. This situation cannot be tolerated. This is why the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) made it a question of privilege.

On the first day when the debates were televised, the CBC did indeed show the intervention of three political parties but refused to show an image of the fourth political party. The next day they finally agreed to show a short sequence. Yesterday, during the debate on the minibudget, the same thing happened again, that is the CBC refused once again to report the position of the fourth political party and went even further than that. What cannot be tolerated, Mr. Speaker, is when a commentator on the French network takes away the remarks made by the representative of the Social Credit Party of Canada and puts them in the mouth of the representative of the New Democratic Party. We therefore ask you to make representations to the committee in order to correct this situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) has raised a question which directly deals with the actions of the CBC, but not precisely the actions or specific procedures of the House of Commons. In such a case, it would not exactly qualify as a question of privilege with regard to the actions of the House of Commons. However, this is a rather complicated subject which we will certainly discuss on a permanent basis in the special committee on the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees which was recently reconstituted by the House. This will certainly be one of the most important subjects of discussion for this committee on which, it goes without saying, there is a spokesman for the Social Credit Party of Canada, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), so it is clear that this subject matter will have to be discussed in that committee. But obviously as it directly relates to the actions of the CBC but not to the actions of the House of Commons, this matter cannot be raised as a question of privilege.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which pertains to the Minister of Finance. But he has left the chamber, so I shall wait and raise the issue on Monday, when I expect he will be here.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I meant to preface my remarks in recognizing the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby as he had telegraphed the nature of the proposed question of privilege. It seemed to me to be a classic disagreement in interpretation of the actions of the government vis-à-vis the Export Development Corporation. One of the things about which the hon. member would have to persuade the Chair is that it is more than a disagreement and extends to a question of privilege if and when it does arise.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on what I hope is a question of privilege. It affects the operation of the House, it affects the rules of procedure, and in an important way concerns the procedure adopted by the government last night with respect to the statement made by the Minister of Finance.

I am not going to deal with the merits of the statement, adequate or inadequate as it was, depending upon one's point of view. Something happened in this House, however, which I think impedes the rights of members, and, if allowed to continue, could impede the rights of members to make comments on budgetary matters. In addition, it merges into the tradition of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, which is a broad and searching consideration of the government's whole policy, fiscal and monetary and budgetary considerations.

It becomes important because, in effect, what happened was that the government heralded this as a budget, in its proportions and in its importance, and had the Minister of Finance speak during the debate on the Speech from the Throne when, traditionally, statements of this nature have been brought to the House in a budget speech, which would give six days of debate specifically related to budgetary matters.

That is one aspect of the question upon which I rise, namely, that members have been deprived of that kind of debate by this procedure. It may be completely legal, but it is questionable in the parliamentary sense.

The second matter I should like to deal with is that the usual courtesies were not extended to all the opposition parties in terms of consideration in advance of budgetary matters which have traditionally accompanied what has been a budgetary speech. I am not talking about time, because there was to be a 30-minute preview. That was extended to an hour because it was requested. I am talking in terms of the documents themselves, which have traditionally been allowed to be viewed in their entirety by the critics of the parties during the lock-up. That did not occur on this occasion.

The document I have in my hand was tabled with consent because of the situation we were in last night. The document is entitled, "Economic and Fiscal Statement". It was available then. It was not dealt with in the meeting but it was referred to in the speech of the Minister of Finance. By failing to do that, and by operating as if it was dealing with a budget, the government denied one of the traditional avenues to the opposition parties and, indeed, to all members of parliament.

We cannot allow this practice to continue. The government cannot have it both ways. If matters are to be dealt with in a budgetary way when we are dealing with budgetary matters—which was the purport of the speech—members of parliament are entitled to all the protections and courtesies with respect to budgetary matters that have been traditionally extended, unless there is agreement to the contrary. I must say there was no agreement to the contrary.

Our understanding of this entire matter was that there was to be a speech delivered on economic matters through the course of the throne speech debate. If it was to be otherwise, the government owed opposition parties, the Parliament of Canada and the people of Canada, the courtesies they would otherwise extend on budgetary matters. This is something which has to be looked at carefully, because they have smuggled a budget into the throne speech debate, without the courtesies or examinations which are traditionally allowed.

I rise on this occasion because it came to my notice this morning, after the time in which I could give Your Honour formal notice, the fact that parliament had been sidestepped. I may be wrong. I am not suggesting it was done in bad faith. It might be viewed as smart politics or slick parliamentary procedure, but however it came about, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance should convey these views to his minister.

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

The Minister of Finance is not here. Therefore, I feel he should be made aware of the fact that we believe parliament has been sidestepped in a very important way. Perhaps there are other members who want to deal with this matter further, because it is quite serious in terms of limiting the rights of members of parliament to deal for six days with items which are budgetary, outside the usual throne speech debate.

We all talk about proceeding within the rules of the House of Commons, shortening speeches, limiting time, working on semester systems, in order that parliament may function better. Also, we would like a better committee structure, and private members' hour to be improved. There is a whole host of things which will be dealt with at some time when we look at the procedures of this House.

I say to the parliamentary secretary that this is not the way to go about it. This place operates properly with reasonable consultation and consideration. It is not only what ministers and members would like it to be, but what it, in fact, is. In terms of the budget, parliament was short changed by the government. I take this opportunity to bring the matter to the attention of the parliamentary secretary so that he will take it to his minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. No notice has been given to the Chair of the intention to raise this point by way of a question of privilege. This question relates to something which happened yesterday, and not something which happened during the proceedings this morning. If I permit that to be done, without notice, on one occasion, I will have to permit it to be done again and again, without proper notice. The matter does not constitute a question of privilege. No motion is attached to it. I cannot permit expanded discussion on something which is not a question of privilege and does not conform to our procedures.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order on two counts.

The first count is this. In short, I should like to say that I am fully in favour of TV broadcasting, for it will bring about procedural changes in the House, an essential one of which should prevent hon. members of the opposition from making their views known, as some did today, while the government has no right to reply, thus showing the viewing public only one side of the coin.

The second reason I rose on a point of order is that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I came to a decision—

[English]

Mr. Paproski: You cannot question the Speaker; sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Alexander: You do not question the Speaker around here, sir.

Mr. Speaker: I made a decision with respect to the possible question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I indicated that it does not constitute a question of privilege. It is something I rarely do. It has been contributed to by only one side. The matter is closed.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, in regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, I feel further comments could be made because it is, indeed, a matter of order. I am referring to additional comments which would help to elaborate on the situation.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point was raised adequately by the House leader for the official opposition. It is a point which deals with attitudes of co-operation in the House. It does not deal with procedure, because there is no compulsion or requirement that the matter be dealt with any differently than it was—except the subject of co-operation which was raised. It was raised in the spirit of notice to the government with respect to attitudes of co-operation in the House. I do not know if that is a valid statement or not. I have to decide whether it is a procedural matter. If it is to be raised, it will have to be raised properly within the procedures of the House. It has not been done in that way, and the matter is now closed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Concerning the reply made to the question on the order paper under the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) which appeared in Hansard for October 17, 1977, on page 8213, I have checked and been assured that it was only by an oversight that this reply was shortened. The complete reply appears in Hansard for yesterday on page 62.

● (1222)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I am glad the parliamentary secretary has again raised this matter, which was originally raised yesterday by the Postmaster General. I wish to speak to the point of order.

The action taken by the Postmaster General in effect places in question in this House the role of the parliamentary secretary vis-à-vis the executive, or cabinet, in the House. I find that a rather peculiar procedure is now being brought into the proceedings of this House. At any point in time a minister on the treasury benches can, in fact, rise and disclaim responsibility for an answer provided on behalf of the department by parliamentary secretary.

If we are to have a system of parliamentary secretaries and a system involving ministerial responsibility, I very much doubt that it is in accordance with the procedures of this House that an answer by a parliamentary secretary can be disclaimed on a subsequent date by a minister. There are other vehicles and other ways by which a minister can admit the incompetence of his department, himself or his parliamentary secretary, other than bringing it in under a point of order.

We now have answers provided by parliamentary secretaries to legitimate questions on the order paper. It is not proper for ministers then to go around this country and say that it was not the minister who answered, but a parliamentary secretary, and what does he know? He can say he has been misinterpreted, the parliamentary secretary is not very bright, or there was a mistake and therefore it is not binding, on the government.

If this practice is to be carried to its logical conclusion, the only attitude that we on this side can take is that anything provided by a parliamentary secretary is not to be believed or accepted as a valid response by the government, and that unless we ask the minister himself we cannot use the answer for the basis of debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I understood it yesterday—and I want to keep this matter in correct perspective—the Postmaster General was saying that the answer he provided was not the one the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council gave to the House. It was not his own parliamentary secretary who was involved; it was the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, whose responsibility it is to table answers, on behalf of all ministers, to written questions.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the time of the House is being spent on a matter such as this. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar could have cleared this up himself if he had read the context exactly. He is following in the footsteps of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—misusing the time of the House in order to get some publicity in front of the cameras.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Blais: I know that Your Honour is very much aware of that. I hope hon. gentlemen on the other side will employ a little more judgment in the use of House time, in view of the fact that we are experimenting in this House with a very powerful medium. They should practice more responsibility than they are. The hon. member's position—I refer to the hon.

member for Saskatoon-Biggar, because it is very difficult to differentiate between what he is advancing and what is advanced by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton—is something that is permitted to all members of this House, including members of the treasury benches, namely, to correct a reply that has been provided where the information given to the House was inaccurate.

My right to do so was even more enhanced by the fact that there had been misinterpretation by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council in the reply he provided to the House.

In order to speed up the process of replies given in the House, especially when questions are asked of all government departments relating to certain information, it has been the custom of the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to gather the replies from the various departments and compile them in a form which is intelligible. This is the first time, in my memory—and I occupied that position for 18 months—that such an error has been committed. It created some impact in my department because the information in the misinterpretation was detrimental to personnel in my department. As the hon. member knows, it is not only my right, but my duty, to correct any misinformation or misinterpretation provided to this House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sorry that the Postmaster General has taken occasion to impute a motive that somehow the point I was raising was other than proper, suggesting the only reason I rose was because I was trying to get publicity for a particular position before the television cameras. I know the disability—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is not going to suggest that every time somebody accuses another member of seeking publicity or wasting the time of the House, I am going to recognize it as a question of privilege. If that is the argument that is going to be put forward, it is asking me to take a course of action that would be extremely drastic to both sides of the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The minister went on to suggest that I somehow went on to mislead the House.

Mr. Blais: I never said that at all.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Your Honour knows that we are involved in a debate on the question of interpretation of questions and answers. It is a matter of interpretation—nothing more, and nothing less. The Postmaster General is attempting, by this procedure, to bring in the treasury benches truth squad with respect to whether answers are, in fact, accurately reported or whether there are nuances. Are we to continue with this kind of correction, at the expense of the time of the House of Commons, with the Postmaster General getting up every day and saying that an interpretation was not correct?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Blais.]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT INCO PLANTS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): As you know, Mr. Speaker, because I have given you the required notice, I intend asking for leave to introduce a motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 26. Before doing so, may I emphasize that a similar motion, under a similar rule, was accepted this morning by the Speaker of the Ontario legislature. I think I am forbidden by the rules to indicate anything more than the fact that I intend to ask for leave to move the adjournment of the House under the terms of Standing Order 26.

I do so in view of the very real emergency that exists and will continue to exist over the next few months in the economies of northern Ontario, the Niagara region of Ontario and northern Manitoba, among others, because of the ruthless and unexpected decision by the INCO metals company drastically to cut back production and mining operations in Canada, resulting in the loss of between 3,500 and 4,000 jobs in Sudbury, Ontario—a place Your Honour is well acquainted with—Thompson, Manitoba, and Port Colborne, Ontario.

I do so, sir, because I firmly believe that this House should have the opportunity to consider immediate, urgent remedial action which really can only be discussed in a sensible and meaningful way in a special debate of this nature.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Having given the required notice, the hon. member has conformed with the requirements of Standing Order 26. The hon. member asks that the debate be set aside in order to give immediate and urgent attention to this problem. The hon. member is quite right; it is obvious, as the hon. member for Sudbury, that I am, personally, deeply affected and deeply aware of the gravity of this problem, for it touches my community more severely than any other community in the country.

The application has been recited by the hon. member in terms of the Standing Order, and I have no hesitation in agreeing with him as to the gravity of the matter. I am, of course, aware that the Ontario legislature is sitting today in special session on the subject. Nevertheless, I have to enforce the rules consistently. Standing Order 26, under which this application is made, reads in paragraph (5) as follows:

In determining whether a matter should have urgent consideration Mr. Speaker shall have regard to the extent to which it concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or could come within the scope of ministerial action and he also shall have regard to the probability of the matter being brought before the House within reasonable time by other means.

The subject matter before the House at the present time is, of course, not only the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, which has always been an occasion for the widest latitude in debate, but an amendment which was moved on behalf of the hon. member's party. It is one which relates directly to economic matters, and it would add the words:

—but this House regrets that the incompetence of Her Majesty's ministers has damaged Canada's economy and undermined confidence in it at home and abroad.

The terms of that motion, it seems to me, permit discussion of this subject not only this afternoon, on one day, but in the six remaining days—today, and all of next week. Further, when this amendment is disposed of, presumably on one of the scheduled votes next week, pursuant to Standing Orders, another amendment can be moved by any member of the House; and I would certainly invite hon. members to consider the possibility of doing so if they so desire. Amendments can be directed to any industry or to any aspect of the economy. If it is the intention of any member to bring this subject to the forefront of discussion in the House, he has six days in which to do so: it is open to him to put forward an amendment should he so desire. But even if a specific amendment is not to be put forward, this matter can be discussed, beginning when orders of the day are called within a few minutes.

To the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham and to all members who are interested—I have in mind, for instance, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, whose constituency borders mine and who, I understand, intends to speak today—I say that I am perfectly prepared to give recognition to him in a few minutes, on orders of the day, and to consider carefully, this day and during the forthcoming days of this debate on the Speech from the Throne, recognition on a fair and proportionate basis of any members whose intention it is to concern themselves with this problem and to address themselves to it, and of any government members who are in a position to respond for the government in regard to this crippling blow which has been dealt to Sudbury and to the economy of Canada by the action of the International Nickel Company.

It appears to me that to rule otherwise would be inconsistent with any past ruling on the application of Standing Order 26. But instead of having only one day, we now have six days in which hon. members have my assurance that if they wish to address themselves to this very serious problem, the Chair will see to it that they have the floor at the appropriate time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On the point which has been raised, Mr. Speaker, I find that the ruling Your Honour has made is one which affects my privileges and rights as a member of the House, as it affects those of other non-government members. I call attention to a situation I have noticed for some time, and I regret that the decision should have gone this way.

The debate on the address traditionally gives hon. members generally the opportunity to raise various points. Discussion is not limited, and this affords an opportunity for backbenchers to address themselves to the problems of their constituencies or of the nation. I would point out that already, quite legally, a minibudget has literally been dumped into the throne speech debate. This, in itself, pre-empts a portion of the time available for speeches by backbenchers. Now, as a result of Your Honour's ruling, a further subject has been introduced with an indication that priority will be given to it. In my view, this has the effect of foreclosing comments and speeches and the right of hon. members to speak—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member seeks the floor on what he calls a question of privilege. The hon. member's privileges have not in any visible way been affected by the ruling by the Chair today. If at some time they are, I would think the hon. member would have the opportunity at that time to raise a question of privilege. The Chair has indicated that, in proper proportion to other subjects and to other speakers, it will recognize those who wish to address themselves to the very serious subject which has been raised. Those who are directly concerned with it compose only a small number of members. Other members are interested in the general question as it affects the economy.

It seems to me perfectly reasonable to expect that the Chair ought to be able to accommodate that point of view and to recognize those hon. members during the course of six days of debate, without in any way doing an injustice. But if there is an occasion on which any injustice is done to an hon. member, I will deal with it when it arises.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to indicate that my hon. friend from Nickel Belt does wish to speak on this subject today, and I hope he can be recognized at least among the first three speakers.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dennis Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Clark, (p. 30).

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne, delivered so graciously by the Queen, emphasized the central importance of energy to our economic future and, indeed, to the very coherence of Canada. Speaking of the field of energy, it stated:

> It will continue to be the determined poiicy of the government to work with the provinces toward the goal of self-reliance by encouraging exploration and conservation to reduce our dependence on imported oil. Further encouragement will be given to the development of energy-saving technology, of renewable energy sources and the application of solar energy.

I should like to direct my remarks to the passage in the Speech from the Throne which I have quoted. I suppose that 110 years ago it was transportation policies, transportation decisions and transportation projects such as the CPR which forged the links holding this country together and established the basis of our economic development. Transportation policies and projects are, of course, still fundamental to the economic future of this country and to its unity. But increasingly, I believe, Canadians are recognizing a relatively new policy area, that of energy, as having the same kind of importance both today and for our future as transportation questions did in the past. Indeed, it seems to me that coal fields, natural gas fields and oil fields are going to be as important in the future as the wheat fields of Canada have been in the past. I believe that oil pipelines, natural gas pipelines, slurry coal pipelines and high voltage transmission lines will be as important in the future as rail lines and waterways have been in the past.

Canada is blessed with huge potential resources—I emphasize the word "potential"—but we shall not be able to develop those resources easily. It will not be cheap energy. For the most part it will be difficult to locate the potential supplies, expensive to develop them, and very costly to transmit them to markets because, for the most part, those resources exist in far away places remote from consumers.

We in Canada have an opportunity which many, if not most, countries do not have. We have the opportunity to use our engineering ingenuity, and the opportunity to marshall the financial resources, management and manpower to undertake really significant projects, projects which can have a compelling and determining effect upon our future. Those projects, for the most part, are going to be aimed at reducing our dependence upon foreign oil.

As hon. members know, oil represents very close to 50 per cent of the primary energy consumed in this country. Hon. members also know that we are becoming more dependent upon imported oil for the consumption of energy. Indeed, in the past six months our imports have been running at the level of about 600,000 barrels a day. Our economic future, indeed our future as a federal nation, is going to depend upon how we meet the energy challenge, upon how we establish ourselves as a self-reliant nation. For let there be no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker: there is a looming energy crisis which is not far away. It may not yet be perceived by the public. It is not unlike, in many regards, the iceberg which sank the Titanic. It is no less real because there is no public perception, or strong public perception, of this looming energy crisis at the present time.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Indeed, the fact that there is no significant public perception of it at the present time is, I believe, an additional danger for us in the future. I refer hon. members to the Gallup poll which was published within the last two days, indicating that just about 50 per cent of the people of Canada do not regard the next five years as being a period in which we will be faced with a serious energy crisis. Clearly, the perception is not there.

Not very long ago—within the last two weeks—I had the privilege of chairing the International Energy Agency meetings at the ministerial level. It was the first meeting of the International Energy Agency at the ministerial level in 2½ years. It was a meeting of ministers from 19 countries, the major oil importing and energy-using countries of the world. I think the two themes which probably dominated our discussion more than any others were, firstly, the stark reality that we will not have a choice as to whether or not our energy consumption—our oil consumption in particular—will be reduced. We have the choice as to how we reduce it, but we do not have a choice about its being reduced. Because if we do not take action ourselves to reduce through conservation measures, through substitute energy measures, through the development of new sources and through reduction of our consumption of imported oil, then others will take that decision for us.

The second stark reality was that all ministers of the consuming countries recognized explicitly, in most cases, that perhaps the biggest problem they have is conveying this sense of impending crisis, this looming energy crisis, to their people and getting the public support that they need in order to introduce measures to avert the kind of crisis situation I have been describing. It is a crisis which most of the industrialized world is forecasting to take place in about the year 1985, a period when the OPEC nations will not be able to deliver the kind of oil upon which the economies of the western world have been based. The economies of the western world have been growing in economic terms and in energy consumption terms.

For that reason, ministers took the decision to limit oil imports. The target was set of 26 million barrels a day, which compares roughly to 22 million barrels a day at the present time. Canada made the same political commitment which a number of countries made to limit our oil imports by that date. Our commitment was the commitment, which we put forward in "Energy Strategy for Canada" a little over a year ago, to reduce our imports to one-third our consumption, or to 800,000 barrels a day, whichever is the lesser.

Again, let there be no misunderstanding, Mr. Speaker: if we—that is to say, the western world—fail to understand the magnitude of this problem and fail to react to it, the change which is inevitable will be a very much more painful one. Our choice is that of being able to take measures to ease the pain, to ease the cost, to smooth as far as possible the transition from what has been an economy ever-growing in ways which, in terms of energy, has been ever-wasteful.

Failure to solve this problem will have profound effects upon the standard of living of Canadians, as it will upon those in other countries. It will have a profound effect upon the world trading system. We are already starting to see protectionist attitudes develop with respect to world trade. Many of those protectionist attitudes are being developed as a result of the oil import bill which countries are increasingly having to finance in a deficit way because they have not been able to develop their own merchandise account to cover the increasing cost of their oil imports.

If we do not avert this crisis, we will be faced with increasing world tensions, particularly with the Third World countries which for the most part are not going to be able to deal with this problem in the same way as the industrialized nations. They have fewer choices. Indeed, I do not think it is too much to say—and this was reflected by ministers at the conference—that the very future of western democracy itself is at stake. It is not over-stating the position to say that unless we find a way of managing this impending crisis, the fragile nature of our democracy may not be able to withstand the shock.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to re-emphasize the remarks the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made in his address last night. He emphasized a number of very important things, particularly in regard to energy. He stressed the need for investment in Canada to create jobs. He emphasized the need to take measures which are going to help improve the serious balance of payments problem with which Canada is faced. It seems to me that in the energy field we have an opportunity of doing some of these things but it is going to require some changes, and I think his remarks last night reflected the kind of changes to which Canadians should be looking. For example, he referred to the rather special area which he described as the critical energy area, along with several other areas such as housing and fisheries. The minister said, as reported at page 101 of Hansard:

> In all these, and many other areas, much more has to be done by investment policy and basic structural changes. We intend to promote such changes, to seek the active co-operation of the provinces, and to engage as widely as possible in consultation with business, labour and other economic interest groups.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, there is a signal that the government is prepared to re-examine some of its policies in this critical area which affect investment in this country. So far as energy is concerned, I think the best way to put the government's policy would be to summarize it around four basic thrusts. The first thrust is through energy supply polices which are aimed at stimulating the private sector to undertake huge energy projects across this country. I will deal with those in a few moments.

The second area of thrust is through energy conservation and renewable energy initiatives by the federal government. I will deal with those in a moment. The third is through legislation and other initiatives aimed at protecting the public interest in three specific areas: firstly, providing information on cash flows from the petroleum corporations, to ensure that those cash flows are reinvested in conformity with the government's policy for new energy supplies—that will be covered by the legislation, the petroleum corporations monitoring act—secondly, ensuring a fair return to Canadians for the successful exploitation of Canadian Crown lands in the development of oil and natural gas—that will be covered by a new act, the oil and natural gas act. The third area of protection to Canadians, in the public interest, is ensuring the most effective methods for the regulation of the nuclear fuel cycle. That will be covered in a new act, the nuclear control and administration act. The fourth area of thrust is to work with the provinces toward the attainment of these objectives.

I would like to turn quickly to the supply side. I would like to run down a few of the kinds of projects which I think are illustrative of the projects for which we should be aiming, the kinds of projects we should plan to undertake in the next few years, the kinds of projects which are anticipated in the huge forecast of $180 billion in energy investment between 1975 and 1990. The kinds of projects I am talking about are the Foothills (Yukon) pipeline—which I hope in part will start very shortly—a project which runs, in 1975 dollars, at around $4 billion and which should generate roughly 100,000 man-years of employment; and the Tar Sands III plant. The bill for it is much in the same order; it will amount to around $3 billion, in 1975 dollars. There is every indication that in terms of man-years of employment it will be comparable, perhaps even significantly greater, because the permanent employment associated with the Tar Sands III plant would be significantly greater than that of a major pipeline.

Another project is the expansion of the existing Syncrude plant, which should come on in the next year, by another 75,000 barrels a day, the expansion of the GCOS plant, the first Tar Sands plant, by another 25,000 barrels a day, and a major investment in Cold Lake for the development of heavy oils, roughly $2 billion to $3 billion for a 100,000 barrels a day upgrading plant. There is the opportunity of another heavy oil upgrading plant in the Lloydminster area, of the order of $1 billion in investment and a 100,000 barrels a day. Electrical generation projects in the Atlantic area, the Gull Island project, for example, a $2 billion project and for example a tidal power project in the maritimes which would run close to $1 billion. These are examples of the kinds of projects which we should be planning to put into place over the next few years.

Mr. Gillies: That should have been done ten years ago.

Mr. Gillespie: I believe the projects can largely be undertaken, in the sense of being financed and managed, by the private sector. Clearly, there will be a need for the provincial governments and the federal government to participate in the development of some of these projects. I do not suggest that these projects are by any means the totality, but I indicate them as the kind of really major projects we shall be undertaking. In total, in 1977 dollars, just the ones I have mentioned would add up to $20 billion. That is a significant investment challenge for the Canadian people and primarily, I suggest, for the private sector.

I believe there are a number of other government initiatives that should be mentioned at this time. As I have already indicated, we need to work out the fiscal terms with Alberta and Saskatchewan which will ensure the development of a third tar sands plant and which will encourage and ensure the development of future heavy oil plants. Of the ones that I have mentioned, clearly there should be one in Saskatchewan. The Saskatchewan government has already expressed an interest in that and Petro-Canada is discussing the project with them. Two more could be started too in the Cold Lake project and perhaps another one in Alberta.

Through its budget, the government has already provided fiscal incentives for more heavy-cost exploration in the far north. I believe that Petro-Canada can play a useful role with respect to a heavy oil plant, as I have indicated, and I think Petro-Canada can also play a useful role in helping to develop the market for natural gas in Quebec. Let us face it: if we are going to reduce our dependence on foreign oil, we shall have to do it in many cases by substituting natural gas for foreign oil.

There are other legislative initiatives which the government will be undertaking. I have already mentioned the oil and natural gas act. There will also be the northern pipeline bill which will be placed before us. Much can be done through the establishment of the maritime energy corporation, a corporation in which the governments of the maritimes and the federal government would participate. I see it as being absolutely essential to the planning, future development and co-ordination of major energy projects in the Atlantic area.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there has been agreement, as was mentioned by the Tory House leader a short while ago, to permit me to complete my remarks, which will only take a few more minutes. I would appreciate your ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it agreed that the minister continue until he completes his speech shortly after one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I mentioned the legislative initiatives that the government will be undertaking. I have referred to the maritime energy corporation as being key to the development of the whole future of the energy supply situation in the maritimes and, indeed, could be a significant factor in export sales as well in the exporting of surplus power. I would say to the hon. member that the maritime energy corporation is absolutely essential to the development of Fundy tidal power, because that project will be too big and will have surplus energy. We have to find a way of bringing the various interests of the maritime provinces together, and I believe that through the corporation this could be achieved. That will be one of my priorities in the coming months.

I believe there is a role and a possibility of involving the federal government in equity financing of some of these projects. I do not want to raise the expectation that the federal government is prepared to put large amounts of equity financing into them, but I am saying that we are prepared to consider equity financing. In the past we have looked at the financing of major energy projects solely in terms of loans. That would make it possible to bring some of these projects to fruition.

I believe hon. members would want the government to continue, despite the initiatives of certain opposition members who at least cast doubt on the importance of our export policy on uranium. Indeed, in the question period today it was quite clear that there is a major contradiction in their policy with respect to the export of minerals. The government will continue to place pressure on conservation projects all across the country.

Consistent with the home insulation program, which has now been recognized as the leading program of its kind in the industrialized world, we will be active in exerting pressure for higher insulation standards in new housing. We will be extending our activities and our initiatives to the industrial side, as well, with respect to such successful programs as the energy bus program, which uses a computer and which is of major assistance to small business. This has been tried out very successfully in the maritimes. Agreements are being negotiated at the present moment with a number of provinces with respect to that program. We will be offering the Enersave program to a wider constituency as well.

The government will be placing increasing importance on research and development of energy, particularly renewable energy, and conservation. We will be increasing our budget this coming year by $15 million. This represents more than a 10 per cent increase in the total energy budget of the government for the next fiscal year. Almost all these moneys will be directed toward accelerating the high priority areas of renewable resources and conservation. Increased sums will be available for the demonstration of solar, space and water heating, and for technological development in the budding solar industry. We hope to have a significant demonstration project at the Rideau Falls, where a number of renewable technologies can be demonstrated.

We also believe that our forests and our forest wastes represent perhaps the most significant renewable energy source, after hydro, in Canada. We will be placing greater importance on combustion and gasification, and perhaps later on forest waste, as a source of synthetic fuels, in our energy research and development. On solar energy, the federal government has adopted the principle that there will be a strong preference for the use of renewable energy sources, specifically solar, in all its building and renovation programs wherever it can be demonstrated that there are no substantial differences in life-cycle costs over conventional sources. That is a significant change in government policy.

These initiatives and policies are capable of contributing very significantly to the solution of our looming energy crisis. They can also collectively make a major impact on the economy in terms of more permanent jobs. They can make a major impact upon improving our balance of payments by reducing our imports and increasing our exports. I referred to maritimes power as part of that program. I believe they can make a big impact on regional development and regional security. Above all, I believe these policies, measures, initiatives and major projects can have a major effect on national unity.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The House has been gracious enough to extend the time for the minister, and I listened intently and with great interest to what he said. I wonder if it would be possible for me to have the permission of the House to ask one brief question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Muir: The minister dealt with energy, naturally; that is his portfolio. He spoke about natural gas, oil, solar energy, tar sands and pipelines, and another important feature was the maritimes energy corporation. However, only once did I hear him mention the term "coal field." I wonder if the minister would advise the House what the government is going to do as a catalyst, psychologically or monetarily, to encourage the opening of new coal mines, particularly in the eastern coal fields in Cape Breton and in Nova Scotia in general.

I was hoping he would elaborate on that, because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) hardly mentioned that at the Canadian Coal Conference. I do not think he knows about coal fields in the east. He talked about Alberta and British Columbia. Would this minister be good enough to advise if he will use his influence within the cabinet to make sure that proper funds are made available to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to establish and open new coal mines on Cape Breton Island, which would provide employment in a very quick way, because of the high rate of unemployment we have in that area? I hope the minister will have something encouraging to say about that.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to that question. It is a very good question. I am not in a position to say that I can promise any additional funds to the Cape Breton Development Corporation. As the hon. member knows, it is already receiving substantial funds from the federal government. However, I can tell the hon. member that we are very interested in a proposal which has been put forward by the Premier of Nova Scotia to change some oil-fired thermal generating plants to coal-fired generating plants.

We have indicated we think that would be a very proper use of federal funds provided to the province of Nova Scotia under the agreement we reached earlier this year to reduce our dependence on foreign oil and the vulnerability of Nova Scotia to that foreign oil. I hope the talks we are presently having with the Nova Scotia government will result in a greater market for Nova Scotia coal. To the extent that takes place, there will be greater activity in the Cape Breton coal mines.

Mr. Muir: We need new coal mines.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 1.09 p.m. the House took recess.

• (1402)

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as we all know, the most serious of the many problems facing the country today is a stagnant economy which has caused unemployment to rise to 8.3 per cent of the work force and will go considerably higher in the months ahead as the stagnation drags on.

Unfortunately, the government has put forward no effective plan for stimulating the economy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) told us recently there is no indication that the economy will be able even to absorb the new entrants into the work force during the next 18 months, let alone reduce the present high rate of unemployment.

I believe the only practical way to stimulate the economy and increase jobs is to make our products more attractive in price, quality and design. It is obvious that no Canadian, or anyone else, is going to buy a Canadian product if they can find a better product made in some other country at the same price, or a similar product at a lower price. I believe that the only way the job can be done in the conditions which will exist during the next few years is by offering incentives to reduce costs, and thereby selling prices, and improve quality and design. If we can do these things, we can increase our share of the existing purchasing power in the hands of Canadians and potential customers abroad, and increase production without increasing inflation in this country. The kinds of incentives I have in mind would do the following: first, lower labour costs; second, increase productivity; third, induce more research and development; fourth, expand export trade.

First of all, what must be done to reduce labour costs of potential new business to levels which will enable Canadians to compete successfully for that business? There is a great deal of business which Canadian companies are unable to compete for because of low labour costs in the foreign countries where the products are made. If Canadian companies are to be able to compete for a good proportion of this business, and thereby obtain additional employment for Canadians, they must have an incentive which will enable them to reduce their labour cost on this potential new business to a level where they are within striking distance of these low foreign rates. Then, by accepting a lower than normal margin of profit on this extra business in order to get started, they can compete for orders and stand a good chance of obtaining a reasonable proportion of them.

Now, what kind of incentives will do the job? The government should say to all business—not just manufacturers and processors—that it will reward over-all increases in employment during the year by way of an employment incentive which will be paid in direct proportion to the increases that are made. It is simply a matter of comparing the total number of man-years of employment by the company in the tax year under consideration with the last full year before the plan is put into operation, which will be the base year. The employment incentive would be paid in proportion to the increase in employment and the general wage level of the plant concerned, and the company would thus be able to calculate well in advance just what amounts of money it would require for various increases in employment. This would enable Canadian businessmen to calculate in advance how much their labour costs would be reduced on additional business which the employment incentive would make it possible for them to go after. All such business obtained in this way would be a net gain for Canadian employment.

As Your Honour knows, persons receive two-thirds of their former pay or salary when they are out of work and receiving unemployment insurance benefits. If one-third of their former pay scale is made available to potential employers who can then bid on previously obtainable contracts, and in this way provide work for those unemployed persons, they would have the satisfaction of working instead of remaining in idleness; they would be removed from the UIC rolls; they would be making a positive contribution to the economy, and they would begin paying income taxes to the government. To pay for this employment incentive we would have available to us a considerable proportion of what the government pays out each year as its contribution to UIC benefits. This year it is estimated that the government's contribution will be at least $2 billion of the more than $4 billion which will be paid out as such benefits.

The second matter I should like to deal with is the need to induce greater productivity in our economy so that we can further lower costs, selling prices and become increasingly competitive in the marketplace. To do so, we must offer incentives which will persuade producers that they will be able to pay for the new plant, machinery and production systems they will have to buy in a reasonably short space of time, and in this way make it as easy as possible for them to make the usually high expenditures involved.

The kind of incentive I have in mind would be one whereby all capital expenditures may be written off in two years, and a plant would be rewarded, in the form of a cash bonus at the end of the year in proportion to its increase in productivity during the year, compared to the base year, the last full year before the plan goes into operation.

This form of incentive has been very effective in increasing productivity in such countries as Japan and West Germany, where spectacular results have been achieved since the end of the Second World War. There is no reason why such an incentive would be any less successful in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: I should like to deal with the steps which should be taken to increase the amount of research and development work which is carried on by industry in this country. One of the reasons we have had to rely so heavily on foreign investment in the past is that investment brought with it technology which was produced by research done in the country where the capital originated. In order to be less reliant on foreign investment, to capture new markets which are looking for new and better designed products, and to lower costs and become more competitive, it is obvious that we must carry out a great deal more research and development in this country.

To bring this about, we should allow industry to write off 200 per cent of the cost of current and capital expenditures on research and development in excess of those made in the base year, the last full year before the program is introduced. In addition to writing off the full cost in one year, it will put a considerable cash reward in the pocket of the company undertaking the research. This kind of program has been successful in significantly increasing the volume of industrial research in countries where it has been introduced, and I am convinced it will prove equally effective in Canada if the government will introduce such a plan.

The fourth incentive which I suggest is one designed to promote greater sales in the export market. Because of this country's great dependence on the United States market—we make 70 per cent of our export sales in that market—and the steady move of that country toward protectionism, the development of additional markets has become particularly necessary if we are to increase our volume of exports or even maintain our present level of export sales.

Making sales in other countries depends to a very large extent upon doing four things successfully: first, going abroad and making personal contact with potential buyers; second, finding out what is required to meet the competition in those markets; third, returning to Canada and producing a product which can compete successfully; fourth, displaying the product effectively before potential customers.

The incentive would allow producers to write off 200 per cent of all expenses connected with making trips abroad, displaying their products at foreign trade fairs, and any other expenses incurred in sales promotion in the export market in excess of those made in the base year, the year before the plan goes into operation. Not only would all such expenses be completely written off in the year when they are made, but a considerable cash bonus would accrue to the company for its additional sales promotion activities. The kind of incentive I have mentioned would greatly encourage the kind of activity which is essential if increased sales are to be made.

Another thing the government should do to help increase the sale of Canadian products abroad is to organize "fly and buy" missions, whereby the important buyers from the principal foreign markets would be brought to Canada once a year to see Canadian products displayed in giant trade shows in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver, and our heavy machinery in the factories where it is made across the country. Such operations have produced spectacular results where they have been used, and have paid for themselves many times over through the additional business which they have generated.

In conclusion, I am convinced that if these incentives are offered to industry, they will produce the kind of economic stimulation which is so badly needed today, and we can begin the long climb back to a vibrant and healthy economy.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, there is a question which arises in my mind after hearing the Speech from the Throne and now that we have entered into debate. That is, "Who wrote the throne speech?" I think if a Martian were visiting this planet and had listened to that throne speech, he would not have realized that the people who wrote the speech have been sitting in the government benches for 45 out of the last 56 years. Since 1963 the same people have been sitting across the way; the Liberal party has been the government of this country for 45 of the part 56 years.

Mr. Alexander: Too long.

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, far too long. One could comment that they are slow learners, but we appreciate that they are at least starting to learn. However, it may just be a political gimmick, because we find on page 5 of the Speech from the Throne these pearls of wisdom:

> High rates of unemployment and inflation are clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies appropriate to simpler times. They are also signals of the urgent need for important structural adjustments in the economies of Canada and other industrialized countries. More than that, they are the symptoms of an illness which can be cured only by a readjustment of our values, and by a re-discovery of the merits of self-discipline and fair sharing.

On page 7 it is stated:

> The human hardship imposed by the current level of unemployment in Canada is deeply disturbing. It is neither just nor tolerable that in this country there should be so many men and women deprived of the dignity of self-supporting work, unable to meet their financial commitments and plan confidently for the future. It is intolerable that so many are deprived of their right to secure productive lives, and that their families bear an unfair burden of worry, uncertainty, and deprivation. On a national scale, unemployment now constitutes a very serious obstacle to economic growth.

I am glad they finally recognize that. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office in 1968, the rate of unemployment was about 3.8 per cent. Today, it is 8.4 per cent. As you go across this country you find that the unemployment rate, in several regions far exceeds that; it is often triple, and sometimes quadruple, that rate.

Since I joined the New Democratic Party we have been telling this government that there is a need for economic planning. However, the government has refused to involve itself in planning the economy so that the citizens whom they govern may get the benefit of such planning.

It is outrageous that the corporations, the mining corporations, and one in particular which I will discuss in detail a little later, are being treated the way they are by this government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) admitted that he was called the night before this major lay-off announcement. He was told of the number that would be laid off in the Sudbury basin and in Manitoba. We know about the wheeling and dealing that goes on on this Hill. Any time the government is considering a change to the Income Tax Act which might affect the corporate structure, one of their members runs over to the Rideau Club to have a confab with the banking and financial groups. They go back and forth to visit the cabinet ministers, and before you know it the lobbying has begun.

Insurance companies are a perfect example of that. Consultation takes place before the legislation is brought down. In this instance it is the mining corporations. It is a one-way street. In effect, the government is at the beck and call of the mighty corporations.

I invite the Prime Minister to come to the Sudbury basin and make the speech he made in London. Let him tell the people of the Sudbury basin that it is only a figment of their imagination that they are going to be unemployed; that the 2,200 people who have two years and 161 days of employment, or less, with the International Nickel Company will not really be laid off. I want him to tell them that they have been dreaming in black and white and it really is not so.

We have lost ten miners in the Sudbury basin this year because of unsafe conditions in the mine. The government has been promising, since time immemorial, that it will do something about reducing the danger to the health of workers. Incidentally, 1,000 miners have been lost in the past ten years. I want the Prime Minister to tell those miners that they have become soft because of their high living, and that they have been overpaid for the work they do. It is those across the way who are the experts in soft living.

The other day I heard a radio clip of a speech made by a former minister of finance, John Turner of Bay Street. He said that Canadians have to learn to tighten their belts and live within their means. He said they have to trim the fat. At the end of the clip, it was stated that Mr. Turner had been addressing the Association of Canadian Chartered Accountants in Hamilton, Bermuda.

Mr. Orlikow: Earning $50,000 a year.

Mr. Rodriguez: He has joined the Bay Street barons; he has joined the boards of directors of several major corporations. That same gentleman is now organizing a $125 a plate dinner at the Royal York hotel in Toronto for the Liberal party of metropolitan Toronto. Twelve hundred persons will pay out $125 a plate. Who will pick up the tab? The taxpayers. I bet my bottom dollar they will put in for receipts in order to get tax rebates under the Election Expenses Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: Instead of heckling, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, in New Brunswick, should be joining me. Unemployment in his riding in New Brunswick is now over 10.8 per cent.

Mr. Hogan: It is higher than that; it is 30 per cent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Members opposite should be pushing to get some changes in the economic planning of this country. Yesterday the community of Sudbury received a disastrous blow. We have consistently stated in this House that this government has permitted the Canadian economy to develop as a resource economy. I have here a booklet entitled "100 Years of Trade and Commerce between Canada and Japan", put out by the Japan trade centre. I have looked at the 1976 figures for Canadian exports to Japan, and Canadian imports from Japan. It is a microcosm of the situation we find ourselves in.

We have been ripping our resources out of the ground, putting them into a semi-processed state and shipping them abroad, where they are made into a processed state or final product. On page 20 of this booklet, it shows that total Canadian exports to Japan in 1976 amounted to $2,387,942,000. All the items are listed, with the amounts, which we exported to Japan. No less than 95 per cent of these items are raw resources. When I look at the imports we buy from Japan, I find that in 1976 the total figure was $1,525,560,000. All the items are listed here, with specific amounts against them. I found, as I looked at them last night and made a calculation, that 96 per cent of those amounts consist of finished products, primarily cars, cameras and electronic equipment.

That is where the jobs are. They are in the manufacturing sector. They are not in the resource sector at all. Just yesterday I happened to be holding one of the microphones attached to our desks, the new equipment we have brought in and for which we have paid, I don't know how many millions. I found that it was made in Austria, a country which has a population of about six million. What is the unemployment rate there, I wonder. Mr. Speaker, I bet you there is Canadian copper from the Sudbury basin in these microphones. Here is a prime example of Canadian parliamentarians speaking right into a symbol of our problem, the hinterland economy. These products have crept right into the House of Commons, not only on the government side but on the opposition side.

I do not think the answer lies in saying, as did one spokesman for the official opposition, that we ought not to be ashamed of being hewers of wood and drawers of water; that we ought not to be ashamed of selling our raw resources. That is a lot of baloney. One of the official critics for the Conservative Party, the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) said, and I quote him: "There is nothing disgraceful about being hewers of wood and drawers of water if that is where you find your competitive advantage."

We in the mines of the Sudbury basin have been hewers of wood and drawers or water, and every time the multinational mining companies want to pressure the government for tax concessions they diversify their operations into Third World countries and say, "Either you give us a tax break or we lay off workers". They do not even give notice. They call ministers in the dark of the night before making the announcement. I think this is treating the people's representatives in a most cavalier manner. I would point out that the minister of labour of Ontario, Betty Stephenson, was also notified the night before the lay-off announcement.

Today we asked questions in the House about the whole subject of jobs and the Sudbury basin. Some of the answers given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) were really revealing, and I would like to deal with them. First of all, though, I wish to bring the House up to date on exactly what is the Canadian investment in the International Nickel Company. I would like to put it into the context of INCO's lay-offs. INCO will lay off, by the end of January, 2,200 hourly-rated and staff employees in the Sudbury basin. They will use attrition to wipe out 600 additional jobs in the Sudbury basin, and 600 in Thompson, Manitoba. We must bear in mind that for every permanent job there are about three service jobs which go with it. In effect, then, one is looking at some 6,000 to 7,000 jobs. Failure of the income from that number of jobs to flow into the community will certainly be a massive economic blow to the Sudbury basin.

What is our investment, as taxpayers, in INCO, Mr. Speaker? We have allowed INCO, to date, to defer $378 million in taxes. That is the amount of tax they have not paid to the people of Canada and, in effect, it becomes an interest-free loan because it is only a paper entry; that money is not set aside in any bank. So INCO has been getting the use of that money. That is one of the investments we have in the International Nickel Company of Canada.

Then, again, under the March budget which was brought down by the previous minister and reiterated by the present Minister of Finance, INCO, using 3 per cent depreciation on its reserves, in terms of inflation accounting, plus the other goodies contained in that budget, received a benefit of $10 million. So they owe us $10 million. As well, we have loaned INCO over $70 million through the Export Development Corporation; over $70 million was loaned in Guatemala to a subsidiary of INCO called Exmibal. It involved a two-phase loan; the first phase was $17.25 million and the second was $3.5 million.

I remember, when we were considering Bill C-9 which was intended to increase the capitalization of the EDC, back in 1974, I raised the question of INCO's loan from EDC to their subsidiary in Guatemala. The question I raised was whether, in fact, this would have a disastrous effect on the INCO operations in Sudbury. I also raised the question of the $128 million loaned to the Argentinian government in connection with the CANDU reactor, a deal which we now know was so smelly it was like a barrel of fish which had been left in the sun for six days.

Then there is the loan made to an INCO subsidiary in Indonesia by the name of P.T. International Nickel (Indonesia). Again, under a two-phase program it involved some $17.25 million and $40 million. We raised questions about that loan earlier this year during the committee hearings on Bill C-47 which was to further increase the capitalization of the Export Development Corporation. We also loaned INCO an additional $20 million through a New Caledonia subsidiary in which INCO was participating as a part of a consortium called Le Nickel.

The question we raised in committee with respect to the loan was the rate of interest INCO was paying on that money. Well, that was a state secret. That was a most secret thing, and we could not find out that rate of interest for INCO to borrow taxpayers' money. Now we know that the American EXIM bank rate was somewhere between 6.5 per cent and 7 per cent, and the president of the EDC admitted that our interest rate was below that because we have to be competitive. He told us he was out there reaching for business, so the interest rate had to be competitive and therefore less. Mr. Speaker, see how we have come full circle. That money, which really is the taxes of the workers of Canada, including workers in the Sudbury basin, has now been used to create their own unemployment. They have, in effect, funded their own unemployment. I do not think that is good enough.

We are going to see 2,200 workers laid off, whose average income is about $15,000 a year, and the average income tax payable would be about $2,500. The treasury of Canada will lose that tax revenue, and then we will pay them unemployment insurance. If they draw benefits for 50 weeks, and there are 2,200 of them, the cost to the unemployment insurance fund will be in the region of $22 million. That is not counting the spin-off effect in the service sector and that is not counting the human misery which follows these lay-offs.

I have been in the Sudbury basin long enough to know what happens. We went through the bust of 1972 when INCO cut the number of hourly-rated workers from 18,000 to 13,000. I was there; I taught in the schools. I saw families broken, and alcoholism taking over. I saw the drive onto the welfare cheque. The party to which I belong, Mr. Speaker, has never supported the paying of welfare cheques. We think workers should earn pay cheques, rather than be given welfare cheques. We do not support a situation whereby the mining industry creates a bust, lays off its workers here in Canada, and then demands that the community pick up the pieces.

With regard to Guatemala, the Minister of Finance today told me that because I come from Latin America I ought to understand that we were really helping Latin America when we did this; that we were really helping Latin America with technology. Well, the technology is not being transferred. The loan to establish the subsidiary in Guatemala will be used to scoop up the lateritic ore from the surface, put it into a semi-processed state and ship it out to Great Britain or to the United States for processing. The fact is that the Guatemalans will not get their hands on the technology. That is the whole question facing the Third World—the whole question of a new international economic order. It is the question whether rich countries like Canada and the United States are prepared to transfer, or sell the technology to the developing countries. That is the crux of the problem.

When the Minister of Finance says, "Oh, we have been so good hearted; all this money is really to help the Guatemalans, the Indonesians and the New Caledonians get the technology", let me tell him they are not going to own the technology. What is being done to them is exactly what has been done to us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how does Guatemala benefit? INCO is involved in Guatemala with a "small" mining company called Hanna Mining Corporation, which is a United States mining corporation. INCO owns 80 per cent of the Guatemalan subsidiary, and Hanna Mining Corporation owns 20 per cent. It was Hanna, by the way, which discovered the lateritic ores in Guatemala. I want to place these facts before the government because the Minister of Finance said that as a Latin American I should understand that Latin America benefits. I am saying to him that Latin America does not benefit, because the multinational mining companies have developed a pattern.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, it was Hanna which discovered the lateritic ores in Guatemala and had connections with the dictatorship in Guatemala at the time, headed by General Carlos Manuel Arana. It is of interest to know that he was nicknamed "the butcher of Zacapa". In other words, Mr. Speaker, he respected no human and civil rights on the part of his citizens. Indeed, torture was a way of life in a country which could offer Hanna and INCO security of supply. It could offer them a malleable work force. If there were any arguments from the work force, those persons would disappear in the night. Indeed, around the site where this lateritic ore was developed he consistently placed an armed camp so that the workers could not leave the site or slip off if they wanted to stop working there. So he provided a service to Hanna and INCO by providing a captive work force.

History has now made very clear that the CIA was involved in Guatemala with the United Fruit Company in the overthrow of President Arbenz, who tried to bring some social justice to the country, which did not suit the purposes of the CIA. So the government was overthrown. It was INCO and Hanna which drafted the mining act of Guatemala, and under that act INCO was not to pay taxes for 40 years. That is exactly the way they have operated in Ontario. They were allowed accelerated depreciation allowances and the whole bit. We have been through that. INCO used, in Guatemala, the same approach which they have used in Canada so successfully.

There were several well-respected and well-known professors at the University of Guatemala who opposed the mining act developed by the "butcher", INCO and the Hanna Mining Corporation. For example, Adolfo Mijangos, a law professor, was machine-gunned in January, 1971, while he was leaving his office in his wheel-chair one month before the mining act was signed by the "butcher", INCO and Hanna. Julio Camey-Herrera, a lawyer, was machine-gunned in November, 1970, while he was driving a car. Afonso Bauer-Paiz, a lawyer and professor, survived a point-blank attack in November, 1970. These were men all well-respected in the community who opposed the INCO operation in Guatemala. They were eliminated from the scene. We know now who in that republic engineered that machine-gunning.

I am quoting this from the arguments that I raised when we were discussing Bill C-9 in committee in 1974. I asked, "If the Export Development Corporation is interested in the development of the Third World, do its officers actually investigate on the site; hold discussions with local people? Is the particular development welcomed by respected and knowledgeable people in the community?" The EDC said it was not, rather, in the business of judging local politics but, when, they were in the business of lending money.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is our money they are lending. If the money is lent to help the Guatemalans take control of their economy so as to develop it along the lines they want, then I am all for it. But, in effect, it is not. And what about Indonesia? Amnesty International has just published a list of people who are kept in prison in Indonesia without trial, and are often tortured. This is another area of the world in which INCO is interested and has obtained Canadian taxpayers money. In every instance where INCO has moved there has been a dictatorship. There has been a malleable work force. INCO is given iron-clad agreements with respect to mining acts. They exploit those countries' resources and then they turn around and say to the Canadian government, "Give us more tax concessions or we shall have to lay off Canadian workers."

I do not pretend to know all the ins and outs of being in government or in cabinet, but here, for example, is what Eric Kierans, who was a cabinet minister in the Liberal government, and he is well versed in the economics of this country, said:

> There has never been a period of such unparalleled growth in assets and income in the corporate sector as that obtained by the 311 largest corporations in Canada and, equally, there has never been such an outpouring of hostility toward elected governments.

He went on to say that the irony of the situation is that the corporations have profited because of government policies, and that these policies have given them the power to curb potential competition. He continued:

> It is obvious (by looking at tax policy) that the government favours corporate concentration and mergers in Canada—

That is what they keep telling us, Mr. Speaker—that we have to have our own multinationals to compete with the American, German and Japanese multinationals. Mr. Kierans continued:

> Large-size firms . . . (and) established firms are accorded privileged status that compounds the difficulties and barriers facing new firms . . .
> Existing corporations are cementing their grasp on future resource development by being able to write off huge sums ($1.6 billion in 1973 and 1974) for exploration and development investments.

With regard to the situation in Sudbury—I know my time is coming to an end and that I will not get unanimous consent to continue, nor would I ask for it, Mr. Speaker—there is an immediate solution which it is incumbent upon this government to supply. The government ought immediately to announce the stockpiling of nickel. This has been done in the wheat industry and with butter. It has been done in the uranium industry for seven years, and it has been done with gold for years and years. I see the Minister of Employment and Immigration shaking his head. What he proposes is job-sharing. INCO loves job-sharing because that means the taxpayers of Canada subsidize, through unemployment insurance funds, the payment of the workers, while INCO gets the nickel produced at even lower cost.

This government has the responsibility to restore confidence in the economy of the Sudbury basin as well as in Thompson, Manitoba. What it is going to cost to keep the workers will far exceed what it will cost to buy the nickel. At least, when we have bought the nickel we will have the value in the product itself. When you pay the workers unemployment insurance, you have nothing at the end of 50 weeks. Once the workers get on the treadmill of not being productive and not working, then I am afraid it may become a way of life.

What do I have to say to this government? I beg them to say right now to INCO, "Withdraw the announcement of cutbacks, and we will sit down and look at the alternatives for the long term. At the moment, to secure those jobs and the economy of the basin, we will stockpile nickel". This is not unknown in the Canadian experience, and the government should do it because it was the government that got us into this mess in the first place.

I see you resting back in your chair, Mr. Speaker, so I must have another minute.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

• (1452)

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, to respect an old tradition, I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the throne speech. First of all, I must say that I was not at all surprised when I listened to the Speech from the Throne. Since it came straight from the Prime Minister's office, no wonder his senior advisers emphasized the basic tenets of the Liberal party in dealing with inflation, unemployment, controls and decontrol, temporary job-creating programs and its next big issue, national unity. What surprised me most, Mr. Speaker, is that the day after in his speech, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) recognized that basically the province of Quebec was not a province like the others, but that it must be treated like the others.

For many years, we have tried to explain to him and to have him understand that the province of Quebec was not a province like the others with a majority of English-speaking people, because of its language, its culture and even its Civil Code which is different, while all the other provinces have the common law. What is even more surprising, the Prime Minister has yet to recognize that all Canadian provinces are different because they all have their own characteristics. Indeed, that is the earmark of Canada, namely that its provinces all have their own identity and have decided to live in an economic union while preserving their own personality, as the children of a large family who have different characters but are close to have a better family life.

Each province is losing its identity, in a word each is self-governed as regards domestic matters in order to better contribute to this economic union that the Fathers of Confederation advocated. When we look at our history since the beginning of Confederation, we can see how strongly all the provinces have defended their independence. Young people in the English provinces feel that only the province of Quebec is fighting for its independence, which is completely wrong. I will surprise many of you when I say that it was one of Ontario's premiers, Mr. Mowat, who was the first one to launch discussions in favour of self-government in his province of Upper Canada, fearing Quebec or Lower Canada which had a much larger population than Upper Canada.

And here is another surprising fact: in 1886, Premier Fielding introduced a bill in the Nova Scotia provincial legislature calling for the separation of his province because he thought the independence of the province was threatened. All this arose from the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister of the time, Mr. Macdonald, was too much in favour of centralization. History is always repeating itself, Mr. Speaker. The provinces have always feared an overly centralizing federal government and the situation has grown even worse in terms of threat to Canadian unity since the coming into office of this government, which continuously encroached upon provincial territories and jurisdictions, taking unto itself all the best taxation fields to make full use of them. That is the real political and economic picture of Canada today. And what is even worse is that the usurper refuses to leave those territories he has violated in an attempt to hypocritically invade them through the back door. That is why national unity is jeopardized, Mr. Speaker. The federal government, established by the provinces to be responsible for some areas that were well defined by those very provinces has become the dictator of those who have created it. Before coming to the federal bureaucratic dictatorship as we know it today, there were three stages: from 1867 to 1887, there were lieutenant-governors who were the link between the provinces and the federal government; from 1887 to 1937, there were interprovincial conferences which the federal government did not attend; from 1937 to 1967, it was the time of administrative conferences between federal and provincial officials. It was in the heyday of bureaucracy, and finally came the federal-provincial conferences as we know them to-day and in which civil servants still play the leading role. According to some knowledgeable critics, those conferences have been and still are increasingly nothing but economic compromises. In short, those meetings are endless squabbles about who can tax and control the most. All the provinces, Mr. Speaker, want to win back their full autonomy in their respective jurisdictions. And to do so, they will have to have back their exclusive right to direct taxation.

However, the federal government does not want to withdraw from a field that brings it so much money. The only possible solution is therefore an interprovincial meeting so that the federal government may turn over a new leaf. We therefore suggest a constituent assembly of all the provinces, just like the one we had in the early days of Confederation, to determine what sectors they want to pool together and designate once again the federal government as administrator of those sectors.

I am convinced that only then shall we be able to live in harmony and in a new economic union which will respect the complete autonomy of each province. Canada will become a strong country only when all its members, the provinces, will be perfectly healthy, strong and free in their own realm of life.

When the Prime Minister tells us about the dissatisfaction which is felt throughout Canada, he seems to imply that this situation has been prevailing only since November 15, 1976, with the coming into power of the Parti Québécois. The Prime Minister did not feel the years of frustrations the people of Quebec went through under the previous administration of Mr. Bourassa who was even called "hot dog eater" when he was reluctant in submitting to the will of the federal government.

The explosion of November 15 was the expression of a feeling of disgust first towards the economy. Is it possible to understand this properly? And this feeling was the consequence of the federal dictature because the present government no longer respected the man the people of Quebec had elected democratically. Everyday the federal dictatorship was looking more menacing for Quebec which it seemed to treat as a second rank area without our premier being able to fight back.

Of course, the awakening of November 15 was brutal but when a man is awakened by being kicked what kind of awakening can he have, Mr. Speaker? What I am saying is hard to take but I am doing so reluctantly. My only purpose is to awaken the conscience of a government if that is still possible, to make it see reality to make it stop precipitating the destruction of Canada for the only purpose of saving face.

Mr. Speaker, that boxing bout between two fighters, Lévesque and Trudeau, must end while one awaits the next blow from the other, countering a referendum with another without clearly defining what those referendums will be. And, powerless, the people have to watch that fratricidal fight. I say that the people of Canada are powerless because the only referees are the governments of the provinces that must get together at the earliest to come up with concrete solutions that will satisfy the province of Quebec so it may find its economic interest in the renewed constitution. That was done for Nova Scotia in 1886 when it threatened to leave Confederation. The same ills call for the same remedies because the aspiration of peoples does not change, Mr. Speaker. They simply want more freedom.

The Prime Minister pitied the people of Canada, particularly the English-speaking group, by saying that Canada is going through a very dark period. I was happy to hear the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) talk about Manitoba the other day. He did it very timidly but still he mentioned it. For an Anglophone, that is great. Has the Prime Minister only read our history of the late nineteenth Century?

Has he even imagined the distress felt by our forefathers, as well as by all French Canadians who still made up half of the Canadian population, when all the governments of western Canada, which were majority governments through the well-organized federal immigration policy, decided to abolish all the linguistic rights of our compatriots by compelling them to become English if they wanted to survive, after they had settled in those provinces? Even today, our compatriots cannot put in a plea in their own language before western courts. Not even in Ontario. This government knows what I am talking about since its supporters are presently suffering from this situation.

Mr. Speaker, that is why I cannot ignore the childish statement made the other day in this House by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy), who said he was very pleased with the linguistic situation of Franco-Ontarians. I think the hon. member should stop looking at his shoes and hold up his head to see what is going on in Ontario. That is the kind of complacent statement by white negroes which harm all those people who for the past century in Ontario have been fighting to obtain for Franco-Ontarians the very same treatment Anglophones have been getting in Quebec for the last 110 years.

That is what happens when a member wants to save his party instead of his constituents. He brags about the fact that in Timmins 40 per cent of the population is French-speaking and that they have French elementary and secondary schools. I suggest to the hon. member that if Anglophones accounted for 40 per cent of Quebec's total population, they would control all schools, whether it be secondary, college, pre-university or university. In fact, despite the low percentage of Anglophones in Quebec, just count the number of English universities in Quebec and the number of French universities in Ontario, and then let us draw a comparison.

Instead of inviting us to his riding, the hon. member for Timmins should visit with those French-speaking groups who struggle daily to obtain the same justice which Quebec has always rendered to its Anglophone minority.

No one can deny that the people in Quebec have been patient for over a century. For one hundred and ten years, we have been patient and Quebecers have been acting as Good Samaritans in their province in the hope of an anglophone conversion. And where are we now, Mr. Speaker? A Quebecer cannot visit the western provinces even today without someone shouting at him: "Speak English!" I ask all members of this House what progress their provinces have made as concerns respecting minority rights, amd more particularly, as concerns the recognition of both official languages throughout Canada.

All sincere Anglophones will admit that there has not been in fact that much progress. Of course, there have been some attempts, studies, promises, agreements in principle, but all in all, what are they worth to people who have been waiting one hundred and ten years? Put yourselves for one minute in our shoes and in those of your fellow citizens who now live in Quebec and ask yourselves what would be your reaction and what are the reactions of this group of Anglophones who are temporarily going through what we have experienced ourselves in the past.

Moreover, put yourselves in the shoes of our young Quebecers who have much less patience than we have because they were not under the same religious influence as we were and do not believe in self-denial and resignation in the face of discrimination. I would like to add something to make the Anglophones who advocate Canadian unity—and thank God some Anglophones advocate Canadian unity as we do ourselves—understand why Quebec is now less patient than it was before. I believe that if something must be done today, it is up to the Anglophones to do it, and this, on the economic level of course, since it is useless to try to make a point with someone who is starved.

The young people in Quebec are hungry; they hunger for economic and social justice in Canada. I know that many have shown goodwill, but this is not sufficient, action is needed. First, our respective governments must be urged to hold meetings with the Quebec government to draft new provincial agreements. I fear that there will be no more dialogue nor any more hope and that would be serious for Canada.

It is not by referring our current problems to the Supreme Court of Canada that we will improve our relations with Quebec. Indeed, what about the Supreme Court itself faced with the precedents created in every western province in the past? If the government at the time did not dare say a word, how can it intervene today for a minority, while it allowed the rights of nine minorities to be denied. All this to convince the House that a confrontation before the courts will not settle present conditions, but intelligent, honest, free and far-sighted men will save Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken about the third option in order to warn all those who would venture in that direction. This is regrettable but we are among those who want to go in that direction, because we do not believe in his status quo although he had tried to prove that this is not a status quo but an evolutive status. It is evolutive in a sense that it will increase federal powers but regressive as it tends to diminish provincial powers. This is why we cannot accept it. What we would propose are reworked agreements with the provinces. I have here a very interesting article published in Le Devoir of October 18. If you will allow me I will quote you some passages:

> The third option calls for compromises, states John Robarts.
> The way towards Canadian unity calls for compromises and the members of the Commission for Canadian Unity will not forget it in their recommendations which are also inspired by various elements of psychology, sociology and economy.
> Commission Co-Chairman John Robarts was in Montreal yesterday and explained to the members of the Canadian Club how complex is the task that awaits the eight members of that commission and how wide is the scope of their mandate.
> "The commission, he reminded them, believes in the idea of a Canadian federation where the powers of the state are shared between two levels of government, both sovereign and partners under a single constitution. At the same time, it intends to present concepts and policies likely to constitute the elements of a third option for Canada."

The first inquiries of the commission have led to recognize that the various organizations of the federal government did not effectively represent provincial and regional interests. Those signs of dissatisfaction have led members of the commission to become aware that it is becoming urgent to define and work out changes to the institutions and to the political practices in order to make them more suited to the true needs of our time.

Therefore the commission has directed itself towards the search for an alternative, a third option, which will include listening to the population and experts but which is nevertheless inspired by certain principles.

The first of these principles is that Canada owes its origin to two founding peoples, one of which—the French-Canadian—has always recognized the principle of cultural duality while the other, on the contrary, never could accept it as exemplified by some recent events: the crisis over bilingualism in air traffic control and communications, the dispute over a French secondary school in Essex, etc.

For those who are claiming linguistic rights for Italians, Germans, in short for all other minorities, Mr. Robarts recalled that language is not a right that can be classified in the same category as freedom of speech or freedom of religion.

These two words are very, very important, Mr. Speaker.

Historically and constitutionally, French Canadians have the right to safeguard their language and their culture, and this right is inseparable from the "contract" signed in 1867.

Besides taking into account linguistic differences, the members of the commission will also be called upon to review regional differences and disparities.

During these consultations with Canadians, the commission will determine whether Anglophones are fully prepared to recognize the Canadian duality.

The first indications make us believe that it will be so, states Mr. Robarts, and tend to show a great gap in this government policy on bilingualism: the teaching of French in the English sector of Canada failed to gain prominence and that could have changed the whole picture.

After consulting the various groups, the members of the commission will present recommendations . . .

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the government-appointed commission. Such are the ideas put forward, and I think they are the result of the commissioners' travels. The other day, when I heard the Prime Minister suggesting we should not be deluded by that third option, I wondered if his statement does not hinder the commission from doing earnest and sincere work. I am anxious to see the results. I am especially anxious to see how the government will receive the commission's conclusions.

I would now like, Mr. Speaker, since I have a few minutes left, to deal with the unemployment situation referred to in the throne speech. Just recently the government pushed through a series of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. That once more harms the workers, who will pay more and get less.

That was a good deal for the government. They will be getting more money from the workers and give less in UIC payments, once more passing the buck to the provinces which are not the only ones responsible.

Looking at total benefits paid to the unemployed versus salaries received by the hundreds of technocrats and bureaucrats, we wonder whether the unemployment insurance program was created to the benefit of the unemployed or that of civil servants, because unemployment benefits deteriorate in direct proportion to the improvements in civil servants' monetary and other rewards.

If benefits were on a universal basis or in the form of a guaranteed annual income with equal treatment for all, we would finally start on the way to the distributory justice we have been advocating for years. The Prime Minister gave us notice of an additional amount of $150 million to fight against unemployment; if that kind of money were directly earmarked for the primary, secondary and tertiary sectors to create new industries, do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that such an investment would be much more profitable than to try once more to promote all kinds of make-work projects across Canada? I did not say that the minister took a wrong way, he is doing the best he can, but I think that the government's policy is not properly directed.

As for inflation, which is this government's main argument, I think they were unable to control inflation because this argument was borrowed from the Progressive Conservative Party. As we all remember, the Liberal Party went into the last election campaign saying that it was opposed to price and wage controls as recommended by the Progressive Conservative Party; what a surprise, for us, to see the Liberals use the Progressive Conservative argument as soon as they came to power. It was not the first time the Liberals had tried to lift the weapons of their enemies, they even attempted to have them cross the aisle—unsuccessfully as it turned out because they did not know how to handle them.

Government members are still wondering where inflation came from, yet they should know because they started the ball rolling ten years ago when they removed interest ceilings for banks and other credit institutions. Another reason is that the government did not control corporate prices and profits. I realize, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to stand up. I will simply say that if we do not work together to try and fight against inflation, and if the government does not take action to invest in primary industries, unemployment will keep on rising and our dollar will keep on sinking.

[English]

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Dawson) on his fine speech. Also I should like to take a few minutes to thank Her Majesty the Queen for making such an exhilarating visit to Canada in the past week. In my constituency in the east end of Toronto we have perhaps one of the last old, strong, British communities which has great links with the monarchy, and these people were extremely happy that Her Majesty's visit was such a success. As well, there are large numbers of newly arrived immigrants from Commonwealth countries in Asia and the Carribean who have their own ties with the monarchy.

The throne speech provides a forum for the government to outline its general direction of thought in the governance of the nation. Similarly, the throne speech debate, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) this morning, provides an opportunity for backbenchers to talk on the general issues of the day. On Wednesday afternoon of this week in the Chamber we heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) give one of his most brilliant and effective speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: In that speech he outlined succinctly the government's position on the economy and national unity. He demonstrated to the House how these two problems were intimately related and how they have an impact on both Quebec as a province and on the nation as a whole.

In contrast, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent), analysed the Quebec situation and the problems of the country generally. Both concluded that the source of all evil facing this country today emanates from our so-called poor economy. In my opinion these two hon. gentlemen and their parties are making a fundamental error in judgment.

As the Prime Minister stated on Wednesday, it is wrong to place the emphasis on economics and to dismiss perfunctorily the cultural and linguistic causes of today's dilemma.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: In fact the only bone the Leader of the Official Opposition threw into the national unity debate was his rather shrill and sabre rattling cry for an instant referral of Bill 101 to the Supreme Court. This represents a callous attitude which is openly playing to the extreme point of view in English-speaking Canada. There is a vast array of moderate people in this country, both English and French-speaking, who are looking for rational approaches from Canada's leaders. They are looking for statesmanship in dealing with the national unity problem. On Wednesday the Leader of the Opposition demonstrated that he has forfeited any claim to provide effective and rational leadership in this entire national unity debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: I should like to talk about the government's strategy on national unity. There has been much criticism in the English-speaking media that the government is taking no action and that it is sitting on its hands. That is not true.

I have been travelling around my constituency in order to speak at various service clubs and Rotary clubs. I have been talking about the government's strategy in dealing with the separatist threat. On the night of November 15 the Prime Minister said that the voters had done their democratic duty; they had elected a government, as was their right. He indicated that this government was a provincial government and, like all other provincial governments, it must abide by the constitution of Canada, which is the British North America Act at this particular time. In late last winter and early spring of this year the Prime Minister took his case to the country and attacked the basic premises of separatism. He defended and promoted the cause of Confederation. In fact he took his case to my own constituency on February 17 and made a stimulating address to the students of East York Collegiate.

The third phase in the government's strategy has been as dangerous as it has been necessary. It can accurately be described as marking time and waiting while the Parti Quebecois comes to grips with the real problems of government, and while the honeymoon with Quebec voters began to end for Mr. Levesque. Although this phase in the strategy has caused some disquiet in English Canada over the past few months, we have seen that Mr. Levesque's preoccupation with language and culture, and his neglect of economic issues, have seriously weakened his own position in Quebec. The Quebec economy is in serious trouble.

As has been pointed out by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), the Parti Quebecois has caused a flight of capital, technical know-how and skills from that province. The summer has allowed Quebecers to focus on their own problems without the diversion of federal intervention, and has exposed the idealogical division within the Parti Quebecois. This is demonstrated by the public cabinet decision-making now being engaged in by Mr. Levesque over the appointment of a language commissioner, by the rather frustrated views of Mr. Parizeau, and his nasty attacks on our own Minister of Finance.

The latest phase in the government's strategy began in September with the Prime Minister's offer to entrench minority language rights in the constitution. This was severely criticized by the opposition and by English-speaking Canada. The Prime Minister's offer demonstrated his own flexibility and demonstrated the flexibility of this government and of the Liberal party in dealing with the problems of the country. As the Prime Minister pointed out on Wednesday, the government is quite open to further changes in the constitution to accommodate the real needs and aspirations of all provinces, and not only the province of Quebec.

The next phase in this general strategy dealing with Quebec separatism will come forward in the next election. The next election will not be about what party is best suited to deal with national unity. No one on this side can convincingly argue that the Leader of the Opposition or the Leader of the New Democratic Party are any less committed or any less sincere in their desire to keep this country together. No one in his right mind would make this claim. The essential question for Canadians to decide next year is not which party is more dedicated to Canadian unity than the others, but which party offers a program of new constitutional and economic arrangements which will satisfy the west, the Atlantic region and, indeed, all the regions of Canada, and not only Quebec.

The NDP argues that the present constitutional arrangement, with some minor tinkering, will suffice. The New Democratic Party, with its natural Marxist bias, argues that an economic solution is the only way to preserve Confederation. The Progressive Conservative party appears to be following its traditional philosophy which favours a greater decentralization and a greater devolution of power or authority to the provinces.

As I stated earlier, the problems affecting Canada today are not only economic. They are also less obvious, certainly to the NDP and the PC's. Canada's problems also have to do with language and culture, their dignity and place is Canadian society. They have to do with the responsibility and responsiveness of government to the electorate. They have to do with the equalization of resources and constitutional power. Finally, Canada's problems also have to do with regional expression and regional identity.

Only the Liberal party, as the Prime Minister has shown, recognizes the duality of the challenge which faces Canada. Our party recognizes that there must be a re-arrangement of constitutional powers which will satisfy cultural, linguistic, and regional aspirations. But, Mr. Speaker, our party also recognizes the paramount need to preserve a strong central government, one that can act beyond sectional desires, to represent the collective interests of all Canadians and, Mr. Speaker, a central government which has the constitutional power to act in this fashion. For my part I am an avowed, unabashed centralist, and I have no qualms in telling the House why.

Over the past 20 years the proportion of government expenditures out of the total Gross National Product has increased to about 42 per cent. During this time federal expenditures have grown but, Mr. Speaker, they have not grown nearly as much as expenditures by provinces and municipalities. Since 1955 federal government expenditures have increased sevenfold, provincial expenditures 20-fold, and municipal expenditures ten-fold. Although the public sector portion of the GNP has increased in absolute terms to 42 per cent of all Canada's goods and services, the federal portion of total government expenditures has decreased from a post-war high of 60 per cent to about 40 per cent today.

We see a startling fact. The Government of Canada takes 40 per cent of all government expenditures, the provinces and municipalities the balance. This compares to the 60/40 ratio found in two comparable industrial confederations, the United States and West Germany.

A fundamental error is being made in the national unity debate. Critics of the present constitutional arrangement argue that many Canadians across the country are alienated from the federal government. They feel removed from the federal decision-making process. Therefore it is argued that more power should be vested in the provinces. I agree with the premise, but I disagree with the conclusion. Surely if federal institutions and the federal bureaucracy are not serving the needs of Canadians, then those institutions, the Senate, the House of Commons, the Supreme Court, the Public Service Commission, should be reformed. We should not devolve more powers to the provinces as a response.

In a speech made in this House last year I proposed certain institutional changes that could be made with respect to the House of Commons, such as a system of proportional representation which could effectively restore the confidence of Canadians in parliament. We can only do this by changing the method of election to the House of Commons. As the Prime Minister stated, we can also make changes to the Senate and the appointment of Supreme Court judges.

We could also decentralize not only the administrative plant of our public service, but also decentralize the decision-making process in the bureaucracy so that regional directors have the authority necessary to adapt government policy to the various needs of the regions.

As a federal state, Canada is the most decentralized in the world. Any further devolution of authority to our provinces would so weaken national decision-making as to allow Canada to become little more than a loose commonwealth of independent states, with wide differences between the quality of government services offered in medical care, in treatment of the elderly, in higher education, in housing standards, and in a host of other fields. Mr. Speaker, is this what Canadians want? That is not what I want, and I am sure that is not what the Liberal party wants. I am sure it is not what the government wants. That will be for Canadians to decide in the next federal election.

If it is our duty to restore the confidence of Canadians in the parliamentary process in the country in order to deal with the problems of national unity, it is equally important that we, as parliamentarians, encourage Canadians to restore confidence in our country as a whole, but in our economy in particular.

Contrary to the opinion of the opposition, I believe the government has done a pretty good job in managing the economy during the difficult period of the past few years. Indeed as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) have pointed out, our economic problems are the problems of all the industrialized countries and, with a few exceptions, are not nearly as serious as those faced by our major trading partners.

It is not the Government of Canada which should take the blame for deteriorating economic confidence in Canada. Surely critics in the business community, in the media, and in the parliamentary opposition should be castigated for their negativism, their pessimism about such a great country with such a great future.

The leader of the NDP has talked in terms of Canada facing another great depression. This is absolute rubbish. I wonder what Canadians think of such a political leader as the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby whose resort to hyperbole and hysteria has seriously marred any respect he may have had from the public and from the members of this House.

Let us look at the facts, Mr. Speaker. Over the past ten years Canada has outspaced the United States when one takes into account all economic factors. It is true that over the past two years Canada has lost its competitive edge because of declining productivity and higher wage rates. However, the high costs of Canadian labour are now being corrected by the anti-inflation program, and by the dollar's decline in value.

On the question of lagging productivity in 1976 and 1977, we must remember that productivity reflects not only attitudes toward work by employees. To listen to the Conservative party you would be led to believe that all Canadians are lazy. If they are going to say that in the next election, good luck to them. Productivity reflects not only worker attitudes. It also reflects lack of capital investment and poor management methods.

According to the OECD, Canada has created more new jobs in recent years than any of the world's industrialized nations. In not one year of the last ten have Canadians seen their standard of living fall. Even in 1975 when the U.S. GNP declined by 2 per cent, Canada's GNP actually increased by 1.1 per cent. This could possibly be called no growth, but no growth in a difficult period of time is preferable to a decline in the standard of living as we saw with our major trading partner, the United States.

Mr. Gillies: We have gone to tenth place.

Mr. Collenette: I hear the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) who will be following me. He is my next door neighbour. He will have adequate opportunity to say what he wants on the subject.

We must remember, Mr. Speaker, that the effects of the 1975 recession in Canada were cushioned by the phasing in of energy price increases, by our generous system of social benefits, the indexation of pensions, family allowances, and personal tax exemption rates.

It is my conclusion that Canada has not done as bad as our critics would have us believe. Sure we have to be careful. The growth in government expenditures must be in line with the general economic growth of the country. In fact more than $3 billion has been shaved off the government's spending estimates over the past two years.

We must continue to restrict the growth in the public service so that it does not exceed the general growth in the population. In fact over the past year growth in the numbers of public servants has been held to 1 per cent less than the population increase.

We must be careful not to allow federal public service compensation to outpace compensation in the private sector. In fact over the past 20 years the complaint that the federal public service has been the pace-setter for wages is not entirely true since both the average provincial and municipal public sector salary increases outpaced federal public salaries, with the municipalities being most guilty. So, Mr. Speaker, let's get our economic facts into some perspective. Our economic performance, while not great, has been far from bad.

What of the future? Well, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. Our prospects are excellent. With the revaluation of the dollar, the export of manufactured goods should increase substantially. With the winding up of controls, business should feel more confidence to invest and broaden their entrepreneurial skills.

The building of the pipeline will create between 6,000 and 8,000 new jobs in the next few years. Pipeline materials will be made basically in Canada, for the Canadian portion of the line by Stelco in Hamilton, perhaps, and in Sault Ste. Marie near the hon. member's riding of Nickel Belt. In addition, nearly $500 million a year will accrue to Canada through maintenance fees and royalties, thus bringing about a more favourable balance of payments position.

Major defence procurements of such items as the Aurora patrol plane and the new jet fighter, much of the work on which will be apportioned to Canadian companies, means an injection of between $4 billion or $5 billion into our economy over the next ten years, and no doubt there will be a further investment in plants such as Syncrude, perhaps through government in partnership with private industry.

Canadian technology in several fields has recently created business for Canadian companies. I am thinking, for example, of the Lear executive jet which is being built by Canadair and is giving work to the aviation industry, especially in Montreal. Then there is the joint venture between Canadian National Railways and a Spanish consortium to build a new railway in Venezuela, an enterprise which, by the way, will have the effect of recycling some of the oil money.

In the field of foreign aid, CIDA grants are being tied to the purchase of Canadian goods and services. Witness, as one example, our involvement with the construction of a railway in Zambia.

In short, Canada's future is bright and I believe we have much to look forward to. If there is any impediment to the economic recovery of this country it is not the government's management but the doom and gloom, the pessimistic attitude of the opposition.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I know I must keep my remarks short because the Minister of Employment (Mr. Cullen) has a plane to catch and he wants to gather every pearl of wisdom I have for him, so I must finish before he has to leave.

I do want to express my gratitude for the opportunity of having the Queen in our country during these past few days. I think the Canadian people appreciated very much seeing her and having the opportunity to hear her personally read the Speech from the Throne. I think it is too bad the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did not see fit to give her a little more freedom of movement in this country; I know there are a lot of people in the west who would have loved to have her visit that part of Canada. I know the people of Surrey-White Rock would love to have had her come and visit us there.

Mr. Cullen: She will be in Edmonton next year.

Mr. Friesen: Yes, she will be in Edmonton next year. "During the campaign?" says the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais). I don't think the government will have the nerve to call an election even then. But we will welcome her back to our shores at that time.

It is too bad the Queen had to read such a vacuous statement as the Speech from the Throne. However, that document has already been sufficiently belaboured by hon. members and by the press, and I will leave it alone for now. But to have it followed up by the tedium of a two-hour speech, so-called, by the Prime Minister was another plague on this House. The one benefit that television brought is that we could see clearly the collective ennui in the faces of government supporters as they listened to what the Prime Minister had to say, or not to say.

I recognize that the only cabinet minister who had the fortitude to sit for the whole length of that address was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I can understand why he possessed that kind of fortitude; he is used to speeches of that kind because he reads his own. It is too bad we had to be harangued in that way and listen to the kind of statement the Prime Minister made. Out of what was said in those two hours we got two statements, one where the Prime Minister, to use his own words, scooped the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on the announcement of the $150 million make-work program, and the other when he scooped not only the Minister of Finance but the entire cabinet on the question of the referendum. I say this because, as it became evident during the question period yesterday, the entire cabinet knew nothing about that particular proposal. But there are certain problems inherent in that proposal for a referendum. The Prime Minister has problems with members of his own caucus.

A year ago we were debating the Speech from the Throne, as we are now, and I recall that the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) was the member who moved the address in reply. Today I looked up Hansard and could not help but be amused by what the Prime Minister had said by way of a compliment to that hon. member. He complimented the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont and his colleague for the eloquence with which they had spoken, and went on to say—

The presence of such outstanding young men among us demonstrates the ever renewed vitality of the House of Commons as well as its ability to reflect the varied regional and cultural concerns of Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Friesen: That was on October 30. One month later, on November 15, Hansard records the remarks of the same member, the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont. It so happens that the day before I had presented a motion to the House asking that a referendum be held on the subject of capital punishment. The Prime Minister had already spoken of him as a very intelligent young man who added vitality to the House. Now let me read the remarks the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont made regarding a referendum. He said, and I quote from page 1003 of Hansard for November 15, 1976:

I do not think it would be appropriate to use such a dangerous tool because a referendum is very dangerous. It can divide a population into two factions and afterwards it is extremely difficult to heal the wounds.

I trust that all the members from Quebec will keep in mind what the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont said a year ago on the subject of a referendum.

Mr. Roberts: Does not an election do the same?

Mr. Friesen: The Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) wants to respond. He has already presented himself to the House as an authority on sex and reproduction, and we find all kinds of examples of his philosophy on Yonge Street in Toronto. He would be better advised to keep to the subject of broadcasting and assistance to the arts rather than talk about sex.

The hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont went on to say, as reported on the same page:

Without that experience, and on such a touchy subject as that one, it is inadvisable to experiment. I am not ready to tackle that adventure. Why not? I will tell you right now. The idea of a referendum is not a new one. In Quebec we know what they are because people have been talking about them for some six years, now.

He went on to say:

The real concerns of Quebecers are shelved. Economic problems, consumer issues, problems relating to industry, fishing, transportation, all that is thrown to the basket because what is important is the referendum, the basic option: people voted in 1970, in 1973 and again in 1976 for or against that option.

He went on to say as reported at page 1004:

Mr. Speaker, a referendum is dangerous . . . It is serious, and when 22 million people are involved, experiments are out of the question . . . I do not want any referendum but still less on the occasion of an election, because then you have the situation we are witnessing in Quebec: People do not have any choice; they no longer vote for a party, they no longer vote for ideas, they vote for an option, Mr. Speaker.

● (1552)

And what happens over the years? In the case of the province of Quebec, this creates dissensions, factions, and the province can no longer operate with factions. And if factions are created in Canada on the basis of the results of such a referendum, or of one option, or another, Mr. Speaker, there is no room for Canada in the world.

Those are the remarks of the hon. member for Lafontaine over a year ago on the very day of the election in the province of Quebec. His remarks were followed by those of the hon. member who is chairman of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). We know he is an esteemed lawyer who knows the law. I recall very vividly his taking me to task about the word "referendum". He gave me quite a little lecture on what is a referendum and what is a plebiscite. As reported at page 1005 of Hansard for that day he said this:

I find it hard to understand that hon. members could rise in this House and urge us to change our whole parliamentary system merely because they are not satisfied with a particular vote.

Those are the words of a supporter of the Prime Minister who, two days ago, suggested that we should hold a referendum. The hon. member went on to say:

If we were to have a referendum, it would have to be followed by an act of parliament, with the members of parliament being bound by the referendum not having the right to vote independently on the issue. In effect, they would be bound by something that happened outside this House, and that would be destructive of the whole parliamentary system.

That is what the Prime Minister is suggesting, Mr. Speaker, and I am waiting to see how the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville will vote if that measure ever comes to the floor of the House. Certainly I will be watching how the hon. member for Lafontaine will vote if the measure comes to floor of the House.

Mr. Blais: You are comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. Friesen: That is the best the Postmaster General has to offer. Then, as recorded at page 1006 of Hansard, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville said this:

If we were to introduce a device of this kind we would be in a position where at least all issues of moral content, in the generally accepted sense of the word, would have to be submitted to the vote of the people. There is no possibility of isolating a single vote of this kind and treating it as something separate.

It seems to me that in our system the only case in which a referendum could be justified would be one dealing with the system itself . . . If we had a similar case here which was changing our future course, or a vital question dealing with the government itself, that would be different—

Does the Prime Minister have in mind the changing of the system itself? He has suggested that on previous occasions. He has said that the government will have to take some action in the marketplace. As Prime Minister does he have in mind changing the system? Then I assume the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville would feel justified in supporting the Prime Minister's ideas on a referendum.

The speech of the hon. member was followed by a statement from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), who was here a few minutes ago but has now left the Chamber. As reported at page 1007 of Hansard he said:

A number of complex issues to do with the questions at issue cannot be solved by referendum.

There in a nutshell, Mr. Speaker, is the problem which the Prime Minister faces within his own caucus on the matter he proposed so glibly in the House the other day. Just a few months ago we had an occasion in the House when members from Quebec voted en masse against the opposition because our famous Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) failed to produce a document in both official languages. They still supported that action even though it was a denial of the very principle they have been espousing all these years. What is a mystery to me and to many people across Canada is that the Prime Minister says that on matters relating to the economy the law cannot restore economic equilibrium in this country, that what we need is the collective spirit of all Canadians. It is not the law that will change the economy, just the collective spirit of Canadians. But when it comes to the language issue, he says that only the law can provide equality.

Just a few evenings ago we had the privilege of attending a gala performance in the National Arts Centre. I count it a privilege because it was a great performance from beginning to end. I think whoever it was who was in charge of planning that occasion, as far as the talent assembled there was concerned—

Mr. Roberts: Me.

Mr. Friesen: The Secretary of State says it was he. I compliment him on that, because the talent from beginning to end was of the very highest quality and the spirit was great. I note there were about 150 Conservatives, New Democrats and Social Crediters invited, and 2,150 Liberals and their hacks and money raisers from across Canada. As a matter of fact, I sat next to one of them from the Yukon, the official agent who had been told by the PMO that he was going to meet the Queen, on the plane coming down here.

[Mr. Blais.]

The climax came with the André Gagnon performance, which I thought was superb. It was an exquisite expression of creativity in music. We saw it last year at the Olympics. It illustrates my point that for 300 years our French culture has been flourishing and thriving and has been creative. There has been a flowering and a burst of activity in the last generation as never before, without legal support, without the need for constitutional rearrangement. We have seen the flowering of the expression of French in that province as never before, and I think this is to be welcomed. I applaud it and I enjoy it. André Gagnon's performance the other night proved it.

But the next day, Mr. Speaker, we attended not only an ecumenical but a bilingual church service, and I could not help but be amazed at the contrast. There were some people taking part in the service who obviously were brought up in the French language, which they used in the most beautiful, limpid tones of which that language is capable. It was beautiful to listen to, and I enjoyed it. Then we heard those trained in recent years; butchery, mutilation of a beautiful language, killing it. Why anybody would want to decimate that lovely language by using it in the way it was used, and as it is constantly used by people trained late in life, I will never understand.

That language and that culture have been preserved for generations, indeed for centuries, because the people love and enjoy them. People will only preserve such things when they have esprit de corps and love for their culture. No one in this country can make that happen. I can see what the Prime Minister is going to do. Like Elmer Gantry he is going to take his religion of culture across Canada and peddle it in each of the shrines of the provinces.

He will probably begin in the maritimes where there is already something of an agreement to preserve bilingual education, an agreement which was easily reached. Then he will come to Ontario. Ontario has been in the vanguard of providing bilingual education for the people of Ontario. Then he will move on to meet the newly elected premier of Manitoba. That is a province where, I understand, during the provincial campaign about a month ago the Liberals spent $1 million trying to get a few Liberal members elected. One was elected and they managed to reduce their share of the popular vote to 12 per cent. They have the same investment policy for the economy, incidentally, and they get the same kinds of returns.

● (1602)

That is the province where a gentleman by the name of Forest—for a decade he has been called Forest but now, all of a sudden, he is called Forêt—received a traffic ticket some months ago which he is now refusing to pay, even though he has been convicted, because the traffic ticket was not written in both the official languages of Canada, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford) has been sending men from his staff over to Manitoba to protect that man's rights. I wonder if that is what the Prime Minister had in mind in his Speech from the Throne, although I do not know how a traffic ticket can be considered a criminal offence. I suppose it depends on how the man drives.

Incidentally, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) is reported to have gone to his riding of St. Boniface. He realized there is one thing he can do. He cannot read his answers very well, but he can think ahead to the next election. Apparently he went to his riding and he said to the NDP members there, "Look, we have an election coming a year from now and you are going to face a tough battle in this riding. We will not put up a very strong opposition now, but next year we will ask you not to put up too strong an opposition against me". He knows how to think ahead.

The Prime Minister will go to that newly elected government and say, "Look, let us make an arrangement here", and then he will go to the beleaguered socialist leader in Saskatchewan and will say to him, "Look, we have this arrangement", and he will talk about it politely while the television cameras are grinding and the newspaper reporters report him, and he will try to make some arrangement. But after he has been there, the gremlins from his office will follow hard on his heels and will say, "Look, we understand we have a disagreement on the cablevision policy here. We would really like to solve that, we would like to come to an agreement. We also know that before the next election the Liberals will be in third position and surely you, Mr. Blakeney, will want to be re-elected, so let us come to an agreement. We will not put up too strong a candidate in opposition to most of your members so that you do not fight us too hard on this issue". He will come out with some kind of arrangement regarding the bilingual education program.

Then the Prime Minister will move on to Alberta, and that is where he will find the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Cullen: Watch out, you are on television.

Mr. Friesen: That is right.

He will find the Farm Credit Corporation in the metropolitan area of Camrose. You see, that place will now require bilingual education, so he will go to the premier of Alberta and say, "Look, we must have bilingual education here. We will supply the bucks if you supply the program", knowing all along that nobody wants to be known as a bigot, and knowing full well that a few years ago the Prime Minister called the former premier of British Columbia, W. A. C. Bennett, a bigot because he did not agree with his bilingual policy. Nobody wants to be called a bigot, so the Prime Minister will try to bring each of these premiers into line.

Last on the list will be the premier of Quebec who, according to today's newspaper, has already rejected the idea and said that the whole thing will be settled in Quebec anyway, and that the Prime Minister can do what he wants. The man who started the unity group in Quebec said that a referendum will do nothing but create more problems. I suggest to you that the Prime Minister has problems, but the gimmick is that he will try to get unanimity from all nine premiers, then he will go to Mr. Lévesque and, voilà, he will not get it. Then the rest of the premiers will have to decide whether or not to go ahead with the program. If they do not, the Prime Minister will call them pikers. If they do, he is that far ahead. This is the kind of game that the Prime Minister might play.

The Prime Minister has already said in the House that this referendum is binding. But what are they going to do with the Tessier group in the PMO? What are they going to do with the group that is travelling across Canada participating in hearings—the Robarts-Pepin group? If the referendum is binding on parliament, why bother to have those groups discussing and working on this subject? Sooner or later the Prime Minister will have to come clean on this issue. As I said at the outset, why is he saying that no law will restore the economy—it has to be the collective spirit of Canadians—but when it comes to language and culture he says, "it must be inextricably bound within the constitution", when for three hundred years we have had proof in Quebec that that is not the case?

The second part of the Prime Minister's statement had to do with job creation programs, and that included one of the greater absurdities in his speech because he was flailing the NDP—I do not mind that much but I wish he would do it with some consistency—for their lack of conscience about productivity and saying that the Canadian workers are only 80 per cent as productive as the Americans. I should like to ask the Prime Minister how one million unemployed can improve their production percentage points. That would be a great solution.

At the same time he announced a job creation program of $150 million. We in Surrey-White Rock know something about job creation programs, because in the last batch of money that the minister of employment sitting over there gave us he promised me that I would be very happy with it, and yet I got only half as much as in the one before. I do not know what he thinks it takes for me to be happy, but I want to assure him it is not that. The hon. member for Skeena, the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo), received $4 million while I received only $214,000 for an area with 140,000 people.

The minister tells me that there are around 175 people looking for work, but when I checked with the local Manpower office I found that there are nearly 6,000 people on the active rolls. I do not know how he works his statistics, but certainly no maths major is working in his department. As I said, people in Surrey-White Rock know something about job creation coming from this government, but when it comes to productivity and the complaints of the Prime Minister that Canadians are not sufficiently productive, he has the gall to announce another job creation program, which is the least productive area of government in the whole country. He knows that every job that is created through this department costs $5,000 and the person only makes $3,000. You are spending $5,000 so somebody can earn $3,000. Under the DREE programs it costs $50,000 to create a job. When it comes to productivity, I wonder if the Prime Minister is the one to lecture us about 80 per cent productivity.

This government does not deserve the support of the Canadian people. The bankruptcy of the two hour speech of the Prime Minister the other day is absolute proof that the government has run out of ideas, that it is exhausted, that the Prime Minister has joined the geritol generation and has no energy left. That is why I support my leader's motion that we cannot have confidence in this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Joe Flynn (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy today to take part in the speech from the throne debate. First I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood).

This debate takes place at a time of great importance in Canadian history when Canada faces a crisis of confidence in its economy and in its ability to survive as a united nation. In the weeks and months ahead we in this Chamber will make decisions which will inevitably determine the future shape of the Canadian federation.

The Speech from the Throne outlined the major policy directions the government will take in this session of parliament, and my reading of the speech indicates to me that this session will be both productive and very exciting.

I am especially pleased with the announcement of the government that the control period will terminate in 1978, on a staggered schedule. Probably the happiest news a diversified constituency such as mine, with many industries which are anticipating a problem as these controls come off, could receive would be that the controls will be taken off carefully, slowly and in a determined fashion, and we expect the result to be our well-being. It is important to the price stability of the Canadian economy that controls are lifted on a sector by sector basis so that the effects of a free pricing policy are gradually absorbed.

The creation of a monitoring agency to replace the Anti-Inflation Board will add greater depth to the arsenal of the nation's economic planners.

I think there is little doubt in the minds of most Canadians—although hon. members opposite rarely find anything good to say for it—that the Anti-Inflation Board has rendered a valuable service to all Canadians. The annual rate of inflation in Canada decreased from 11.1 per cent in August, 1975, to 6.2 per cent in August, 1976, largely due to the efforts of the AIB. Although the present year's inflation is expected to be approximately 8 per cent, the over all target has been attained due to the better than forecast reduction in the first year. Over-all, the performance of the controls program has been encouraging. The double digit inflation of 1975 is now a thing of the past, and the prospects for economic recovery have improved.

I was also glad to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announce in his speech to this House last night that the proposed tax on death benefits accruing from life insurance policies is not to be proceeded with. I have always been of the opinion that this proposed tax would not be in the best interests of average Canadians. In the period of grief immediately following the death of a loved one the government has no right to impose further grief by taxing whatever is left of the deceased's estate.

I think most hon. members of this House will agree that the two most important problems for us to resolve are closely related to each other. Our continued concentration of effort toward the preservation of national unity will be greatly assisted if we direct an equal concentration of effort to matters in the economic sphere. It goes without saying that a strong and prospering Canadian economy will help unite Canadians.

With respect to economic problems I would like to make several observations on factors which I think will contribute to an economic resurgence in Canada in 1978.

At its present level our devalued dollar will make Canadian products and services more attractive to foreign buyers, and the resultant increase in the volume of our exports will stimulate domestic economic growth.

A total of $1 billion will be spent this year and next by the federal government on direct job creation, thereby significantly reducing the number of unemployed in Canada.

The spring of 1978 will mark the beginning of one of the largest civil engineering projects in the history of the world; the northern pipeline to carry gas to the energy-hungry south. This will provide immense benefit to Canada in terms of our foreign trade deficit, as well as substantial employment opportunities. It will also result in a marked production increase for Canadian manufacturing and service industries related to the project.

In this session we will be re-introducing tax reduction and investment incentive legislation to stimulate the economy further and create needed jobs. Properly administered, these initiatives should lead to increased confidence in the Canadian economy.

The $100 tax reduction announced last night by the Minister of Finance should cause a spurt in economic activity in early spring, 1978. I am sure all Canadians will benefit from this initiative. Also of primary importance to any recovery is Canada's competitiveness in the international market place. Canadian workers must make a concerted effort to increase productivity and to engage in responsible negotiations when it comes to wage increases. Every Canadian is acutely aware of the gravity of the situation in this regard. All around this nation we hear that we have been pricing ourselves out of business. I am not sure whether the reason is our minimum wage law, but we are surely in trouble if we do not take a real look at ourselves.

Of equal concern to Canadians is the issue of Canada's national unity. Since the election of the PQ government in the province of Quebec on November 15, 1976, the national unity question has become the predominant concern of many Canadians. During this session of parliament we will be increasingly involved in the course of our national development.

On October 19, 1977, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) told the House that the federal government would also consider holding a referendum on the question of Quebec independence. This announcement comes at a time when the PQ in Quebec is preparing its referendum machinery. It is a time for all Canadians to become involved in the debate.

We will also be dealing in this session with several proposed constitutional changes which will ensure the strength of Canada's duality. Such a task will be long and difficult.

Mr. Speaker, I promised to be brief, and I shall keep that promise. In closing I would like the House and all Canadians to reflect for a moment on the following description of Canada given by Her Majesty the Queen in the Speech from the Throne. She said, and I quote:

> Whenever I am in this wonderful country of Canada, with her vast resources and unlimited challenges, I feel thankful that Canadians have been so successful in establishing a vigorous democracy well suited to a proud and free people.

Speaking at Government House she said:

> From the viewpoint of history this is the great Canadian achievement: not just that you have prospered, but that you have done so as a diverse society, and in peace.
> In a world divided by differences of colour, race, language, religion and ideology, the Canadian experience stands out as a message of hope.

Canada, like any other nation, does have serious problems. Some are of a purely domestic nature, and some are due to external conditions which are beyond our control. As we begin this new session of parliament, let us not forget that we are here, first and foremost, to provide for the people of Canada good, responsible government. Our task is great, and though our problems are many, our resolve to succeed is limitless.

We will put to rest Canada's crisis of confidence.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, this has been a most unusual day in the House of Commons. It is unusual that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) can stand up and speak on a day on which one of the major industries for which he is responsible reports the largest lay-off since the end of World War II and have absolutely nothing to say about it. It is very unusual that the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), who represents the area concerned, should make the statement that he does not really believe that the natural resources industry needs support and encouragement in this country. What an unusual day it has been!

● (1622)

This afternoon I want to speak about the Speech from the Throne. I want to go through the ritual—because ritual is often much more important than substance in this place—of thanking the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne for their fine remarks. I do that with some depth of appreciation because, as I read the Speech from the Throne, I know that anybody who had to speak in favour of it had to use a great deal of ingenuity to praise it. Both members showed a great deal of ingenuity in their remarks.

It is a fatuous document, Mr. Speaker. There is nothing in it, which has become the hallmark of such speeches made by this government. It is really astonishing, at a time when people are asking the government and parliament to be a responsible forum for the conduct of the business of this nation, that the government did not even bring down a list of bills, an agenda for performance for the forthcoming session of parliament. We cannot look at the Speech from the Throne and assess from it what is going to happen in this country because there is so little in it.

We have to look at a troika of activities—the Speech from the Throne, the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the day before yesterday, and the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) last night to try to obtain some feeling for what the government is going to do about the great problems of our nation—problems about which there is very little dispute—the economy, national unity, and I would put as a third and very, very important problem, the reform of this institution. These three things are very much interrelated.

Canadians can take very little confidence from the speech of the Prime Minister. I disagree totally with the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette) because I suspect there has seldom been a time in the history of parliamentary democracy when the leader of a country spoke with such little analysis of the problems, with such little emotion, and with such little call to duty to the people of the country than was the case by the Prime Minister the other afternoon.

To say that the Prime Minister's analysis of our economic problems was at the level of Economics I is to do a great disservice to the teaching profession. It was well below that. There were some interjections to the effect that he was quoting Adam Smith, but he obviously has not even read Adam Smith very carefully. If this were not such a serious matter, a duo like Wayne and Shuster could take what the Prime Minister had to say about the economic problems of this country and make a fine sketch out of it.

The Prime Minister said that we do not need a new theory of economics. But he was proposing one, Mr. Speaker. He was saying it is our collective responsibility because of our collective guilt, that we are in economic trouble in this country. In his ten years of maladministration he has given us Marshallian economics, Keynesian economics, Neo-Keynesian economics, Galbraithian economics, and now he wants to give us Freudian economics.

A psychological theory of economic activity is what the Prime Minister is proposing because the fault, as Brutus would say, is in ourselves. The problem, according to the Prime Minister, is not the way in which this government has operated the economy but is among Canadians. They want too much. They do not work hard enough. We have not had theories of economics like this since William Stanley Jevons and the sunspot theory in 1870. It reminds one of 1930 when people sat around saying, "Don't worry, things are going to be fine if we just talk about prosperity." I have forgotten who said it this afternoon but someone did say that if we would just be optimistic things would turn out well. That is what people did in 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, and it didn't work.

No serious student of economic problems believes the sort of thing the Prime Minister was saying the other afternoon—that if we think things are going to be all right, then they are going to be all right. That simply is not true; it never has been true, and it never will be true. The psychological theory of economics which the Prime Minister is advancing certainly is not going to work.

The Prime Minister is telling Canadians that they ought to work harder and get less. For 200 years, Mr. Speaker, the theory has been that you work harder and get more. He said that Canadians are living beyond their means. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? How do you live beyond your means? An individual cannot live beyond his means because his credit is used up and then he is finished. Even a provincial government—upon which this administration likes to put blame for our economic difficulties—cannot live beyond its means because eventually debts are called.

The only organization that can live beyond its means in this country is the federal government. It can do so because it can print money. The myth that has been spread that inflation in this country has been caused by people wanting too much, by unions demanding too much, by corporations demanding too much, is wrong. The reason we have had so much inflation is that we have a profligate government, an irresponsible government that has never felt it had a responsibility to keep the spending programs it put before the public in proportion to what the country could produce. The federal government has created the problems we face in this country today, no one else. When I see an $8 billion deficit in this country with 8 per cent unemployment, I know Lord Keynes is twirling in his grave.

How does one make a government responsible when it does not require any backing for the currency it prints? Two thousand years ago Demosthenes said that democracy will never survive because democracy means that people elect those who will give them the most. Once you start giving and giving and giving you will bankrupt the country and it will collapse. The essence of an efficient, operating, democratic system is responsibility on the part of the government. It is a sad fact we have had no responsibility on the part of this government that has had the authority for the past ten years.

The Minister of Finance was correct when he said last night that he did not have much room for manoeuvring. I agree he does not, with an $8 billion deficit going to $10 billion, and 8 per cent unemployment. If he hopes to go ahead with the same sort of budgetary policies that were followed by his predecessors, he will fail.

The former Minister of Finance brought a budget down last spring. There was nothing in it whatsoever. I does not make a bit of difference what the Minister of Finance said last night about the economy if what he said indicates the direction of economic policy in the future.

[Mr. Gillies.]

We must recognize what our problems are. They are deterioration of the balance of payments, a huge drop in the exchange rate, and this has meant more inflation. High inflation means uncertainty and low investment; low investment means low employment. What must we do to resolve this situation? $150 million of make work expenditure programs this winter will do nothing towards solving our fundamental problems.

Of course, I support the proposition that no one in this great country should be allowed to starve or not to have housing. But we need a completely new type of budgetary approach to solve our problems. The government must look at the industries that are the foundation of our strength in this country, at fishing, mining, pulp and paper, and find out what has to be done to make them competitive again so that they can export anew. The government must bring in representatives from all areas to find out what must be done and then go ahead and do it.

We ought to have one of the most magnificent fishing industries in the world, and indeed we have some of the most efficient fishermen in the world. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) made a fine speech in relation to this industry the other day. How is it possible that we can negotiate the 200-mile limit and not be ready with programs for a modern fishing industry which will provide employment in the Atlantic provinces?

How is it that the mining industry has opened only one new major mine in the last five years? Why is it possible, in this country that has the greatest potential for mining of any country in the world, that we import twice as much mining machinery as we export?

How can it happen that we are a net exporter of pulp manufacturing equipment? What has gone wrong? Why is there no industrial strategy in the country at all, absolutely none? If we are to turn our economy around, we have to support those industries where we have a competitive advantage.

We have heard over and over again the litany of problems the manufacturing industries face in Canada. It is alleged that markets are too small, distances are too long, and productivity is too low. The reality is that when we have reasonably large markets such as in auto parts the productivity in Canada is as high or higher than any place in the world. In agriculture no country in the world can match Canada as far as increasing productivity is concerned.

Unfortunately, we do not have a climate created by the government which encourages investment, hard work, and which stimulates people to be as productive as they possibly can.

Perhaps the most incredible situation we are faced with, because of our delinquent government, is in our energy policy. I find it incomprehensible, as I am sure other hon. members do, that the government is still working on a strategy of self-reliance—that we are going to import energy, particularly oil, in the 1980's to meet our domestic needs. We have in Canada in the tar sands the largest known reserves of oil of any country in the world. The reserves are greater than in the Middle East. Yet we have no crash program to get that oil produced. If we have to depend upon the importation of oil, as is planned by the government, it will have enormous negative effects on this country.

The exchange rate in Canada in the 1980's could drop to 75 cents. The government cannot be aware of the dangers in its current policy. It must be and I hope it will be changed.

What we require in this country is constructive production. We must have a budget policy to make it possible for the people who are producers in this nation to start producing again. If we do not, the trade deficit will increase, the exchange rate will fall, there will be more inflation and more unemployment. This afternoon the hon. gentleman opposite told us not to be gloomy but surely the only hope we have for finding solutions is to analyse our problems. Anybody looking at Canada from outside or inside has to conclude that we are facing the most serious economic crisis we have had since the depression.

The problems can be solved. The legacy of the Hon. John Turner as minister of finance was the attitude that nothing could be done. That was his motto of operations—do nothing. Of course something can be done. We can have a new budgetary policy based on needs of various sectors of our economy and that type of policymaking could give us a chance to turn this country around.

Referring to national unity, I am concerned with what the Prime Minister said about national unity in his speech because I am afraid that we may be trapped in rhetoric, language and words. He referred to the fact that there is no room for a third option and the people who are talking about a third option are making a big mistake. The Prime Minister should move around this country in order to find out what people are thinking.

In British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick people are looking for a third option. Let us not get caught up in the semantics of federalism. The reality in this country today is that people are not content with the constitution as it now stands and are not content with the manner in which federalism has been administered by this government. Also, they will not accept the interpretation, belief and understanding of federalism put forth by the Prime Minister.

If the Prime Minister suggests that there is not to be a third option, which is the way I read his speech, that will not satisfy the Canadian people. In my reading of his speech I see a suggestion that we have had a moving federalism, but the Canadian people do not believe this. They do not believe federalism has been flexible enough in the manner in which it has been administered by this government. They want a total new look. They want a total new look for this country, the way in which it is governed the constitutional relationships among areas of the nation.

Associated with that demand and there is no question—and this must be a matter of great concern to everyone—that the Canadian people do not believe parliament is operating effectively. I have sympathy for the remarks made by the hon. gentleman opposite when he was referring to an elected Senate. We have to find a way so that the people in the regions of this nation can have an input into the making of federal policies. Perhaps one way to do that is through an elected Senate on a regional basis, but it must be a Senate with power. The people of Canada are aware of the fact that far, far too much of what goes on in this House is a sham. When the estimates come into the House, there is no one in the House of Commons who knows what that money is being used for and how it is being spent. The checks and balances of our system are not working. The legislative function has been destroyed to a considerable degree because so much has been taken into the hands of the executive. It is essential that we return a true legislative function to the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gillies: It is interesting to note that anyone who looks at any committee of this House knows that most committees find it difficult to perform their functions, except when they get a special reference. The committee which performs the best work in the House, by and large, is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Why is that committee able to function so well? It is because it has the Auditor General reporting to it. Why does that work? It works because the Auditor General has a staff and he is able to examine what is going on so he may bring relevant information to the Committee so it can do its work.

We can fool ourselves because we are very isolated in Ottawa, but the people know that the functions they think are being performed by parliament are not being performed. As a legislative body, when the people of Canada need to have trust in the functioning of their federal system, more than ever before in history, we must find some way to bring about reasonable reforms in the manner in which this organization operates.

It is indeed unfortunate that the government did not bring in an agenda of legislation with the Speech from the Throne. We must be the only organization in the world which cannot put together an agenda of what it is going to do and how it is going to do it. People are losing confidence in this body. We do not have much time to make major reforms before all confidence is gone. Committees will never operate unless there is a staff attached to them so they can proceed in a manner which has some real relevance to the conduct of the business of this country. We have lost the real element of checks and balances which makes a democracy work and work effectively.

It may well be that in a simpler time, with a simpler form of government, that an election every four or five years was an appropriate form of check. It is not enough today.

I believe very sincerely that much of the problem we have in Quebec is not associated with the fact that there is a French element in our country as well as an English element. It is associated with the fact that we have not had the courage, wisdom or strength, to adjust our institutions to accommodate to changing needs. There are many countries in the world where people live together who happen to speak different languages, who have found effective ways of governing themselves. Surely we can do as well as others.

One final thought. It is a great mistake for the government not to take Bill 101 to the Supreme Court of Canada and I will tell you precisely why. If we must have constitutional change to keep this country together, this country has to mean something. It has to stand for something. It has to stand above everything else for the proposition that to be a Canadian means that you have certain protections, rights and privileges that are inalienable, that no one can touch. This fundamental principle has to override all else, or what is the country for? What is the use of having a country? It is not acceptable for 1,100,000 Anglophones in the province of Quebec not to know their constitutional rights.

What I say is a fundamental belief that I have, that if you have a country it stands for something. It must mean something. It does not mean much if the people do not know their rights and privileges.

There is a great responsibility on this government to find out clearly for the people of the province of Quebec who are English speaking, what their rights are and what it means for them to be Canadian.

No one can ever accuse me of not being totally sympathetic to the aspirations of the Francophones of this country. They have developed their own culture. It is not a French or English culture. It is a French-Canadian culture. It must be preserved. Language must be preserved. However, a country must be certain that its citizens are all protected under the constitution and know what the constitution guarantees them.

It is not going to be easy to keep this country together. However, if we are not prepared to defend the fundamental rights of everyone, even if it is only one person, the task will be even more difficult.

We can continue to be a great nation. We have been unbelievably mismanaged in economic terms. We have great resources that are not developed. There is no imagination in our budgets. Trying to rely on the same procedures of economic management that were used in the past, will not work. And most unfortunately increasing unemployment, inflation and unrest, make it much more difficult to keep the country together. I say to everyone in this House of Commons that if you believe in this country and want to keep it united, you cannot support the motion contained in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate on the Speech from the Throne and to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply, my colleagues, for their fine contributions.

I would not have chosen to participate in the debate in such a constrained time frame, but I understand that my colleagues in the other parties have agreed that if a little additional time is needed, that will be agreeable, given the fact I have to be at the United Nations next week and cannot complete my speech if not today. If that is the case, I promise I shall not trespass upon their time very long.

My constituency is representative of the whole country in its French origin, in its continuing French presence, in its multicultural constitution, and in its industrial light.

The city of Windsor is rightly proud of the tradition, tolerance and good feeling which it has demonstrated over many years. One indication of that is the twinning arrangement which it has had with the city of Granby, Quebec, in the Eastern Townships, for some 20 years. The relationship has not always been as active as it might have been, but it has recently been restored.

Granby citizens have officially visited Windsor, and on the first week end of this month I participated in an official visit by the mayor and members of the city council of Windsor and many citizens, including members of the Richelieu Club, to Granby. We were extremely well treated there and made to feel like brothers.

We believe this type of contact between citizens in Ontario and Quebec and those of other provinces with the citizens of Quebec, and indeed between Ontario and other provinces of Canada other than Quebec, is very helpful to national solidarity.

My constituency and my city of Windsor are willing to contribute to the solution of all our Canadian problems. However, in order to do so we must have our strength protected. We must build on our strength.

I therefore want to turn for a moment to problems of the automotive trade which are so vital to my part of the country. My constituency contains substantially the whole manufacturing operation of Chrysler Canada, although the new truck plant is just outside the boundaries. It contains plants of Ford and GM as well. It thus contains all the big three and many feeder plants as well.

We have different sets of figures with respect to the auto trade pact at the present time, or perhaps more exactly, we have different interpretations of the same set of Statistics Canada figures. As I understand it, the most accurate figures are those which Statistics Canada released on October 6. They show a slightly lower deficit in automotive trade for the first six months of this year than for the corresponding six month period last year.

Even if the deficit turns out to be slightly less this year than it was last year on an over-all basis, it is still $597 million, as opposed to $654 million for the first six months of last year. It is much more than we can possibly afford to have continue. If we look at it from the viewpoint of the auto parts industry, the deficit becomes spectacular.

We consistently have a surplus, an advantage of 2 to 3 per cent over our share of the market with respect to auto assembly, and a disadvantage of 5 per cent in our share of the market with respect to automotive parts. If it is true, as many believe, that the trade deficit that we have over-all, including the automotive trade deficit, is one of our most serious basic problems in this country, then the deficit in automotive trade is indeed a very serious matter for all Canadians, not just for those living in automotive centres.

In an address in Leamington on September 14, the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), said that government policy was to correct the trade deficit without re-negotiating the auto pact. I do not think we should foreclose the possibility of re-negotiating the auto pact entirely. This is an option we should keep open as at least a possibility on a fair share basis. However, I am prepared to accept at least in the first instance that we try to redress the balance without doing that.

Here again I might refer to the minister's comments on that occasion when he said the government would put pressure on the big four to source more auto parts in Canada. This is probably the most important constituent of a new and helpful policy. It is certainly a fine beginning for a new automotive trade policy.

We also need investment incentives of various kinds, particularly in the form of loans to enable capital expansion to take place and also to assist in re-tooling and other matters which are vital to the continuing development of the industry.

We should have a third-country duty remission of the kind we have with the United States which induces manufacturers to incorporate Canadian auto parts in foreign assembled vehicles, or even if the vehicles are assembled in Canada. Canadian assembly is of much less assistance to us than it would be if we not only had that assembly, but also a share of the parts production as well. Such a duty remission would undoubtedly be a considerable inducement to non-American automobile manufacturers to produce their parts in Canada.

In addition, in my view, remission of duty to the big four automotive companies in excess of that earned by them according to the strict rules should be made conditional. We should not be in a position where the target needs rigidly to be achieved each year, but on the other hand, when the government does make a concession of that kind it should be upon conditions as has sometimes been the case in the past. I believe this should be a general policy. As a member from an automobile constituency I eagerly await the enunciation of a new automotive policy by the government.

I should like to turn, now, to a broader national question with which I have been associated this year. I refer to the subject of penitentiaries. I begin by saying we on the sub-committee have been highly pleased by the response to the report by experts in the field, by the public and by the media across Canada. I would add that I personally find the response of the minister to be most gratifying. I think his support for the report is very great and I have complete confidence that he will bring about its implementation. His official response to our report was in somewhat general terms but it was very positive and encouraging in tone. There was, perhaps, a little ambiguity in that response with respect to which precise recommendations he was rejecting and which ones he was deferring for further consideration. I have had this matter clarified with the minister's office and, without going into detail, I should like to put on the record of the House the numbers of the recommendations concerned so that they will be publicly available.

The recommendations of the sub-committee which the minister has rejected are as follows: 29, 33, 58, 60, 62 and 65. Those which have been deferred for further consideration are: 18, 21, 22, 24, 26 and 59. It is these latter recommendations, presently under consideration by an interdepartmental task force and to which the minister has still to announce his adherence, which are the heart of the report. I said from the time the report was presented on June 7 that the government should be allowed some six months in which to reply—we should expect an announcement to be given this calendar year but that the government should be given six months in which to make a response. We are now, of course, in the final third of that period.

There is already an inherent difficulty attached to the implementation of the report in the sense that basically the recommendations aim at the changing of attitudes, primarily on the part of the staff in the penitentiaries, and something of this kind may take many years, perhaps even a generation—a staff generation—to bring about. This being the case there is already a certain delay built into the recommendations themselves. There has to be. I would hope there would not be any further delay which would intensify this inherent problem through anything of an artificial nature with respect to the time frame of the response made by the minister and, indeed, by the government as a whole. We fully recognize that some of our recommendations, such as the one concerning the setting up of a fully independent penitentiary service, the crucial recommendation in our report, would require an answer from the government as a whole, not just from the minister. We look forward to getting a response before the end of this year.

I would mention briefly a judgment which was handed down this week in the Dodge case by Mr. Justice Keith of the Ontario Supreme Court. This is an extremely important decision which strongly reinforces the recommendations of the committee. According to that judgment, three Millhaven guards had used excessive force in October, 1972, while escorting a prisoner from one cell to another, and $15,000 in damages was awarded against them, half of it representing punitive damages. This reinforces what the sub-committee had to say in its report. It establishes the irreducible character of justice which has a primary application to all men, whether guards or prisoners, in or out of prison. It is one of the things which those who are in prison do not lose—they do not lose the right to justice.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: I was unfavourably struck by a comment this week with respect to this decision by Mr. Paul Caouette, the executive director of the Solicitor General's component of the PSAC. He was reported by the Globe and Mail of October 20, at page 10, as saying: "How could anyone think of joining the penitentiary service knowing they will face civil actions against them?" I should like to tell Mr. Caouette that people in all walks of life always face the possibility of civil actions being taken against them—and criminal actions, too, if they are not prepared to follow norms of conduct usually accepted—if they are not prepared to use only reasonable force. I would hope there would be no exception for prison guards, for policemen or anyone else in the conduct of their duties. This decision, the first of its kind in Canada, would be an excellent means—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: However, at the beginning of his remarks I understood there was general agreement that he might carry on. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacGuigan: I thank the House, Mr. Speaker, and I shall pass on to my third and last subject, which is that of national solidarity. I propose to treat it briefly under the three headings: structure, strategy, and spirit.

First, with respect to structure. The report of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, which was presented in March, 1972, has stood up very well over the years. I believe that only two modifications need to be made to that report in order to make it entirely relevant to the situation today, both a further spelling out of certain things which at that time were not as apparent as they are now. We did not then feel it necessary, because of the provision which already existed in the constitution with respect to immigration, to spell out further details in this area. That should be done and, indeed, the Minister of Employment (Mr. Cullen) is co-operating with ministers in the provincial governments to try to work out just such an arrangement.

The other area is that of communications. Here again, further specification is needed. With those two additions, I think the report of that committee, one which the government has been following for the last five years although it has not had the opportunity for introducing it to a full scale constitutional conference, is most applicable. It advocates a great deal of decentralization. But it also recognizes there must be some centralization and that to some extent there must be an exchange of powers when we have constitutional changes.

I do not anticipate radical structural changes. I do not think they are desirable. Nor do I think they are necessary, because it seems to me that where there are active provincial governments, where there are provinces which take full advantage of their power, there is not a great need for constitutional change. Such governments can do almost all that needs to be done for the people of their provinces, and on this premise I do not think we need constitutional changes in order to bring about changes in political life in those parts of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: The other condition is that of fuller consultation by the federal government. The federal government has begun this, as it has indeed begun the decentralization of our federal services. Consultation is extremely important. The various areas of the country must be made to feel that they are being consulted, and this brings me to our recommendation with respect to the Senate, which was to increase that body to give more representation to western Canada, and also to change the method of appointment. But in general we do not need radical structural changes; we do need some changes and they are spelled out in this report.

• (1702)

At the moment, strategy is of more importance than the structure itself. It seems to me that there is a lot of naiveté in English-speaking Canada about what the Parti Quebecois is about in Quebec. Surely in the light of recent statements by ministers of that government it is no longer very necessary to persuade public opinion of what the PQ government is about. Claude Morin, on March 19, said that the PQ government was committed to independence and did not believe that any constitutional reform within confederation could meet the province's demands. He also said that there would be no possibility of any constitutional discussions before the referendum. Mr. Levesque on October 19 said the same thing, that before the referendum constitutional discussion with other parts of Canada could take place only on the basis of the Parti Quebecois proposal of political sovereignty combined with economic association, hardly a very palatable basis for the rest of us.

The PQ strategy is the plebiscite or referendum. We must have an answering strategy. Here part of the answer was given by the Prime Minister this week when he spoke about the possible necessity for a referendum. I am pleased, by the way, that the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), who I am sorry is no longer in the House, introduced my position on this with so much fanfare. I owe it to him that he read enough of my remarks from the previous occasion to indicate that I did say that there could be a referendum when our very system itself was at stake. I am not sure he appreciated the significance of those words, but what I was saying then is precisely what the Prime Minister is advocating now. When the country's government or the country's future itself is at stake, a referendum, of course, can be extremely appropriate. It was matters of ordinary policy which I was suggesting should not be taken from parliament and handled by way of referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: The hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) showed what I have to call, I hope not unkindly, a naive understanding of the benefits of a referendum yesterday when he said that if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had taken action on his motion in February which called for consideration of such referendum, much of the uncertainty which pervades the country today would never have occurred.

The point, Mr. Speaker, is that we cannot decide on a referendum now. It looks as if the Parti Quebecois is determined to have an unfair referendum in Quebec, one which will not safeguard the rights of assembly, of association and free speech. In those circumstances, obviously the results of the referendum will not be reliable and we may have to use a federal referendum. But that is a decision to be made then. All we are talking about now is the power to have such a referendum; we are not making a decision to go ahead with it.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, just a word about spirit. It seems to me this is really much more important than structural changes. After all, we have no one to negotiate with right now while we are awaiting the referendum. It is really the spirit of our country, the spirit of our government, the spirit of our people which counts.

It seems to me that we ought to have a national nationalism—not one of Quebec, nor of the west, nor of the maritimes, nor even one of Ontario which likes to regard itself as the heartland of the country; not nationalism of that kind, but one which tries to embrace the whole country, one which gives all people in the country a feeling of "at homeness". It should be one based upon survival—the survival which we achieved over so many centuries here—upon the land and the people—upon the French fact and also upon the multicultural nature of our country. It should be based on the social tolerance that we have. In some ways, perhaps the most important of all, because it sums all the others up, is our sense of liberty, as meaning variety or diversity, a kind of fullness which allows us to choose among various kinds of life modes and lifestyles and ways of living in our country.

The Canadian sense of freedom stems in part from the British tradition, which is more relaxed than that of the American because it is less conceptualistic. But I believe that its principal source is the French fact in Canada, which has compelled the recognition of diversity from the Quebec Act on. This in-built diversity has never been entirely welcomed by some Anglo-Saxon elements, but it has had to be accepted as the condition of national existence. In my view it is the foundation stone of our political independence from the United States and of our national uniqueness. The English tradition prepared us for the intellectual acceptance of diversity; the French Canadian presence rendered diversity a necessity.

Our national experiment is only beginning to mature. It arrived at formal acceptance of official bilingualism in the sixties and of multiculturalism in the seventies. It needs to be understood and consciously embraced by the mass of Canadians. It also requires an expansion of outlook to include equality, so that the colourful mosaic does not remain fixed as a permanently vertical one. Here is enough for decades of national striving. It is a goal well worth the efforts of a free people. It justifies, even demands, the preservation of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. According to the unanimous consent received earlier I see it is now five o'clock. This House stands adjourned until Monday until 11 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 5.09 p.m. o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSED REVIEW OF USE OF AIRCRAFT BY DEPENDENTS OF MILITARY PERSONNEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity regarding the use of national defence aircraft by non-military personnel which is causing dissatisfaction and a lowering of morale in our armed forces. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon):

That the matter of the priorities given to dependents of military personnel in the use of national defence aircraft be reviewed by an appropriate parliamentary committee for the purpose of establishing more reasonable priorities vis-à-vis the priorities now enjoyed in the use of these aircraft by non-military personnel.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTED CONDEMNATION OF FAILURE TO ACT TO AVERT LAY-OFFS AT INCO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that almost two years ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) had submitted to him a report by his officials warning that future expansion of INCO would take place in Guatemala and Indonesia at the expense of Canada, I move:

That this House condemns the Prime Minister and his government for not taking corrective action during the interim to avert the layoffs which have been announced to take place in Port Colborne, Sudbury and Thompson.

RECOMMENDED DISCOUNT TO CONSUMERS ON RETAIL PRICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has stated on Canadian television that Canadians do not spend enough in this country and too much abroad; considering that this situation is the consequence of a feeling of uncertainty over the future as well as distrust towards the Canadian economy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House recommend that a discount on retail prices be granted to consumers on all Canadian products and that to that end the Minister of Finance be asked to make a special study to establish a national credit office which would be responsible for determining the discount rate which it would be advisable to set from time to time.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST FOR DELAY IN TERMINATION OF EXPRESS SERVICE IN SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the announcement by Canadian National Railways of its intention to terminate express service in the province of Saskatchewan thereby causing the layoff of a substantial number of employees and the prospect of a decline in express service within the province and the accompanying inconvenience of a great number of Saskatchewan communities, in view of the fact that immediate termination of express service will mean layoffs at the onset of winter when employment opportunities are most scarce and that CN retraining programs commence in the spring, and in the interest of continuing efforts to arrive at an agreement between the province of Saskatchewan and CN to allow for the continuation of CN express service in Saskatchewan, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to request Canadian National Railways to forestall any termination of existing express service in the province of Saskatchewan until at least next spring.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

In view of the fact that the trial of communications engineer, Peter Treu, has recently been completed in Montreal behind closed doors and in secret from beginning to end, thereby setting a potentially dangerous precedent and in order to reverse this very dangerous trend of withholding information that is in the public interest as evidenced in the Laycraft commission inquiry in Alberta as well as the Keeble commission in Quebec and the excessive use by this government of Section 41, Subsection 2 of the Federal Court Act, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That this House instruct the Minister of Justice to table transcripts of the recently completed trial under the Official Secrets Act of Dr. Peter Treu, edited of course, to omit any matters of legitimate national security.

RESOURCES

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—REFUSAL OF UNION TO ACCEPT SHARED WORK WEEK—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I will direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Canada is facing a disastrous winter of one million plus unemployed people with serious consequences for the country in terms of loss of productivity and human suffering. In view of the particular vulnerability of one-industry towns and the trouble facing the mining industry, I should like to ask the minister what response we can now expect from the government in the light of the announcement by INCO of major lay-offs in Ontario and, further, the closing down of the ALCAN mines in Newfoundland following the refusal of the union to accept the only positive response from the government, namely, to put forward a proposal for a shared work week supplemented by payment of unemployment insurance benefits?

● (1117)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I hope the union will re-examine its position. It would seem to me from reports I have read that the union was rejecting the proposal because it felt it would in some way be subsidizing the corporation instead of looking at the proposal on its merits as one designed to assist the workers.

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—PROPOSAL TO ESTABLISH TASK FORCE OF GOVERNMENTS AND UNIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): It has been announced that the government is to meet tomorrow with representatives of the company and the unions, and since it now seems evident that the mining industry, a major employer in this country, is in a serious situation, may I ask what leadership the government proposes to provide to this troubled industry? For starters, given the fact that at least three or four departments of the government are actively involved in this matter, is the government prepared to propose the setting up of a task force combining the jurisdiction of the federal government, provincial government, and the unions?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): There are two aspects of that matter. On the broader issue, I can tell the hon. member that discussions are going forward between my department and financial officials and their opposite numbers in the provinces concerned in respect of the health of the mining industry. As to the suffering, the disastrous news we all received at the end of last week, it is clear that a number of federal departments are involved and they are concerting their actions. There have been discussions between federal officials and the provincial governments—I myself was engaged in discussions this morning with one of the provincial ministers on this question. I think there is an opportunity to provide significant employment in Elliot Lake and I hope it will be possible to work this out with the province, with the companies at Elliot Lake and with the employees concerned, because the uranium mining industry is ready to expand very substantially the operations which now exist.

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—ALLEGED INADEQUATE RESPONSE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): May I ask the minister this question? If there are on-going studies within his department to determine world market conditions, to compile inventories of raw materials in Canada and to assess the impact both can have on future operations of mining companies in Canada, did these studies prepare the government for this latest announcement by INCO and, if so, why did the government not produce a much better prepared response than we got from the Prime Minister on Friday?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Anyone who has been following the mining situation would have recognized that the mining industry was in great difficulties.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do anything about it?

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member who asked that question does not seem to realize that the mining industry is an exporting industry which is dependent upon customers outside Canada. He does not seem to realize, for example, that 95 per cent of the output of domestic nickel is sold to overseas markets and that when those markets are down there is very little the government can do to change the buying habits of people outside the country. I wish there were something we could do in that regard. When the market turns down, as it does from time to time, there are very painful adjustments to be made in this country. I hope the need for these adjustments will be temporary and that we can ease the kind of adjustment which has to be made.

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—GOVERNMENT'S VIEW OF PROPOSALS BY ONTARIO LIBERAL LEADER

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister, if there is one who can act. The leader of the Liberal party in Ontario, Stuart Smith, stated on Friday that the Ontario government should demand that INCO cease all operations in Guatemala and Indonesia right now, that all investments they are making with Canadian money in those countries should cease and that any contracts they have with those countries should be filled from the nickel mines in Sudbury. Would the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether the government of Canada agrees with these policy proposals of the Liberal leader of Ontario, and will the government of Canada direct INCO to cease all operations in Guatemala and Indonesia, that they cease to use Canadian funds for investment in those countries, and that they divert their sales contracts exclusively to Sudbury?

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the figures showing the amount of money which the Export Development Corporation has lent INCO are grossly exaggerated. In fact, I have the figures here. In 1973 the Export Development Corporation lent $17.25 million and in 1976, $40 million for their Indonesian operation. The 1976 loan is about 40 per cent disbursed. I might say that all of these loans were made on the undertaking that the money would be used for Canadian equipment, which means jobs, about 4,500 jobs, which otherwise would not have been available to Canadians. When one takes into consideration that very pertinent fact, together with the undeniable assertion, I think, which has been made before, that if we had not lent this money somebody else would, this again redounds to the benefit of Canada in terms of the export of our technology. So all in all, I think it has been a very beneficial thing.

With particular reference to the hon. member's question, I think he would be the first to agree that as a government we do not have the capacity to give that kind of direction to INCO. Even if we did, it seems to be a strange policy to be advocated by the official opposition, who have been arguing across the country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I think the hon. member is now in fact endorsing this type of policy.

Mr. Crosbie: We want to know what your position is.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): If he is, it seems to be a strange type of policy, right now with high unemployment, to try to alienate the private sector, which is the very sector we are trying to stimulate to create jobs badly needed by Canadians.

Mr. Crosbie: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Acting Prime Minister has certainly misinterpreted my question. I asked him to give me the government's response to policy suggestions made by Mr. Stuart Smith, his leader in Ontario. Mr. Smith also stated that if INCO failed to do these things there was power in the government of the province to force INCO to do them. Does the Acting Prime Minister agree that the government of the province of Ontario has power to make these directions? If not, does the government of Canada; and will the government of Canada accept these suggestions of Mr. Smith? They are not my suggestions; I am putting them forward for an answer.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Smith asked Premier Davis to consider that. I think the hon. member might agree that Premier Davis might have the capacity to answer Mr. Smith's assertions, I do not know. That would be up to the premier of the province to whom this suggestion was directed. I have already indicated my view that I do not believe that as the federal government we have the authority to issue directives of that kind. Nor do I think it would be wise in the circumstances.

Mr. Crosbie: Would the Acting Prime Minister agree that these are irresponsible and politically motivated suggestions and that they should be—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF MEMBER OF UNITED KINGDOM PARLIAMENT, WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL

Mr. Speaker: Before continuing with the question period, I know all hon. members would want to join with me in recognizing the presence in our gallery of a very distinguished visitor from the United Kingdom parliament, himself a member of the United Kingdom parliament and the grandson of a very distinguished former member of that parliament. I speak, of course, of Winston Spencer Churchill, member of parliament of the United Kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—SUGGESTED STOCKPILING OF NICKEL

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I put my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Will the Acting Prime Minister contact the real Prime Minister some time today, wherever he may be, and ask him, I request most seriously, to get in touch with Mr. J. E. Carter, chairman of the board of INCO, in advance of tomorrow's meeting to deal with the INCO situation in order to make two important requests. First, will he rescind now the order announcing the lay-offs to take place in three Canadian communities in February; and second, in relation to that, will the government with INCO begin procedures now which could lead to stockpiling of material produced by INCO in Canada on the reasonable grounds that it makes more sense to put money out now, which may be regained later when we sell that, than to spend $20 million in unemployment insurance payouts which will have to be paid if these lay-offs take place? On the grounds that we have done such stockpiling in the past for Canadian farmers, what is good for Canadian farmers surely is good for Canadian miners.

● (1127)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the Leader of the New Democratic Party is requesting that I relay his request to the Prime Minister, certainly I will do that.

Mr. Broadbent: Will you support it?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): He is asking another question now as to whether or not I will support it. As far as stockpiling is concerned, I can indicate only that I do not believe that that is any fundamental answer to the question at all. There is indication that there has been months of stockpiling already. Increased expenditures or incentives to further increase those stockpiles seem to be putting off the day when we can get this industry back into a healthy condition to guarantee jobs for the people who are unemployed.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister should know that we stockpiled uranium for seven years and not for seven months, and as the minister is aware, considerable profits were reaped after that period. I do not know why it cannot be done for nickel.

RESOURCES

ALLEGED REPORT ON FOREIGN EXPANSION BY INCO—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ACT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In January, 1976 he had a report which was submitted to him indicating that future development in nickel by INCO was going to be taking place in Guatemala and Indonesia at the expense of Canada. I should like to ask him why he did not make some report to the cabinet outlining the correct steps which should be taken to ensure that these jobs remained in Canada?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the NDP seem to find it convenient to suggest the building of a nice, tight little fence around Canada and that we can forget about the rest of the world. They seem to feel that we do not have to concern ourselves with the ambitions of other countries to develop their resources.

Mr. Broadbent: Answer the question.

Mr. Gillespie: They seem to feel that somehow or other we can insulate ourselves as a major mining and exporting country from the rest of the world, and I think that is absurd.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister should know the absurd because he specializes in it. With reference to this red herring, members on both sides have generally supported assistance for Third World countries. I ask the minister seriously and not rhetorically, does it make sense for the government of Canada to be taking taxpayers' money to encourage the development in other countries of specific industries which will compete with Canadian industries? Given the problems of the textile industry in the province of Quebec, would he favour giving millions of dollars to Taiwan, Hong Kong or South Korea to encourage more sophisticated production of textiles in those countries, which would drive thousands of workers out of work in Canada in the textile industry?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I put it to the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party: if one of the South American countries decided that it was going to develop its nickel deposits with the assistance of the World Bank and other international agencies and was looking for engineering assistance, hardware and mining equipment, would the hon. member suggest that Canada should stand back and say: "No, we are not going to provide that kind of assistance"?

Some hon. Members: Order.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POSSIBILITY OF GRANTING GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to whom I wish, first of all, to extend my congratulations and very best wishes of success in her new duties.

As the setting up, in Canada, of a guaranteed annual income has been the topic of many studies in the last few years and negotiations with the provinces, can the minister tell the House whether she intends to introduce in Parliament during this session a bill providing for the adoption of such a plan, so that we can hope that this new formula will encourage people to work and so help considerably in solving the unemployment problem?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, first, I wish to thank my colleague from the opposition for his good wishes, and tell him that I hope his wishes for success in my work will come true. As for a guaranteed annual income, may I say again what I have already had the opportunity of explaining through the mass media, namely that I shall do everything in my power to take a step in that direction, a big step, I hope; it will, of course, require passing legislation which will reflect the promise of the government to have some form or other of guaranteed annual income. I hope this can be done as soon as possible.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I want to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Would the Minister of National Health and Welfare be in a position to inform the House in a more specific way of the state of the negotiations with the province of Quebec, considering the situation we all know? Are those negotiations carrying on normally or are there major squabbles which could delay the establishment of such a scheme?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I am presently carrying on the negotiations initiated by my predecessor with the provinces, and more specifically with the province of Quebec, on the proposed transfer of lump sum payments under the social services legislation as opposed to the 50/50 formula we used to know. This would parallel the lump sum payments we have already agreed on with the provinces in health matters and which seem to satisfy everybody, providing fewer administrative complications for us and more independence in the program selection for the provinces. I have nothing specific to tell about any province in particular since we are still carrying on negotiations which I feel positive.

ABILITY OF COUNTRY TO AFFORD GUARANTEED INCOME PLAN

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. We have just heard interest proclaimed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in a guaranteed income plan or some take-off on it. Given the fact that the provinces have been very concerned about the possible administration of it, that it could be a disincentive and that it is questionable whether we can afford it, would the minister now be in a position to give us some indication as to whether he has reached any particular decision on this matter? Has he looked into it, and can we afford this year or next year even to consider it?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the latest details, so I could not make any comment of that nature.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT'S TARGET FOR GROWTH

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I am very interested in the fact that the Minister of Finance is now saying we should spend more and save less. I hope this does not apply to the government front benches. Given the fact that the government indicated that it wanted to cut the growth of the civil service below one per cent and that it has grown by 2.4 per cent, adding some 14,000 to the civil service rolls, which does not indicate that there is any restraint or discipline, would the minister be in a position to indicate what his target is now with respect to the growth in the public service? Are we still looking toward a cut below one per cent in terms of growth?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, our commitment was to contain the growth of authorized man-years in the public service under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board to less than one per cent, and that commitment will be met.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DUMPING OF NICKEL BY AMEX—POSSIBILITY OF PROTEST

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I suppose my question will have to be to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises from what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said and from what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said this morning about the situation with regard to nickel. There is a complete misunderstanding on the part of the government of the problem which is clearly and simply the fact, not that the economies of the world are slowed down, but that Canada has gone from supplying 95 per cent of the world's nickel to 40 per cent. I would like a very specific answer to this question. Has the minister's department protested to GATT, as it may do, about the fact, as asserted by the Minister of Finance on Friday, that one of the reasons Canada is losing its share is that dumping by other countries, and particularly a firm called AMEX, is taking place? Under GATT there does not have to be dumping into our country, but if we think there is dumping, we can protest. Has the department officially protested to GATT in order to protect our share of the market in the world of nickel, which could provide the employment we are trying to get?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the preamble to his question. I will not argue with him about the share of the market we are receiving. However, I do think that there are a couple of other considerations, and I am sure he would agree, if there was time to discuss them. On the specifics of his question, we are examining now whether a legal case exists for us to make such a representation. An examination of the AMEX proposal is now going on, and if in fact there is a technique or a means by which a formal representation can be made to GATT, this will be done.

EFFECT OF LOANS TO DEVELOP RESOURCES IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In its operation of the Export Development Corporation and in its foreign trade activities, is it the position of the government that the government is properly carrying out its responsibilities by funding activities which will in fact become competitive with Canadian jobs?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had listened to an earlier answer I gave to the House, he would understand the situation.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully and was so shocked by the answer I could not believe a responsible minister would give it. Is the minister suggesting that we should trade off short-term one item sales in mining equipment against the possibility of maintaining a strong and forceful position for the nickel industry in the markets of the world?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member supports the hewers of wood and drawers of water approach to Canadian policy.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gillespie: He made that very clear a little while ago. If the hon. member is really sincere in that position, we should not export any machinery to anybody if that machinery might compete with a product which is made in Canada.

POST OFFICE

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING CROWN CORPORATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Walter Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General, who has some responsibility for a department which is vital to the employment situation and economic stability of this country. Now that a senior official of the Post Office Department has added his voice to the request of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, along with 79 per cent of the members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, spokesmen for the opposition parties in this House and a growing number of exasperated Canadians, in asking the Government of Canada to consider replacing the bureaucratic tangle of departments and agencies running Canada's Post Office with a Crown corporation type of organization, would the Postmaster General inform the House and the Canadian public what action he is taking on the matter?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, there has been in the past serious consideration to making the Post Office a Crown corporation. However, as he knows as well, our deficits have progressed from somewhere in the vicinity of $70 million some five years ago to approximately $560 million for the current fiscal year. At a time when that much public funding is involved in postal operations, surely it is essential that the government keep its hand in the operation and maintain the operation of the Post Office in order to ensure that the expenditures are kept at the lowest possible level.

Mr. Dinsdale: Does the Postmaster General feel that Canadians can continue to afford a half billion dollar deficit in the Post Office which results from mismanagement, inefficiency and continuing labour-management confrontation?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the increase in the deficit bears no relationship at all to the question of management or efficiency. It is a question of increased labour costs and transportation costs. I hope that the hon. gentleman will wait until Friday when I am prepared to participate in the throne speech debate and will inform the House completely of the situation relating to the post office.

AIR TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF TRAFFIC AT TORONTO INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport regarding whether air traffic movement at Toronto international airport has at last returned to normal; that is, to the rate that was considered normal and safe until parliament acted to order the air traffic controllers back to work and their apparent slowdown began?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the procedures being followed in Toronto are still somewhat different from the situation prior to the air traffic control strike. I should assure hon. members and the public that safety is in no way impaired. Discussions are going on between air traffic controllers and my senior officials concerning various matters that lead to the problems and difficulties. The air traffic control situation in Toronto is much more complex than in other places in Canada on a number of counts. A variety of steps to deal with the problems created may eventually lead to a solution.

POST OFFICE

DELAYS IN PARCEL DELIVERY AT TERMINAL A, TORONTO—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Postmaster General. Has the minister been informed of the long delays in clearing parcel mail at Terminal A, Toronto. If so, what action is he taking to clear up the backlog of parcel post mail which amounts to an almost complete breakdown in the service?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have not been made aware of any difficulty in Terminal A relating to the parcel post. The hon. member's information is usually reliable, so I shall make sure an investigation is conducted immediately and will provide the hon. member with a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly surprised that the Postmaster General has not heard of this. The Vice President of the Doubleday Canada Limited is having great trouble with the backlog in Terminal A. I wonder if the chaos in the parcel post service in Toronto is due to mechanical difficulties at the new huge bulk mailing plant there? Can the Postmaster General inform the House when this expensive facility will become operational?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the shortcoming is not due to any problem in mechanization. The bulk plant in Mississauga, in the riding of the hon. member to my left, is operating successfully and there is no difficulty there, as I indicated to the hon. gentleman. If there is a problem with one large user, Doubleday, I have not received any representations from them but I shall look into the situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON BOUNDARIES AND FISHERIES MANAGEMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the economic importance on the east coast of the renewable fishery resources on the Georges Bank and the importance on the west coast of the boundary separating Canada and the United States in Dixon Entrance, Juan de Fuca, and in our northern area in the Beaufort Sea where Alaska joins Canada, would the minister elaborate briefly now, and later make a statement on motions, concerning his release of October 21 and inform the House how negotiations on these important matters are proceeding and what the prospects are on the east coast of obtaining the equidistant line between Canada and the United States on Georges Bank followed then by talks on joint management of the resources?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in saying that the first phase of negotiations with the United States was completed successfully from our point of view, as well as from that of the United States, I believe. Essentially what was achieved during the first round of discussions was an agreement about the manner in which the ultimate resolution of the problem will proceed. In that context an important development occurred as far as Canada is concerned in that the United States accepted the proposition of joint management of fish stocks, a plan which was advocated in large measure by east coast fishermen whom the hon. member represents. The next phase will be to see, on the basis of this agreement, how it can be translated into a treaty. The negotiators will be resuming talks within about a week or ten days. In the interim, our negotiator will be carrying on discussions with the east coast and west coast provinces that are interested.

As for the ultimate resolution in terms of the boundary itself, I would not wish to jeopardize the negotiations by indicating a specific Canadian position at the present time. I can say to the hon. member, however, as I believe he knows, that the negotiating position laid down by Canada was the equidistant line in the case of Georges Bank. This was without prejudice. This is the way things stand now. As the negotiations proceed I am very hopeful and most pleased that, despite the forebodings when the negotiations started, considerable progress has been made. The atmosphere for a resolution looks good, even though there are a lot of problems ahead.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIAN JOBS IN VIEW OF LAY-OFFS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there will be a $3 billion deficit in the auto parts business relating to the Canada-United States auto pact, and in view of the intended lay-off of 870 employees at Anaconda Brass which would result in a further loss of Canadian auto parts business and a loss of Canadian jobs, what steps does the minister intend to take with regard to adjusting this difference and protecting jobs for Canadian workers?

Hon. John C. Munro (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that we are very concerned regarding the possibility of lay-offs at Anaconda Brass. I know that officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and others have been meeting to see if we can alleviate the situation. Perhaps further particulars can be given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on the next occasion he is in the House.

Mr. Gilbert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would act in the same casual way if this affected the steel industry in Hamilton? I should like him to tell the House whether the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has received a reply to the telex he sent to Anaconda officials in regard to delaying the decision to rescind the close-down order and to continue the operations to protect Canadian business?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated the minister in question will be able to give all the details necessary with respect to the negotiations he has had with the company. I hope he will be able to do that very shortly.

FISHERIES

SALMON FISHING ON ATLANTIC COAST—POSSIBILITY OF COMMERCIAL OPERATION

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. I shall try to put it without making a speech. I wonder if the minister can inform the House if a final decision has been taken with regard to a commercial salmon fishing season on the Atlantic coast next fishing season? If so, has the manner and form of that season been decided or is it subject to negotiation with the fishermen?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the decision to open a modest commercial salmon fishing season on the east coast, where it had been banned for six years, has been taken in principle. I am awaiting the latest reports from the biologists about the escapement of this year's run. The manner in which this re-opening would take place is the subject of consultation with fishermen and fishermen's organizations on the east coast. I hope we can arrive at a unanimous agreement.

RESOURCES

MINING—SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF DOUBLE TAXATION

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and follows the line of questioning by the hon. member for Don Valley on Friday and today. In view of the situation at Sudbury and Thompson, and soon in all mining communities in Canada, in view of the fact that the new government of British Columbia has reduced its taxes on mining, in view of the fact that the new government in Manitoba indicated its intention to reduce the high taxes on mining in that province, will the minister ask the Minister of Finance to consider removing the double taxation on the mining industry which was imposed in 1974 in the budget brought in by John Turner? This is one of the reasons our mining industry is not competitive, taxwise, with other countries.

● (1152)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would agree with the hon. member that there are instances in certain provinces where the combined federal and provincial tax rates clearly indicate a major disincentive to that industry and in those provinces. As a result of a significant study, we have brought the situation to the attention of various provincial mines ministers and finance ministers across the country. I hope that, as a result of that study and the work we have been doing in my department with various provincial governments, other provincial governments will act. If the hon. member were to talk to industry, he would find that there is no major complaint with the federal government tax level. The complaint is with respect to certain provincial tax levels which discourage mining investment.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question. Will the federal government offer to the provincial governments their proposal to reduce the double taxation imposed on these companies because of the quarrel between the civil servants in Ottawa and the civil servants in the provinces over who will get the most from the mining industry. My question is simply this: Will the minister, on behalf of the mining industry, recommend to the Minister of Finance the ending of double taxation imposed by the Turner budget of 1974?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will have to repeat a part of my answer because I made it quite clear to the hon. member that the federal tax level is below the provincial levels. If, in the words of the hon. member, there is double taxation of the industry, then I would say to him that there is a very simple solution. Those provinces which have a combined tax level which is significantly higher than that in other provinces and than that, perhaps, in some other jurisdictions, have it within their power to reduce their tax level so that the combined tax level in this country would be a more propitious one.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED REVISION OF MANDATORY PAROLE PROVISION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. In light of the fact that a prisoner in the province of Ontario has just been released on mandatory parole—as set out by the law over which the minister and his department and the Solicitor General have no control—is it the intention of the government to amend that section of the law so that in cases such as this one, where a prisoner with a long record of sex crimes and who is now under police surveillance in two towns in Ontario, could be brought either before a judicial body or someone who would have the power either to grant or not to grant parole as was laid down in Bill C-51 last session?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): As I understand it, in the case to which the hon. member referred, the man had served his sentence and was therefore, by operation of law, released from the penitentiary. As the hon. member knows, in the last session of parliament in Bill C-51, we amended the law to do away with statutory remission by which people could earn a reduction in their sentence simply by serving it and that statutory remission, as of October 15, has been done away with. People now have to earn any remission by good behaviour. In that same legislation we implemented the revision of the dangerous offenders section which also came into operation on October 15.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister is well aware of the fact that one of the most difficult charges to prove is the habitual criminal acts charges under the Criminal Code and now the dangerous sex offenders charge under the amended code. In light of that fact, these prisoners continue to be released on what we call mandatory parole, I am asking the Minister of Justice this question in all seriousness, because I brought to his attention last year a murder in Calgary where the accused was released and now we have a situation in Ontario which is creating a great deal of anxiety.

Mr. Basford: I appreciate that, but the problem is that when people have served a fixed sentence, they are subject to release from the penitentiary. That is the reason the Criminal Code was amended last session and the dangerous offenders section was included to deal with those with an indeterminate sentence under which a person cannot be released if deemed to be a dangerous offender without the approval of the administration and of the courts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEPLOYMENT OF NEUTRON BOMB—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. On July 15 of this year, in answer to a question about the deployment of the neutron bomb, the Prime Minister said that he had not been consulted and the Minister of National Defence said that all he knew was what he had read in the newspapers. Since the minister has just attended a nuclear planning group meeting in Bari, Italy, can he tell the House what policy he advanced on Canada's behalf concerning the deployment of the neutron bomb?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the hon. member. I was not present at the meeting in Bari. We are rotating members of the planning group and we were not present this time, although we are kept informed on what goes on there. The first thing to do is to realize that the term "neutron bomb" is a misnomer. Actually it is not a bomb and it is not a strategic weapon. It is known in NATO circles as an enhanced radiation warhead.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: It has a reduced blast. We are not dealing with very nice things, Mr. Speaker, but these are part of the arsenal of modern nations today. The neutron bomb, as my hon. friend calls it, the enhanced radiation warhead, is not in production. It has not been decided by the President of the United States that it would go into production as yet. In his considerations he has decided to consult his NATO allies. Some discussions are taking place or have taken place, as I understand it, at the NPG meeting in Bari, but there is not a unified position on it at this time and no decision has been made, but all the allies will be consulted on this matter. There is no question about its effectiveness as a military weapon but the considerations go quite beyond that.

Mr. McKinnon: The nomenclature used by the minister is rather surprising. People in some circles might think that this use of the word would fit better the minister of housing, which was the previous portfolio of this minister, in that the bomb is designed to protect houses and kill people. The serious thing about it is that if deployed it might well lower the nuclear threshold in western Europe and make the likelihood of a nuclear war breaking out more serious than it is at present. Is he telling us that Canada has no position on whether we are for or against the deployment of the neutron bomb or, as he prefers to call it, the enhanced radiation warhead?

Mr. Danson: It is not, Mr. Speaker, that there is no position. The whole question is being studied at this time by us and our allies. Obviously one of the considerations would be the reduction of the nuclear threshold. There are counter arguments to that and we want to hear them all before we go running off shooting advanced radiation warheads from the hip.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in light of the general question of the nuclear disarmament. As you are probably aware, Mr. Speaker, the minister is about to depart on another extended tour, and yet we have not had an in-depth report from him on the last of a series of meetings in London, England of the nuclear supplier group. My question to the minister is whether it will be possible for us to have an in-depth report from the minister on this important subject before he leaves?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not before my departure, Mr. Speaker. I should say to the hon. member that, through nobody's fault, and I think hon. members opposite will agree, a statement had been prepared the summer before we adjourned and could not be presented nor could a debate take place. Within the next two weeks some significant developments are to occur, including those at the INFCEP meetings in Washington with regard to restrictions on reprocessing and the like. Probably, it would be appropriate to await the outcome of these, and I will undertake to the hon. member and to the House to have a full statement as early in November as possible when we get the details. In the meantime, if the hon. member wishes to have some form of briefing, I will be glad to arrange it for him while I am away.

CODE GOVERNING FOREIGN SALES OF NUCLEAR TECHNOLOGY AND INFORMATION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): I am not only talking as an individual member. Obviously, I am trying to elicit information that should be available to the Canadian public on a matter such as this because it seems to me that those who are interested in it have to go to the foreign press or to foreign governmental officials to get this type of information. Here, especially, the House is pretty well united on the general subject of nuclear disarmament, and yet we have to go overseas to obtain that kind of information. For instance, can the minister inform us if at the London meeting, as reported in the Washington Post of Tuesday, October 4, agreement was reached for the first time to publish a code governing foreign sales of nuclear technology and nuclear information? If so, why have we not heard this from the minister? When is the code going to be published? When can we have something specific instead of these vague generalities we always get from him?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With the greatest of respect, Mr. Speaker, I have been ready ever since the House has been opened to answer any questions which the hon. member might care to pose. This is the first occasion that he or any other member has seen fit to ask this kind of question. It might have been possible to make a statement on motions. There were two days. I am not sure that hon. members then would not have complained that we were taking time away from the throne speech debate. Let's be frank about it. However, that does not detract from the importance of the matter which the hon. member has raised.

First of all, let me answer that specific question. The report that the hon. member has read is basically correct. There is an anticipated published proposal. The drafting of that, of course, is something which has to be done. The contents of it will obviously not be known until the drafting has been completed.

On the broader question, a number of developments have occurred. I am sure the hon. member knows, for example, that within the past two or three weeks the United States has made an arrangement with Japan which significantly alters the total situation with regard to nuclear non-proliferation. We are seeking to find exactly the proper time and the proper occasion on which a statement can be made that will be something other than an invasion. I have no reason in the world to withhold from this House anything by way of a frank assessment of the proposal. In fact, I would welcome some clear declaration from the opposition as to what they themselves would do. Given what they have been talking about with regard to Sudbury, I am very much surprised and doubtful whether I would get that kind of unqualified statement.

PENITENTIARIES

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHMENT OF FACILITIES AT BURWASH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. In view of the cutbacks by INCO in Sudbury which will have a very adverse effect on the whole Sudbury district, and the negotiations which have been going on between the Solicitor General's department and the Ontario government for the establishment of a federal correctional institution at Burwash, can the minister say whether he is prepared to move immediately to establish a new federal facility at Burwash and thereby create several hundred new jobs for the Sudbury Basin?

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have of course received representations of this kind from the hon. member on this subject. I wish to report to the House that we have completed our initial negotiations with the province of Ontario and have now set a price for the acquisition of the institution. At the moment, we are determining our own evaluation of the type of upgrading and the cost of that upgrading that would be required to use the institution as a federal correctional facility. I am most interested in the acquisition of the institution. Not only would it provide additional jobs in that area, but it would permit me to implement one of the recommendations of the subcommittee of the House which investigated the penitentiary system last year, a recommendation in connection with the establishment of some specialized institutions in the country. I therefore hope to be in a position to make an announcement in this regard in the very near future.

RESOURCES

REASON FOR FAILURE TO AVERT LAY-OFFS AT INCO IN VIEW OF EARLIER STUDIES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources with regard to this problem at INCO which concerns a number of members of the House of Commons, including yourself, Mr. Speaker. I want to ask the minister for clarification of his position with respect to it. On Friday, the Prime Minister gave the impression that he had just heard of the problems at INCO. His answer is in Hansard at page 114. He said that they were informed of this very serious decision yesterday morning. That was last Thursday. Today the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the matter had been under study for a period of two years. Assuming that the minister was telling the truth when he answered his question in the House today about studies undertaken with respect to this matter, will the minister now tell us why he did not go to INCO a year ago or perhaps two years ago, to advise them what those studies revealed to see whether this dreadful situation could have been averted? We now see that situation snowballing to Newfoundland and other parts of the country. The House is entitled to an answer to that question.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the preamble at all. The hon. House leader of the opposition is now trying to present himself as an instant expert on the mining industry. If he had followed the work that was done over the past year, he would know that there have been consultations between my department and the industry on a regular basis. He would know that the international market for mining activity in Canada was in a very depressed state. He would know that capacity outside the country had increased very substantially. He would know a lot of these things and would not have to ask that kind of a question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, if I should have known these things, then the minister should have known these things. Why has he not done something about it?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it quite clear that we have been working with the industry. If the hon. member has just become aware of the situation, he should have known that it could happen in the mining industry at any time. Anybody in the mining industry unfortunately has to live with that spectre.

TABLING OF GREEN PAPER ENTITLED, "A NATIONAL POLICY ON AMATEUR SPORT"

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

AMENDMENT OF STANDING ORDER TO PROVIDE FOR PERMANENT REFERENCE

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, some concern has been expressed about a change in Standing Order 65(1)(q), which was implemented last year, designed to have a permanent reference for the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. We have discovered that there is a flaw in this particular resolution. I have discussed this with House leaders. The following has been agreed:

That Standing Order 65(1)(q) be amended by inserting between the word "been" and the word "referred" the word "permanently".

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is in accordance with discussions we have had. I want to thank the deputy government House leader.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be general agreement that that motion be proceeded with now. It cannot be proceeded with without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to deal with the motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION OF ANSWER BY SOLICITOR GENERAL

Hon. Francis Fox (Solicitor General): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the course of the question period on October 19 I made a factual error in responding to a question addressed to me by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). As reported on page 17 of Hansard I indicated that the commanding officer of the RCMP in Alberta had met with the attorney general of Alberta. As a matter of fact, the commanding officer of the force in Alberta met with the solicitor general of Alberta, the minister responsible for the force in that province.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[Translation]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, October 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Clark (p. 30).

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped that perhaps the Speaker would remain in the Chair for I would like later to make a few comments on certain statements he is reported to have made during the weekend. I think the hon. the Speaker of the House will have to listen to some advice which will be given him.

This is the first time in several years that I have the chance of participating in such a debate. I have indeed been in this House for a good many years and I always have given up my turn since other opportunities were offered to me. This year however, I decided to try and catch the Speaker's eye to participate in the debate.

I would like to point out that the two young members, young in terms of seniority, who moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, namely the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the newly-elected member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) did very well in those rather symbolic duties. Younger members are always called upon to move the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Once again, I would like to say that they did a fine job, for which I congratulate them.

However, before discussing the motion of those hon. members and the motion moved by my leader which is a non-confidence motion, I would like to comment on what is taking place in the House. As I said, it is regrettable that Mr. Speaker is not in the House because I will refer in a rather specific manner to the discussions of this past Friday when my colleague for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) moved the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, there have been some incidents in the past week, the first in which we have had television in the House. It is a trite saying now in newspaper articles and elsewhere that this chamber is going to be greatly modified, that this is the greatest thing since the discovery of sliced bread. Well, I want to make certain observations about what has been said here in this chamber with the advent of television and about what I hope will not be the attitude of members in this House. I hope that this will scotch, once and for all, the idea which may now be growing as a result of certain things said, and may be repeated, with regard to what speeches are made and to whom those speeches are being addressed.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) startled me on Thursday last when she wished to comment on a question put by the House leader of the official opposition, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). According to the Chair, the question was out of order but the hon. minister indicated that because the House was now on television it was quite wrong to prevent her from answering or making a comment. What a nonsensical argument, that if a question is ruled out of order as containing certain allegations, as they often do, because we are on television the Chair's ruling of out of order should be set aside and a reply or comment made. That is utter nonsense, yet that was the argument of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

In the same way, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has commented and attributed motives.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The Postmaster General (Mr. Blais), too.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am coming to the Postmaster General because he, too, participated in these totally improper references to the conduct of members, allegedly because television is now in this chamber. Mr. Speaker, if this chamber is to become merely a podium for representatives of parties to address larger audiences, then those who allege that parliament has become irrelevant are vindicated. Incidentally, I don't know why they make these wiseacre comments, because that is all they are; many of those who make such statements have rarely been inside this chamber, and do not know how it works. But if this chamber is to become merely a speaking platform from which to reach an audience out beyond, it merely becomes, then, a method whereby a message may be put out, to what audience, one never knows. In the immediate future it may be limited to the Ottawa area, to those who subscribe to a cable system and have a converter. Those are the people who will be following—possibly—the sittings of this House.

Then there is to be a weekly wrap-up, and we have seen that in the news clippings certain ministers make certain statements in reply to questions. All I can say to hon. members is this: take a look at the performance of the province of Alberta where the legislature has been on television since 1971 or thereabouts. All that great program to take the legislature to the public no longer exists. It is only when ministers, in reply to a question, give an answer which is of public interest that there is a clip taken of the minister. Backbenchers never enter the picture, of course, unless they position themselves behind ministers.

The comment about what may have been some shifting around here on Friday afternoon, when frankly there are not many members in the House—there never have been and there never will be—ignores the fact that members have timetables to keep, airline schedules to follow, and that great distances have to be travelled by hon. members to get to their constituencies where they have important things to do. They also have families and, as members of parliament, they have the right of access to their families just as anybody else has. Somehow the public seems to forget that. Members of parliament are nailed to their desks here from Monday morning at the opening of the session until Friday at five o'clock when the session closes. I say that comment was utter tripe, utter nonsense.

Let me say something about the nature of this debate. I raised this point with Mr. Speaker the other day and I regret that he did not wish to listen fully to my argument, as I think he should have. This debate is for the purpose of discussing the Speech from the Throne. By tradition it has been reserved for backbenchers. Government ministers review certain aspects of policy, but it is for backbenchers to raise problems, to report from their constituencies, and in fact to report to their constituencies from this chamber.

But what has happened in this debate, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been the first to admit that into this throne speech debate has been inserted a mini-budget. That has been done perfectly legally, but it was done, said the Prime Minister, to save time, or so he alleged. I ask, whose time? The government's time at the expense of the backbenchers, who would under normal circumstances, and who should under all circumstances, have the opportunity of discussing the throne speech through the full tenure of the debate, as well as discussing a budget.

We voted on an amendment last Thursday and we are voting on the main amendment tonight. There may be another amendment. But none of these amendments should have to do with the content of the budget statement or resolutions which were put forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) the other night. This would be pre-empting that particular debate. Depending upon who moves another amendment to be voted upon on day six, there will not be any expression of opinion by this House on the mini-budget until we get to the individual bills, primarily the income tax bill. It is on this expression of opinion by the House that the government must survive.

I doubt whether it has occurred to a number of cabinet ministers that we are still operating under a form of responsible government and that the government holds power for so long as it has the confidence of this House; but if subterfuges like introducing a mini-budget are used—indeed, it is a budget because there are major modifications in proposals put forward by the former Minister of Finance—then the House has had its opportunity foreclosed.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, there is one other point. While I must accept the rulings of the Chair on particular questions, I do not have to agree with them, and I do not agree with Mr. Speaker's ruling on my colleague's motion under Standing Order 26 on Friday. The subject matter was indeed most urgent. I say there is no case for insisting that debate on that particular item pre-empts the right of members to participate in the throne speech debate. But that is what has happened.

Under the rules, if Mr. Speaker had been prepared to accept the motion, debate on it could not have commenced until three o'clock on Friday afternoon. Members who were interested in that question—I would hope there would be many because it is a very serious matter—would then have had unlimited time to discuss the question until the debate was finished. But no, Mr. Speaker, it has been thrown into this debate, the Chair ruling on the basis that if members indicated they wished to discuss the Sudbury and Thompson situation, the Chair would recognize them. I say that is an improper insertion of that debate into this. Say over the weekend some other very important event had come up. Following the logic of Friday's decision by the Chair, that item too could be brought into this debate. I disagree with that and I record my disagreement publicly and as forcefully as I can.

In the same way I also object to being told, as I have quite often in the past, that subjects brought up for discussion under Standing Order 26 will have to form the subject matter of an opposition day. I participated in the formulation of the rules in 1968 and I know why provision was made for opposition days. In effect, they were a curtailment of the opportunities the House used to have, when dealing with motions, to introduce estimates, and also motions for interim supply.

Again in the spirit of so-called efficiency, emergencies are to be discussed at the expense of the opposition's time. By what right is that done? Emergencies and adjournments of the House are debates at the expense of government time, not that of the opposition. Should the occasion arise again this year, then this House can certainly expect to hear from me on this particular point.

I am eternally interested in the rights of the backbenchers on both sides of this House. They have been abused over the years on every occasion by this sacred white cow known as efficiency. It is the backbencher who gets in it in the neck. We can always improve, shall I say, the handling or expedition of business in this House, but in this regard let me warn hon. members, particularly those on the government side whose experience in the House may be somewhat limited. I will use the words of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that it is a long, long road that has not got some ash cans, and it is a long, long road that has no turning. What suits the government today can be a terrible, terrible restriction tomorrow when there is a change of power.

Back in the fifties in a moment of weakness, the Chair accepted a certain proposition with regard to the discussion of supplementary estimates. At that time the opposition thought it was great, but when they took over on the other side they discovered what sort of hair shirt they had fashioned. I caution hon. members opposite that they are fashioning hair shirts which they will have to wear.

I will not discuss the budget presentation which occurred the other night. That will come in due course. There are changes and inadequacies but, according to my argument today, this is not the time to discuss the matter proposed by the Minister of Finance.

It is unfortunate that the ministers involved with what I am about to discuss are not here, but on Thursday past there was considerable questioning by my colleagues, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay), the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), the hon. member for Edmonton-Centre (Mr. Paproski) and possibly others with regard to an agreement signed by the deputy minister of National Revenue and a representative of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in April of 1972. The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) has indicated that everything was legal. When I asked the Minister of National Revenue about the definition of organized crime, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox) said that it was contained in Bill C-51. I do not know how one of the principal officers of this House can assert that a definition contained in a bill passed by this House in mid-1977 should define the terms of an agreement signed in 1972. What is this? Is it a new form of retroactive legislation?

I say to hon. members opposite that the argument made by the Solicitor General is fatuous. That is the best I can say for it. Perhaps there is a definition of organized crime in Bill C-51 which can be found in clause 7 at page 47. Possibly there is some wording that can be interpreted as a definition of organized crime. The hon. member for Central Nova indicated that the best definition of organized crime is contained in Bill C-24, the Immigration Act passed this summer. Presumably that has a retroactive meaning to 1972. I have a copy of the agreement which the Solicitor General tabled as a result of my question to him. This agreement is supposed to deal with investigations concerning unreported and innocent accumulation of wealth amassed by organized crime figures. Perhaps the authors of the press release are aware of what organized crime figures are because they base themselves on present legislation; but when one looks at the agreement, there is no such thing.

All hon. members are subject to investigation under the terms of this agreement. I should like to refer to the memorandum of understanding between the Department of National Revenue, and the Department of the Solicitor General which in part reads as follows:

> The Minister of National Revenue, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (4) of section 241 of the Income Tax Act, hereby designates the members of the Directorate of Criminal Investigations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as authorized persons for the purpose of assisting him and his officials in carrying out investigations for such purposes as the Minister of National Revenue may designate related to the administration or enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

There is not one blessed word limiting such investigations to criminal activity. The memorandum continues as follows:

> The Royal Canadian Mounted Police acknowledges that the members of the Directorate of Criminal Investigations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will conduct for the purposes of the Income Tax Act—

Remember it is limited strictly for the purposes of the Income Tax Act.

> —Such investigations of such persons as the Minister of National Revenue may from time to time request—

There is one exception and that is if the RCMP does not have enough personnel they are permitted to say: "No thanks, we cannot do it."

The memorandum continues:

> The Minister of National Revenue will furnish the Directorate of Criminal Investigations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with such information or material in his possession which in the minister's opinion will facilitate the conduct of any investigation which the Directorate of Criminal Investigations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is carrying out on behalf of the minister.

Mr. Speaker, that reveals the precise situation. The Minister of National Revenue says: "All legal", I say "Totally illegal activity" under this agreement as revealed in the Laycraft inquiry. I am not making any brief with the Royal American Shows, but where this agreement comes into play is in the Minister of National Revenue turning over to the RCMP the tax returns of one Albert J. Anderson not only for the year 1975 but for previous years.

As far as the RCMP were concerned, they were interested in Mr. Anderson because of charges under the Criminal Code, and that is totally denied under this agreement. There was no investigation of Mr. Anderson with regard to the Income Tax Act, but officials of the Department of National Revenue gave his income tax returns to the RCMP who were looking into his background with regard to a charge under the Criminal Code. Of course, the whole thing has fallen through so far as prosecution of Mr. Anderson is concerned, but let not the Minister of National Revenue stand up in this House and say his officials acted legally. I say they acted illegally.

● (1242)

Second, there was the question of tapes. The provisions of our privacy legislation which deal with wiretapping under the Criminal Code are related to offences under the Criminal Code and others designated specifically in the statute as passed by this House. Nowhere does it mention income tax, yet the representative of the Department of National Revenue admitted in the Laycraft inquiry that he had listened to tapes furnished to him by the RCMP for which authority had been obtained for criminal purposes. At no time was it mentioned that these tapes were going to be listened to by a representative of the Department of National Revenue. The section does not include the Income Tax Act as a legal purpose whereby the police may obtain permission to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and thanks also to hon. members of this House. I will not abuse this privilege.

I have pointed out the inconsistencies in the answers of the Minister of National Revenue and of the Solicitor General with regard to this particular matter. I have also asked the Minister of National Revenue whether there are any other types of agreements with regard to the use of social insurance numbers, for instance, other than for that which may be given under this particular agreement. Is there any other type of agreement whereby the Minister of National Revenue can give selected bits of information from tax returns? We received a total non-answer the other day, but I want warn the hon. gentleman that he will have to produce that information somewhere along the line, and the sooner he can give the House the proper information the better it will be. If he wishes to join in this debate, that is perfectly fine. If he wishes to stand up on motions and make a statement to correct the information with which he inadvertently misled the House the other day, that is perfectly good as far as I am concerned.

There are other subjects on which I would have liked to have spoken, a particular subject being the rejection by the Treasury Board of the much needed improvements and modifications to the terminal at the Edmonton International Airport. I notice that the previous minister of transport, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) is here. He knows about this because those demands were in existence when he was minister. However, the situation has become chaotic. The matter is urgent, and no reason was given; simply that the Treasury Board had turned down these much needed improvements. It is not that I want to spend the money; it is that the public using that air terminal is being prejudiced. The public pays the airport user tax just as anybody else, but frankly cattle pens are better than the customs facilities there. We treat cattle better than we do people coming off major planes, and those people have to use those facilities. Calgary is doing much better. It has its Mirabel of the west at $150 million, plus or minus. The public there can get customs clearance. People can be handled quite adequately there, but Treasury Board and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) have to come up with answers as to why for the third year in a row those improvements to the air terminal in Edmonton have been turned down. That is my plea.

I said I was going to mention one other point. It is with the greatest sadness and respect for the Chair that I say I do not think Mr. Speaker should introduce himself into controversial questions such as the one regarding the proposed layoffs by INCO at Sudbury. It is Mr. Speaker's own constituency, I know, but there is already controversy between the government of Canada and parties in this House. If I may say so, the Chair must not get itself involved on one side or another of the controversy. That is one of the limitations or characteristics of the Chair. Never, never, should Mr. Speaker, appear at a public controversial meeting.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Mr. O'Connell: Not even in the House?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Outside the House. The hon. member may have different ideas as to the standards which should be followed by the Chair.

Mr. O'Connell: He is a member.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let the hon. member make a speech, and possibly on some other occasion I will be able to reply to him. Let me simply say that I hope we will not see the Chair become involved. I have gone through this. The temptation was great, but I know all our predecessors in the Chair have deliberately abstained from controversy, even though during election compaigns one is involved. An election compaign is something different. This should not be done whilst the hon. gentleman is presiding in this House.

With that I thank hon. members for giving me this opportunity and allowing me to extend my remarks.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I notice that it is about eleven minutes to one. However, in the interests of using up all the time of the House I will refrain from the tendency of calling it one o'clock and proceed, and I presume with the indulgence of hon. members I will resume after the luncheon break.

First, like all speakers, I want to compliment the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and also the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for their splendid contributions to the throne speech debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I happen to know something of that experience because it was ten years ago, I hate to admit, that I had the honour of moving the Address in Reply during centennial year.

Of course, this year was also a special occasion for the participants because of the gracious presence among us of Her Majesty the Queen. I know I speak for all Canadians and most particularly for my fellow Newfoundlanders when I say how delighted we were, not merely at the Queen's presence here, but also with the charm, dignity and grace with which she carried out such a tremendously heavy burden of functions and responsibilities while she was with us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Understandably, the emphasis during this debate has been almost exclusively on what we can do and ought to do within Canada in order to bring about an improvement in present economic conditions. I say that this is the appropriate emphasis for most hon. members because it has been made abundantly clear that there is a great deal we can do within this country. There is a great deal in fact we must do of our own volition if we are to regain the momentum of economic progress which is so important to the future. I think it is also important in this debate that some member—perhaps I might venture to say that I am the most appropriate one given my responsibilities—ought to say a word or two about the international implications of the current economic situation and related questions.

I think all must recognize, and I believe most of us do, that despite all the things we do for ourselves during the next weeks, months and years, Canada will not really be restored to full economic vigour unless there is a companion improvement in the economic situation around the world. It would therefore be a mistake if we were to assume that we had within our own hands all or even most of the levers necessary to bring about a desired situation.

Having said that the importance of this international dimension ought not to be overlooked, I think it is also of the greatest significance and importance that we as Canadians understand the real nature of our role in internationl affairs. Sometimes I believe there is a tendency to over-estimate or over-state Canada's ability in various world forums to bring about circumstances which we consider desirable. It is important that we be realistic and understand the limitations placed upon our actions internationally while at the same time identifying, clearly and unmistakably, those areas where we do have capability not only to improve our own circumstances but to enhance the general position of the world.

As has been demonstrated time and time again, Canada has the respect and confidence of many of the international groupings where decisions affecting all of us are made on a regular basis. For example, Canada has had for some time membership in the so-called summit group which had its most recent meeting in London in May of this year. It is made up of the eight largest economically powerful countries in the world. This was quite a recognition for Canada and I say that in a totally non-partisan sense.

Similarly, Canada plays a leading role in the OECD, the economic and co-operative development organization, based in Paris in which members are drawn from all developed countries in the western world. We also have participation in the International Monetary Fund and a range of other organizations, all of which are coming to have a far greater importance than ever before in terms of this universal or global effort to come to grips with the unique situation we face on this planet. At all of these meetings, most of which I have attended, a consensus has emerged clearly and unmistakably on certain key and important points. While these have been uttered so often as to become trite in many respects, the fact of the matter is they must be repeated because we ignore them at our peril.

There is a range of conclusions, some of them so simple that I would not insult the intelligence of this House by going through a recitation of them. One conclusion stands out above all others, however, as being central to international planning for economic recovery. It is that the energy crisis and the events associated with it over the past four or five years and certainly since 1974, have brought about significant and permanent changes in the world economic structure. I emphasize the word "permanent" because this is really the key to moving toward a solution. In other words, since these structures have altered in a manner that cannot be restored, new structures must be tried; new concepts have to be developed. As well, we must slough off some of the old conventional simplistic techniques which have been used with relative success over past decades to correct imbalances as they occur in the world economic order.

I emphasize this point for the particular reason that there is still a tendency for all of us, instinctively, whether in the public sector, in this House in government or opposition, or in the private sector, to ask what we did last time and to apply that remedy again. The truth of the matter is that in terms of our present problems there is no last time. This is a new, a unique situation.

At one of the international forums not long ago I heard a gentleman quote a Scandinavian philosopher, I believe, to the effect that the essense of tyranny is the denial of complexity. These words certainly ought to drive home to us that we are in an enormously complex situation and that those who propose simplistic answers are guilty, first of all, of the tyranny of tending to look inward in a very narrow self-interested fashion which ultimately will fail.

There is another danger with the simplistic approach and we are seeing it on every hand around the world. It is the tendency for people to believe that all will be well if only they put into decision-making positions some miracle-maker who can put everything right without any effort on the part of the people themselves. Of course, when the miracles fail to materialize, as they inevitably will, and when there is a continuation of the problems, as there inescapably is, the inevitable result is as we are seeing in one country after another, not merely a deepening of cynicism but a very real threat to democracy itself.

It is demonstratively true and necessary, therefore, that we in this House and all the people of Canada recognize the nature of the difficulties we face. We must not seek to proceed with a whole series of unilateral actions, many of which are mutually exclusive and which in the end will create a situation far more devastating than anything we have seen to date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: If I may have just one moment before we recess for lunch, Mr. Speaker, let me try to put in perspective one or two issues in international economic affairs that are often overlooked. First of all the free market society—countries pursuing an open approach generated by and supported by democractic governments—have shown themselves to be far more vigorous, far more resilient than anyone thought possible in 1974. One has only to recall the dire forebodings expressed in this House just three or four years ago with regard to the free world economies and the structures of those nations to realize that they have shown remarkably more toughness than any of us had predicted. In other words, we had a tendency to underestimate our own capabilities. When you think that countries such as the United States, the European Economic Community or Canada have been able to withstand within a three year period a fourfold increase in energy prices, then this of itself should give us reason for confidence that we can move through the remainder of this difficult period and emerge both wise and more strong than we were before.

● (1302)

In calling it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I say that after lunch I will try to demonstrate some of the means through which we can achieve that goal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): When we adjourned at one o'clock, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) had the floor.

Mr. Jamieson: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. When we rose for lunch I had said that the international dimension of the current economic problem was such that virtually all of the leaders of the western, developed countries had acknowledged that what we were facing was a permanent change in world economic structures brought about primarily by the dramatic changes in the energy situation, which in turn, of course, was the result of the fourfold increase in prices. I had pointed out, as well, that although we have had, in the western world and in the developed world, very difficult times since 1974, the performance was not as bad as many had forecast and the free democratic system had shown what I described as far more resiliency than even some of its advocates had thought possible at that time.

There is another aspect of the situation which gives us cause for confidence. That is the fact that during this period from 1974 on, we have also seen the development of international organizations, some of which I have referred to—the OECD, the summit meetings, the International Monetary Fund, and a number of others. They have once again demonstrated the free world's capability to come together to act in concert in order to fend off some of the most difficult aspects of this unprecedented world situation.

While in 1977 we can scarcely say that conditions are normal—if, in fact, that is an appropriate word under any circumstances in today's world—the truth is that progress has, in fact, been made. If one looks at the statistics relating to the OECD countries, it is encouraging to note that the rate of inflation around the world has dropped sharply from what it was in 1974. Then it was running at something close to 14 per cent. In 1975, this concerted action to which I referred reduced it to a little more than 11 per cent. At the present time, while the statistics are not in, and will not be until November or December, it is fair to anticipate that the average rate of inflation in the developed world will be something in the order of 8 per cent, some countries obviously doing better than others.

I might point out that while the Canadian figures are deplorable and, indeed, far too high, OECD statistics indicate that only two countries, the United States and Germany, had lower rates of inflation than Canada in the period up to May, 1977; that is, in the period of the last 12 months or so. So there has been a slow reduction in rates of inflation.

At the summit meeting in London in May of this year certain conclusions were reached which were subsequently confirmed by the larger group in Paris at the end of June. It was understood, as I said earlier, that these structural changes have occurred and that new processes are necessary. Everyone in the OECD group concluded that, unlike previous troubles, we were now facing inflation and high unemployment at the same time. Furthermore, there were within the international community significant differences in capacity in terms of coping with such a situation, as well as different problems. The problems of the United States, for example, are vastly different from those of Japan even though, to use a popular expression, we are all in the same boat.

The decision was, therefore, taken at the London meeting that countries with stronger economies would undertake to promote a degree of stimulation, while the less strong countries would, in addition to doing what they could on the stimulation front, seek to bring about a greater degree of stimulation by cutting back on pulic expenditure and in other ways. Six months have passed since those decisions were made. Obviously, the two healthiest economies, judging by the statistics, are those of Japan and Germany, and in each of those cases the countries concerned have, within the last few weeks, announced certain stimulative programs designed to develop additional consumer demand, thereby generating a greater demand for imports and providing assistance to exporting countries whose economies are weaker.

On the other side of the picture, success has not been so easy to achieve. In the field of domestic restraint, country after country has indicated that it is locked into certain levels of expenditure established over many years, and that a sudden withdrawal from a variety of programs would be exceedingly disruptive. It is important to remember, in this fight against inflation on one hand and against unemployment on the other, that unless stimulation is handled with considerable skill it tends to drive up inflation, and that if stabilization is carried out in too restrained a fashion it tends to generate increased unemployment. The assessment made six months after the summit decision is that though there has been movement, it has not been as great as anticipated and that it will be 1978 before there is any real evidence as to the effect of the action taken, for example, within the German and the Japanese economies.

In addition, another phenomenon of our time has emerged, one which is interesting to note and which has far-reaching effects. I refer to the balance of payments on current accounts, particularly that of the United States. This is largely, if not wholly, due to the United States deficit in terms of oil imports. For the most part it is energy-related. The irony of the situation is this: as the United States stimulates its economy, the demand for energy in the country increases; the volume of oil imports must be increased and consequently the balance of payments situation deteriorates. I said this morning, quoting the gentleman from Scandinavia, that the essence of tryanny is the denial of complexity. I imagine few situations could be more complex than the one to which I have just referred.

However, in the area of joint action—the basic theme on which I am reporting to the House today—there are two aspects which are of particular importance to Canada. The first is what we have committed ourselves to doing in the context of the world community in terms of stabilizing our own domestic activities and, indeed, of reducing our own balance of payments deficit to the extent that we can. This, of course, means increasing our productivity.

The word "productivity" has been bandied around in the House and outside for a long time now, and in many respects the debate has been sterile because, first of all, there has been no general agreement between business and labour or between the private and the public sectors as to just what it is we are talking about. The time is certainly ripe for a broad public discussion on the question of productivity. It is not enough simply to proclaim that we need to increase productivity. When a businessman talks about increasing productivity, he usually means there ought to be a reduction in the demands of labour. Labour, on the other hand, tends to suggest it might be brought about if the plant or factory were made more efficient, or equipped with more modern machinery, without realizing that both these things are part of the same equation.

There is a further important consideration. If we wish, as part of the free world, to make this contribution of greater productivity, we have to determine how productivity is to be measured in areas where there are no convenient yardsticks to employ. How, for example, does one measure the productivity of a nurse, a teacher or of workers in a whole range of occupations within what is described as the service industries. Only when one takes the total figure for the national economy as a whole at the end of the year can one assess a general measure of productivity reflected, of course, in the level of growth of related industries. But until we can compare many areas starting from the same base of understanding—one which so far we do not have—we shall be faced with enormous problems when attempting to decide how a credit for productivity increase is to be distributed.

If, for example, a worker in a highly mechanized industry such as woodworking can show a 15 per cent productivity increase, ought the credit to go exclusively to that worker, or should some of it be reserved for those who support him in the service industries but whose productivity it is not possible to measure? I mention this to show that the argument on productivity will not get us very far unless there is agreement as to the basis on which we are going to take our measurements.

All this aside, there is no question that Canada must take all the steps at its disposal to improve its export position and to ensure that our competitiveness is sustained. And these are principally for the private sector. I might point out in this connection that the value of the Canadian dollar is an important element, though let me hasten to add, parenthetically, it does create serious problems in terms of levels of imports brought into the country. That, surely, is not a source of argument. However, it does have a serious effect on the balance of payments, and the more we can do to generate import replacements in Canada, the better it is for us.

Having said that, it brings me to another of the dilemmas which we are going to face as we work our way, as a free world community, out of the present circumstances. I refer to the approach that not only we but other countries are going to take to the whole question of the present round of multinational and multilateral tariff negotiations. The last three or four days in this House have demonstrated very vividly and very clearly how very little below the surface is the instinct for protectionism and the tendency toward protectionism. Of course, that is an understandable and a natural situation and we should not try to hide the reality of the problem that it reflects.

Clearly, even though Canadians are among the most generous people in the world when it comes to assisting the Third World, it is natural to react when imports from certain countries are below the cost at which they can be produced in Canada and, therefore, become a threat to Canadian employment and to the Canadian economy. We see it often in textiles and shoes. We are today hearing about it in terms of primary industry. Therefore, the job before us—which, incidentally, is one involving the whole community and not simply either the government or parliament—is to devise a tariff structure which will to the maximum extent possible allow us to take the greatest advantage of, for instance, our mining industry and various other industries where we have an obvious and a built-in advantage.

But let me caution the House, if that is necessary—or perhaps a better way of putting it would be to remind the House—that we, of all countries, must be extremely careful of protectionism. The old adage that every action brings a reaction is never more true than it is in the case of Canada. We have already seen, in terms of some of our comparatively limited actions, for instance vis-à-vis the United States, what kinds of opposition that can generate.

I was interested this morning to hear someone comment on certain countries to which we are providing various forms of aid in regard to textiles. May I remind the House that our largest single customer for wheat, for instance, is the People's Republic of China, which is also a country very interested in selling some of its products, including textiles, to Canada. So that the question we have to ask ourselves is: How can we ensure an adequate degree of protection, on the one hand, without blocking ourselves from access to exports, on the other?

Those who talk about helping the depressed areas of the country, but who at the same time talk about moving toward greater protection, should recall that in my province of Newfoundland, for instance—indeed, in the whole Atlantic region—at the very least the advantages of the 200-mile limit and the new developments that we are going to achieve in the fishing industry as a result can be thwarted overnight unless the multilateral tariff negotiations proceed smoothly and we get greater access for these additional fish products into the various markets which right now many people are advocating we ought to penalize in some way.

There are literally hundreds of those kinds of examples. That is why the multilateral tariff negotiations are going to be difficult for this country. That is why it is going to be of immense importance that on either side of the House we do not seek to achieve very short-range political or other advantage at the grave risk of underming the potential which we must have if we are going to expand both our natural resource base and our manufacturing base.

May I remind the House very briefly that Canada is unique in a number of respects, but particularly in this one which is very rarely stated. The United States is one of our markets and comprises over 200 million people. The European Economic Community has come together and consists of over 300 million people. The ASEAN countries of Southeast Asia now represent what is coming to be a trading bloc, which again has over 200 million people. Canada is the only industrialized country of 23 million or 23½ million people which does not have that large trading area in which no tariff considerations, or virtually no tariff considerations, exist. Apart from everything else, unless we can have access on a reasonable basis which gives the maximum assurance possible to our present domestic industry, then economies of scale, production runs and various things of this sort will put us at a decided disadvantage, even if we are successful in the tariff package which we achieve.

I see my time is very nearly up, Mr. Speaker, and I have barely scratched the surface. I would invite hon. members, either at a special session of the committee or through debates here if these can be arranged, to address these particular matters. I give them my assurance of total access to whatever information is necessary in order to make that debate meaningful; because there is nothing, in my judgment, that is more important, not just for 10 or 15 years from now but for the very near future, than how we cope with these particular problems.

If I may have one more minute, Mr. Speaker, I want to say something about the argument that is frequently presented here, that you can in some way or other separate the national unity question from the economic question. My experience around the world tells me that this is quite impossible.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the minister that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we agree that the minister continue.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of hon. members and I assure them that I will not abuse it. In addition to the matters to which I have referred, and in relation to international co-operation an enormous amount depends upon how Canada is perceived by the rest of the world, and particularly how it is perceived by foreign investors. We have all conceded, whatever our ideology in regard to foreign ownership, that Canada is going to need large amounts of foreign capital if it is to be able to develop and to prosper. Therefore, this question of Canada's future, of its national unity, is hovering now over a tremendous range of decisions.

Regardless of the country one visits, regardless of the number of economists to whom one speaks, or the bankers, if hon. members are in Switzerland, Paris or New York then I will set it up for them. I will set it up for the government of Quebec, because if they think this is not true, then they are deluding themselves; they have their heads in the sand. Clearly, no one is going to undertake massive capital investments at the present time unless there is more clarity as to what the future is going to be, particularly in the province of Quebec. But it is also of concern to the rest of us in Canada because it spills over into every other part of this country. Therefore, to say we can fix up the economic conditions first and then deal with national unity is to oversimplify it; the two are inextricably linked.

I have one final comment. I know this is a time in this country when we are prone to breast-beat and to be depressed and concerned about our future. But the good fortune I have had through the opportunity the House has given me to be the representative of Canada around the world has put me in touch with at least 100 leaders in the last 12 months. Having listened to the problems they have—and I wish each member here had the opportunity to do so—whatever our difficulties may be in this country, if I had the chance to swap the problems of any country in the world for those we have in Canada, I would take back my own, our own; and I think you would, too, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question at this point?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Due to the fact that the minister's time has expired, we need the unanimous consent of the House for the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) to ask the minister a question. Does the hon. member for Brant have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank my colleagues for giving me this opportunity. I have one brief question. A few moments ago the minister referred to the fact that Canada did not belong to any major trading bloc in the world. He made reference to the European Economic Community, to the new ASEAN community, and so on. I should like to ask the minister whether he thinks, in his own judgment, it would be to our economic, financial and material benefit to enter into a customs union or economic union with the United States.

● (1432)

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in one minute I could answer that very big question. However, I think the short answer is no. On the other hand, I emphasize what I said earlier, namely, that we can achieve much better access for our products in the United States through these multilateral tariff negotiations. The alternative to that is to see the tariff become less and less significant for the large manufacturer with the long-run production line in the United States who may very well be able to leap over the tariff barriers and, therefore, would have no disposition to establish here in Canada. That is quite an inadequate answer to a very big question which at some point I hope we can discuss in detail in this House. I am opposed to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I want with my colleagues to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and before I begin my speech I want this afternoon to pay tribute to one of my greatest friends in Canadian politics who died Saturday morning, Gaétan Mireault of Sutton, Quebec. Wounded during World War II, he was sergeant-major of Paul Sauvé's regiment, who became premier of my province, and he was my organizer-in-chief for eight elections. He was a great Canadian, a great soldier during World War II, a great soldier in peace time for his country. I want to pay tribute to my great friend, a great Canadian who has among his friends several Liberals.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, before I get into my actual speech, I think everyone in this House, be he Liberal, Progressive Conservative, Social Credit or New Democrat, does not have a chance to pay tribute to those foot soldiers at the grassroots level who make it possible for us to be here. I know all 260-odd of us have foot soldiers back in our constituencies who do the hard, day to day work in the political game and get very little credit for it.

On Saturday, my organizer-in-chief, Gaétan Mireault, of Sutton, died at the age of 58. He was Paul Sauvé's regimental sergeant-major during the Second World War. As I said a few moments ago in the other official language, he counted many good Liberals among his friends. He thought the political process was very, very important, so he fought for the party of his choice and for his country in peacetime, as he was a great soldier in wartime. Far too often we do not talk in this House about our foot soldiers and our friends at the grass roots level. I should like to pause very briefly and pay tribute to my greatest friend in politics who fought side by side with me for eight federal elections. I should like to bring the attention of the House to this fact.

[Translation]

I was in complete agreement with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) when he said earlier that the matters of the Canadian economy could not be separate from the matters relating, say, to the constitution and national unity. Even now we are faced with important questions related inter alia to the Canadian economy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that he is greatly involved among other things in the issue of national unity and the constitution—what I call the third option for today's Canada. This afternoon I want to discuss briefly what I have been saying for nearly 12 years inside and outside this House, and that is the need for us Canadians to write a modern constitution for modern times.

As I have often noted both here and outside the House, I am firmly convinced that it is time to prepare a modern constitution adapted to the needs of modern time, a constitution written in Canada, by Canadians and for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the development of this constitution could be done over two years. The first year, the federal government would establish a parliamentary committee on constitution with representatives of all parties. The provincial governments would do the same. Mr. Speaker, during the year, meetings could be held between the federal committee and each provincial committee. The second year, a federal-provincial commission including representatives of all political parties in the House of Commons and the provincial legislative assemblies would develop a new constitution.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this will not be easy. We will need extraordinary perception and political sense, a lot of courage, of imagination, hard work and the will to preserve Canadian unity. To ensure prosperity in Canada and unity of the country, we must make every effort to find an acceptable compromise between status quo and separatism. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting challenge which should stimulate us. It is no longer possible to have political confrontations to obtain short-term gains. Canada is more important than a political party, whatever it may be.

An hon. Member: Separatist!

Mr. Grafftey: That is not very bright. I thought you were more intelligent. You are perhaps a bit tired this afternoon. You say that I am for separatism. Are you making a statement or asking me a question?

[English]

In discussing the need for the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to form an all-party constitutional committee of this House made up in proportion to party representation in the House, the Prime Minister must let the elected representatives of the people in on the constitutional debate. After all, the Fathers of Confederation were all elected public officials, meeting with their counterparts in the various regions of this country. Task forces of appointed people are one thing, but in the best and truest sense of the word, constitutional documents are political documents.

In searching for an acceptable third option between status quo federalism and the separatist option of Mr. Lévesque, the Prime Minister must, without delay, establish an all-party parliamentary constitutional committee of this House of Commons. As I said in the other official language, it is my hope that our provincial counterparts will do the same thing. Also, it is my hope that during the first year after the establishment of such a committee we can meet with our provincial counterparts in provincial capitals from one end of this country to the other, and in the second year we will sit down and draft a modern constitution suited to modern times, made by Canadians for Canadians here in Canada. The whole operation will be more than just symbolism. It will create the cement in which we can get this union back on the road. It will not be easy. It will require statesmanship, hard work, guts and imagination. But the time to get going is now; we cannot tolerate further delay.

I appeal to the Prime Minister, and I say this perhaps advisedly, who at times has not shown too much respect for the pith and substance, the centrifugal aspects of the elective system, to let the elected representatives of the people in on the constitutional debate, if he wants to have that kind of profound and all-embracing consensus which will bring this country together. It is obvious that with the representation on his side of the House from the province of Quebec, and with our representation this side of the House largely from western Canada, it is important to inject this note of bipartisanship into such an important debate.

I heard the Prime Minister suggest a federal referendum. Quite frankly, I have not consulted other members of my party on this, but it is my reaction—and in this debate we are talking as Canadians, rather than as party people—that we should be very careful with that federal referendum. We must be very careful that we are not playing Lévesque's game. Possibly no province has the unilateral right to separate, and if we admit the principle that referendums can divide and bring this country to an end—which I do not admit—we are falling into a trap.

So I say to the Prime Minister, go very easy on admitting the validity of any referendum, be it provincial or federal, in this whole national unity debate. It is no idle threat when I say that for many Canadians, particularly in my part of the world, separation will become an increasingly viable option and those who defend the federal status quo continue to support separation blindly.

I have thought about this for a long, long time. I know that national unity is indivisible, but I think it is true to say that those of us who live in my part of the world are living with this thing day by day. Frankly, I myself am not satisfied with status quo federalism, and for many reasons. In my view, much more is involved than language, culture and the so-called Quebec question. Ottawa no longer responds to legitimate regional needs from coast to coast. After 1958 and during my first year in Ottawa, I was appalled at the waste, duplication and buck-passing which went on between different levels of government. Action on gut economic and social issues was, and is, being shelved because of the irresponsible handling of these issues within an outmoded constitutional framework.

As examples, I think of housing, the humane delivery of medical and health care services, urban renewal, public transit, job creation, and the rest. How can I tell my constituents, be they French or English-speaking, that contemporary federalism is working, when in many instances in their home towns they are faced with staggering unemployment rates of well over 18 per cent and galloping inflation of well over 10 per cent?

Far too many federalists who are defending the status quo feel that the provinces can be strong only at the expense of a strong federal authority. I have never understood this argument. Perhaps it is true within the present constitutional framework that needs immediate changing, but I do not believe it would be the case under a new, modern constitution drafted within the next two years, made in Canada by Canadians and for Canadians right here. Modern constitutional objectives should underline and encourage strong federal and provincial powers within their respective jurisdictions. Can we expect less? If I have oversimplified the issue, I would like to hear from individual members in this debate before it is too late. I repeat, can we expect less? In view of the present situation, where we have escalation of confrontation between the Prime Minister of Canada and a provincial premier from my province, can we have a continuation of this debate, confrontation and escalation while the economy goes down the drain? I say no, and the time for action is now.

When we analyse federalism in other parts of the world, sometimes we erroneously attempt to make analogies and comparisons, but one which is close at hand historically and geographically has some pertinent relevance. In the United States, after the Declaration of Independence was signed, the first constitutional document was the Articles of Confederation. It proved too weak to hold the union together and a big second step had to be taken before the present constitution was finally drafted and became operative in Washington.

In 1867, the Fathers of Confederation were all elected public officials. There was no task force of defeated members of parliament or of retired premiers. There was no task force going from coast to coast without any elective responsibility to the people. The Fathers of Confederation were elected public officials back in 1867, but it was impossible for them to envisage all the changes which would take place within the next 110 years. Unfortunately for many status quo federalists, the fear of change causes them to resort to irrational words in defence of the status quo, and thus confrontation and escalation, while the country becomes more and more divided and the economy becomes more and more paralysed.

I understand much of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) was saying, but there is far too much buck-passing in this country. When the economy is going down the drain and we are dividing much more than we should be, it is not very comforting to individual Canadians to be asked to look at other countries around the world. I remember, when I was in school, when everybody was flunking exams it was because they did not study for them. It was very cool comfort for me to go home to my father and tell him that I flunked my exam, but that that was all right because the other fellows did not study either; they all flunked.

We are the luckiest people in the world. Very often Canada reminds me of a company I had something to do with. I asked one of the members of the board of directors whether it was a good company, and he said, "Hell, Heward, it has survived 25 years of successive mismanagement". Let us not take comfort by saying that everybody is in the same boat with us. We are blessed with many things and we could be doing one heck of a lot better than we are. I hope those on the treasury benches will convince the Prime Minister that the time has come to let elected people from both sides of the House dialogue with their counterparts at the provincial level as we bring this new constitution to pass.

The Fathers of Confederation of 110 years ago would be the first to tell us in this House to get on with a big second step as they did in the United States. They did not freeze the Articles of Confederation in a museum, as we have done with the British North America Act. Are we up to this challenge? We had better be. Have we the will to preserve the union?

Let us stop talking about this referendum nonsense. The Prime Minister pulled this referendum idea out of a hat, and I am not convinced that we will ever have a referendum in the province of Quebec. I repeat for the second, third or fourth time, who in this House will admit that any kind of referendum, be it provincial or federal, can be an instrument to bring this union to an end? If we carry this kind of confrontation to its logical consequences, do we know what those consequences will be? Do I need to say?

Let us start talking common sense in this debate. I am not afraid to stand up—and I will say it in French and in English—and say that no province has the unilateral right to bring this union to an end. I would like to hear the Prime Minister say the same thing and forget about this referendum nonsense. I am very doubtful about the efficacy of referendums in the whole tradition of the parliamentary system, in the first place. I well remember 12 years ago when inside and outside this House I pleaded, not because of language and culture issues or because of the so-called Quebec issue but because of my experience in the four years between 1958 and 1962. I was appalled. If the average Canadian could come to Ottawa and see the waste, the buck-passing and the duplication—not of a few dollars but of billions of dollars, and not because of languages but because of our outmoded constitutional framework—he would surely push us to get on with the job. I had many extremely interesting conversations in those days, upstairs in the cafeteria, with the then new member for Mount Royal, now the Prime Minister, who had the ear of the then prime minister, Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

As we debated those matters 12 years ago, I took the position that the time had come do draft a modern constitution, suited to modern times and made in Canada for Canadians by Canadians. It was good debate, although he did not agree with me for all kinds of reasons. First of all, there was the classic notion that any weakening of the federal authority would diminish the possibility of putting on paper the kind of plans he had for Canada. I did not agree with him. But what has happened in the past ten years is there for everybody to see; I am not going to make any partisan interjections about that.

About a year later, a man called Lévesque was driven from the Liberal party. He went to Toronto to make a speech, which I heard. He proposed what I thought was a modern outlook, a new federalism, when he said that if the then government and its successors stubbornly held on to the status quo, he would unfortunately be forced into another option. I am not going to be naive and say he was not going into that other option anyway. What I do say is that 12 years later a lot of people inside and outside Quebec deplore separatism and the separatist option. I do not want to use phrases like "cave in," "give in" and "back down", but unless we can be led by some statesmen who understand what the third option is, in terms of drafting a new constitution, this blind following of the status quo will drive more and more Canadians to accepting the separatist option.

Children who go to an ice-cream store for chocolate ice-cream are willing to accept a second option if the store does not have chocolate ice-cream. When we talk about the future of the country and the provinces, however, it is another thing. The blind faith underlining of status quo federalism cannot go on indefinitely without something cracking. I am not just talking to leaders of political parties, but to every member of parliament, of all political parties, when I ask if we have the guts, the muscle, the clairvoyance, the statesmanship to preserve this union. Are there enough statesmen with muscle, imagination and courage who are ready to go to work?

I do not think the next two years is going to be easy for the parliamentary committees. It is going to take a lot of guts, hard work and give and take. The Fathers of Confederation had fewer tools of convenience than we, but they had the guts, the muscle, and were forward-looking. In this House, most members are Canadians first and party people after. Let us go to work. We can do it, but time is fast running out. The hour for action and leadership in this great country has finally arrived. I do not think, sir, that time is on our side.

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, it is not seven years since the last public statement on sport. I am pleased that today, having tabled a green discussion paper toward a new national policy on amateur sport, hearings will be held across the nation on amateur sport so that it will be possible for people in every community to have input, should they wish to, as we forge our directions and goals into the 1980s.

Canada's accomplishments in sport are often unknown, but that does not diminish them in the slightest. Canadians have, through their own commitment, proved that it is possible to surmount great odds in order to achieve, and achieve in almost every realm of sport. The powerful bond that is forged by sport is recognized on many levels of society both in performance and in mass participation endeavours. There is real joy of effort in seeking personal excellence, as well as enjoying the camaraderie of getting to know others better as we strive toward new plateaus of personal accomplishment.

The sport movement is broadly based, with implications that go far beyond the playing fields, with increasing significance as a tool in the enhancement of both social and health perspectives in a very special way.

Canadians spend $7 billion per year on health care. Over 40 per cent of this cost goes to the overwhelmingly unhealthy lifestyle habits which many people have difficulty changing—habits such as smoking, use of liquor, the licit and illicit use of drugs, nutritional imbalance and physical exercise that is abandoned, to name only a few. As a people we are slowly learning together to change our attitudes and expectations. It is as essential to our physical well-being that we learn a more healthful lifestyle as it is also essential to our economic survival. The two are irrevocably linked together. We have to learn to match reduced expectations to our ability to produce. A radically changing world economy is part and parcel of everything we face today, whether it be sport or national unity.

The main theme of the sport policy formation document set before the House and Canada's sport family today is the scale of the federal role in sport—the structure of sport, its administration, its technical development, its promotion and many other programs. The commitment of this government to sport access is complete. That is the one immutable factor in the paper tabled in this House today. Everything else, I submit, is once again subject to the people. Recognizing that there is federal involvement in sport, the public sector neither can be, nor would want to be, all things to all people. The federal role in sport has, quite naturally, become largely the national and international level of participation. The combination of public funding, lottery revenues from Loto Canada and private funds, is proposed as a means to greater stability in sport endeavours. I expect considerable discussion to take place on this point in the hearing process.

The precept, clearly, is that every Canadian should have equitable access to sport at his or her level of achievement. Certainly, this involves all other levels of government at the community and provincial levels as well where renewed co-operation and consultation can possibly lead to improved accessibility in sport opportunity. Sport at the level of the community and of the provinces is burgeoning just as it is at our level. It is, therefore, essential that we seek together a new means of sharing in sport as in all other attributes of Canadian life.

The mandate at the national level is clear: to assist in providing equitability of sport access in every part of the nation, so that within and between provinces and territories, as far as is practicable, there is a Canadian level of attainment open to every person. This is a national priority and it will only be obtainable through provincial co-operation. But the mandate is not solely here at home. The federal government sees its role as more than just a financier of sports enterprises. Achievement has been made possible by innovations at the national level. Achievement also has been made possible by such systems as a game plan which is a support mechanism including coaching and training access for national athletes and for national teams. A new, developmental coaching school system, in concert with the universities, to develop a national master coach plan through apprenticeship training has been begun, so that Canada will be able to have world-class coaches of its own and not consistently bring coaches from other countries which have had the foresight to train them in advance.

Mr. Alexander: Will this help the Tiger Cats?

Mrs. Campagnolo: I know the hon. gentleman is a well known sport, but we are trying to keep politics out of sport, and sport out of politics, at this moment.

Mr. Alexander: I am still a sport.

Mrs. Campagnolo: In any event, these master coaches will be the first Canadian trained world-class coaches who will assist us in many ways to bring up the certification for which we are looking. Right now, 44 of the sports governing bodies in this country have attained level 1 in coaching certification, 25 have attained both levels 1 and 2, and 14 have moved up to level 3.

Then we have the national sport and recreation administration centre which was established in 1970 and has provided services to the sport and recreation governing bodies in ever greater number. By 1981, we expect to have all the national associations in residence, additional professional personnel in the form of technical directors, and the development of official referees and judges. As well, program administrators will be employed. These have been added to the roster of expertise that is available to the Canadian sports person. We seek new knowledge in sport research and in sport medicine—another area where Canada has famed pioneers. Few people recognize the contribution made to Canadian sport medicine by Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, who is more often recognized for his beautiful statuary than for his significant contribution to sport medicine.

He is the man who discovered, in the trenches of World War I, that it was possible to bring people when they had been injured in the war back from the brink of despair by involving them in physical exercise. I think of Tait McKenzie as being one of those who made it possible for the famous games for the handicapped that take place in Canada at this time. These games are a joy. I hope that every member will go to see them and will watch a most inspirational form of sport in this country.

We also have what is called S.I.R.C. the first of the national computers in sport analysis. It is the largest and best in the world, the most significant computerized sport and fitness resource centre in the world. Following us in this data centre is East Germany, and following that country is West Germany, just to show us there are accomplishments in the world of sport which are of significance. Our programs for the disadvantaged continue in conjunction with the provinces and other agencies. I have only touched on various items of the present program.

This new Canada of ours has responsibilities beyond our borders, however, and one such responsibility concerns sport relations with South Africa. It is the same South Africa which this week stated it would "show its fist to the world" in answering U.S. President Carter. There has been much discussion of our sports policy concerning Canadian participation in this nation of racial separation. I should like to reiterate, for those who have been concerned about our policy, a very clear and succinct understanding. The government of Canada will not underwrite with public funds, or provide moral support for the participation of Canadians in sporting events involving South Africa, in either South Africa or Canada.

In Third World countries, we consider the good judgment of both Canadian sports people and the host country will prevail in decisions made by them concerning sport contacts with South Africa. Naturally, we reserve the right to be publicly critical of actions which might contravene the spirit of the Commonwealth heads of government accord reached at Gleneagles, Scotland, on June 12, 1977. The Gleneagles compromise, largely spearheaded by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), put Commonwealth leaders on record as being opposed to sporting contacts of any significance between Commonwealth countries and South Africa. This is a consistent policy of this government, and not just something conjured up to keep next year's Commonwealth's Games at Edmonton on track.

From as early as 1970, Canadian government investments in South Africa have been removed. Canada no longer sells defence goods to South Africa. That is our answer to the heinous social policy of apartheid. There have been politics in sport since well before Athens and Sparta used to seek perfection against each other on the Olympian field, or later when Philip of Macedon was assassinated at the Olympic Games in order that Alexander the Great might succeed him. Politics is an everyday part of life, whether in this historic chamber or in teaching your children a value system which is consistent with your own free beliefs. In turn, sport is part of politics. Our political and economic relations with many countries have been changed for the better by sports people in the sports context. Do any hon. members here think that the head of IOC, Lord Killanin, would be negotiating now to bring China back into the Olympic family if Canada and our Prime Minister had not stood firm and the Prime Minister had not remained adamant on the issue last year of Taiwan's bid to attend the Montreal Olympics?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: It is vitally important that our high performance athletes seek competition against the best. Best on best cannot always be arranged within our borders, but in co-operation with my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), it has been increasingly possible for Canadians seeking excellence to compete against top athletes in many nations; and our young people are proving equal to the test, primarily here in the western hemisphere against the United States, Cuba and Mexico, but also in the U.S.S.R., in Japan, in Poland, in Hungary, in West Germany and in East Germany, with growing exchanges with other nations as well. These exchanges do not come easily; they are worked at; they are representations of human contact; they are a very fine example of the Helsinki accord.

More than any other human endeavour, sport has proved over and over again that it is the bridge-builder between peoples, the friend-maker, the ice-breaker. It all starts right here at home on the corner lot; at home where there are hundreds of thousands of devoted volunteers, from Inuvik to Point Pelee and from Newfoundland to the Queen Charlotte Islands, making it possible for everyone who has the inclination to participate, to be able to do so. There are fine facilities from coast to coast in this country, and although it is hard to believe, too many of them are not used as much as they should be. We have only to think back to the Canada Games last August, in St. John's to know that more than Games' records are the achievements of such endeavours.

Every province now has provincial editions of mass participation games. These games are a human achievement. Now we look toward the Arctic Winter Games of March, 1978, at Pine Point and Hay River, Northwest Territories; to the giant undertaking with Alberta, the host province of the Commonwealth Games next August in Edmonton, where our goal is to achieve first place. The national contribution of capital and services to the Commonwealth Games exceeds $40 million from the Canadian people. Alberta will demonstrate the efficiency of their building and budget management and the friendly hospitality of our nation's largest northern city.

Then we will move on to Brandon, Manitoba, in the spring of 1979 for the next edition of the Canada Winter Games; then to the Pan American games, in Puerto Rico also in 1979, where we are aiming for second place; then on to Moscow in 1980 where we hope to exceed our tenth place finish in Montreal, which was a significant leap forward from our average twentieth placing over the last 40 years of Olympiads. Gold medals are not everything. Achievement of excellence of our best selves, is. It is as true in our striving for personal improvement as it is in our striving to become the great nation of our potential.

The goal of this government is to ensure that the athlete, at whatever level of competition, is regarded as a full-functioning, productive member of society. The goal of this government is to see that sport, fitness and recreation is acknowledged by one and all as a full-functioning part of that culture which is Canada. No more the sweaty athlete syndrome. No more the denigration of the athletic scholarship. No more the culture which is divided between artists and athletes. Athletes are artists, and some artists are athletes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: We are struggling now with a rather difficult economic period in our evolution as a nation. For too long we have been a nation that is top heavy with those who produce only services. Do hon. members know that today only one-tenth of the labour force is literally "carrying the can for Canada?" Do we know that the world is reallocating its trade priorities, that this global economic earthquake is rocking us to the very limits of our ability to pay for those goods and services we all think we cannot live without?

Even so stern a critic of the mining industry as former Premier Barrett of British Columbia, in a speech in my constituency last week made the alarming statement for him and exhorted that resource exploitation must now be undertaken. He was the premier whose deathless words, "leave it in the ground", are still well remembered in my province and are still ringing in the ears of others, in reference to minerals. Competition in copper from Chile is overwhelming. The attack in zinc, nickel and other metals is hurting our nation. All this reminds members that it is the primary producers of this country, the loggers, the miners, the fishermen and the agricultural producers who are so pitifully few in number, who literally support the rest of us.

The contribution made in Canada by the resource producers to the welfare of this country of ours is gigantic. We will together seek means of weathering this earthquake of the economy so that Canada can turn the corner once again to prosperity. However, in my opinion there will never again be the profits which were reaped so effortlessly in the fifties. They will not be realized in our time. I believe that in order to survive, we must be willing to make sure that not only do we survive, but the rest of the world as well.

I could not enter this debate on the Speech from the Throne without talking about reconfederation. There should be no losers in confederation. Our building of unity must be based on real values, not stereotyped ones. As long as one deals in stereotypes, tolerance and understanding are impossible. It is on the real and intrinsic value of each citizen that the strength of a nation can be reinforced.

We are the second largest nation in the world; our geography is overpowering. It has at times intimidated us as a people and it has deterred us from knowing our fellow citizens intimately. Until the banding of our nation by rail and by road, by radio and by television—and the task is still incomplete—we could perhaps afford the luxury of not knowing each other. No more. That which other nations may perceive as an economic burden of transportation and communication, we know to be a social necessity, linking together our people in a federation that takes into account our differences and our regional and geographic inequities.

When I came to Ottawa, I was often perplexed by continued reference to our country's five regions. My consciousness as a northwesterner turned the large end of the telescope on our own differentials and needs and, naturally, my five choices were, the Atlantic, central Canada, the prairies, British Columbia and the north. But here in Ottawa a central viewpoint from our national telescope showed the same malaise I had had, as I heard the regions solemnly named, B.C., the west, Ontario, Quebec and the Atlantic, half an hour later in Newfoundland, with the north, if perceived at all, seen through the wrong end of the telescope by most everyday Canadians. This distortion, this telescopic myopia, is perhaps unavoidable in a nation where London, Ontario, is closer to London, England, than it is to Old Crow, and where it is cheaper to fly to Hawaii or the Caribbean for a winter holiday than it is to travel from Prince Rupert, my home, to our nation's capital.

Inevitably, there are forces, fed by the unique aspects of each region, which exert pressures on them to pull apart from the rest of the country. These pressures were what we overcame to create this Canada of ours. We must continue, both to respond to the pressure points and to resolve the legitimate grievances they spawn, in order to maintain and to improve the unity that we won through such effort over the last century. But we must address the issue on the basis of a united nation, not on the basis of six regions, each seeking to gain a better deal at the expense of the rest. "Balance-sheet" confederation has never worked, and it never will.

If we succumb to the forces that pull our regions apart, and neglect those that bind us together, we may well become, like Pirandello's characters, six regions in search of a nation, or like the blind people describing an elephant, with each defining, however he or she pleases, his or her own part of the beast, and with the additional burden of a tacit agreement that no line be crossed, that each remain within his or her own region and not "meddle" in the others' territory, while each seeks ever greater power and favour for that region.

It was this type of regionalism that led the premier of British Columbia to say, in 1872, when that province was still smarting over what were felt to be the inequitable terms of the Act of Union:

> I would not object to a little revolution . . . if after confederation we were treated unfairly.

This quote is from a truly unusual man, but perhaps an archetypal Canadian, a man from Nova Scotia, by way of California, named Bill Smith who so fell in love with the west that he changed his name to Amor de Cosmos, "lover of the Universe". But did his universal love include Canada? Looking backward in time it appears to be "cupboard-love" to me. But surely Amor de Cosmos was not alone then, and would not be so now, within confederation.

Small revolutions? There have been many of them. In fact, we are now in a time when psychologically we are six giant regions and numberless special interest groups waging small revolutions, based on sometimes real and sometimes suspected grievances that reflect the new reality in confederation. One hundred and ten years ago we were 4½ million people huddled around the pivot points of Upper and Lower Canada like winterchilled children around a bonfire.

The fires are banked now and stretch from Newfoundland to the Queen Charlotte Islands, but our constitution remains geared to the bonfire rather than the solar cell. Unless collectively we have the wisdom to perceive the nature of a just and equitable reconfederation and to work continuously toward that goal, we will become fragmented into cultural, ethnic, linguistic, economic and geographic ghettos where regional self-interest, and "What's in it for me?" federalism saps the strength of our national union.

Listen to another British Columbia of early day, a "rentable federalist" of the same era as de Cosmos, John Helmcken, who on conversion to confederation several years after the Act of Union in 1871 said, "Love for Canada had to be acquired by the prosperity of the country and through our children."

"A Canadian is a Canadian, is a Canadian", the Prime Minister said shortly after Quebec made known its intention to secede from Canada. But who is this new Canadian? What is this larger Canada? We are a people who founded ourselves on an indigenous culture which we are only now coming to appreciate. The native people of Canada can teach us love of land and the warmth of sharing in a society that depends on each other in a co-operative manner. We are an officially bilingual nation, which does not mean every citizen must speak both English and French, but that every Canadian must be able to address the national government in his or her official language.

This government, unlike the opposition, does not regard language as a "divisive" force, but strongly and adamantly follows a policy of freedom of choice, genuine freedom of language choice as the only sensible policy. Canadians, too, are a polyethnic society where the best of each culture and of the past is nurtured and husbanded with devotion and retained as part of the fabric of this new Canada. Canada is a promise to the world. If we, with all our regional inequities, racial and cultural differences and political estrangements, can pull this grand diversity into an even greater nation, we shall have set the pattern for a global community that must inevitably follow.

Twenty-five years ago, in Prince Rupert, Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent said: "We shall never have real peace until the whole world becomes one large, good neighbourhood in which all men and women respect the rights of others and work together for the common good." We must remember that all men are our neighbours. As we, together, engage in this battle for our nation's future, I cannot ignore the heroic fight of the Fathers of Confederation 110 years ago to bring Canada into being. Some of their words still ring true today. I should like to quote from a speech made by Thomas D'Arcy McGee in Halifax in 1894. He said: "Who will oppose? Who are now opposed to the union? Only those who have a vested interest in their own insignificance." As a British Columbian, I say to Quebec:

[Translation]

Your presence is not without value for the future of our country. You are essential to its life and your presence is of absolute necessity.

[English]

Each person in this nation is the mother or the father of a new federation—a new and better Canada for all.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. If the subject of part of my remarks is parochial, it is with justification. The federal government and the provincial government of British Columbia signed, in June of this year, a series of agreements. Indeed, two substantial agreements were signed under the DREE program, one dealing with industry and the other with agriculture.

It is interesting to note that in the subagreements, according to the terms of reference laid down by the governments themselves under the general development agreement for British Columbia, attention was paid to two or three areas which are closely spelled out. These areas which are singled out for special assistance are the northwest portion of British Columbia and the northeast portion of British Columbia. I have no quarrel with that; indeed, I think it is most commendable. But it is also interesting to note that the one area which is clearly identified in the agreement, but which has been totally ignored in terms of special consideration, is Kootenay West.

I must say that reading the industrial agreement I was amused and more than a little frustrated at the minister's definition of "small business". I know he is prepared to provide as a loan or a grant—it amounts to the same thing, because it is forgiveable—some $30,000 on the basis that the capital investment of the person making application for the money does not exceed $60,000. I would ask the minister responsible for small business, if he were in the House today—I see that his predecessor is here—whether, in his opinion, the $60,000 limit on capital investment can be considered to qualify under the definition this government has of small business. I am curious to know what, according to the colourful imagination of this government, $60,000 is going to accomplish. I suggest a person would have difficulty in establishing a Dixie Lee outlet or a Colonel Sander's chicken-stand with that amount of money, at today's equipment prices.

However, it is some comfort to us to learn that the Liberal caucus is visiting Kootenay West this weekend. I am encouraged by this, because as a result members may have an opportunity to grasp the problems they have ignored for the last 40 years. Perhaps they will learn for themselves about the rape they have imposed on Kootenay West with their Columbia River treaty. Perhaps they will get to understand the problems of Castlegar. Perhaps they will sit down with Audrey Moore. I hope they do. Perhaps they will ask her what she thinks of the DREE program and the amount of assistance likely to be forthcoming for Castlegar which is suffering from a serious water shortage.

The government has told us it is seriously concerned about unemployment and that it wishes to support measures taken by industry to increase employment. Castlegar has within its borders a provincially-owned pulp mill and sawmill. This complex is now to undergo a $7 million expansion, which means additional jobs. However, there is no place where the workers may live, because any new homes which may be constructed in Castlegar today are built on the understanding that they will not have a water hook-up. The problem is that Castlegar, at the confluence of the Kootenay and Columbia Rivers, has to rely on wells in its own subsoil, and because of geographical configuration those wells do not draw water from the Columbia River system. They are wells whose content is highly alkaline. Instead of the soft, clean water which lies above the Keenleyside dam, the residents of Castlegar must put up with this system.

I urged the minister responsible for DREE to consider a subagreement similar to the one drafted for Fort Nelson, involving $3 million or $4 million—$7 million, as it was with Fort Nelson—federally, provincially and municipally shared. That plea fell on indifferent ears. They said, "We are coming up with a new industrial and rural agreement, and surely within this context there will be something for Castlegar". Officials of DREE have advised me that as far as they can determine, there is nothing in the terms of the subagreements which affects the city of Castlegar, even though there is a less than adequate supply of water through the hydrants for fire fighting: 50 per cent of the fire hydrants register less than 50 per cent of the required pressure.

Hon. members are aware, as is the minister responsible for DREE, that the Cominco plant in Trail is in process of a $435 million expansion program. That is more money than the federal government has ever spent in the riding in the history of Kootenay West. Here again, more jobs are being created and there is a need for housing. Because of its geographical position, there is no more room in Trail for houses to be built, so people are looking to Castlegar to provide the accommodation they need. The problem, of course, is that if they move to Castlegar, since no water supply is available they cannot build houses. If the government is going to put its money where its mouth is, if the government is truly concerned about employment and about human values in British Columbia, then when government members visit my riding of Kootenay West this should be the very first issue to which they address themselves.

One of the things I have discovered, to my despair, during the short interval I have been a member of parliament is the lack of social conscience on the part of the government. It really is not entirely the fault of government parliamentarians. Clearly, in my view, ministers fail to get the message across to senior civil servants, who have established their own little empires, that there is need for a heart and for sensitivity in government. How many members, Liberal, Conservative or NDP, have appealed to the minister of health in the past and said, "Mr. Minister, I have a senior citizen in my riding who has paid into the Canada Pension Plan for a number of years, and when he applied for his old age pension he thought he was applying also for his CPP. After three months without his cheque, he discovered his mistake, and he is now asking to apply for his rightful benefits under the CPP and for the three or four months' lag in benefits which he missed because of his own ignorance"?

It is only recently that the minister, due to pressure from members on both sides, has at last amended the act to make provision for such cases. However, how many senior citizens have been robbed—there is no other word for it—of their Canada pension for a period of months? Because it was engraved in stone in some ridiculous government regulation, the minister was determined to stick to the book. How very unfortunate for Canadians. That is only one example, Mr. Speaker, of many in which the government has demonstrated its total lack of feeling.

If I had an opportunity to sit down quietly with some of my constituents, or indeed with all Canadians, I would say to them that one of the biggest frustrations I have today, as a member of parliament, is that some members of parliament have been dishonest and have deceived Canadians; that this government has on occasion demonstrated what can only be called corruption; that the government and its members sitting opposite, when confronted with evidence of corruption, of lying, of deceit and dishonesty, have jeered, hooted, howled, smiled and grinned at those who have with justification levelled charges.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, there are among us some who have a conscience. I find it very disturbing that a member would not accept with a great measure of seriousness the charges which I have heard levelled in the House in the past. But rather than accept those charges seriously, rather than expressing concern, they adopt a united front—the big grin, the deceitful laugh. I think Canadians are going to wake up somewhere down the line and realize just how dishonest this government has been, in terms of its dealings with the people.

So many examples have been raised before in the House of government arrogance, of the pork-barrel system. The Liberals laugh it off. What disturbs me most is that Canadians do not rise up in their anger and frustration and let the government know what they think of the blatant pork-barrelling of this government. One of the most laughable instances is the government's decentralization program. Let me refer to a Conservative riding, Cape Breton. One of the most laughable decisions of the government has to be the movement of the passport mailing office to Cape Breton. Quite frankly, I have advised my female constituents that the minute they give birth to a son or daughter they should consider making application for a passport, because it might just arrive at the same time as puberty of the child.

If you review, Mr. Speaker, the last round of pork-barrelling, you will notice that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), our Deputy Prime Minister, received a hand-out in terms of public service decentralization. The community involved is Antigonish. Then the Postmaster General (Mr. Blais) received some goodies for North Bay. The Speaker of the House had some goodies for Sudbury—and God knows they need them right now. Then we have the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) whose riding of Saskatoon also benefited. This brings me to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), that corn-fed youth of the west. I can just imagine what the farmers are saying, as they thump across the fields in their tractors at this time of the year, about the grain exchange, or the Wheat Board, or whatever it is, that has gone to Camrose. Does this government really think that that is going to buy some votes? If they really believe that, let me tell them they are in for a very rude and serious awakening.

Then we must not forget our new Minister of State (Environment (Mr. Marchand)) and the goodies for Kamloops, B.C. The minister of Indian Affairs has received a hand-out for Peterborough. Then there is the allocation for Thunder Bay, represented by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), which has enormous unemployment of, I think, about 2.5 per cent. Then, of course, we have the parliamentary secretary from Thunder Bay, the parliamentary secretary from Sherbrooke, Quebec, and on and on it goes. The list is nauseating and is a condemnation of the system with which we are saddled at this time. Yet hon. members opposite sit there and laugh and grin. They should hang their heads in shame.

Since October of 1974, which is not that long ago, I have sat in this House and listened to the charges laid in connection with Sky Shops. I have seen the emasculation of the standing committee dealing with Polysar and AECL, the failure to disclose the truth, the fear to disclose the facts. I have seen the "dial-a-judge" affair go through the House, and the cabinet resignation which resulted. There has been the contempt of court by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), and the travel agents and Air Canada question. The principal secretary of the Prime Minister found himself conveniently promoted to the Senate, thereby avoiding the necessity of answering questions on the order paper.

Then there was, more recently, the uranium cartel, in which we now find that champion of truth and justice moving forward to the television sets of Canada and telling the people that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Allmand) has come to their rescue, that he is going to hold an inquiry and that the government is going to examine itself. It is going to test its own integrity, Mr. Speaker. It is like a patient with a long-standing disease making a self-diagnosis. This self-diagnosis would be without the benefit of any outside impartial analysis. Let me assist in the diagnosis. The first thing we would find in the victim is a hardening of the policy arteries of this government. We would find a cerebral atrophy of ideas. We would find an emphysema of rhetoric, a social disease of arrogance, a pox of corruption, and tunnel vision of ideas.

● (1542)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Carry on, doctor.

Mr. Brisco: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) went across this nation in 1974 and told Canada that everything was fine, that we had nothing to worry about, that the federal government was now addressing itself to one of our major national concerns and that a whole new transportation policy would be evolved. Where is the transportation policy? I suspect it is probably residing somewhere at the bottom of the St. Lawrence Seaway, or in Hamilton harbour with the rest of the scandal.

The Prime Minister assured Canadians that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), the then leader of the opposition, was woolly-headed in his thinking in terms of an economic policy for Canada, and that this idea of prices and incomes control was something abhorrent. It was just as serious as the social disease from which this government now suffers. Yet what do we have. We have a government which has saddled Canada with a prices and incomes control system far removed from the concept advanced by the hon. member for Halifax. There is no comparison. It is nothing short of an economic disaster. It demonstrated most of all that the Prime Minister, that renowned athlete who was going to wrestle inflation to the ground on God knows how many occasions—

Mr. Railton: Watch your language.

Mr. Brisco: I can give you a few medical terms. That renowned athlete suffered from a hernia and introduced prices and incomes control after telling Canadians that it would never be done by a Liberal government. What Canadians lost when they elected a Liberal government, when they believed in their Prime Minister and his deceit, was a man of integrity and basic honesty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brisco: They won a performer on television. They won a man with a convincing tongue. They won a House full of Liberals who at every challenge to their honesty and integrity sit there and grin and laugh up their sleeves.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Brisco: They won a foghorn for a minister representing Canadian farmers. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has now assured Canadians that all will be right with unemployment and that the government will throw $150 million into Canada Works. Riding after riding has submitted, for approval, Canada Works' applications. They have rejected some and are unable to fund others. Whether it is called Canada Works or a rose by any other name, we will probably see that those frivolous projects which should never be funded will be, in fact, funded.

If this is the minister's proposal, there will be no frivolous applications coming from Kootenay West. You can keep your dirty money. I would rather see that money advanced to solve the problems within Kootenay West in terms of the community of Castlegar and its water supply.

Mr. Whelan: Oh, oh!

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) have a question?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is taking notes. I hope he is paying attention.

Mr. Brisco: I would rather this government spent $150 million on some policies of permanence. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has been urged by members on this side of the House to consider a major upgrading of the manpower training program, much greater support, in conjunction with the provinces, for our skilled trades and a need which has been clearly demonstrated to fill those jobs which require skilled trades. What do we find? Tool and die makers are being imported from Europe. Coal miners for British Columbia are being imported from Taiwan and Southeast Asia. What is wrong? What is the problem? Clearly, the government is not listening. How can this government allow industry to import these skilled trades which we need, and turn a blind eye on the necessity to provide apprenticeship programs to fill the jobs waiting for Canadians?

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Brisco: What possible use is there in a decentralization program, if this government is not prepared to go ahead, in concert with the provinces, and think about the decentralization of some of our universities and university programs into the area of skilled trades? What is wrong with putting skilled tradesmen out in the marketplace where they are needed, instead of filling the streets and the taxis of the nations with people who have university degrees and nowhere to go?

There is a great deal more I could say about Canada, our government and national unity. I have addressed myself to only a few of those points. I apologize if I have been overly parochial, but I should like to remind the Liberal members of the British Columbia caucus—I see one representative of that caucus in the House today—that when they come to Kootenay West they should consider sitting down with the people who can inform them how their government has failed so completely to address itself to the economic problems of Kootenay West and this nation.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am appalled, in the last week of the debate in which we have been participating, at the way the opposition has attacked the government without really any understanding of the kind of problems we are facing at this time. Also, I am appalled at the rather weak defence the government has made of a rather good record.

Before we talk about the problems of our time, we should look at the record of this government over the last ten years to see if its record is as bad as the opposition is saying it is. I can see it is much better than the government is declaring it to be. The most useful document I am able to acquire each year is the annual review of the OECD, the economic survey dealing with Canada. The books on this document were closed on June 30 and the document arrived in Ottawa some time in late August or early September.

I would like to refer to a few of the figures included in the document, to indicate the success this country has had relative to other countries. The OECD uses four indicators. They survey the seven major countries, of which Canada is one. This summit group representing those countries met in London. If the opposition had a chance, I suppose it would say Canada is seventh in that group because Canada has the smallest population and there is something wrong with that. However, we are part of that group of seven.

There are four indicators. The first indicator is real personal consumption. Canada leads in the group. The average annual increase for Canada over the period 1970 to 1976 is 6.5 per cent. Canada is first and the United States is fourth at 3.4 per cent. Another indicator is real disposal income per person employed. Canada is fourth in this category at 4.2 per cent. The figure for the United States is 1.6 per cent.

In total number of new jobs created, Canada leads the list with 3.2 per cent for every year, on average. Canada leads the seven countries in that category, with the U.S. second at 1.8 per cent. Let us talk about the increase in the household savings ratio. Canada is second and the United States is seventh. In these four categories which are used by the OECD—and we are talking about the years 1970 to 1976—we come first in two, second in one, and fourth in the other. Is that a bad performance? Is that an intolerable performance? Is that a mess? I say that is a fine performance, and I am critical of the government for not bringing this to the attention of the public.

There are a couple of other points which should be made with regard to this document. The document says that in 1974-75, at the cost of deterioration in the relative inflationary performance and the external balance because of this, Canada resisted the international recession much better than most other industrial countries. Following the shift in emphasis during 1975, which was a recession year, economic policy continued, in 1976, to give priority to reduction in inflation not only as an immediate objective but also as an essential condition for sustained improvement in output and employment. Those in the NDP said we should not have gone into controls; OECD said we did the right thing. We had the right priorities at that particular time.

In 1976, private consumption grew by 6 per cent in this country. Private savings also grew. The OECD says that this consumption did not grow because of any propensity to consume. In fact, the household savings ratio nearly doubled in the same period, but buoyant, real disposal income growth was achieved, thanks partly to an extremely rapid expansion in employment. That is why Canadians are better off, and to say that the government has not done these things is to miss completely the point of the OECD which, I assume, is a neutral body dealing with some 20 countries.

Let me refer to another figure, which does not come from OECD but from the Canadian Press of last week. Average family incomes, before taxes and deductions, rose by 5.9 per cent to $19,110 in 1976 from $16,613 a year earlier. After inflation, that represents a 7 per cent increase in family incomes. Yet we put this forward and say that Canada is doing very badly.

In real dollars, since 1968—which was the year the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took the reins of government—that is, dollars which are not inflated by taking 1971 dollars as a constant figure, the gross national product increased by 42 per cent over these eight years. Canada's personal consumption—in real dollars, again—increased by 52 per cent. This, again, is from OECD.

Let us consider the clincher. Hon. members opposite say that the government is spending too much money and bankrupting the country. But personal income, in real dollars, increased by 52 per cent. Government expenditures—in other words, government consumption—increased by only 41 per cent, in real dollars, in that period. So are government expenditures in excess of personal expenditures? No. Personal consumption has gone up 15 percentage points faster than has government consumption. These are some of the things the government has not told the Canadian public, and I am annoyed that it has not. The reason I am annoyed is that I think it is unfair, in these very difficult times, to say that Canada has performed badly in the past eight or ten years, that it is all our fault and that it is only happening in Canada.

I have three major ideas I would like to convey in this speech, aside from getting the foregoing off my chest. I will be saying a great deal more about this as time goes on. The first point is that in a global sense there has been a great increase in the seriousness of problems which governments have had to face. Second, the institutions, the techniques and the means we have had at our disposal traditionally to solve these problems are not working. Third, there is a totally new element involved today with which we have not had to deal before, and that is scarcity of energy resources.

From these three points I would like to draw the conclusion that we have come to the end of an era, and that to get around the frustrations which are bothering all of us—the opposition, the government, and so forth—we have to take a new look at different techniques of solving our problems. I will not spend a great deal of time on the first two points, but I will try to illustrate what I mean in terms of inflation. For the first time in a non-war setting we have worldwide inflation which is serious. I understand that the summit group meeting last summer agreed that, generally speaking, 5 per cent must be a minimum inflation rate. In the industrial countries we have had an inflation rate over the last 100 years of between 1 per cent and 1.5 per cent. The rate went to about 2 per cent during the late sixties, and from 1973 on it jumped to 10 per cent and 12 per cent in this country and in other countries.

The summit group says that a 5 per cent basic figure is going to be common. That is the basic figure to work with, and there is very little we can do about it; we have to work with that figure. That is something we have not had before. I must remind hon. members that 5 per cent means a doubling every 14 years; it means that prices will double in 14 years, and in 28 years they will be four times what they are today. In 42 years they will be eight times what they are today, and so forth. It gets ridiculous. I am explaining this because I think it is important when we deal with energy growth.

There is a large unemployment problem all around the world. I am not just talking about Canada. For those who say that Japan has no unemployment problem, I refer to a couple of points made in the Globe and Mail last week. Only 8 per cent of companies recently surveyed expect any increase in permanent employment. Official statistics show that about one million people are wholly unemployed, but at least two million people are considered redundant by Japanese companies which are unable to dump them. In other words, workers are not fired in Japan; they are just made redundant. It is a kind of unorganized work-sharing. The article also makes the point that the Japanese stock exchange is very sluggish.

The New Democratic Party constantly assure us that everything that happens in Sweden is right. I should like to read a paragraph from The Economist, one of the best magazines in its field. I am not trying to show that Canada is worse, or better, but that the problem is global. Referring to Sweden, The Economist article reads as follows:

> The picture is already bleak. The first half of this year saw Sweden's gnp falling (0.5 per cent) for the first time since 1945, and the total drop for 1977 will be 1 per cent—just as other industrial countries are averaging 4 per cent growth; unemployment (whether the visible 2.1 per cent unemployed, or 6 per cent total if those in subsidized employment or retraining are counted) is rising and inflation (prices are 14 per cent up on a year ago) is accelerating from 10 per cent a year—

This is in a country with a population about one-third that of Canada. The article goes on to say that subsidies to industries in trouble are gobbling up over $2 billion per year, and that the latest devaluation of the Swedish currency was 10 per cent. To say that Sweden, Japan, or any other country in the group I have mentioned, is doing better than Canada is ridiculous. I mentioned the indicators of the OECD. We are first in two, second in a third, and fourth out of seven in the fourth. To say that is a bad performance, or that Canada is in worse shape than other countries, is wrong.

All the industrial nations have the problems of inflation and unemployment, although to different degrees. Traditionally, inflation went up when unemployment went down, and went down when unemployment went up. But today inflation and unemployment are rising at the same time in all these countries. This is not the only area where we find an increasing severe problem. We also find it in government spending. This year, we will have a deficit of around $8½ billion and the Americans will have a deficit of about $60 billion. This is at a time of high inflation. That is another area we do not seem to be able to master.

At the heart of a lot of our troubles, and maybe at the heart of the situation in Sudbury, is the rapid rise in the size and power of multinational corporations. Several good studies have been done in the United States, particularly one by the finance committee of the United States Senate, which show that global corporations control 1½ to twice the amount of the liquid assets of all the national banks of the countries they deal with. Control is not in the hands of governments—Swedish, Canadian, Japanese, West German, the United States—to the extent that it used to be. A good deal of it is in the hands of global corporations. We have a global problem of much greater magnitude than we had in the past.

The second point I should like to make is that our institutions are not working the way they should. Keynesian economics do not seem to be working the way they did. The New Democratic Party has taken a lot of swings at us for not putting enough demand into the economy. They say we only put a very small amount of demand into the economy by means of the last budget. Actually, we put $2.2 million worth of demand into the economy, in the budget as well as through indexing income tax, pensions, etc. It did not create as many jobs as they say the same amount of money will today. It is interesting that much of Canadian income today goes into savings—about five times as much as in the early 1960s. Therefore, if money is put out it does not necessarily go into demand.

We do not just face problems of economics today, but also social problems and stresses. In the community of Thunder Bay, for instance, there has been a great leap in adolescent problems in recent years. Perhaps that has something to do with unemployment, and so on. Recently, I attended a conference of the social planning council of Thunder Bay where the problem of adolescent social misbehaviour was discussed. It is interesting that during the whole evening only one mention was made of the school as an institution. People do not see the schools as the solution to their problems or as having any major effect in solving this kind of problem.

I could go on talking about the fact that the institutions are not working and that we need new techniques, but I should like to deal with the third subject because it is one that concerns me even more than any others. I refer to the growing scarcity of energy resources. When I studied economics at high school and university, I was taught that scarcity was invented by bankers, and that if we could rid ourselves of the notion of scarcity there would be plenty for all. I grew up with the idea that there was nothing more sacred than an ever-growing gross national product; that whether you were a socialist or a capitalist did not matter—growth was what counted. Almost overnight—I have some thoughts on this because I think we were badly misguided—the world was told that there are shortages, that we are going to run out of energy, and that these shortages are going to produce some very serious problems. This is difficult for people to get used to. Have we been lied to, or is this the truth?

I have said in this House, in committee and outside the House, that the National Energy Board was negligent in not giving us fair warning of the danger. I have said it was negligence bordering on the criminal for not telling us long ago what the situation was. We are getting the figures today, but we did not get them in the past. I think this was gross negligence. I do not mind saying this outside the House, Mr. Speaker. I will say it anywhere, because I believe it and the figures will prove it.

[Mr. McRae.]

There are all kinds of ramifications of the energy problem that we must face. We are told by the National Energy Board, and by a global group dealing with the problem on a global basis, that by 1985 Canada will have a shortage of oil roughly 25 per cent of our needs. The cost of oil alone will be about $6 billion. At present, 45 per cent of all the energy used in this country comes from oil, and 20 per cent from natural gas; so we cannot convert to something else very rapidly. A recent study by MIT indicates that this will be a worldwide problem.

We had some negative testimony, which did not refute the statement that I made in committee some time ago, that Saudi Arabian oil will probably run out in about 30 years' time. I made the statement which, again, was not refuted—that my son, who is now 15 years old, when he is my age, that is, 53, he will be living in a virtually oil-less world. The implications of that are horrendous in terms of the whole of our industry which is based on oil, such as the automotive industry, and so on.

There are alternatives, but they are not easy to achieve and they require a tremendous replacement of energy. The gas situation is not as bad, but we can expect a five or ten-year gap between gas and oil depletion. What kind of heritage will we leave to our sons, daughters and grandchildren? If this were just something I had in my mind, or something the National Energy Board had stated—as I indicated, the National Energy Board has not been too accurate in its predictions in the past—we could say, well, this should not be taken too seriously. But there are all kinds of other groups, such as the group which has put out the book called "Global Prospect" this summer, which say exactly the same thing, namely, that we have a massive problem.

The problem is not just in terms of scarcity of oil, but also in terms of scarcity of capital. I am told—I am not able to vouch for the figure—that the James Bay project is using up 50 cents of every capital dollar being used in Quebec today. The capital dollars that are badly needed in the pulp and paper industry to refurbish that industry, to make it more productive, are being used up in an energy project. When we talk about the future of energy capital growth—$180 billion over the next 15 years—in today's dollars, we are saying that 30 per cent, 35 per cent or perhaps 40 per cent of all the capital we will use in this country will be used for energy projects. That means there will be fewer dollars for consumer products. It means that a whole series of things will happen.

I would like to sum up some of these ideas because shortly my time will run out. First, there has been a quantum leap in the problems faced since the war—in the seriousness of problems facing governments. Second, the techniques and simple answers, about which I hear so much from the opposition and which I find so exasperating, are not working. The institutions we have are not working. For instance, some of our institutions have been bureaucratized to the point where they cannot work.

One of the reasons, I suggest, that the schools are not working is that they have become bureaucracies which have had to take on all kinds of other problems besides running the educational system. They have taken on the family, the community, and so on, and so they have ceased to function well. I am saying that our institutions, our techniques, the Keynesian techniques that we use, the social democratic notions that some groups use, are not working at this time and are not likely to work.

Third, we have an element of scarcity of energy in our industrial economy, which could be disastrous. From those three points I am led to believe, very much as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated two years ago this coming January, that we are coming to the end of an age, to the end of an era—an era that has been dominated by the notion of growth. This does not mean that we do not need growth, but we are rapidly coming to the end of this era, dominated totally by growth and in order to solve our problems we must look at new ways of doing things; we must adopt new approaches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: The frustrations which we feel in this House when we come together and shout at each other are caused in part by the fact that there are no simple answers to these problems. The techniques we have are not working.

I think that these frustrations will begin to go away when we start looking at new techniques. What are some of these techniques? I cannot tell you what the new world is going to be like, but I can tell you about some of the things that might happen and some of the things that might work. One of the things that will be coming into existence is a reduction in the size of things—the "small is beautiful" concept. The John Bullock independent business group is talking about this. They are saying that if you are going to be efficient, the best way is to be relatively small. This is not the total global picture, but it is one thing that I think will be there.

I think it will be terribly important that we develop into a conserver society, as opposed to a consumer society. We will still be consuming a great deal, but we must learn to conserve, to cut back on what we are using at this point.

I think we will find many people—I found myself doing so this summer—returning to the land, returning to doing things oneself, returning to growing one's own produce, to using wood from the forest and food from the garden. This may sound fanciful, but in my community of Thunder Bay hundreds of people have moved to the country, to non-agricultural land, to good woodlots, beginning to cut down their cash flow requirements, to consume less and to conserve. Eventually, they will be living practically independently in terms of their economic needs.

We also have to look at—this will be the last point I will make in this respect, because my time is running out—some of the techniques which are not working in terms of creating employment. I do not believe, if we have a 6 per cent or a 7 per cent growth rate—we had one last year of 5 per cent—that we will be able to create the number of jobs that will be required, given the degree labour participation in this country. We have approximately 300,000 people coming on to the labour market each year from schools as opposed to 60,000 in the 1950s. We will not be able to create enough jobs, even with a fantastic growth rate. So I do not think this is the solution in the creation of jobs.

There are two ways we can do it. One is to keep a certain group of society off the labour market permanently, which is one of the things we are doing now when we are saying the unemployment rate among our young people between 15 and 25 years of age is 12 per cent to 14 per cent. The other is to start sharing the work that is available among the people who are available to do the work. It seems to me that the Sudbury situation, which is a very grave one, has all kinds of ramifications.

We have here, essentially, a very strong case for doing some serious work-sharing. That work-sharing should involve three ingredients. First, it should involve a fairly large unemployment insurance fund which would be used in Sudbury, for example, to pay people who are not working. Second, it should involve a very big commitment on the part of INCO, perhaps refunding some of the tax already deferred. Third, there should be a sharing of work among the employees. I know many people in my community told me that, given the fact they have good incomes, they would prefer a four-day week, at the same hourly wage they are earning, than a five-day week. If one went to the individual workers—not to company representatives or union representatives—one would find many people in Sudbury who are well paid, who have a house, a car, a Skidoo—and will be getting a second Skidoo—who are beginning to think that perhaps their life would be better if they had more leisure and that work-sharing in the context of the three elements of industry, government and the worker, may be an answer to this problem.

I repeat what I said earlier. Is it much better to share the amount of work that is available among the people available to do the work, than have one group working for 40 years, eight hours a day and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McRae: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might take a question at this point and let it go at that. I believe I have pretty well made my point. We live in a new age. The answer is to start looking for new ideas, and not condemn each other. If there is a question, I will be glad to take it.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to follow in debate the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae), whom I have always thought of as an optimistic member of this House who looks upon life in a rather cheery way. However, if he was evincing the attitude of this country, more particularly within the ranks of the Liberal party, with regard to the future of this country, his solemn and somber attitude is something with which we should concern ourselves.

We live in a land that is replete with resources and a work force that has shown itself able to rise to challenges. If we must suffer under what he terms a conserver society, where we have to turn up our collars in the face of winds that are temporary, we are in much deeper trouble than we thought. I do not accept, and I hope others in this chamber do not accept, that the future of this country needs to be burdened with the sombre and doleful picture painted by the hon. member for Fort William.

Let us face up to a few things. In his speech today, the hon. member for Fort William said he was appalled at the weak defence of the government. Has it ever occurred to that hon. member that the government is defending weak case, not in terms of the ability of Canadians to come together and meet a difficult situation or crisis, but in terms of the government's involvement in it?

The hon. member mentioned the INCO case. That company, and indeed the whole of the mining industry in Canada, has become the handmaiden of the taxation policies of government. Governments have conveniently looked upon industry in Canada as the place from which they can soak up money with which to operate a whole host of programs. They did not think that when they are taxing and double-taxing, as they have done in the mining industry of Canada—and not just this government but other governments as well—they were removing from those agencies which employ thousands of Canadians their ability to function in competition with other nations of the world.

There are 21 nickel-producing countries in the world. If our taxation policies are so out of line that industries cannot compete—and that is the case with INCO—a lot of the blame must fall at the feet of the federal government as well as other governments. If that is to be the case, is it any wonder we are in trouble in competition in the world with respect to the production and sale of nickel?

What does the government do? Today, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was asked in this House whether the government would consider taking leadership in terms of relieving the burden of taxation on this aspect of the mining industry. What did he say? He said the burden is a responsibility of the province, not his government. That is nonsense. The leadership, change and new approach which the hon. member for Fort William spoke about has to come from somewhere. I suggest the leadership should come from the national government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I listened with great interest to the very eloquent and far-ranging speech made today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson). He said, as did the hon. member for Fort William, that when we look at our position in relation to other countries, we should consider ourselves fortunate. Of course we should. However, that begs the question.

I would be the last to argue that, in terms of a nation which is just emerging in the middle of Africa, we should not consider ourselves fortunate, or in terms of some European nation that has been fraught with economic difficulties. What the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the hon. member for Fort William did not say was that we have moved from second place to ninth place in relation to all the nations of the world. While we can consider ourselves fortunate today, the question that must be in the mind of every Canadian is, why have we made that leap downward? Who was responsible for it? It was not Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, nor was it the New Democratic Party or the Social Credit Party. Those parties have not been in power in this country for ten years. It does not lie in the mouth of the hon. member for Fort William to make that assertion. What has happened is that there has been a failure on the part of this government properly to study or interpret what has been happening in the world; it did not relate its approach to Canada's economic policies in terms of other nations. There is a serious responsibility there which we should take. It does not help the fishermen, the INCO worker, the Newfoundland miner, the linerboard plant employee in Newfoundland, or the thousands of students and young people who over the past five years or more have come to me and other members of parliament, to say that we are as good, or better, than other nations in the world. That is a political cop-out.

The hon. member is correct in saying that we have to take some new approaches. We must look at the way our society is going, and ask ourselves whether we have now reached the point where we are asking too much of government. Is it the job of government to do things for you and for me, or is it the job of government to create an atmosphere where I can start doing things for myself, whether I am a farmer, a businessman or a teacher or whatever. It is not satisfactory to say that all countries have the same problems, because they do not. We have problems in Canada, in terms of our geography, which cannot be overcome by a minister simply making a speech in the House of Commons.

What has been the approach of the government with regard to this matter? Sometimes, in economic terms, in terms of gathering together the elements of this nation to face a problem, the government finds itself at odds with the facts.

● (1632)

The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco), who spoke a few moments ago, mentioned the whole problem of the decentralization of government. There isn't a person in the House of Commons who would argue that it is not a reasonable thing that elements of the federal government ought to be placed in various parts of the country. But no one in the House of Commons, surely—except, perhaps, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien)—would swallow the argument that decentralization must take place because it is going to help employment in particular areas or because it is going to help national unity. Is our unity in this country so frail that the presence of a post office or an agency of government in a particular place is going to be the band-aid or an adhesive to hold it together? Of course not. No one honestly believes that.

This new program has been called expensive, in a period of restraint. It has been called a program of political patronage, and that is precisely what it is. We hear the argument that it is to help unemployment in those areas. What a silly argument that is. Look over the list of agencies which are being transferred. What are those agencies? Technical agencies, scientific agencies, specialized agencies. Are they going to lay-off the experts in these fields and hire others in the local areas? Of course not. They have sent 92 jobs to Cape Breton. The hon. member who represents Cape Breton called it a crumb from the table. Do they envisage that those 92 jobs will be filled down there? Of course not. Three quarters of the people are going to move down there at some personal and public expense and inconvenience. Less than 20 jobs will be taken through local employment in that area. This is the ridiculous part of the program, at a time of restraint.

What we face is a government which operates by cosmetics. Not too long ago, in the last session, I put a question on the order paper asking what studies had been undertaken with respect to the decentralization of the public service. I asked what was the cost per man-year and whether the government had done anything at all except canvas ministers to ask what agencies could be moved. Do you know what answer I received, Mr. Speaker? No studies had been carried out. It was pure politics. There had been no reviews, nothing. Yet they expect us to believe them when they say they are concerned.

In the week after the announcement was made, I had nine public services families come to my office saying, "Mr. Baker, I have a problem, my wife and I have a problem, our children have a problem. We have our aged parents settled here, and nobody told us we would have to disrupt our lives. No one ever told us we would have to sell our house and move somewhere else in Canada, however desirable that place might be. Nobody told us our children would have to interrupt their schooling and move from one province to another, with all the difficulties there are in this country with respect to disparity in educational standards. Yet we are forced to move, we are forced to go, by a government which has not learned the process of consultation."

Moreover, this is a costly process, Mr. Speaker. I believe the riding of the minister of the environment is receiving a scientific laboratory from the Department of National Health and Welfare at the cost of $7 million. The employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been told by officials of the department that it will cost about $7 million to move that laboratory, because they are not consulted very often. That is nonsense. They are consulted. A public servant who spoke to me about it said that right after the meeting there were five calls for information that was required immediately. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what would $7 million do to build a sewage treatment in that area? A lot more than those jobs; a lot more than that government building.

The government has dealt into these issues in terms of cosmetics, and then they ask us to believe they are really serious and they know how to tackle the economic problems of the day. Of course they do not. The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is in the House today. The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) is here today. All of us, it does not matter where we sit, have had problems in terms of the public service. All of us have suffered from the tales told to us of the difficulties which have come upon public servants through the actions of a government which does not care. Every one of us has dealt with human problems as a result of the implementation of bilingualism in the public service. All of us know that careers have been wrecked. All of us know that the merit system had gone out the window. "Merit" is now a dirty word.

What does the government propose? It now proposes to change the policy, so that Canadians who have not had the advantage of growing up in a province where there are two languages spoken and where two languages can be learned, will be effectively barred from the public service of Canada by 1983. We have seen how the government deals with its public servants, how deputy ministers are prepared to go along with anything to satisfy the government, prepared to ruin the career of one man whose name I mentioned yesterday in the House of Commons, Mr. Sant Singh.

How will deputy ministers deal with the positions which are now to be filled on an imperative basis by bilingual Canadians, Canadians who are bilingual at the outset? Are Canadians not going to be given the opportunity of learning the other language? Moreover, Mr. Speaker, we are going to pay bonuses to people who have learned the two official languages—at least, they were supposed to—at public expense. How can any person look at this government and say they are sincere about restraint or about the public service?

Before this House resumed after the recess I called for an independent inquiry with respect to the implementation of bilingualism in the public service. I call for it again today. If the inquiries into the merit system which are going on in the public service with respect to the cost, the problems, the results, the cost-benefits of that implementation, are carried out within the service, then it will be a case of the government examining itself; it will be like putting a weasel in charge of a henhouse. Independence is what is required with respect to this matter.

Over the weekend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) talked about the protection of freedom in this country at a meeting of the rural lawyers of Quebec. He is a personable fellow, and they enjoyed the meeting. He said that in terms of language, which is a serious problem in Canada and which has been his preoccupation, to the detriment of Canada and in many other ways, the lawyers of this country should protect freedom, and one of the things he did not like about Quebec's bill 101 was the following:

We are forbidding French Canadian parents from sending their children to English schools just as 20 years ago Catholic parents were forbidden from sending their children to Protestant schools.

He said, further, that clauses of the province's French language charter which eliminate freedom of choice in language were "a step backwards for freedom". He told his audience that the documents which were produced by Mr. Gordon Robertson at his famous press conference, when he announced that the attack on lack of freedom would be no attack at all, indicated that the bill was reprehensible. It has been called a blot on the legislative landscape of this country. Yet what is his approach? His approach is to do nothing, to let somebody else carry the ball. "Never mind", he says, "I am the keeper of the constitution; let somebody else carry the ball". Never mind that owing to years of delay, feelings will develop in this country that will go a long way to destroy what feelings we have left for one another, which will drive us further apart. I think it is important, Mr. Speaker, that a government act. I think it is important that a government take a chance and go to court. I think it is important that a government do what it asks somebody else to do.

● (1642)

I met Quebec Protestant Home and School Association representatives in Ottawa the other day. They told me that in view of the educational limitations of bill 101, and due to its lack of courage, the federal government seems prepared to allow 1½ million Canadians to rot, in terms of their place in society. The Prime Minister is absolutely right: bill 101 does deny French-speaking Canadians the opportunity to learn English. It also denies English-speaking Canadians in Quebec the right to use their own language as well as French.

Mr. Woolliams: What about the ethnic groups?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) mentions the problems of the Inuit people. I understand an undertaking has been given that in that regard the James Bay Agreement bill would not be proclaimed. That undertaking was given in this House, and I intend to see that that undertaking—which was given to me in the House—is carried out.

There is not one member of this House who is prepared to take any step or to advocate any course which would mean the end of the French language or the French culture in Canada. I am sure there is no member who would want to advocate any course or take any step that would end the English culture in Canada or any other culture that goes to make up the Canadian mosaic. But surely the members of this House cannot sit idly by and in all good conscience approve a course of inaction in regard to the very important question of the right of Canadian parents to educate their children in the language of their choice all across this country.

I would be the first to say there have been differences of approach and timing in regard to the advancement of one province compared with another. That, of course, is wrapped up in the traditions of our country. I think it is improper, that it is really a false argument, to say that somehow British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan is wilfully deficient in educational terms, so far as minority languages are concerned, because their historical development has been different. But there will be no historical development at all if the government is prepared to sit back and to do nothing.

There are examples where governments have moved courageously and the country has withstood that move and has come to admire the government. But there is just no way that we can justify the stand that Quebec, or indeed any other province, shall not have special status, on the one hand, and then have a government, through a language paper, give it that special status.

The hon. member for Fort William spoke of new approaches that are required in the House in regard to financial control not just by the opposition but by the Parliament of Canada. We have a long way to go if we are to return to the House the opportunity of examining government programs and seeking information which the government relies on in advising itself. I would be the last to advocate that parliamentarians who are not members of cabinet should be privy to discussions which go on among cabinet members leading to a decision. On the other hand, I would be the first to argue that the House of Commons and the public of Canada, a pluralistic society in which we fund as well as promote interest groups, should be given information, points of view and expressions of opinion which are submitted to the government in arriving at certain decisions. I think we have to have that. If we do not, then parliament is going to act more and more on instinct rather than knowledge. In view of the complexity of government, this is precisely what is happening today.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) made a good speech in the House the other day, I thought, on what has happened within the bureaucracy, within the public service, and its attitude toward spending. When we examine estimates in this House, Mr. Speaker, we examine them piecemeal. We examine them in a way which actually pushes members of parliament into submitting that perhaps more should be spent on a particular program because it is a good one. But under our parliamentary system we have no opportunity today to examine estimates and government programs in a broad way. I think it is time all members of the House took a look at the machinery that it is necessary to put in place to enable us to contribute to a discussion of financial control over the expenditures of government. This has been lost to us, and should be restored to parliament. There is no machinery in parliament today which enables us to examine estimates in any way other than a piecemeal basis.

I put a proposal to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization in the last session of parliament. It was not taken up and it is still there. The hope was to give us an over-all review so that over the course of an ordinary parliament, Liberal, Conservative, New Democrat and Social Credit members would have an opportunity to examine a department's programs in depth in order to see whether Canadians are getting their money's-worth, to see whether a program is good, bad, or redundant and should be done away with. We do not know this today; such decisions are made one way or the other in the bowels of the bureaucracy.

The bureaucrats are not bad people. They are not indecent people. They are not out to scalp Canada. They are humans, a group of human beings with a particular point of view. We must examine the procedures of the House whereby members, some of whom are very talented, can get themselves into the policy-making process. I recall the immigration bill regarding which options were considered in advance. Parliamentarians travelled the country hearing evidence long before any bill or regulations were drafted. As a result of this process there was a very short debate. A report was produced which to a great extent appeared in the form of legislation.

Too often in our system decisions are made by cabinet and the bureaucracy. When legislation reaches the floor of the House, the government has already made a decision from which it cannot move. As a result, debates in this House become long and acrimonious. I think that problem could be solved and many matters could be dealt with if we decided to change our approach. Many things can be done to deal with this question. We owe it to ourselves and our institution to make the change.

● (1652)

Mr. Douglas Fisher, in a column which appeared in the current issue of The Legion magazine which I see the hon. member for Ottawa West has in his hands—indicated that because of the complexity of our society, our institutions have not kept up. What has happened is that the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the chairman of the Canadian Radio and Television Commission, and the chairman of the task force on national unity, have become more important than this place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the indulgence of my friends. I will not be too much longer. We have to look at our committee system in the House of Commons in a new way. There is one successful standing committee of this House, and that is the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. It is not successful because it is examining the Auditor General's report, but because it has attached to it a staff which is independent of the ordinary bureaucracy. It has attached to it a responsibility which is independent of the government. It has attached to it a reputation of such high order that members on the government side do not choose to be partisan about the work of that committee. The important aspect is that there has been developed for that committee, quite by accident, an independent bureaucracy to assist the committee in fact-finding work. We should develop that approach in order to assist other committees. If our committee system is to function, then that must be done.

There are a number of other requirements which I will speak about in due course. I do not intend to go further into that matter today, except to say that this institution of parliament will go further and further down in the estimation of the people of this country unless it can be given greater pre-eminence than the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or one of the joint chairmen of our national unity bureaucracy. This is a very important matter to which we must soon direct our attention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in a famous 1975 end of the year interview with Carole Taylor and Bruce Phillips of the CTV, said the following:

Some economists say all you have got to do is get back to the free market system and make this market system work. It won't, you know.

But this same Prime Minister, in his economic lecture to members of the House on Wednesday, October 19, had an altogether different line. He had become converted to return to a free market to get us out of our increasing economic difficulties. He said that our prices are too high, and of course the markets of the world set the prices. This he gave as the major reason for our incease in unemployment which, as we know, is by far the highest of any country in the western world.

The serious decline of this country in recent years has been increasingly clear to Canadians and non-Canadians. To those of us who sit in parliament, the Prime Minister is seen as playing a sort of musical chairs with key cabinet appointments. This ultimately reveals the lack of a coherent economic philosophy for the nation. The country is economically stagnating and dangerously drifting, both economically and socially, under the leadership of the Prime Minister. Unemployment, inflation and a general environment of uncertainty is seriously eroding family and business confidence in the future of this nation.

The Prime Minister seemed to come to government in 1968, not only with a special style and charisma but with some sort of serious commitment to a "just society". This attitude has turned into a short-run, sort of seat of the pants, ad hoc reaction to the serious problems facing the nation. The Prime Minister's inconsistency is shown up not only in the general lack of an over-all consistent economic philosophy; it is personified and made clear in the speech he gave us in the House last Thursday, and it is also enshrined in the mini-budget of his new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien).

Let us briefly review that mini-budget. The tax cut announced by the minister will take the form of an increase to $300, from $200, in the minimum amount of a federal income tax credit. It must be noted that this tax benefit will apply only to the current taxation year and will affect more than 7.5 million taxpayers. It is estimated to cost the government approximately $700 million in forgone income.

I think most economists would say that this provision will only be a modest stimulus to the economy. It will bring an increased job-creation program which, along with the further $150 million approved for federal government works projects, will likely create between 30,000 and 40,000 temporary jobs. Given that more than 900,000 expect to be unemployed next year—and it could be easily one million—these programs promise too little.

Under the new mini-budget of the Minister of Finance, basic wage increases will be limited to 6 per cent for new wage contracts covering the coming year. If the government had not revised the wage control regulations, workers would have been entitled to claim increases of up to 8 per cent in the coming year. This cutback from the 8 per cent level to 6 per cent will, among other things, accentuate the squeeze on personal incomes and in turn that is bound to affect consumer spending and the national economy.

The Minister of Finance forecast that Canada would have an economic growth next year, in real terms, excluding inflationary pressures, of 5 per cent, compared with about 2 per cent this year. The effect on consumer spending by going from 8 per cent to 6 per cent, as announced in the budget, will make it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to achieve the 5 per cent real growth rate forecast for next year. We will be very lucky if our growth rate extends to 4 per cent. Given the new entrants into the labour force, the sluggish rate of growth in the economy in the last few years, and expected higher interest rates, we can expect very little, if any, relief for the crisis unemployment situation in this country.

Personally, I am scared that the tax cut announced will not result in as much an increase in spending as the minister had hoped for. Savings deposits at the national level grew by 19.7 per cent in the first quarter of this year, and are continuing at extremely high levels. It is more likely to be recognized as a transitory tax cut and much of it which will be applied to the middle-income earner will probably be saved and not entered into the income-spending stream. If the minister hoped that this type of stimulus would result in long-term increases in demand, which would in turn act as an accelerator for investment plans by manufacturers, he will be very disappointed. As is likely, a good part of the result of the tax cut will come out of current inventories.

The minister mentioned that about $1 million will be approved for an employment credit plan for private corporations. This would be a new approach to job creation in Canada, but this type of approach has been used in other countries. Such an employment tax credit program has to be carefully scrutinized because it is likely to give unanticipated windfalls to firms already planning expansion.

The other side of the question is that there is also danger that some employers will lay off initially too many workers at the time of any given cut-backs, only to hire them back again to take advantage of the employment credit plan. I would think that marginal corporations of medium and small sizes are unlikely to expand in the face of the uncertainties of rising inventories and costs. Experience of other countries has shown that such a plan has not been nearly as successful as it had been hoped.

I am personally pleased that despite the fact that our devalued dollar is in large part due to a mismanaged economy, it will, however, continue to float. Certainly in the last several years our exchange rate has been somewhat over-valued. The continued floating of the dollar should have the over-all result of improving markets for domestically produced goods and a better market for Canada's exports. The price of some important inflation due to the higher price of imported manufactured materials and of consumer imports should be outweighed by the benefits coming from the improved employment prospect the lower dollar carries with it for domestically produced goods, and especially for Canada's exports.

While family allowances are still not indexed, income tax deductions for children under 16 will rise by $30, and for those over 16 to $60. The elderly and those with handicaps will receive an exemption increase of $100 to a maximum of $1,500.

I regret that the government did not see fit at this time to lift wage and price controls in Canada. They are obviously not a long term stabilizing influence on the economy, and the amount of short-term relief in terms of a dampening of expectations has been over-exaggerated.

The country has paid a significant cost in terms of uncertainties and of confrontation between labour, management, and government because of these controls. This, in my opinion, would have been a good time to lift them and to do it quickly and with a minimum amount of phasing out at a time when product markets, as well as labour and financial markets, are weak, and the danger of a post-controls explosion of prices and wages which would create a new round of troubles is at a minimum.

As it stands now workers will be forced to accept the maximum of 6 per cent wage increases when the consumer price index is going to run at 8 per cent or 8.5 per cent in the new year. That is asking for trouble and more confrontation. For the final few months of the existence of the AIB I ask this government to consider exempting the low income Atlantic region from AIB control.

This budget will do little or nothing for poor and low income Canadians whether they live in the Atlantic provinces, Quebec, Ontario, or any of the other provinces. There are not many people in Canada who realize that the lower paid 25 per cent of families in this country are only getting 4 per cent of our national pie, which we call the gross national product or national income, while the highest paid 25 per cent in this country are getting 42.2 per cent. How long do we have to tolerate this in a country which says it is committed to egalitarian principles and to bringing about equality with democracy? I would like to spend more time on this, but obviously, because I have only half an hour, I must move on.

In 1972 the then leader of the New Democratic Party, David Lewis, wrote a book which he titled "Louder Voices". In his book Mr. Lewis analyzed the tax treatment of corporations in this country in recent years, and concluded that it was grossly unfair. It was around this time that the now well known corporate rip-off concerns began to be expressed by our party. Over the post-war period the contribution of the corporate sector toward the financing of public services has considerably decreased in Canada. In 1950 personal income taxes contributed 20.3 per cent to total federal revenues, while corporate income taxes contributed 28 per cent. By 1974 personal income taxes were contributing 37.9 per cent of our federal revenues, while corporate income taxes were contributing only 15.7 per cent.

The essence of our argument, then—and it has not changed because the tax system has not changed, other than to increase corporate rip-offs—is that because of the great power and influence of large corporations, and because of the complexity of the tax system, a succession of federal governments have granted enormous concessions to big business, which have gone virtually unnoticed by ordinary people. We estimate the total annual value of these corporate incentives to be in excess of $5 billion per year, made up of roughly $4 billion because corporations are not required to pay current tax on their current incomes and $1 billion because of corporate rate reductions since 1972.

This is a serious problem for the people of Canada and for rational public policy because it means that a large segment of the government's discretionary financing decisions are not subject to regular scrutiny. Relatively few people are aware of the magnitude of hidden "tax expenditures" involved in the hidden corporate welfare system. Again, the United States—despite the many faults in its tax system—is well ahead of Canada in providing a public accounting of "tax expenditures." Every year a detailed summary of the cost of these tax concessions is presented to Congress.

In Canada no one has a clear indication of the precise cost of corporation tax concessions, apparently not even the federal Department of Finance. It is possible only to estimate the cost based on incomplete information which has been made available through official sources. In 1972 deferred income taxes amounted to $448 million in this country. In 1973 they went up to $959 million, practically a billion dollars. In 1974 they amounted to $1.468 billion. That is the last year about which we know. On that basis it is now believed by us, who have looked at the statistics and studied them, that the annual value of these corporate tax concessions is in excess of $6 billion, an amount equivalent to over 12 per cent of the 1976-77 federal budget. In other words it could be argued that the federal budget is really about 12 per cent higher than the figures which are printed in the annual public statement of the Minister of Finance.

Incidentally, the last available figures in the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act report show those corporation deferred taxes, which are in fact interest-free loans.

By way of digression, can hon. members imagine the average taxpayer, behind in the payment of his taxes to the Department of National Revenue, not being charged interest on his overdue current taxes? None of us could believe that, but it can happen with corporations.

I started to say that the last available figures were for 1974. We can easily project for 1975, 1976 and 1977 that the total amount of deferred taxes for corporations operating in the Canadian economy is between $10 billion and $12 billion. When I hear the Minister of Finance say that he cannot give more income tax breaks to the poor or when I hear, as I did in the House today, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) asking the new Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) where she would get the funds for the beginning of a guaranteed annual income, the thought immediately strikes me—

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not mind the hon. member making reference to me, but I think he should get his facts straight. I never asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) a question about anything. My question was directed to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) whose responsibility it is to save money. I was taken off guard when the Minister of National Health and Welfare indicated she was prepared to look into the possibility of introducing a guaranteed annual income. As usual, the socialists really do not have their facts straight so I thought I should intervene to set the record straight.

● (1712)

Mr. Hogan: I suggest that is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member did not ask the minister I mentioned, he asked the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) where they could get it.

Mr. Alexander: That is better.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is obviously against a guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Hogan: The thought immediately struck me, when I heard this question, that if our corporations, who have these billions of dollars of deferred taxes, were paying a market rate of interest to the government on them, we would have substantial funds to help the poor in a more serious way. Imagine if they had just had to pay 10 per cent on the $12 billion they now owe.

From the figures that I have seen, Mr. Speaker, the years 1973 and 1974 were some of the largest years from the point of view of tax deferrals granted in Canada since corporations were required to report these things. These, of course, were the years when the Hon. John Turner was the Minister of Finance and corporations like Canadian Pacific were allowed $56 million in tax deferrals. I cannot but wonder whether there is not a connection between Mr. Turner's incentives to Canadian Pacific and the fact that he is now a director of that corporation. As minister of finance he certainly showed himself as a great give-away artist to some of the large corporations. He might be forgiven, until you remember that, in order to defer taxes, you must have made a profit to have the taxes to be deferred in the first place. One wonders why the over $1 billion that was given to these corporations in the March budget, as well as all of these tax concessions that I have noted, have not ended up in increased plants and equipment and new jobs in the Canadian economy. One can only conclude that they were added to the cash flows of these companies and were probably used to buy the securities of other companies, and thus increase corporate concentration of wealth without adding much new employment for Canadian citizens.

There is nothing of specific help to the Atlantic provinces in the mini-budget despite the claims of the Prime Minister to the effect that we have received, over the years, large equalization grants, which is undeniable. Despite the effects of various federal regional bodies, from the Atlantic Development Board on through to DREE, there is not much substantial increase in earned per capita income in the Atlantic region. It is true that there was some improvement in the early years of the 1970's in per capital income which has largely been accounted for by increasing transfer payments from the federal government. We do not want more transfer payments, we want earned income. Our people want permanent jobs. They do not want to be continually saddled with high payments for unemployment insurance and welfare payouts.

Mr. Woolliams: And tax the corporations to death so that they cannot pay anybody.

Mr. Hogan: At a Department of Regional Economic Expansion meeting on April 7 I suggested that there is an especially severe disparity in the Atlantic region when you consider that the official figures of the 1971 census showed Sydney's per capita income was only 68 per cent of the Canadian average. For Glace Bay, it was 54 per cent, and New Waterford, in my riding, 48 per cent. Since the Cape Breton development Corporation took over the coal mines from Dosco-Hawker Siddeley there have been two major mine openings and substantial improvements to another major mine, No. 26 in Glace Bay, which produces coking coal which, even without washing, has about one to 1.1 per cent sulphur only. Yet the mines are still losing money, although Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard), in his speech before the 29th Annual Convention of the Coal Association of Canada, at Edmonton, Alberta, on October 3, 1977 said:

> It now appears that as a result of industry and government co-operation, and of new market and technological development, it will be possible to create an economically viable industry by the end of this decade . . . in Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker, Francisco Parra, head of Petroleos de Venezuela, South America, in his speech before the Canadian Gas Association just two weeks ago said:

> . . . in ten years the surplus oil production capacity of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) will gradually disappear as demand rises and additional supplies of oil from outside the OPEC area are not forthcoming in significant quantities . . .
> When this happens, international crude oil prices will again rise steeply, perhaps to as much as $20 a barrel in 1976 dollars.

This same theme has recently been reiterated by many experts on the oil industry, and even the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) reported it recently at a meeting in Paris. I want to suggest very strongly, Mr. Speaker, that a mine started in 1978 in Cape Breton-Glace-Bay-New Waterford area would guarantee that Nova Scotia, which is so heavily dependant on imported oil, would have an assured source of supply and this would definitely guarantee that the Devco coal mines would more than break even from an operational point of view.

If you consider that at least one million tons of coal could be sent up from Sydney through the St. Lawrence to the southern industrial plants of Quebec, this country would literally save hundreds of millions of dollars in oil costs for an $80 million expansion for two new coal mines in Cape Breton. This would give us a total production of about six million tons, add directly at least 1,000 miners to that industry, and bring about an increase of at least another 1,000 jobs as spinoff. We desperately need these jobs, Mr. Speaker.

During the first quarter of 1977 for all of Cape Breton, including my own riding, that of the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir), and that of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen)—who unfortunately has been sick recently and I wish him well—the government paid out $14.8 million, in round figures, in unemployment insurance. For the second quarter it was $13.3 million, for the fourth quarter $9.7 million, with a total payout to date for 1977 of $37,905,000. The number of unemployment insurance claimants in Cape Breton was 13,751 for January, 1977, and 14,221 in March, 1977. Unemployment insurance payments can go from $50 million to $60 million. We do not want that, Mr. Speaker. We want jobs. The jobs can be put there in terms of coal that is needed not only in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia but to offset the imported oil now being used by Abitibi and by cement and other industrial plants in southern Quebec. If money were invested in Cape Breton mines it would save this country millions of dollars later.

I do not pretend to have much expertise with regard to the fishing industry but I know that with all the good that the late Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson did for this country in trying to promote co-operative federalism, he was an over-zealous internationalist, and we in the Atlantic region have paid a price for that. The result of a policy of bilateral agreements with another country was that after 15 years we allowed foreign fleets to come into our waters and to take most of the fish. Mr. Pearson was too much of an internationalist and not enough of a nationalist. It is hard to fault anyone for being too much of an internationalist, but when your basic industry is allowed to deteriorate for 15 years, as was ours in the Atlantic region, one must call a spade a spade.

We are now turning a corner. I agree with the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) who is cautioning against too much development of off-shore fishing until more chance is given to different fish species to grow. It is true that he is considered in the Atlantic region to be too cautious, but I think that with proper planning the mistakes of the last 15 years can be corrected in the next 15.

What I am most concerned about is not only that our offshore fishing be assisted—because there is already a threat of a monopoly developing in Nova Scotia, a situation which I already brought to the attention of the anti-combines branch—but that inshore fishermen be assisted because they make up 90 per cent of all fishermen in Nova Scotia. We must make sure that these independent fishermen and smaller companies are protected and are given a chance to develop. The minister disagrees with me when I say that we need a 50 mile zone to protect our inshore fishermen, but I know, after talking with him, that he is reconsidering his view. I know there are difficulties between inshore and offshore fishermen on this score, but surely it will become increasingly clear, just as the minister said, that delineating a 200 mile zone across the Atlantic will not automatically result in the creation of a new offshore fishing industry. Neither will a 50 mile zone be a magical cure for the inshore fishermen. However, we are asking him to consider seriously whether this is not a sine qua non, a premise that must be accepted, if inshore fishing in certain areas is not to be completely wiped out, as threatens to be the case.

The only other point I would like to make in conclusion is that the Atlantic region especially, but the whole of Canada in general, needs more funding for transportation, particularly railway transportation. If we are to assume that the cost of oil will continue to increase and that gradually, in the next 30 years or so, our resources will be depleted, then it makes sense to put more money into the most labour intensive transportation industry. Railways do not use nearly as much energy as other forms of transportation.

Already the Department of Transport, the utilities in Ontario, the steel industry in Ontario, and the western premiers are getting together to consider whether or not to rebuild the whole railbed from British Columbia through Alberta to the terminal point of Thunder Bay, at an expenditure of some $2 billion in the next ten to 15 years. I suggest that the same thing should be done in the Atlantic region up to Montreal, and that over the next ten years we should put in $1.5 billion to help stabilize the rail plant in Sydney and the rail car plant at Trenton, Nova Scotia, which would have an important effect on the port of Halifax through the movement of goods to central Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to commend the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Their responsibilities were attenuated since the speech as such is a summary of good intentions. What will be interesting is the forthcoming pieces of legislation.

In last Friday's issue of Le Droit, I read a comment from a journalist, Mr. Lacombe, who summarized his views more or less in the following words:

The Speech from the Throne: What Next?

To the extent that the Speech from the Throne informs us that the government's intentions are to improve the economic situation and maintain national unity, it is certainly a valuable document. To that extent, it is even a noble document . . . Anyhow, it does not really matter and it is of little significance that the Speech from the Throne smacks of electoral opportunism, as many have said. What really matters, once again, is the work that will be done throughout the session which has just started.

Of course, that is what matters most. As other people, I have noticed that the speech often mentions the unemployment problem, and rightly so because this is the main problem Canada is faced with just now. I should like to quote a particular comment which I found most interesting:

The suffering which is currently the consequence of unemployment in Canada is seriously disquieting. It is neither fair nor admissible that so many men and women should be deprived of the dignity of gainful employment, and unable to meet their financial obligations and make plans for their future in a climate of confidence. It is not tolerable that so many people should be deprived of their rights to a useful and assured livelihood and that their families should carry the unfair burden of worries, uncertainties and deprivations. Unemployment is now, on a national scale, a very serious impediment to economic growth.

That is certainly a most beautiful way of putting it. However, I remember quite well that in its Speech from the Throne of February 27, 1974, the government stated:

Other measures will be taken to increase production and employment through providing workers with improved access to available jobs, and employers with improved access to Canada's manpower. These steps will relate employment policy, immigration policy and the activities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

In the throne speech delivered in 1972 which I have on hand, the following can be found:

Unemployment continues to be a matter of intense concern to the Government and will remain a primary focus of attention and action. Co-operation with the business and industrial communities will be extended even further to ensure a favourable business climate. As the economy continues to gain momentum, the private sector will be able increasingly to provide jobs for those Canadians.

Those years have elapsed and we are now facing conditions which I do not have to describe. Everybody is aware of it. The number of unemployed is gradually increasing and that is getting alarming. Yet our ancestors had to fear famines as a result of bad crops in some areas. They did not have the means of transportation we have. Today there is plenty, or there can be plenty provided we know how to use it. The forces of nature man has harnessed are multiplying goods while increasingly reducing his direct participation in the production process. Progress increases the number of goods while reducing the number of producers, and yet it is felt that only the producers should be entitled to the products.

It seems that since we get plenty with little work, man should have abundance while enjoying more leisure. Yet nobody has even found how to provide everybody with the necessaries. We have a long way to go. We have plenty in production but scarcity in distribution. Why? Is that a natural law? Not at all. That is not even a law, that is a convention set by men, convention which could do during centuries of labour and scarcity, but which can and must be changed to adjust the economic order to the present historical situation. That convention set up as a law by masters of money and profiteers of the system is running against the progress which it is deterring. It is inhuman because it makes man become the slave of money and keeps him in an unjustifiable state of deprivation.

It is the cause of both immense physical and spiritual sufferings. In a society which distributes its benefits to such an extent in proportion to work, the situation of the poor is both terrible and inexcusable.

In order to meet the difficulties faced by low-income people, we should first of all establish a plan which would guarantee them at least the minimum income above poverty level. No other measure is more urgent. It is unfortunate that no real guaranteed income program, no real legislation establishing the guaranteed income for everyone is put before Parliament. We have been hearing about this for 10 years or perhaps for more than this, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) sometimes suggests programs she intends to implement; this is a beginning but still far from being real guaranteed income legislation. This should exist in a country like ours which keeps pouring its wealth outside; I am not against this as I am prepared to help those who are in a difficult position, but we should be intelligent enough to organize here in Canada a system of life which would enable all citizens to look to the future with a little more confidence.

I will deal again with the unemployment problem since it was mentioned on several occasions in the Speech from the Throne. We have seen that after collating and studying various statistics on occasional, sectorial, seasonal and temporary unemployment, we now have permanent unemployment. Bill C-27 has been passed. It is a strange combination of commissioners, officials and consultants whose task seems to be a redefinition of duties and a reappraisal of the goals to get more jobs for Canadians. We wish good luck to all those who will assume administrative responsibilities in this combination. However, I am afraid this will not change the meaning of a number of provisions of the law as well as the regulations which the personnel of National Revenue, another group, use to disqualify unemployed people who experience problems with job insurability.

An employee is now required to pay back $2,500 to $3,000 benefits he has received. But the commission had found him eligible and paid him benefits.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): After he was found eligible!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Yes, and after some kind of summary inquiry they decided to refer the case to income tax officials and told him: "This is unfortunate, but your job was not insurable, so you must pay back the overpaid amount."

Let us put ourselves in the place of the unemployed who, after receiving benefits because he was unemployed, is being asked by the commission to pay back. But here is something worse still. He should at least have been told after the first month so he could try and get welfare. But at that time he was eligible and he got the benefits. This is quite normal in view of current circumstances, but after one year he is told he had no right, he must pay back all that money.

I have cases in my office. Anybody can check them, I will be quite happy to show that this is absolutely accurate. I appeared many times before the Federal Court. Fortunately I met very sensible judges, including one of our former colleagues here, Mr. Justice Dubé, who is now a member of that court. He realized by himself that this was unbearable, these jobs were insurable. A citizen from Saint-Jean-de-Dieu, a gentleman outside my constituency who comes to see me on occasion, was refunded $3,120 one month ago. He had been forced to borrow from his caisse populaire to survive after being denied unemployment insurance benefits because his job had been found uninsurable.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): This is senseless and should be changed. What with those irrational requirements about searching for a job, the unemployed worker should go on meeting serious difficulties. The unemployed is required to stay next to his telephone in case some bureaucrat in the manpower centre calls him. He is required to phone every possible place where some employer might need his services. He is required to go outside his community, otherwise he is told he is restricting his work opportunities to his community. He has to spend part of his benefits to move 25, 30 to 50 miles around his residence looking for non-existing jobs.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Even when they know there are no jobs!

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Yes, because there are civil servants at the manpower centre, good guys. There must be good workers among them; they are paid regularly for that. Now, in my area there are two or three manpower offices. Those people are there to make inquiries, to dig up information, to find out from the employers if jobs are available. The Unemployment Insurance Commission says: you must also go to the manpower centre. And if they don't go, then they are disqualified: You should have gone. And if the fellow says he did go, he is told that that is not enough, that he should have gone to see other employers. It just does not make sense.

Here is what goes on in my area, in particular, the one I represent here in this House. I quote, with some reluctance, an editorial published in my local paper, dated August 17, 1977. It is fairly recent, I quote:

EXODUS AND UNEMPLOYMENT NO LONGER TO BE ENDURED

He tries to make somebody budge so that people can earn their living in their own area. I quote again:

For almost a hundred years now several generations of young people in eastern Quebec have had to leave their own areas to seek elsewhere in Quebec, in Canada and even abroad, the employment from which depends their sustenance and their future.

In the last few years, in this area, in even larger numbers than ever before our educated youths have left school to find themselves in a regional labour market without any job openings. That also explains the fact that these young people must leave their homes in ever-increasing numbers to find employment.

We must stop a moment to look at the grim reality: the old saying that in our region a young man who wants employment has to leave has never been truer for our youth in eastern Quebec in 1977. Amazingly enough, such "institutionalized" emigration seems thus far to always have been accepted as an inescapable phenomenon. The surest way for governments to fight that exodus from economically depressed areas would be the provision of financial and technical assistance to resource development cooperatives and other community development agencies which aim at fighting economic stagnation and enabling people to make a decent living where their roots are.

The foregoing article was published on August 17, 1977, in Le Saint-Laurent.

I wish I had more time available to me to put it all on the record, it is so interesting. Of course, one hesitates to try and really seek ways of curbing unemployment just because our system is faulty, our financial system is both corrupt and corrupting. When one tries to do something to curb unemployment one brings back inflation. So one is faced with two evil twins—unemployment and inflation. And the government, even if it is made up of a lot of intelligent people, at least people with big degrees, does not seem to find solutions.

The fight against inflation has resulted in increased unemployment. We were told, we saw, and we are told that controls were a lot more effective in controlling the salaries of workers than consumer commodity prices. That is so true that government jugglers are not thinking about ways of making the best out of a bad situation they helped create by preparing a period of decontrol.

That is playing with words, there is no doubt about it. About Bill C-27, I would like to point out, for example, that I find the amendments contained therein are reasonably based on common sense. I should have said Bill C-24, the Immigration Act. It gave the department the opportunity to announce that immigration would be better supervised to avoid the situation where new immigrants would contribute to increasing the rate of unemployment in Canada. It is a somewhat late decision but it is based on common sense.

There is another very important point I would like to make in this debate, and it has to do with working relations which are still very deficient. During the session just ended we had glaring examples of what we should never be forced to do. However, we did it. I am talking about the legislation to send striking workers back to work after passing legislation giving them the right to strike. Those are examples of flagrant contradiction that should be absolutely avoided. We should still have enough foresight to develop a rational allocation system for existing resources, without resorting to strikes when thousands of unemployed want to work.

The agricultural sector should not be neglected either. We know what has happened there in these past few years. I therefore draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), so he may use all means available to him to regularize a situation which is complicated by all kinds of jurisdictions, both federal and provincial. All kinds of things are happening but in the final analysis those producers whom the government once encouraged to produce do not receive the subsidies they can rightly expect.

Agricultural legislation oriented somehow or other, not always in the right direction, which resulted in an ever decreasing number of producers. Imposing a fine upon those who produce too much is not the best way to encourage production, at least I do not think so. There is a problem of distribution of benefits which should be granted to dairy producers. As a result of some jurisdictional disputes, a large number of producers who would otherwise be eligible are deprived of subsidies. This issue of legal difficulties should be solved, however so that those who have listened to government authorities asking them to increase their production become eligible.

I have also noted that the Speech from the Throne deals with an issue which is of great concern at present among the Canadian people—national unity. A lot of things were said in this regard and this issue is referred to on every possible occasion.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): What is national unity?

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): Of course, I, for one, would prefer the words "national harmony" but the fact remains that the Speech from the Throne deals with national unity. I will quote in particular this excerpt:

The government dedicates itself profoundly . . .

Of course, the government is taking all the steps it can.

. . . to the re-discovery of the spirit of unity.

Can you imagine they do not even have any spirit of unity. It is essential and it is time to discover it.

It wishes to learn from all who are interested in Canada and who have thoughts on how it can be made a better place in which to live.

First, I would advise those who are looking for a spirit of unity to direct their research work to introducing legislation to allow the present generation of Canadians, who inherited from those who have colonized Canada and have given them the country they are living in at present, legislation that would allow them to live as heirs and not in debt as they are at present.

Following the political events of November 1976, the debates have too often concentrated on national unity. One should not forget problems like unemployment, inflation, even though I think this word has been coined to try and offer an easy explanation to financial difficulties. One should not forget all the other problems we face and engage in a debate with a government leader because of the elections of last fall, about which too many people have been uselessly seething with excitement. Let us establish a suitable legislation for Canada, and this problem of unity, of harmony will be automatically settled. When people are happy, there is obviously no trouble, but we must start our job so that Canadians can be happy in their country.

I think it would be wiser to pass legislation which would allow Canadians of each province to live like genuine heirs, as I said before, and I say it again, as genuine heirs instead of being constantly in debt, by the establishment of a fair sharing of the resources with which Canada is so generously endowed. History decided that we would live together on this territory. It is inconceivable that Canada, which is the product of a long lasting collective work, could go suddenly all to pieces. We can foresee occasional events which will prevent such a catastrophe. The province of Quebec belongs to the whole of Canada, and Canada belongs to Quebecers as well as to the citizens of the other provinces of the confederation. Canada needs Quebec to keep its identity, and Quebec needs the rest of Canada to keep its own.

● (1752)

I shall close my comments with a brief passage from an article by Jean-Marc Poliquin published in the newspaper Le Quotidien of May 14, 1977, in which the author reported words spoken by Mr. Gordon Robertson during a speech before graduates of Dalhousie University in New Brunswick.

French Canadians will perhaps risk poverty to recover their dignity. A proud people cannot be bought—

I believe I still have time to express my convictions in these circumstances. I have followed as much as possible and as closely as possible the debates of federal-provincial conferences where people have always talked about the allocation of taxation powers. Finally, this is nearly always the subject that is discussed during those conferences.

I have here the text of the federal-provincial conference of January 14, 1941, I repeat, 1941! At that time, the British Columbia Premier, Mr. Pattullo, and I could mention premiers from other provinces, said the following:

Money, of course, is at the root of this whole question. While monetary measures should be based upon the productive capacity of our people, the productive capacity of our people can be amplified by wise monetary measures and other considerations.

Those were the words of the premier of British Columbia at the time.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Was he a Liberal, a Conservative or what?

Mr. Dionne: I think he was a Liberal.

I shall come back to a Social Credit premier of the time, because we must not forget that this premier, whose speech at the federal-provincial conference has already been quoted, Mr. William Aberhart, became premier of Alberta in 1935, in the middle of an economic crisis, at a time when a certain party made up the governments of all the provinces and of Canada. At that time they had no answer to give to those who wanted advice on various means which would help create new activities for Canadians. But the answer was always the same: not enough money. That had always been their regular response, their classical answer. The premier of the Province of Alberta used to say, back in 1941, talking about the British North America Act, as I stated before, that problems of unity, of harmony and diversity would quickly be solved if all Canadians could rest assured that they could live and shape their future according to their desires.

I will now quote you the remarks made by the premier of Alberta:

I do not believe that the British North America Act, or confederation, or whatever you like to call it, has been responsible since that time for the three D's which have marked the industrial history of some of our provinces—I mean,

[Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska).]

decadence, debilitation, and death. I do not believe that confederation was the cause of these things, but I avow—

And at this moment he was addressing himself to the man who has always been the president of such conferences, namely the Prime Minister of Canada.

. . . sir, that something has been responsible for the awful plight that has settled upon the provinces. I notice sadly that the Ethiopian is still at large; the blight continues.

And he said further, and I quote:

Now, what is the job of each of us at this moment?

And at this point, I remind you that all the premiers of the provinces were together with the Prime Minister of Canada.

Is this conference a ration line, where we are to receive our dole, or is it a place in which each must grab all that he can to carry away with him? Is it not rather a conference to which we are privileged to bring, for the benefit of the Canadian nation, the combined gifts of thoughtfulness, wisdom, foresight, vision, tolerance and understanding with which we Canadians may be endowed?

Is this not our golden opportunity to lay the foundations for the never-before realized gifts of fraternity, freedom, equality of opportunity, and, what is also important, financial security? We are here, honourable chairman and gentlemen, I take it, to make it possible at some near future date to formulate for Canadians a series of decisions which will give them security in old age and the right to enjoy, according to their needs, the abundance of food and clothing and the comforts of adequate and sanitary shelter which the limitless resources of this great dominion can provide. We are here, I assert, to establish a heritage of education for those who seek to learn; of health for those who suffer pain or disease; of security and deliverance from debt for those who have built homes in their prime of life and who may face eviction and the loss of their sacred firesides when the lean years descend.

I conclude that quotation from the Social Credit premier—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired unless there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Continue!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dionne (Kamouraska): I thank my colleagues for that courtesy. I have almost finished my remarks. What I have to say is very important. It reminds me of historical facts and we are presently discussing the problems arising from confederation, adopted regulations, discussions that first ministers had at various stages of our history. I quote the premier from a province which succeeded in repaying its debts, the only province which repaid its public debt under the scheme of things we have presently. I quote the remarks of that premier and I conclude that quotation by saying:

We are here, I believe to draft a scheme of things for the Canada of the future, a scheme of things which will bring to that Canada a standard of justice which shall place human values above dollar values, a scheme of things that will provide for our fighting heroes when they return a standard of national viewpoint which shall not only recognize, as you have publicly stated . . .

—desirable and financially possible.

. . . which shall further decree that that which is physically desirable is financially possible . . .

If the people who were present at that conference, from the Prime Minister of Canada on, had directed legislation we could have reorganized the wrong financial system in which we are struggling. We are asked to make suggestions, to help rediscover unity. As Mr. Aberhart pointed out at that time, the only way to foster real unity and national harmony is to provide every Canadian with the opportunity to make a decent living. That is the only way we will find our way back to unity. The Canada Gazette lists all bankruptcies between April 1 and May 30, 1977. There are hundreds, thousands of them and they are caused by an inadequate financial system which we are suggesting should be changed.

Mr. Lefebvre: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to participate in this important debate. First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpèque (Mr. Wood) the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I believe they have both delivered excellent speeches. They are very representative of their constituents and of this great country, Canada.

[English]

Although I could have spent the time allocated to me on broad national subjects, I have chosen instead to bring to the attention of this House, once again, the major concerns of my constituents on a local basis.

[Translation]

The issues of most concern to the citizens of this large constituency which includes about 50 municipalities from three provincial counties, Pontiac, Gatineau and Labelle, are related to the economy, and wherever they live, most of them are more interested in the possibility of job creation than in anything else. Certainly, they are concerned about the future of our province and of our country, but I am under the impression that the majority feels there are many things to be done in order to improve the living conditions. I should like, Mr. Speaker, to draw the ministers' and the members' attention to several questions of concern to this population.

[English]

The main concern over a large part of Pontiac in the last few years has been the future of Hilton Mines and its employees. This mine, which employed 350 persons at full production, has closed down its operations since this spring. Valiant efforts were made by a lot of people to find solutions in trying to keep the mine and mill in operation.

On March 27, 1974, when rumours of its closing became more and more numerous, I called a meeting to initiate discussion on the future of the mine and its 350 employees. This meeting was held in the county building in Campbell's Bay, and interested persons from the union, company, municipalities and the federal and provincial governments discussed the problem in depth. As a result two committees were set up: one to study industrial questions, and the other for manpower questions. Both these committees accomplished a great deal in bringing to both levels of government the facts and the seriousness of the situation. However, due to market conditions and cost of production, and in spite of many efforts made to find ways of continuing its operations, the mine finally had to close down completely.

All of us involved in the discussions which took place are of the opinion that the site on which the mine and the pellet mill are located would make an ideal site for an industrial park. The SAO, or Western Quebec Development Corporation, is preparing a report on this possibility. Being within an hour's drive from the Hull-Ottawa area, there is hope that new industries could be located there, helping to rebuild the economic base by providing job opportunities.

● (2012)

Modern highways and access roads for development of forest resources, tourism and other industries are of continuing interest. The citizens of the area are still waiting for the provincial government to decide finally to build a connecting road to link Pontiac County and Témiscamingue County. Many times in past years I have had opportunities to bring this to the attention of federal officials, including the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard). His department is ready to study a proposal from the Quebec government if it is presented under a federal-provincial program. I am sure it will be received in Ottawa with a great deal of interest. As everyone knows, the Canadian government could pay up to 60 per cent of the cost, if such a road project is put forward by the Quebec government on a cost-sharing basis.

[Translation]

The possibility of opening the Ottawa river to pleasure boats from Montreal to Témiscamingue is another project in which I earnestly believe, since a study requested by the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) and myself has shown that such a project, once carried out, will have a tremendous economic impact in that region through direct job creation in the tourist industry and related services. People in that area have shown their support of and their interest in that project at three public meetings, and all municipalities, through resolutions, have supported my colleague and myself. I will pursue my efforts in that direction in the hope that the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) will also endorse such a project and that the specifications to circumvent the major obstacle between Lake

Deschênes and Chats Lake will be drawn up soon because it is the key to this whole tremendous project which, if carried out, would open a vast historical river to thousands of tourists who would like to explore it and holiday on its shores.

Mr. Speaker, the expectations of the people in the northern areas of Gatineau and Labelle were partly met when it was announced that the federal and provincial governments had signed agreements to improve the system of roads. There is no doubt that a modern highway from Sainte-Agathe to Abitibi, through the northern areas of Labelle and Gatineau, will have major economic effects, and this announcement might in turn generate a series of investments to create still more jobs. The announcement that an access road would be built between Témiscamingue and Maniwaki by the Ottawa and Quebec City governments, under a shared-cost program, has caused much enthusiasm, for this road will make resources more accessible and attract a greater number of tourists to a large area which is already famous for its lakes and forests. I suggest, however, that this road is but a link in the chain of similar roads which are most needed between the counties of Pontiac, Témiscamingue and Gatineau, which I have indicated to the Standing Committee on Regional Economic Expansion. We are counting on similar announcements within the next few years, so that the rural area on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River may finally be endowed with the installations which are necessary for its economic development; this area is rich in natural resources, and the projects which have been announced are the first of several for which the people had been asking for a long time.

In order to bring new jobs in that area, a lot of people are interested in the establishment of a federal penitentiary, and applications by Maniwaki, Grand-Remous and Mont-Laurier are now being considered by the Department of the Solicitor General of Canada. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I have taken personal interest in this matter for a long time and I agree with the fact that the establishment of such a penitentiary, with the permanent jobs it would create, would be very profitable to this area; if built, it would serve the whole Outaouais district, Abitibi and northern Laurentians.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Pacific made an announcement in May saying that they intended to ask the Canadian Transport Commission permission to abandon its railway service between Hull and Maniwaki and, a short time ago, the section between Sainte-Agathe and Mont-Laurier.

I immediately spoke against this and I am very pleased to see that the citizens in my area reacted at once through their mayors, aldermen, chambers of commerce, etc. I think that a lot of people will attend the public hearings in which the demands of the Canadian Pacific will be examined and that valid reasons will be put forward to prevent the abandonment of these lines. Instead of discontinuing its service, the Canadian Pacific should examine and find means to improve it. The citizens of this area feel that the Canadian Pacific has done nothing for years to maintain, improve or modernize its equipment and that this is why users become increasingly scarce. So we begin to have a vicious circle: less service, fewer users and fewer customers, still less service until complete discontinuation.

The Canadian Pacific could also restore its passenger service in the area for people residing in the rural part of the Ottawa area and who go every day to Hull or Ottawa to work, with a service in the morning and in the evening and further trains on weekends for skiers and other sportsmen and for the numerous visitors.

This is not the right time for the Canadian Pacific to think of discontinuing its service but rather to think of offering an ever more efficient service to the people of this area, a service which meets the needs of modern life. These lines are very important. If they are abandoned, this will have very adverse effect at the very moment when economic development attracts more and more interests.

[English]

The need for more industry in this vast constituency is apparent, and I am happy that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has always studied with care the applications submitted by interested persons for grants. The area eligible for grants was enlarged during the past year, and new efforts are being made to enlarge it once again. DREE has played in the past and will in the future continue to play an important role in the expansion of job opportunities in this area.

Agriculture continues to occupy an important place in the economy of the region. More and more beef production is taking place, and there is a well established dairy industry supplying both industrial and fluid milk. I sincerely hope that the quarrels between Ottawa and Quebec on the hold-back of subsidies is solved soon. I do not believe the producer should bear the financial burden of seeing his payments lowered and millions of dollars being held in trust by the Quebec Federation of Milk Producers until the quarrel is settled. This is a constitutional question, and a way must be found to pay the producer the fullest amount possible until a solution to the question of jurisdiction is found.

Discussions are also taking place in various areas of the constituency as to the feasibility of establishing a slaughter house and sale barn so that local beef producers could have an outlet in their own district operated by themselves on a co-operative basis. I congratulate these people and, if plans do go ahead, I am sure officials of Agriculture Canada and DREE will listen carefully to any requests for aid.

There is great potential in the constituency of Pontiac for development in the fields of agriculture, tourism, forestry and industry. I will continue to support valid propositions to help expand the employment base in every section of Pontiac.

Earlier in this speech I mentioned the need for modern highways and access roads because they are very important to the future of my area. Hon. members will recall that in 1972 the NCC and the provincial government signed an agreement to upgrade all the highways in Quebec within the national capital region. Great strides were made in extending a modern highway 148 from Wyman to Hull and a new one from Hull toward Wakefield on a shared cost program between the two levels of government. However, the new provincial government has blocked further construction of these two highways. I believe this is a backward step; everyone knows how badly they are needed. Over the years I have brought this need to the attention of the NCC officials many times, and no one applauded more than I did when the 1972 agreement was announced. I trust that the government of Quebec will reconsider this decision and that construction will start again soon on both of these important highway links.

● (2022)

Another program which has had great success in the area, Mr. Speaker, is rural RRAP, the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, to upgrade the homes of residents of Canada's rural areas. This program, financed by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation through loans and grants, has permitted the upgrading of many homes in the designated municipalities occupied by low and middle income families.

Not only are the homes made more comfortable and habitable, but jobs are created in the homes being repaired as well as in the manufacturing of building materials and sales outlets.

I trust that the government will continue this program until all the municipalities become eligible and have an opportunity to benefit from it.

[Translation]

Over the long term, Mr. Speaker, there are a whole series of projects that can help create jobs in that area. Over the short term, Canada Works Program, the LIP program, has had considerable success in the past and should again this year thanks to many projects from one end of the riding to the other. The millions of dollars recently spent have created hundreds of jobs while helping with the building of many community, municipal and other centres, and offering numerous services previously non-existent in those areas.

To hon. members who do not believe in those programs and who think that people are less interested in them, I should like to say that the second phase of the Canada Works Program has attracted this year more applications than ever before; at the present time, there are 151 applications for a total amount of $6.7 million though the budget for the riding has been set at $2.5 million only. Inevitably, many good projects will have to be turned down or cut down for lack of funds, despite the fact that the budget was increased this year to $2.5 million. Fortunately, there is a third stage and those who wish to make an application can do so until January 27, 1978.

These programs have a considerable effect in a rural environment and I congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and the government for introducing them. I shall continue to support and defend them and I will do my best to make the minister more aware of the needs of the people of this riding.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the topics I have referred to in this speech demonstrate clearly that local people are concerned with a lot of projects. They are also concerned with the future of their province and its position within Canada, but when one is looking for employment, one has understandably less time to think about the constitutional issue. Most are federalists and quite willing to settle the constitutional issue as soon as possible for it is obvious that the atmosphere created by the Parti Québécois does not contribute to the discussions of industrial expansion or other matters.

I am not among those who think that separatists could disappear forever in a full employment situation, but the unemployed can wonder about their future in this country, Canada, and whether federalism is contributing to unemployments or if it helps in this regard. I am quite sure most of them feel it is helping a lot.

[English]

National unity, Mr. Speaker, is everyone's business and I encourage and applaud all those persons in my constituency who are participating in movements to promote it. I am sure we shall beat back the separatists, but vigilance is the password and every citizen must participate fully in the debates ahead.

Canada was founded by our forefathers with belief and trust; we must not let it fall by disbelief and mistrust.

[Translation]

If Canada ever needed willing people who have confidence in their future, it is today. I am convinced that most Quebecers have such confidence and will do their duty for the sake of the future of a united country.

[English]

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to add my name to those who have congratulated the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) on the capable manner in which they moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I should also like at this time to express my own appreciation, and I am certain I speak on behalf of my constituents as well, for the honour that Her Majesty bestowed on Canadians in general, and parliament in particular, by gracing us with her presence in our nation's capital during her Silver Jubilee Year and by so eloquently reading the government's Speech from the Throne.

Although the pageantry surrounding the Speech from the Throne is always exciting and most impressive, particularly with the presence of Her Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, the intent and promise of the words cannot be taken seriously if based on former speeches under the jurisdiction of this administration. There is a sense that one has heard it all before. Indeed, when I witnessed the Speech from the Throne as a new member of parliament some five years ago, I was impressed and excited with the multitude of promises made and the many words exulting success and hope for Canada and Canadians in every field and every walk of life.

Unfortunately, my naive glimmer of expectation at that time was short lived and my hopes shattered as I quickly realized that what this administration outlined in the Speech from the Throne was merely a series of hollow words outlining false expectations of which very few, if any, were to materialize.

That Speech from the Throne five years ago was not an isolated incident. One can simply look at the record of subsequent Speeches from the Throne and budgets, as well as Liberal campaign promises, and conclude that time after time the present government has not lived up to its promises. It continues to make promises and continues to break them to the point of misleading the public. We do not have to go back five years in order to prove that.

I am sure all hon. members remember the last election campaign with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) swearing up and down that income and price controls were not an effective way to battle inflation, and saying that it was very wrong indeed of the official opposition to advocate a 90-day price control program. It should be remembered that it was a 90-day program we were proposing. After the Prime Minister received his mandate, overnight he saddled Canadians with the most stringent and incomprehensible wage and price controls program imaginable. In fact the government was so unorganized that it has taken over two years for it even to consider decontrols. Even today an aura of uncertainty exists in this regard. There are dozens, in fact hundreds of examples of unkept promises and examples of deceit by the Prime Minister and his government. Some of them, like controls, are premeditated indeed but, in fairness, I must also add that some are made, I am sure, inadvertently.

Members will recall the memorable occasion less than two years ago when the Prime Minister, on national television, told the nation in all seriousness, and I assume in good faith, that one of the main causes of domestic inflation was excessive government spending. He went on to outline a strict program of reduced expenditures by his government. People were happy to hear the Prime Minister taking government spending so seriously. Indeed, members on both sides of the House were pleased with the promises the Prime Minister made to the public at that time.

Unfortunately, once again this did not come out the way the Prime Minister promised. The government's budgetary deficit in the fiscal year 1976-1977 alone totalled $6.3 billion, a growth rate of more than 50 per cent over the previous year, hardly a figure reflecting the government's promise of restraint. Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) himself is unable to forecast an improvement in this regard, although the throne speech in a number of places makes reference to government restraint. A predicted deficit of $9 billion this year and $12 billion next year, a prediction that is made by the government itself, is not much restraint.

One can also recall the Prime Minister's famous phrase which has been repeated quite often but which I want to quote again. This is what we are still talking about today. The Prime Minister said, "We will wrestle inflation to the ground". Not only has this not been accomplished, but indeed today our inflation rate is somewhere around 8.4 per cent and rising, far from the projected 6 per cent figure, which makes a sad commentary on the Prime Minister's famous quote. Now the Prime Minister has reversed his position and is blaming everyone but himself and his cabinet for the growing inflation.

The Prime Minister of any country must be trusted and respected when he comes out with statements, and the ones I have quoted are but a few of the kinds which our Prime Minister has been making. Limitation in time will not permit me to refer to all the unkept promises he and the Liberal administration have made over the past years, but it is becoming increasingly difficult for Canadians to trust and respect this Prime Minister after observing the record of his leadership. How can we respect him when recently, in reply to students in Toronto concerned about future employment possibilities in Canada, in a question and answer period—I am sure hon. members recall this—the Prime Minister said "If you don't like it here, you can leave the country and go elsewhere"? This country can no longer afford to have a leader of that calibre.

Let me sum up my feelings in this regard by quoting a recent editorial in one of Toronto's daily newspapers which concluded with the following paragraph. It is from an issue just last month. The paragraph reads:

> The whole mess contributes to the conviction that Trudeau is the worst Prime Minister in our history and the person, more than any other, who is destroying Canada. He has to go—for the sake of our country . . .

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: Name the newspaper.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Davenport Times. You remember that.

Mr. Jelinek: I see I have woken up the members opposite. They do not like to hear the truth.

I will talk about the Prime Minister a bit longer and upset hon. members opposite a little more when I try to tell them a few more things which they are trying to forget. The economic situation in which Canada finds itself, as well as the situation with regard to national unity and our whole way of life, cannot make the Canadian public forget what this Prime Minister has been doing to this country and where he has been leading it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Before I leave the subject of the Prime Minister for more pleasant subjects I would like to place on the record, if I may, some background documentation which is not new. It has been printed in the past. It was researched by former RCMP undercover agent Patrick Walsh and printed in the Canadian Intelligence Service publication, prior to his becoming the Prime Minister of Canada in 1968.

An hon. Member: Not again!

Mr. Jelinek: I will attempt to be brief and outline in point form some of the background of the individual who has probably become the most powerful leader and Prime Minister in our nation's history.

An hon. Member: Say this outside the Chamber.

Mr. Jelinek: I will say it both inside and outside the House, if the hon. member wants me to.

I will quote from this document some of the background of the right hon. gentleman who is now our Prime Minister. It reads:

1940: booted out of the Canadian Officer Training Corps (COTC) during the war for lack of discipline.

1941: associated with anti-war and red supported Bloc Populaire in undermining war effort.

Mr. Boulanger: Aren't you ashamed of yourself? This is small time politics.

Mr. Jelinek: The document goes on to read:

1945: enrolled at Harvard, spawning ground of leftist intellectuals—

At that time.

An hon. Member: Oh, God!

Mr. Jelinek: It goes on:

1950: was in Shanghai when the communists took over, and became a rabid admirer of Mao Tse Tung and his red regime.

1951: back in Montreal, he launched the leftists publication Cité Libre. Among the well known reds who collaborated, professor Raymond Boyer (convicted of Soviet espionage in the Gouzenko case); Stanley B. Ryerson, leading theoretician of the Communist Party and editor of Marxist Review, Pierre Gelinas, Quebec director of agitation and propaganda of the Communist Party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boulanger: This will get you nowhere.

Mr. Jelinek: I will continue to read this very interesting document. It goes on:

1952: led delegation of Communists to the Moscow Economic Conference.

Mrs. Sauvé: I went to China in 1973. Am I a Communist?

Mr. Jelinek: It goes on to read:

1953: barred entry into the United States as an "inadmissible" person.

1955: launched "Le Rassemblement", a leftist "united front" rally in Quebec, but the CCF refused to join because it was too leftist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: It goes on to read:

1960: led a Communist delegation to Peking for red victory celebration.

1961: "Social Purpose for Canada", the socialist handbook written by Marxist and NDP leaders, was published containing a chapter by Mr. Trudeau in which he lauds Mao Tse Tung, urges socialists not to "water down" their socialism but to make its approach "more flexible", and to welcome federalism "as a valuable tool which permits dynamic parties to plant socialist governments in certain provinces, from which the seed of racialism can slowly spread".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame on you!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. Those seeking to be recognized should stand in their places and the Chair will recognize them, but at present the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) has the floor.

Mr. Jelinek: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. members across have any complaints and want to support or deny some of the things I have been saying, let them stand up. We now move on to 1962.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, come on, Joe, sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) is rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): The hon. member said that if anyone disagreed with him, he should stand up and say so. I disagree totally with all the things the hon. gentleman was saying because they are nonsensical.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is not a point of order.

Mr. Jelinek: I do not want to state publicly whether I agree with the hon. member, but most of what he says in the House of Commons should be ignored.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: We now move on to 1962.

Mr. Andras: That is absolute McCarthyism.

Mr. Jelinek: The document goes on to read:

1962: Amidst protests, this millionnaire leftist succeeded in gaining appointment as a professor at the University of Montreal, which became a pro-Castro stronghold.

No wonder that he shouts "viva Fidel, viva Cuba". I would rather he shouted "viva united Canada".

Mrs. Sauvé: He speaks a few languages, which is more than you can do.

● (2042)

Mr. Jelinek: In 1963 he campaigned with the NDP against the Liberals whom he called idiots because they had decided to accept nuclear defence weapons. By 1965, having decided to use the Liberal party as an instrument to propel himself to political power, he was elected to parliament for the first time. With that background of our present Prime Minister and the Liberal record under his leadership, I need not say more on that matter.

The fact is that even in this country with its abundance of natural resources, its wealth of technology and know-how, its strong character and diversity of its many cultures and peoples, we nevertheless unfortunately find ourselves at a crossroads of the future of our country. Be it in the changing aspects of our society, national unity, or the economy itself, future generations will have to depend on whatever course we happen to take within the next few years or perhaps even months.

National unity is, of course, a major factor. By way of numerous regional and national polls, it is evident that the majority of Canadians want our country to remain united despite some of the differences that are being magnified by some. These differences should unite, not divide. All provinces should be treated equally, instead of giving special status to any one province. It is therefore unbelievable that the government continues to push bilingualism in nine provinces, with some success and I am happy for that, while at the same time allowing Quebec to become the only unilingual province in Canada.

Mr. Olivier: That is not true.

Mr. Jelinek: The hon. member says that is not true. It is the only province in Canada where people do not have a choice of what school to attend. They have a choice in Toronto of what school to attend, whether French or English. They do not have that choice in Quebec City.

Mr. Olivier: They do not have a French school in Toronto.

Mr. Jelinek: They have one in Toronto as well as in Etobicoke, Oakville, Hamilton, Guelph, and right across the country.

I repeat, national unity is an important factor. However, it is the economy that is the major issue that parliamentarians, and indeed all Canadians, should be concerned about today. I was pleased that the result of a recent questionnaire which I sent to my constituents confirmed this feeling. In fact 76 per cent of my constituents who replied to my questionnaire indicated that the economy, and not national unity, was the most important general issue facing Canadians today. This is what we in the Progressive Conservative party have been saying for quite some time, none more emphatically than the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who continues to outline specific remedies and recommendations in this regard. Just last week in this Chamber my leader outlined a number of positive proposals which would help stimulate the economy and reduce inflation.

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Jelinek: We only have one leader, and he is on his way up while yours is on the way down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: The Leader of the Opposition does not whine, moan and blame the state of our economy on international forces or the lazy and lackadaisical attitudes of Canadians the way the Prime Minister does, putting the blame on everyone except himself and his cabinet. He, instead, continues to introduce realistic and positive programs which, if instituted, would reverse the negative trend that we have been living with in the past years.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

This party has outlined its policies in all general areas, not only during this debate but over the past six to 12 months. Therefore, instead of repeating some of the policies that have already been dealt with by other party spokesmen—

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Jelinek: If the hon. member opposite wants to find out what they were, he can read Hansard over the last week. He will find the policies in Hansard, especially those that deal with the economy.

Instead of repeating some of the policies that have already been dealt with by other party spokesmen, I should like to dwell briefly on a subject matter that I personally am responsible for on behalf of my party, namely, small business.

By the government's own admission, small business is responsible for 60 per cent of the labour force in Canada today. This obviously constitutes the largest potential employment sector by far, and therefore it is twice as incredible that no mention of this sector was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) last Thursday in the so-called mini-budget, and only three words, Mr. Speaker, were dedicated to small business in the throne speech itself. That is a shame. It is a disgrace. It is an unfortunate situation as far as small business, which forms the backbone of our economy, is concerned.

With roughly one million Canadians unemployed, and with all indications pointing to an increase in this figure in the coming months, it is incredible that the government continues to ignore this vital sector which undoubtedly forms the backbone of our economic way of life. It is true that the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) inherited a ten point program from his predecessor which, after years of studies and consultations, generally concludes that the government should further study some of the problems related to small business.

I must give some credit, however, because this is the first time the government has ever given any indication that it knows small business even exists. However, further studies with no specific program is no help today. Studies and consultations have been made. The time has come for some positive and realistic incentive oriented programs.

Let me go to the ten point program that committed the government to continue to study, examine, and analyse specific aspects of small business. The points refer to existing programs, namely, Enterprise '77 and FBDB, and the tenth point which reads in part "efforts will be increased in order to make useful statistical information available" only adds to the already heavy paperwork burden imposed on small business by all levels of government—in short, Mr. Speaker, not one new point, not one new program; not one specific recommendation which would in any way, shape or form assist the already ailing small business community in Canada.

After studying that aspect for one and a half years, since the former minister was appointed to that position, even the government's own definition is vague and impractical. On the other hand we, in this party, after much consultation with small business representatives in every region of Canada, as well as small business officials in other industrialized nations such as the United States, Japan and West Germany, have time after time made specific and detailed incentive oriented recommendations in this House and elsewhere which, if implemented, would undoubtedly benefit the small businessman and therefore the economy as a whole.

I have given before, but allow me to put on record again and this time in point form only, some of the recommendations that we in the official opposition have been making for some time. I would like the new Minister of State (Small Business) to look at them and seriously consider their implementation in the very near future.

First, the definition is an important one. After studying small business administration around the world, we felt that the most workable general definition is that of the United States Small Business Administration which defines small business as an "owner-managed enterprise not dominant in its field". Further specific definitions can easily be outlined according to individual programs such as net worth, sales, number of employees and so on. We cannot have a general definition by number of employees like the government has recommended. What about foreign subsidiaries? What about small subsidiaries of large multinational corporations? They would fall within the small business definition. It cannot be.

Second, we would establish a small business secretariat which would function independently of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The secretariat's primary function would be to help small business cope with government and compete with big business. This the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does not and cannot do. It is too big a department to oversee this very important segment of our economy. The secretariat would also put forward the interests of small business to other government departments and agencies, would assist small business with existing as well as new programs and cut through the existing maze of bureaucracy.

Thirdly, we would develop a small business act, a sort of unbrella act which would encompass all federal government matters dealing with small business and provide much needed incentive in the form of specific programs and/or commitments, such as some of the following. I realize I am repeating these, but some hon. members did want to know. Perhaps they do not read Hansard so I will give them the information at this time.

The first commitment would be (a) to change government tendering practices so that small business supplies a portion of government purchased goods and services. This is better known as the "set aside programs".

(b) We would reduce considerably obsolete and/or duplicate form filling regulations, known as the "paper work burden". True, the government has taken some steps in this area, but not nearly enough. Small businesses are swamped with bureaucratic paperwork and regulations, and it is very possible to reduce, by at least 10 per cent for starters, excessive paperwork.

(c) We would provide small business investment tax credits by giving a tax credit of up to $5,000 for capital investment in Canadian-owned small businesses.

(d) We would provide assistance in the formation of small business export consortia—for obvious reasons.

(e) We would remove the capital gains tax on transfers of a business from one family member to another.

(f) We would encourage secondary manufacturing by way of tax and/or research and development incentive.

Secondary manufacturing in this country is far below its potential. It is an area where job creation possibilities are unlimited. It is an area in which we, as Canadians, have not even scratched the surface. It is a very important area.

We have also stated, Mr. Speaker, that we support in principle an employment tax credit, which in fairness I was pleased to hear the Minister of Finance touch upon in his speech last week. It is unfortunate, however, that even upon questioning he was unable to explain the government's proposal in this regard in more detail. One must only conclude that even the minister is not quite certain how this recommendation should be implemented. We certainly look to some form of legislation dealing with employment tax credit to assist in alleviating the unemployment crisis in Canada on a long-term basis, rather than continued handouts and give-aways which only create jobs for a temporary period of time.

Finally on small business, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that last summer this House amended the Small Businesses Loans Act to increase the dollar value of loans as well as the aggregate amounts in the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. My seatmate brought this matter up with the Minister of Finance last week, who was not aware of the fact that we were promised at the time by the then minister of state (small business) that the new interest rates would be established, again by order in council, of course—what else is new with this government—within a short period of time, rates which would be pegged somewhere between 1 and 2 per cent above prime.

This is another unfortunate example of an unkept promise. Interest rates have not been established. The Small Businesses Loans Act, as a result, is in limbo and not being properly used across Canada by our chartered banks. We can no longer afford to wait. I repeat that realistic incentive oriented options must be made available immediately before it is too late. We are witnessing today more bankruptcies than ever before in the small business sector. The lack of specific government programs in this area is helping to create record levels of unemployment. Unless we act at once, I feel we could be witnessing the beginning of the demise of small business, and therefore of free enterprise as we know it.

This would probably not bother or disturb the Prime Minister too much, Sir, because you will recall that some one and a half years ago he indicated quite clearly in interviews that the free market system will not work. This demise is not because the free market system will not work, as the Prime Minister tries to suggest; it is because he and his government will not allow that free market system the freedom to operate properly.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Although I heard the hon. member say he was concluding, I might seek the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I did.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I was not too sure that I was listening to a member of the House of Commons when the previous speaker began his venomous and virulent attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), but I think probably the less said about it, the better. We should forget it.

It is gratifying to speak in this debate for a sentimental reason, namely, the fact that Her Majesty, as one of her Silver Jubilee official duties, graciously read the Address in the other place. Most Canadians are accepting the monarchy as a symbol of unity in this country and as a rallying point for our diverse Commonwealth. The force for good it maintains is largely because of the courage and concern our Queen displays.

I join, Mr. Speaker, with all members of this House in giving hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) on their eloquent and original orations in moving and seconding the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

As usual, Mr. Speaker, my contribution is a chance for me to give my own opinions on both constituency and national matters. Tonight I remind the House and Canada of their good fortune in having a Prime Minister who exhibits so much good judgment and clear thinking in handling the very difficult happenings in our nation at this time of crisis. His handling of our affairs is honest and courageous. Often at a cost in popularity he demands fair and just solutions to our economic and social needs, and he continually presses for true national unity. In his speech to the lawyers of Quebec he showed that Parti Quebecois policy is infringing not only on Quebec's English citizens' language rights, but also on the freedom of Canadians to live equally in, and to take part in deliberations in any part of, Canada. Thus the Parti Quebecois are restricting rights of Canadian citizens, in my opinion, unlawfully.

The new Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has gained stature by his strong and skillful defence of his "stand pat mini-budget". Mr. W. A. Wilson of the Ottawa Journal is rather chary of compliments, but he implied last weekend that the minister's speech was wise and statesmanlike. In these times when Canada has so much at stake, surely we deserve sane press writers and TV commentators like Wilson, people who will report all facets of news, good and bad, but mainly factual; people who will stop trying to make scare headlines and stop gloomy reporting. Most of us can do without their dubious help. We can work to turn petty catastrophies into triumph as our forefathers have always done. If the media are good citizens, they will turn their talents to positive thinking, as will our opposition in this House.

On that point, the official opposition seems to be satisfied to denigrate every good government effort. The NDP have been giving us superficial but so-called serious advice; however, Canadians know that we cannot spend our way out of unemployment. We know that to gain our rightful position we will have to work harder than ever before.

At this point I would turn from generalities to troubles we are experiencing in my own riding of Welland. Some of these exemplify social and economic trends in a wider context. To begin with, the electoral boundary commission mutilated the Welland riding and others to obtain one more needed seat in the Niagara peninsula, which now has five in all. Let me welcome these new electors right now to our new Welland riding. I am sure they will adjust and work for the good of their new constituency and the country. The commission could have found an almost painless solution to the problem but were completely deaf to the good suggestions from local interventions during hearings. To me there is something archaic about the idea of reviving three Commissioners every ten years just to have them impose completely autocratic decisions on the public. Surely, a local vote on alternatives would be a better way.

A happy conclusion to the abandoned canal crossing problem was achieved by the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), and I thank him for it. Five million dollars was acknowledged to be a fair and just settlement.

The third bridge in Port Colborne is just a matter of time. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) accepts its need fully. He is negotiating with his counterpart in Ontario, but this should be completed soon. People will no doubt realize that the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority's policy is to abolish all overhead, bascule and lift bridges throughout the canal. This is the reason why the Port Robinson bridge was not replaced. A tunnel will be constructed eventually about half way between that community and Allanburg. There is some sense to the minister's asking that the federal contribution to the third bridge at Port Colborne be subtracted from the federal contribution to the tunnel in that city which will be built at a much later date.

Increase in Seaway tolls is the biggest controversial issue in my riding just now. The Chamber of Commerce, the mayors of St. Catharines, Welland, and Port Colborne, and the regional municipality of Niagara have taken a strong stand against the move. They claim that the increases will be mainly on the Welland canal and will deter use of the canal. They claim that reduction in canal traffic is bound to occur with resulting depression to the Niagara area. The figures prepared by the Chamber are inaccurate and predicated on the prophesied drop in canal traffic. This drop will not occur.

Ships are now moving through the canal even when loaded at the ridiculously small fee of $100 per lock. These fees bring in $5 million a year and the operating costs are $20 million. The statement that the tolls could jump to $12,000 a ship is untrue. The very greatest would be approximately $6,000—and that by charging another one cent per bushel of wheat or another 47 cents on a ton of coal or ore. Freight costs for going through the canal would still be much cheaper than by road, rail, or via Atlantic or Pacific seaports. The United States government has been consulted and its studies are in agreement with ours. They see no reason to build a rival canal at a cost of two to three billion dollars. They intend to levy similar tolls soon on their own inland waterways.

On top of all this, people who complain that the government subsidizes other modes of transport should remember the following: rail gets a subsidy of five cents per mile, air receives two cents per mile. The government will now subsidize the Seaway by writing off the $625 million capital debt and the $225 million of back interest, not a bad subsidy! All the Welland canal portion of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority wants is to be paid its operating costs.

In the Welland riding, Mr. Speaker, unemployment has become a much bigger worry than last spring. Algoma Steel has closed its Port Colborne plant, and thus put 200 men out of work. Chances of reopening are not bright because of the softness of the steel markets in the world. This last week's huge INCO general lay-off was preceded in Port Colborne a month ago by the lay-off of 375 out of a work force of 1,300. My constituents feel that a great Canadian firm has become multinational and that its decision has been made outside Canada. They feel this firm has a responsibility not only to its shareholders but to the country whose natural resources and benevolent government assistance made its growth and developing success possible. We worry that this once Canadian company may gradually develop its foreign mines and plants and make the Canadian mines and plants completely unnecessary.

How can multinational companies be good corporate citizens? That is a question, with which INCO, the unions, and the federal and provincial governments are now wrestling. In spite of this concern, the idea advanced by the NDP to nationalize the nickel industry, would open the doors to many firms which are also struggling to keep their heads above water financially and encourage them to ask for the same treatment.

In the same vein, Atlas Steels of Welland has complained to the government, through me, that a stainless steel plant in Cuba is being built with Canadian government assistance and money as help to an emerging nation. If that is so, Atlas Steels rightly asks how we can build a plant which will be exporting 40,000 to 50,000 tons of stainless steel annually when it will be in direct competition with our own plant in Welland, especially when there is such a discrepancy in standards of living? Doesn't charity begin at home? I believe there is some gap in trade policy. I think we should look into the whole policy of funding low employment areas of Canada.

The three main concerns to which the Prime Minister addressed himself were unemployment, inflation, and national unity. Though the third affects the first two they naturally must, as a preliminary, be taken together. Without trying to be pedantic or authoritative still a few main points must be evident to us all.

Commodity demand has gone down and all markets are soft. Job creation at over 200,000 cannot keep up with the growth of our labour force which is the highest in the world, and which is due to the baby boom and ever-increasing female job participation. The rates in the Atlantic provinces and parts of Quebec are chronically very high. Ontario's rate is high; the west's is just barely acceptable.

Most people except unions and big business agree on the removal of AIB controls April 1, 1978. However, decontrols will be difficult and will require monitoring. They also require union and corporation co-operation with government. In my opinion these powerful bodies are not acting as good Canadian citizens, and public opinion should be directed at gaining their co-operation with government. However, our national unemployment figure may not go up much over 8 per cent, and inflation will stay near 7 per cent this year and should reduce by 2 per cent next year.

Last spring and winter, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Scarborough East Mr. (O'Connell) chaired a caucus committee on industrial policy of which I was a member and which I enjoyed tremendously. Among the speakers brought before us was a Dr. Smith, a vice-president of Toronto Dominion Bank, who foresees a continual annual growth of Canada's gross national product at 3.5 per cent. In the next 15 years he believes it will double, or increase even more. This means our foreign borrowing can be carried easily and still leave enough Canadian capital to develop our pipelines and energy strategy. With the exhibition of patience, we shall see this pipeline start in about a year's time. It needs to have political agreements signed, detailed planning and pre-start stockpiling.

The committee realizes that the old post-war easy prosperity is over for us and the whole group of western industrial nations. One of our industrial strategies should be for our branch plants to compete export-wise with their United States head office plants. Also, these Canadian branch plants must do their own research and development in Canada. Only by pushing our indigenous technology and know-how can we rebuild our export trade.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) stated last Friday that only half our citizens are willing to admit that an energy crisis is at hand and building up at a whirlwind rate. He clearly pointed out that the drain on world oil supplies by western nations is increasing Third World tensions, which in turn places western democracy's future survival at stake. In Canada he calls for reduced energy use, conservation of energy, close supervision of all energy resources, more federal-provincial co-operation, and regulation of nuclear fuel. His department is spending large sums on solar and other renewable energy development. By 1990 he expects we will have spent $180 billion on energy programs.

The Prime Minister is criticized for calling on us to stop wringing our hands and to tighten our belts. It should be clear to all of us now that he foresaw the inevitable reduction in living standards and personal expectations, that we are trying to get more out of the economy than it can provide. We have concentrated on material possessions as a way to acquire happiness. More are now perceiving the old true values. People gain materially and become poor spiritually. The belt tightening experience will do us no harm. It will make us more conscious of our needy neighbours, our human brothers and sisters.

At this trying but challenging time in our history, Canadian unity is one of our greatest concerns. It seems strange that national sovereignty for the province of Quebec is being sought through separation, at a time when nationalism as a goal is recognized to be an ever-narrowing and unsatisfying pursuit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack).

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) permit a question?

Mr. Railton: I would rather carry on than answer a question at this time.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Remember this is all on television.

Mr. Railton: In spite of our difficulties, Canada has been doing very creditably in bringing social benefits and equal living standards to all parts of the country, in spite of their unequal resources, opportunities and haphazard development. Surely we all realize our country suffers from its northerly position, its huge size and its sparse population.

Quebec has received generous treatment from Ottawa. It is said that there are people in Quebec who harbour feelings of inferiority and hostility which really have no foundation in reality. Granted there are bigots in the rest of Canada who, just as senselessly, would let Quebec depart just to "serve them right". The three ideas consisting of total separation, sovereignty with economic association, or remaining in and participating in Confederation, if viewed logically, force us to admit that anything but full Confederation would lead to economic and political disaster, not only for Quebec, but also for all Canada.

The Parti Quebecois' unnatural hostility to the rest of Canada is even more regrettable when we see that the great multicultural group in Canada, which will soon be almost half our population, feels the need for Quebec's presence with us, just as much as do the greatest number of Anglophones.

[Mr. Railton.]

Senator Maurice Lamontagne, in a speech at the University of Montreal on April 6, 1977, demonstrated that Quebec has at every turn since the settlement of 1763 been given greater assistance from the central government than her citizens received from successive provincial governments. He made a big point that French Canada was of so little interest to France after the battle of Quebec, that she chose Guadeloupe as a colony for its sugar, rather than accepting Quebec and fighting for the fur trade in Canada. He estimated that the French could very well have won this battle. Another big point he made was that by being an integral part of Canada, Quebec was saved from sliding helplessly into the American republic where its culture and language would have been lost completely.

There has been a fortuitous economic development in Canada up until now. Only by chance did Ontario develop steel and did Quebec go for textiles and shoes.

In spite of official Parti Quebecois dissent, most of us realize that Confederation has saved both Quebec and Canada. Both entities will continue to exist only through Confederation's continuance, albeit a confederation treated to constitutional reform.

Most Canadians—and this includes most Quebec Canadians—believe in a united Canada. They feel our country is unique and has something to contribute to world peace and understanding, simply by its continued existence after so much heart-searching dialogue. At this time we are encouraged by the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. They can promise this country not only a modicum of prosperity but also even a bright future. This will happen only if we relinquish our individual selfish patterns of action. In one or two years we shall turn that difficult corner in our history, but only if we are willing to work together as hard as our forefathers did to achieve Confederation 110 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington (Mr. Alkenbrack) is requesting permission to ask a question of the hon member who had the floor. Does the hon. member accept the question?

Mr. Railton: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton) complains in his speech that softness in the steel market results in large lay-offs at Port Colborne. This being the case, why does the hon. member for Welland in his speech acquiesce in the increase in St. Lawrence Seaway tolls, since iron ore, the mother of steel, is the product with the largest tonnage to pay these increasing tolls on the Seaway?

Mr. Railton: Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question in my speech, but I can answer it once again. The 47 cents toll increase on a $30 or a $40 ton of ore or on a $200 ton of steel has absolutely no effect percentage-wise on the cost of that commodity. Therefore it will have no effect on competitiveness in the export market.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, this has been a very sad summer for Canada, and indeed it is going to be a very frightening and disastrous winter. There is no doubt about the fact that we are entering into a period in our economy when—

An hon. Member: That has already been said.

Mr. Malone: That has been said? I dare the government members to call an election. Anytime they want to call it, we are ready. They are not fooling the Canadian people for a single moment with the record they have put forward. By gosh, they do not even know how smart Canada is. Canada is ready for this election anytime they dare pull the plug, and so are we.

The last five years of the Trudeau regime have been disastrous. If you take an overlay of the record from indicators of the economy on unemployment, inflation, the devaluation of the dollar, the gross increase in taxation, and the government's take of the gross national product, and place it on to the period of time from 1962 to 1967 in Great Britain, you would have almost the identical pattern. The pattern shows that this country is on the same path Great Britain has been on, and look where we are today.

Hon. members opposite are scarcely worried that the government is about to go bankrupt. There are people in this nation who are full of imagination. We have people who are full of educated talent, but we have a government which will not give them encouragement to build a nation the way it ought to be built.

Our competitive advantage today is equal to the competitive advantage we had in 1969. We have to conclude that we have had a decade of waste. During the period from 1970 to 1976 unit labour costs in the manufacturing sector increased 49 per cent. In the United States they increased 28 per cent. We hear hon. members opposite regurgitating and uttering the excuse that all the nations of the world are having economic problems, that the United States dollar is being devalued and that U.S. unit labour costs are going up, but what hon. members opposite fail to recognize is that we are outstripping in a negative sense all our trading partners in the world. Relative to the United States, Japan or West Germany, we find that we are heading for economic chaos.

I remember as a child going to school being proud that our country, with only 20 million people and being the second largest nation in the world, had the second highest per capita income in the whole world. Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to power we are not even in the top ten. We have dropped from being something we could be proud of to the point where we do not even rank because of the economic policy of the government, which is not to care and the government will show people how to do things. As a result Canadians have lost incentive.

In 1969, the year after the Prime Minister took power, the Canadian hourly wage 65 cents lower than that in the United States. Now, seven years later, our hourly wage is 64 cents higher than that in the United States. It is not a matter of right or wrong, because the rightness or wrongness of how much we are paid has to be relative to productivity. If we in Canada were producing more than our counterparts, we ought to be paid more. But the Prime Minister came into the House after the throne speech and admitted that it is a well documented fact that Canadian productivity is far below that of the United States. How in the world can we sell anything abroad if we charge more for our labour and, by the admission of the Prime Minister, produce less?

If the United States cannot afford to buy our products, who in the world can? We are in such a disadvantaged position on the international market that the government is looking for every avenue it can to hide itself from this economic malaise. To a large extent the whole question of national unity has been a government manufactured issue in order to hide its own faults with regard to mismanaging our economy in terms of the dollar, international trade and competitive advantage with other nations. To a large extent national unity would become a resolved issue if we did not have a million people in this country hunting for a way in which to earn their bread and butter.

An hon. Member: You sound like someone else.

Mr. Malone: The hon. member opposite says I sound like someone else. How can hon. members opposite be so callous as to sit there and not recognize the fact that a million people in this country are out of work?

Mr. Paproski: Resign.

Mr. Malone: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) says that if hon. members opposite do not know how badly this country is being run, they should resign because, if they do not know how badly off we are economically, they do not deserve to sit in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: In the six years from 1970 to 1976 unit labour costs in this country increased some 49 per cent, and in the United States they increased 28 per cent. That should destroy any argument used by hon. members opposite that we should not worry about what is happening because it is happening all over the world. Granted, the trend is there, but it is not nearly as steep on the graph as it is in Canada.

The stage set for Canada is so frightening that the government cowers at the thought of introducing a budget which would give some incentive to Canadians. Instead it shrouds its budget in a throne speech. What a cowardly way to put forward a budget! The government is afraid to admit that the course it plotted last March 31 has not worked. It is afraid to face a budget debate in this House. It is afraid to face what obviously would come about, a vote of non-confidence.

Afraid to bring in a budget, the government brought one in the back door by way of a throne speech. Can you imagine a government in a country with economic conditions like those which exist in Canada not even daring to introduce a budget? I think that is recognition of the fact that there is no leadership in the government. In the last election campaign the issue was leadership.

Recent Liberal budgets have been like a scavenger hunt. There have been no long-term policies and no indications of long term direction for the nation. The government has prostituted its citizens. I suggest that because it over-spends. The Prime Minister tells the people to practise restraint, but there has been tremendous growth in government expenditure and tremendous growth in the civil service. What a callous attitude this government has! The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) tells Canadians to spend more; the Prime Minister tells us to spend less; the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) tells us we have the strongest of all the economies in the western world. Whom in the Privy Council are we to believe?

When the Prime Minister took office in 1968, personal income tax represented 34 per cent of federal revenues. Today, 53 per cent of federal revenues come from personal income taxes. If the government is to be run on the backs of the people, the Prime Minister has no business telling Canadian citizens that they are the ones who ought to practise restraint, because that simply is not where the restraint is needed.

Everywhere we look there is waste without principle. The government decentralizes for the purpose of buying power, not for the purpose of helping the nation. The government sets up committees to study committees and to back away from the responsibility for its actions. There is no better example of that than the recent Hall Report. How tremendously discouraged Mr. Justice Emmett Hall must be at this time! He was asked to do a $1 million study, and then he found that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) set up another committee to study his principal recommendation. The Hall Report would not have been required if action had been taken after the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in Calgary in 1973. However, the Hall study was set up because the government would not go along with the recommendations of the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. So we had the Hall Report. Following that there was another committee to study it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

PROPOSED BAN ON USE OF SODIUM NITRITE IN FOOD PREPARATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that there is irrefutable scientific evidence that sodium nitrite used in the preparation of virtually all cured meats undergoes a chemical change in the meat, after cooking and after ingestion by humans, producing highly carcinogenic chemicals, that the increase in stomach and perhaps other cancers in North America has occurred in direct ratio to the increased use of cured meats containing nitrite and that the supposed safe level of 150 parts per million of nitrite set by the Canadian government is not based on any scientific evidence that this is indeed a safe level, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard):

That the Canadian government take immediate action to ban the use of sodium nitrite in the Canadian food supply, that the government direct its attention to alternative methods of meat preparation and that during the interval until the ban is in complete effect the skull and crossbones or some other appropriate warning be placed on the labels of all foods containing sodium nitrite.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate pursuant to the Standing Order can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I too, rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion relates to the fact that a former deputy director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act has stated in a legal opinion that only a special inquiry under the Inquiries Act can possibly ascertain the full truth about the uranium cartel, including the government's role therein, as the limits imposed by law under the Combines Investigation Act would prevent a full inquiry. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House demands that a full inquiry be held under the Inquiries Act to investigate the international conspiracy known as the uranium cartel and to ascertain the Canadian government's role in it.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROPOSAL TO RESCIND LAYOFF ORDER AT INCO AND STOCKPILE NICKEL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Considering that INCO owes the people of Canada $378 million in deferred taxes and considering that INCO will also benefit by about $10 million as a result of the decision announced last Thursday night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to re-introduce new corporate tax concessions which were originally announced in the budget of last March, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to contact the president of INCO to insist that his corporation rescind the announcement of layoffs to take place in Canada and instructs the Prime Minister to set up the machinery necessary for the stockpiling of nickel in order to preserve these Canadian jobs.

REQUEST THAT AGE OF ELIGIBILITY FOR OLD AGE PENSION BE REDUCED TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move an important motion of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that a large number of young people aged 15 to 24 are unemployed and that a large number of individuals between 60 and 65 years of age are tackling serious problems of survival, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That this House enjoin the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) to take all necessary means in the shortest possible time to introduce in the House a bill whose effect would be to reduce to 60 the eligibility age for old age security pension for persons wishing to retire at that age, which would surely have a considerable impact on the level of unemployment in the country.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN WINDFALL PROFITS FOR OIL COMPANIES AND FOR URANIUM COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. My motion concerns the secret uranium cartel which, organized by the government of Canada, enabled multinational interests to reap billions of dollars in windfall profits. In light of the government's efforts to cream off windfall gains made by the oil industry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the government explain to this House the moral difference between windfall profits such as the 51 per cent profit made by Gulf in one sale to Ontario Hydro and the gains made by oil producers in the wake of the OPEC price hikes.

REQUEST THAT DOCUMENTS CONNECTED WITH URANIUM CARTEL BE MADE PUBLIC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. My motion concerns statements in the House by both the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). On Friday, August 5, 1977 the Prime Minister said, concerning the uranium cartel:

We will put every fact we have before parliament so it can debate this matter properly.

In view of the fact that not only have we received no documentation whatsoever from the government but under the gag law it remains illegal for persons connected with the cartel to make documents public, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens):

That this House demands that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources fulfill their broken promises by making public immediately all documentation concerning the uranium cartel in their possession.

SUGGESTION MORE GOVERNMENT ORDERS BE ALLOCATED TO AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of shocking unemployment across Canada and in view of the ironic situation where more official concern is being shown because of job losses and lay-offs in provinces where unemployment is less devastating than in the maritimes and Quebec, I move, seconded by the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion make strong representations to his cabinet colleagues to have a more reasonable proportion of government orders such as the manufacturing of railway rolling stock allocated to manufacturers in the most needy and disadvantaged areas. I am thinking particularly of the Hawker Siddeley works in Trenton, Nova Scotia, which received only about 10 per cent of the order allocated to National Car in Hamilton, an area where unemployment is less than half of what it is in northern Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PROPOSED ACTION TO CAUSE FALCONBRIDGE NICKEL TO CLOSE OPERATIONS IN NAMIBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. In view of the fact that Mr. Kenneth Kaunda, President of Zambia, has urged the Commonwealth countries to unite to end the "exploitation and plunder of Namibian wealth", in view of the fact that Namibia is illegally controlled by South Africa, and in view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) has recently said that Canada should speak out more on unacceptable South African policies, I move, seconded by the member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the Canadian government take action that would cause the Falconbridge nickel operations in Namibia to be withdrawn.

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—KNOWLEDGE OF CABINET OF EFFECT ON DOMESTIC PRICE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the former Minister of Finance repeatedly stated that in issuing minimum price directives with respect to the uranium price rigging that was agreed to at international cartel conferences, he did so under the directive of the cabinet, will the Prime Minister indicate to the House if, when cabinet was approving these new directives setting in place the price rigging that had been agreed to by the international cartel, the cabinet asked what were the consequences for Canadian domestic consumers of the product.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I refer the hon. member to a lengthy statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources about a fortnight ago. It put before the Canadian public and members of parliament all the rationale for the international arrangement that we entered into. It indicated how this did not in any way penalize the Canadian consumer. It indicated also how it had saved thousands of jobs for the uranium industry in Canada. I appeal to the hon. member and members of his party by saying if they wish to debate this to choose a day for debate. We would gladly debate this subject with the opposition. They continue making allegations about a secret conspiracy and so on. These were open arrangements. They were known—

● (1117)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: They were known by well-informed people, who obviously do not include members opposite. So, if the opposition wants to debate this subject on the merits, I repeat, now what I said last summer: we are very anxious to do it. We are now in the position of having an industry, the uranium industry, which is prepared to offer hundreds of jobs to workers who have been laid off elsewhere because, perhaps, such arrangements have not been entered into. The foresight of the government has guaranteed the health and the survival of this industry. I wish the opposition would state the facts.

Mr. Stevens: A supplementary to the Prime Minister who has indicated that the cartel has had no effect domestically. Is he aware that it has now been revealed that Gulf Minerals (Canada) Limited entered into a contract with Ontario Hydro in the spring of 1974 at the height of the cartel activities under which some uranium was sold to Ontario Hydro which, according to an internal memorandum of Ontario Hydro resulted in a $51 million profit to Gulf on a $98 million sale; in other words, a profit of 51 per cent or $13.78 per pound? Is the Prime Minister aware of this and, if so, how can he tell us there was no domestic consequence?

Mr. Trudeau: We are in the very curious position of having a member of the opposition complain on behalf of Ontario Hydro when they made a statement just last summer saying they were very happy with the arrangement and that they had not been penalized in any way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: For the information of the Prime Minister and the House, this is a new fact which has just been disclosed. Is the right hon. gentleman aware of the fact that in an internal memo of March 8, 1974, Gulf said: "The Energy, Mines and Resources staff does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same prices as we could achieve from export sales". Bearing in mind that in 1974 export prices were one and the same as cartel prices, would the Prime Minister explain the apparent contradiction between the Gulf statement and the government's repeated claims that the Canadian domestic market was not affected by the cartel?

Mr. Trudeau: I was quoting the Canadian consumers themselves, and surely that is as good an authority as that advanced by the hon. member opposite. We are used to facts coming from the Tory party which turn out to be non-facts as soon as they are investigated.

Mr. Stevens: They are right here. Do you want to see them?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member has facts which are not ascertainable by others he might show them to the Combines Investigation people. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate affairs has specifically asked the combines investigators to look into these allegations. If there is any evidence of combines, surely the hon. member would want to turn his quoted facts over to them.

● (1122)

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—REASON FOR FAILURE TO HAVE PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is to the investigation which the Prime Minister is relying on that I should like to direct my question. The Prime Minister is obviously relying on it because it will get at all the involvements, including the government's involvement; at least, that is the case the government would like to put. Is the Prime Minister aware of the effects of the Combines Investigation Act and the power of investigation; that it does not apply where criminal offences may be involved; that there is a limitation on the seizure of documents and the publication of those documents; that the director has no power to order any further inquiry, that that power rests with the government which this inquiry should be investigating? In other words, it is another case of the government investigating itself.

Is the Prime Minister aware that there is no opportunity whatsoever for the public to be informed with respect to the government's involvement? In fact, is the Prime Minister aware that the investigation which he calls for under the Combines Investigation Act is no examination of the government at all, which is the centre point, the keystone, of this cartel which has caused the trouble to Canadian consumers? How can the Prime Minister justify this inquiry, and why does he not have a public inquiry so he can let it all hang out, if his case is so good?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the powers of the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act are set out under that Act and, in effect, are a great deal broader than a criminal investigator would have under the Criminal Code. Those are the powers the official opposition has criticized in this House any time that any revision of the Combines Investigation has come up.

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—SUGGESTED LIMITATION ON POWERS OF DIRECTOR OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has seen fit to answer for the Prime Minister. Is the Minister of Justice aware that the former deputy director of investigation and research in the combines investigation branch, who was in that capacity until January of 1977, has prepared an opinion which indicates that in fact the answer of the Minister of Justice is not true, that in terms of investigating the government, the investigation by the combines branch is limited in just the way I suggest. Is the minister aware of that, and if there is a contrary opinion, would the Minister of Justice be prepared to table that opinion? I can tell him now that I am prepared to table in the House, with the consent of the House, the opinion of William P. McKeown, a former public servant who had direct responsibility in this field when he was a public servant and who has indicated that the investigation which the Prime Minister relies on is no investigation of the government at all. Is the minister prepared to do that?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the powers of the director are clearly set out in the legislation, as supported by the jurisprudence, and they are perfectly adequate for the director to get to the complete bottom of whether or not the allegations made by the official opposition are in fact true. It is the inquiry for which, for three months, the official opposition in this House argued day by day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am prepared to grant the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton a final supplementary but I will have to keep a tight line on the preamble.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, either the Minister of Justice is ignorant of the law or, if he is aware of it, he chooses to ignore it. The Minister of Justice has indicated that the government feels that it can be investigated. The former director feels it cannot. Would the government kindly table the opinion that allows the Minister of Justice to come to such a ridiculous conclusion?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am more concerned with the view of the present director, who has raised no such objections—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Naturally.

Mr. Stevens: He wants to remain on the payroll.

Mr. Basford: —who at the suggestion of the Department of Justice in early September retained independent legal advice to advise him throughout the course of this inquiry. No report has been made either to the minister of consumer affairs or to me that the powers of the director are in any way insufficient for the purposes of his inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REASON FOR FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ACT TO AVERT LAYOFFS AT INCO

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In an article published some three weeks ago in Forbes, an American publication on business affairs, there is an outline of the recent activities of the INCO Corporation, part of which referred to its recent expansion in Indonesia and Guatemala, which was financed to a considerable extent by the taxpayers of Canada. The article concluded that for political reasons if INCO made cutbacks this year it would do so in Canada where it could get away with it, as opposed to Indonesia, because that country, and I quote, "does not look kindly on cutbacks".

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether this explains the total lack of response by the government of Canada to ensure the preservation of those Canadian jobs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of this particular publication, but I am informed that INCO plans a reduction in Canada of 15 per cent of its operations, whereas it plans reductions abroad of some 30 per cent. So that would seem to invalidate the allegation of the leader of the New Democratic Party.

● (1127)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. For the Prime Minister's information, in the same press release in which it announced the layoffs taking place in Thompson, Sudbury and Port Colborne, the corporation announced its decision to continue with its expansion in Guatemala and Indonesia. Therefore, it was not cutting back on those countries, and they are the countries in which the Corporation is expanding with the assistance of the Canadian taxpayer.

In view of this serious political judgment by a business publication that the government of Canada could not be expected to take steps toward INCO, whereas the government of Indonesia could, is this a sound judgment? Does this explain the government's failure to say to INCO: "You have made hundreds of millions of dollars in Canada. You can go on making a profit legitimately in the future if you keep these Canadian jobs"?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the allegations of the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party are founded on very serious misinformation. The fact is that the Guatemalan production is not expected to come in until 1979.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is not true.

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, it is not a question of cutting back. It is a question of some future production which will hit the market at a time, we hope, when we will have put our own house in order.

SUGGESTED STOCKPILING OF NICKEL TO AVERT LAYOFFS AT INCO

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, it is the Prime Minister who has to get his facts straight. In part the expansion has taken place already in these countries and the company will continue with future expansion.

The question I want to put to the Prime Minister is: given all the financial assistance directly from the taxpayers of Canada, and indirectly simply by supporting operations of this particular corporation in Canada in the past, does the Prime Minister not believe that that corporation has a fundamental obligation to continue with its jobs in Canada? Because we live in the real world and not in Utopia, and if there is some assistance required, instead of providing further financial grants, would the government not undertake to work out stockpiling arrangements with INCO to preserve those jobs? In the past we have stockpiled uranium for seven years; we stockpiled wheat and we stockpiled other products in Canada in order to preserve jobs.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously on the facts there is a dispute. I have clear information to the effect that Guatemalan production will not reach the market until 1979. Therefore, the basis of the argument of the hon. member seems to fall on that. As to possible remedies, he is suggesting stockpiling. As the House was told, INCO has stockpiled for a period of 12 to 14 months.

An hon. Member: Seven months.

Mr. Trudeau: The question is: how much longer does the Leader of the New Democratic Party want the stockpiling to go on?

Mr. Broadbent: It was done for seven years for uranium.

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously, when you are stockpiling you are taking money out of circulation. You are putting it there; you are locking it down.

Mr. Broadbent: What about unemployment insurance?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may be speaking for the unions or he may not be. In Toronto now we are discussing with the company and with the union leaders a scheme whereby unemployment insurance money, federal money, would be used in order to supplement a scheme whereby there would be for a period of time work-sharing. We are hoping that the union and the company will come to an agreement which will permit the workers to have some time during which to share the work and they will be supplemented by payments from unemployment insurance.

● (1132)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: If hon. members on the other side believe that to be unreasonable, they might say so. This is what we are discussing now. We hope it will be accepted by both sides and that it will permit at least the transitional period to be crossed during which everybody will be able to share the work with very little loss of revenue.

MANPOWER

INQUIRY WHETHER NEW FUNDS WILL BE APPLIED TO CANADA WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. After a first selection of Canada Works projects in the riding of Roberval, barely 50 per cent of the applications were accepted because of the lack of funds. In the speech of the Minister of Finance, following the Speech from the Throne, an additional amount of $150 million was promised to enable the execution of a larger number of high concentration projects. Can the minister tell the House whether this amount is meant to go to Canada Works projects, whether the areas most severely affected by unemployment will be given top priority and, if so, to what extent?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the additional funds are not intended for the Canada Works Program. They will go to the government program administered by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. I thank the minister. I had an inkling that would be his answer but I wanted him to say it so that the public might be made aware of it. The public has the wrong idea about the announced $150 million. Now we know that money will not go to the Canada Works Program. I should like to ask the minister whether he hopes to put additional funds at the disposal of the Canada Works Program so that some of the more interesting projects, in ridings where unemployment exceeds 20 per cent, can be approved.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have had considerable success with the Canada Works Program. The third phase will soon be undertaken at which time other people can benefit from it.

ENERGY

URANIUM—REASON FOR FORMING CARTEL—CONTRACTS WITH UNITED STATES COMPANIES IN 1974

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and it arises out of the Prime Minister's reference to the document that was released a couple of weeks ago in which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources again puts forward the proposition that Canada had to organize a cartel in defence against the U.S. embargo. Can the minister tell us why that was necessary. The evidence before the Moss committee is to the effect that in 1974 when the embargo was at its height, 90 per cent of all the forward commitments made for uranium were made with countries outside of the United States by buyers in the U.S. and the majority of those commitments were made to Canadians. If the government had to have a cartel to prevent this from happening, why was it still going on?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, quite obviously the hon. member is misreading the facts.

Mr. Gillies: No, you are.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

Mr. Gillespie: If he were to look at the statements which were made public some ten days ago by myself, the notes between the Canadian government and the U.S. government complaining very vigorously and indeed bitterly about the embargo imposed by the United States on Canada and the rest of the world, a market which represented 70 per cent of the market for uranium at that time, he would understand why we had to take action to protect Canadian industry.

Mr. Gillies: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is talking about spot deliveries not about forward commitments and the majority of the contracts in the uranium industry, as he should know, is done on forward deliveries, not spot deliveries. Forward delivery contracts were still being signed by the Canadians in 1974 at the precise time when the government was saying they had to have a cartel to protect the Canadian industry, which is nonsense.

My second question is: Did the minister not know that Canadian companies were signing contracts with the United States at the same time as the cartel was at its height?

Mr. Gillespie: Again the hon. member is completely misreading and trying to misrepresent the situation. He talks about 1974. We entered into this agreement in 1972. I would remind him that the situation that he has described as having existed in 1974 did not exist in 1972. The second point which he should make clear and he has not made clear is that those so-called forward agreements were conditional upon the United States lifting its embargo. The United States had given no indication to us, or to anybody else as far as I know, that it would lift its embargo. That embargo was in place.

Mr. Gillies: That's not true.

If the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources did not know in 1973 that the embargo was going to be lifted, he was probably the only person in the world associated with uranium who did not know that, because there are letters between the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and Gulf Minerals; for example, there is a letter about a contract—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are drifting increasingly into a tendency to argue rather than to question. I recognize the hon. member for Don Valley for a final supplementary question.

Mr. Gillies: If the minister says it was important in 1974, why did the government not start the cartel in 1965? The U.S. embargo started in 1964. We now have some indication it might have been illegal and it also appears to have been stupid.

Mr. Gillespie: Maybe we should have started it earlier, Mr. Speaker, but I will tell the hon. member why we did not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gillespie: Canada has always stood for producer-consumer groups. It has been a basic part of our policy to try to work out commodity agreements with consumers as well as producers, and we made every effort to do so. We also hoped, as a result of representations to the United States, that they would lift their embargo. Unfortunately, it was not possible to put together producer-consumer commodity groups and it was not possible to get the United States to lift their embargo, and that is why we went ahead in 1972.

URANIUM—REASON FOR FAILURE TO ADOPT TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—ALLEGEDLY CONFLICTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed either to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources or to the Prime Minister. Assuming that the government, if they are to be believed, were concerned with Canadian consumers and with keeping down the domestic cost of uranium, why did the government not go to a legal two-price system for uranium as was done with wheat, and also would the minister explain how it is that the government, on one hand, was ostensibly committed—as noted in the Speech from the Throne and in other areas—to strong competition legislation including amendments to the restricted trade practices law, and on the other hand was engaged at the same time in setting up and operating an uranium cartel to eliminate competition? Could the minister or the Prime Minister elaborate on this apparent duplicity?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): If the hon. member had read the statement he would realize our policy with respect to domestic market was not affected by the cartel arrangement.

Mr. Gillies: Not true.

Mr. Gillespie: It was up to the producers to make their own deal with the consumers. The whole thrust of the cartel arrangement had to do with external markets and not with the Canadian market or the U.S. market.

Some hon. Members: Nonsense.

Mr. Gillespie: The clear implication is that opposition members are less interested in the Canadian public interest and much more interested in serving as chore boys for a Congressional committee.

Mr. Gillies: You are not telling the truth.

COMBINES

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—REASON FOR PROTECTING PARTICIPANTS FROM PROSECUTION

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): I want to thank the minister for his answer and simply say that it does not appear to be in accordance with what happened in the Canadian domestic market. My last question is directed to the minister or to the Prime Minister. If the circumstances surrounding the setting up of an uranium cartel were perfectly legal, as was stated by the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister, why was it necessary to advance guarantees against prosecution to the Canadian participants in the cartel, as set out in an internal document dated 1972 which states briefly, in a couple of lines:

> . . . the Minister of Justice of Canada . . . will prevent any action being taken under Canada law against participants in the agreement, at least as long as the present government is in power.

Furthermore, why was it then necessary to proclaim what amounted to a gag law, which the government has already had to modify, if everything was perfectly legal?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to read the statement. If he were to read it he would understand and not make the kind of wild allegation he is making this morning.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DATE OF APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF REVIEW COMMITTEE AND POSSIBILITY OF PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, on October 19 I endeavoured to put a question to the government House leader. The Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, undertook to reply and indicated that he would give me the information the following day. I am putting the question again. Further to the statement of the President of the Privy Council to this House on February 4 last, can the minister state whether a chairman has been appointed to the special committee to review the Public Service Employment Act and if so does the special committee intend to hold public hearings? If it does intend to do this, when will they be held?

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, on Feburary 4, 1977 the government House leader made an announcement that a committee would be set up for this purpose. The government is very much concerned with this question and realizes the many representations made by the hon. member. I am informed that the Deputy Prime Minister will be making an announcement as to the chairmanship of this committee very shortly and will make a report to the House at that time.

TRANSPORT

AVAILABILITY OF BOXCARS FOR DELIVERY OF WHEAT—ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to direct a question to the acting minister. My question concerns complaints that are general throughout western Canada to the effect that there is injustice in the allocation of boxcars for the shipment of wheat and the like. Certain areas receive preference and other small areas do not. I should like to ask the acting minister to bring the situation to the attention of the Wheat Board and insure that those smaller marketing areas are not discriminated against.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in fact the minister is out west today where he will chair three meetings with the people concerned to discuss matters concerning the transport of grain in the west.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the acting minister to whom I directed my question that there should be an end to this kind of discrimination. It did not exist until the Department of Transport took over the allocations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—REQUEST THAT CABINET MEET UNION LEADERS BEFORE MAKING PROPOSALS TO COMPANY

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister received a telex yesterday afternoon which was signed by municipal leaders, federal members of parliament, provincial members of parliament and the President of the Chamber of Commerce and asked the Prime Minister and his Cabinet to meet with the leadership of the workers in the Sudbury Basin before meeting with officials of International Nickel Company and Falconbridge to discuss their proposals for avoiding the layoff of workers in Canada, may I ask the Prime Minister's response to it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated earlier that there would be a meeting this afternoon in Toronto between union leaders, officials of the Canadian government and the provincial government. The Minister of Employment and Immigration is standing by to see if he can assist in any way in these meetings. If necessary, he will join them at a later hour.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that we in the Sudbury Basin are extremely concerned that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet not lay a proposal before International Nickel Company prior to consultation with the leadership of the trade union movement who have five excellent points to propose to deal with the layoff situation, can the Prime Minister assure the House that his Cabinet colleagues will meet with the union leadership to listen to these proposals prior to laying any suggestions before the company? That is our concern. Can the Prime Minister give us that assurance in the House?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can give the House the assurance that almost goes without saying, that we realize the co-operation of the management and of the union is necessary in solving this very serious problem. In that sense, I can assure the hon. member that no solution will be imposed upon anyone. I cannot give him the assurance that we will not begin discussions—we probably have at this hour begun discussing the solution of work sharing with one and later will with the other party. Obviously, if the union has other suggestions we would be very happy to discuss them with the union and with the company. I would just remind the House that this government asked parliament to adopt in the last session amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to permit us to enter into work sharing schemes. The proclamation of that section awaits the co-operation of the management and of the union. If the hon. member has any influence with the union I hope he will talk to them about this provision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I wish hon. members would not bang their desks like that before they hear the final supplementary question. I am sure that the Prime Minister is not aware that the union's proposals concern suggestions such as no overtime, when in fact the workers on production at INCO worked overtime up to last week to produce stuff they cannot sell, that they are still working on bonus mining to produce stuff they cannot sell, and that there needs to be some adjustment to the pension plan to allow for 30 years and out, surely these are all very concrete proposals which the government will seriously consider with the union leadership and lay before the company before asking that federal taxpayers' money be used through the unemployment insurance fund to subsidize INCO's production again. I see that as another concession to the company. These four proposals are very constructive and I beg the Prime Minister to consider them with the union leadership before proposing work-sharing.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has taken three questions to ask if we would study any proposal put forth by the union. My answer to the first question was yes. The answer to the second question is the same yes. The answer to the third is the same yes. If the hon. member wants to ask further supplementaries and make further speeches we would be glad to say yes to those as well. We are very concerned with finding solutions to this very large layoff, that the union, that the management and that the government themselves will be putting forward for discussion.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

EFFECT OF ORDER IN COUNCIL—POWER TO INVESTIGATE GOVERNMENT ACTIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of his answers to our House leader and the hon. member for Central Nova. In view of the fact that on several occasions, and again today, the government admitted it brought in amendments to the atomic energy control regulations in July 1972 solely as a means of enforcing quotas and minimum prices as set by the cartel in Paris and that this violates the spirit if not the letter of the Combines Investigation Act, would the minister tell the House if the government believes that a mere order in council supersedes the combines legislation that he discussed today?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that point is covered very carefully in the statement made a fortnight ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which made clear that what was envisaged was a regulatory scheme. The jurisprudence shows that this is an exemption under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given today that the Combines Investigation Act sets out the right and gives the authority to investigate, does the minister go so far as to say with this kind of legal drivel, that he can investigate the executive power that set up this illegal cartel?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, he obviously cannot challenge the legality of regulations lawfully passed by the executive. The place for that challenge is in the courts. The regulations were upheld in a decision of the high court of Ontario in June and have been subject since then to challenge by six members of parliament. We are awaiting the decision on that matter.

An hon. Member: That is another regulation.

COMBINES

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—REASON FOR PROMISE OF FREEDOM FROM PROSECUTION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up the question put by the hon. member for Central Nova to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who sidestepped it, though not too well. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, if the government thought this cartel was so legitimate, could he advise why it was necessary to have a letter or memo to the effect that there would be a delay or avoidance of prosecution? Further, why was it necessary to impose a gag law? In other words, if everything was so swell and all right, why was it necessary to have these two innocuous statements placed before the Canadian people?

● (1152)

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and another one previously talked about guarantees of non-prosecution. I am aware of no such guarantees having been given at any time.

The latter part of the question has been answered by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The regulations were passed, namely, to support the activities of the marketing scheme.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact that the hon. member for Central Nova brought to the attention of the House, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources a memo to the effect that there would be some delay or avoidance of prosecution, would the Minister of Justice now undertake to look into this matter to see whether in fact there is such a memo or directive involved?

Mr. Basford: The easiest way would be for the hon. member to send me the memo he is talking about.

Mr. Alexander: Go ahead and look for it.

BEEF—POSSIBILITY OF IMPLEMENTING IMPORT POLICY RECOMMENDED BY SENATE COMMITTEE

Mr. Cliff McIsaac (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Earlier this month the agriculture committee of the other place published a report of its extensive inquiry into the financial disaster suffered by Canadian beef producers over the past few years. Has the Minister of Agriculture had an opportunity to consider this report, and if so, can he tell the House whether he intends to bring in legislation implementing the import policy recommendations contained in that report?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I had a meeting this week with a sub-committee of that Senate committee, and we discussed the report in detail. I hope to be able to make an announcement in the very near future on what parts of the committee report we can use to the advantage of beef producers.

ENERGY

URANIUM—REASON FOR ALLEGED SECRECY IN FORMING CARTEL

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is with respect to the uranium cartel. It seems to me that the thing people are asking about generally with respect to this matter is, if it was so proper why the government took the option of making this agreement in secret and not bringing it before parliament in the way producers' agreements with marketing boards in other matters are brought in. Why was this matter cloaked in an aura of secrecy as opposed to bringing it before the people of Canada through parliament? Why has that not been done by the government?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was brought forward under existing legislation. It was also made quite clear what the government was doing. There was an announcement by the former minister to that effect.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Under the circumstances, is it the position of the minister that there is one law for the government of this country and another for the rest of the people under the Combines Investigation Act? The minister justifies this whole arrangement, which has caused such damage to our uranium industry and to the reputation of our country, by saying that the regulation justified the government's action. Is it the position of the minister that there is one law for the government and another law for the average person on the street?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is afraid to answer that.

URANIUM—REASON FOR FORCING DOMESTIC PURCHASERS TO PAY WORLD PRICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Noting that shipments will be made from the government stockpile of uranium concentrates to the Spanish electric utilities in 1978, why has the government of Canada not offered to sell the provincial utilities in Canada uranium concentrates purchased at $4.75 to $6 a pound with Canadian taxpayers' dollars rather than leaving them exposed to world prices? To be precise, why should Ontario Hydro pay world prices or more for uranium concentrates mined in Ontario and purchased by the government of Canada at prices more than 100 per cent below world prices?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, what Ontario Hydro pays for its concentrates is a matter dealt with through negotiation and by commercial contracts between Ontario Hydro and the producers. As the question of the stockpile, the Canadian government stockpile is a very important strategic reserve for this country.

Mr. Rodriguez: How about nickel?

Mr. Gillespie: It is a basis for ensuring that there will be an adequate supply of uranium for Canadians in the future.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, is the minister aware of the sworn testimony of William Gilchrist, former head of Eldorado Nuclear, which makes it clear that one of the reasons for the massive hikes in the price of uranium through 1974 and 1975 was that the Canadian government did not sell from its own stockpile to moderate the price, and would the minister tell the House why the government chose not to restrain excessive uranium prices on behalf of Canadian utilities, bearing in mind that Uranium Canada stated in its recent report that a continuation of the rapid rise in the price of uranium could be detrimental to the industry, making the choice of nuclear energy less attractive economically?

[Mr. Gillespie.]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has read a long question which has been prepared by his research staff.

An hon. Member: Did you follow it?

Mr. Lawrence: Look who's talking.

Mr. Gillespie: Surely, the hon. member is interested in seeing the Canadian uranium industry benefit from rising world prices. Canada alone did not have a major effect upon the increase in prices. It had some effect, probably, in the years between 1972 and 1974, but immediately following the oil price increase, the price of uranium around the world took off, and for very obvious reasons. There is a very high energy component in uranium; that is why people were buying it. People suddenly realized that oil was no longer going to be a secure source of energy in the future, and they started to look at alternative forms. That was also the time when Westinghouse, which had been selling short—which had had a depressing effect on uranium prices—suddenly realized that it was in a bind and repudiated its contracts. If we take a whole series of circumstances together, we can see why the world price of uranium rose very rapidly.

FINANCE

EFFECT ON JOBS OF TAX INCENTIVES TO CORPORATIONS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that Northern Telecom in its report to shareholders of August 5 states that the March budget's corporate tax credits, which the minister has announced he will re-introduce, reduced the company's effective tax rate from 42.8 per cent to 40.6 per cent, or about $3 million, and in view of the fact that subsequent to this tax cut the company announced lay-offs of over 1,000 workers, mainly in Quebec and Ontario, does the minister still maintain that these tax incentives are creating jobs and not just fattening corporate coffers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, sales patterns of a corporation can vary from one month to the next. Obviously, tax cuts offered by my predecessor were intended, on the medium term, to stimulate investment and create jobs, but it may happen, on the short term, that market conditions bring about a decline in employment. However, I think that the goals aimed at by my predecessor, on the medium term, will produce the expected results.

[English]

SUGGESTED INQUIRY INTO HOW TELECOM SPENT TAX SAVING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the minister well knows that these lay-offs occurred subsequent to these tax cuts, and we have no guarantee that in the future workers will be rehired.

In view of the fact that Walter Light, president of Northern Telecom, stated on September 24 that besides the sluggish economy a major reason Northern was laying off 1,000 employees was, "Telecom's own success in recent years at devising ways to produce more products with fewer employees", will the minister now launch an inquiry into how the budget gift of $3 million to Telecom was spent? Was it spent on job creation or on machines to replace workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that manufactured products in Canada must sustain competition with all the world goods, and that we have to accept modern technologies if we want to keep our markets. Therefore the hon. member's proposal does not hold because I believe it is very important for Canadian industries to take the necessary steps to be able to sustain competition on world markets, otherwise lay-offs will be much greater than they are now.

BILINGUALISM

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT TO ELIMINATE CERTAIN INJUSTICES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

The government announced recently, through the President of the Treasury Board, its decision not to create bilingual districts. Considering that the Official Languages Act is based to a large extent on the creation of bilingual districts, can the minister tell the House whether the government intends, in addition to the proposals which have been announced in the Speech from the Throne, to bring in amendments to the Official Languages Act during this session in order to eliminate a lot of provisions irritating minority language groups in the country as well a some statutes of the federal government containing anomalies and inconsistencies which are not acceptable at all to the minority language groups?

● (1202)

[English]

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the government indicated in the Speech from the Throne, there will indeed be proposals for amendments to the Official Languages Act. As to exactly what the content of the amendments will be, the hon. member will have to wait until the legislation is presented to the House.

COMBINES

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—POSSIBILITY OF INQUIRY BY PRIME MINISTER INTO EFFECT ON DOMESTIC PRICES

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I thought I heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources say earlier that there were no domestic price consequences caused by the existence of the cartel. Did the Prime Minister's office in fact investigate whether the cartel did raise Canadian prices in concert with world prices?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the minister indicated, the policy was clear in that it was not to apply to the Canadian market. The principal consumer, Ontario Hydro, has said that they were clear that they had not been adversely affected by this marketing arrangement. As far as the government knows, there has been no adverse effect on the Canadian consumer. For greater certainty, we have set up at the request of the opposition an investigation under the Combines Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: We want a public one.

Mr. Trudeau: The opposition is now saying they have no confidence in the law that until now they had confidence in. They are saying they have no confidence in quasi judicial tribunals because they are on a recent kick. I find it very ironic that at a time when Canadian mineral production is under serious attack in the world market, causing high unemployment in Canada, that the opposition should be about six years late in worrying about orderly marketing arrangements which saved jobs in Canada and which will give jobs to the people in Sudbury who are looking for jobs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—INQUIRY WHETHER ASSURANCE SOUGHT THERE WOULD BE NO EFFECT ON DOMESTIC PRICE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister just said that the cartel arrangement was not to apply to domestic prices. If I heard him correctly, he just said that as far as the government knows, there was no implication for domestic prices. On the other hand, there is an internal memorandum from Gulf dated March 8, 1974, and I will quote the relevant sentence:

> The EMR staff does, however, recognize that Canadian utilities must be prepared to pay the same prices—

That means the cartel set prices.

> —that we could achieve from export sales.

In other words, the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons today directly contradicts the understanding given to Gulf by EMR officials in 1974. What I want to know from the Prime Minister is whether the government of Canada, as a cabinet, prior to approving this cartel arrangement sought and received reliable assurances that there would be no impact upon domestic prices. Did the Prime Minister look for those assurances and did he receive them? If so, will he table them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when we set up the arrangements they were done under cabinet and government policy. The direction of the policy is well known, that it was not to affect adversely Canadian markets or for that matter American markets. This was clearly in the policy. If the producers in any way went beyond that policy and if they are guilty under some combines law which is not authorized by government policy, naturally they will be found out by the combines investigator. I do not know of any consumer in Canada complaining. I gave the evidence of Ontario Hydro which said that they were not adversely affected by this cartel. It seems to me that we should take their word for it rather than the suspicious mind of the opposition leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we appear to have made a little progress here. We are now told by the Prime Minister that the companies which were forced by the government of Canada to enter into this cartel are uniquely and alone responsible for any illegality, if any illegality has occurred, and that the Prime Minister and the government of Canada which authorized and forced this agreement bear no culpability under the law. That is the position of the government of Canada, shifting off the responsibility of the people they forced into this arrangement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ALLEGED URANIUM CARTEL—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I want to come to this question of the public inquiry. What parliament and the people of Canada want to know is not simply whether the companies broke the law. We also want to know what was the role of the government of Canada. We have received, as my colleague from York-Simcoe indicated, a legal opinion from a former senior official in the Combines Investigation Branch of the government of Canada making the point, and I quote part of the letter:

> The Director of Investigation and Research by law is restricted in his ability to deal with matters outside the purview of the Combines Investigation Act and cannot fully probe the allegations about government involvement in the uranium cartel.

The Prime Minister and his ministers have several times today defended this narrow inquiry by the Combines Investigation Act branch because it deals with the purposes of the inquiry. Our point and the point of the people of Canada is that the purposes of the inquiry are too narrow because they exclude the role of the government of Canada. Will the Prime Minister now call a major public inquiry that will look into the role of the government of Canada and not simply the companies the government seeks to blame?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Clark.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as to the long preamble by the Leader of the Opposition about the government forcing companies into this operation, I urge him to read a public letter sent by Steve Roman of Denison Mines, a citizen who members opposite may have heard about, who indicated that these orderly marketing arrangements were to the great benefit of producers and workers in Canada. Therefore this argument about forcing is obviously a spurious argument.

The additional preamble about the government forcing people to do something and then blaming them for illegality is obviously controverting my earlier answer. I did not say that. I said that the government had a policy which authorized an orderly marketing arrangement and to the extent that companies acted within this policy, they were doing what the government had requested and advised for the protection of the workers and the producers.

In so far as any other illegalities having been entered into by anybody, producers or for that matter the government, we hope it will come out in the investigation by the combines investigation office. The Minister of Justice has indicated that he did not agree with the legal point made by the Leader of the Opposition. He undertook to look into it. He will look into it and report to the House at a further date. However, until now we have asked the combines investigation officer to look into all aspects of this and to the effect that anyone in Canada might have broken the law, including the government. We are absolutely convinced that was not the case as far as the government is concerned. We have no knowledge what some companies may have done under the pretext or cover of government policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. During the course of the question period today on a number of occasions I extended some considerable leniency that I obviously cannot continue to do because it is cramping greatly the opportunity for other members to express their points. I extended some leniency in respect to preambles to questions and long answers. I want to serve notice to the House that I cannot continue to do that. Today I have attempted to compensate somewhat by allowing the Leader of the Opposition extended time. I will certainly allow him a final question and close off the question period in that way. However, I have to indicate to hon. members on both sides that in order to try to share the question period time adequately among both the front and back benches on both sides, henceforth questions and answers will have to be a good deal shorter than they were today.

Mr. Clark: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will be very brief. If I can get the Prime Minister's attention—

Mr. Trudeau: Why didn't you ask the question during question period?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: My question is for the Prime Minister who is trying to assume the role of Speaker. Will he guarantee to the House of Commons that there will be an inquiry broad enough and public enough to investigate all aspects of the involvement of the Government of Canada?

● (1212)

Mr. Trudeau: I just gave an answer to that question. At the request of the opposition, we referred this whole matter to the Combines Investigation investigators. Having done that, we find they want some other investigation. I would think that had the Leader of the Opposition wanted to ask that question he could have done so at the beginning of the question period rather than now.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain on a point of order.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention on two important technical points which should be respected if we are to preserve the rights and privileges attached to the functions of hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Champlain has the floor.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I will deal first with the omission, probably unintended, that Your Honour has made during the second round of questions. Yesterday, in spite of all my efforts to be recognized, while I rose and sat at least ten times, you did not consent to give me the floor.

Our party was limited to only one intervention, that is the one of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) yesterday and the one of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) today.

My second point is about the time reserved for motions under Standing Order 43. I have noticed on several occasions that you proceeded to the oral question period when there were still a few seconds left before 11.15. However, this is less important than the fact that this period usually lasts only seven or eight minutes whereas it is supposed to last 15 minutes.

I think there could be two possible solutions: one would be to allocate 15 full minutes to this period as long as there are enough motions to fill it and the other to start that period as soon as the required 20 members have taken their seats. This is not only a question of order but also a question of equity for all of us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain is offering to consider, and I will ask him to do so, what happened during the oral question period yesterday, today and on other days when I gave the floor to hon. members of each party according to the number of members of each party who were present in the House. It is indeed the Speaker's judgment on each occasion to recognize each member according to the number of members of each party who are present in the House at the time.

Order, please. The same applies to motions under Standing Order 43, before the daily oral question period.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that the debate last evening concluded with a vote. If the hon. member for Battle River had the floor prior to the vote, that certainly places him in a difficult position. I am not sure how much time the hon. member had taken up; if he were severely prejudiced I might consider allowing him a few minutes now.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. If my hon. friend from Battle River is given the opportunity to complete his remarks your decision will certainly be considered appropriate on this side of the House, but since the Minister of Communications has already been recognized perhaps Your Honour would consider calling on my hon. friend immediately afterwards.

Mr. Speaker: It we are to do it at all, we had better give the hon. member for Battle River five minutes now in which to complete his remarks.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a sincere problem we are facing in response to the Throne Speech delivered a few weeks ago.

Yesterday, just prior to the vote, I was pointing out that in essence what the government has done has been to waste a decade for Canadians. It has wasted our resources, it has wasted our development but, more important still, it has wasted the trust and confidence of Canadians. Take a look at the regional disparities which exist in the country today. We note that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), campaigning in Edmonton in 1974, stated that in no case would rail charges for the short haul exceed those for the long haul. The truth is that the same inequities exist today. Take a look at the abnormalities in freight rate structure categorized by the Department of Transport. In no less that 22 categories anomalies in freight rates continue to exist. Here we are, three and a half years after the last election, and there are still 22 groups of anomalies in the freight rate structure.

This is the situation to which we have come—one million unemployed, major industries closing down everywhere, not just in the Sudbury basin—small companies overloaded with paperwork. The dollar bills we use today should have been minted rather than printed. We heard last night that for the first time the dollar has dipped into the 80 cent group and the degree of regional disparity is reflected by the fact that the five eastern provinces have 37 per cent of all the unemployed. More despairingly still we find that an added 50 per cent of our young people today are among the unemployed, the unemployment rate having doubled since the present government took office.

Then, there was the startling information that the government will have to contribute some $4 billion in unemployment insurance, up by more than $1 billion as compared with a year ago, which simply illustrates that the government of the day has no strategy for coping with unemployment or satisfying the needs of the nation in terms of providing incentives to develop the economy. The government should be charged with the rape of the nation. In 1968 federal expenditures amounted to $9 billion. Today, those expenditures have risen to $40 billion with a $9 billion deficit. So, when this government took office we had a $9 billion budget and today we have a $9 billion deficit. This shows clearly and succinctly that the government is simply incompetent to run the nation's business. In the six years from 1970 to 1976, federal expenditures increased by 61 per cent. What a waste of the people's money, especially considering that in the same period the consumer price index increased by some 55 points.

In face of all this mismanagement, we have to realize that there has been a double knifing of the farm population of this country. In 1976 we note that farm incomes in Canada increased two per cent but input costs increased 40 per cent. In other words, farmers had a net drop in income of 38 per cent.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like at this time to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That Your Majesty's advisers, by their failure to develop and implement a comprehensive industrial strategy for Canada, are directly responsible for the high level of unemployment and the loss of export markets, and have thereby forfeited the confidence of the people of Canada and this House.

[Mr. Malone.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): With the permission of the House, the Chair would like to reserve judgment on this amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, like many Canadians I was pleased that the Queen, opened this session on the occasion of her Jubilee. I am one of the Canadians who hope Her Majesty will be able to fulfill her royal functions for many years to come with the dignity and graciousness which won her public admiration throughout the world. I also wish to congratulate the two new members who have moved the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Their speeches revealed, of course, their very good knowledge of public affairs and keen awareness of the political situation in Canada. For one of them the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), whom I had the opportunity to see at work during his electoral campaign, such ability has not come as a surprise to me. He has already held several public offices and is highly qualified to perform his new duties brilliantly as a member of parliament.

The Speech from the Throne, Mr. Speaker, mentioned some of the steps the government intends to take to solve the national unity crisis. Today, I would like to state briefly in what political context these steps should be taken and what results can be expected at this stage of the debate on the Canadian Confederation.

What progress has been made, in fact, since the Parti Québécois was elected on November 15, 1976, in Quebec as well as in the other provinces, and at the federal level? In the province of Quebec, as everyone knows, Mr. Lévesque's party was elected on the promise to give Quebekers a good government and to postpone the separation of the province until a referendum is held to clarify its mandate. The results of what can be called the electoral trick which brought the Parti Québécois to power are beginning to show. Quebec is governed by a team of intellectuals and university professors without any experience in government—they are not really conversant with Canada's economic, industrial and technical realities and are in addition, given to dogmatic solutions.

I could give many examples to prove my point, Mr. Speaker, but I will mention only two. The PQ's sudden decision to increase the minimum wage to the highest level in North America stems from a very commendable concern for small wage-earners, but equating the minimum wage with social security while it is in fact an economic measure may well turn out to be more harmful than beneficial for those low income earners themselves.

How many small businesses have been compelled to fire one or two of their half-dozen employees? In fact, if the increase ordered threatens the small and medium size firms which are operating somewhat marginally, and if our competitive position on international markets is adversely affected in such areas as the textile and shoe industries, who will be the first to suffer? Precisely those the government meant to help.

Likewise in the linguistic area. Under the guise of a cultural insecurity which is greatly exaggerated, the Quebec government is likely to complicate more than what would be normally acceptable, among other things the lives of head offices in Montreal. Montreal is admirably situated to serve as a practical link with New York City, where a great many deals are transacted, Toronto, and the rest of Canada. This vocation for Montreal, however, has now been seriously jeopardized. Yet the PQ party would prefer that we did not mention this. It suggests that to show the signs of a sure deterioration of the situation, as evidenced by the shocking number of houses for sale in the City of Montreal, is to indulge in political terror and seek to make a point through fear.

Of course, the economic situation is poor throughout the land, with the possible exception of Alberta where the growth rate is definitely higher than in the rest of the country. Quebec is certainly not the only region to receive hard knocks, but assuming that everything which is taking place in Quebec, that is a decrease in private investment and an unfavourable migratory balance, as it was quite recently pointed out by the new member for Outremont, Mr. André Raynauld, assuming that absolutely everything is attributable to the economic situation elsewhere, is it the time then to introduce political changes which are likely to disrupt completely the existing order? Through its propaganda, the PQ would like to generate a liking for Quebec but they themselves do not like Quebecers. They dream of new structures and of building a political authority which will tickle their vanity. They dream of independence when nobody is independent. They preach a state religion while forgetting that of the man they were committed to serve.

One of the things we must denounce in this government is its partisanship, and that is even more frightening than its political options. We have seen that during the great debate on Bill 101. We have been told, among other things, that the Parti Québécois alone is the embodiment of Quebec's collective soul, that those who do not agree with the party are suspected of sympathizing with Anglophones. But we have seen that the soul of Quebecers is less collective than one would think. When they prevented the distribution of Mr. Keith Spicer's audio-visual kit called "O Canada", a group of citizens of my constituency, of Ahuntsic/Laval-des-Rapides volunteered to distribute these kits to students who asked for them. In my constituency alone, 5,000 kits have been handed out and we ordered 2,000 more to meet the demand. This indicates that Quebecers will never be muzzled, even by a so-called interpretation of their own collective soul.

Likewise when the figures concerning the advantages of Quebec's participation in Confederation were published. What do they do when these figures show something different from what that party would like them to depict? The Quebec government publishes national figures which corroborate its own PQ theory and declares that all those who doubt the official interpretation are incompetent.

The main point to be remembered of, Mr. Speaker, is that the PQ team does not feel at ease to govern because of the fundamental ambiguousness of its terms of reference. How can the Lévesque government pretend to behave as a good provincial government and work in the interest of Confederation without destroying its own theory to the effect that federalism is a nonsense and Quebec must leave it? There is a fundamental contradiction which even those with the best intentions in the world will eventually be unable to live with.

Good government is not possible so long as the hindrance of independence is not removed. The Parti Québécois is fooling the people without caring to enlighten them. So many of its statements give rise to confusion: there will be no independence. That is what they said in the beginning; then they said it was inevitable. All of a sudden we were faced with sovereignty-association, as if it were possible to do something and the opposite at the same time. Quebec should at least be honest enough to tell us that sovereignty-association comes necessarily with independence, and then we will see how the people in Quebec will react.

Quebec cooperates with the federal government only when it is a matter of obtaining funds from this government. Nobody is fooled by this ruse. But we, in the federal government, will not refuse that cooperation, even though we do so reluctantly, unwillingly, because we do not want to deprive Quebecers of the benefits of Confederation. As far as we are concerned, Quebec has not yet separated.

What is happening in the rest of the country, because it is also important to know what will be the response of the rest of the country to the present crisis. It seems to me that after the initial shock of November 15, after the kind of disbelief at first in the real intentions of Mr. Lévesque and his team, Quebec's partners within the Canadian Confederation are now becoming clear-headed.

Slowly but surely English Canada is realizing that nothing can any longer be as it was before. Right from the outset some provincial premiers expressed a desire to get to the bottom of the problem. There was no outraged denunciation of bill 101, for example, on their part. The provinces, mostly English-speaking readily understood that they could not denounce bill 101 introduced by the Quebec government without blaming themselves. Quite fortunately their awareness of that uncomfortable situation prompted them to make the St. Andrews statement which I am sure will soon result in a human and minorities rights charter enshrined in a constitution and solemnly guaranteed by the supreme authority of the law. So we are on the right track.

What did the federal government think at the time bill 101 was introduced? In the name of a pluralistic conception of our society, in the name also of the freedom of movement of citizens throughout the country, in short, in the name of general and noble principles, we could have disallowed bill 101 or challenged its constitutionality before the Supreme Court. Apart from our historical reality and in terms of absolute principles, I for one would be prepared to fight fiercely for the freedom of choice of the language of education in Quebec and in all Canadian provinces.

But is one justified at this particular time in our history to hide behind broad principles when, historically Francophones outside Quebec never obtained from the English provinces, with the exception of Ontario, where a great effort was made, the same rights as the English minority in Quebec?

• (1232)

[English]

One may have some feeling today about the situation in Quebec resulting from the passage of Bill 101. Nevertheless, they still enjoy their own public education system. How could we intervene in the name of our power of disallowance when we did not lift as much as a finger when the Francophones of other provinces were the subject of negligence and sometimes of hostility on the part of public authorities? How can one forget the Manitoba law in the beginning of the century when Francophones in that province were deprived of French schools, and the fact that at the time the champions of liberty had not felt that they should fight for those minority rights?

What about the time of this famous rule 17 in Ontario? Where was the federal government with its power of disallowance of that kind of thing? Where was the federal government when I, as an adolescent student in Ottawa, had to write my examinations in English? To think that today the federal government could have disallowed Bill 101 is to ignore our history.

[Translation]

This is tantamount to ignoring our history and the deep wounds that have not yet healed in the collective unconscious of French Canadians. To denounce the injustice of Quebec towards its English minority in the name of a superior conception of justice that the Anglophones have never respected themselves would have appeared quite indecent to the French Canadians.

When Confederation came into being, the English language then needed protection, since Anglophones were in a minority in Lower Canada. Georges-Étienne Cartier made reference to that when he said: "If we submit to the provincial legislatures and the imperial government a bill to create a general government, it will be our duty to protect equally all ethnic groups and their various interests." The English language was therefore protected in Quebec.

Are we to conclude that as soon as the demographic balance shifted in favour of the Anglophones throughout the country, justice and tolerance were disregarded? Canada was born out of the need for English and French Canadian to work together and it will not survive without this cooperation. The linguistic and cultural issue is not the only one of which Canada as a whole will have to be aware. Already in a minority in Canada as regards language, French Canadians are also dominated economically in their own province. In Montreal for instance, to continue in the same vein of the present debate, the economy is widely controlled by Anglophones and, as some have already said, in a hundred years of existence, none of the big English banks for instance has ever managed to appoint a French-speaking chairman and executive vice-president. Is it therefore any wonder that French-speaking Canadians are convinced that Anglophones can rise to the top of the economical and political ladder without having to speak French, while a Francophone will never be able to do so unless he is bilingual.

Out of 105 companies operating in Quebec with more than 1,000 employees, 91 are Anglophones. A study of those companies reveals that less than 10 per cent of the executives appointed by their a board of directors are French-speaking. I repeat a mere 10 per cent. And 41 of those corporations do not have a single French Canadian at the management level. All this in Quebec! In the face of such facts, it is easily understood why young Quebecers feel frustrated, when they they are relagated to the public service or self-employment, because they have no access to the best jobs available in their province. However, the situation can be corrected. At the federal government level, this is what we have attempted with a large degree of success.

According to a study conducted at my request, federal Crown corporations showed much more encouraging results than the private sector.

Among Crown corporations, the proportion of French-speaking executives is 23 per cent nationally. The proportion is still higher in Quebec, so that province's private sector is clearly lagging behind. Turning to the directorship level, French Canadians account for some 25 per cent of the total number of directors in our Crown corporations.

These statistics would have to be broken down of course to determine whether we are well represented in every area of endeavour of our Crown corporation. I note for instance that at the Canadian Museums Association, the proportion of Francophones is 50 per cent. A brief look at the study shows that we have not last ground in the cultural areas, but on the contrary, we are present in almost every field of endeavour of the federal Crown corporations. This shows that the ratio of French-speaking Canadians at the federal level is in proportion to the French-speaking population and that they have significantly more equal career opportunities.

Perhaps we were warned of such possibility by Sir John A. Macdonald, but the federal government has understood that a sharing of responsibilities was necessary for the harmonious development of the two founding people of our country. I quote Sir John A. Macdonald in an admonition to his English-speaking fellow-men:

> Looking through the directory of civil servants in Lower Canada, you would be surprised to discover your supremacy over all important positions. Be careful that the French people do not discover those facts and do not begin to expose them.

This was written in 1856.

In spite of those mistakes, those oversights and what I would call our lack of faithfulness toward the spirit which led French and English Canadians to tie their destiny, Confederation is not a failure. We are still speaking French, we have developed our identity and we enjoy a standard of living envied by many.

Indeed, no province in this country is entirely like the others within that Confederation and each in its own way is demanding changes. All have grievances about Confederation in its present form. For Quebec, of course, this is somewhat more obvious because of the language difference. We have one more grievance to add. However, Saskatchewan, for instance, is under many aspects more different from Ontario than from Quebec. Saskatchewan has the same social democratic concerns as Quebec, for example, and gives the same importance to the cooperative movement which Saskatchewan residents consider to have been an important tool for developing regional culture. In addition, there is in the west the same feeling of alienation which is expressed in various ways according to the events. Moreover, the particularities of the Maritime provinces deserve to be maintained if we want to escape the dullness of uniformization in Canada.

Therefore English Canada itself must become aware of its identity. This identity has many facets. English Canada is not homogeneous. It must decide what characteristics each region wants to safeguard within the unity of Confederation. Some will be discouraged at the idea of assembling such diversities within the Canadian Confederation. For my part, I see in this a source of hope because if it considers itself diversified, English Canada will be better able to understand Quebec aspirations and more stimulated to invent the formulas which would enable everyone to feel Canadian without having to give up his provincial or regional roots.

We must therefore take advantage of the present crisis to rethink our country and to rebuild it with our hands. The real danger is to lose interest in the problem of national unity. Introspection is not easy for individuals and even less so for countries and for entire nations. I have already perceived in some circles in my travels through Ontario a certain weariness about this problem of national unity in areas of Ontario which have been traditionally much closer to us than other provinces. This problem bores people when it does not irritate them.

On this level, it seems to me that the role of the federal government is absolutely crucial. It is up to the central government to spirit up lazy minds so as not to allow the country to slip away from us. Canada can survive only if very many of us want to save it. We are looking for and we must now recall those who want to save the country. Everyone must realize that he has no right to leave this task to his neighbour, because a desire to live together can only exist through individuals who are bent on uniting their destiny and no one can decide for someone else. In that sense the federal government cannot act as a substitute for the English provinces and federalist forces in Quebec to define the details of a new confederative agreement, but it can and it must exercise a leadership such as the Prime Minister has been doing so far.

Taking into consideration the change in mentalities and the new opening in English Canada after the impact of November 15, the Prime Minister did offer to take advantage of this new climate to reopen the constitutional issue and seek a renewed constitution.

In the speech he delivered in Quebec City, among others, he just opened doors and some new avenues and he declared himself prepared to join the provinces to launch this great debate. And he committed himself to clean the house from basement to attic if necessary.

But first it was necessary to find out about the tastes and needs of the dwellers of the house, the partitions they wanted to tear down and those they wanted to move away. The Pepin-Robarts Commission has therefore been set up to carry out this inventory and identify on another level the lines of force of any possible evolution or change.

Does this mean that the federal government, now that it has set up thses mechanisms, must sit back and wait? Certainly not, for it would be, in my opinion, a serious mistake on its part. For the federal government has its own message to contribute to this constitutional debate, and it must speak loud and clear. Of course, it is only one of the parties involved in this debate, but the provinces can no more assume its role in the reconstruction effort of our country than it can assume theirs.

It would be easy to re-write the Constitution to please Quebec, or to re-write it to please English Canada. But the real challenge is the one which is confronting us now, that of finding a formula which would be universally practical, without necessarily boxing up the country in a carcan which would render it powerless when faced with diverging regional interests. And the super-challenge is that of defining that new balance between the centre and the areas without the active and interested co-operation of the PQ government now in power. The participation of the Quebec people will definitely be needed because the government itself will not co-operate in that endeavour.

It therefore seems that, in coming months, people will have to remember first that any federal offer to the provinces can only be partial since it comes from the central government. The new constitution cannot be brought forth by the federal government as if by magic. And even if, fortunately, we did discover the magic formula, it would still have to be rediscovered and reinvented jointly with the provinces.

On the other hand, the people can rightly expect us to be imaginative in the invention of new ways in which to exercise powers at both the federal and provincial levels. I feel that Canadians are justified in asking their central government to develop institutional changes to help us go from a federalism of confrontation to a federalism of "concertation".

Whatever new spirit we may hope will come from a new constitution, the fact still remains that in the meantime, and even after, any measure taken by the Canadian government shall, as I said earlier, take into account the past and the common subconsciousness of both founding groups. As Georges-Étienne Cartier once said "in trusting a federal government, the French-speaking population is showing confidence in our English-speaking compatriots. Would it be asking too much of the English that they trust the liberalism and the fair-mindedness of the French in local government?"

It should be recalled that the English were a minority at that time. One could not summarize more briefly our problems, as well as the terms of a durable solution to our problems.

In order to rebuild Canada, we must first restore the mutual trust between our two founding people. If we are not prepared to take common and personal measures to overcome those grudges and those prejudices which divide us, it would be useless to expect miracles out of any new constitution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At the conclusion of his speech the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) moved an amendment. The Chair finds the amendment acceptable, and the question is now on the amendment. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke).

● (1252)

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I should like to say what a pleasure it was for me to hear the Speech from the Throne read by Her Majesty in the other place and to have an opportunity of seeing her at the various functions in Ottawa, as well as for my wife and me to meet Her Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Phillip at the reception here in the parliament buildings. I should like also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

If it would not be considered irreverent by the House, I should like to say that recent actions of the government remind me of a story told me by Howard Clark, the former Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada. The story concerned a little girl who had a sports day coming on a certain Saturday so she was hoping for good weather. She believed in God and so she prayed all week for good weather. She was disappointed, however, because it rained on the Saturday and the sports day was not a great success. Her father was not a believer. He thought it nonsense to believe in a Supreme Being and he said to his daughter, "You see, your prayers were not answered because it is raining today." The little girl showed her faith by replying, "Oh no Daddy, God answers. He always answers. It is just that today the answer was no."

I was reminded of that story because I know that Canadians have been praying the government would take some action to get this country moving again, to get people working again, to cure the many ailments of the country. I am sure that Canadians praying for action must have felt as the little girl did, that God—in this case the government—had said there were not going to be any goodies that particular day.

I want to mention two areas of the Speech from the Throne that may seem unrelated, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure the House that I shall relate them to one another. One is dividends on stocks of Canadian companies and the other is unemployment insurance. The connection may seem tenuous but I hope you will not feel that way when I have finished my remarks.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

Let me begin by referring to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). The document we were handed that day looked very much like the budget document handed to us on March 31 and I thought we were getting a budget or a mini-budget. The government insists it was neither but simply an economic and fiscal statement. Whatever it is called, Mr. Speaker, it made only passing mention of unemployment and unemployment insurance. I thought that odd because in the Speech from the Throne Her Majesty made some moving comments about unemployment, unemployment insurance, inflation and all the other problems we face in Canada today. I should like to read a couple of sentences. At one point Her Majesty said:

> High rates of unemployment and inflation are clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies appropriate to simpler times.

That may be the case, but I wonder if it should not have made reference to simpler minds rather than simpler times. We must ask ourselves who has been in power for the last 14 years? Who has been in charge of the affairs of this country? Fourteen years is long enough to make any changes considered desirable.

Perhaps Her Majesty's remarks concerning unemployment in Canada were more moving when she said:

> The human hardship imposed by the current level of unemployment in Canada is deeply disturbing. It is neither just nor tolerable that in this country there should be so many men and women deprived of the dignity of self-supporting work, unable to meet their financial commitments and plan confidently for the future. It is intolerable that so many are deprived of their right to secure and productive lives, and that their families bear an unfair burden of worry, uncertainty, and deprivation.

Those are very moving words and describe quite accurately, I am sure, the problems and feelings of many Canadians who find themselves in that position through no fault of their own. It seems strange that the government has repeatedly refused to adopt a solution suggested by this side of the House which I am certain would have positive effects on the economic condition of the country and be effective in relieving unemployment. The government says that, of course, all these policies are not going to work, that they are on trial, unproven. The answer to that is that the policies the government has applied have been tried and proven not to work.

The Minister of Finance said that dividends will remain under control for at least another six months, until April 1978 and the increase will be restricted to 6 per cent instead of the 8 per cent allowed previously. Some two years ago in the Anti-Inflation Act then before this House there was a provision that dividends would be frozen, that no increase would be allowed. That provision ignored the fact that many Canadians had taken action to provide for their own wellbeing in old age and relied to a large extent on dividends from investments made from their savings.

The government eventually realized it would be unfair to allow wages to increase by up to 12 per cent while freezing dividends at the level of the year before even though inflation continued. Now, we find they have taken a similar step in principle and restricted the amount of increase on dividends to 6 per cent all the while admitting that inflation will be in excess of 8 per cent. The numbers may be a little different but the principle is the same. The government has ignored the fact that the provisions now put forth are imposing a hardship on those very people who have been thrifty and saved and now rely on dividends for a portion of their income. It is cruel to allow inflation to continue at 8 per cent while restricting dividends which form part of a person's income to 6 per cent.

I see it is one o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I shall continue my remarks at two o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m. this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, before the lunch hour I was commenting on the policy of the government in restricting dividends, a practice which inflicts a penalty upon retired Canadians who rely on dividends for a portion of their income. The government may say, "Yes, but we have indexed pensions to protect the retired people of this country". However, I think we should note that probably only one-third of the workers currently in Canada are covered by any kind of retirement pension plan besides the government pension plan, which provides at best a limited benefit. Of course, private pension schemes are not indexed, and retired people are therefore left on their own to get their income out of their savings.

I think the most important aspect, however, of the freeze on dividends—and the biggest negative factor—is the effect that it has on investment in Canada. Capital, as well as labour, is hit. Capital, naturally, cannot be invested at low rates while there is a high rate of inflation, so if we have a rate of inflation of 8 per cent, capital has to seek the real return that it earns in addition to the 8 per cent. That is why mortgage rates in Canada today exceed 12 per cent. In its search for high returns, capital is discouraged, therefore, from investing in Canada because of the freeze on dividends, or at least the limitation to a 6 per cent increase. If there is no investment of capital in Canada, there will be no creation of new jobs.

Workers all over Canada who have their savings held in pension funds are also interested in the dividend rate because the accumulated dividends in pension funds all over Canada become investment capital for the future, thus creating jobs. When dividends are restricted and capital formation, therefore, is restricted as well, those jobs will not be available. Capital probably finds its best investments in other areas where regulations are not so strict.

I think I have arrived at the tie-in between dividends and unemployment insurance. As I said at the beginning, I want to talk about dividends and unemployment insurance and I will tie the two subjects together. Many members may not realize how important a topic unemployment insurance is. It would be well to remind the House that the estimated current expenditures on unemployment insurance—that is, payments to those unemployed—in the current fiscal year is estimated to be $4,200 million, over $4 billion. In order to get that figure in proper perspective, I remind the House that it is approximately 10 per cent of the total budgetary estimates of the government of Canada for this fiscal year.

Another way of relating it to the over-all financial situation is that unemployment insurance payments will approximate one half of the total budgetary deficit for the current fiscal year. It is now projected to be over $9 billion. Therefore, we are talking about an expenditure, in total, of over $4.2 billion. That is a large enough expenditure. However, the problem of unemployment insurance is two-sided. Not only do the unemployed add to the expenditures of Canada, but because they are not employed, they are not earning wages and, therefore they are not paying taxes and not adding to the revenues of Canada. Therefore, there is a double loss to the country. On the one hand, we have people taking money from the treasury; at the same time, those people are not in a position to put money into the treasury. I am in no way suggesting that it is their fault; I suggest it is the fault of the policies of the government opposite.

The government will boast of all the new jobs that are created. What they do not tell us when boasting of their 200,000 new jobs, is that the number of workers exceeded the number of new jobs created in this past year by some 128,000. There are 128,000 people coming into the work force where no jobs exist. Until they have a job in the work force, there are no unemployment insurance benefits because they have not worked to earn the credits that are necessary.

The minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) both announced a new program of $150 million to develop some 30,000 temporary jobs. It is worth comparing that with the total problem. At today's rate of unemployment insurance, the $150 million will keep the unemployed in benefits for a little over one week. This is hardly a program one can laud on the basis it will take care of the problems. It is a lot like many other government give-aways that we have seen in the past, give-aways which may attract a little favour in the government's direction but which really do nothing in the way of creating permanent jobs that Canadians want today.

For some five years I have campaigned against this kind of government give-away. I started with the Local Initiatives Program and Opportunities for Youth. Certainly, the recipients of these programs were enamoured by the fact that they were getting a few dollars. However, when you sat them down and pointed out that at the end of that particular program they would be back on the sidewalk without a job, they could see it was just a trick of the government to take the heat off.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clarke: We now have the spectacle of Canada Works. I do not know how it is working in all parts of the country, but the figures in my constituency may be typical. In Vancouver Quadra we had applications for Canada Works grants totalling $1.2 million. The budget for Vancouver Quadra was $100,000. The government has funded less than 10 per cent of the need. If there are members opposite who think Vancouver Quadra should be entitled to more, I will agree with them.

Even the Liberal government would have difficulty in justifying how nine constituencies in British Columbia received the minimum of $100,000, while two Liberal constituencies—one of the minister from Skeena—received $4½ million, and the other, Coast Chilcotin, received over $2 million. One would not want to suggest there is anything political about those allegations, but one might have to guess at it. The government recognized that there may be a need, and they designed a program. The shortfall is alarming. In the case of the unemployed and the $150 million, one week of benefits is covered by this little extra gift. In the case of Canada Works, less than 10 per cent of the need in my area was met by such a program.

We on this side of the House, my leader in particular, have called for a major overhaul of unemployment insurance payments. First, the government has to decide whether unemployment insurance is to be an insurance scheme or a welfare scheme. At the moment it is hard to see any difference between unemployment insurance paid as a kind of welfare item, and other give-aways which the government brings in from time to time. It would be easy for the government to let Canadians know the cost of their unemployment insurance plan. At the moment it does not matter about the level of unemployment; the government picks up the tab for the shortfall between the payments out and payments in by workers and employers. This year the shortfall will be something like $1.7 billion. I am not sure Canadian taxpayers really care whether they pay that kind of cost through tax premiums or through tax payments into general revenue. However, it is only fair of the government to let Canadians know the cost of this kind of program.

When talking about costs you need to take a much closer look at unemployment insurance abuses. Here we have not just the attack on individuals who may be abusing the system, and that certainly exists. We have all heard of the Canadian ski team at Banff getting their cheques mailed to them, and the thousands of cheques that went unclaimed during the last postal strike because whoever the unemployed were, they were not interested or needy enough to pick up their cheques when they were made available to them.

It is not only individual abuses: there are abuses of the system by the system. That is the kind of abuse which allows high income earners to collect unemployment insurance during the off season. I know one fisherman on the west coast who can earn $60,000 during the season, and quite legally collect unemployment insurance in the off season. He is perfectly entitled to that because that is the way the rules are. We on this side happen to think that unemployment insurance was not intended for that kind of individual.

We do not intend to lose sight of the regional disparities in Canada. We know very well there are areas on the Atlantic coast, for example, where job openings are non-existent and the number of people seeking work is enormous. We also know there are people in other areas in a similar situation. If I may use the example of Edmonton, there are people unemployed although there are many jobs going begging. In those cases, people would rather be unemployed than go to work.

We can trace that attitude back to the government policy which has made it attractive to be on unemployment insurance. There is certainly a need for real protection. We are not in any way suggesting that the breadwinner of the family who is genuinely unemployed should in any way lose the protection of the unemployment insurance scheme. However, we are not at all certain that Canadians, recipients or payers, want it to be a welfare scheme, which is the way it seems to be right now. We see that the policies of this government have created practically a whole generation of people who have no incentive to work, because the government has made it so attractive not to work. We think the system needs an overhaul so that kind of situation can no longer exist.

I said I would relate these two apparently unrelated topics. I hope I have made it clear how they are related. I think they need to be considered together. We urge the government to come up with some kind of comprehensive economic plan which will get Canada moving. We do not need so-called economic and fiscal statements of the kind the minister gave us last week to tell us what the government hopes to do by way of piecemeal efforts. What is needed is a comprehensive plan which would solve a few of these problems all at once, instead of all these stop-gap measures we are getting from the government.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I confess I have lost track of the number of times I have taken advantage of the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne to speak about a subject which is a favourite of mine, namely, pensions, including old age security and all our other pension programs, in particular the programs which affect our veterans. There is no doubt about it, I intend to make another speech on that subject this afternoon and I shall continue to do so in such debates as this, year after year, as long as it is necessary for the case to be made in this House for our senior citizens, our pensioners and our veterans.

It is clear that the case needs to be made at the beginning of this session. Not long ago the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), in a speech outside this chamber, flew a kite—I suppose that was what he was doing—by suggesting there should be some curtailment of family allowance payments and of old age security benefits. I said what I thought about those remarks right away, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) also expressed her view—a view which was quite the reverse of what the Minister of Public Works had put forward.

This gave me some encouragement, at least for a few days. Within the last few hours, however, news has come that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that members of the cabinet are pressing her to cut back on family allowance payments and on payments to those who qualify for old age security benefits.

An hon. Member: Mean.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister says she is resisting this pressure. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me she is going to need some strength if that resistance is to be effective. Then, of course, she comes out with the old saying that this is a period in which we have to exercise restraint, in which we have to save money, and maybe it is in the field of our social programs that this restraint will have to be shown. Mr. Speaker, that is utter nonsense. Furthermore, it is cruel and heartless.

The government is in trouble, there is no doubt about that. But there is no reason why a government which finds itself in trouble, particularly in the economic field, should look first of all to its workers and the wages they get and, along with workers, at our old age pensioners and other recipients of various social security benefits and say that those programs have to be cut back.

It is precisely because there is uncertainty in this country and precisely because of a lack of confidence in our future that this is the time, I suggest, when we should be eliminating causes of unfairness and moving faster in the direction of fairness and equality for our people. If we tell our older citizens and our veterans that they are the ones who must make sacrifices in the interest of a government which is in trouble we shall not add to confidence in this country but, rather, we shall lessen it. I therefore suggest once again that not only should cut backs be avoided but that there should be advances in our social legislation.

Before anyone asks me whether we can afford it, or where the money is coming from, I would ask the House once again to look at this whole matter in its proper perspective. What has to be considered is not just the figures in the budgets of our various governments but the total production of Canada and the extent to which we are letting our older people share in that production. The estimates for the year show that Ottawa is spending about $5 billion toward the provision of old age security, guaranteed income supplements and other means of maintaining the incomes and the lives of our older people.

I do not know how much other income Canadians 65 years of age and over receive and I doubt whether it is possible to put this information together from the statistics available. But I do know some things. I know that 30 per cent of the nearly two million Canadians who are over 65 have nothing else but their old age security and their guaranteed income supplement upon which to live. I know, also, that a further 30 per cent of those 65 and over have very little else because they qualify for part of the income supplement. I know that many others in the top 40 per cent are experiencing difficulty in getting by in these times of inflation. Therefore I think I am doing a bit of legitimate and justified guessing when I say I doubt whether the total income in the hands of our senior citizens is more than about $8 billion, $5 billion of which comes out of the federal treasury and the rest from some of the provincial treasuries as well as from incomes which some of those over 65 might receive from other sources. My figure could be wrong. Maybe it is too high. If it is too low, I am sure the total does not go beyond $9 billion or $10 billion. But I believe I am pretty close to the truth when I suggest the figure is about $8 billion—I am talking about the total income of the two million Canadians who are aged 65 or over.

These people represent about one-twelfth of the population. But if that one-twelfth is receiving only $8 billion of income each year I ask our members to relate that figure to our gross national product—not to the budgets of governments, but to what we produce in this country. What does our gross national product—gross national expenditure as Statistics Canada calls it—amount to in a year? It is running in excess of $200 billion. The $8 billion which we provide for our senior citizens is one twenty-fifth of the total production of this country. That is, we are giving one twenty-fifth of the total production of this country to one-twelfth of the people. That is mean, inhumane and unfair, and hon. members, whether in the cabinet or elsewhere, have no right to suggest that this is a time to cut back on social programs, that this is a time to cut back on old age security or, indeed, on family allowances, although that is another matter which is separate from the statistics that I have been giving.

• (1432)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Those on the other side who are applauding, are applauding my position. It is good to have some applause from the Liberal backbenches.

Mr. Symes: But will they vote for it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Whether they vote for it or not, through the decades we have taken this position we have made very real gains. We have been doing so for years, and we shall keep right at it.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because the fair thing to do is to improve the position of our senior citizens, I say let there be no more talk about cutbacks. Let there be no more proposals or flying of kites calling for curtailment. Instead, let us advance our social programs and try to bring the portion of our gross national product which we provide for our senior citizens a little closer to the portion that they deserve. It is not fair to give to one-twelfth of our people, the older people who built this country, only one twenty-fifth—or, if my statistics are out, only one-twentieth at the most—of the wealth that we are producing at the present time.

I emphasize again that these people may not now be in the work force. They may not now be part of the productive process. But they built this country to the point where it can now produce that much wealth in the course of a year. This is why I call for an increase in the basic amount of old age security. It is now up to a little over $150 a month, and there is the $105 a month guaranteed income supplement available to those who have nothing else. But not only are the global figures which I have given indicative of how unfair we are to our older people; those figures—$150 to everyone 65 years of age or over; $255 to those who also have the supplement—show that we are not doing what we ought to do for our senior Canadians.

I have already filed my usual resolution for a private member's debate one of these days, I hope. I suggest in that resolution that the basic amount of the pension should now be raised to $300 a month. Let hon. members not throw back at me the question: Where is the money coming from? Any government that cannot direct the affairs of this country so that a group of people as large as the senior citizens are do not get their share is a government that does not deserve to sit across the way.

Not only do I call for an increase in the basic amount of old age security; I call for the escalation formula to be reviewed and put on a proper basis. It is good that there is escalation, that the pension moves up a little bit every three months. But it is always behind. It always relates to the increase in the cost of living which took place several months ago as compared with a few months earlier still. It is never an increase to enable senior citizens to meet the cost increases of the current month or quarter. So I call for a review of the whole escalation formula.

I also call for a lowering of the eligible age, certainly for those who are out of the labour market. I am not at the point of saying that there should be universal pensions at the age of 60 in the way we have them at 65, but I am saying that all those who are out of, or are prepared to leave, the labour market and who are between the age of 60 and 65 should have the right to their old age security at that time.

This leads me to say that I agree with the hundreds of persons, especially women, who write in because they find it incredible that a couple of years ago this parliament passed a piece of legislation having to do with spouse's allowance, providing a payment to a spouse, man or woman, between the age of 60 and 65 so long as that spouse is married to and living with an older pensioner, yet which provides nothing at all for the person of single status, widow, spinster, widower or bachelor. In most cases, those who are denied pensions in this category are spinsters or widows. But those who write to me just do not believe this. They write, "Mr. Knowles, did parliament pass that?" They do not believe that the parliament of a civilized country would have been so uncivilized. I call for this spouse's allowance to be replaced by an old age security pension which is available to everyone between the age 60 and 65 who is out of the labour market.

I also call, Mr. Speaker, for amendments to be made to the Canada Pension Plan. There are a number of technical improvements that I should like to deal with, but they can be raised, at some other time. I want to make once more the main point which was made this morning by one of my hon. friends to my left in a motion under Standing Order 43, namely, that we should lower the eligible age under the Canada Pension Plan to 60 for those who leave the labour market.

I know there is a lot of talk about the right of people to work until they are 65 or 70, or 85 or 90 as some of us might like to do. But the fact is that many workers, especially those in the heavy and dirty industries, can hardly stand the racket until they are 65. If you gave them the chance to retire at 60 on old age security and on the Canada Pension Plan, as well as on any other pension they might have, you would immediately release from the labour market many thousands. This would be of help in alleviating the unemployment situation at the present time. Why keep these older people working with their noses to the grindstone, when they would be entitled to pensions and there are younger people who want the jobs? These are reforms that must be made, and I call on the government to make them in this session of parliament, despite all this talk about restraint and there not being any money to spend on social programs.

I also plead for a new look to be taken at what we are doing for our handicapped people. We have been slow in getting anywhere in this area. The Canadian Council on Social Development a few weeks ago published a very thick volume on the state of our programs for the handicapped of this country. That volume tells a story of a hit and miss operation which does not really recognize the fact that a decent, humane society would try to put those who have handicaps in a position as nearly equal as possible to others. This runs all the way from the structural changes which we should make in our buildings, to special equipment, wheelchairs, transportation, hearing aids and all the rest of it, including adequate pensions or allowances for the blind, to whom we owe a special responsibility. These matters we have hardly touched. We have made a start and we have some legislation, but we are not going to be able to call ourselves a decent, civilized society until these people get all they really need in order to live life as nearly as possible on the basis that it is lived by those whose health and physical capacities are good.

So, Mr. Speaker, I plead for more attention to be paid to the blind and the disabled. Let us not have any talk about this not being the kind of session when these things can be done. It is precisely because there is unhappiness in Canada, because there is a feeling that things are not fair, that we should correct the situation my moving in this direction.

I turn now to another question which I think should be dealt with in this parliament, and that is the whole question of the escalating or indexing of pensions. I know there are certain spokesmen for insurance companies and other bodies who are carrying on campaigns against the indexing of the pensions of public servants, retired RCMP, armed forces personnel, and so on. They argue, why should these people have their pensions indexed when other Canadians do not? That is a good point; if some get it, others should. But the answer to that question is not to take away escalation from those to whom we have given it; rather, let us make it the law that every pension should escalate. Every pension should be indexed. A pension which does not keep up with at least the rising cost of living—and in my view it should keep up with the rising standard of living—is not a pension at all.

● (1442)

These people who are spending money complaining about such indexing as there is should spend their money, their energy and their thought in going in for the proper indexing of all pensions, requiring private pension plans to be indexed or setting up a government scheme for it. In that way things would be a lot better. I know there are those who like to say, "What will it cost down the years? Will future generations be able to afford the pension plans that we build up?" I have said it many times, but let me say it again.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Say it again, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you. My good friend always encourages me to keep going. People on pensions do not live on savings. They do not live on food, clothing and shelter which they have saved from the days when they worked. They live on current production. They live on a portion of what society is producing today. Pensions are just a form of bookkeeping. Just as we decide that children, even though they do not work, will be cared for, so we decided by the granting of pensions that older people will get their share of the wealth that is being produced by a society which is more productive and more capable because they brought it to that point.

This being the reality of the situation, we should start with the simple proposition that retired people should get a pension to enable them to continue to enjoy life as they enjoyed it at the point of retirement, and that they should be able to keep up with the rising cost of living. I go further by saying that I should like to see the day when pensions will rise in accordance with the rising standard of living. At least, if we can get it across the board that pensions must keep up with the rising cost of living, that will be a real improvement.

I hope the studies being made under the direction of the government, under the direction of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare will come up with something very soon. I hope those studies will answer this nonsense that we have had against the escalation of pensions. Instead of allowing that nonsense to continue, I hope we will start attacking the real problem, which is to see to it that the pensions of all our people are properly indexed.

My friend who spoke before me had a bit to say about pensions. He talked about them in another context, but he made the point that very few Canadians who retire have a private pension plan at all. Of course, that just shows that what we really need today is to enlarge greatly the scope of the Canada Pension Plan. I hope the day will come when the Canada Pension Plan will be large enough and the percentage of one's earnings while he was working, that he receives as a pension, will be large enough so that our older people will really have a break in being able to live on their combined old age security and Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Speaker, that almost leads me to the remarks I had in mind by way of summing up this little speech, but I will save what I had in mind to the end because there are a couple of other things I still want to say. First, I mention once again the railway pensions. It is good that there have been some increases. Even the CPR finally got around to the point of making a slight increase in the pensions of those who retired some years ago. I have been receiving interesting mail on this point. I get letters from some who are delighted. An extra $20 or $30 a month to a retired person who is just getting by seems a good deal, and they are most grateful for the efforts which have been made on their behalf.

I get letters from others who get a small amount or who are left out altogether, and they wonder how long the CPR is going to get away with it. Both the CPR and CNR should be required by law, by this parliament and by this government, to excalate the pensions of their retired workers and the survisors of those workers, in accordance with the rising cost of living.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am proud of what this parliament has done. I am proud of what my generation has done. My generation has been in this battle, in politics, in the church, in trade union movements, in farm organizations, and what have you, for 40 or 50 years. I am proud of what we have done in bringing forward these social programs. But unless we extend them, unless we cover everyone, and unless we escalate them to keep up with the rising cost of living, their value will deteriorate and instead of having a happy, contented and satisfied generation of older Canadians we will have people who will be complaining, as everyone else does, about a government which does not know how to run this country.

Before my time runs out, I should like to say a few words about another group, and I refer to our veterans. I am glad to see that my good friend, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald), is with us this afternoon. We all have a great deal of respect for him. For myself, I appreciate and welcome the way I feel he fights with those cabinet colleagues of his for the break our veterans ought to get.

Mr. Paproski: Not hard enough.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, the interjection by my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski), is quite correct. It is not hard enough, but he is fighting as hard as he can. But with the colleagues he has, he has to fight a lot harder.

Just as I am disappointed that there was no reference to old age security in the Speech from the Throne which Her Majesty read to us, so was I deeply disappointed that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was not able to get into that speech some reference to veterans. I pleaded with him during the last session to try to get the cabinet to agree to that, but there was no reference in it at all. Well, that means we do not have a guarantee that anything will be done in this session for veterans. The fact that we do not have the guarantee does not mean we cannot persuade the minister to do something.

The first thing I should like to talk about is the wide gap which has developed between the average wage paid to five designated categories of public servants and the basic rate of the 100 per cent disability pension. As the minister knows, four or five years ago we passed legislation making the 100 per cent pension equal to the average income of five designated groups in the public service. That is where it started 50 or 55 years ago. We got away from it, but we got it back again three or four years ago. Already, it is out of line again. Now there is a gap of over $500 a year between that average which we accepted as a goal and the amount that veterans on the 100 per cent disability pension are receiving. Of course, if there is that gap with regard to the 100 per cent pension, it runs all down the line.

One thing veterans' organizations are pleading for most is the closing of that gap. Let us not wait another 20, 30 or 40 years until we get it back there again. Let us do it now. I plead with the minister to get that through his cabinet in this session of parliament.

Also, I plead with him on behalf of the widows of veterans, particularly those whose husbands' disability pensions were less than 48 per cent. For those cases there are no pensions at all. There is a lot which is good about our veterans' legislation, but to say to a widow, "If your husband had 48 per cent or more, you get the full pension; but if your husband's maximum was 47 per cent or less, you get nothing" is just about as inhuman and cruel as it can be. In these days, the number of widows who are being left with no pension at all is increasing. This is of concern to the veterans. I hope the minister will get action on that in this session. He must!

Also, I hope he will do something about a very small group of Canadian veterans—200 or fewer—who are survivors of World War I, who were prisoners of war in that first conflict and who were not covered. It is not our fault, nor the fault of the committee. It is not the fault of the minister. It was the fault of his cabinet colleagues that they were not covered in the legislation providing for prisoners of war compensation. It would cost only a small amount of money for those 200 people in the years they have left to live. They are all in their eighties or higher. Surely that is something this parliament can do.

While he is at it, perhaps the minister can also do something about the prisoners of war compensation for the escapers and evaders who were not actually taken prisoners but lived a very precarious existence on the continent of Europe in the last war.

I have no hesitation in saying that there is a lot that is good about our veterans' legislation, but that does not relieve us from the responsibility of improving it in such areas as those I have mentioned. The same goes for the War Veterans Allowance Act; there is a lot that is good about it. I am glad a review is taking place, and I hope that review will come up with something that is good for our veterans.

I see that the clock is getting around to the point where you will move to the edge of your chair, Mr. Speaker, so perhaps I better wind up. I am always glad, as I say, to have the chance in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne to speak on a subject I have spoken about in the House, I suppose, a thousand times. That is not an exaggeration if you multiply the number of times per year I have spoken on it, by the number of years I have been here. I am proud of what we have done from the days when the pension was $20 a month at age 70, with a means test. I am proud of all the things that have been added, and I am proud of the improvements we have made for railway workers, retired civil servants, RCMP, armed forces and veterans.

But, sir, this is a different age from the one in which we started these campaigns. It is an age when we are producing $200 billion of goods and services in this country, and we have no right to stand and boast of what we have done in the last 40 or 50 years unless we give these people their rightful place in sharing what we now produce.

So I plead most strongly that these matters be dealt with in this session of parliament. I call in particular on the Minister of Health and Welfare and on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to do the job that is theirs in cabinet. If they do that, we can be proud of what we have done in this session of parliament to make life better for our senior Canadians and for our veterans. In doing so, we can make Canada a country of which all of us can be justly proud.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, allow me first to congratulate very sincerely the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) for having been asked to move the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. As could be expected, he agreed with the contents of the throne speech and this is due to the strict discipline of the majority party. Congratulations also to the seconder of the motion. It must be recognized that both members discharged their duty in a truly graceful manner. I acknowledge in spite of my short experience in this House that those two members should be very sincerely congratulated and this is what I am doing.

I am pleased to sit in this House, Mr. Speaker, on account of the mutually granted respect despite our differences of opinions and principles applying to the administration of the country. I think that the Canadian Parliament is an example for every democracy. It is really fantastic to note how members readily comply with the procedure while suggesting at times some corrections to try to improve it further. That is what democracy is all about and we must try to defend and improve it.

The Speech from the Throne is certainly the best listing of good intentions I have ever heard. Statements on the deplorable economic situation, on the catastrophic rate of unemployment and on our fragile national unity are to the point. Indeed we have been saying so for quite a long time. They are not new realities and too many Canadians have lived with them too long. The throne speech points out the urgency of radically revamping Canada's economy. Finally, we have come to realize that something has to be done.

Now if we decide not to wait a hundred years to do something, I think we will succeed in demonstrating that Canada is not only a prosperous country but a country which considers its riches and does whatever is required to ensure their distribution to provide Canadians with a fair standard of living. Nothing is more obvious and that is exactly what the Social Credit Party of Canada has been claiming all along. I repeat that pious intentions and band-aid measures will never put the country back on the right track. What is needed is nothing less than a sound and intelligent reorganization of Canadian economic and monetary structures.

Mr. Speaker, the government is not proposing any concrete measures. For instance, the Speech deals with the new funding proposals which were made recently to the provinces in the area of social services. Two sentences further, it reads, and I quote:

It is hoped that the response of provincial governments will lead to the introduction . . .

—and realization. We had better hope indeed, when we consider the great constitutional problem which stands in the way of these projects and the bargaining we have to go through. Let us hope. What is needed is not only hope, but action. Why not give the provinces the fiscal jurisdiction they need to administer their services without their having to beg the federal government for money over and over again? The services would be more efficient, for they would be adapted to local requirements and that is why, as members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, at our last convention last weekend we adopted a constitutional position in keeping with the intention our Founding Fathers had when the first four Canadian provinces met and decided to establish the Canadian Confederation.

Then the federal government is a creature of the provinces and, if we want them to be able to carry out their responsibilities to the people of Canada, we must provide them with the necessary revenues to fulfil their financial obligations, and this is the reason why we definitely support the principle of a new constitution, tailored to Canadian conditions and drafted by the provinces, in which the jurisdictions of the central government and the provinces will be clearly set out. I think this is the only way we can ever hope to live together in harmony in this country.

In the final analysis, Mr. Speaker, what each of us is trying to achieve is peace, security and freedom. That is what we are seeking, whether we are French speaking, English speaking or new Canadians, we all want peace, security and freedom. That is why we all have to work together to determine the areas of provincial and federal jurisdictions. They should be clearly defined. We should have enough brains to do that, otherwise there is no point in having all those universities, political scientists, academics, economists and what not, if we are not able to come out with a sensible solution which will be acceptable to the whole country. This is our position with regard to the constitution, Mr. Speaker: respect of all by all and also respect for such covenant, such constitution as we shall choose to give ourselves.

● (1502)

Last July, during the debate on the motion of the Prime Minister, I explained in the House how we intend to meet to prepare this new constitution. I shall now repeat it. It may not be the only possible way, but it comes from the heart of a sincere Canadian who loves his country and who would like to preserve it under its present name, in its present dimension, but in such a way that we shall all be happy to live in this country instead of tearing at each other. We must work together to give to our children a country with a constitution that meets our aspirations and which is in complete accordance with the thoughts of the Fathers of Confederation.

We suggest that the provinces designate representatives outside of politics for a meeting that will take as long as it has to and that the federal government also designate someone outside politics, with representatives from the intermediate classes, from chambers of commerce, from finance, from industry, from national associations, from all organizations which have an interest in this country, and that those people, in accordance with the representations that they have been making for many years, develop a constitution project which will then be submitted to the attention of the provinces who can then decide among themselves if this constitution formula is appropriate. If they decide that it is, after defining the role of the federal government, they will invite representatives from the national and provincial political levels and then determine if the formula which has been studied and developed is valid. If such is the case, then comes the matter of the referendum. Mr. Speaker, our party was the first to suggest the idea that questions as important as this one should be submitted to the population through a referendum.

As secretary treasurer for many years, I have been somewhat involved in the question of referendums. This is where we must be careful.

The wording of the question might distort completely the aim of the referendum. That is what matters. The question should be plain. The question should be put in objective and clear terms so that when the woman, the old man, the worker or the farmer go to the poll to cast their vote they understand perfectly the question put to them, or that when they vote by "yes" or "no", their vote not be negative but positive. That is what matters, Mr. Speaker.

The Speech from the Throne details the efforts made under youth employment programs, but it fails to mention that the government spends a lot more on unemployment insurance than on those programs. I do not believe that that is an enticement to work. As for the supporting measures allowing the private sector to undertake projects in other countries, I cannot help but call them scandalous.

If we see fit to channel Canadian money into great projects in other countries, we should have enough courage to do the same in our own country. If such initiatives are likely to create jobs elsewhere, we are likely to create jobs in our country if we do the same here. I think we should help underdeveloped countries but let us not allow our economy in Canada to decline at the same time pretexting that we have no money to help.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I admit that I am a little disappointed to see that the government does not make any mention of the high unemployment levels with the hope that the situation will improve. On the contrary, we are told that the high unemployment and inflation rates demonstrate clearly that the economic methods of an often complex period are no longer applicable. It took the government many years to become aware of this.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is a bit thick. Major Douglas and other enlightened economists have advised governments for years that the present capitalist economic system, and I do not use the word capitalist in a derogatory manner, is ill and that it is in dire need of remedies. That has been going on for years and still nobody does anything. Band-aid measures are taken, governments try to patch things up as best as they can but a new formula is neither accepted nor applied.

Mr. Speaker, will the government at last, and they themselves admitted to this failure, introduce a minimum yearly guaranteed income plan? I put the question yesterday to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and she gave me an affirmative answer. But will it come about soon? Such a measure, combined with a retail discount for Canadian products, would only increase productivity because the national effort would be rewarded.

In addition, the purchasing power thus increased in turn can only lead to better productivity. Mr. Speaker, in this regard I was surprised to read in the newspaper Le Devoir for October 24 a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). The article is entitled, and I quote:

Canadians Save To a Fault

I am absolutely flabbergasted, Mr. Speaker. The government, through its Minister of Finance, advises the people they will have to tighten their belts, that the government will have to spend less. Yet, that same Minister of Finance tells us two days later that Canadians save too much.

I therefore would like to quote a few lines from that editorial:

According to the Minister of Finance, Canadians who do not produce enough, save to a fault.

In every class of society, he said, but more specifically in the middle classes, expenses do not grow in proportion to increased incomes.

Canadians, he feels, "demand a lot but do not necessarily spend. They merely want to save for the future".

But, Mr. Speaker, what does saving for the future mean? It means that they no longer have confidence in the Canadian economy, that they are worried about tomorrow, that is all. And, on the other hand, can we blame them? Thrift is a virtue!

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Commander Desjardins, the founder of Credit Unions, taught us this virtue when he founded this economy inspired movement with a view to bringing children and adults to save their pennies and dollars, so that together we may be in a position to build and develop a business or an industry, within our community and give young people the opportunity to save money for their future. I belong to this generation, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who still believe in thriftiness. But we should not let this seven headed monster that we call inflation harm us and get away with it.

Inflation, as we know it today, is bringing Canadian economy to its knees, it is tolling the knell of private enterprise. All we see about us are bankruptcies. Industries produce less, close their doors, lay-off their employees. In short, inflation creates misery. Inflation breeds unemployment. Inflation plays havoc with the savings of people who have worked on small wages for 40 or 50 years and tried to put a little money aside for their old age. Today, these people have to spend their scant savings on overpriced commodities. The consequence of that is to further diminish the small wages they used to make and the small savings they may have set aside. Yet there is something worse than that and this is why it must be said and we have to tackle this dreadful problem: the case of the Young People. What is going to happen to them? Young couples who buy a house at today's inflationary prices and who will be bound for the next 30 or 40 years to meet their obligations based on today's wages. This situation cannot last or otherwise it is of no use to have experience.

We know for a fact that someday we will have a recession. We are aware of the fact that incomes will be drastically reduced therefore these people who commit themselves today to meet certain obligations in order to acquire a home will necessarily have to give up the hope of ever keeping it. Their creditor will demand payment of the mortgage they signed and as these people will not be able to meet their obligations they will have to give up their home and then the mortgagee will be able to sell that same house at the current price on the market. The new buyer will then move into their house, but as a result the former owners will have been ruined because of inflation and these people are precisely those young couples of today taking commitments.

This is why I am saying that inflation and unemployment are twin brothers. Unemployment breeds inflation and inflation breeds unemployment. I have heard about that in this House since 1968. It is quite incredible to see that we are here 264 members vested with the highest authority on the land, yet we spend time talking in a lighthearted manner of these dreadful problems, not having the courage to pass measures likely to change the situation. We, from the Social Credit Party of Canada, are proposing some solutions. They may not be the best as there can always be something better but at least we have the merit of having studied the situation and of presenting concrete propositions. This is why I am asking the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) who is not here in this House and who, I hope, will read my remarks, to have a special study carried out by serious people on the feasibility of instituting a discount system on the domestic prices of Canadian goods.

The minister is serious, I hope. He is the one who says we are not spending enough. We are going to give consumers the chance to have more income without affecting salaries, without bearing on prices because when you raise salaries, prices go up and you are back to square one. Not so long ago an industry in my area increased salaries. A worker came and showed me his pay slip. He had $20 more on his pay but since he had changed brackets he paid more tax. So the federal government took more, the provincial government took more, the other marginal services took more, and he was finally left with $8. And since we know that prices are going to go up because of higher wages his $8 is going to be wiped out, so that is not the solution.

People are tearing at each other, union leaders point to employers as dangerous people, exploiters, and employees are being made to believe that they are mistreated and exploited, all sorts of things are put in their heads, and they are shown a dollar sign but they are not taught what an economic system is, how it works, what are the repercussions when a decision is made at given levels. They are not informed, and that is why there is social unrest, why there is no peace at home. That is why there is insecurity, why individual freedom is being restrained.

Mr. Speaker, let us give a discount on prices. Let us start with milk. We have a great milk problem at the moment in Canada. There is a legal dispute between the federal government and the provinces about the quotas and the subsidy on that part of the industrial milk coming from milk producers that goes for processing. The provinces take $1.20 for each hundredweight they collect from fluid milk producers and they must hand it over to the Canadian Dairy Commission. Since the Canadian Dairy Commission under a regulation decided to ask milk producers to give it 25 cents per hundredweight of class 1 milk and since those people say the federal government does not have the right to act like that because fluid milk comes under provincial jurisdiction, there is a conflict there. The Canadian Dairy Commission keeps the subsidies, and the Federation of Fluid Milk Producers in my province withholds the payment of the amount collected.

Mr. Speaker here is a typical example showing that if one would really stop and consider, we should utilize new methods and try this year to give a 10 cent discount on each quart of fluid milk; consumption would increase as the minister wishes, people would spend more and we would fill their needs at the family level. There is a discount if somebody buys and if nobody buys there is no discount. It is as simple as that. This is going to be the real control which will allow us to consider the problem in its true perspective. If people buy a quart of milk then they need it, and this is why they are given a 10 cent discount. The problem would be partially settled if one would stop to bickering about surpluses while other people are too poor to give the bare necessities to their families.

Mr. Speaker, it should be possible as well to offer a discount in areas which are most vulnerable such as the shoe industry, clothing, textile, furniture which at the moment are subjected to the heaviest pressures because of more competitive imports.

So, if we gave a discount after a serious study of those products we should help businessmen be more competitive and when their warehouses would get empty following the demand from Canadians for Canadian products, automatically they would call workers back to work, thus creating employment, and we should be able to work seriously toward an answer to the employment problem. This is a practical proposal, Mr. Speaker. Here is a second one which I mentioned very briefly earlier—the establishment of an annual minimum guaranteed income to eliminate social measures that were good in the early days but that became wrong because of abuses: unemployment, social welfare, annual minimum guaranteed income based on the income, on Canadian surpluses and distributed to everyone. That annual minimum guaranteed income, Mr. Speaker, will not prevent anyone with guts to work and get an additional income. If not, if he prefers to live on that minimum it is his business. It will not prevent others from being productive and participating actively in the Canadian community.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have made very clear proposals and if we had time—unfortunately you are ready to stand up. We should also lower the age of eligibility for the old age security and make it optional at 60 for all those interested, allowing them to leave the work force and be replaced by young people.

[English]

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, I first want to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) for moving the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and his colleague and mine, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). They both delivered excellent addresses to this House. I join many others in offering my congratulations to them.

Second, I want to indicate, as some members have done in the past, the great pleasure that I and all Canadians had on the visit of Her Majesty and His Royal Highness on the opening of this session of parliament. I was particularly moved because in my capacity as Minister of State for Multiculturalism I had the great honour and distinction of hosting a luncheon, held in the Confederation Room, for Her Majesty. There were in attendance delegates from all across Canada representing our ethnic and cultural groups. They were very impressed and honoured to be invited to attend that luncheon.

Mr. Paproski: Particularly those from your constituency.

Mr. Cafik: Perhaps I should rise to the occasion because of an article which appeared in this morning's Globe and Mail. It refers to the fact that I have had quite a number of constituents here this session. That is true. In fact, I have done that since 1968. It so happens the newspapers have only now picked it up—after ten years. I should point out that my constituents who chose to do so, like many Canadians, through an open invitation attended a multicultural concert. It was not the one at which Her Majesty was present, because I did not think that would have been appropriate; I thought that they should go along with other members of the public. I put that on record because of the suspicious nature of my friend opposite.

Mr. Paproski: Not me.

Mr. Cafik: I should indicate at the outset that I would like to address a few remarks to the two capacities assigned to me by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when I was appointed to the cabinet. First, I was asked to act in terms of deputy House leader. I am very pleased and honoured to do that. I look forward with a great deal of anticipation to working with the House leaders at appropriate times to try, in the best way I know how, to make the House of Commons a relevant and responsive instrument of the wishes of the Canadian people. I am sure all House leaders, including our Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) and House leader, share the intention to do whatever we can to make this place a relevant and meaningful instrument which can act expeditiously on business that is in the Canadian interest.

I want to talk more specifically about my role of minister of multiculturalism. Multiculturalism is a policy that has existed with the government of Canada for some time. I would like to talk about its background for just a moment. The origin of the establishment of the directorate stemmed from recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism contained in volume IV of its report. That report dealt with contributions by other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada, and measures that should be taken to safeguard those contributions. Volume IV examined the whole question of cultural and ethnic pluralism in this country and the status of our various cultures and languages, an area of study given all too little attention in the past by scholars.

On October 8, 1971, the Prime Minister indicated, in a speech in the House of Commons, that he accepted all the recommendations contained in this commission's report. He stated that at that time:

> A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework commends itself to the government as the most suitable means of assuring the cultural freedom of Canadians. Such a policy should help to break down discriminatory attitudes and cultural jealousies. National unity if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity; out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share ideas, attitudes and assumptions. A vigorous policy of multiculturalism will help create this initial confidence. It can form the base of a society which is based on fair play for all.
> The government will support and encourage the various cultures and ethnic groups that give structure and vitality to our society. They will be encouraged to share their cultural expression and values with other Canadians and so contribute to a richer life for us all.

The concept of multiculturalism in the world is rather unique. To my knowledge, and based on my research, we are the first country in the world to adopt such a policy. In the last year and a half, I understand that the government of Australia, following consultations with our directorate, established a similar policy in that country. I hope the example we have given will be shared by many other countries in the future.

[Mr. Cafik.]

There is no question that multiculturalism is an extremely important concept, particularly now when there is so much talk about national unity and a feeling that the real questions facing Canadians relate to the relationship between Anglophones and Francophones.

Mr. Paproski: And "Ukraphones" and "Poliphones".

Mr. Cafik: I will leave that remark for the record; I would rather not have made it. In any event, there is no question that the public perception is that the whole equation of national unity relates to those two groups within our society.

It is very important to underscore the genuine nature of Canada. The Prime Minister has indicated in the past that we live in a bilingual nation but we do not live in a bicultural nation. It is extremely important for us to realize that distinction. Bilingualism, in the sense that we have two official languages, is, I am sure, supported by all members of this House and, if it is understood in the right context, by all Canadians. One culture is no more favoured by the government or by the people of this country than any other. All of us have brought to Canada our own unique cultural backgrounds and traditions. They need to be respected, and they are respected by this government.

Our experience in nation-building, which has been emphasized more clearly in recent days in contradistinction to the American approach, is commonly called the mosaic, as opposed to the melting pot. Many nations of the world seem to think their national interest would be better served were they to take all their cultural backgrounds and put them into some kind of melting pot from which they could be cast out into some kind of uniform shape, size and description. We subscribe to the mosaic, in the firm and consistent belief that Canada is a better place in which to live and that all of us will be better people, individually and collectively, if our people have the opportunity and the incentive to retain their cultural backgrounds, traditions and histories.

There is no doubt that our policy arises primarily from a realization of what is the full dimension of the human spirit. A great deal is said about human freedom, and it is true we need a whole broad range of freedoms; and we have them in place. But little has been said about that which gives rise to the very nature of man. Man is unique to a large extent, not only because he was created that way but because his traditions, his background, his history, his culture have all contributed to making people uniquely what they are. We believe that as a national policy we should foster this uniqueness and take advantage of it for the benefit of the whole of society.

We realize that Canadians, like all mankind, are the inheritors of the past. That makes us what we are in the present. In my view, this augurs well for the future of this country, provided we are allowed to retain that background and that history. Very special benefits flow to the whole nation and to all our people through the intermix of our culture and of our people. As a result, we build a spirit of understanding, tolerance and appreciation of our own individual and communal individuality. Ours is an experience in living in a real and diverse world. How well we meet this task will determine the contribution we can make by way of example to other nations and people as to how best to live together in a bilingual, multicultural and multiracial society. The world is in great need of such an example, and we as Canadians have the challenge and the privilege of setting it.

The directorate of multiculturalism and its role in our modern society seems to be viewed in three ways by the public at large. For those who support the policy, it is often viewed as a token gesture toward a third of our people of non-English, non-French backgrounds. Others who oppose the concept in principle do so on the premise that the melting pot is a more appropriate response to diversity and to national unity. Third, it is viewed with indifference by those who take our diversity for granted and who feel that present government policy is really an unnecessary instrument.

I would like to respond to these three perceptions. First of all, in terms of the view that our department might be a token effort toward multiculturalism, I would say that those who feel or think that way are confusing budgets with impact. There is no doubt at all that when one looks at the Department of Multiculturalism, realizes that we spend about $8 million a year in that area of activity, and relates that to a global budget of about $40 billion a year, one can hardly get the impression that it is other than a token gesture. However, the department is not simply a dispenser of grants to ethnocultural groups in our society; our impact is much greater than that. I shall elaborate on that aspect of the matter in a moment.

To those who have the feeling that we should not be encouraging the maintenance of our ethnocultural heritage I would like to say this: I believe they are confusing two principles, the principle of assimilation and the principle of integration. Some people think the best thing which can happen to immigrants when they come to Canada is for them to be totally assimilated into our society. To my mind, this carries with it the implication that they must shed all their background and become some new kind of human being. We do not say that at all. What we say is that they ought to be fully and totally integrated into society, realizing that their background and heritage and those things which meant so much to them as individual human beings should be freely carried on and retained here in their new land.

I think there are those who feel that the encouragement of people to retain their cultural heritage implies that we are really asking those who come from other lands to carry with them, as well, some of the antagonisms they may have developed historically in years gone by in those lands. That is not implied at all. I think it is quite evident to us that people who have come from Europe and elsewhere, where nations have shifted and changed over the years, might tend to retain antagonisms resulting from historical, cultural, linguistic and national pressures imposed upon them in their former lands. We are not asking that they do this at all. Quite the contrary. We are asking them to retain that which is good, and to shed and set aside those things that may have divided them back in their homelands.

I would ask those who also do not realize the import of the policy to sit back and think for a moment of some of the major cities in this country—Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and others—where you can find evidence of practically every culture of the world within their boundaries. Surely, anybody who addresses his mind to that equation would realize that those cities are richer, more vibrant than they would ever be if they did not have the input and background of the people who make up these cities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: To those who view the policy with indifference, I would say this: Operating upon a premise that I think is very easily related is the question of the English-French relationship. It is quite evident that in the past 100 years the French people, in terms of their linguistic rights and their opportunities to participate fully and totally in the whole of Canadian society, may not have been what they ought to have been. I do not think there is any question that we need a period in which to catch up in order to give them fair and equal opportunities in this country.

The same is true of our ethnocultural groups. Many of them have gone through great difficulties in years gone by in securing equal recognition, equal status with the rest of Canadians. There is a little catching up to do there as well. Immigrants are coming into this country: a great deal of work has to be done to integrate them into our society and to make sure they are given fair and equal treatment in all aspects of Canadian life. The indifference to our policy would rapidly fall aside if people realized that what we are trying to do with these groups which have come into the country, whose ancestors came here hundreds of years ago, is to make sure they are provided with a fair and equal opportunity along with the rest of us.

There is another point I want to make in this respect. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, the percentage make up of our society. First of all, about 43 per cent of our population has an Anglo-Celtic background. The figures I am giving are not easily defined or even accurate statistics, but they are reasonably close. The French-speaking group constitutes about 25 per cent or a little more. Our native peoples comprise about 2 per cent of our population. Other ethnocultural groups account for the remaining 30 per cent. It is my job as Minister of State for Multiculturalism to see that all groups in our society are given fair and equal opportunity in this land. I think it is important that we carry out that mandate in all the broad ranges of human activity.

The legitimate, important and indeed essential role of the directorate of multiculturalism I think bears some explanation. First of all, in relation to grants, I mentioned earlier that we have a number of grants programs. We distribute about $4.5 million to $5 million a year to ethnocultural groups in Canada.

I should like to make one thing quite clear. I am not of the view that it is necessary for the government of Canada to preserve culture in the sense that we require money to do so. I am inclined to think that cultures that are real, alive and viable would sustain themselves if we spent $1 billion a year trying to uproot them. The fact is that they are cultures because people want them. They are sustained because people want them.

Our granting funds to these groups is not really directed to that objective. Our funds are granted in a different way altogether, to provide equal opportunity; but, in addition, to make sure that all Canadians share in the benefits of those cultures. This enables cultural groups to work and to interface together, to share their backgrounds and traditions with all of the community in which they live. In that way that which is theirs will become that which is ours, and all of us will benefit as a result.

I am not suggesting that the real thrust of our department is in the form of grants, as important as they may be. They will be sustained in areas where they are required. The real impact of the Department of Multiculturalism is more global; it has an impact upon government policy as a whole. It seems to me that when the government gives consideration to policies, of whatever description, in so far as they impinge upon the interests of those people who are within my mandate it is my responsibility, in the halls of cabinet and in the decision-making process, to see that their legitimate views and concerns are taken into account.

Dealing with specific issues is also important. For example, international human rights arising from the Helsinki Accord and now being dealt with at the Belgrade conference are a matter of genuine and serious concern to many people who come from behind iron curtain countries or from the Soviet Union itself. I, as the representative of those people, must ensure that their voice is heard by those who make decisions regarding our posture at the Belgrade conference. The same thing occurs with regard to immigration policy, citizenship and the broad range of government policy. So the impact of the directorate of multiculturalism is broader than grants of money; it is as broad as the government itself.

We also have to deal directly with domestic perceptions which lead to mutual recognition and respect among all Canadians. There is no question that difficulties arise from time to time as a result of intolerance, lack of understanding and lack of appreciation of the backgrounds and traditions of others. It is extremely important that our directorate deals positively with those difficulties to ensure that we have an orderly integration of all people in society, leaving them the option, indeed the right, to be themselves in every way they can.

In addition, it is the responsibility of the directorate to try to give Canadians a more accurate reflection of ourselves and our backgrounds. First of all, in looking at our educational institutions—which are out of our jurisdiction—the media, the composition of our libraries and museums, politics, the arts and the whole broad range of human activities, it is very important that we begin to portray ourselves for what we are, a multicultural, multiracial society with each group having made a valuable and important historical contribution.

It is not enough to look upon the history of Canada as beginning and ending with the Plains of Abraham. It is important that we know the contribution of the Ukrainians in western Canada, the Germans in western Canada, the Japanese on the west coast, the Polish, the Irish—everyone. It is in that context that we will begin to understand what Canada is really all about. I think our institutions of all types have an obligation to address themselves to this question and not spend so much of their time dealing only with English-French relations in Canada, which I think gives a distorted picture of our reality.

The key to a successful policy is to ensure that all of us, individually and collectively, are better off if we recognize and take advantage of our own background and diversity, allowing it to flower so that the public interest may be best achieved. Each of us as Canadians, regardless of our origin, will become richer and more vital because of the interface between our culture and the culture of other groups. Through it we will draw the maximum benefit and create a wholesome and vibrant society. It is not our intention to build a nation of isolated solitudes. The key element in our program is to bring together individual cultures working in combination with others and impacting upon the whole community.

Those of ethnocultural backgrounds have a great interest in the national unity question. Perhaps they realize as much as, or more than, anyone what is at stake in this issue. Our ethnocultural groups can readily identify and understand the aspirations of the people of Quebec to preserve their language and their culture. We accept the concept of bilingualism and we support the legitimate concerns of French-speaking Canadians in regard to the preservation of their culture and language. Their aspirations are not unlike our own, and for that reason we find it so easy to relate to that concept.

We can also understand the concern of many in the province of Quebec that their cultural background could possibly be totally absorbed by the English society either within their province or outside. We understand the need and the desire to take steps to retain that which they have, that which they are so proud of, and with good reason. So we support this policy. We support the policy of bilingualism and the right of the people of Quebec and of other provinces to retain that which is theirs in the context of free choice and under the banner of two official languages. We believe it is important that all Canadians have the right to communicate with their government in either of the official languages, wherever they reside in this country.

I do not wish to deal with bill 101 at any length, except to say that it is my view the questions at stake are not really legal ones. I believe this is the view of many Canadians. The question of national unity will not be resolved in the Supreme Court of Canada; it will be resolved in the hearts and minds of Canadians. Any society which is united, is united because it wants to be united and because its people realize that they are better off culturally, economically, linguistically and in every other way if they are united.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cafik: Our people realize we are better off being Canadians with a whole Canada, as opposed to separating this country into individual parts. It would not be in the interests of any Canadian to allow that to happen. We must all show that we recognize our interdependence. But even more, we must show that we recognize our mutual good will toward each other. Our national unity problem shall disappear when Francophones, Anglophones, our native peoples and our ethnocultural groups of any origin fully realize that we are all better off economically, socially, culturally and linguistically if we are living in one land in a spirit of understanding, tolerance and good will. When this realization takes root in Canadians in every corner of our land from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the American border to the North Pole, we shall indeed be a free, happy and united nation showing leadership in a divided and often antagonistic world.

It is only by the realization of that which makes us what we are, uniquely Canadian, that those aspirations can be achieved. I assure all members of this House that the ethnocultural communities of this country are as married to that concept as any other group—perhaps more than some. We will play our part in holding this country together and building it to be the land we want to decree to our children.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. minister permit a question?

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I was expecting to answer a question to be posed by the hon. member who is now absent. Therefore, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) can take his place.

Mr. Paproski: He is not absent. He has decided to let the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) ask the question.

Mr. Cafik: That is fine. He may be present. I just do not see him.

Mr. Paproski: He has left the chamber.

Mr. Cafik: Perhaps he is on the monitor.

Mr. Paproski: He is not on the monitor; he is watching you on the monitor.

Mr. Cafik: Is he?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He is interested in comic relief.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's comments in regard to multiculturalism. I am interested in the "off again, on again" policy of this government with respect thereto. The minister will recall that during the debate on the immigration bill there was concern registered about the fact that that bill excluded the word "multicultural". That concern was registered on the opposite side of this House.

Because the minister is now enlightened and understands how much the realities of life mean in terms of multiculturalism, can we expect the minister to bring in an amendment, after consultation with his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), to see that that much needed word is inserted into the bill we passed recently? Is this what the minister is talking about?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Unless the minister informs the House that that amendment will be introduced, then I say that the government is hypocritical.

Mr. Paproski: That is why the other minister left.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member. He has very cleverly put me on the spot, but I have no objection to that.

Mr. Alexander: Just be honest with the Canadian people.

Mr. Cafik: Just a moment, please. I will be honest with the Canadian people, as well as yourself. The local impact of the Department of Multiculturalism is extremely important. The type of gesture you are talking about in that particular bill was clearly important to the ethnocultural people of this country.

Mr. Alexander: Right on.

Mr. Cafik: If it is important to them, it is important to me. As to what I am going to do about it, the hon. member will have to sit back and watch.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We have been watching.

Mr. Cafik: That is all I can say.

Mr. Alexander: Just answer my question.

Mr. Cafik: I intend to.

Mr. Alexander: Are we going to have an amendment, or are you just talking through your hat?

Mr. Cafik: If the hon. member would like to pose a supplementary question, I would be delighted to answer it as well. I am telling the hon. member that he will have to be prepared to sit back and watch.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, I know.

Mr. Cafik: The hon. member can be assured that the ethno cultural people of this country have a minister. They are aware of that, and they are going to be served by him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: You can just wipe that speech off the record.

Mr. Dinsdale: What does Stan Haidasz have to say?

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Just for the sake of clarity, and in order to keep the record straight, I was on that committee and I should like to point out that the entire bill was based on the premise that Canada will continue to reflect the diversity of its people, in which case the introduction of the word "multicultural" was redundant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: That is all boloney, and you know it.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Shame.

Mr. Paproski: Wait until the people of Toronto hear that.

Mr. Alexander: And you are from Toronto.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. For certain obvious reasons, this was a very special throne speech, since it was only the second time in our nation's history that the speech was read by a reigning monarch. It was special, as well, because the occasion surrounding this particular event was the Silver Jubilee of our Queen, and her visit to Canada encompassed our tribute to Her Majesty's 25-year reign.

Therefore, it is regrettable that the content of the Speech from the Throne did not match the uniqueness of the occasion surrounding it. If it were not so tragic, it would be almost humorous that such regal pomp and ceremony should surround such a limited, pedestrian document. The speech was not what the times demanded.

I think back to that other occasion some 20 years ago when Her Majesty participated in a similar ceremony, and I speak to the Canada of that era. Those of us who remember that occasion can remember, also, the optimism, the buoyancy and the stability which marked those years. Then our world, globally and domestically, was relatively stable. At that time we believed—and our belief was confirmed by reality—that if we worked hard, we would achieve. We told our children that those who stayed in school, studied hard and graduated would have a job waiting for them when they finished their education. Those were the rules of the game, and no one doubted them.

The realities of today dramatically call into question those hopes and beliefs. The buoyancy and the optimism of the fifties have dissipated into instability, fear and uncertainty in the seventies. It is the uncertainty, the lack of confidence permeating this country, that is the most destructive of the moods of the seventies. Instability can be coped with if there is some certainty that it will be eased, whether sooner or later. A nation's fears can be calmed if there is certainty that there are clear choices to be made and competent people to make them. But there is no solace in uncertainty. Uncertainty can bring on needless fear and increased instability. Uncertainty can smother hope.

Whatever else are its accomplishments, this government is a past master at creating uncertainty. In no other field has it been so productive, and with what disastrous effects for the nation! The current uncertainty, in the face of economic controls and controversial constitutional questions, is only the tip of the iceberg which has been in the process of formation for these past ten years. The proposals put forth last week in the Speech from the Throne do nothing to counteract that mood of uncertainty or to restore the confidence of Canadians. Quite the contrary, it does everything to add to our collective uncertainty since, by spelling out the many problems that face us, it confirms our worst fears; and then, by offering what are patently facile and superficial remedies, it invites our despair. It is true that the government recognizes the current economic crisis: it is right there in the speech from the throne. It reads:

> High rates of unemployment and inflation are clear signals of the inadequacy of economic strategies . . . signals of the urgent need for important structural adjustments in the economy . . .

Sir, since the throne speech, we have heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and we have heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) discuss the economy at great length. But what we have yet to hear in concrete terms are the so-called important structural adjustments that the government intends to make to the economy. The government's announcement of a proposed expenditure of $150 million in job creation is one of the few concrete proposals put forth. But what does that really represent? A mere 60,000 jobs for the one million Canadians who are without work. Such a proposal can hardly be considered an important structural adjustment. Major structural adjustments are necessary if the government is to confront, not just the hard economic realities that we in the opposition keep bringing to their attention every day but the social cost of these realities.

I would like the Prime Minister and his colleagues to look back for a moment on their own lives and remember the dreams and ambitions of their youth, to realize how much the existence of possibilities contributed to their hopes, their choices and to the options that were open to them. For the unemployed youth of today, possibilities, choices or options are practically non-existent. Not only do they not have jobs, costly as that is to the economy, but, furthermore, 400,000 young Canadians are unable to make the crucial decisions that are necessary to shape their futures. They cannot plan their lives, nor can they dream, wildly or otherwise, about their future.

What does it do to their personal development, to their self-worth, to be so unable to control their lives? What will the possible cost to our society of the collective cynicism of a generation which has played the game by the rules only to find that the rules have changed at the end? I would ask the Prime Minister to consider that we are facing the possibility of producing a generation of adults who have been totally alienated from the mainstream of Canadian life. Such alienation can only bring anger and frustration in its wake, but more than anger and frustration, social upheaval of a kind that we have not witnessed in Canada previously. We in this country are not immune to the social unrest that is emerging elsewhere in the world, an unrest that our current unemployment situation does nothing to stave off and everything to invite.

Mr. Speaker, there are no major structural changes recommended in the Speech from the Throne to indicate that the government either recognizes or plans to take steps to alleviate these serious social pressures. It is very easy to conclude, in the wake of what we have heard, that the best structural change that could be made, the one most beneficial to this country, would be to get rid of the present government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: If the economic measures in the Speech from the Throne offer little to quell the climate of uncertainty that exists in this country, the constitutional proposals offer even less. Indeed, in his collective musings on our constitutional problems, the Prime Minister escalates the uncertainty that abounds with his apparently off-the-cuff suggestion without benefit of cabinet decision.

It would appear that the government may hold a referendum on national unity, and I stress the word "may" because, true to form, the Prime Minister declines to give any details of his proposed referendum. He equivocates. The referendum may or may not be held; it may or may not be held nationally; it may or may not be held only in Quebec. If held in Quebec, it may or may not be binding on that province or on the rest of the country. The Prime Minister mounts a horse called "referendum" and then he rides off in all directions. A referendum if necessary, but not necessarily a referendum. The Prime Minister, by his lack of precision in this matter, seems determined to add another dimension to the uncertainty of our present constitutional crisis.

Our fragile federal system is already sorely beset by fears and anxieties. Those of us who are profoundly concerned about the future of our country—that includes members of all sides of the House—are concerned lest the Prime Minister's conflicting comments of the past few days will add to those fears and uncertainties. Surely, it is the height of irresponsibility for a prime minister to introduce such a far-reaching proposal without any indication of how he intends to implement it. Surely, it is totally irresponsible and an abuse of the office of prime minister to propose in the House a serious measure that could involve very basic changes in our parliamentary system, and then shroud the proposal in circumlocution and speculation. One has to ask oneself if this referendum-cum-plebiscite, or plebiscite-cum-referendum, is no more than a diversionary tactic designed to take the attention of the people of this country away from the government's inept handling of economic problems.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Not only does the Prime Minister's penchant for musing aloud on such a serious matter serve to distort the function of the House; in addition, his subsequent allusion to unilateral action on the constitution which could result from such a referendum seriously undermines and ignores the role of the premiers of the provinces in constitutional reform. At this time of crisis, both economic and constitutional, it is of the utmost importance that the partners in confederation work together and not at cross-purposes. Does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) seriously believe the announcement one day of his intention to visit each premier to discuss constitutional matters, and his allusion the following day to the possibility of unilateral action on the constitution, is the kind of initiative that is conducive to co-operation?

● (1612)

The Prime Minister should recognize that the process of conducting federal-provincial relations requires as much sensitivity and as much consideration as do the substantive measures involved. A viable confederation capable of adapting to the natural forces of social and economic change rests on a process of continuous federal-provincial consultation and accommodation. To be effective, this process of accommodation requires mutual respect and trust between the federal government and the provincial governments. When that trust and respect does not exist, tensions arise which emphasize our differences rather than our common interests.

The conduct of the federal Liberal government in dealings with the provinces over the last ten years has imposed a serious additional strain on national unity. One has only to look at the federal government's record of federal-provincial relations to see this strain. The reluctance of the provinces to enter into negotiations in resource development and the failure of the federal government to produce agreement in the area of social security revenue, after four years of negotiation, are but two examples of the deterioration in intergovernmental affairs that have had direct and, indeed, negative results on the level of services and the prosperity that Canadians should enjoy in this country. These results, in turn, have a direct bearing on weakening the national fabric of our country.

In short, the process of federal-provincial relations over the last ten years—that process itself—has adversely affected the ability of governments to act as a unit. The approach of the present federal government has been to treat the provinces and provincial aspirations as a problem that can only be solved by the central government.

In contrast to this approach, the leader of my party and the then four Progressive Conservative premiers met recently at Kingston and produced, with unanimity, a program for economic recovery and federal-provincial reconciliation. The reason that agreement was produced among leaders with extremely diverse constituencies stems from a fundamentally different approach from that of the government to federal-provincial relations and federalism. The first reason that agreement was reached was that agreement, rather than confrontation, was sought. The second and more important reason was, and is, because the Progressive Conservative party recognizes that provincial governments must be assured that their interests will be recognized and integrated into the development of national policy.

In speaking of the Kingston conference, the Prime Minister attempted in his speech last week to make light of the achievements of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Conservative Premiers regarding entrenchment of equalization payments in the constitution—a proposal, I may say, far more specific and fundamental than that proposed by the Prime Minister at Victoria, or any since. In fact, the latest effort along these lines that the Prime Minister can point to on the part of his government occurred last year during an early stage in the federal-provincial fiscal negotiations, when a major change in the revenue equalization formula was proposed which, if it had been carried out, would have significantly weakened the basic purpose of equalization and created new regional inequities.

Contrast this with the initiative taken at Kingston for the full and formal protection of revenue equalization in the constitution. This initiative was taken by, among others, the Premiers of the two wealthiest provinces as being right and just in the building and maintaining of a sense of national community.

That was one initiative taken at Kingston. There were others: a commitment to annual consultation among first ministers on economic and fiscal policies and goals, so that fiscal decisions taken by one level of government do not distort and frustrate the policies and objectives of the other; a commitment to patriation of the constitution and to the involvement of provincial governments in appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, a proportion of those to the Senate and such agencies as the Canadian Transport Commission and the National Energy Board, so as to assure the federal nature of these institutions. There was much more.

The Prime Minister not only belittled these initiatives but, as well, sought to distort the position of those at that conference regarding minority language rights in the constitution, a position based on the agreement arrived at by nine of the provincial Premiers at St. Andrew's earlier this year, and endorsed in Kingston.

Mr. Basford: All proposed at Victoria.

Miss MacDonald: That kind of tactic, of course, should not surprise us. For ten years the Prime Minister has been unrelenting in his deliberate efforts to distort the position of this party regarding the official languages policy, to create suspicion and breed distrust and, to his shame, he does it in the name of national unity. What probably goads the Prime Minister into this reaction is the fact that after his own many attempts ended in failure, the Leader of the Opposition was able to sit down with four provincial Premiers and arrive at specific, concrete proposals in relation to the problems facing Canadians. The Prime Minister offers us vague generalizations based on his own proposals. The Leader of the Opposition offers concrete commitments based on discussion and agreement with his provincial counterparts: that is the difference.

In a similar vein, I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister's petty reaction towards the Kingston conference is further reflected in his negative attitude toward calling a federal-provincial first ministers' conference both on the problems of national unity and on the problems of the economy.

Some years ago, at the Victoria conference, the Prime Minister proposed that the first ministers of this country meet annually to discuss matters of federal-provincial concern. Since then, the Prime Minister and the Premiers have met every year, and in some years have met two or even three times on matters of urgency. The proposal of 1971 had become a reality—until this year. This year, the year in which the problems that we face have reached crisis proportions, is the only year since 1971 that a federal-provincial conference of first ministers has not been held. The Premier of Ontario has called for one, the Premier of New Brunswick has called for one; and all the Prime Minister will tell us is that he intends to visit the Premiers individually in the near future and that he may or may not call a federal-provincial conference at some future time. The institution of the first ministers' meetings is an integral part of our system, particularly in dealing with constitutional matters. It deserves to be honoured by the Prime Minister. But, instead, he chooses the route of bilateral negotiations.

Mr. Basford: Instead, he chooses to go and see each of them personally, directly and face-to-face.

Miss MacDonald: We see the pattern emerging, Mr. Speaker: the Prime Minister believes that he, and he alone, has the right to deal with the issue of national unity. Yet in the 11 months since the election of the Parti Québécois government, his initiatives have been negligible, his actions few.

• (1622)

The Premiers meet, and nine of them reach accord. The Leader of the Opposition and his provincial counterparts meet and work out specific proposals. Meanwhile, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) meditates. He carps about and ridicules the actions of others. But for a year he has existed in a state of semi-paralysis. He neglects the cabinet in his plan for a referendum. He belittles the efforts of opposition leaders. He ignores the calls of the provincial Premiers for a federal-provincial conference; and of most importance to this chamber, he spurns the establishment of an all-party parliamentary committee on national unity. None of the established institutions in this country for dealing with constitutional crisis merit his consideration.

I remind the Prime Minister that certain issues, because of their gravity and universality, transcend the normal bounds of partisan politics. The question of national unity and constitutional reform is such an issue.

Mr. Basford: I have never heard a more partisan speech.

Miss MacDonald: Were the Prime Minister to show half the respect he should to established procedures and institutions, he would begin by immediately setting up a parliamentary committee to deal with national unity. This party has been demanding such a committee for a long time; but, true to form, the Prime Minister has not heeded such a proposal.

If the Prime Minister cannot accept this recommendation from the opposition, perhaps he might listen to the views of a former Liberal cabinet minister—and there are lots of those. Perhaps he would listen to the views of a man who was asked by the Prime Minister himself to serve on his personal task force on national unity, but who declined. I refer to Claude Castonguay. There was a great deal of speculation at the time as to why Mr. Castonguay rejected the Prime Minister's invitation to join his task force. Well, now we know the reason. Mr. Castonguay felt—indeed, he knew—that there was a more appropriate vehicle. In speaking to the University of Toronto's recent Options Conference, he said that the parliament of Canada and each provincial legislature should form a committee composed of members from every political party.

Mr. Castonguay suggested that these broadly based committees could hear briefs from interested groups and members of the public and conduct their own studies. Then they could formulate proposals for reform. Mr. Castonguay also suggested that implementation of this approach would also depolarize the Trudeau-Lévesque debate and put an end to its sterility. It would provide a forum for the majority of Quebeckers who want change but who do not seek independence. That is the advice from a former leading Liberal.

We, the Progressive Conservative members of the opposition, have been calling for such a committee at the federal level, to no avail. We called for it in the House this past summer and were told at that time by the Prime Minister that we were too far into the session to establish such a committee. Would the Prime Minister care to tell us now that we are too far into this session to establish a committee? Will he offer us another excuse, or will he admit that the representation of all parties in the crucial debate on national unity is both necessary and desirable; and will he give assurances that he will act to set up such a committee?

How long does this troubled country have to wait for its Prime Minister to avail himself of the avenues open to him on this issue? How long is the cancer of uncertainty to be nurtured by his neglect? When will this country again be able to look with confidence to its government and with hope to its future? The Speech from the Throne, and the Prime Minister's discourse which followed it, have shown clearly that there is no hope that this will happen in this session.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, if someone were to ask me if Canada has any enemies, I would have to say it has. I would say that I even know the names of those enemies. They are discord, defeatism, despondency and despair—and anyone who arms those enemies does no service to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: I would like to quote three short paragraphs from the Speech from the Throne:

> It can be an era of increasing confrontation, tension and division, or an era of enhanced freedom, cooperation and unity of purpose. Fundamentally, the choice must be made by every citizen every day.
>
> It is apparent to thoughtful Canadians everywhere that this is a time of great decisions for Canada, a time for rediscovering the strength and potential of a marvellously free and caring society.
> That rediscovery will require that Canadians rededicate themselves to each other's well-being—

Those are beautiful words in any language, and they sounded much more meaningful because they came from the lips of Her Majesty the Queen, who has shown to us her own personal warmth and sincerity. But words, no matter how beautiful, can be cruel shams unless they are transmitted into action.

I read an article in the Globe and Mail recently. It was a survey of several members of parliament, including myself. It said that there seems to be a feeling among some constituents that the problem we are having with Quebec does not affect every Canadian, that it is something just between our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the leader of the Parti Québécois, or that it is something just between Ottawa and Quebec, as if it were another tragic "tale of two cities". Those constituents felt it did not concern them; that is the way the newspaper reported it. But I am beginning to wonder if the attitude of those constituents did not reflect some feeling of personal helplessness rather than indifference. What can the individual Canadian do? I would like to offer only a few suggestions, because time does not allow me to offer very many. But I hope they are constructive ones.

If the problem in Quebec or with our French-speaking brothers were only a question between two leaders, a kind of one-upmanship, or a question of who is better than the other, I would probably be like everybody else and say that we should sit back and let them fight, knowing very well that one of them would get a bloodied nose. However, it is more than that. If it was a question of two provinces, I would probably say, "Why worry? Let Bill Davis and Rene Levesque fight it out. Why should I get involved?"

However, the whole point is that we are not talking about some little fight or about one-upmanship: What is at stake in this whole tragedy is our destiny and, more importantly, the destiny of our children. Are they going to grow up as citizens of one great, united country, or are they going to grow up in a fragmented society? That is what is at stake. We must assure ourselves, as individuals, that what is at stake is too important to be left to two men, two cities or even to two provinces and each and every one of us has to get involved. How? I thought about that. Again, something happened quite recently. It was the granting of the Nobel Peace prize. While it was for 1976, it was only given a couple of days ago. I read the citation, which is as follows:

Mairad Corrigan and Betty Williams acted out of a deep conviction that individual people can do meaningful efforts for peace through conciliatory work.

I put the emphasis on "individual people". When I read that, I decided to find out as much as I could about these two women. Who were they? Did they have some tremendous academic distinction? Are they supported by big government, big management or big labour? Who is behind them? When I did my research, I found out that nobody was supporting them. When asked how they got started, one is reported to have said, "Someone had to get up and do something."

I am not intending to draw analogies between the situation in Northern Ireland and the situation we have here with our French-speaking brothers. I am the first to pray that our differences in this country will never escalate to the type of holocaust that has occurred in Northern Ireland. That is not the similarity. The similarity is what that woman who received the Nobel prize for peace demonstrated. Somebody has to stand up and do something. What a marvellous spirit! That is the kind of spirit that appeals to me. It is the kind of spirit I understand. It is the kind of spirit that is mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and what I want it to be—the Canadian spirit.

What can each and every one of us individually do for our country, not only with regard to political problems but economic problems? Let us start with the political problems. What can we do? If I may, I will address myself primarily to the women of Canada. They are 50 per cent of the population; therefore, we have a very vested interest in this question. What would I, as a woman of Canada, do in this particular situation? I would start by speaking to my French-speaking sisters. I would tell them we have a tremendous amount in common. Like me, most of them are mothers. They have the same aspirations for their children as I have for mine. Their children try just as hard as mine. There is no difference there.

I would then have to be very honest and say to them that mistakes were made in the past. I would tell them that I am really sorry that some time ago, even in the near distant past, their kids had to learn my language before they could communicate with government, theirs and mine. I would say that I am sorry there were other inequities as well. I would then say that things have improved. They really have. I will tell you why I say that. My favourite five-year old sibling is now going through French kindergarten in Toronto. I emphasize, in Toronto, Mr. Speaker. His parents could not do that because they did not have that opportunity. His little brother will go. The time will come when he will go to his French-speaking cousins and feel at home. That is the way it should be.

I would have to say to my sisters in Quebec that they know as well as I do that two wrongs do not make a right. I would have to say that what their leaders are now suggesting is a repetition of past errors. They are saying that if my children go to Quebec, they cannot continue in their language. That is exactly what happened in the past with their kids. They do not want that to happen. My French sisters would probably tell me that it is not just language; there is an awful lot more involved.

[Mrs. Appolloni.]

I would be the first to agree with that. We do not know about their culture, but what are we going to do? Here, again, I would tell them that things are improving.

A few years ago I telephoned a large radio station in Toronto. I spoke to the disc jockey. I told him I liked the music he played, but it saddened me a bit because I never heard music from Quebec. He said they could not play it because no one understood the words. What a lot of boloney! Things have improved. When in Toronto last week, I put on the car radio. The first thing I heard was pop music from Quebec. It was great. We cannot accept the phony argument that no one understands the words. Italian and German opera has been heard and loved throughout the world. People do not know the words, but they do not care; they get the feeling of the music, and they love it. A disc jockey might say, with regard to pop music, that it is the lyrics that count. That, too, is a phony, specious argument. You cannot understand most of the words in today's pop music. It is not the king's English, but gibberish. Who cares; the kids like it.

What can we do? We can telephone our radio stations, not just in Ontario and Manitoba but throughout English-speaking Canada, and tell them we believe we are getting a raw deal, that we have heard that the best pop music comes out of Quebec and we want to hear it. We would not do this in order to patronize. Nobody wants to be patronized. It must be because we have heard that it is the best in this part of the world. Somebody has to get up and do something. My French-speaking sisters would say that it is not just language or even just culture, but a lot of other things. My kids are learning French. I am going to make sure they get the benefit of hearing that music, not just to be good to those in Quebec, because that would be silly, but because that music is great. By listening to their records, not only do we get a bit of Quebec—which is a great feeling—but it helps their recording industry. That is the kind of co-operation I would like to stress.

Let us go on to what individuals can do to help, not only the political problems we face at this time but the economic problems. Maybe it is very difficult to divorce one from the other. Here, again, there is much the individual can do. We must realize that the realities of the situation have changed. Now, more than ever, our economy is in a period of transition. Things will never be the same again. We can no longer feel ourselves fortunate because we have so many natural resources at our disposal. We still have them; however, we must realize they are not infinite, but finite. We have to husband them with very great care. No longer can we use oil and electricity as though it will be here forever.

We must individually examine what we do in our own houses. Do we really need all those lights turned on? I am looking around the chamber. I assume that we need all these lights. Apart from the tremendous consumption of energy, they are awfully hard on the eyes. There are many things we can do in our own houses. We have to be very sensible about our energy supplies. We know without doubt that they are finite. Everyone must do his share. I have not been used to this tremendous affluence of energy supplies. It is difficult to suddenly change all one's habits. What we need is not just somebody saying, "Okay; you have to conserve energy; you have to do this and that". This is not enough. You have to motivate people.

I should like to use a word which is not often used any more, and I regret it. I should like to say—and this refers to motivation, "Save energy because it is patriotic to do so". There is nothing wrong with being patriotic. I wish we would show a little more of it. Not patriotism of the old type. We are not going back to Rudyard Kipling and fifes and drums. We are not going to ask people to die for their country; we are going to ask them to live for their country. That is the motivation. Let us conserve what we have very carefully. Then, once we have looked at our own houses, let us go out in our community and find out what our municipalities are doing. For instance, how are they treating the disposal systems? Are they doing enough? Then we could turn to the province and finally to the federal government.

We are all vitally interested in this idea of energy conservation. Can we afford to have so much waste? Could we not think more about the advantages of recycling? Jobs are being lost daily. That is a terrible tragedy. But the day will come—hopefully, very soon—when we shall hear that though the old jobs are being lost, new jobs are being created, but not by the government, Mr. Speaker; not by the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: You hear people say, "I should like to do this", or, "I should like to do that". I ask them why they do not go out and do it, and they reply, "Too much intervention from all levels of government". I say to them, "If you really believe that any level of government is putting a stranglehold on your ability to do things as an individual, I would tell that government to butt out. But once you tell it to butt out by one door, don't ask it to come back through another".

We are still talking about the individual. What can an individual do to help the economy?

An hon. Member: Why not the government?

Mrs. Appolloni: I will tell the hon. member why. It is because I firmly believe it is the sum of individual effort which leads in the long run to the success of the collectivity. It is the individual who matters. That is what our society is all about. It is not what society can do for the individual, but vice versa. Here, again, I speak from the point of view of members of my own sex because they hold the purse strings. Go into any supermarket in this town or in my own city of Toronto and you will find, for example, that the lamb on sale comes from New Zealand or Australia. I am not talking about the balance of trade; we all know there must be a certain balance of trade between ourselves and our trading partners. What is it like, this lamb from New Zealand or Australia? It is fatty and indigestible. You wonder why you buy it. When you ask about Canadian lamb, you are told there is not enough Canadian production. Why not, Mr. Speaker? Then you go into a Greek restaurant in Toronto and you find the lamb is exquisite. What is the difference? Do you know what it is? That lamb is prime lamb from the fields of Ontario.

What about McDonald's? One should thank them for coming into our country, bringing in their capital and providing a certain number of jobs. But ask them where the beef which goes into their patties comes from. Is it grown in Alberta? If they say it is Australian, ask them why they are not using Canadian beef.

An hon. Member: Don't forget Canadian wine.

Mrs. Appolloni: When was the last time you tasted Canadian wine with your hamburger or lamb, or whatever you eat? By jove—just like the pop music from Quebec, I can guarantee it is darned good.

What else can we do? Look at the souvenirs sold at Niagara Falls. Maybe you want to buy something to remind you of your trip. Do you know what it is likely to be? A very nasty, gaudy bauble, and if you look closely at it you will find it was made in Hong Kong or some other place abroad.

An hon. Member: It is the same everywhere.

Mrs. Appolloni: No; there are other places. I will give out a free advertisement. Go into the Davis Agency here, or the Four Corners store, most places around Ottawa, and you will find tasteful Canadian-made things at reasonable prices. These are just a few ideas about what individual consumers can do. I suggest that every week when families are checking the shopping list, they should make another column in which to list the country of origin of the items they buy. This is important. We have to help our economy. I know we shall face criticism. Someone will accuse us of narrow self-interest. Like heck! Any neighbour who is a good neighbour will realize that the family comes first. This is the Canadian family, and it has to come first. I am not saying anybody should buy shoddy goods. Such goods deserve to be passed over. But in my experience Canadian goods are not shoddy. Maybe we have not given them the support they deserve. Let us buy all the Canadian-made goods we can.

There is still more to be done. Take the fish we put into our children's sandwiches when they go to school. Where was it canned? If it was canned in British Columbia, and other things are equal, let us by all means buy the product which was canned in British Columbia. If we find that many of the things we want to buy are not made in this country, we shall have to ask ourselves some very serious questions. I am not talking now about goods which cannot be produced here for climatic or similar reasons.

I have been trying all day to find out whether a rumour I have heard is true. The rumour is that only two pulp and paper mills in this country make cartons for milk. I can hardly believe it, since almost every day we see in the newspapers big advertisements inserted by the pulp and paper industry of Canada telling us that they are in trouble. So I have been trying to find out what percentage of the milk cartons used in Canada are actually made in this country. I was not able to get a precise answer. What I did get was the information that only 5 per cent of all corrugated paper used in Canada is manufactured in Canada. In other words, with all the forests at our disposal, we only corner 5 per cent of that market. Why do we not have more? Processing paper means more jobs. It is not that we are not capable of processing paper; we can do that and many more things. Is it because our people have a little less courage than others? Let us ask ourselves all these questions, Mr. Speaker.

Still on the economy, I would tell the average Mr. or Mrs. Canadian to be very careful how their representatives negotiate for them in the upcoming GATT agreements. I would tell them that we all know that an industry which is not competitive or efficient does not deserve to be supported. On the other hand, we must be extremely careful to make a distinction, if I may use a very familiar simile, between the child, the infant just learning to crawl, and the lazy teenager. If our infant, our industry, is just learning to crawl, you cannot automatically enter it in a four-mile marathon. We cannot afford to do that. We cannot afford to be the Boy Scouts of the world, even though Canada is great and open. I wonder if the others are as open as we are. What about the absence of tariff barriers on goods from other countries? In the meantime, our people are without jobs. So I say, watch the GATT agreements.

Now the future. At the moment we have a tremendous number of Cassandras—economic Cassandras and media Cassandras. It seems to be the great thing these days to say, "Oh, boy, you're going down the drain!" This is not doing us any service at all. What we need now are torchbearers of hope and confidence, and by jove we can have them. As for the future, it is going to be different, vastly different, from the past. It is not going to be an extension of the past, mainly because of our natural resources but also for other reasons. I think we will have to diversify. We will have to use all the imagination, enthusiasm and initiative of which we are capable. We can make the future a better, more humane place, we can have a better environment, if we have proper planning and design and the collective will.

We very definitely have problems, but we cannot allow them to come so near to us that they obstruct or even obliterate our vision. That would be foolhardy and tragic. I should like to refer to a recent report by the Science Council of Canada entitled "Canada as a Conserver Society". It tells us that the future can very well be much, much better than the present, but to what degree will depend upon whether we face the change with inertia, or grapple the challenges with all the enthusiasm, imagination and initiative of which we are capable.

Our long-term policy will be to achieve reliance on sources of renewable energy, aided by improvements in conservation and efficiency. New technologies such as solar heating, electricity from wind and liquid fuels from biomass will probably be developed economically and on a scale sufficient to meet new demands. The challenge is there, and we have the technology at our disposal. My time is up, Mr. Speaker, but my views are not.

[Mrs. Appolloni.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. With the kind permission of hon. members, I should like to inform them of the proceedings on the adjournment motion. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker)—Public Service—Request that minister intervene in case of Mr. Sant Singh; the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie)—Industry—Closing of fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland—Government action; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Industry—Request for measures to improve economic conditions.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. As individuals they made a valuable contribution, and I do not blame them for the misdeeds of the government opposite which I am going to speak about in a few minutes.

I want to speak this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, as a torchbearer of hope—the hope this government is going out of office in 1978 and that this country will get on its feet again. I do not believe that what we heard at the opening of this session was a Speech from the Throne. It was a whisper from the throne. It was a whimper from the throne. It was a plea for sympathy from the throne. It was a whine for forgiveness from the throne. It was a subtle and subliminal attempt to "con" all Canadians into believing that they, individually, are to blame for the state of Canada today, not this great wonderful government which sits opposite and which has occupied the benches of power and authority in this House for the last nine years.

That is what the Speech from the Throne was designed to do, Mr. Speaker, but it has fooled no one. Despite the fact that it was delivered by Her Majesty the Queen, its content is insipid, to say the least, and its intent is insidious, to say the best. What have we had after nine years? Canada brought to its knees. I do not want to bore the House with figures, but briefly they show that in 1968 the national unemployment rate was 4.5 per cent. In 1967, the year before, it was 3.8 per cent. Today, it is 8.3 per cent—far worse in eastern Canada. In 1968, the inflation rate was 50 per cent less than the present rate of 8.3 per cent. It has doubled since 1968. This year, real economic growth is 2 per cent. That is the best that Pierre can do for economic growth in Canada.

The government's budgetary deficit is $9.2 billion. When I was minister of finance in Newfoundland I thought, "My God how can I ever survive?" But our deficits were not even a twinkle in the eye of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when compared to this government's deficit of $9.2 billion. Revenue was only $33 billion 50 million. In addition, to such a deficit, hundreds of thousands of Canadians are unemployed; and everyone is suffering from inflation. We have a trade deficit in the billions. We have a Canadian dollar worth 89 decimal point something cents in terms of the U.S. dollar.

Do hon. members remember the "Diefendollar" and how the right hon. member was jeered at, this great man who sits with us on the front benches today? Now we have the floating dollar. It does not matter that it is worth 89 cents; the great answer of those on the benches opposite is that it is a floating dollar. They are very proud of what they call this floating dollar. is like a floating rib or a floating kidney. It is something which was invented by the Liberals and is supposed to be magnificent.

Well, Mr. Speaker, as our leader said the other day, the floating dollar has sprung a leak; we have a pretty leaky floating dollar. It is a Liberal leak. It is an 89-cent dollar, and some experts think it is going down to 85 cents or possibly 80 cents before it comes up again. That is where this government has brought us.

Then we have this pitiful attempt at a budget which was brought in under the Speech from the Throne. I refer to it as a gay budget, because it was sneaked in the back door! It was not brought out like a properly married woman. It was hidden and sneaked into the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a queer budget. That is where the government has brought us.

National unity is the great Liberal security blanket. They think we are all going to go to sleep worried about national unity, and vote them back into office in 1978. Not a hope! The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) cannot lead us to national unity. He has had nine years since being elected into office in 1968. He was elected on the promise of national unity and bilingualism. Where has he led us? Now he wants a confrontation so that he can get on our backs for another five years. Not likely!

Hon. cabinet ministers do not need to suck their thumbs. They have the national unity security blanket to get under every night. That will not work for them. That is the direction in which this country has been led.

A prominent Canadian, the ex-premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Joseph Smallwood, has a solution to the national unity question. I should like to quote from an article which appeared in a New Brunswick newspaper several months ago. It reads as follows:

> . . . the only way to keep Quebec in Canada is for English-speaking Canadians to "smother Quebecers with love."

I would not mind doing that in our caucus because there are only two to go. But it would wipe out the Liberal government opposite if we smothered them with love. That is the solution which was proposed by Mr. Smallwood, that we have to smother the Quebecers with love. Our two had better watch out if that advice is taken.

That is the kind of crap and nonsense which is coming from Liberals across this nation with regard to national unity. We are supposed to keep our mouths shut, listen to them, and believe that only they have the answers to these problems, while the unemployment ranks and inflation grow.

Look at Quebec in September, 1977. The unemployment is 10.8 per cent. That was the official figure. Over 10 per cent unemployment! Newfoundland was 15.8 per cent, which is the adjusted figure. New Brunswick was 15.3 per cent. Nova Scotia was 10.4 per cent. Prince Edward Island was 9.3 per cent. All of eastern Canada had over 10 per cent unemployment. That has never happened before. If it happened during the depression, I did not know.

I should like to refer to youth unemployment. In Newfoundland, 22 per cent is the official figure referring to those under 25. In New Brunswick the figure is 19.8 per cent of those under 25. Saskatchewan is the lowest. It is 6.1 per cent. The real rate of unemployment in Newfoundland, according to our statisticians, is 26 per cent. That is the miserable state the country has been brought to by hon. gentlemen opposite. We are told that we should not be Cassandras, that we should not moan and groan, and that we should not complain because it is our own fault. That is what we have been told by the hon. members opposite. On March 11, 1972, the Prime Minister said that we could be obsessed by unemployment. You bet we can. We are obsessed by it.

Now the ministers are coming forth and blaming everyone but themselves. On September 13, for example, the Minister of Finance indicated that foreigners know that Canada is riding through the current world economic difficulties in comparatively high fashion, but Canadians do not have the same buoyancy, and instead we bitch. Are we wrong to complain? Are the hundreds of thousands of unemployed wrong? Are those laid off by INCO wrong? Are those laid off at Stephenville wrong? Are those laid off at St. Lawrence wrong? The Minister of Finance says that they are bitchers. The Prime Minister has said that the remedy is not to print money, but to work harder and to be more modest in our demands, in our profits and in our wages. That was said by him on October 6. In other words; "Do what I say and not as I do".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: On October 11 in the Sunday Star the Prime Minister indicated that the answer is in ourselves. That has a faint literary ring. He also indicated that the answer is in self-discipline and the sense of values which we develop, that Canadians are a bit soft and have to be told they are soft. That is the kind of government we have. They blame everyone. They tell Canadians that they are soft. Yes, they are soft if they let the next election go by without turfing out the hon. members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Soft in the head. Because of the miserable amount of time we are given in this House to speak, I will refer only to one last quotation. It appeared last June in a newspaper article in British Columbia and reads in part as follows:

> Kelowna—Iona Campagnolo, minister of state responsible for fitness and sport, says a federal election probably won't come before June of next year . . .
> She also said unemployment and food prices will rise in Canada.

It was a positive promise that unemployment and food prices were going to rise in Canada. The article continues:

> Canadians are going to have to understand that the fat times are over.

That is great advice. Yes, the fat times are over. Because of the hon. gentlemen opposite, their fat times are going to be positively concluded as soon as they have the courage to go to the people and put themselves to the test of the electorate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There has been dismal failure in economic matters and in national unity matters. There has been complete, utter, and adject failure of government policy on the question of national unity and regional economic disparity. Nine years ago the government was going to eliminate, brutalize, terrorize, and absolutely stop regional economic disparity in Canada. Of course it has not, no matter what money is being spent.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) and some of his Liberal colleagues went for a visit to the province of Newfoundland. They crawled across that province to tell us how good we had it. An article which appeared in The Evening Telegram dated September 13, 1977, reads as follows:

> Regional economic expansion has generally failed in Newfoundland in terms of creating new secondary industries . . .

It certainly has. The article continues:

> Jamieson, who headed the department of regional economic expansion at one point in his political career, said that except for industries native to the region, industrial incentives have not "succeeded to a great extent" . . .

Also the article indicates that there was not a complete failure by DREE because of infrastructure and so on. In other words, DREE is just a method of handing out moneys across Canada to enable provinces to put in infrastructure. Good enough, but it is not overcoming regional economic disparity.

During the last nine years that the government has been in office, it has failed completely, utterly and absolutely. If it had any conscience at all, it would resign quietly. It should go to the electorate and ask the electorate if they want it to return to power. That would let someone else have a chance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I am delighted to have been appointed critic of industry, trade and commerce. I will be able to have a few dialogues in the House this year with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). He was good enough to come to my nominating meeting just one year and one month ago in order to give me a good send off. Therefore I owe the hon. member something. Now he is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. That is important to Newfoundland, as well as the nation. I should like to give him a hint, that he must concentrate on fisheries and getting our fisheries products into the European Common Market and into countries other than the United States. That will be one of his priorities, if he does not want to have me after him constantly, both in and out of this House.

For the first time in 100 years we have a chance in Canada to break into the European market and markets other than the United States market. This must be one of the objectives of these negotiations which are now taking place under the so-called Tokyo Round. I hope he will not be as vague as he was on "Question Period" two weeks ago last Sunday. I have never heard anything as vague as some of the minister's references on that occasion. He has to do his homework, and I am prepared to wait another three or four days to see if he can be more specific. Also, he should be concerned about the travel deficit.

During last year Canadians travelling outside Canada spent $1.2 billion more than foreigners travelling in Canada. That huge deficit was a record for Canada up to that time. In the first six months of this year the deficit is $1.2 billion, and everyone is indicating that the deficit will be $2 billion by the end of the year, because of Canadians travelling abroad. I suppose that is because we are "fat cats", as the minister for sport and amateur fitness would say, or as the minister for amateur sport and fitness would say, or as the hon. fit minister would say. We are spending $2 billion more abroad than foreign tourists are spending here. That cannot continue.

The government has indicated that it is not going to put on mandatory controls. Therefore I suggest to the minister that one of his first jobs should be a "ban the tan" campaign. All of us have heard of the "ban the bomb" campaign. What we need is a "ban the tan" campaign. Every Canadian who dares to go south next winter and returns to Canada with a tan should be ostracized. That "ban the tan" campaign should be started now, and perhaps we will be able to reduce that $2 billion deficit next year. If hon. members get a tan from the lights in this Chamber, we can explain that.

I have one regret in connection with the Speech from the Throne. Her Majesty was here in Ottawa, we were all delighted to see her and, I guess, the nation was delighted to see her on television, apart from those who were invited by the government to Ottawa, and I will not go into that. My only regret is that Her Majesty's government sitting opposite refused to allow Her Majesty the Queen to visit parts of Canada other than the Ottawa area in 1977, in spite of invitations extended to her. In fact the advice that Her Majesty the Queen received from the government was not to visit the province of Newfoundland, as one example. A petition was signed by practically every member of the population as a declaration of loyalty, but it had to be sent over to London and delivered at Buckingham Palace by the daughter of one of the petitioners. Her Majesty did not come to Newfoundland because the Prime Minister would not advise her to do so. I hope that will not happen again. I hope that never again will the Queen's presence be reserved just for Ottawa and the people in the Ottawa region. I do not think that is right or proper.

The Kingston communique was mentioned by my colleague a few moments ago. It was put out by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and four premiers. We now have five Progressive Conservative premiers, half the country, and the Leader of the Opposition, which makes a country and a half, agreeing on what should be done. There are only two Liberal premiers left. The Prime Minister, who speaks for himself, and two premiers speak on those matters, and they scoff at what has happened at Kingston.

I should like to speak on another subject for a moment. The government is giving advice to the people of Canada. It is telling them that they have to make some sacrifices, they have to produce and they have to lessen their demands, that a lot of what is happening is their fault, that we have to restrict our ability to get what we want, and so on. All this advice is coming to us. But when the people of Canada look at the government for inspiration, what do they see? They see, as our leader pointed out the other day, two cabinet ministers, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), whizzing out to Calgary in two separate jets, landing with their own separate parties, going to the same function, and then flying off again. That is the kind of sacrifice at which the public are looking. They are looking at raw politics in action.

There is supposed to be a great policy of relocating government departments and civil servants from Ottawa to places all around the country. Several weeks ago there was an announcement about relocating 2,500 civil servants and 15 agencies. Seven hundred and fifty people are supposed to go to Sherbrooke. So far as I know, every one of these moves was a move to a Liberal district, and most were removed to a district of a cabinet minister to try to prop them up in their feeble attempts to get elected next year.

The Hydrology Research Institute is supposed to move to Saskatoon. Well, the Minister of Transport may be suffering from water on the brain, but it is a pretty expensive way to get at it to move the Hydrology Institute to examine him. The Farm Credit Corporation is moving to Camrose in Alberta, the constituency of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If he were still on this side of the House what an outburst we would have heard from him if that move had taken place to the constituency of the Minister of Transport and not to his! That is what the public is seeing from this government which is asking for sacrifice and for restraint. What we are seeing is raw political chicanery in everything it does, from the Queen's visit to relocating civil servants.

One of the things we are wondering about in eastern Canada is that nothing seems to exist outside of central Canada. A happening in the last few days reinforces that impression, that is, the INCO close-downs at Sudbury and in other Ontario and Manitoba communities, resulting in the unemployment of over 3,000 people. It is very bad. But the fuss that is being made here in relation to these shut downs makes one wonder about the situation in eastern Canada. For example, 3,175 jobs will be lost in Ontario as a result of the INCO shut down, that is .078 per cent of the labour force of 4,048,000. Yet in Newfoundland six months ago the Labrador linerboard mill shut down on the west coast of Newfoundland and 1,500 people lost their jobs in the mill and out in the woods. In Newfoundland we have a labour force of 198,000. The loss of 1,500 jobs means that .76 per cent of the labour force became unemployed. Was there any outburst up here in central Canada, or any attention paid to it? No, hardly a twitter.

A mine is closing in St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, and 400 jobs will be lost. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did not even answer a letter from the Newfoundland government for two and a half months asking him to impose a tariff to save the mine, or to impose a quota. An oil refinery in Come-by-Chance is closing and over 600 jobs will be lost. Is there any fuss, any activity by the federal government to try to get it going again? No, none. All those close-downs will result in 2,500 jobs being lost, almost as many as here in Ontario, but they are being lost quietly despite our cries and our plaintive appeals, the appeals of a few members from that area, members from the west coast of Newfoundland.

The government was asked to assist the Newfoundland government to keep the Labrador linerboard mill going. The Newfoundland government could not keep it going any longer because of the huge expense and because it did not have the financial wherewithal, but the Government of Canada has done nothing in a substantial way to help that concern. In fact it has turned it down. Cabinet ministers say they are not in the business of saving jobs, they are in the business of creating jobs. Yet I look at the September 30 release by the minister's department and I see that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are contributing $11.3 million to a firm called Valleyfield Chemical Products Limited to acquire and rehabilitate a CIL factory at Valleyfield to manufacture explosives, much of which is forgiveable and does not need to be paid back. Why is it being given? Because of this federal involvement, 250 jobs will be saved. That is what the release says. So, to save 250 jobs in Quebec it is all right to lash out $11.3 million, but when you ask to help save 1,500 jobs in Stephenville, Newfoundland, you are laughed out of Ottawa. Let us call an election so we can show what we think of that in Newfoundland. This kind of inconsistency will be looked into a lot further before this session of parliament is over.

A civil war is going on between the Government of Canada and the government of Newfoundland. The government here is trying to crush the spirit of the government of Newfoundland. I have at least ten examples that I could give the House if I had the time to show what is happening there. Canada's representative, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is concerned about every country in the world except about the little province of Newfoundland which is being smothered and snuffled by him, by the government of which he forms a part.

A wood cutting project was suggested in connection with the Gull Island project in Labrador. Gull Island will be developed, if not next year, then in five or ten years. All that hydro power will not go to waste for ever; Canada needs it. The environmentalists have said that wood should be cut away on the sides of the lower Churchill river so that the reservoir will be in an area where all the wood has been cut out. The government of Newfoundland suggested to the government in Ottawa that it is a great work creation program which would involve employing some of the 900 loggers laid off at Labrador linerboard to start this wood cutting project on the reservoir. The project would take about four years and would employ about 400 loggers, and it would be worth while because the work has to be done anyway. The officials appeared to be delighted with this sensible suggestion for a make-work project. Yet the answer came months later from the minister of manpower and immigration, the now Minister of Employment (Mr. Cullen), that Canada Manpower cannot approve this proposal until it is certain that the project will proceed, the whole $2.5 billion project. They will wait until it is certain that it will proceed! What malarkey! It might be five years before this happens. That is their answer.

Ottawa must look at environmental considerations before giving the green light, and yet the environmentalists themselves have said that the wood must be cut off before the work is started. The member for the district says that no funding for this project will be considered until an environmental impact study has been done. I think we must do an impact study on this government and impact it right out of office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: There is a fisheries confrontation. The government, through its Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc), is attempting to dominate and crush any plans, policies or suggestions for the development of the fisheries that the Newfoundland government has through its minister of fisheries. The Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry has examined this.

Newfoundland is the province most dependent on fisheries in the whole of the Dominion. Twenty-five per cent of our work force is in the fishery or connected with it, and 10 per cent of our gross provincial product is involved in the fishery. It has great prospects for the future, yet when the provincial minister of fisheries sent a proposal to the federal government on May 11 outlining what should be done in various areas of the fishery it was repudiated without even the courtesy of a meeting. Most of the proposal was thrown out and the rest of it must wait until this government develops a policy for the Atlantic fishery. The federal minister refuses to meet with the provincial minister.

The Newfoundland government has started a program to build 100 longliners to replace vessels 40 to 65 feet long in the present fleet, but the 35 per cent subsidy that the federal government used to pay has been refused, and now the program will cost the Newfoundland government an additional $12 million. The federal government will not permit the chartering of foreign fishing vessels nor joint ventures.

I do not have time to go into details on all these matters, Mr. Speaker, but I submit that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry should be permitted to examine the minister and his aides and to invite the minister from Newfoundland and his aides to appear before it to make recommendations in an effort to resolve this problem. That committee should show some guts, and the majority of its members should stop being slavish devotees of the government. This is an area where there is complete confrontation, but because of the British North America Act the federal minister can have the last word. He can have the last word while he is in office, but if he is not in office he can have no words at all. That is what will happen to the minister and this government if they do not adopt a better approach than this to the provinces.

I have 100 examples, Mr. Speaker. There is the interprovincial ferry service, for instance. As a result of that service coming into operation, coastal boats no longer have to call at settlements, thus saving the Government of Canada great sums of money. The federal government agreed it would pay for the intra-provincial ferry services from certain islands to the mainland because it was saving money on the coastal boats. Now, however, the Minister of Transport tells the government of Newfoundland that it has to take over and pay for the ferry service. His list of crimes of omission and commission is long and I do not have time to deal with it properly.

The Cape Sambro is a trawler. This is the worst incident in recent months. There is a shipyard at Marystown, in the riding of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which is owned by the government of Newfoundland and employs at least 400 or 500 people. In the fall of 1975 the yard had no work and could not get work, so the government of Newfoundland decided to have a trawler built to the same specifications as earlier trawlers in the hope that someone would buy it—perhaps National Sea Products Ltd.—so that the yard could keep going. They spoke to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who told them that if they went ahead he could assure them they would get the 35 per cent subsidy, 22 per cent from the Department of Fisheries and 13 per cent from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, under regular programs. This was a $4,250,000 vessel so the subsidy was very important in order that the shipyard could compete with foreign yards.

The trawler was built and the minister was contacted about the subsidy in October, 1976, because officials in Ottawa were not talking much about it. There was an offer from National Sea Products Ltd. to buy the vessel for 10 per cent down with a 55 per cent mortgage, and the balance to be covered by the 35 per cent subsidy.

The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce agreed to pay the 13 per cent subsidy that goes to shipyards, but the Department of Fisheries has resolutely refused to pay the 22 per cent or $935,000, from that day to this. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment is defying the Secretary of State for External Affairs saying that he will not pay the subsidy. The Secretary of State for External Affairs came to Newfoundland with his Liberal colleagues last September. He was questioned about this matter, and the following report appeared in the Evening Telegram of October 21:

> The federal minister from Newfoundland said Sept. 22 the Cape Sambro affair had been a "foul up from day one" and, without making a specific commitment, said the federal government would do its best to straighten out the situation.
> At his side, Fisheries Minister Romeo LeBlanc said on that occasion it is regrettable that the province went ahead and built the trawler on speculation that the full subsidy would be paid. He also said Ottawa would try to resolve matters.

He had better resolve them, Mr. Speaker. It was big of him to say it was regrettable they had gone ahead. They went ahead because his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, said they would get the subsidy. He said there had been a foul up and the federal government would do its best. Mr. Speaker, the best thing it can do is give the money, and if the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment does not, he will have to answer for it when he appears before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. We will deal with him in the House and, as Churchill said, we will deal with him on the beaches and in the fields and in the sea and in the coves until he pays up that 22 per cent that his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, promised the poor little government of Newfoundland.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his allotted time has expired. However, he may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There is not unanimous consent. The Chair did not hear unanimous consent and therefore has to recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Robinson).

Mr. Crosbie: Is it agreed or not, Mr. Speaker, that I conclude?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: Let the record show that the Minister of National Revenue—

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Chair asked was there unanimous consent of hon. members, and it was refused. Therefore the Chair recognizes the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to say how pleased I was, and I know members of my constituency were as well, to have the Queen open our parliament recently. I was pleased and honoured to have the opportunity of meeting Her Majesty and His Royal Highness Prince Phillip. This was a great honour shared by many other members of parliament.

In keeping with tradition, I should like at this time to extend my congratulations to both the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) on their thoughtful remarks which opened the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

I should like to mention briefly the report submitted by the subcommittee on the the penitentiary system in Canada. I will not cover the background of the report because my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), spoke at some length last Friday about the recommendations made and their future implementation. As a member of that subcommittee I want to add that the report we produced was unanimous, representing all parties in the House of Commons. The feedback I have received from experts in the penal field and the general public has been positive and encouraging. The response of the minister, to date, has been reasonably supportive, and I hope that virtually all of the recommendations will be implemented and will receive the unanimous approval of the House.

At this time I wish also to thank my colleagues for their support and good wishes on my recent appointment as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport (Mrs. Campagnolo).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson: I am not entering my new responsibilities empty handed, without experience, because I have been chairman of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs for the past three years. My duties there were made easier because of the active participation of all members and, as a result, good legislation was returned to the House for consideration and passage.

I want to mention one private member's bill which was dealt with by the committee, Bill C-221, introduced by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen), which proposed an amendment to the section of the Criminal Code dealing with the abduction of a child. When parliament recessed, this bill was under consideration by the standing committee. I am confident that I have the full support of the House when I say that I hope that this bill will retain its present status so that the witnesses arranged can be heard and a report finalized in this forthcoming session.

When I was chairman of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs I followed with considerable interest and satisfaction the development of federal legislation on social services. As a matter of fact it was my pleasure to address a volunteer agency on the topic about this time last year. This is why I take particular pleasure today in speaking about the legislation which the government hopes to introduce in this session. For those hon. members who may not be aware of the development of this legislation I would like to take this opportunity to identify its origins and to suggest the form the legislation might take.

As a result of concerns being expressed by a growing number of Canadians, the federal and provincial ministers of welfare decided to have a look at our country's social security system. A social security review was launched soon after, with the release of the Working Paper on Social Security in Canada on April 18, 1973 by the then minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde).

As a direct result of this review there were a number of improvements in many areas. First, there were significant improvements in the old age security and guaranteed income supplement programs. Second, there were significant improvements in family allowance programs. Third, there was increased compatability between the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. Fourth, there was the introduction of indexing to federal income maintenance measures. Fifth, there was research into how the taxation system could be used to develop benefits for the working poor.

I now come to the developments with respect to social services which have occurred as a result of the review. I feel that the federal and provincial ministers have been particularly impressive in responding not only to the needs of the aged, the handicapped, and children, but also to the changing social climate between 1973 and today, a climate of increasing economic restraint and of changing concepts of confederation. I would like to discuss this climate a little more fully.

In the fall of 1974 one of the working parties which grew out of the review, the working party on social services, produced an interim report which contained a critical review of social services in Canada and proposed areas for further study and consideration. Following receipt of this report the then minister of national health and welfare proposed to his provincial colleagues federal sharing in a wider range of services than was possible under the Canada Assistance Plan and additional financing for improved services in the areas of rehabilitation services and support services for the aged and handicapped. In May of 1975 the welfare ministers met and agreed to develop the necessary legislation in consultation with each other.

A year later, in June, 1976, general agreement was reached on an outline for the proposed legislation on social services. The federal government therefore began drafting the appropriate legislation, and consultation continued with respect to the regulations.

The proposed social services act, Bill C-57, was read for the first time in this House of June 20, 1977. Its presentation had been somewhat delayed by developments in the health sector. New legislation covering the federal contribution to Canada's health services took effect on April 1, 1977.

What is important to remember is that throughout the negotiations the provinces urged that the federal legislation on social services should allow them flexibility to develop services in response to their perceptions of their needs and priorities, provide them with security of financial arrangements, and avoid undue administrative complexity.

As the development of the legislation and the negotiations with the provinces on the regulations progressed, it became apparent that the conditional cost-sharing approach might no longer be the most appropriate instrument to promote the improvement of social services and to provide the provinces with the flexibility they desired. There has been a growing concern that the legislation as proposed might be difficult to administer. It was feared that the introduction of block financing for health services in April, 1977, would make administrative matters even more complex because of the close relationship between many of the services, such as homemakers' services and nursing services.

Furthermore, the trend in an increasing number of provinces was to integrate health and welfare services, thus making less clear the line between them and making certain service definitions difficult to evolve. Too much complexity in a federal-provincial agreement would mitigate against positive working relationships between the two levels of government, and in terms of federal-provincial relations this was an important consideration. However, it was equally important in terms of the development of the sector and the improvement of social services in Canada.

The federal government has responded vigorously and creatively to these concerns. The former minister of national health and welfare made an alternative offer to the provinces which, if accepted, would provide them with the basic financial security they desire, while at the same time allowing them maximum flexibility and minimum administrative complexity.

In September of this year the minister proposed to the provinces that a block financing arrangement be substituted for the conditional shared cost approach which was reflected in Bill C-57. Under a block financing approach the federal contribution in 1978-79 and onward would be based on a per capita formula rather than on provincial expenditures.

The formula provides for expansion and growth in the sector, recognizes price changes, and includes a levelling factor which would bring all provinces to the same per capita payment in ten years' time. The combination of these factors would have the effect of raising the federal per capita contribution of $22 in 1977-78 to close to $70 per capita in 1987-88, given current projections of the rate of growth. The federal contribution in a first full year of operation would be some $700 million.

I would like to emphasize three very important points. Some comments have been made, in the news media and elsewhere, that the federal government's offer to block finance the social services represents a withdrawal from the sector. Nothing could be further from the truth. The government attaches just as much importance to the development of social services as it did when it introduced Bill C-57. Indeed, it has demonstrated that commitment by including in the offer $132 million as its share of the growth and expansion that are necessary in the field of social services.

I would like to emphasize that the block financing arrangement would cover precisely those services which were defined in the social services bill tabled in this House on July 20, 1977. I should stress that I am referring here only to social services and not to the income maintenance needs of disadvantaged Canadians. Those needs will continue to be met through a variety of federal programs and through the income maintenance provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan.

It is still too early to determine what the reaction of the provinces to this imaginative proposal will be, and hence to predict when new legislation reflecting it will be ready for presentation to the House. The Minister of National Health and Welfare very recently wrote to her colleagues and hopes to have their views on this matter in the near future. If the response continues to be as positive as has been evidenced so far, the government will introduce a revised social services bill during this session.

I know of no real reason why the over-all response to this attractive offer should be anything but positive. On the one hand, the governments of the provinces would be completely free to respond to the needs in their provinces in accordance with their own priorities. On the other hand, both levels of government would have their energies freed to work together on social policy issues rather than having to maintain detailed administrative arrangements, with the attendant friction.

In responding as positively as it has to provincial concerns I believe that the federal government is laying the groundwork for an excellent model of co-operation with the provinces which will lead to greater social progress in Canada in a way more in keeping with our developing confederation.

I would now like to direct my comments to our economic policy. In the past year the government has published two discussion papers. The first was "The Way Ahead" and the second "An Agenda for Co-operation". Both papers suggest that it is necessary to find a better way of managing our economy, a more equitable method to spread out the wealth when times are good, and an improved way of pulling together when times are bad. The Speech from the Throne, the address by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and the economic and fiscal statement by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) all echoed a similar theme regarding our present economic state: high inflation, slow growth, and high unemployment. To quote the Prime Minister, "We were in a true sense, a nation living beyond our means."

● (1742)

The Minister of Finance outlined some of the measures that the government will take to improve our present economic climate. I would like to discuss only a few, controls, further job creation programs, and the encouragement to the business sector.

It is two years since the establishment of the Anti-Inflation Board. Controls have helped greatly to check the inflationary spiral. During that period the Board has operated just about on target. Costs have been brought down, wage settlements are down, and the consumer price index has been brought down as well. You will realize that the government does not want to intervene indefinitely. Therefore the Minister of Finance announced that a phase-out of controls will begin on April 14, 1978. The Anti-Inflation Act will be amended, and an agency will be established to monitor price and cost developments.

Many groups have called for the immediate end to controls, but they do not seem to realize that their solution would only result in a rapid escalation of wages and prices, which would feed inflation and which would do nothing toward stimulating the economy or reducing unemployment. This gradual phase-out will allow us to sustain fiscal and monetary restraint.

There is no question that the Canadian economy is facing a very serious unemployment problem. The labour force has grown rapidly, with an especially high influx of young people into the labour market. Youth unemployment is a world-wide phenomenon and Canada has been a leader in providing innovative direct employment programs, the most recent being Canada Works and Young Canada Works. Four hundred and fifty million dollars have been already budgeted for these and other programs. The Minister of Finance informed us that an additional allocation of $150 million would be made available to create work projects in high unemployment areas. It was also stated that the government was exploring a new approach to job creation schemes in the form of a new program of employment credit for private business firms.

I fully support these new measures. However, I am keenly aware that these programs do not provide long term employment. We must look to private enterprise to supply this employment. However, job growth will only result if our industries are capable of better productivity so that they can actively compete in the world market place. There is strong international competition for productive resources and markets.

During the last session the government took several initiatives to assist Canadian business. For example, the Enterprise Canada 77 program is an effort to enhance development in the business community. At this time, all across the country, businessmen are being invited to attend seminars and workshops on export financing, technological innovation, and productivity, to name a few. The Minister of Finance stated that the fiscal measures mentioned in the March budget would be reintroduced. These include the introduction of a 3 per cent inventory allowance, the enrichment of the dividend tax credit, and the extension of the investment tax credit.

It is important to note that we have recognized the need for, and are prepared to participate in further consultation and co-operation with the provinces and labour and business, if our industrial sector is to get back on its feet and create the much needed employment for Canadians.

For the last few minutes I have been speaking about what policies the government has taken and will adopt to revitalize the Canadian economy, but at this point I would like to turn the tables, using the Kennedy approach, and ask all Canadians if they are prepared to contribute. To quote the Prime Minister:

> What is needed is a simple decision on the part of the Canadian people to co-operate to keep their costs down, to live within their means, to act together in a spirit of co-operation in every area of the economy.

Aside from our preoccupation with the economic concerns of this country, Canadians are individually and collectively reaching out to discover what links us together as a Canadian people and by what means we can express our dedication to the Canadian spirit. With the passage of bill 101 by the National Assembly of Quebec, the national unity debate has intensified. No longer do some of us underestimate the dedication of the Parti Québecois government, a government which sincerely believes that separation is the only way in which the French culture and language can survive.

All Canadians, French and English alike, are at the crossroads. A choice must be made. Some consensus must emerge on the future of our country. Therefore I was pleased when the Prime Minister announced that during this session legislation would be introduced concerning a referendum, which will allow the federal government to consult with all Canadians on the national unity issue.

The Speech from the Throne reiterates the Prime Minister's wish that we participate more actively in the reshaping of the future of Canada, and to quote from the Speech from the Throne:

> The government dedicates itself profoundly to the rediscovery of the spirit of unity. It wishes to learn from all who are interested in Canada and who have thoughts on how it can be a better place in which to live.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this long traditional debate. First, like previous speakers, I would like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I admit that perhaps I would not have been as generous as they were in their comments on the throne speech, but anyway they are two new members to whom I would like to wish much success in the interests of their own electors.

I would also like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I represent a constituency which as most others in Canada is now experiencing the problems and concerns stated in the throne speech. I also come from a particularly tormented province taking into account the political and economic circumstances. My constituency as many others needs a certain economic impetus. Agriculture is also having some difficulties. The unemployment rate is unacceptable and I think that I am only representing a constituency which is not unlike many others. During the next few weeks, no doubt I will have the opportunity to deal with some projects or pieces of legislation that could solve these difficulties. I also hope to have the opportunity to make some comments that will be taken into good consideration by hon. members on the government side.

I listened very carefully to the Speech from the Throne and also with interest to speeches delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I draw from them all a very clear conclusion: the obvious recognition of a difficult if not catastrophic situation at both the economic and political levels. Of course both speakers called for co-operation from all Canadians to redress the present situation. Both recognized the absolute need to obtain the confidence of the Canadian people, thus inviting as well the official opposition to co-operate with them to help regain this confidence. In ten years, I have never seen a government as ill at ease, as concerned about the various problems as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, can anyone believe that, as members of the official opposition who have the responsibility and duty to denounce, on behalf of the Canadian people and with all our might, the failure of the current administration, we could co-operate with this government and help it obtain this trust? What do they take us for, Mr. Speaker? Could we ask the Canadian people to trust a government which has demonstrated such evident inaction, which has failed to achieve the objectives it had set for itself in 1968, from the "just society" to national unity, which was responsible again quite recently for the elimination of some 6,000 dairy producers in the province of Quebec alone, which had succeeded in fostering so much hope, then creating so many needs which finally turned into so many cruel disappointments.

● (1752)

But then I say they are expecting too much from us, much too much indeed. Mr. Speaker, I would like to give a fairly faithful and precise account of the specific reasons why we, members of the official opposition, felt we had to decline an invitation by the minister although he claimed he needed that kind of confidence. Should we remind him of the situation we are facing now? I suppose the Speech from the Throne overlooked this matter of equal opportunities and economic justice, of difficulties and cultural injustice in the future. In my opinion, the Speech from the Throne should have been read five years ago. In my view we are in a slump, therefore, we cannot possibly ask the Canadian people to trust the Speech from the Throne.

I would like to give a few examples to support my statements which are very harsh indeed, Mr. Speaker. When Canada celebrated its centennial in 1967, it was one of the privileged countries in the world. We were a simple, vigorous and flourishing country which could look confidently towards its future. It was a country where, in spite of different origins, languages and cultures, people were showing signs of good will and were ready to make the necessary compromises to live together in some kind of satisfactory cohabitation, so that in spite of the normal frictions and necessary adjustments we were moving slowly but steadily towards a mode of mutual tolerance and harmony. In a word, Canada was moving forward and it was possible to believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right when he said that the twentieth century belonged to Canada.

Ten years have passed and all this is disappearing and will soon be nothing but a memory. Ten years later, we find ourselves in a country stuck in alarming economic programs which are about to paralyze for a long time our economic growth and development, a country divided by political and linguistic prejudices, a country which is wondering about its future. What has happened in this ten-year period to make the butterfly turn into a caterpillar and the dream become a nightmare? In 1968, Mr. Speaker, after the Centennial celebrations, a general election put at the head of the government a man who, we must admit, hoisted himself by the sheer power of his personality and intelligence. So deep has been his influence on the economy and even our national fabric that he unknowingly has confused and cast them adrift. I know that government members will accuse me of petty partisanship because I am attacking their party leader. True, he is a personality above average, but, personally, I am not so blind as to be unable to see him as he actually is.

I am taking the Prime Minister and this government to task all the more easily. I know they are able to defend themselves. I also know that he is a Quebecker just like me and that the words "français" and "franchise" have the same root. Whether members opposite admit it or not, I say that the frustrations and difficulties which our country is now experiencing stem from the personality and the behaviour of this government and of the man who has managed the affairs of Canada for nearly a decade, Mr. Speaker.

It has been said that the Prime Minister has charisma, that he exudes an uncommon magnetism; it is true. But it is also true that he flaunts his arrogance, that he knows nothing about flexibility and that he does not recognize his errors readily. It is also said that the Prime Minister is an intellectual, that he is refined, that he is quick-witted, which is also true. But it is equally true that his line of reasoning is often a one-way street, that he plays with words like a juggler, and that he is slow in adapting to new realities. Besides, the Prime Minister himself has in the past said of himself that he constantly sought out new challenges, that he found it difficult to conform, that he loved a tough fight, that he did not care about details, and very little about whether or not people agreed with him. All those aspects of his character, Mr. Speaker, combine to throw light on the ever astonishing performance of the Prime Minister since 1968, in this House as well as outside.

I wanted to draw that rough sketch of what I believe to be his qualities and his faults, for I feel that therein lies the true explanation for his actions since he has come to power, actions which are but the prelude to the economic and political stagnation in which we now find ourselves.

In his speech last week, the Prime Minister decided at long last to recognize that the country is up against serious economic problems, but again he would have us believe that it all happened as if by magic, because of the economic situation throughout the world, because of inflation, because of unemployment, because Canadians live beyond their means; in short, because of everything save him and his government.

But he took good care not to admit that for the past nine years he had tried to pass as an economist without any qualifications in that field. Nor did he admit that his own views on the most effective ways to fight unemployment and inflation had swayed the Cabinet into adopting short term policies over the past few years, which failed to get to the roots of the problem. Incidently, I would be curious to know the views of the former minister of finance, Mr. Turner on the economic philosophy of the present prime minister. The Prime Minister would not confess that he had made a mistake on the issue of price and wage controls. He scorned my party's suggestions during the 1974 electoral campaign but ended up by having to implement them a year and a half after. The difference is that they were 18 months overdue and were applied without previous consultation with those affected by these measures. And as a matter of fact these controls proved almost ineffective because business and labour were not involved in their application.

Finally, the Prime Minister does not really know how to remove the controls because of the climate of mistrust and uncertainty he created by his attitude in the economic world. Such was the disastrous economic performance of this government for almost 10 years. And it is that same government and that same man who spoke about leadership during the 1974 campaign. In 1972, he had another slogan: This nation is strong, he proclaimed everywhere. Indeed, the country was strong, but he succeeded in breaking it up.

However, the most disappointing performance of the government leader concerns national unity. Our great expert on constitutional matters has done so much that the cannons on the Plains of Abraham are perking up.

Never had separatism been so strong before the advent of this government in 1968. But I suggest that it is himself and his government that are responsible for the rise of separatism in Quebec, because of their arrogance and rigidity, their continuing reliance on the status quo, their obvious contempt for provincial grievances and their morbid fear of giving up the least bit of federal authority. Indeed, he is the man responsible for the rise of separatism in Quebec.

Today, he would have us believe that the separatist thesis and the coming into power of the Parti Québécois on November 15 are at the root of all the ills suffered by our country at present. But he fails to say that he is responsible for the rigid, insensitive and costly implementation of the Official Languages Act which only succeeded in upsetting the English-speaking provinces without meeting the aspirations of the province of Quebec that were quite different, Mr. Speaker.

Because he had promised English Canada that his bilingualism policy would deal with the problem of national unity—and he still maintains this—the Prime Minister raised great hopes that were frustrated. Because he always persisted in reducing the constitutional problem to a mere linguistic dimension, he only succeeded in aggravating the grievances of Quebec towards the federalist system.

In addition, how is it that over those years, the Prime Minister has never heeded the growing menace of separatism and did not see fit to warn English Canada about it.

I shall quote his own words to back my contention that either he has very little political foresight, or he was deliberately hiding the truth.

Mr. Speaker, as I have several very interesting quotations to make this evening, may I call it six o'clock, and continue my remarks at eight o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

● (2002)

Mr. La Salle: So I shall continue, Mr. Speaker. Before we adjourned, I was saying that along with my comments, I would make a few quotations to illustrate the total unawareness of the Prime Minister, as shown by some statements he made over a number of years.

For instance, in May 1966, he said it was unlikely that Quebec would ever want to separate. In May 1968, he asserted that federalism was gaining ground in the province of Quebec. In January 1970, he said that federalism was not threatened. In July 1971, he contended that his firm stand on the constitutional issue had prevented separatism from developing in Quebec during the past three years. In September 1972, he claimed that as a result of the efforts made by his government, Canadians had never been so united. In October 1972, he predicted that separatism was disappearing in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, those are the statements made by the Prime Minister throughout Canada and in particular in other provinces than Quebec. On top of that, a few months before November 15 of last year, he announced to the Canadian people, and this beats all: Separatism is dead. However, he said, one should not lose all hope since last January, he came back again saying: Separation will not take place. Let us hope for the sake of this country that this time he will be right. But it is above all in his discussions with provincial governments that one can see how great are his diplomatic skill and statesmanship.

[Mr. La Salle.]

In May 1967, he denounces the aggressiveness of provincial premiers. In January 1968, he states that it is time to engage in a fight against the provinces about the constitutional reform. In January 1968, as well, one week before the constitutional conference, he warns Quebec that it empire building is out of the question. In March 1968, he accuses Premier Johnson of negotiating in bad faith. Also in March 1968, he says that the Quebec government is "an insignificant provincial government". In April 1969, he says about Premier Bertrand that he has lost his senses. In April 1970, he describes the Quebec premier as an unimportant provincial politician. In May 1970, he accuses the provincial premiers of blackmail. In February 1972, he accused the British Columbia premier of being narrow-minded. In June 1972, he also called Quebec's claims insignificant. Finally, more recently he derided former Premier Bourassa—one of his cousins—for eating hot dogs.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the government did not spare any efforts to bring about national harmony in this country. If only the Prime Minister would remember a statement he made in 1971. I don't know if my friends opposite remember. He said he would resign if a separatist government were ever elected in Quebec. You will not mind, Mr. Speaker, if I deplore aloud that certain promises prove to be empty words.

From the beginning of my speech I have tried to establish the link between the man who has been running this country for nearly ten years and the dramatic imprint he has left on it. He is, of course, a man out of the ordinary, I admit without hesitation. How could he be otherwise and yet manage to stay in power in spite of so many contradictions, disappointments, mistakes and turnabouts? He has been unique in many respects and it will be said of him that he was not a prime minister exactly like the others. But legend lasts only so long and with the coming winter I find comfort along with a very large number of my fellow citizens in the thought that spring will finally bring the final curtain down on a show that has already lasted for too long. Quite fortunately for the future of Canada, I think we have started the final act entitled: The colossus with clay feet. Mr. Speaker, those statements made across this country knowingly or unknowingly hid the truth. Only the Prime Minister can tell for sure. I made reference to a series of statements which were misinformation spread across Canada. Mr. Speaker, I think that those quotations were correctly interpreted. After reassuring English Canada particularly that separatism will decrease in the province of Quebec, they had the gall to support the CBC when it misrepresented the facts throughout the country. I say to all Canadians, Mr. Speaker, it would have been wiser to reflect on the CBC broadcasts instead of believing the Prime Minister's statements, and this, for the last four or five years.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to remind you, when I say that the separatism issue in the province of Quebec is due to the inflexibility of this government, I would like to remind you also of those negative answers made not only to the present first minister but also to Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Bertrand, Mr.

Johnson, Mr. L'Allier, Mr. Hardy, Mr. St-Pierre, who relied on a great number of members from Quebec in Ottawa, on representations which fell on deaf ears, and which were so many reasons they gave at that time to the present first minister to reject a federalism that they wished and still wish to be viable.

With regard to the representations made by the province of Quebec particularly, could the government remember also the common front put up by the finance ministers against the federal government and realize that the views of the province of Quebec were also shared by the nine other provinces in some respects. And now, a few days ago, the Prime Minister laughed at us when he said that no government has ever been as flexible as his. But, Mr. Speaker, a few provincial Liberals remember that the measures advocated by this government led to disaster in the last provincial election.

The dairy policy which deprived Mr. Bourassa of invaluable support because of the mismanagement of an ill-conceived, ill-prepared federal policy proved very costly to the Quebec milk producers. I could mention the Ontario milk producers because that issue has not been settled, but I will come back to that. Mr. Speaker, for ten long years we have listened to those men, and I say again that they have the gall to ask for our cooperation, to win the public confidence. But the only way to settle that question is not through a cabinet shuffle which will not produce any new ideas due to the absence of new faces.

Mr. Speaker, I remember that it was rumoured at the time of the by-election that the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Lamontagne) had been promised a portfolio in the forthcoming cabinet shuffle. I realize that he must be disappointed, I am sorry he is absent from the House, and I suggest he could have brought something new to this 10-year old government. The ministers have played some sort of musical chairs; the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was shouting from the top of his lungs last Thursday that the worst thing was the fear of fear itself, not realizing that he was shaking all over as he was saying this. We are not to expect any new idea from this cabinet, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance has been there, with all his colleagues, for the past 10 years and he was supposed to come up with new ideas. What did we get? Leftovers. The government has clearly demonstrated that it is exhausted and the only solution is to get rid of it.

Mr. Béchard: Are you kidding?

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) is asking me if I am kidding, after this huge failure of some 10-year duration in the area of unemployment. Huge failure also in the area of national unity, under a government which still claims to be the government of the people, even after the elections of a separatist party in Quebec.

Furthermore this same government, elected in Quebec, promised ten years ago to achieve Canadian unity. Is it not a colossal failure, Mr. Speaker? And do you suppose that we, the members from Quebec, are going to co-operate with this government in an effort to convince the Canadian people to back it up? The Canadian population would resent it, Mr. Speaker. They have shown unparalleled incompetence. And as far as the economy is concerned, to this day this government has shown complete lack of competence and effectiveness; for how long has this been going on?

I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) boast about the tax reduction when we know that our leader and our financial critic have been asking for this reduction for the past two years in order to give a minimum purchasing power to Canadians in view of the absence of positive action and new initiatives. Are we going to support this government, Mr. Speaker? No, we are not and we shall do everything in our power to remind the Canadian people of its colossal failure at the political and economic levels.

In Washington recently, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine certainly heard his beloved leader express his wish to make an in-depth re-evaluation of our constitution and say the exact opposite of what he has been doing for the past ten years. Suddenly, the truth has to come out. Recently in this House he gave us a lecture on history. Canadians know it and Quebecers think that they do too. Mr. Speaker, I believe that because of our responsibilities as members of parliament, we must denounce the stand-patitis of this government and refuse to help it regain the confidence of the people when this government has continually favoured confrontation among unions, businessmen and provinces at a time when it would have been essential to bring all these people together for a round table discussion!

It is unthinkable to try to restore our economic climate without those people, and on this level also, the government is doing nothing. And we know that it needs now the co-operation and the advice of these businessmen. We have been asking for a long time that the government meet with these associations to try to find a way to restore the economic climate, and now of course, there will be the question of a referendum, which is another original idea of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and this government to hide the real problems. They are not afraid of increasing the tensions which exist in Canada by using the referendum issue in order to conceal the real problems. These problems have been concealed under the bilingualism issue. As this may show a lack of initiative or imagination, they are coming up with the referendum formula. But this is not what we need. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the important thing is to prove not only to Quebec but to all the provinces that there is a possibility of restoring the economic climate, thereby enabling the Canadian people, both English and French, to fraternize just like they did ten years ago during the centennial celebrations. This is the way to proceed.

When Canadians are made to believe that the solution lies in national unity, this is not true; this is a smokescreen. It is by restoring the economic climate, by establishing a minimum income for each citizen that we will be able to get Quebec and all the provinces around the same table and I would be very pleased to accept this challenge. We now have the proof of the tremendous failure of this government. We, in the opposition, cannot believe for a single moment in the projections made by the Minister of Finance, for instance, since those made by the previous ministers have proved to be false, thereby embarrassing the government. And the financial qualifications of the Minister of Finance are probably not any better than mine, in spite of all his goodwill, Mr. Speaker, and I shall never go so far as to solicit the Minister of Finance, for example.

Mr. Béchard: Good luck!

Mr. La Salle: But he has announced measures and estimates which we have heard long ago, with the same economists and the same experts, and which have turned out to be just as wrong. How is it possible to ask the Canadian people to believe in these estimates? It is unthinkable. It has been proven a hundred times, Mr. Speaker, that these were outright misrepresentations and that all the objectives set by the government have turned out to be failures. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will be difficult for me to vote against this throne speech. I repeat that I will not miss the opportunity during the coming session to urge these Quebecers—who certainly feel like interrupting me from time to time—to ask these Quebecers sitting on the other side to consider the responsibilities which fall on their own government.

Is there anything more odious, Mr. Speaker, than to pretend that there are problems in my province since November 15? Mr. Bourassa was saying yesterday in a broadcast that he saw these problems coming for three years and that he deplored the narrowmindedness of his colleagues in Ottawa. So my dear friends, how many times have you made fun of your little cousin? You held him up to ridicule enough, I repeat, to be responsible for the election of a government which aims at the division of the country, and contrarily to what you have told me, you have abused people in the past. I do not seek independence, but between the two extremes—

An hon. Member: There is the third option!

Mr. La Salle: —between the two extremes, contrary to the minister who is speaking of the third option—

● (2022)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall conclude on this, having no intention of exaggerating. The Prime Minister issued a warning not to opt for a third option. Is it possible, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister contradicts the reasoning and directives of the Pepin-Robarts Commission? Mr. Pepin referred to a third option. Mr. Pepin has been stressing all the time that between those two extremes, independence and the referendum on the one side and centralization and this government's status quo on the other, we should opt for a central, third option.

Highhandedly the Prime Minister is rejecting the advice given by people he chose himself. Mr. Robarts and Mr. Pepin can give sound advice to the Prime Minister. But he feels that he is Canada, he cannot accept the advice given by Mr. Pepin, one of his former advisers, and Mr. Robarts, a well-experienced man. We should not choose a third option, we should remain by his side. When we were not thinking along the Liberal lines, when we expressed a concern for Quebec and provincial autonomy, we would be separatists. Well, we are neither Liberals nor separatists. Thank God, Mr. Speaker. My feeling is that between those two extremes, there is space for something else and after a meeting our leader recently—

Some hon. Members: Which one?

Mr. La Salle: —after—What an information gap! Those people over there are not even aware! After a meeting, our leader, with the four Conservative premiers—they are now five and this is encouraging—expressed the view that the constitution should be reassessed. We are ready. We are ready to reassess the constitution. We feel the need to reassess provincial jurisdictions. We are among those who believe that the provinces must take part, not in a meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada about decisions which have already been taken, but to prepare records so that the final national decision be shared with the provinces. Recently we had a typical example: once again the federal government offered money to the provinces for insulation programs. But this project is an example, Mr. Speaker, of the generosity of the federal government and is in itself acceptable since the federal government is responsible for conserving energy. We are grateful to the government but as this initiative had not been studied by the provinces, there have been some hesitations.

Is it not possible to get the provinces together, to spell out the proposals and the offers of the federal government and to have all eleven governments agree on how these benefits might be shared? No, Mr. Speaker, instead the government has preferred to tell the provinces: "We have $1 billion to spend and this is how you are going to spend it." This is arrogance my friends and this is the kind of attitude which irritates the provinces. That is what makes the premiers of the provinces so negative towards such policies.

We believe that the provinces must be consulted and there must be a dialogue between the federal government and the provinces. I know that the Prime Minister is much more flexible than he used to be and he always said it, but how many members kept silent, behind him, Mr. Speaker, about the needs of Quebec or of other provinces?

Mr. Speaker, of course we have problems. We want a wonderful country just as much as our friends on the other side, but we do want to have our say, and we do not see any change in that respect. It is unthinkable, Mr. Speaker, to talk about a new and beautiful Canada if this government does not show respect towards the Canadian population, recognizing its own incompetence and failure and its need for the help and assistance of our businessmen, unions and provincial premiers. Canada will have to pay dearly for the pride of its government. The attitude of the government and its outright failure will have terrible economic consequences on Canadians over the next decade. We can expect a hard winter, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Roy (Laval): Ah! Ah!

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting occasionally to hear the hon. member for Laval. They are people like us, Mr. Speaker. It was also quite interesting to hear someone before me this afternoon say that we should not be negative, that we should remain optimistic. Let us tell the dairy producers about the optimism of the Liberal government. Right now, the government does not obey its own legislation, it is spurning his own agreement. It refuses to subsidize thousands of producers. They have no incentive left.

I know that some hon. members are very disappointed with the policy and attitude of this government. One of them told me so personally. Although it is a professional secret he had the guts to admit it to me. But the government breaks its own law!

Mr. Olivier: You have been talking for over 40 minutes!

Mr. La Salle: I have been given the floor.

Mr. Olivier: You abuse that privilege!

Mr. Pinard: It is the last time you will get it!

Mr. La Salle: I know that I will have the opportunity to address the House again but when my colleague opposite speaks before this House it will be for the first time.

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I only wish to mention that we on this side of the House had the courtesy to let the hon. member exceed his normal 30 minutes' time. But the hon. member knows very well that many other members in this House wish to take part in this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. So, I am asking him not to abuse the privilege hon. members have extended to him, and to be reasonable if he wishes in the future to avail himself of the generosity of this side of the House.

● (2032)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would suggest to the hon. parliamentary secretary that is not a point of order. The House extended the time of the hon. member so he is entitled to continue.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the invitation which, unlike his leader, the hon. member graciously and unpretentiously extended. I am going to show my good faith and allow my hon. friends opposite to criticize their own government as much as it deserves, and if I were sure that they would, I would stop talking right now. I do not wish to deprive of their time hon. members who may have a lot to say, so I will merely state that I hope we all realize how important it is to find solutions.

If the opposition were asked to contribute positive steps conducive to solutions, our party would not refuse its cooperation but if our cooperation means we are expected to help this government remain in office, the answer is a definite "no" and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian people will not fail to vote this government out as soon as possible to make room for a new administration.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to straighten the facts which were so twisted by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle).

For instance, when he says that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) refuses a third option for Canada, the hon. member for Joliette knows that he is not telling the truth since the Prime Minister has never said that in his speech to this House. On the contrary, he did say that he rejects the option of sovereignty association but not a third option.

To start with, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members would permit me I would like to express my respect and admiration for our graceful Queen Elizabeth II on the occasion of her Silver Jubilee, and to convey to Her Majesty as well as to His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, my appreciation for their presence which greatly enhanced the brilliance of these celebrations in Canada.

I also wish to congratulate the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, my hon. colleagues from Louis-Hébert and Malpeque (Messrs. Dawson and Wood) for the admirable way in which they discharged their duties.

Mr. Speaker, to some people who are usually found in the opposition, the speech delivered by Her Majesty at the opening of this session offers nothing or next to nothing which might relieve the hardships which Canada is now experiencing. For anyone however who takes the trouble to carefully reread that important document, for instance if the hon. member for Joliette had bothered to read carefully the Speech from the Throne, we would not have had to listen, this afternoon before dinner and since eight o'clock, to the poppycock he has so generously delivered to this House. Any person who reads that speech carefully, Mr. Speaker, will see a large number of measures which prove how serious the government's intents are to alleviate, if not completely resolve our economic problems and one must admit, whatever the hon. member for Joliette may think and say, that since last November 15, with the coming to power in the province of Quebec of the PQ government which is determined to break up this country.

The most important measures of the legislative program mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and on which I would like to briefly comment in the time allotted to me under our rules are as follows: Those dealing with economic development, particularly in areas where unemployment is at the highest level, the overhauling of our national transportation system and the issue of Canadian unity.

As far as the economy is concerned, the measures presented to us in the Speech from the Throne and which become clearer as ministers take part in this debate and as this session unfolds, if implemented without too much delay and used wisely by manufacturers and Canadians at large to their advantage in the same spirit that motivated those who drafted them, namely the government, these measures alone, I repeat, should make our national economy healthy again as it has been especially since the last world war.

As representative of an area quite remote from large centres of the country with a relatively small population, I can say that its economic development has not kept pace with that of more favoured areas of this country. Our geographical location still offers a climate which is similar to that of many other more prosperous places in Quebec and in other Canadian provinces. It also has access to the St. Lawrence River, the cheapest means of transportation available and its scenic sites attract thousands of tourists every year. Furthermore its manpower, if given a chance, is characterized by its adaptability to all modern technological changes. Our geographical location as we have always been told is the major handicap to our economic take-off.

Our main natural resources are forest products, fisheries, agriculture, tourism and for the past few years, mining. These are, Mr. Speaker, the five economic sectors from which all the people in my riding directly or indirectly live off. Some commendable efforts have been made in the past few years—this must frankly be admitted, in spite of the objections of my colleague from Joliette—by successive Liberal governments in Ottawa and since the beginning of the 1960's to strengthen the economy of our area including my constituency of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

For example, in the forestry field, to the important sawmills of the Madawaska Corporation Limited, now the Lacroix Lumber Limited of Carleton, Nouvelle and Causapscal has been added a new pulp and paper mill in New Richmond and this through the policies initiated by the Pearson government, in the form of a tax allowance under regional development to create employment. Let us also point out the policy of land consolidation, more generous subsidies to milk producers, the increased development of tourism, the adequate development of fishing ports at designated places, subsidies for the establishment of various small plants or the improvement of existing ones, subsidies to fishermen and fish producers, increased activity in construction and establishment in our area of the sacrosanct Housing and Mortgage Corporation which up to 1962 was almost totally unknown to us, federal contribution to the improvement of our highway system within the federal-provincial program for the development of Eastern Quebec and special programs for the creation of jobs: LIP, Canada Works, now Opportunities for Youth Program, manpower mobility program, on-the-job training program, etc.

But since our regional economy had been lagging so far behind, much remains to be done to bring it up to standards. Our people, specially our youths, are leaving gradually for lack of adequate jobs. We must try and free them from their ever present concerns over the spectre of having to depend in such large numbers upon society as a whole, to rely on welfare or too often on unemployment insurance.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, the March budget made me particularly happy, because it increased by 10 per cent the investment tax credit in my area so as to reflect the government's determination to support industrial development and create jobs. I am even happier now since the government announced in the Speech from the Throne that tax reductions will be reinforced to stimulate our economy. I feel the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and his colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) should concentrate their efforts on ways to promote greater productivity, to encourage our small and average businesses through fiscal measures and credit facilities more in keeping with their ability to pay and with conditions more acceptable and more suitable to their type of business.

For instance, we should not penalize the borrower who would reimburse the government or the Federal Business Development Bank before the expiry date. The state should not act as a banker or a money lender to gain benefits or make money. If a businessman or a merchant who borrowed from the Federal Business Development Bank or from some other federal agency is so successful in his business because of that government policy which enables him to repay ahead of time, so much the better for him. This would free funds from which a larger number of small businesses might benefit. Let us relieve them from the petty annoyances of stacks and stacks of paper work such as countless and complicated daily, weekly, monthly, yearly reports and so on.

One businessman in the Magdalen Islands told me recently that one of his employees works only one hour a week for him, spending the rest of her time working for the state to file weekly reports which must be made according to federal or provincial legislation. The individual, the small businessman is therefore an asset to the state, for he must hire and pay an employee to fill in the reports which should be done by a civil servant of the state. The only hour during which that employee who is paid by her employer actually works for him is when she prepares the payroll at the end of the week.

The Speech from the Throne gives us an idea of the government's optimism concerning the benefits which Canada should gain from the multilateral trade negotiations which are taking place in Geneva. I sincerely believe that the future will prove it right. For it is imperative, Mr. Speaker, if we want to keep our traditional industries which generate a great many jobs, such as the textile and shoe industries, industries which are already facing great difficulties, that special efforts be made to make them more competitive than they really are just now. In this respect, my own province of Quebec is seriously affected. The pulp and paper industry is facing enormous difficulties and the province of Quebec, in view of the extent of its forest, is again greatly affected. Under the present conditions, the competition of the United States, which depends on various factors, is almost impossible to meet, partly because of their advanced technology, a climate which is more conducive to a quicker growth, and the cost of rail transportation which is notably too high in Canada.

It is consequential then that I should deal with transportation in Canada and particularly in my area. I could say the same about the whole of Eastern Canada, since the Speech from the Throne indicates without any of the details which will become known later on that several measures will be introduced during this session with a view to improving our national transportation system. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that it will not be too soon nor will it be a luxury! Members of the House of Commons have heard me plead rather regularly and often with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) to improve rail, air, sea and even road transportation in Eastern Canada so that I do not have to remind you that everything is not working smoothly in that area, particularly in my area.

As far as air transportation is concerned, not to mention the Magdalen Islands or other places, improvements have been required for more than ten years and they are long in being brought about. This means of transportation is so to speak almost non existent on a regular basis in Bonaventure. It seems however that the problem, as far as the Magdalen Islands are concerned, is about to come to a happy ending. I shall therefore refrain from dwelling further on the matter, reserving my comments for some later date, if need be. But, in the part of my riding located on the mainland, the situation is a disaster. Though the Minister of Transport and his officials are aware that there is at Bonaventure a landing strip of some 6,000 feet completely paved and lighted, with possibilities for an extension if warranted, there are hesitations, delays, regrettably, I would even say tragically, about the Gaspé airport as a regional airport, while the DOT experts have said repeatedly that it is impossible to equip it with air traffic instruments (ILS) because of the neighbouring mountains.

Improvements to the islands' airport have been delayed by the difficulties encountered at Gaspé, because, in addition, Québecair demands the simultaneous development of those two airports. By virtue of what authority are those views now being imposed upon the DOT? The Bonaventure airport, which belongs to the Quebec government, it is true, lends itself magnificently to the improvements that would make of it an all-weather airport where aircraft of all sizes and power could land without any problem. All the government need do is to start negotiations with the authorities of the province of Quebec and obtain its agreement to setting up in that part of the Gaspé peninsula a regional airport from which an airline located in the Magdalen Islands could link the south-east coast of Gaspé, Bonaventure, and the islands directly to Quebec and Montreal.

That suggestion, which I have already made to the department, would take away nothing from Gaspé; it would naturally keep its existing airport which in turn could easily be linked with the regional airport at Bonaventure. That solution, Mr. Speaker, would, in the final analysis, be far more logical than that which is being suggested to us by asking the people of Bonaventure, which is located further west, and who want to go even further west, to Quebec, Montreal and elsewhere, to go board the plane at Gaspé, fly some 125, 150 or 175 miles further east, and then come back towards the west. Why, I wonder, can we not use what already exists before thinking of investing millions of dollars in relocating an airport that has already cost several million dollars?

Now, let us consider rail transportation.

In our area as well as in many others in this country, the railway is the most reliable and economical means of transportation and for us, in the Gaspé peninsula, it is the only means of transport we can now rely on. However, as I already said elsewhere, the negligence of the CNR in the field of passenger service, and I apologize to the man who is sitting in the Chair, a former railway employee, their failure to modernize their equipment and their passenger services, for example, has lead to such a disruption of our railway system that unfortunately the people are turning instead to the bus service which is not a very good alternative on long routes such as Gaspé-Montreal.

And now the CNR has asked the Canadian Transport Commission to abandon the passenger service, the only one we have in the Gaspé peninsula, between Matapédia and Gaspé. I had the opportunity to state my objections before the Transport Commission which held public hearings in Gaspé recently, particularly in my constituency, on my behalf and on behalf of my constituents, at this request of the CNR, and to make a number of suggestions. Therefore I shall not repeat the arguments I put forward on that occasion. I shall simply ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) and the government to categorically and unequivocally turn down that irresponsible and, moreover, unfair request of the CNR.

Our railway companies anxious as they are to make a profit, and to that end to get rid of passenger service, in my opinion and in that of several of my voters and several Canadians, are charging excessive rates, which places our industrialists and businessmen and the products they manufacture in an unfavourable situation in relation to their U.S. competitors, for example. A good example is that of pulp and paper mills which are not only unable to compete in terms of labour costs but are also at a disadvantage with regard to transportation costs. I hope that among the many measures proposed in the Speech from the Throne and aimed at improving Canada's national transportation system, there will be some to correct those anomalies.

I also want to take this opportunity to say that I am dead set against the policy of the Minister of Transport, not the department's, but of the minister who wants the user, in this area of transportation, to pay for the services he obtains, as if he did not, through taxes or transportation rates between Montreal and the Magdalen Islands. Such a policy is perhaps fine for the director of a private company, but when it comes to Crown corporations in a country as vast as ours where transportation costs among other things greatly affect the cost of our manufactured products, and thus the competitiveness of our products on foreign markets, it is not realistic to want to implement such a policy in Canada. Our remote areas will never be able to survive and prosper.

The people in this country are ready to pay for these services and they are already paying a good price, but to add to their burden would be to condemn them to perpetual stagnation. That is why they are prepared to pay directly, but they ask all better off Canadians to help them through the tax system, as has been the case and as is still the case today. If the minister persists in implementing that policy, ferry, air and railway transportation, and consequently the whole economy of our areas, of my area in particular, instead of making progress will decline, including all sectors—forestry, agriculture, fisheries, mining, tourism, and so on.

The measures proposed in the Speech from the Throne, if they are implemented immediately and with good judgment, understanding and consideration for remote areas, will restore the confidence that one can feel is at least shaky in the whole Canadian economic area. But one important factor also that does not help the present Canadian climate is the situation that was created in Canada by the advent in Quebec, on November 15, 1976, of a Parti Québécois government whose avowed objective, I repeat, is the separation of Quebec from the rest of the Canadian Confederation.

Even though we may be deluded or even taken in by the PQ ministers telling us that Quebec has lost nothing from an economic point of view since this event and that, according to the Minister of Industry, inquiries from interested investors are more numerous than ever in Quebec, we cannot be so sure when we talk to businessmen and industrialists. Their response indicates the opposite. These are simply attempts by the Parti Québécois to appease the business community and the people of Quebec and to have them forget the cruel facts while the PQ government is busy introducing a whole series of measures for this campaign on the famous referendum, campaign which began on November 15, 1976. Whether we want it or not, whether we shut our eyes or keep them open, the situation in Quebec is reflected everywhere in Canada and in the edginess of foreign investors who would like to come here to improve their Canadian businesses.

What happened in Quebec last November may have been called an accident by some people, but I believe that it would not be realistic or even honest for any Canadian who knows the history of his country or has ever read it to forget that the problem facing our two founding races, French and English, did not start on November 15, 1976. It has existed since Confederation. However, it has become more acute at various stages of our history with the coming into the political arena of French Canadians, great politicians, leaders inspired by a nationalism which is very healthy and necessary for the survival of the French element, not only in Quebec, but throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I came to parliament as member for Bonaventure at the time when bombs were being placed in mailboxes in Montreal and under monuments in Quebec city, and so on. I for one have stated again and again to people all across Canada during the centennial year that what Quebec really wanted, was not to be given a special treatment, but to gain recognition of the identity, the language and the culture, of its French majority.

If since Confederation and in the course of these various difficult moments of our country's history all our English-speaking compatriots had shown more good will towards and less contempt for those "Catholic French Canadians, those French Canadian Pea Soups", outside as well as within Quebec, if they had understood as fortunately they seem to be doing today, our situation, we would not have had to use for so many years, and now in particular, we would not have had to use and waste our energy, our talent, our time and our money in the difficult economic situation we now know, discussing linguistic questions and constitutional changes. Mr. Speaker, I believe that all federal governments since 1962 have made fantastic efforts which no previous governments had ever made to give Francophones equality in their relations with federal institutions. When one considers the fierce opposition which all measures proposed in that area have met with in this the last half of the 20th century, in 1970-77, in some English-speaking areas, while the unity of our country was at stake, we should not, Mr. Speaker, be overly surprised with what happened in Quebec.

Was November 15, 1976, really necessary to finally get our compatriots or some of our English-speaking compatriots to see the light? What price, Mr. Speaker? I suggest it could have been avoided. But it seems that for some bold ones, you must be near catastrophe before starting to react in the face of danger. Let us still thank providence for even this late conversion of our compatriots or of some of them, and that conversion lets us foresee with confidence a solution to this problem which unfortunately has always divided us.

Quebeckers are federalists, Mr. Speaker. The Quebec people do not want to be isolated on this immense continent. They want to remain Canadians but they want to be full fledged citizens, respected everywhere in Canada, just as they have themselves always respected other Canadians. They want to take part in the great decisions which will affect their daily lives, their own and their children's future. They along with their countrymen want to keep developing this vast country so well endowed with natural wealth, and a great variety of regions which they and other Canadians are so proud and other nations so envious of. They are proud of their peaceful and free homeland which has been built thanks to the sacrifice and hard work of their fathers and ancestors.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote a remarkable paragraph from her Majesty's Speech from the Throne:

Few countries are as blessed as Canada, where a wealth of freedom and of this world's goods is apparent for all to see. Perhaps only those who have come here from less fortunate lands can appreciate to the full the great good fortune of living in a country so favored by nature, and so enriched by its cultural diversity.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that many people in the galleries and many people outside watching cablevision are wondering how all this magnificence came about—the two cameras on either side of me, the two cameras at the ends, and your own seat pushed back, Sir. I will just give them one clue and then the knowing people can write in and receive some sort of a prize.

Last year there was one member of parliament who presented a motion to the House and suggested that the proceedings of this august Chamber be presented on television. The motion was debated and, lo, it has come to pass. I don't want to identify the member, but I just want to recall to people that in the same parliament as that motion was presented, television came to the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: It was the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

Mr. McCleave: No, it was not the hon. member for Halifax. It was the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: May I begin in the traditional way? I should like to congratulate the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address in Reply to Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne. I do not think there is anything I can say about their contributions except to sum them up in one word—and that word is "envy". I thought they did extraordinarily well. In all the years I have been here I never cease to marvel about the members who come into this House and, for the first time, are chosen to address a group of people who, by and large, are strangers, and make some sense out of what they do and put feeling and passion into their expressions of belief in being a Canadian. It was just a thrill for me to listen to those men doing that. They achieved at the very top level of this special craft.

While I am on this congratulatory kick I look toward Your Honour as you preside over our proceedings, the member of parliament for London East (Mr. Turner), a long-time friend and the Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole. And I think of your assistant, the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier), and I wish you both well in the duties you carry out. This is a pre-election session and life is not always going to be easy for you; you will not always be looking down and seeing some mild fellow from Halifax-East Hants addressing you. You will be seeing some angry natives around here some night, probably late at night, making your life a little more difficult. In any event, whatever happens this session, we esteem you and we esteem your own particular deputy in the House and know that you will serve us well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: Now, Mr. Speaker, television is here and we are all caught in this amazing age. People are showing up. They not only wear shoes, they also wear blue shirts and have this sort of tie and that sort of coat and everybody is getting their hair cut and people ask you where you are on television. My reply is that when the camera which is down behind the government's side fires it shoots over the head of the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and through the head of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and then it turns to somebody whose head is twisted out to the left. That's my camera, and that is where I sit in this Chamber.

Well, we all have to go back to school to learn how best to deal with this particular medium. I should say television here is long overdue. I would say that radio broadcasting of the House of Commons was more than long overdue. It should have been here since the late 1940's because our sound system all along has been good enough, to my understanding, to provide that sort of service. And Canadians should know what the House is all about. They should know that sometimes when the Prime Minister is speaking the benches are almost empty, and that when I show up there are immediately about 200 people who wish to crowd in to hear me.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. McCleave: There is the lone figure who sits up there from Canadian Press to hear me. I am sorry, there are two lone figures now. They are not always alone; there are a great many other people there during question period. I think that the cameras should be allowed to move about the Chamber though I realize that we are under ground rules and perhaps on strict behaviour for this particular week—and I do not see anything wrong with that either, at least until I am finished speaking.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: But we should be portraying more the nature of ourselves as an institution instead of the nature of what people try to pretend we are, whether we ourselves, going on the hustings, or the reporters in the press gallery who are so quick to have second opinions about us. In any event, the television age is here and we all have to live with it. We have to make a presentation of our handling of the public affairs of this nation we call Canada as best we can and I know that every last one of us, when we go home for this weekend with the whole bloom of the week upon us will learn very much from our constituents.

I want to touch on three or four topics tonight in the time which is given to me. One of them arises out of the personal and special interest I have as a chairman of a committee in which we have to deal in a special way with the meeting of government and the public. I refer to the Statutory Instruments Committee or perhaps I should say the Regulations Committee—that would probably make more sense to those who are listening to me—dealing with the orders in council and the proliferation of documents from ministers, departments, the cabinet and the like which do touch us all very much. The aspect I would like to talk about tonight does not deal with all that, but rather with the special case of where a person meets government through a form that has to be filled out to satisfy somebody in a government department. The forms I would like to consider tonight are two.

First of all, there are those which are being presented by the Public Service Commission of Canada to those who are graduating from higher institutions of learning. These are called post-secondary recruitment programs and I have such a form here. By and large I consider it a fair form, with one exception. When one is asked to go into such detail as one's academic achievements or what one has gone through by way of academic studies, notation 17 on this particular form not only asks you for your course number and title, but for the total number of hours per course, the number of credits, the length of the course, and whether it is a half course or a full course.

It seems to me that for someone who has gone through four years of university, for example, to be asked to retrace one's steps through that particular process and try to recall to the exact hour or half hour how much one has done, is going a little too far. These are young people. They may have been gifted when they went through their academic career and that part may have been duck soup to them. They made good marks, met every whim of their professor and wrote brilliant exams. Then suddenly they are thrust into that miserable old thing called the workaday world and perhaps another equally miserable thing known as an employer, one such being the Public Service Commission of Canada.

It strikes me we may be a society which depends too much on forms. You can take a person's social insurance number, take all sorts of other details from them and then give them a mark, A, B, C, or D, and punch it through a computer, but not necessarily come up with anything very meaningful. An absolute dunce might be able to answer these questions completely satisfactorily and be rated very highly, whereas a natural genius might not. I am not sure that Albert Einstein himself in his palmy days would have succeeded too well with this particular form. For one thing he was too diffident, but it is the Albert Einstein that we would like to get rather than some other type.

In any event, I think what is lacking here is a humanistic approach. It is not a question of how well one can fill in a form; it is a question of meeting with a prospective employer, talking with that person and outfolding one's personality in that way. I hope the Public Service Commission of Canada and my old friend, Mr. Edgar Gallant, who is the chairman and the only person in Canada whom I have heard speak English with an Oxford accent and French with a Parisian accent—hon. members can gather how gifted he is—will take these words of mine to heart.

On page 1 I am really surprised to see about one sixteenth of the page—a heck of a lot of space anyway—to decide this momentous question: "D. Sex (for statistical purposes); Sexe (pour fins de stastiques)". Then there is a space for masculine or feminine, male or female. They give you all that space to make up your mind. I would have thought that about one tenth of the space provided would have sufficed and that the rest of the space might have been used to deal with one's other extraordinary abilities.

Another form I looked at—I searched for it today but it was lost among the other forms in my office—is one dealing with requests for financial assistance from the Department of Fisheries. I hope my hon. friend, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc), will look at those forms and that the opposition fisheries critic will nod his head in agreement. He does, but he has not heard my question. That is comradeship and partnership.

What bugs me about the forms that you fill in for the Department of Fisheries is that you almost need a chartered accountant to assist you. Many of these people were not educated beyond the Grade 5 or 6 level. Good fishermen they are; statisticians and fillers-in of forms they are not. I suspect a large number of them miss thousands and thousands of dollars a year to which they are entitled under government programs simply became they do not have the patience or understanding to fill in those particular forms. Since I do not have the form in question here this evening, and I really cannot make my case without it, what I will do is guarantee that I will send the minister a letter containing my views.

I now turn to a national issue, but not one which is going to put any of my colleagues on either side of the House in trepidation in regard to their own brilliant positions as ministers or members of the opposition. What I want to talk about is the need, in my opinion, for a very important program to be carried on for those who are inmates in Canadian penitentiaries. I refer to a legal aid program. These people may be entitled to ask for legal advice and receive it with the state giving them some kind of help.

The reason I raise this matter is that there has been all kinds of correspondence back and forth on this matter between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Basford), the Solicitor General (Mr. Fox), the chairman of the justice and legal affairs committee, the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), and others, but somehow the message has not been as strong as it should be.

In my own area of the world, Atlantic Canada, a survey was conducted by the law and social problems class at Dalhousie Law School in 1972. This survey asked inmates of the penitentiaries at Dorchester, New Brunswick and Springhill, Nova Scotia, to identify the legal problems they experienced and how best their needs could be met. Of all the inmates they checked with, some 56.5 per cent had met some legal problem since they entered the penitentiary. But more important than that, 95.7 per cent had no financial means with which they could pay for the services of a lawyer. Their problems were in the area of family law, criminal law, and correctional law. The correctional law referred mainly to debtor-creditor relations or problems. The survey also showed they had rather a hard time in reaching a lawyer.

There is one law firm of which Miss Deborah Gass is a member, called "Penitentiary Legal Services", established in Sackville, New Brunswick. I asked her if they did not get help from the spending estimates which were presented in February by the federal government, would that program be down the drain? At least the people engaged in the program would have to scratch around and do most of their work on other aspects of the law where they had clients who could pay, and then hope that they would be able to give some service to penitentiary inmates. When I asked her what it was she wanted, she wrote this to me:

> What we suggest is that we be contracted to the federal government or the federal and provincial governments under a cost-share agreement similar to that under which provincial legal aid schemes operate. Services to the institutions is a full-time job and is somewhat specialized, in that most lawyers have little if any familiarity with correctional law.

As a lawyer, I would say "Guilty, Miss Gass; you have described me exactly and, I am sure, most of us in the House of Commons". But while we do not have that familiarity, at least our hearts can be in the right place.

Anyway, she took her case to me and to others and had a meeting with the Minister of Fisheries and several of his adornments on the other side, such as the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne), the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), and the member of the other place, Senator Margaret Norrie.

● (2122)

She responded positively to us by promising to look into the matter and see what could be done. Since I have put it on record, I know my friends on the other side will also add their very, very strong words.

I asked Miss Gass to do one thing before I took part in the throne speech debate and made this particular plea on behalf of legal services for those in penitentiaries. I asked her to provide me with some illustrations of what they were doing. She sent along 15 cases. I cannot refer to them all now because my time will be running out shortly, but I should like to mention as many typical cases as I can.

I will refer to seven out of the 15 illustrations which were sent to me. The first is the case of a young inmate, age 17, who has been diagnosed as mildly retarded. He was guilty of three car thefts, and the question was if that person should go to jail.

The second one was an inmate being transferred from a federal penitentiary in Dorchester to one in western Canada. He had a valuable ring which was taken from him before he left, so he said. He is trying to get the ring back.

The third one is an inmate who was severely beaten and attacked by another inmate in the prison gym during a movie. It was a fight for compensation under the Innocent Victims Crime Act, and the inmate was rewarded $1,500.

The fourth one is an inmate who had outstanding debts totalling approximately $10,000. He had no assets, and requested assistance in applying for the bankruptcy services of the federal trustee. Anybody who says that inmates are free to choose their lawyers like anybody else is wrong. They are in jail and they have no means of earning incomes. They have no money—crime does not pay after all—and then they are being asked to hire outside lawyers, which is impossible. I hope the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General will take this to heart.

The fifth case involves an inmate's father who died suddenly and had named no beneficiary in his insurance policy. The inmate, being the legal heir, sought help to settle the estate.

The sixth case is that of an inmate's mother who wished a divorce. She was on welfare and could not afford the services of a lawyer. Therefore the inmate requested legal assistance for his mother.

The seventh case is that of an inmate who sold his truck but was still owed $110 on it. That might not seem like much to anyone here tonight, but to that person it meant that it was the end of the world. He attempted to contact the debtor on several occasions but received no reply. However, the legal services group sent a letter to the debtor and the debt was acknowledged after a little bit of a fight. A settlement of $55 was negotiated, so the inmate was ahead by that much. The foregoing are some samples of what these people are up against.

If anyone in this Chamber tried to establish a successful law practice with those types of cases, I am sure he would be reduced to living on the parish as well. These people have very human problems. It is a matter of rehabilitating them and returning them to society as useful people. I hope their pleas to myself and others succeed.

In order to follow this up a little bit more, since I promised to spend a larger part of my speech on this subject than any other topic, I would suggest through Your Honour to the Bars of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick that being a lawyer is not easy because of the fees and insurance which have to be paid. Someone located in Sackville, New Brunswick, or across the border in Amherst, Nova Scotia, who primarily services the inmates of penitentiaries and other federal institutions, will not come home with any real harvest even if he has received help from the federal treasury. I hope the Bars of those two provinces, which have been very, very co-operative so far, would recognize that there should be some special type of law firm established in that isthmus between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I am not saying that one has to be a member of the Nova Scotia Bar and not a member of the New Brunswick Bar. The hon. member for Gloucester is nodding his head. I am sure he understands what I am getting at. There must be allowances made for the special circumstances these hot, store-front lawyers are going into when they try to help people.

The name of our particular game in this parliament is jobs. How well we do that and how well we come through the current hardships afflicting the country will make or break a lot of hon. members in this Chamber. I do not think the public expect miracles from us, but they do expect an effort from us. My own philosophy is that I do not believe we can spend our way to prosperity. We have tried that, and we are approximately $8 billion in the hole this year.

Mr. Crouse: It is $9.2 billion.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) is referring to $9.2 billion. Because he is more knowledgeable about those figures than I am, he is probably correct. This is a substantial cry from the approximate $7 billion forecast with which we started this fiscal year. We thought the country would go in the hole by that amount. We have proven to ourselves that we cannot spend our way to prosperity. Therefore, whatever initiatives are left to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien)—God knows I feel for the man and I will feel for his successor as well—they will be restricted and will depend on imagination, effort, and some old and ancient concepts which are being rediscovered, such as incentives, good hard elbow grease, and "let the state stay away, we will try to solve it on our own."

The only areas where federal spending can work are areas where federal spending has an obligation to work. For example, we have an obligation to the Department of National Defence. Ships, tanks, airplanes and various other things have to be built. They can be built in certain areas which have shipyards, aircraft plants, or the tank plants. One could use those to buttress the employment there. These things have to be bought. Heaven only knows the requirements of the navy have been put off for a long period of time. Sooner or later the government has to face the fact that these things have to be bought.

There is an absolute necessity for the government to create incentives and to take special tax measures. We will have an opportunity when the Bank Act comes up to see what we can do for small business, and that is important. We will not lose our shirts if we try to devise measures in this parliament which will help the tens of thousands of small businesses across this country to create more jobs.

I should like to refer to an article which appeared in the October 17, 1977, edition of the London Free Press, which reads as follows:

> One intriguing new idea has been the proposal by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business that special tax credits be given to firms that increase their employment; it would have its greatest impact on small firms in labour-intensive business. It is these firms which suffer the most from high minimum wages and from their need to match Canada Pension Plan and unemployment deductions, and to pay other fringe benefits—and from the high cost of meeting the myriad requests of government for reports.

That makes an awful lot of sense to me. I should like to conclude by saying two things. One I will say now, the other I will say at a later time. There will be another debate, they always come around. They are like taxis in New York.

What I want to say is that in times of difficulty it is not only for each of us to think of answers but for each of us to provide those answers as best we can. I have not touched on the social problem that is besetting our nation—the future of Canada. I have touched on other matters and I have mentioned briefly the economic one, but if I had anything to guide me over this particular winter of difficulty, there would be two things: one would be to think Canadian, and the other would be to buy Canadian. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to congratulate the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and of course, my colleague from the Maritimes, the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). They have both made excellent contributions to the House.

[English]

I might say that when the hon. member for Malpeque was describing his constituency in such a poetic way I thought for a moment that he was speaking about my constituency. In fact, many people do not realize that both my constituency and his are as similar as are other constituencies in Canada, despite the fact that they are in different provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we are now going through difficult times not only in economic but also in politic terms. For the first time in the history of this country, a provincial government wishes to bring about a complete change in the political structures of that province within the Canadian Confederation. As a member of the French-speaking minority outside Quebec, I am most concerned with this matter.

As a matter of fact, all Acadians have been very concerned with the Canadian situation for the past year or so. They are worried because in the past they have benefitted from the fact that Quebec belonged to the Confederation. It would be almost impossible and unthinkable for us, the Acadians who are living in the Maritime provinces, to expect that Canada would make linguistic and cultural concessions to us if it were not for the province of Quebec. The fact that that province which we very much admire and have always been proud of is considering a totally new role within the Canadian Confederation is of great concern to us. Of course, the stand by the Quebec Premier, Mr. Lévesque, and his party, advocating independence or sovereignty within an economic association with the rest of Canada, simply means that Quebec considers itself as the only voice of French-speaking Canadians.

The problem of Quebec nationalism is not a new one and we are concerned that the Parti Québécois put foward such an idea because this concept of Quebec nationalism seems to mean that they will negotiate another arrangement with the other nine provinces on behalf of all French-speaking Canadians. At that time, some concessions will be necessary. Whether we think of a sovereignty-association or a renewed Federalism or any other special status, some constitutional concessions will eventually have to be made to Quebec for the sake of the French-speaking group.

Then the minorities outside Quebec could not claim anything and it would be difficult for them to get concessions as they do today, among other things for instance to work in their own language in the federal public service or the fact that, just as Quebecers, Francophones outside Quebec have legal rights to services in their own language. All those advantages could be lost if Quebec were to quit Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, we often hear, specially from members opposite, that this government lays too much emphasis on the national unity issue, that we have more serious economic problems which need our attention. In the same breath those people claim that we have had problems over national unity ever since the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office. I believe they mislead themselves if they think that. For many years some regions in Canada have identified themselves on a regional basis, and that may be normal as we have a huge country and a scattered population. So we have more public administration per capita than in other countries.

Therefore regions and people give much importance to their own area; we see in the Maritimes, in the Prairies, in western Canada and in Quebec where it is demonstrated in another way. It all revolves around culture and language. But national tension in this country is nothing new and you do not know the situation if you say that the approach of this government, of this Prime Minister, which created that issue. Indeed, as I said earlier, the nationalist movement in Quebec dates from way back and as you know, Mr. Speaker, because you are from that province, that issue and that concept are not new.

Nowadays, in fact, they are simply expressed in another way, by another group, by another political party and by some people who choose another way even though they have the same idea. Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk briefly about my riding, my own area in Canada. I stated earlier that most Acadians, indeed all Acadians, are much concerned by the present situation in Canada and also by the political situation in their own province.

Acadians in New Brunswick have made tremendous progress since the sixties because they succeeded in finding allies among others, in other areas of the province, because they have been willing to accept political arrangements, structural changes, although they were not constitutional structures; they have adopted new political arrangements which gave them the opportunity to restructure their community, to improve their standard of living, but also gave them opportunities on the linguistic side, a legislation on official languages. The Official Languages Act of New Brunswick is very important to us, even though it has some weaknesses and is not perhaps as important from the administrative support point of view as Canada's Official Languages Act. But obviously Acadians, specially those who live in northeastern New Brunswick, are preoccupied by the economic situation. The issue of national unity looms larger than the economic one. We must deal with both.

Playing down the importance of the problem between the two founding peoples of Canada will get us nowhere. Indeed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) made it quite clear yesterday that when tackling both problems and trying to put one ahead of the other, we are mistaken because if no solution is found to the national unity problem in Canada, the international business community outside this country will always feel some uncertainty about its future, which will affect investments here and our ability to secure markets abroad.

To revert to the economic situation in my riding, in addition to setting up national programs such as those in the social area, health insurance, unemployment insurance, sharp increase in old age pensions, and family allowances, the government has helped out low income areas. Furthermore, since 1966 the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has been involved in special agreements aimed at raising the standard of living and improving the economic structures of northeastern New Brunswick. Between 1966 and 1976 we have benefited from one of the first FRED agreements—the Fund for Rural Economic Development—which is a federal-provincial agreement designed to define certain problems by analyzing them and proposing solutions. This agreement has led to some success but also disappointment in some other cases.

It is very difficult to stimulate development in an area such as ours because as soon as you start defining a problem or identifying it, it is normal that the psychological response from the people living in the area be negative from the outset since people are likely to put the blame on governments or systems which have tolerated the kind of situation in which they have lived for so long. Consequently many hopes entertained by people of our region have been met with disappointment because, when these agreements were announced, they expected that development would be easier than it actually turned out to be. Anyway, the ten-year agreement of 1966 to 1976 has been replaced this summer by a new one signed by my colleague the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) and the premier of New Brunswick. It changes slightly our approach toward development compared to the former type of agreement and we hope it will contribute a great deal more to improving the economic structure of that region.

This agreement provides outlays of more than $95 million within the next five years and is intented above all to create jobs and consequently enhance industrial development. Instead of coming up with social and community development or carrying out social experiments as contained in the former agreement, the new one will have a more industrially minded outlook. It seeks to develop major industrial centres which will attract investments and consequently create jobs. Naturally this agreement must be considered within the framework of other DREE programs such as the road agreement which greatly benefits northeastern New Brunswick and which, we hope, will help in rebuilding a major segment of Highways 11, 17 and 8.

Naturally, the other federal government departments will also have to keep up their good work in the field of transportation, in the field of maritime and marine structures, because the fisheries are very important in that region, and also in many other fields. We have heard a lot lately about the problems affecting the mining sector.

There is in my riding an important mining industry, and there are several others in the area, but particularly the most important mining industry in my riding, the Brunswick Mining and Smelting, is also having difficulties because world markets are depressed. And of course, unless that situation improves, many other efforts the government will try to make through the DREE agreement will not meet with the expected success.

Anyway, we are moderately optimistic that the federal government investment will help improve the economic structure of northeastern New Brunswick to the point that our area could become a lot more self sufficient than it has been in the past. But of course, the other economically oriented departments, as I said, will also have to keep on not only planning but investing in that area. And of course, the Canadian economy will have to remain strong, the federal government will also have to carry on its efforts to redistribute wealth in this country if people in that area are really to see a considerable change.

[English]

I should like to deal briefly with the debate on the economy now being carried on. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made a very important statement on this.

There is high unemployment in my constituency and it is chronic in that it is bad this year and expected to be worse next year because of restraints in provincial and federal government spending, and also because investment is low. I meet more and more unemployed tradespeople now than ever before. This chronic unemployment problem is due mainly to restraints in spending and less investment by the private sector.

An important aspect of the economy of New Brunswick in the last ten or 15 years has been the construction of major projects in the energy field and some other areas, which have created a lot of economic activity and employment. Tradespeople earn high salaries and this creates an economic spinoff in the whole province, but this has not been evident in the last year and it is not expected any projects will get off the ground in the months to come.

I hope economic restraints can be lifted before too long as the Atlantic economy has suffered more than other parts of the country from their effects. I find the position of the opposition very contradictory when they speak of less intervention in the economy, less spending by government, less deficits—

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear! Good.

Mr. Breau: I am glad the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) emphasizes what I am saying. I wish he could reconcile it with what he said last Thursday evening when he condemned the Minister of Finance for not having done anything. I should like him to explain how he expects the economy to pick up if there is not more government spending in the Atlantic provinces. His colleagues from there always bring pressure for more government spending.

In the month of September my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces and I went around the area and listened to what a lot of community leaders and business leaders had to say. The thing foremost on their minds is the improvement of economic structures, improvement in the standard of living, more investment by government, more spending and more intervention by government.

● (2152)

The Tory party is advocating less government intervention and less government spending, but let us not be fooled by that. They are advocating a system of laissez-faire whereby the private sector will determine where it wants to go. That, of course, would benefit central Canada because that is where most of the industry of this country is located. However, if we want to maintain an equal standard of living and equal opportunities, the government has to intervene in the economy and has to take money from taxpayers and spend to initiate projects and programs across the country so that people across the country can have equal opportunities for finding decent jobs.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member seems anxious to hear from me again, and I wonder if he would permit a question?

Mr. Breau: Sure, go ahead.

Mr. Stevens: After nine years of this government is the hon. member truthfully happy with the unemployment level in the five eastern provinces, bearing in mind that the unemployment level in those provinces is approximately twice the unemployment level in the adjacent New England states of the United States where conservative policies have been implemented very much along the line we would like to implement them to relieve unemployment not only in the five eastern provinces but particularly in the hon. member's own province?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting question by the financial critic of the Tory Party, but what he does not know is that in the last nine years in the Atlantic provinces there has been a dramatic increase.

Mr. Stevens: In unemployment.

Mr. Breau: Back in 1969 when the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created there was an average of anywhere between 5,000 and 7,000 people per year leaving the Atlantic provinces. That situation has now been reversed, and people are coming back to the Atlantic provinces. The participation rate in the labour force in the Atlantic provinces has grown more dramatically than elsewhere in the last nine years, and it has grown a lot more than it has in the New England states.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Breau: I do not want to be distracted by the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Stevens: I have another question, if I may.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not for the Chair to decide. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) has the floor.

Mr. Breau: Sure, I will answer another question.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the hon. member. Does what the hon. member just said make the unemployed less unemployed?

Mr. Breau: No, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for York-Simcoe has helped me make my point, and I am happy about that.

Despite the fact that we have a relatively good record of creating employment in Canada and in the Atlantic provinces, we need to create more, for the simple reason that many young people and more and more women are entering the labour force.

When the hon. member and his colleagues continue to downgrade the government because of higher government spending, and when they get worried about government deficits and government intervention in the economy, what they are saying is that those regions should be left alone. It was hypocritical of the hon. member to stand up last Thursday evening and condemn the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and say that his statement would do nothing for regions of high unemployment, and then to turn around and condemn the government out of the other side of his mouth for higher spending when, in fact, if we look at the economic structure of the Atlantic provinces, that structure has always been influenced by the starting up of large government projects in the energy field and in many other fields, either provincial or federal.

What we need in the Atlantic provinces is to have spending restraints liberated, if that is the right word, and to make sure that we can get projects off the ground again. Many people get upset about deficits, justifiably, I suppose. Because the opposition is in the game of politics, it exaggerates the effects of deficits. The reason we have deficits is not that spending has gone wild; it is strictly because there has been an economic slowdown in the world and in Canada. There is less industrial activity, and therefore a smaller amount of corporate tax is being collected. Less revenue is coming in because of the economic slowdown in the western world including this country, and therefore we have a deficit.

Hon. members opposite are saying that we should slash the deficit right away and that it is terrible, because they are interested only in making political points. There are only two ways to slash deficits, either by increasing taxes or by reducing government spending drastically. If we do the latter, the five eastern provinces, and probably Manitoba, would suffer. The other regions of the country would probably be able to get by pretty well.

It is not difficult right now for the Government of Canada to manage its debt and its deficit. The latest issue of Canada Savings Bonds was sold in record time, for the simple reason that people are saving money. I say it is not so bad, at a time of economic slowdown, for the government to have some deficit financing because people will save their money, and they will be willing to buy Canada Savings Bonds. The hon. member for York Simcoe, who is an expert on banking, has never proven to me that it is difficult for the government to manage its debt. He is also an expert in deficit financing. Let us not get too nervous when the opposition exaggerates the figures. It does so because it is interested in making political points. If we intend to keep this country together and if we intend to have equal opportunities, we cannot slash the social programs we have now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: I venture to say that we cannot continue the spending restraints we have now for too long because unemployment rates in the Atlantic provinces and in some parts of Quebec will rise to a level which will be dangerous socially.

Let us not panic and think we have to slash the good social programs which have been brought in by this government, because they are just as necessary today as they were in the past.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell that to your ministers.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) should not get too concerned about things he hears. He knows he has many friends on this side who will fight for those things he says which are reasonable.

Mr. Douglas (Bruce-Grey): What part is reasonable?

Mr. Breau: My colleague, the deputy whip, says the difficulty is finding the things the hon. member says which are reasonable.

• (2202)

I hope that in this session we will see a turn-around in the economy. I hope the economy will permit us to increase government spending rather than decrease it. In my area of Atlantic Canada, some parts of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, government spending is needed to initiate large projects that will be required. I hope we will see this turn-around and that, by the time we have the next Speech from the Throne, the economy will be in better shape.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

PUBLIC SERVICE—REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE IN CASE OF MR. SANT SINGH

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on October 20 I raised a question with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) with regard to a public servant who had been employed in that department since 1967. That public servant is Mr. Sant Singh. He was classified as an ES2 on January 1, 1970. He was and is a member of the bargaining unit represented by the Economists, Sociologists and Statisticians Association, and was covered by a collective agreement.

This question has worried me very much because of its implications for the Public Service of Canada. It is a fact that he had risen in the public service to the fifth salary rate and he had been promoted in terms of his salary in any event to the sixth salary rate. In fact he was receiving a salary at that rate.

In terms of salary, he had crossed the "barrier," as it is known in the public service. That requires approval of the deputy minister or deputy head of the department. He was then informed that, for some reason or other, the department had made a mistake and they were paying him too highly. It was not his mistake. It was a mistake of the department.

In accordance with the standard rules, he was sent for a performance assessment. It is interesting to note that this public servant had two of them. On his assessment, his superior was called, a person who knew him very well. This was his assessment, and I quote:

> I am very pleased to recommend that this Departmental Performance Assessment Committee approve the movement of Mr. Sant P. Singh beyond the barrier in the ES-2 scale of rates. Mr. Singh has been a member of my staff since February 24, 1969, and has been classified as ES-2 since January 1, 1970. I have been highly satisfied and pleased with his performance, competence, initiative, and loyalty—

The deputy minister, without interviewing the man, said he was not satisfied with that and sent him back for a second assessment. In the course of this unhappy period, the second assessment was held. Mr. Arthur Smith, his immediate supervisor, was not present on that occasion.

In the meantime, some question had been raised about the fact that Mr. Sant Singh had run in the constituency of Pontiac as a Conservative candidate against the sitting member for Pontiac (Mr. Lefebvre). His judgment was questioned by Mr. Mennie, a member of the department. In fact the evidence was that this had a great bearing on the outcome of the case.

The upshot of it is that he was not approved and he aggrieved. What did Mr. O'Shea, the grievance officer find? First, he found that none of the reports he was entitled to see under the policy of the department would be shown to him.

Second, he found as a fact that the political involvement of this public servant, with consent under the normal rules, had affected the mind of the deputy minister, and that ought not to have been the case.

Third, he found that there had been some hanky-panky in terms of the two different boards, the first assessment board with one set of witnesses and the other with another set of witnesses. Therefore the evidence was stacked against him.

I asked the minister whether she would intervene to launch an appeal against the appeal that had been launched by the department so that they would withdraw their appeal. Her answer was of course that they do not interfere with the judicial process. All that has happened is that the appeal has been launched. There has been no hearing by the judge.

This case cries out for action by the minister as head of the department. It is her responsibility to intervene for the welfare of her public servants. She has refused to do that. I charge her with dereliction of her duty.

I hope that when the parliamentary secretary rises in his place tonight he will indicate that he has decided to enter this matter and will ask the solicitor of the department to withdraw the notice of appeal so that this public servant, who has been found to be a man of initiative, competence, loyalty, and all the other adjectives which apply to him, can be granted that to which he is entitled, according to the finding of the adjudicator.

● (2205)

This is not surmise. It is not instinct. The cause I plead on behalf of Sant Singh and of all public servants who are caught in this process of hiring and firing in the public service is based on an adjudication. There is no justification whatsoever for Mr. Sant Singh to be penalized, either for his political involvement or anything else. I think the government owes the adjudicator at least the courtesy of withdrawing this appeal, and I ask the parliamentary secretary to relieve Mr. Singh from the burden he bears as a result of the failure of his minister to look to her constitutional duties with respect to public servants.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for the way in which he has presented the case of Mr. Sant Singh. He has done so from a compassionate and humanitarian point of view, and I think he can be congratulated on his approach.

He has stated that Mr. Singh has been denied advancement because of his political beliefs and because he ran as a Progressive Conservative candidate in Pontiac during the last election.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The adjudicator said that.

Mr. Robinson: The minister has stated that she does not intend to interfere in any way with the process established by regulations concerning the behaviour, classification and promotion of civil servants, and it would seem that the answer given at that time might have been sufficient for the hon. member. Nevertheless, I propose to go further.

This case revolves around an interpretation of a section of the collective agreement entered into by the employee's union and his employer, the Government of Canada. The collective agreement is with the Economics, Sociology and Statistics

Group (ES) and contains a section whereby employees at levels three and five can have their pay increased, or their progression in the pay range accelerated, by progressing beyond the so-called "barrier". Progression beyond the "barrier" is based upon the work performance of the employee. A departmental assessment committee reviews the work performance of the employee and, if that performance in the judgment of the committee meets the necessary criteria, a favourable recommendation is made and forwarded to the deputy minister for approval. If the deputy minister agrees with the performance assessment committee's recommendation, the employee's pay is adjusted to the first step beyond the "barrier". Such progression in the pay range is commonly called "progression beyond the barrier".

It is very important to note, however, that progression beyond the so-called barrier is not a promotion in the sense that the employee has moved up a level in his occupational group. I believe the hon. member told us that really what had happened was that he was given an increase in pay and there was no suggestion he was going to a different level of employment. No appointment is involved; the matter is only a question of pay administration.

The departmental assessment committee which reviewed Mr. Singh's performance in early 1976 issued a report that had conflicting recommendations and contained little supporting evidence in favour of the recommendation that the employee proceed beyond the ES-5 "barrier". The report of a second committee was invalid because of a technical flaw. For these reasons, the deputy minister did not give his approval to the performance assessment committee's report. Because the deputy minister's approval is required by the collective agreement, the employee's pay could not be raised.

Mr. Singh presented a grievance to the department over the fact that he had not been placed above the ES-5 barrier. When this was denied, he referred the grievance to adjudication. At the hearing before the adjudicator, the grievor alleged the collective agreement had not been properly applied with respect to his pay. The employer claimed that progression beyond the ES-5 barrier requires the formal approval of the deputy minister, but because that approval has not been given, the employee cannot proceed beyond the so-called barrier in the ES-5 pay scale.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I see he still has a long statement to make. We are operating under a very strict rule so far as time limitation is concerned and his time has expired, so I guess he will have to pass his answer directly to the hon. member.

INDUSTRY—CLOSING OF FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with a question I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on October 20 about a community which has been sentenced to death by Alcan Limited. This is the community of St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, where a fluorspar mine had been operating since the 1930's. Alcan announced earlier this spring that they were going to close this fluorspar mine, which is the only operating fluorspar mine in Canada.

Alcan still need fluorspar but they are now going to get their fluorspar from Mexico, where they have discovered that, as a result of cheap Mexican labour, they can import fluorspar from Mexico at less cost to themselves than operating the mine they own in St. Lawrence.

To add to the gravity of the situation, the people of St. Lawrence who have worked in the fluorspar mine have had a very tragic history. They worked for at least 30 years suffering unknowingly from radiation as a result of radon gas in the environment, emanating from the fluorspar mine. During the 1930's and 1940's they worked in the most primitive of conditions. The result was that several hundred of these people, a very high proportion of the work force, developed cancer. In the old days this cancer was said not to be related to their working conditions, and for years their widows or dependants did not receive any adequate or any workmen's compensation. This was eventually cleared up in the 1950's when a link was established between their working conditions and the cancer from which they died. In any event, there are books which have been written about this very tragic situation.

Alcan have discovered that they can now import their fluorspar from Mexico more cheaply than they can mine it in St. Lawrence, so they have decided to shut the mine and to lay-off the 400 workers employed there.

There is very little that the government of Newfoundland can do about this. The government of Newfoundland could seize their assets in Newfoundland, but they would be seizing assets which this company has already decided to abandon. The Newfoundland government therefore has no muscle to use on this group of callous employers. The government of Newfoundland is doing some studies to see whether there is an alternate mining operation which somebody else might be persuaded to take on. It is also looking to see whether a fresh fish filleting plant could be established there to provide employment. So the government of Newfoundland is doing what it can.

On July 21 it formally asked the then minister of industry, trade and commerce in a letter from the minister of intergovernmental affairs of Newfoundland whether the Canadian government would impose a tariff on the importation of fluorspar into Canada or impose quotas on fluorspar imported into Canada in order to put some pressure on Alcan to continue the operation of this mine. It was a simple request. No tariff has been imposed on fluorspar until now. It is the only way this decision might be reversed. The Government of Canada did not reply to the letter which was sent three months ago, until an answer was received on October 21 from the minister.

I raised a question in the House on October 20, and the present minister did not answer the real question. He indicated that the federal government is making an effort to work out an assessment of the possibility of restoring the mine in order for it to become a viable operation in the future. That is gobbledygook. That was not an answer from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) to the government of Newfoundland.

A second letter was written on October 11, 1977, and that is the letter to which the present minister is responding. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) has abandoned his 400 constituents. He did not put any pressure on the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, nor on the Government of Canada, to impose a tariff or to impose a quota.

Are we to close down all our industries in Canada? Are we to find Chinese coolies, poor Mexican peasants or whoever, to mine ore more cheaply than we can? Are we to forget the history of the poor miners at St. Lawrence? Are we to abandon them? If there is a lay-off in Ontario, the newspapers are full of it. We have seen the coverage of the recent INCO situation. If it is in Newfoundland, out of sight and out of mind, it is forgotten. That is one of the complaints of eastern Canada. Our people are thrown in the dustbin and forgotten. Therefore I object to the Minister's answer which he gave the other day. He indicated that he would reply soon. I also object to the letter he sent down, because it is a nothing letter.

I ask the minister, through his parliamentary secretary, to have the Government of Canada take some action or explain to this House and the people of Canada what it is doing to protect these people. They have been abandoned by Alcan, which is a multinational corporation. It has no conscience, and these people were abandoned without a twinge of regret. After years of toil, hundreds of men are being deserted, as well as widows and children who are on pensions because of the previous terrible conditions that existed in the fluorspar mines.

In 1975 when I was the provincial minister of mines and energy, I visited the mines. If the mines are abandoned as they are now, they will begin to flood. If the minister does not take action soon, it will be too late. The miners are being laid off now, and the final abandonment will occur in February of 1978. That was postponed because of assistance received from the government of Newfoundland, not the Government of Canada. The minister has little time left, because they are no longer operating several of the shafts. They are starting to flood. People are being laid off now.

Action is needed. If there is no action, then surely the federal government owes an explanation to the people of St. Lawrence of why it cannot take some action to assist them. Are they to be put on the dole because Alcan can buy fluorspar from Mexico? Mexico is a country which pays much lower wages and has much more primitive working conditions than the miners now have at St. Lawrence after 50 years of effort by their union and by themselves to improve their lot.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

The minister should be made aware of the fact that his answer is most unsatisfactory. The Newfoundland minister of intergovernmental affairs gave a press conference today to outline to the people of Newfoundland the abandonment by the federal government of its responsibilities to these people. I ask the parliamentary secretary to pass on to his minister the request that some action be taken soon, or confirm the death knell.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in reply to his recent question that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) has replied to the Honourable T. Alex Hickman, minister for intergovernmental affairs of the government of Newfoundland, regarding the proposed closure by the Aluminum Company of Canada of its fluorspar mining operations at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, early in 1978.

I should like also to advise that the question of the imposition of a Canadian tariff on the importation of fluorspar is a matter for the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). In that regard, my minister sent him a copy of Mr. Hickman's letter and his reply for his review.

As far as restricting the imports of fluorspar is concerned, the Export and Import Permits Act requires that certain criteria be met before an article can be included in the import control list. Since none of the criteria can be met in the case of fluorspar at the present time, it is not possible to restrict imports under present legislation.

● (2222)

The government is exploring other means of maintaining mine operations and in this connection the federal and Newfoundland governments have initiated an independent assessment of the possibility of continuing the operation with another operator. The consultant's report is expected within a month.

INDUSTRY—MINING REQUEST FOR MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, October 19, I raised in this House a question with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) regarding the fact that Falconbridge had announced a lay-off of some 500 workers to take effect by the end of December, 1977. I also raised with the minister at that time the fact that rumours were floating around the Sudbury basin with respect to the INCO lay-offs.

The minister replied in a typical manner, that is, he gave me a non-answer to the effect that he was aware of soft markets and he was exploring possibilities of finding solutions to these problems. But as long ago as April 17, 1973, as reported on page 3370 of Hansard, I raised the question with the then minister of manpower and immigration:

Has the minister obtained from International Nickel Company projected employment and production levels at this company over the next few years? If not, is it the minister's intention to ask INCO to provide his Manpower consultative services with such information?

The minister's response in 1973 was to the effect that INCO was not required by law to consult with his department, but that:

the department encourages employers to inform us as early as possible of any decisions that will cause significant employment shifts, expansions and dislocations.

Then there is this gem of a statement in the minister's letter to me, dated April 18, 1973, which reads as follows:

Departmental officers enjoy a good working relationship with INCO, as indeed with corporations in all industrial sectors.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is with incredulity that I heard in the House last Friday, October 21, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) say in answer to a question from a member of the opposition, as reported on page 115 of Hansard:

Second, I met with two members from International Nickel who spelled out for us, the night before the announcement, the action they proposed to take.

It is fairly obvious that the government's view of a good working relationship with INCO and INCO's view of such a relationship comprise a phone call the night before a major announcement about a lay-off is made. Needless to say, this government's relationship with Falconbridge Nickel Mines is just as close as its relationship with INCO.

But INCO not only treats the government in an off-hand and cavalier fashion. It even treats its employees' representatives in an off-hand, callous, and lying fashion, because on September 23 of this year, at a meeting held among officials of the INCO, Mr. Woodley and Mr. Kramer representing the company, and Mr. Moreau, Mr. Sammut, Mr. Robinson and Mr. Ayres representing the union of workers at Port Colborne, a meeting which took place at two o'clock in the afternoon, the following question was put to the company, whether they were prepared to consider shifting the Port Colborne workers who were laid off to the Sudbury and Thompson areas. The company replied:

That is correct. We will review the job situation in each of these areas before we would offer jobs at these locations. As we get closer to January, we will have a much better feel of the situation. At present there is no problem for jobs at Thompson. It is felt that by January 30th Sudbury will be in a hiring position.

Those are responsible officials of the International Nickel Company speaking to the workers' representatives at a meeting, and these are the minutes as printed by INCO of Canada.

It is painfully obvious that the government has failed miserably not only in planning the economy of Canada but, what is even more important, in keeping on top of major corporation development plans.

● (2227)

Even as INCO announced the 3,400-man layoff in Canada and we were demonstrating our protest to that announcement this past week end, a cargo ship, the S.S. Latija, docked in Vancouver from Japan and was unloaded on October 21, 22, and 23. And what was unloaded? Seven hundred boxes, each containing 2,600 pounds of nickel carbonate from Japan. This material, 1,820,000 pounds of nickel carbonate, was destined for the Sheritt Gordon Refinery, Fort Saskatchewan.

What is going on, Mr. Speaker? That is the stuff we produce in the Sudbury basin. We have heard ministers say that our low interest loans to INCO's subsidiaries in the Third World countries are assisting those countries. Why are we importing nickel carbonate from Japan when we produce it ourselves? Since when has Japan joined the Third World?

Today, in meetings between INCO officials, union leaders and provincial government ministers, Dr. Smith, an INCO economist who is also on the board of directors of the company, noted that Japan has very high import tariffs on processed nickel products. They encourage import matter only. It is fairly obvious that the Japanese government places a great deal of emphasis on keeping its industry labour intensive, while we continue to operate like some banana republic.

There is no question that the government has mismanaged Canada's economy. The only immediate response is to instruct INCO and Falconbridge to accept the unions' five-point program, as well as the establishment of a government stockpile of nickel, and to rescind the layoff order at INCO and Falconbridge.

The time has also come for a special parliamentary committee to be established to investigate the metals industry in Canada, and INCO's and Falconbridge's recent layoffs and cutback announcements in particular.

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the announced layoff of some 2,200 people at Sudbury results from depressed market conditions for nickel throughout the world. After the layoffs take effect, INCO will continue to operate most of its Ontario facilities and will employ some 15,000 people in its Ontario division.

Since early 1975 INCO has been producing more nickel in Canada than it has been able to sell in world markets, and has accumulated a very large inventory of finished nickel products. The excess production resulted in maintenance of employment at the company's Canadian facilities in anticipation of an upturn in world demand. The anticipated increase in demand has not materialized and is not expected in the near term.

A high level of inventories of nickel producers and excess output continue to exert a downward pressure on prices. In order to arrive at a better balance between supply and demand, a rate of production commensurate with consumption and a reduction of inventory are necessary.

In mid 1977 the company announced that it would reduce production at Sudbury and at Thompson by ceasing the hiring of replacements for employees leaving the company's work force.

INCO has also announced it will reduce production at its operations in Indonesia and Guatemala to levels substantially below those planned for 1978-79. These operations are based on lateritic ore bodies as distinct from the sulphide deposits which INCO mines in Canada. Nickel output from laterites is expected to become increasingly important in the longer term because the reserves are much larger than Canadian reserves and laterites can be mined by open pit methods which require less labour than the underground mining operations in Canada.

Because of the lack of demand in world markets for most metals, it should be anticipated that adjustments in production rates will occur.

While international consultations amongst producers and consumers might make a contribution toward bringing about an improvement in the market situation in the longer term, the government's immediate concern is to deal with the threatened lay off of workers in the Sudbury area. It is for this reason that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) is meeting with the company and the union to consider implementation of the various programs under his direction.

I want to assure the hon. member that the government has the real and firm intention of going ahead with programs to help the people of Sudbury, and I do not think we can play politics with such a situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

At 10.31 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC IMPACT OF CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. Having regard to the government's commitment to place before the House a bill ratifying an agreement between Canada and the United States respecting the construction of the Alcan pipeline, and in light of the fact that there has been no study of any kind of the socio-economic impact of the pipeline project on the area of northeastern British Columbia, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the House issue a reference for the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works to study the impact of the pipeline, particularly as it relates to federal jurisdiction such as the portion of the Alaska Highway which lies in British Columbia, native affairs and questions relating to the environment.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

RENTING OF HOUSE TO YOUTH GROUPS BY MR. FLEMMING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of reports that Brian Flemming, the principal adviser to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on domestic policy is renting his Halifax home for $800 per month to a youth group called Katimavik, which is wholly supported by federal funding, and in view of the fact that Mr. Flemming obtained advice from the Prime Minister personally and what was referred to as a conflict of interest group in the Prime Minister's office, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions detailing the composition of any conflict of interest group in his office, the terms of reference of the group and the basis upon which the group and the Prime Minister concluded that Mr. Flemming had no conflict of interest in the rental of his house to Katimavik.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

SUGGESTION ALCAN RESCIND ORDER CLOSING FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It concerns an announcement by the Alcan Corporation, made clear in a headline in the press concerning their profits which were up some 500 per cent, precisely at the time the Alcan Corporation is laying off hundreds of workers in the community of St. Lawrence in Newfoundland. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House urges the government of Canada to request Alcan to rescind its closing of the fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, until alternative strategies can be worked out or face the cancellation of its tax concessions and the possibility of the imposition of higher tariffs on fluorspar imported into Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

ORDERS AND DECORATIONS

CONGRATULATIONS TO MRS. JUDITH RICHARD ON RECEIVING ORDER OF CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to pay tribute to all those who will receive tonight the high honour of becoming members of the Order of Canada, especially to Mrs. Judith Richard, the only House of Commons employee to receive such outstanding distinction. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That this House extend its special congratulations to Mrs. Judith Richard on her appointment as Member of the Order of Canada in recognition of her services to the country as the executive secretary of the late Réal Caouette, ex-leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada, and the great Canadian as he was known by all the members of this House.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

There appears to be some difficulty with the sound system. Is the sound system functioning better now?

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I hope the procedure will be simpler. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to pay tribute to all those who will receive tonight the high honour of becoming members of the Order of Canada, especially to Mrs. Judith Richard, the only House of Commons employee to receive such outstanding distinction. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have in the past expressed reservations about the use of this Standing Order for the expression of congratulations because, of course, it invites repetition. However, in this case, I will put the motion. It can be accepted for discussion only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL SUBSIDIES FOR FLUID MILK PRODUCERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion.

Considering the untenable situation in which fluid milk producers find themselves because the government refuses to pay subsidies agreed upon on the percentage of their production to be used in industrial milk; considering that the government thereby does not respect the agreement of last April between the Federation of Fluid Milk Producers and the Canadian Dairy Commission; and considering that this refusal is tantamount to a kind of blackmail exerted by the government against fluid milk producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That the Minister of Agriculture be urged unanimously by this House, with the hopeful support of the 60 members from Quebec on the other side, to send immediately to fluid milk producers the amounts that are legally owed to them.

[English]

Mr. Beatty: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There has been no English translation of the last two motions and it has been impossible for those of us whose mother language is English to understand the motions which are being put. I wonder whether the fault could be rectified before we proceed.

Mr. Speaker: Immediately it was evident to me there was some defect in the sound system we initiated an investigation into it. I would hope that for the time being we could carry on functioning as best we can. The motion by the hon. member for Joliette says, basically, that the Minister of Agriculture be urged by the House to notify immediately milk producers in the Province of Quebec and give them money which is rightly due to them.

The introduction of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent, of course. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO LOSS OF TRAWLER "CAPE ROYAL"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the people of Newfoundland, especially those living on the south coast of the province, are very worried and concerned over whether or not adequate safety procedures are in effect for seamen and fishermen at sea along the south coast of Newfoundland and as to whether adequate coastguard facilities exist, which concern and alarm is increased by the loss of the 132-foot sidetrawler Cape Royal with her crew of eight men; at some time after 6 p.m. on August 9 she left Burgeo to proceed to Marystown for ship refit and was expected to arrive in Marystown at 10.30 a.m. on August 10 but was not reported missing until mid-afternoon on Friday, August 12, some two and a half days after she left Burgeo. I ask members of the House for unanimous consent to introduce the following motion and I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House direct the Minister of Transport to proceed immediately to meet the requests of the people of the south coast of Newfoundland for the appointment of a public commission of inquiry into the loss of the sidetrawler Cape Royal and her eight man crew and into the adequacy or otherwise of safety procedures and regulations governing transport by sea on the south coast of Newfoundland, such inquiry to commence its work immediately and to report its recommendations as soon as humanly possible.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion put forward. Unanimous consent is required before it can be considered. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Speaker: Order. This would normally be the time at which we would begin the oral question period but I see there are still one or two members who wish to put forward motions pursuant to Standing Order 43. Unless we are satisfied that the translation sound system is functioning correctly, I propose to use a few minutes to allow them do that and then we will examine the situation at that time.

PERFORMING ARTS

SUGGESTED IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION OF COUNCIL OF FILM MAKERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move an important motion. In view of the fact that recent bankruptcies in the Canadian film industry testify to the fact that our film makers are still facing unfair competition and are still restricted in gaining access to foreign controlled movie theatres to show Canadian films, and in view of the fact that American films earn $200 million in the Canadian box office annually and that profits continue to flow to the U.S. rather than a portion remain here to support Canadian film makers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent):

That the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) now implement the policy recommendations presented to this House in a petition on June 16, 1976 by the Canadian Council of Film Makers.

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING ANNUAL GUARANTEED INCOME PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the Canadian economy is experiencing a full slump, that inflation is constantly eroding the purchasing power of the Canadian people, and also that a very high level of unemployment exists in the main areas of our country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House consider immediately the possibility of setting up a universal guaranteed income program, without discrimination for the purpose of ensuring the financial security of all Canadians.

MANPOWER

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—GOVERNMENT MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE EFFECTS

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, we are only one week into the third session of the thirtieth parliament and I see that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Transport are absent. My question is to a minister who is in the House, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and it concerns the economic devastation that is occurring in my constituency and in Sudbury as a result of the INCO lay-offs. Now that both labour and management have shot down the minister's idea of "fair shares of misery", policies of work sharing, will he tell the House what further steps he has in mind to make sure our communities can stay on their feet?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at a time when a problem such as this exists, it seems to me inappropriate not to examine all of the avenues which might be of assistance to those who are affected by the lay-off. That is precisely why we held meetings yesterday dealing not only with the Sudbury, Ontario situation, but also that in Thompson, Manitoba. The idea was in fact not shot down. They indicated that the problem was not of a temporary nature, knew that the work-sharing program would not be applicable on a long-term basis, and therefore not too much time was spent on the work-sharing aspect.

We indicated both to management and to union the full resources which would be available. The union leadership were of a mind that we were jumping a bridge too soon, if you will. They wanted to pursue with management the avenues that might be open to head off, or at least to ameliorate, the lay-off. I think that should be encouraged in order to see what can be done on a union-management basis. In the event that that is not successful or totally successful, then I think it is incumbent upon governments at both levels to do what they can to ameliorate the situation so far as those who are laid off are concerned.

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—REQUEST THAT MINISTER ATTEND MEETING IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. It is my understanding that a minister of the cabinet was not at the meeting in Toronto. It is also my understanding that a meeting is being convened in Winnipeg on Thursday, October 27, with union representatives and INCO officials in the province of Manitoba, who I understand were not represented at the Toronto, Ontario meeting yesterday. Will the minister give this House his assurance that he will personally attend this important meeting in Winnipeg on Thursday and provide some answers for the mining industry, management and labour of this country?

● (1422)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has to make up his mind. In one breath he complains about ministers not being present in this chamber when they are out performing other duties—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I do not wish to be unduly critical. I know the hon. member has a concern about those in Thompson, Manitoba, as I have myself. I did not attend the meeting in Toronto yesterday. However, I was available in Toronto to my officials in the event that they needed some back-up information or some policy direction. At the same time I offered to meet with management and labour. The management people took me up on it. The union representatives had made other arrangements, other engagements, and could not meet. They undertook to discuss with my regional director general, Mr. Boyd, some of the concerns they had.

As far as Manitoba is concerned, we were in direct contact with the premier of that province and the deputy minister to indicate that we are prepared to discuss with them the same services we are prepared to make available in Sudbury. However, we do not want to usurp the roles of union and management. They want to ascertain if there are avenues which can be followed, before they give consideration to using the facilities of my particular department and the resources which are available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: I think they should be encouraged in that. We do not need snide remarks from the New Democratic Party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: We should be more interested in seeking solutions than the bombastic responses we have had from the NDP.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST THAT THOMPSON, MANITOBA, BE A DESIGNATED AREA

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Those workers who have been laid off can take little comfort from the fact that this government's only answer to people who are willing to work is the dole. Will the minister tell this House whether he will designate Thompson as an area eligible for DREE assistance, and in addition, when he intends to consult with the Thompson town council about projects under this problem?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if my memory is correct—and it usually is—the area mentioned by the hon. member is already one of the designated districts of Manitoba which come under DREE subsidies. The city of Thompson, Manitoba, as a designated area in this province is entitled to assistance from my department as long as it is requested by industries willing to expand or create new branches.

With regard to other federal or DREE programs, all I can say is that we have a very substantial agreement of over $100 million for northern Manitoba within the next five years. Pursuant to this agreement which has been effective for one year now, four federal departments have been joining their efforts to further development in northern Manitoba.

RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY TO AVOID LAY-OFFS AT MINES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) are absent, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

In the light of the experience we are living in the mining industry and considering the concrete proof of the lack of a long term industrial policy, and given that, as confirmed today by the company, Noranda Mines will have to invite its employees to take a prolonged holiday during the Christmas period, which causes some concern to the mining industry in Quebec, would the minister be in a position to tell what kind of communication he had with this Quebec mining company and can he assure the House that we shall not have the kind of lay-offs we have just experienced in Ontario.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any recommendation from the chairman of Noranda Mines. However, if he communicates with me, I shall be pleased to talk with him. Of course, if he is forced to invite his employees to take a long holiday at Christmas time because of the conditions on the market, I hope that this will be a very temporary situation.

● (1427)

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I am really disappointed with the answer by the Minister of Finance who does not seem very concerned with what may soon happen in the mining industry.

Could I ask the minister whether his government intends to implement a real long term industrial policy in order to protect the mining industry? This could reassure the province of Quebec particularly in view of the experience we are now going through. Given the absence of the responsible ministers, I apologize for having to put my question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are looking very closely at the situation. Of course, the performance of mining products on the world markets is very weak at this time, i.e. prices are low and demand is slack.

However, perhaps the hon. member could recall that in 1972 we took steps to stabilize uranium prices, and save Canadian jobs but ever since that time the opposition has been blaming us for having acted in that area.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a final supplementary.

I said I was disappointed, but once again the minister has proved, Mr. Speaker, that he does not want to do anything. Can he tell the House whether he intends or not to introduce legislation that can give Canadians the stability they lack?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I have explained to the hon. member that the world situation is very complex, that ore prices are soft at this time, that demand is weak, that those are facts of life we have to learn to live with and that there is no magic solution to the problem. However, I say to the hon. member that we are watching the situation very closely and that we will do everything in our power to stabilize the situation. I urge the hon. member, when we intervene to stabilize ore prices as we did in the case of uranium, to ask his colleagues to support the position of the government instead of asking questions month after month.

PROPOSAL TO STOCKPILE NICKEL TO AVERT LAY-OFFS AT INCO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The government, by its hundreds of millions of dollars of giveaways to INCO, having done all it could to ensure that the company gets the profits and the miners get the shaft—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he is aware that at the meeting which took place yesterday INCO said that not only will it proceed with its announced layoffs but that, quite possibly, there would be further layoffs early in 1978. I would like to ask him why the government does not take up our constructive proposal from this side of the House that the government take immediate steps to form a stockpile of nickel, having done it in the past for some seven years with uranium, in order to preserve these jobs instead of having the taxpayers continue to pay some $22 million which they will have to pay in unemployment insurance if they do not preserve the jobs?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we explored that possibility last Wednesday with the company. One of the problems is that they have stockpiled nickel for a long period of time and now they have a reserve for seven months. If we were to keep on stockpiling, we would be depressing the market even further and would be adding to the problem. We have not rejected that possibility; we have discussed it with the company, but at the present time this does not seem to be the solution to the problem.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, may I say with respect that I do not see the logic of the minister's argument. Our experience with uranium has made it obvious that far from depressing the price, it went up by several hundred per cent and a substantial gain was reaped from stockpiling. Is the government now seriously proposing to the company that it consider stockpiling, and if so, would the minister confirm that in unequivocal terms because I understood from the minister responsible for employment that the government has decided, now that its work-sharing proposal has been turned down, that it would just leave it to INCO and the union to look after their own situation?

● (1432)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said that we have discussed with the company the possibility of stockpiling, but this option did not seem at that time to be the proper solution.

Mr. Broadbent: Why?

Mr. Chrétien: Because it will not bring about the proper solution. However, we are still considering that.

Mr. Broadbent: Why?

Mr. Chrétien: Because I have said that they already have too many stocks in reserve. I would like to refer again to uranium. The hon. member has created the impression that uranium prices went up because we have stockpiled. That is not the reason. The reason is that uranium is a commodity—

Mr. Stevens: It is because of the illegal cartel.

Mr. Chrétien: No. The reason the price of uranium went up is that after the oil crisis uranium was an energy commodity which became more sought after in the world market. That is why the price of uranium went up, not because of stockpiling.

Mr. Broadbent: I am well aware of the complexities which cause prices to go up or down. The minister's simple-minded single cause argument that stockpiling will cause the price to go down does not make any sense at all, and I think any independent economist would agree with that. I repeat to the minister that if uranium has been stockpiled for seven years and if we have only a seven month supply on hand why is it irresponsible for the government to propose another year—a limited period of time—of stockpiling? During that period of time a longer range solution to the problems of the miners in Manitoba and Ontario could be worked out.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is insisting, and that is all right with me, but we have discussed the problem, and that proposal does not seem at this moment to be the solution. Perhaps that proposal would just postpone the problems for a couple of months. If it is the right way to solve the problem, we are willing to consider it, but at this time we do not consider that as the proper solution to the problem.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC MINISTER

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday rumors seemed to hint at a possible conflict between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the President of the Treasury Board whereby the indexation of old age security pensions and family allowances to keep up with the rising cost of living would be abolished or suspended for a determined period by the federal government. Could the minister say to the House how her talks with her counterpart are coming along, and whether the people affected will soon be reassured in that respect?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that as Minister of National Health and Welfare it is my duty to make sure that I always stand for the interests of Canadian families, particularly poor families, and to ensure the redistribution of incomes for all those who are entitled to it and need it, which is the position of this government.

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister has not answered my question at all. I asked whether talks on a possible suspension for a time or forever of the indexation of old age pensions and family allowances to keep up with the rising cost of living were going on between her department and the Treasury Board. I would like to know whether that was discussed or is being discussed at the present time.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member who has been in this House for a lot longer than I and who is a politician knows quite well that whether or not that is being discussed among government officials does not change absolutely anything to the legislation this Parliament voted, and if it is being discussed in the cabinet I am not at a liberty to tell you.

REJECTION OF TARIFF PROTECTION FOR FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Since it now appears that the government has turned down as an option the possibility of protective tariffs on imported fluorspar in order to protect the 400 jobs at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, and in view of the failure of the government to consult with the Newfoundland government on this very important matter, the future of the town of St. Lawrence, what steps does the government intend to take to save this single industry town and the people who are dependent on it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the government of Newfoundland has contacted one of my colleagues, but I myself have received no communication. However, if one of the ministers of that province wants to telephone me to discuss the matter, I will be pleased to talk to him.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE TAX RETURNS REMAIN CONFIDENTIAL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. I want to congratulate him on the achievement of that portfolio.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hope the minister will be successful. Having regard, however, to what happened recently in Manitoba, I think his tenure will be very short.

My question arises out of a general feeling in all parts of this country that income tax returns are not secret within the meaning of the Income Tax Act and that there are occasions, and have been recently, of leaks to other departments. I ask the minister whether he will now give the assurance to the House and to the country that never again will there be any leaks from his department or to permit the use of leaks by other departments, to the detriment of the taxpayer.

[Translation]

Hon. Joseph-Phillippe Guay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the right hon. member for his wishes and then tell him that his predictions concerning Manitoba are not always concrete and not necessarily always true.

[English]

With regard to the question I would like to tell the right hon. gentleman that under section 241, in brackets (4) of the Act—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): I can underline it in blue, if hon. members would rather have it that way. Of course, I take into consideration the fact that the right hon. gentleman is a very prominent lawyer. However, I suggest that he look at that particular section of the Act, and possibly that will answer the question he has put to me.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to follow the peregrinations of his department and the manner in which income tax revelations made in returns have been revealed to individuals who are not legally entitled thereto, and I would like the minister again to look up section 241 in brackets subsection (4).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGATION DEPARTMENTS CIRCUMVENTING GROWTH GUIDELINES

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On Monday of this week the hon. member for Hamilton West questioned the minister about the growth of the civil service, and the minister made the commitment that the growth would be held to less than one per cent. However, is the minister aware that all his cabinet colleagues are hiring additional employees through private employment agencies? For example, 16 departments have taken on an additional 4,500 employees, and the Minister of Transport spent $600,000 more in 1976 than in 1975 for hiring from private employment agencies. Are the minister's colleagues circumventing his guidelines with regard to civil service growth?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker, an unequivocal no.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be another method of getting around hiring. I have figures for 29 departments and Crown corporations which show that 3700 additional people are under contract, and this cost the taxpayers an additional $130 million in 1975 and 1976. The civil service publication Argus-Journal has stated that the government is misleading the public on Public Service growth and gives some very devastating figures which show that contracts are on the increase. In 1973 and 1974 four departments were awarded 8351 contracts, and in 1974 and 1975 the number of contracts had increased to 73,096.

● (1442)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would want to examine the premise of the hon. member's question and the details he is quoting in considerably greater depth than he could describe in the question period. I repeat my answer to his previous question. There is no attempt on the part of the departments to get around this. I believe it is a wise practice on occasion to enter into short-term contracts rather than creating permanent man-years and a permanent growth of bureaucracy. I can assure the hon. member that the authorized man-year growth of the Public Service for 1977-78 will stay within the commitment made in this House. It will be less than one per cent.

Mr. McKenzie: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like the President of the Treasury Board to check the charges made in the October issue of the Argus-Journal which stated that contracting out is just a great government cover-up.

AGRICULTURE

BEEF—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF POSSIBLE IMPORT LAW

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. The minister and his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce have responded to questions in the House with respect to the proposals for a new beef import law for Canada. Can the minister tell the House if we are right to presume that the primary thrust of any new beef import law would be directed toward offshore beef so that we could preserve our access to United States markets which are of particular importance to beef producers in Saskatchewan?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think any legislation we would bring in along the lines the hon. member suggests would be non-discriminatory.

TRADE

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDING SECTION 11 OF GATT AGREEMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. It seems that one way to get a good meat import law would be to make an amendment to Section 11 of the GATT agreement currently being negotiated in Geneva. Has the minister or the Minister of Agriculture asked the negotiators to look into this aspect of getting an amendment to Section 11 of the GATT agreement so that we may have a meaningful import law in Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question is being examined at this time. I would be very pleased to convey the representation of the hon. member to the representatives in Geneva.

SUGGESTED EMBARGO ON IMPORTATION OF NICKEL CARBONATE

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the continuing importation into Canada of nickel carbonate from Japan and Australia, which are certainly not Third World countries, in view of the fact that the latest importation involves 1,820,000 pounds of nickel carbonate last weekend destined for the Sherritt-Gordon Refinery at Fort Saskatchewan, and in view of the fact that we have nickel carbonate stored in bags coming out of our ears in Sudbury, can the minister inform the House whether, as an emergency measure, there will be an immediate embargo on the importation of any raw nickel from overseas to Sherritt-Gordon and other refineries?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the question. I was not aware of this particular aspect.

[Mr. Goodale.]

MANPOWER

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP OF DEPARTMENTAL OFFICIALS WITH MINING COMPANIES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): A supplementary question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of information in the letter dated April 19, 1973 written to me by the former Minister of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that his departmental officials had a good working relationship with INCO and other such companies, and that it is an ongoing one, to enable them to stay on top of the situation, in view of the fact that last Friday the minister told the House he was informed of the layoff the night before the layoff, can the minister now tell the House whether there will be a parliamentary investigation into the mineral industry in Canada with particular reference to the way in which his officials have had this close working relationship and were on top of the situation, specifically with respect to INCO and Falconbridge and their actions in the last few weeks regarding the people of Thompson, Port Colborne, and Sudbury.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am in a position to state that there will or will not be a particular committee set up to investigate that aspect of it. As the hon. member has said, I as minister and others were notified the night before of the press release. That release did not indicate that the individuals would be laid off the next day, however. It indicated that pursuant to the law they had to be given 16 weeks' notice, which was done.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is shameful.

Mr. Cullen: The hon. member says that is shameful. It is conceivable that the period should be extended and we can debate that question at another time but the company did in fact give 16 weeks' notice, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

LAY-OFFS AT INCO—REQUEST FOR MINISTER'S SOLUTION TO PROBLEM

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Finance. In his answers so far today regarding the problems of International Nickel Company and its employees he has been very straightforward and positive in outlining to the House what he considers not to be the solution. Would he now be equally positive and straightforward and take the House into his confidence and let us know what he thinks may be the solutions to this very serious problem?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have been debating this question in the House for a couple of days. We are in communication with the union and the corporation to find an appropriate solution. Of course, we are very concerned about this problem. I said today that some options are not really open but we hope to find others in the next few weeks. It is good that we have at least 14 weeks before the lay-offs become operative.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR WIDOWS OF VETERANS RECEIVING LESS THAN 48 PER CENT DISABILITY PENSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs who has indicated a number of times that corrections to veterans legislation are imminent. Widows of veterans are still being discriminated against, however, as they have for many years because they are denied a pension where a veteran husband died who was in receipt of less than a 48 per cent disability pension. When is the minister going to introduce corrective amendments to the legislation?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the pension applies to widows of veterans who received disability pensions of 48 per cent or more. This matter is always before the government for consideration but I have no specific answer at this time.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Another inequity in the legislation is that the formula for the basic pension is that it shall comply with the five lowest categories in the Public Service. In view of the fact that the precedent has been set of veterans falling behind those categories of the Public Service at a rate of $536 per year, when is the minister going to correct that inequity by introducing amendments to the legislation to correct this very serious fault?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated in this House many times, the department has had the basic rate under consideration. I must tell the House, however, that the government has looked at this very seriously and decided not to increase the disability pension at this time but recipients will be able to enjoy the cost of living increase effective January 1 and each year thereafter. I know this is a disappointment to veterans organizations, but good Canadian citizens that they are, I am sure they will realize that this is a year of restraint and we will not be able to introduce improvements until our fiscal position improves.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBLE DISCUSSIONS WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA ON SOCIO-ECONOMIC IMPACT OF ALCAN PIPELINE

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. In connection with the government's proposal to place a bill before the House respecting the construction of the Alcan pipeline, has the minister had discussions with the province of British Columbia regarding this government's responsibility in northeastern British Columbia for the socio-economic impact the pipeline will have there? I ask this in light of the millions of dollars spent studying the impact on the Territories and the Yukon and the special responsibility the federal government has in northeastern British Columbia because of the highway.

• (1452)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues from British Columbia have raised this issue with the cabinet. The matter is being considered very carefully at the present time. Discussions are taking place with the government of British Columbia. I suggest that the hon. member raise this question with the minister directly responsible for this project when he returns to the House.

Mr. Oberle: Is it the intention of the government to fulfil its commitment and carry out a study on its own, studying the impact on the native community in the area which is as significant as it was in the Mackenzie Valley and the Yukon and the impact the pipeline construction will have on the Alaska Highway which is entirely under federal jurisdiction. Is there going to be a study of that area?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the hon. member that he address this question to the Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Alexander: Supplementary, Mr. Speaker, or will I be next?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR CHANGE IN UTILITY GRADES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of weather conditions in western Canada which resulted in the downgrading of wheat to three utility, and in view of the widespread dissatisfaction among growers with the spread between three red and three utility wheat and also the varying qualities put in this grade, has the minister discussed this problem with the Board of Grain Commissioners as to the possibility of revision in grades in this area, which would be more fair and with a better price differential for the wheat. This involves many millions of dollars.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed the problems of the low grade grains, the utility grains. The commission wants to put together the complete story on all the grains and the harvesting. According to a report I have on my desk, harvesting is practically completed in the west. A lot of grains are coming through with better grades than we had thought, and we will be in a much better position to supply the market than we thought. I am sure the hon. member is aware there is a demand in the world market for utility grain. It is too early to say whether it will be that costly, whether it will involve millions of dollars. We will be much better off as a nation because of the ability of the farmers to harvest the crop in as good a condition as it is when we consider all the elements with which we have had to contend.

Mr. Ritchie: The minister did not quite answer my question. Is he considering bringing three utility grades into one or two more grades which will be more fair and give a better price differential for all the grain put into this grade by the present grading system?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are reviewing the grades.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF $90 MILLION GIVEN TO QUEBEC FOR HOUSING

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The housing issue is of national interest and despite all efforts made by this government, several thousands of people are at grips with housing problems, particularly in my riding. In view of this fact, could the minister first of all specify what use has been made of the amount of $90 million provided to the Quebec government by the federal government in order to conclude various agreements likely to meet its citizens' needs in terms of housing? Second, what steps does the minister favour to help lower rent costs for those who want to find proper housing conditions?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, I can inform him that since it was announced that a part of the funds the government of Canada intended to spend in the province of Quebec for housing purposes had not been used yet, we have received a few requests from the Quebec government. It is to be hoped therefore that within a few weeks we shall be able, in co-operation with Quebec authorities, to launch a few housing projects for elderly people or low income people.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Unfortunately, the requests we expected to receive from the Quebec government are not quite specific and numerous enough to meet all our expectations and the amounts we would be prepared to spend in Quebec may not be spent this year because of the Quebec government's carelessness.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF ESTABLISHING FERRO-SILICONE PLANT IN RIMOUSKI—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Would he be in a position to inform the House whether any progress has been made as regards the establishment of the ferro-silicone plant in Rimouski?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I must inform the hon. member that as far as I know there has been no development in this regard and until further notice we must be patient and wait.

REASON FOR REMOVAL OF PFRA OFFICE FROM LETHBRIDGE

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact that Fort Macleod is the most central location for the PFRA offices dealing with water development in the Lethbridge constituency and has been for over 30 years, and in view of the fact that Fort Macleod has ample office space, storage space, plus a large parking area for farmers and ranchers, will the minister inform the House why he is proposing a move of this office and will he assure the House that he will put an immediate stop to this ridiculous action?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I must admit I was not aware of that decision or that a recommendation had been made recently in this regard. I will check this whole matter and reply later to the hon. member.

FISHERIES

SINKING OF TRAWLER "CAPE ROYAL"—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. The minister is familiar with the fact that on August 9 the vessel Cape Royal left Burgeo to go to Marystown, a 13 hour run. Two and a half days later it was discovered that this sidetrawler had sunk with all her crew.

Will the minister listen to the requests of the people of the south coast of Newfoundland and have the cabinet order a public inquiry under the Inquiries Act, or whatever statute is proper, into that sinking and into the question of whether safety regulations and procedures are adequate on the south coast for mariners, fishermen and others who travel at sea.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I hope I understood all that the hon. member was asking because there was a sound problem. The matter which he raises is very serious. In this instance, a ship which was supposed to dock, if I remember correctly, after 12 or 14 steaming hours had not reported for two and a half days. We have asked the fishing companies to improve the procedure whereby fishing vessels report. As the hon. member well knows, fishing captains are loathe to report too frequently because it can indicate their position. They are very competitive with each other. However, for safety reasons and search and rescue, it would be better if we could devise a system whereby the vessels do report to their home base or use some other system. I might say to the hon. member that in this case reporting earlier probably would not have helped since all search efforts under the competent personnel of my colleagues the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport, did not find specific reasons for what happened. I am sorry to be so long but this is a very serious question. With regard to the matter of an inquiry, I will discuss it with my colleague, the Minister of Transport. Such situations are usually examined under his jurisdiction.

POST OFFICE

PROPOSAL TO SEND REMAINING COIN SETS TO MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): In the absence of the Postmaster General, I will direct my question to the acting minister. Is the Post Office Department concentrating on selling the remaining inventory of the Royal Canadian Mint product, coins and coin sets, at the main philatelic depot in Montreal and has a recall order been sent out to all the post offices in western Canada to return to the Winnipeg philatelic depot all of these products for furtherance to the Quebec philatelic depot?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to bring this to the attention of my colleague, the Postmaster General.

Mr. Whittaker: I have a copy of a letter which was sent to post offices in western Canada. Does the minister agree that this is discriminatory against all other parts of the country?

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

POSSIBLE ENTRY INTO CANADA OF UNITED PARCEL SERVICE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Postmaster General and the Minister of Transport, I will direct my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Is the minister aware that United Parcel Service Incorporated, a giant U.S. corporation, is making every effort to expand its operations into Canada? If so, is the government aware of the effect this will have on employees of CN Express and employees of the post office? What is the government doing to prevent this American outfit coming into Canada which will result in the profits being shipped back to the United States and will create more unemployment for those in the post office and CN Express?

● (1502)

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): I thank the hon. member for that question. This is a situation where the Postmaster General and the union can work in concert to provide better service and the kind of competition which would be effective in coping with those circumstances. In addition we shall, of course, be looking at other avenues which might be more effective to prevent an operation of that kind taking place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before granting the hon. member a short supplementary I would remind the House that because of the technical difficulty we had at the beginning of the question period we should extend the allotted time by another four or five minutes.

The hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys.

Mr. Muir: Is the minister aware that the Foreign Investment Review Agency has stated that Canada would not benefit if UPS bought into Genobele Delivery in Ontario? Can any steps be taken by the federal government to prevent this giant corporation coming into Canada and creating more unemployment?

Mr. Cullen: One of the terms of reference of FIRA is that when they make a decision in a positive way there must be significant benefit to Canada. The hon. member has indicated that FIRA has not found that to be the case in the past and I would assume they would have to go through that particular regimen again. I do not wish to prejudge what Fira might do but the hon. member has certainly made his position clear.

SOCIAL SECURITY

EFFECT OF HOME INSULATION GRANTS ON GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Mr. F. A. Philbrook (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I should like to ask whether home insulation grants made to senior citizens will have any effect on guaranteed income supplement benefits. Will they be deducted and, if so, what are the reasons and possible alternatives?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member and the House that the grants for insulating homes will not be considered additional income or assets to old age pensioners and will therefore not interfere with the receipt of supplementary benefits.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECT OF ELIMINATING FOOD SERVICE DIVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to his press conference and the subsequent press release dated October 20 entitled, "A New Look at Agriculture Canada" which has to do with the reorganization with the hon. gentleman's department. I would ask the minister to give us some assurance that the changes described will, in fact, result in a greater flow of public information to Canadian consumers and to people in the food industry.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): If the hon. member has time this afternoon he will find I shall be elaborating later on that subject in the debate on the Throne Speech.

Mr. Wise: The minister's answer sounds more like an excuse than an explanation. Will he now acknowledge that what in reality is happening is that the director of the Food Services Division is no longer with his department and that he has been transferred to another department? Is it not true that the Food Systems Branch has been dissolved and that the remaining staff have been integrated throughout the department with the result that there is no longer a Food Services Division within Agriculture Canada?

Mr. Whelan: If the hon. member has read the press release and any of the articles written about it—and those I have seen have been fairly accurate—he will find they show that Agriculture Canada will be in a position to show greater leadership in the whole of the food sector than ever before. The Department of National Revenue will benefit from the presence of Dr. Hanna in that department because there will now be one person in that department who has a knowledge of agriculture; this will be of benefit to the agriculture industry as a whole, since we work with that department very often. These people are being absorbed into other branches of the department to the great advantage of those other branches, the great advantage of the farmers and of the consumers of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REASON FOR MOVING ARCHITECTURAL AND ENGINEERING OFFICES FROM SASKATOON

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is his department planning a move of the architectural and engineering offices from Saskatoon to Regina and does he plan to complete this move by July, 1978? If so, why is the department concentrating in the Regina area, where there are already provincial offices, instead of fanning out all over the country in accordance with the government's decentralization plan?

Mr. Ross Milne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I have no knowledge of such a move. I will make further inquiries and report to the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Korchinski: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have knowledge of that move. While the minister is making inquiries I should like him to inquire why such a move is contemplated in view of the fact that there are only about 1,000 Indians living on reserves south of Regina and that 40 per cent of the Indians in the province live north of Prince Albert. Would it not be far better to leave the office in Saskatoon, nearer to the people who are to be served?

Mr. Milne: That seems to me to be a repetition of the first question, and the answer is the same.

TRANSFERRAL OF SOME DEPARTMENTAL FUNCTIONS TO OTHER DEPARTMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture who has just articulated a most incredible proposal. I want to be sure he is saying what I heard him say. Is it the position of the Minister of Agriculture that the Department of Agriculture becomes more effective as more of its functions are transferred to other departments?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry the Leader of the Opposition misinterpreted what I said. That is not what I said. That is not what I intended to say. I am sure the hon. member for Elgin heard what I said. If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to stay this afternoon I shall be elaborating further and telling him just what we intend to do. Agriculture Canada is the envy of the world and he will find out—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby on a question of privilege.

Mr. Broadbent: My question of privilege concerns the Prime Minister. I see he is not in the House, so I shall let it go.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I can get through this on a point of order. It does relate to my present condition, the condition of my fragile body. It is a matter which verges on a question of privilege as it affects the operation of this House.

I know that with the introduction of television into the House we shall find some unusual observations and points of order raised. The point of order which I raise is one on behalf of all hon. members. Since we have had television in the House I have received complaints from members on all sides about the level of lighting in the chamber. As far as some people are concerned the lighting has affected their eyesight and they are required to wear dark glasses. For others, the heat of the lighting is causing some discomfort, and when we go back to the lounge we find that the air conditioning is adjusted proportionately to accommodate the lighting, bringing upon us 'flu and some inconvenience. Since you are in charge of all this, Your Honour, I should like to know whether or not anything will be done.

We were told at the outset that it would be cool lighting and that members would not notice the presence of television in the House. Perhaps Your Honour would take this matter under advisement and let us know whether something can be done about the level of lighting.

Mr. Speaker: I can inform all hon. members that the reconstituted Special Committee on Television and Radio Broadcasting met yesterday. One of the subjects under extensive consideration was the level of the lighting and the temperature in the Chamber. There was anxiety on the part of all hon. members that we begin the introduction of this equipment with the resumption of the sittings of the House, which was done. This did not allow for an extensive period of trial and experimentation.

● (1512)

We are within that period now. The engineers are constantly re-examining the performance of the lighting and the requirements of the lighting, and at the same time the temperature control. Of course the temperature control is a much easier factor because the lighting may remain constant, and some additional equipment may be introduced into the system to alter the temperature. The lighting raises some more technical problems in terms of control because, in addition to experimentation each day, it will be necessary before any substantial adjustments are made that we come to a recess of the Chamber for two or three days in order to permit scaffolding to be put up to alter the lighting. There are things of that sort of an ongoing nature. However, I do want to assure all hon. members that the matter is under careful scrutiny every day.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say, in view of the question of the leader of the NDP, that the Prime Minister is not here this afternoon because he went to the airport to welcome the Prime Minister of Guyana, Mr. Forbes Burnham.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—CLOSING OF FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MINISTER'S REPLY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which relates to an answer given to a question this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). The Minister of Finance was asked by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) whether the government is going to take action on a request which it had from the government of Newfoundland to impose a tariff on imports of fluorspar into Canada because of a decision by Alcan to close the fluorspar mine at St. Lawrence, Newfoundland. As I recall it, the minister said that he had received no such letter or request, but that he would consider it if he did receive such a letter.

That is a misstatement of fact, I believe, Mr. Speaker, inadvertent I am sure. I raised this question last night. On July 21 a letter was sent to the then minister of industry, trade and commerce, the present Minister of Finance, by the government of Newfoundland requesting that either a tariff be imposed on imported fluorspar or quotas imposed. That letter was not answered. On October 11 a follow-up letter was sent to the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner).

This matter was debated last night. As reported at page 276 of yesterday's Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Loiselle), replying to me last night, said this:

> I should also like to advise that the question of the imposition of a Canadian tariff on the importation of fluorspar is a matter for the consideration of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). In that regard, my minister sent him a copy of Mr. Hickman's letter and his reply for his review.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since July 21 or a few days thereafter, unless the post office has failed completely, or since October 11 in any event, this request has been before the Government of Canada. I bring this matter up because I think the minister has misstated the facts, and would he clear it up for me?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to say to the hon. member that I did not want to mislead anybody on this. I have not been seized with the problem as yet, but I will be looking into it this afternoon. If I can provide an answer to both hon. members I will do so tomorrow or the day after.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[Translation]

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to the speech at the opening of the session; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Malone (p. 226).

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, to conclude my remarks from last evening, I would simply suggest that for a number of people, and especially for members of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec, the most significant proposal in the Speech from the Throne, as read by Her Majesty, certainly was the government's intent to amend the BNA Act by enshrining linguistic rights in the constitution. The only language rights of sorts that have been included in the constitution since 1867 are those of the English-speaking minority in Quebec. And ever since 1971, this government's position has always been that our constitution should be amended to include language rights as well for the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec. Because since Confederation, when the existing agreement was prepared and enacted by the British Parliament, French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec have not really had an opportunity to participate in the preparation of that agreement. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I fully support the government's intention to introduce such amendments to the Constitution. This in my view is a matter of basic justice. Francophones outside Quebec have a right to such a constitutional guarantee. In my province, there is a statute on official languages but it is only an act of legislature. To us the significance of having that written into the Constitution would be a basic thing, and I hope the government succeed in getting such a constitutional amendment.

I would repeat that this position was not taken by the federal government on November 15 last or after the enactment of Bill 101 in Quebec. Rather, it has been the position of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the federal government since the Victoria Charter in 1971.

[English]

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, firstly I should like to compliment the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I thought they did a remarkably fine job and I would hate to put them down or let them feel dismayed by the remark which is often heard around this House, that a person's maiden speech is frequently the best speech they ever make. It would be hard to improve on the ones they made. A maiden speech is one that a person sometimes spends half their life preparing to give. I know as a fact that after I made mine I wondered where I had found those wonderful phrases which I had in that speech. I heard some of them the other day. They were very fine speeches indeed.

I should also like to pay tribute to Her Majesty who lent the throne speech a distinction and attractiveness that it had in no other respect except in its reading.

As a defence critic for the official opposition I do not get many opportunities to speak on defence, and I usually take advantage of the throne speech or the budget speech to set out the party's views about our defence forces. However, the speech given the other night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) appeared to be a budget speech in every regard except that it did not allow six days' debate. In every other regard it was a budget speech. He was aware of the fact that there should be six days of debate. Therefore he sneaked it into the middle of the throne speech.

● (1522)

Canada is unfortunate in that the government assumes no responsibility for reporting to the House or for reporting to Canadian people in regard to what it is doing with taxpayers' moneys, and its future plans. This is particularly the case in regard to the Department of National Defence. I can hardly recall the last speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) on defence. It has been at the instigation of the opposition that there have been debates or major speeches relating to defence. There was one exception to that, and that is when the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) made a statement on motions concerning the long-range patrol aircraft. That led to a lively afternoon of debate. Unfortunately this is the way it is in the Parliament of Canada governed by Trudeau liberals.

If the government is unwilling to explain what it is doing and what it proposes to do in these areas, then it is up to the opposition to force the government to explain itself. That is why I am taking this opportunity to talk about defence. The cornerstones of Canada's defence are alliances. Canada is not very large, and there is already one Switzerland in the world. Therefore, we must have alliances or we cannot maintain neutrality. Even the New Democratic Party would agree that any country in this world today either needs to be well armed or it needs to have alliances. We are fortunate in our alliances.

I miss the NDP defence critic who was in the last parliament. He was defeated, but he seemed to have an interest in defence. At the present time that party has alternating critics who show up at defence committee meetings. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) thinks we should withdraw from NORAD. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) thinks we should withdraw from NATO. The hon. member who most often shows up thinks we should withdraw from everything. Given that type of input from a political party, they are not normally missed. The NDP party has no interest in defence, but its former critic kept the party honest; I would like to see them appoint someone permanently as their defence critic soon.

Our alliances are in relatively good shape, although NATO has a considerable amount of difficulty in regard to the standardization of equipment.

At this point I should like to return to the Minister of National Defence who has recently completed a trip to Norway. I would have liked to have seen an official press release from the minister's office on this subject, however, all we seem to receive from the minister's office on these trips is trivia. There was one exception to that in regard to the Norway trip. I understand the minister commented upon the difficulty of fulfilling the role of the ace force in Norway. Norway is unwilling to allow the basing or prepositioning of troops on her soil in peacetime. The Minister of National Defence has finally discovered this situation and realizes now that it is unlikely Canada would be able to land a force there and supply a force with any expectation of overcoming any opposition whatsoever.

At first the minister thought we might be letting our troops in for another Hong Kong experience; but I expect the bureaucrats, who make so much of the defence policy for Canada, convinced him that that was not the party line and he agreed with this rather foolish setup which is in existence at the present time. This forced the minister into another step, and that was asking Norwegians for naval assistance in order for us to get equipment over to our forces which, in the outbreak of war, would be marooned in Norway. Why do we not have our own ships to take our supplies, if that ever comes about? The truth is that, under the Trudeau government, supplying ships for our navy was considered to be a waste of money. Since the days when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) first took office, there has not been a single keel laid down for a major Canadian vessel. We have had four vessels finished during his tenure, because he could not do anything to stop it. They have gone into service with the fleet.

It will be many, many years before the St. Laurent class of destroyer can be replaced. If the government started right now to move toward replacing the St. Laurent class of ship, that ship will be 28 years of age when replaced. It is a miracle to the world that a Canadian vessel could last for 28 years in service. I recall someone saying that that class must have been a good class. We need a replacement for the St. Laurent class, but not as badly as the government needs a replacement of the St. Laurent class of Liberal politicians that we used to have.

I should like to refer to modern weapons. It is unfortunate we hear nothing about them from the Department of National Defence. The Minister referred to one such weapon yesterday as an enhanced radiation warhead and not a neutron bomb. One would expect an advertising agency to come out with the notion that increasing the radiation of a warhead enhances it somehow or other. Yesterday the minister waxed quite lyrical about the fact that it was a beautiful, enhanced radiation warhead! Combined with the cruise missile it is a weapon similar to the B-1s of World War II. It is very cheap, flies at a high speed, and with terrain guidance systems it would be almost impossible to shoot down or to knock down in any way. It can come in under radar, and our allies in western Europe are keen to have it.

If the neutron bomb is put on a cruise missile, one can understand what would happen. The cruise missile would fly under the radar and drop the neutron bomb, with its enhanced radiation warhead. This bomb can destroy people without tanks and within houses. It kills people, and it does not kill them in a very clean method. It is not a weapon we are particularly fond of, and the biggest danger about the neutron bomb is that it will lower the nuclear threshhold in western Europe. Perhaps some featherheaded person, or a person who might not keep cool under stress, might not consider the fact that the weapon he is using is a nuclear weapon. If he attempted to use such a warhead, that might inadvertently start a nuclear war. That is what I meant by lowering the nuclear threshhold.

Our allies in western Europe have asked the United States not to bargain away the cruise missile as part of the plan to get a Russian agreement as to the limitation of arms.

As has been well publicized, we have rented some tanks from the Germans. This will increase the fire power, the credibility and the mobility of our troops which were withdrawn from the central front in Europe and put into the reserves several years ago. I would appreciate a statement from the minister in the near future as to whether we are likely to move our brigade forward again now that we have some modern tanks.

● (1532)

At this time I would like to say something about the bad habit which the minister and the department have of making their very best case for the present situation at every opportunity. I attended a meeting of NATO parliamentarians recently and found, as I read over the general report on the security of the alliance, a section where Canada was mentioned in rather glowing terms. I knew that NATO would be pleased that the Liberals have adopted the Conservative suggestion concerning the re-equipment of our forces for which we have been plugging for so long, and have started to plan the re-equipping, but they tend to spoil it for me when they use puffery to express what is supposed to be a factual statement. I found the following statement in the general report of the alliance concerning Canada. It says:

The decision has been taken to re-equip the Canadian forces with 128 German Leopard C-1 main battle tanks. By mid 1979, the armoured strength of the Canadian Forces in Europe will have been increased from two tank squadrons to three with a total of 57 gun tanks and 8 specialist tanks.

That sounds pretty simple. It sounds as if we are going to put in 128 tanks and that we will increase our forces from two squadrons to three. That is what it says. I went to see the person who wrote this and said to him, "Thank you very much for your kind remarks about Canada. It was very heart warming to read them. Who wrote this?" He said, "Well, as a matter of fact, it was your Department of National Defence". So I started looking for the fine print. I had not realized that they would tell them that we would re-equip the Canadian forces with 128 German Leopard tanks when what we are talking about is tanks for both NATO and Canada. The three squadrons that they talk about will not be three squadrons in Germany, despite the fact that the statement says that the Canadian Forces in Europe will have been increased from two tank squadrons to three. They will have the reserve tanks for an extra squadron put into Germany and left there.

The truth of the matter was explained by General Dextraze, the recent chief of defence staff, on January 13, 1977, when he spoke at the Conference of Defence Associations. He said:

... A third squadron of tanks and a fourth battery of M109's will be located in Europe. Personnel to man these will come from Canada annually, for certain training exercises and in time of emergency as part of the Canadian Forces Europe augmentation plan.

The current thinking in NATO is that there will be no augmentation, that the only likely enemy there, the Warsaw Pact countries, are not likely to have a build-up before they move and we will have no time for augmentation at all. That is the modern thinking about it. Canadians are trying to con them, as this government does so often, that they will put more over there than in fact will be the case.

I should like to talk for a few minutes about standardization and the desperate feeling that many of us who have the interest of NATO at heart have about standardization. I knew well a general who was placed in charge of standardization in Brussels. He said it was the most discouraging job he had during his entire service, to try to make effective the standardization plans for NATO.

A startling example of this was last summer when the Germans and the Americans decided that they would standardize their main battle tanks and they would have a competition to decide which tank was the better tank, following which both countries would accept that tank. The Germans put up their Leopard II, the one that the government did not seem to realize was going to be produced when they ordered the obsolescent Leopard I. The Leopard II was sent to the United States for the competition and, according to most neutral observers, it emerged as the superior tank. All of a sudden what was thought to be an iron clad agreement became loose and we heard about a compromise solution. They would take the Leopard II tank and the American gas turbine motor, which appeared to be a very good motor.

Things went on a little farther, and finally the word came out, I think it was in August, that the entire deal was off. The Americans were going to build their tank, the Germans were going to build their tank, and they would not have the same gun, the same motor, the same armour, or anything that was the same. What this means to a country that is out shopping for equipment, as Canada is, is a disaster. If we buy the German, which we are going to do—and unfortunately we are buying the one which will be replaced by the Leopard II some three or four years from now—we will be limited to working in that sector of Europe where maintenance is possible for Leopard tanks. It will not be in the American sector, it will have to be near the Germans or near the other nations which are buying the German tank as their main battle tank.

We are trying to rush through our speeches today to make room for others. I have a great deal more that I would like to say, and there are some things that I simply must review in general. We will soon be buying new fighter aircraft. The argument is just starting. The Canadian government has asked for applications from six different firms. I would only submit that I hope they have kept their options open to the possibility of buying two different types of aircraft. Our roles demand it. One is for aircraft to support NORAD, which is totally different than the other to support our ground support role in Germany, which the F-104 is doing at present.

If we end up with a single aircraft, we will have to apply to NATO to have the role of our airforce in Germany changed, because certainly an aircraft that would be able to carry out the NORAD role in North America could not begin to carry out our support role in Germany. That, unfortunately, is what we did with the F-104. It is a 1,500 mile an hour fighter that we put into a 600 mile an hour job. Having an F-104 in a support role is not cost effective, but that is what happens if you do not know what you are doing when you start out to buy aircraft. I hope that with regard to this aircraft the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce will not have everything to say about it. I know that offset work is important to Canadian industry.

Something that is very important to Canadians is that there be a good component of defence requirement in the fighter plane that is eventually chosen. We ended up with the F-5 because the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce wanted it, not the forces. We do not want that to happen again. I will only say one other thing about fighter aircraft. I am baffled how we managed to get the French to try to get our contracts when the know how much we want offset work. I have never heard Dussault or any other French company from France offering anyone offset work on fighter aircraft, and I would be amazed if they offered it here.

I would like to run over quickly what will happen with our equipment under this minister, who I think was rather lucky when he came here after the hon. member for Winnipeg South had managed to get the increased equipment budget. The new minister came along to spend it.

We will have the first long range patrol aircraft, about which there was a great deal of dispute a year ago, in May of 1980. The Leopard II tank is the first piece of new equipment to come as of July, 1978, a year from now. The new fighter aircraft will come in 1981, four years from now, and while we may want 125 to 150 of those, we will get ten or 15 a year. The program is to run for ten long years, so the airforce should not think they will be flying new aircraft early in the 1980's because the last ones will be arriving only in the 1990's. As for ships, we have a press leak from the minister's office which mentions 1985, but I am rather skeptical that we will have any by that time.

I will only say to our friends in the services that I am glad that we are moving in the right direction and that re-equipment has started, but this government has left us so far behind before it made a move that, despite the fact that two years ago it started to re-equip the forces, the only evidence of it in the hands of the troops in the major equipments of tanks, ships and planes, is that we have 35 tanks, rented from the Germans.

● (1542)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the past few days we have been speaking about changing circumstances in Canada, changes in the economy and changes in the lifestyles and attitudes of Canadians.

We have talked about the need for a new spirit among Canadians in order to reach a shared appreciation of our current problems and to reach a shared agreement on how these problems should be attacked. We need this co-operative spirit to deal with national unity. We need it to deal with unemployment. We need it in connection with crime and social problems. We need it to manage our energy resources and to make the best use of our food and agriculture resources.

I believe this is a crucial time for Canada's food industry. The past 32 years since the end of the Second World War have brought great changes to every sector. With the changes in the food and agricultural industry have come uncertainties. Consumers wonder what will happen to food prices next year. They wonder about nutrition and food additives. Food processors and retailers wonder about what will happen to their labour costs, what new technologies they will have to adapt to, and whether Canadian eating habits will change appreciably. Farmers wonder whether land prices will continue to rise and whether the prices for their commodities will justify paying more for farmland and for farm inputs.

Everyone wants to know what direction further changes in the food industry will take. But I believe we must take another approach to this uncertainty and concern. We must ask ourselves not only what direction developments in the food and agricultural industry will take, but also what direction we want them to take. We need to shape our agricultural policies with a clear idea of the potential of the industry and how that potential should be employed.

It is this approach that the government is taking in developing a food strategy for Canada. We are not saying that our current policies are not doing a good job. We are saying that we need a longer term plan for the food and agricultural industry. In making this plan we are asking for co-operation from everyone involved. The government has taken the lead in setting out the basic principles of the strategy. We are undertaking discussions among the federal departments and provincial departments and agencies to find ways to improve our services to producers and consumers and to build a stronger food industry.

In addition, as I announced last week, we have invited a number of major organizations within the industry to submit briefs on their responses to the white paper, "A Food Strategy for Canada". National organizations representing farmers, fishermen, processors, distributors, retailers and consumers will be presenting their opinions in December to a panel of ministers, including myself, who are working on the food strategy. We are looking forward to a frank public discussion with these organizations. While time and space have limited the number of groups invited to the December meeting, we are inviting all groups in the industry to make submissions. The government will consider the additional submissions at the National Food Conference which we will be holding next February.

Last week I announced some majors changes in the organization of my department. These were not changes just for the sake of change. It is a new look for the Department of Agriculture. It is also a new feeling about how the department can best do its job and how it can efficiently serve the total food industry, from the farmer's field to the consumer's dinner table.

All the attention which has been directed toward me as a farmer advocate, and all the department's work to assist the farmer seem to have blocked out in many people's minds the fact that the Department of Agriculture works for the consumer too. All the unheralded work we do with grading, inspection, food research, consumer advice on nutrition and so on, serves the general public. Our efforts to stabilize farm income and provide new technology in improved farm management benefits the consumer, and much more than he realizes.

As I said earlier in this House today, the research people in the Department of Agriculture and the farmers of Canada are the envy of the world. We farm in the northern hemisphere, and no other country in the northern hemisphere is as productive per man. We export much of our produce on the world market. In cereal grains alone we produce enough for our 24 million population and our livestock industry, which in turn in dollar volume is greater than the grain industry. We export enough for another 80 million people. No other country in the world exports such a high percentage of its production of cereal grains, which is close to 74 per cent.

On the subject of reorganization, hon. members will recall that the Speech from the Throne promised that the views of producers, consumers and processors will be adequately represented on marketing boards and agencies so that they can operate more efficiently. In this regard I will be making an announcement in the near future concerning changes in the make-up of the National Farm Products Marketing Council. These changes will be in harmony with the commitment of the government to ensure fair and equitable representation of all viewpoints in the supervision of national marketing boards.

Some of the changes which have been made have made farmers more efficient, but they have also left them more vulnerable to forces beyond their control. That is why farmers are concerned about the instability of prices. Farmers are not the only ones who suffer as a result of instability in agriculture. What about processors? What happens in the meat packing industry when the number of hogs coming to market drops by 20 per cent in one year? The instability of farmers' incomes is also quickly transmitted to those Canadians who supply farmers with building materials, machinery, fertilizer, and a long list of other goods and services. This is what has happened in the hog industry in Canada. Because there have been no government programs, farmers decided over a period of a year and a half or so that they should discontinue producing hogs. This year we will not be self-sufficient in hogs.

Mr. Mazankowski: Shame!

Mr. Whelan: We will be a net importer of pork this year. Some people would say that that is because of marketing boards, but the province from which the hon. member who is yelling "shame" comes has no marketing board and no supply management, and that province has decreased production. That decision was made in that province. We know what happens when that takes place. We know that packing plants close down and jobs are lost. However, that is the decision the farmers themselves made. For the last nine years farmers have made money out of pork production in Canada. There has never been a year in which they have not showed profit.

They made a decision which caused the closing down of packing plants, and we are now importing pork from the United States. We are still fulfilling our export orders and the commitments we have made to such countries as Japan. The producers signed contracts. They knew what they were going to get.

The hon. member who is making comments would be interested to know what Mr. Child, the manager of Burns, said yesterday in Montreal and what he said a week ago in Edmonton. He said that pork producers in the province of Alberta should look to the dairy producers in that province. Modern plants have been kept up to snuff, and dairy producers are getting a proper return. Mr. Child concluded by saying that they have a supply management system in the fluid milk industry in the province of Alberta which is superior to anything in the hog industry. All the plants are flourishing and are as modern as can be. They are going full speed ahead, but in the pork industry packing plants have closed down, and not because of anything the government has done. The consumer has been affected by this. Fluctuations in bacon prices have taken place. Packing plants have not been modernized, but the opposite has been the case in the dairy industry.

I think we must be realistic and recognize that, when prices are high, producers expand their operations and new farm enterprises start. In periods of lower farm incomes producers are forced to cut back or perhaps even to get out of the business. This movement of physical and human resources in and out of food production adds to the cost of producing food. Ultimately the consumer pays the higher cost. We must also consider the cost of unused capacity or adjustment which is needed at the food processing level.

The whole food and agricultural industry stands to gain from increased stability down on the farm. That is why stabilization has been a priority policy of this government. We have supported the concept of marketing boards. We have amended and updated the Agricultural Stabilization Act. Since the Agricultural Stabilization Act was revised in 1975, we have paid out $100 million to improve producer returns.

We have set up the western grain stabilization program. There is every indication of a substantial payment to western grain farmers this year under this program. Just last session we presented the Advance Payments for Crops Act which stabilizes returns on storable crops by helping farmers even out their marketings throughout the crop year. That is something new that farmers who produce cash crops in eastern Ontario have been able to take advantage of.

There is a long list of programs that support and stabilize the Canadian food and agricultural industry. The federal government spent more than $56 million last year on crop insurance. This year our contribution to crop insurance is expected to reach $75.5 million. Under the domestic feed grain program, we have set up a $14.5 million budget in Ontario for feed freight adjustment programs that encourage farmers to build permanent on-farm storage for grain and silage, and to instal grain handling and drying devices and feed preparation equipment. Ontario has signed that agreement. We are working with the province of Ontario and many farmers from Elgin County, for instance, have taken advantage of this program. At least 50 farmers in the community around that of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise) have taken advantage of this. He must have done a good advertising job of the wonderful program we have developed for farmers in the area.

We are working hard with the Quebec government which has been reluctant to sign this agreement. They have dilly-dallied. The Minister of Agriculture for Ontario signed it months ago, but Quebec is blaming us for not going ahead. We have been funding forage transportation assistance programs in co-operation with Ontario and Saskatchewan to help livestock producers who have suffered unusual crop losses because of bad weather.

Canadian farmers operate in the toughest climate in North America. We make the comparison with the United States so often and so easily, but I must tell you that other countries in the northern hemisphere come here to learn how we produce so much food in this northern, cold country called Canada. They know our extreme climatic conditions, yet none of them approach our productivity. Our programs have to be as good and in many cases better than those of our neighbour to the south. The United States enjoys an ideal climate for food production. An examination of the programs we have put in place shows we have provided superior programs when they were needed to give assurance of adequate supplies of wholesome food from farms that must contend with problems posed by our northerly climate.

The former secretary of agriculture of the United States was in Ottawa the day before yesterday. He withdrew a lot of programs, and now the present Secretary of Agriculture has been forced to put them back because of threats of strikes etc. by farmers as a result of their losses.

A United States team is in Canada at present studying our crop insurance program because United States farmers do not enjoy the kind of protection our farmers have. They do not have the tremendous Western Grain Stabilization Act that protects our farmers. As I said already, it appears there will be a substantial payment under that program. Through our Agricultural Stabilization Act we can cover any commodity as required, including grains grown outside the Canadian Wheat Board area and livestock across the country. The United States has no stabilization plan like this to cover livestock production and give the livestock producers the protection they need in world markets, and they are under tremendous pressure to introduce programs such as we have in this country.

The federal dairy policy recognizes the challenge faced by dairy farmers through short summers and long winters. No other country in the world houses its dairy cattle as long as we must. We have overcome this problem through the application of science and such things as genetic breeding. We have some of the best dairy cattle in the world, and other countries come here to study our methods. Cattle are the best producers of highly nutritious food, particularly the Holstein cattle in Canada. Let no one say that any dairy policy, provincial or federal, has caused inefficiency in the dairy industry.

The two-price wheat system in this country protects both consumers and producers in a way not found in the rest of North America or maybe even in the world. However, there is more to be done. Our first priority now is to reach an agreement with the provinces to harmonize all the stabilization programs for various commodities that are produced and marketed nationally.

The danger exists that some provincial stabilization programs may lead to production shifts against the comparative advantage of producing commodities in one area of the country over another. Recently the Minister of Agriculture for Brazil was here and he told me he was concerned that if one commodity goes down in price while he has made commitments to world markets and, as a result, producers switch to another crop on their own, he has to be able to stop such a switch.

In western Canada pork producers reduced production by 46 per cent on their own. They were still making money, but it was easier to sell grain than to take care of hogs. I realize that, but it does not help the packing industry or employment in different parts of the country. It does not help our balance of trade either to spend more money outside the country for pork than ever before. We have to import pork because we are not self-sufficient.

I have no problem with eggs, Mr. Speaker, and I have no problem with dairy products or anything else. Bankers tell me they have no problems with producers in those organizations either, whether provincial or federal. We have done a better job than any other country in the world. In turn this may lead to unproductive competition among provinces.

We must have harmonization of the stabilization programs. There may be restrictions on agricultural products moving within Canada, and difficulties in international trade if some price support levels are judged unfair by our trading partners. As I said earlier today, we must remember that we are one of the largest exporters of cereal grain in proportion to our production. On average, 74 per cent of it goes to world markets. No other country exports such a high percentage of production.

I do not expect an overnight success in reaching harmony among provincial and federal stabilization programs. We have had long discussions on the subject at our federal-provincial meetings in the last two years, without reaching agreement. However, the provincial agricultural ministers are as concerned as I am about the problem, and as anxious as I am to find a solution.

In fact stabilization will be high on the agenda at federal-provincial agricultural talks being held in Ottawa tomorrow and Friday. I can report to the House that Agriculture Canada will be going into these meetings with some new thoughts for a workable compromise.

One of the reasons I am confident we will be more successful in our discussions at this time is that we will not be talking about stabilization in isolation from other problems. Harmonization of stabilization is just one aspect of agricultural development. We will be discussing all our agricultural development programs with the provincial authorities in the months ahead.

In the Speech from the Throne the government stated its intention to work out a more co-ordinated approach to agricultural development. Agricultural development is a cornerstone of the over-all food strategy. My department will be taking the lead in building the new agricultural development strategy. I would like at this time to outline more fully for the members of the House what we will be doing about it.

First, though, I want to dispel the idea that agricultural development is something that affects only farmers. It is a vital matter for each and every Canadian. The strength of the food and agricultural industry affects employment. One in every four Canadian workers owes his employment to the food chain—whether in production, processing, transporting food, retailing, or in industries that supply machinery, energy and other inputs for the food industry. Agricultural development also affects food prices, food quality, and the security and dependability of our food supplies. It affects our international commitments and moral responsibility to supply food aid to areas of the globe less fortunate than ourselves. The decisions we make about the future directions for our food and agricultural industry will also affect the quality of life in Canada, particularly the sort of life people will lead in our rural areas.

The aim of the government in establishing a strategy for agricultural development is to tap the full potential of the food industry to contribute to the growing Canadian economy. How can we reach this goal?

To begin with, we must set specific objectives. Then we must co-ordinate our efforts to achieve these ends. This means consultation among all the federal departments that have programs to encourage agricultural development. Agriculture Canada will be taking the lead in this consultation process. We will be evaluating all the current development programs. In co-operation with the other federal departments involved, particularly the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, we will assess the impact of current policies on agricultural development. We will see if we need to make changes in these programs and their funding.

Agriculture Canada will then take the lead in meeting with provincial officials to get their response to the federal government's agricultural development goals, and to discuss what separate and joint programs can achieve the best results. Other departments currently negotiating aspects of agricultural development with the provinces will either be turning over these negotiations to Agriculture Canada or involving the agriculture department in joint negotiations or accepting Agriculture Canada's co-ordination input.

One of the most important aspects of the agricultural development strategy is that it will be an approach team with various federal and provincial departments co-operating on development programs. Producer, consumer and industry organizations will also be on the team and will have an important input into these programs. As Minister of Agriculture, I accept my responsibility to be leader of that team.

I have said that our over-all objective in agricultural development is to assist agriculture in realizing its full market potential. Perhaps I should elaborate a little on this theme. There are eight specific objectives we want to achieve.

First, we will aim for increased production efficiency in the Canadian agricultural industry. As you know, Canadian farmers are among the most efficient in the world today. But, we have room for improvement. We could make significant gains in production efficiency if we could increase the rate at which proven technology and management practices were made known to farmers. We may need an on-farm demonstration program to show farmers new equipment and techniques at work. Or perhaps we need some direct assistance to farmers for adopting proven managerial and technical methods in agriculture.

A second objective is to maximize the contribution of agriculture to the Canadian economy by ensuring that our resources are devoted to the commodities with the best market potential. I have always been honest with farmers. I am going to tell them if they should be shifting from one commodity to another. I want to give full information to others in the industry as well, agribusiness and extension workers, for instance, so that they can play a part in helping the industry make necessary adjustments.

Our third objective is to help low income farm families to make a better living in agriculture. Improving farmer efficiency and using agricultural resources to produce the right commodities will no doubt help low income farmers. However, this group has some special problems and we need to make a special effort to overcome them. Maybe the answers will include special training programs, or a program to intensify production on these farms without expanding the land base, or efforts to include part-time farmers in programs that now exclude producers who also work off the farm.

A fourth point we must consider is the conservation and improvement of national agricultural resources. We are already working on a national land-use policy as part of the food strategy development. And we already have programs under PFRA and ARDA to encourage soil and water conservation, drainage improvement, and community resources such as community pastures. But, obviously, these programs can be reviewed and strengthened.

Along with increased efficiency at the farm level, we need increased efficiency in the marketing system. Much is possible in this area. Let me give just a few examples of recent actions by the federal government to improve marketing efficiency. In the area of markets information, Agriculture Canada has evaluated all of its current services and is changing them in response to ideas from users in the industry.

Among the changes introduced, we are offering, starting November 1, a free phone-in national livestock market report, updated daily. Farmers and others in the industry can get this report by calling a Zenith number. Our recently announced program for storage assistance for feed grains in feed grain deficient areas is another example of a service to improve marketing efficiency. Improvements in marketing efficiency will also include initiatives for improvements in the processing, distribution, and retail sectors.

Our sixth specific goal is to protect farmers against income instability and the natural hazards faced in agricultural production. I have already talked about our stabilization policies. However, we must also consider the results of instability on world markets. I think immediately of the beef industry and the beef trade problems we have had to grapple with in the past two years. At the present time, I believe we have the beef trade situation in hand. However, if warranted, we may consider legislation to set up a national meat authority with powers to control exports and imports.

If necessary, I have been authorized by the government to look at the possibility of the passing of a Meat Authority Act, provided I could be assured of the very close collaboration of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: You said you wanted it. There is the challenge for you to accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The horticultural industry is another sector greatly affected by prices and production levels outside Canada. We are studying the whole horticultural sector with a view to improving tariff protection and other assistance that may be necessary to build viable domestic fruit and vegetable industries. Not every fruit and vegetable crop can be produced profitably in Canada in the long run, but we are looking at which ones deserve protection and assistance to reach their potential. This is our seventh specific objective, to provide longer term protection against foreign competition for selected commodities.

The eighth specific objective is to improve access to foreign markets for Canadian agricultural commodities. We can produce more food in this country than we can consume. But we need to be sure of international markets before we produce food products in excess of our domestic requirements. Agriculture Canada, as well as Industry, Trade and Commerce, will be looking at possible new initiatives to promote our agricultural products abroad. The current round of multilateral trade negotiations provides us with the opportunity to improve our over-all access to a number of foreign markets. We have consulted with the various sectors of the food and agricultural industry in developing our negotiating position. Those consultations are still going on.

In working to meet all these objectives, we must keep in mind the significant differences among the various agricultural regions of Canada. They differ both in potential and in problems and we must accommodate regional objectives along with these national ones, as much as possible.

The federal-provincial co-operation on agricultural development and harmonizing stabilization programs will have a considerable impact on national unity. I am confident we will be able to reduce friction between provinces on the stabilization issue. Our new agricultural development strategy will be forged in the interests of the whole nation without overlooking regional problems.

Our efforts to define further the agricultural development strategy will follow the same co-operative process being used to create a total food strategy, that is, the federal government is counting on participation and input from farm organizations, consumer groups, food retailers, the processing and distributing industry and all others involved in the food chain. In addition, the provinces will have a large role in determining the shape of agricultural development programs for the future.

Mr. Hurlburt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if he would permit a question. In the mini-budget of Thursday, October 20—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Will the minister accept a question?

Mr. Whelan: I am practically finished, Mr. Speaker. I will end by saying when I compare programs that we have for agriculture today, I compare the health of the producers within those programs that we have worked so successfully with the provinces to provide. When I compare them with programs which they either do not have in the United States or which they did have at one time which compared slightly with the ones we have at the present time, I find our programs supersede theirs. I do not have the tremendous worry for those producers within those organizations as I do for those outside of an organization, whether it be federal or provincial. These programs work for the security that agricultural producers need, that kind of production program we need to keep them the most productive people in all of Canada.

Our producers are protected. The loan institutions know that those farmers who are borrowing money have a program with marketing boards or marketing associations, call them what you will, which provide some kind of security. The program we have now for advanced payments of storable crops provides some kind of guarantee. It supersedes any in the world.

Our dairy farmers are better off than any in the world. Our poultry producers are better off than any in the world, as are our egg producers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whelan: The farming industry is not in that bad a shape. I am not saying it is in as good a shape as I would like it to be, but I challenge members opposite to name any other nation that provides more security for farmers than we in Canada through the Canadian government and the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister's time has almost expired. I am ready to allow a question if the minister is ready to accept it.

Mr. Whelan: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is this. In the mini-budget of Thursday, October 20, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said as reported at page 99 of Hansard, and I quote:

—the government does not believe in excessive intervention in the market place.

I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) why he and two Senators keep crossing this country promoting marketing boards and supply management, which is completely against the free enterprise system?

● (1612)

Mr. Whelan: I never said I agree with those people in the other place. They have submitted a report. But I just want the hon. member to go and talk to his provincial minister of agriculture, who is quoted in one of the noteworthy newspapers in this nation as saying he agrees with that report. I am talking about what the provincial minister of agriculture in Alberta has said. He agrees with those Senators. I am not saying I do, because there are many things in that report which would involve us in being asked for compensation by our trading partners in GATT, from our trading partners in Australia and New Zealand, and so on.

If we think we can isolate ourselves even in the North American market for beef, we are just kidding ourselves. The United States is dealing with more than 20 other countries in connection with beef and you are not going to be excepted from that kind of a trading program; you will be involved in a world trading program. So there is nothing we can do in this country, there is nothing this minister will do with any marketing board, which will protect inefficient farmers. Anyone who makes such a charge is not being factual and is on the verge of dishonesty when he says that this minister or this government is pushing any kind of program which will protect an inefficient operation to take place in this nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I see that members are getting up to raise points of order or to ask questions. If the intention is to ask questions, I would point out that the time allotted to the minister has now expired, so he could continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Joliette would like to ask a question and he can do so only with the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there consent to allow members to ask questions of the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No!

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to take up the time of the House, but I listened carefully to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). He made a speech which will once again create much hope, but anyhow I do not question his statements. First I would like to know whether there have been butter imports since January last. If not, will there be some from now until April next? Second, on behalf of fluid milk producers—and if I have to implore the minister I will do so—can he tell us today when he will be sending the subsidy cheques to producers who are now experiencing problems of which the minister is aware?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member has made some accusations and asked some questions. If the House wants to give me half an hour I am perfectly willing to answer him. The dairy question alone is a complex one. He intimated to the House, and probably to the viewing audience, that we are withholding subsidies from all the industrial milk producers of Canada. We are not doing that. The industrial milk producers are getting their full subsidy. But we have asked the provincial producers of fluid milk to contribute $12.5 million across this nation from Victoria through to Halifax, and some of the provincial milk marketing boards have agreed; in some cases legislation has been passed enabling this contribution to be made to the skim-off. We do not at the present time intend to abandon the position we have taken. We think it is something that can be legitimately asked.

We think that those who are taking fat off whole milk and putting the skimmed milk and 2 per cent milk on the market are contributing to the surplus industrial milk situation. The fluid milk producers are benefiting from dairy milk policy to the tune of $281 million a year. If they had to deal strictly on the basis of world prices for dairy products, that is how much it would cost the fluid milk producers in Canada for a program of that kind.

The hon. member has been complimentary about the program I announced today—the forward-looking approach I have taken toward agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: He is concerned about the importation of butter. We have announced exchange of a butterfat program. I hope the hon. member realizes that if we can sell on world markets condensed milk, for example, we would have no butterfat problem, no skim milk problem; we would be exporting the whole product. In return for that we have agreed with some of our trading partners to import butter if necessary. That would be of greater benefit to the dairy producers and more beneficial to the treasury of the country as well. It would be of greater benefit to the dairy producers because they would then have to spend less of their income for export subsidies on skim milk powder. For every pound of butter you make, you make double the amount of skim milk powder.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wish to be fair, but I see many members indicating they want to ask questions. There is only an hour and a half left and at least ten or 12 members were wanting to speak this afternoon. I do not see how we can meet the schedule. I think maybe I should allow only one more short question and short answer, if there is consent.

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There does not appear to be consent to continue. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Mr. Flynn: Mr. Speaker, when you asked for unanimous consent just now I distinctly heard two members say no and refuse unanimous consent for more questioning of the minister. I think you should ask the question again, Your Honour, to see if there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, I must say that any hon. member who is not satisfied with what the Chair has heard can always stand up and raise a point of order and notify the Chair accordingly. Nobody stood up, and I therefore concluded there was no question being raised. The matter has now been settled, and I am recognizing the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for their participation in the debate. I, along with many Canadians, felt deeply honoured by the presence of Her Majesty as she participated in the proceedings at the opening of this session of parliament.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to a fairy tale which probably many of us learned about in our younger days. It is a Hans Christian Andersen fairy tale entitled "The Emperor's New Clothes." The story goes something like this.

The emperor loved clothes and spent very little time on matters of state. One day two cheats or charlatans came to the castle and told him they were weavers of the very finest cloth. They asked him if they could weave some cloth for him. He gladly consented.

This went on for some time, and as the days approached when the cloth was to be completed, the emperor sent one of his most trusted ministers to check on the progress of the operation. When the trusted minister got there he looked at the loom, and on it saw nothing. But the two charlatans pointed out the wonderful imaginary pattern in the wonderful cloth that they were weaving. The minister, very concerned about the wrath of the emperor, decided to go back to the emperor and tell him the story the two charlatans had told him.

This went on for some time, Mr. Speaker, until one day the emperor came to look at the cloth that was being woven and he, too, was conned by the very same story his minister had been told.

● (1622)

To put the fairy tale in perspective, the day came when the emperor came to the weavers to put on his new suit of clothes. He took off his clothes and put on his imaginary new clothes. Then, having said there was going to be a great procession through the town, he walked through the town and the courtiers hung on to the imaginary train, until they passed a small child.

The small child, unlike the adults who were looking at the emperor and exulting about his wonderful clothes, simply said, "The emperor has no clothes". And the people said, "Listen to the innocent. The innocent says the emperor has no clothes; indeed, the emperor is naked".

That story, though fairy tale, launches us into the very type of situation in which we Canadians find ourselves today. The throne speech, to many Canadians, was to be the cloth whereby we were going to get a new dimension, a new hope for the future. We find the emperor, who has been the so-called Prime Minister of this country for the last nine years, following the throne speech, and again following his participation in this debate, is devoid of new ideas. Indeed, the emperor is naked, naked of any direction, and naked of any future hope for Canadians. Surely the Speech from the Throne should be a thrust. It is an opportunity for the government to show Canadians that it is capable of leading. Unfortunately, the Speech from the Throne was devoid of credibility. It gave no hope to Canadians. Much more, Mr. Speaker, once again it placed a wedge between Canadians and those who are to govern, showing there is no trust in the government of the day.

What is the record, Mr. Speaker? In 1968 Canada was united. The euphoria of Expo and of the related Centennial activities was such that it bound Canadians together. Today, whether one assesses our economy or our future as a country, the government gives little cause for hope. Is there any hope for the one million unemployed in Canada? At the present time our unemployment rate is running at approximately 8.3 per cent. Statistics can be very cold; one million unemployed is bad enough, but even more important, when we look at Canadian workers under the age of 25 we find that their unemployment rate is double that of the Canadian average.

It cannot be said any better, Mr. Speaker, than in the words of the Speech from the Throne. This extract is to be found at page 2 of Hansard:

> The human hardship imposed by the current level of unemployment in Canada is deeply disturbing. It is neither just nor tolerable that in this country there should be so many men and women deprived of the dignity of self-supporting work, unable to meet their financial commitments and plan confidently for the future. It is intolerable that so many are deprived of their right to secure and productive lives and that their families bear an unfair burden of worry, uncertainty, and deprivation. On a national scale, unemployment now constitutes a very serious obstacle to economic growth.

By their very words, Mr. Speaker, the government stands indicted. The evidence is one million unemployed. Every member of this House knows that, as the winter months come and go, this unemployment rate will increase. What is the government's response? The only response it has given is another make-work project, another $150 million of largesse. That $150 million comes from where, Mr. Speaker? It comes from the taxpayers of Canada. This is but a short-term solution.

We need a better manpower strategy, Mr. Speaker, one which will create an economic climate which is conducive to steady growth. We need to create approximately half a million jobs per year, and this projection is valid until approximately the mid-1980's. At the present time we are creating only about one half of the needed jobs. We will never create those jobs, we will never create that climate, by shor term make-work projects. What is needed is a manpower and industrial strategy whereby the private sector is encouraged and in fact given incentives—not handouts, because that is welfare of another kind—so it will not see everything which it produces taxed away.

I want to get to this point a little later, Mr. Speaker, but I believe that today we have stepped over the boundary of fair taxation and reached the position of confiscation. That is the situation in which we, as Canadians, find ourselves today. We are confiscating much of that which belongs to individual Canadians; it is taken by government and redistributed in a very unequal and unfair manner.

As a western Canadian, Mr. Speaker, I ask for how many years have we argued, begged, and pleaded with the government to bring forward an industrial strategy whereby we will be able more equitably to develop our own agricultural products and commodities? Where is the industrial strategy? Instead, Mr. Speaker, we had the Calgary Conference on Western Economic Opportunities. Western aspirations are no closer to reality today under this government than they were at the time that conference was held in 1973. We need to create jobs, Mr. Speaker, permanent jobs, not government handout jobs. But this government is not going to provide those jobs.

As for productivity, all Canadians who have studied this question know that our standard of living is largely dependent on the fact that we are an exporting nation. Seventy per cent of our trade, both imports and exports, is still with our neighbour to the south, this despite the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has attempted to erode the confidence in and the good relationship that we have had with our neighbour to the south. Our cost of manufacturing is from 20 per cent to 25 per cent higher than it is in the United States. Added to this, the United States has other advantages, such as a more southerly latitude and economy of scale with a population ten times that of ours. So at the best of times it is difficult to penetrate that market. As a result we have lost jobs. Why are we not competitive, Mr. Speaker? It is because we have created an environment of high production costs, whether one talks about wages or whether one talks about taxes.

Another factor which is becoming more and more apparent at this time is that the regulatory agencies, both federal and provincial, are constantly encroaching upon the private sector and adding to those costs. The only way we can finance trade at the present time is by the export in raw form of our agricultural products and very often of our national resource commodities. When the world market goes soft, as we keep hearing is the case today, we lose our competitive advantage.

The world recognizes, Mr. Speaker, that we are in great difficulty. There was an article in the Globe and Mail of September 28, 1977, simply entitled "Japan shocks Davis"—that is Premier Davis—"with a stern rebuke over strikes, taxes". The article went on to refer to our labour force, and then had this to say:

> The Japanese business leaders cited higher corporate income taxes in Canada as the second most important reason why Japan looks to the United States.

Lack of productivity has also resulted in lack of investor confidence. Where is investment confidence today? Why is it that Canadians do not want to invest in their own country but rather look to the United States as a better place for their capital? Why is there a flight of capital? I say it is largely due to the lack of economic leadership on the part of this government and successive finance ministers.

In the 1960's, Mr. Speaker, we heard it said more and more that profits were too high. In fact we often hear it said that the word "profits" is a dirty word. One simple fact in our economy is that profits create jobs. Again no leadership has been given by this government in creating that type of climate. The government's response has been to change its minister of finance. Again I say that the emperor who is to lead has been found naked, devoid of leadership.

As for inflation, Mr. Speaker, granted inflation is a factor in every economy of the western industrial world, the fact of the matter is that inflation rates in Canada today are increasing despite controls. Other countries, including the United Kingdom along with their unemployment rate, have a lower rate than we have. Surely we have become the sick man of the international economic community; it is no longer Britain.

We all remember the Prime Minister saying in 1974, "Zap, you're frozen". To my mind, the reason why the anti-inflation regulations have been ineffective is that the government lacks credibility, because it said one thing in a campaign and then, when politically expedient to do so, said something else.

● (1632)

Governments must tell the truth. When they do not, it is the people who suffer and get a jaundiced and wrong view of governments. Therefore they say that all of us cannot be trusted. The biggest losers in this shell game have been the Canadian people.

What has been the result of this lack of leadership? What about the sliding dollar? It is not sliding any more, it has sunk below 90 cents. It has sunk to the 1932 level at the height of the depression. We must remember that the dollar is 90 cents as against a declining American dollar. It has come to the point where a cartoonist like Ben Wicks portrays two people walking down the street: one is about to pick up a piece of paper, and the other one says: "Frank, don't bother, it is only a Canadian dollar."

We are the laughing stock of the industrial community. As a result, because of our heavy international foreign borrowings, those borrowings are becoming more expensive every day.

The government has shown the greatest lack of leadership in government spending. I am referring to governments at all levels. At this time close to 43 cents out of every dollar, which is made in goods and services, is taken by the three levels of government. In order to put it in practical terms, it means that a Canadian worker earning $15,000 a year will pay direct and hidden taxes in the amount of $6,800. That is what it is like to be a Canadian today.

To put it another way: during January, February, March and to the middle of April, he or she will work in order to pay federal and provincial income taxes. He or she will continue working during the rest of April, all of May and half of June to pay the rest of his or her taxes. On June 15 or 16, finally he or she will be entitled to work for themselves. What has happened to incentive? The government is silently sitting by, hoping it will go away like a bad dream or a bad headache.

I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is in the House today. I have respect for him, but he should be told that he has a big job to do. Unfortunately he does not have a Prime Minister or a cabinet who are willing to say the things that need to be said, and much more important, are not willing to follow the things that should be said. The Prime Minister is not willing to do this because he is an interventionist into the market place. He enjoys it, he wants it, and that is the direction in which he wants to point Canada. All he will do at this point in time, if it is not politically expedient for him to do it, is ease off. The minute it is possible for him to do it politically, he will do it once again.

We have repeatedly heard about the taxpayers, that it is the corporations which are paying the high taxes. The 1975 Canada Year Book indicates that 85 per cent of all working Canadians are individual or salaried earners. These people are the ones who have to pay the shot.

One might say, if we have a 43 per cent level of taxation, that hopefully the in-trust money is being spent well. Is it? What did the Auditor General say in his report? I should like to refer to the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1976, which reads in part as follows:

> The present state of the financial management and control systems of departments and agencies of the Government of Canada is significantly below the acceptable standards of quality and effectiveness.

Where does the government spend money? The government keeps on asking where we would cut back. In order to give this House an example of where I would cut back, I will refer to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press and was reprinted by the Winnipeg Chamber of Commerce. It received wide circulation during the recent Manitoba election. When asked the question: "Who is the largest spender in Canadian advertising dollars", one might say General Motors, Ford, or Proctor and Gamble. Elliott Research determined last year that Proctor and Gamble was No. 1. Who is No. 1 today? Today the government of Canada spends more money on advertising than any single corporation in Canada, without taking into consideration the spending of the Crown corporations. Is that restraint? If one were to add to that the spending in advertising by Air Canada, Canadian National Railways or CN Telecommunications, just to name three, what would be the advertising dollars then? A lot of these programs are compulsory.

I should like to refer back to that article and quote from it in part:

> It must come as a bit of shock to discover that the advertising cost of programs such as persuading Canadians that filling out income tax forms—already required by law—can be fun, or telling everyone, at a cost which exceeded that of energy saved, that Environment Canada is really an energy miser after all . . .

Today the Government of Canada consumes more money than does Simpsons-Sears, Bell Canada, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Dominion Stores, Nabisco, Pepsi-Cola, and the Royal Bank of Canada combined to sell their wares. One must remember that these firms are competing businesses. On the other hand, the Canadian Post Office, which has a monopoly, considers it necessary to spend $350,000 to improve its image, a task that would be more readily accomplished if the money were spent to improve service.

One can refer to the ministerial use of aircraft. That was brought forward once again in this session of parliament. The people of Canada will be conned no longer. They will not be bought by their own money. The evidence of that is what happened in Manitoba during the election last week. Prior to that election the campaign strategy was very simple. The campaign strategy of the Progressive Conservative party, which has now been sworn in as the government of Manitoba, was that we would run on a policy of restraint. For many people that was not a very popular move. They said that people must be given promises. We said that Canadian people, and specifically the people of Manitoba, were not willing to be conned; tell them the truth and they will respond.

Apparently the press did not believe us. On October 3, 1977, an article appeared in the Financial Times of Canada by Roger Newman. That article was entitled: "PCs Hopeful but Unlikely in Manitoba Vote". I should like to quote the last paragraph of that article, which reads as follows:

> If the vote was held today, most observers think Manitobans would elect a minority NDP government, with perhaps a weaker Tory contingent as the official opposition and the Liberals as a fairly strong third party. Since no dramatic issues are being debated, the parties could end up in something close to a three-way tie, with the result that a rematch might be necessary within a year.

What is that non-dramatic issue of which Mr. Newman speaks? It is that we said to Manitoba that spending must stop and taxation must be reduced. Also we said that there would be six taxes we would eliminate, one of which was succession duty.

I asked the Minister of Finance the other day whether he would follow the lead of the Manitoba government, whereby a farmer or an owner of a small family owned business would be able to transfer or sell, without the penalty of capital gains, to a close family member once during his lifetime. I am in agreement with that because it would enable the family to retain the family farm or business.

As I have said before, we have gone beyond the threshold of fair taxation to confiscation. This government is confiscating the rightful property of Canadian taxpayers. These family farms and businesses have been paid for; taxes have been paid on those farms and businesses, and yet the government wants capital gains. The government complains about youth leaving the farms and not carrying on with their fathers' businesses. The reason is very simple: confiscation.

We must return to living in a society with incentives. We live in a technological age, and we must adjust to that age. The Minister of Finance should reduce government spending on non-productive sectors such as advertising and direct more money into research and development.

● (1642)

Let us put research and development on a better footing in order that the technology with which we can develop can be used for the creation of new jobs in the technological age. My concern today is especially for the transportation industry and for energy.

Not only is the economic situation such that the emperor is naked, he is also devoid of any new ideas with respect to Canadian unity. We will never solve the question of Canadian unity so long as the regions feel they are outside the decision-making process in the country. That is what we feel in western Canada. I do not want to speak only as a western Canadian—I want to speak as a Canadian—but there are regions in Canada which feel they are being left out, and the government must wake up to it. There is a close link between the economic stength of the country and the desire of Canadians to remain within the country, and the unity question will have to be solved.

References have also been made in the House to the language law. Let me say clearly to all members here that, as a Manitoban, I do not apologize for what has been done in Manitoba because Manitoba has always had the reputation of being an ethnic province, and as ethnics and citizens of that province all we ask for is equality. We do not ask for a special status or for special rights. All we ask for is equality, and it is time that the government woke up to the fact and announced that all Canadians are equal and that there are not some who are more equal than others.

The same thing applies to a referendum or to any new organization on the constitutional level. We want no special deals, no special status for anyone or for any region of Canada. Unity will not be the product or the outgrowth solely of a change in the economic fortunes of Canada or of constitutional changes but, rather, as was said in the throne speech read by Her Majesty:

> This discontent in such a wealthy country must find its causes in the human spirit, and it is there also that the unity of the nation must be found.

If I were to condemn the government for anything—and I would not even refer to the economic situation which is bleak, and I have painted the picture to describe it, nor to Canadian unity which has been destroyed by the Prime Minister during his ten years in office—it would be for its lack of moral leadership, its lack in human spirit.

I want to quote from the speech given to the Canadian Club on October 17, by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. He said:

> The age of the social conscience, social justice and concern seems to have coincided with the age of crime, pornography, mugging and international terrorism. What started out as a liberalization of restrictive social conventions seems to have developed into a dictatorship of licence.

This dictatorship of licence has gripped Canada. It has not only gripped Canada but it has gripped the western world. I do not want to miss any words when I say that one of the reasons for the malaise which we are experiencing today is that the Prime Minister has tried to destroy many of the moral values on which this country was founded because, with a humanistic approach to life man becomes all important, man becomes the only one, he becomes the I. All values based on Christian principles are set aside once you put I in the centre of things, and this Prime Minister has done it. That is why we are experiencing this malaise.

The Prime Minister has frequently been in the vanguard of change, and, I say very directly to you, change for the worse, not for the better. Under the guise of civil libertarianism, we thought we would gain greater civil liberty, but civil liberty has been replaced by licence. For these three reasons alone it is high time that the government packed its bags and left because Canada cannot afford another term of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. I say to you very clearly: Canadians awake. It is time, and the time will come at the next election.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great honour for the member for Hull to address the House and have the opportunity to participate in the debate on the Speech from the Throne. First I would like to thank the hon. members for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for the excellent speeches they have delivered in the House on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. In spite of their limited political experience, they have proved to the House and to the Canadian nation that they know their ridings and that they will be excellent spokesmen for their constituents.

Mr. Speaker, when I heard some of the speeches delivered in this House on the national unity issue, I was deeply shocked and, as a physician, I made a diagnosis. It was more psychiatric like since those speeches, to be more precise, bordered on schizophrenia.

I also noted that the hon. members who made these speeches committed most of the capital sins, from hatred, envy, anger to jealousy. Surely some hon. members and the next generations will see these hon. members as participants in a candid camera stint. I should like to return to one of my pet subjects, namely the federal presence on the Hull side of the river, or rather in the Francophone part of the national capital region. You are doubtless aware of the climate of uncertainty and skepticism which now exists concerning the federal government intervention in Hull.

From the allegations and comments of the people, we get the impression that the federal government is no longer welcome on the Quebec side of the national capital region, and particularly so since November 15 last. It is therefore important to emphasize again the basic objectives and principles which warrant the presence and action of the federal government within the Hull area. As far as I know, Hull, the Ottawa area, and the province of Quebec as a whole still belong to the Canadian Confederation. At the conference which took place in 1969 and which dealt with the constitutional issue, it was the elected representatives of the whole of Canada, namely the first ministers of Canada, who decided of their own free will to create a national capital with areas from both sides of the Ottawa River.

I therefore invite all those who cried scandal and constitutional rape as soon as the government of Canada showed its presence and even its existence to suggest a more democratic and more constitutional mechanism to enable the Quebec side of the capital area to take advantage of the benefits of being in the national capital region. As the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) said so well on May 28, 1975, in Hull, it would perhaps be a good idea to put the city of Hull on the calendar of virgins and martyrs to better negate the constant and legitimate demands which have been made by the whole population of Quebec and its elected representatives for the federal administration to be truly present in Quebec, in the Hull area, which demands go back to 1917. It is therefore necessary to stop suggesting that the federal government presence in Hull is only a pious wish or an exaggerated statement on the part of politicians.

The federal government made a commitment and has kept it. It is present in Hull. Not only do we intend to remain there, but throughout the years, we have decided to amplify our presence, to increase our staff, even though the present figures have been somewhat adjusted since the beginning, which means that in the future, there will be more so-called federal buildings in this area, so that despite those who do not want to recognize it, the federal government will assume sole responsibility. This systematic obstruction to the establishment of the federal government in Hull is only a form of shabby and lowly politics. I therefore invite people to be far-sighted and recognize the long-term objectives that are suggested for the establishment of a national capital area on the side of Hull.

You are certainly aware that if we look at the history of the region, before 1969, the National Capital Commission was for all practical purposes the only federal, provincial or municipal agency planning or developing anything on the Quebec side of the national capital area. Despite this technocratic vacuum, the National Capital Commission has implemented the suggestions made by French urbanist Jacques Gréber in his development plan for the federal capital. Only in 1969, as I said a moment ago, following the resolutions by the federal-provincial conference on the constitution where the premiers as well as the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) agreed that the cities of Ottawa and Hull and the vicinity form the national capital area, did the governments concerned decide to have the city of Hull become part of the reality of the capital of Canada.

The adoption of that resolution was to allow the Quebec and Canadian governments to work out an operation policy and programs aimed at eliminating the many disparities and equalizing the development opportunities of the Quebec side of the national capital area. It is thus important to recall that already at that moment federal action was aiming first at a real federal presence on both sides of the Ottawa River and, second, at the needs, concerns and requirements of the people of Hull and the area. That cooperation has unfortunately not always been easy. For example, when in 1969 Ottawa decided to expropriate a district located on the Hull Island, some Quebec officials hurried to have that district expropriated by the Quebec government just before the federal expropriation, on the alleged pretext of providing needed space for building Quebec government offices.

Since then, this great Place du Centre project came painstakingly into being but actual construction work was not undertaken until there was a federal commitment to use most of the buildings. Obviously without such federal undertaking, that piece of land would have remained at best a parking site until the year 2000. Our presence and action in Hull is in no way related to an electoral speech full of stale promises. What we are bringing is a massive injection of money into the economy which will amount to $500 million by 1985. A deep sense of respect for other levels of government and people in general pervades our planning and development which is aimed at creating a national capital area for all Canadians while preserving the western Quebec character of Hull. And the principles underlying our work are simple; they are based on a selective idea to create and maintain a capital which symbolizes Canada as a nation.

Mr. Speaker, Hull had to become part of the national capital area, while assuming its role as a western Quebec metropolis if it wished to reap the social and economical benefits which can be derived from such a position. We still want to discuss the planning and development of the National Capital region with the Quebec government. As always, it is important that we set out together our mutual objectives and while building a capital city on both sides of the river, that we respect the will and interests of the various governments of that region, since, in carrying out this important task, the federal government is not an opponent, least of all an enemy, but an essential partner.

If we want to make this project a success, we must keep communications open and establish direct and frank links between the three levels of government as far as current activities are concerned. In this respect I have been rather surprised at the Quebec government's negative response to the regional community of the Outaouais over the past few months, as if the people elected to run this agency were not competent enough to fulfil their responsibilities in the much publicized issue of the filtering plant which incidentally is not over yet. This near control over the decision making process can only make the heavy hand of the bureaucracy appear even heavier at all levels and slow down the process of decisions and consequently the implementation of certain programs which will finally cause tremendous increase in the cost of these projects which will have to be borne by the overburdened local taxpayers.

And if the presence of the federal government, Mr. Speaker, has made itself clearer today, it is because since 1917, as I mentioned earlier, all elected representatives of the county of Hull and parts of that riding as mayors or aldermen have requested the federal government to spend money in their community. Everything started in 1909 with Dr. Fontaine, the then mayor of the city of Hull, who asked Ottawa improvement commission for $5,000 in order to improve the City Hall park. Then it went on, Mr. Speaker, with Mackenzie King who stated on April 6, 1927 his intention to create a federal district commission which was not supposed to restrict its work to the Ottawa side but expand it on the other side of the river as he used to say, then referring to Hull.

In 1956, Mayor Moncion appeared before the Joint Senate and House Committee on the development of the National Capital and stated: "I am pleased to address these justified remarks to the federal district commission on behalf of the population of Hull and its city council". He also said that on several occasions the city of Hull had requested the construction of government buildings within its limits and that he was taking the opportunity to reiterate his requests. And to those who are screaming blue murder at the decision taken by federal authorities to erect government buildings on Hull sites and saying that Hull had a labour vocation, the mayor of this town said in 1956: The city of Hull, which was formerly an essentially labouring town is gradually changing in character due to its geography and it is destined to have an increasing number of people whose occupations will be in the government sector.

Mr. Speaker, must I remind the House once more that in 1956, when the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons met, the President of the chambers of commerce of western Quebec said before this committee: The share of federal buildings in the city and the region of Hull is truly pitiful. We have the printing bureau, big deal! And he went on to say: Does federal district mean that all or nearly all federal buildings will necessarily be on the Ontario side? If the federal district is homogeneous and serves the same purpose, why such discrimination? He wanted ten or more federal buildings on the Quebec side because if a series of federal buildings were to be built along the Ontario side of the Ottawa River, a series of similar buildings would have to be built on the Quebec side. And if one looks behind the National Library, one can see that Hull has completely changed since 1969.

I could quote some statements by former Hull mayor Marcel D'Amour. I could quote from former mayors like Mr. Alphonse Moussette, Mr. Raymond Brunet, Mr. Adéodat Lambert, Mr. Armand Turpin, Mr. Thomas Moncion, Mr. Henri Gauthier, Dr. Fontaine, Mr. Jean-Marie Séguin, Mr. Marcel D'Amour and even the present mayor, Mr. Rocheleau, who, as I said earlier, have all advocated these massive investments on the Quebec side of the Ottawa region. And Mr. Marcel D'Amour, then mayor of Hull, stated to the committee on the constitution in 1971: We believe that Hull, like Ottawa has the same vocation as a federal capital. And I wish to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that contrary to what one might think, even though Ottawa is the centre of the federal government, it still has the same duties, the same obligations as any other Ontario municipality. Now, Hull might become the centre of the federal government while remaining directly under the province of Quebec's jurisdiction. Its institutions would still come under Quebec's jurisdiction just as those of Ottawa come directly under the jurisdiction of the Ontario government.

And I might quote other evidence, particularly the statements made by Mr. Jean-Marie Séguin who said precisely, as we know, that under the order pursuant to article 16 of the constitution, Ottawa is the capital of Canada. However, we believe we are included in the national capital of this country. We are convinced of that despite all legal descriptions. This is what we think.

[Mr. Isabelle.]

Mr. Speaker, one can often hear on the Quebec side that people do not want the federal government's interference or even its presence but I have gathered some statistics which have also been compiled by other media and I quote for instance from Le Droit which carried out a survey, on May 2, 1969, thanks to CKCH news service. Those who were responsible for this survey have published in the paper of that day a very relevant question, which might be of some help to those who are preparing the referendum in Quebec. The question reads as follows: Should Hull separate from Quebec? The question is clear enough and 83 per cent of all respondents said yes.

Second question: Would Hull benefit more from a federal district? Eighty-four per cent said yes.

I also had my own poll, which I would call a "home-made poll". On February 12, 1973, I asked a question which I sent to all electors in the federal riding of Hull. Are you in favour of regrouping the municipalities in the Hull-Ottawa area under a tripartite administration, namely federal, Quebec and Ontario? I must say that 8,159 persons sent in a reply, out of 26,616 heads of households to whom cards were sent; in other words, 32 per cent of them answered. For a poll of that kind, it was a record because few get a 32 per cent rate of respondents with that type of questionnaire. So, back to the first question: Are you in favour of regrouping the municipalities in the Hull-Ottawa area?

Mr. Speaker, 82 per cent said yes. The second question is not important because I asked: How would you call that kind of district? I must say that 26 per cent supported the national capital district. Some may say that this is ancient history, but according to a survey made by station CKCH in October 1975, during an open line program, the question was: "Would you favour a federal district or not?" An 86 per cent majority was in favour.

And referring to the earlier suggestion that for many the federal government's presence in Hull is a cultural nuisance in terms of assimilation and so on, a scientific survey was made in 1970 during the Hull mayoralty election. That survey was done by the Le sondage d'opinions du Québec. Question No. 10 was asking for the surveyed persons' opinion on the erection of federal buildings. Ninety per cent of the people surveyed stated that the erection by the federal government of office and other buildings in Hull was a good thing. Such is the will of the people in Hull. In addition, there are those who suggest daily that we should build some Great Wall of China between Ottawa and Hull. They are far from knowing the facts. Here are the facts, Mr. Speaker.

I shall not speak for the western Quebec constituencies that border mine, in other words Gatineau and Pontiac. I shall leave it to my colleagues to elaborate on the figures. But in the constituency of Hull representing the western part, Touraine, Aylmer, Deschênes, and the city of Hull, I must say that 10,385 Hull people are working in Ontario, which includes the federal government, and 2,485 work partly in Ottawa, partly in Hull. This accounts for a total 14,645 people working in Ontario. Adding the other 3,000, we get nearly 17,000 or 18,000 people working for the federal government and in Ontario. The practical conclusion therefore is that whether we like it or not, we depend on Ontario and Ottawa as a federal capital for employment in the Hull area.

● (1712)

To the present Quebec government which has been regularly sending its ministers in the Hull area to cock a snook at and to make fun of the federal government by making all sorts of statements I would not dare repeat here because they are not serious, I would say that it should go back to the history of that area which has been so long forgotten by Quebec and will still be forgotten by the present government, for we are too far away from Quebec City.

What the Quebec government wants now is a repetition of the Plains of Abraham drama, perhaps not on the military but on the intellectual field. That is why they come traipsing in Hull. They come here to flatter the people and promise them things and funds the federal government has already given them or is going to give them under shared-cost programs. They also forgot to tell them that in the last nine or ten years the federal government has given $950 million to civil servants who work in Ottawa but live in Hull and spend their money there. Everybody knows that such a massive input of money in a given area does much for the industrial and economic development of that area. It is for that reason, Mr. Speaker, that for a long time I have encouraged my colleagues from the cabinet and this House to understand the history of the national capital area so that eventually we amend section 16 of the constitution to include Hull and the area, in other words the municipalities within the national capital area so they will be part of the nation's capital.

Mr. Speaker, a few years ago the federal government amended its legislation on the reorganization of its departments when it deleted under the mention "head office" the word "Ottawa" and added the words "the area of the national capital". So, if we belong to the national capital area and if we are part of the federal capital of Canada, I do not see why we could not amend section 16 to become a "national capital". We should demonstrate to the nation what the government really wants to do as concerns biculturalism and bilingualism and even transportation—to become a kind of laboratory, the place where we experiment things before we implement them throughout Canada and this should be done within the national capital area that should be the showcase of federalism as it has been understood since 1867.

Mr. Speaker, we have been too long in the shadow. The Hull area has been for too long in a state of stagnation to go back to it, but I am afraid that is the aim of the present Quebec government. But the people from Hull and the area are confident because they know they are in the shadow of the Peace Tower and that since Confederation the protector of that small minority has always been and will always be the father of the nation, the federal government. A capital, Mr. Speaker, is not only the seat of government but also the symbol of the power and unity of a country, the home of the national spirit and we can achieve this only by amending section 16 of the constitution, something which will not require us to go to London. An order in council would be enough.

So I hope I got the message across. I know that many members from other constituencies do not really understand what is happening. Everybody is confused when the matter of the National Capital Commission is brought up. As the Fullerton report said, we are overgoverned. No generation will tolerate the political confusion which prevails in the national capital region, on both sides of the river.

I hope that future generations will cut through in order to rationalize this whole system which is an undescribable mess. I therefore invite my colleagues to address themselves to the problem of the federal presence in Hull and to the problem of the national capital region, to become more familiar with the situation so that when the matter is brought up in the future they may be in a position to make a judgment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I see that by a recorded vote which will be due shortly the time allocated to me has been cut in half. However, I wish to mention a few important points in this very important debate on the future of our country. In the Speech from the Throne the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outlined plans and directions where his government hopes to take the Canadian nation.

My question to the people of Canada is: what confidence can we as a people have in the Trudeau government considering the economic and political crisis in which we now find ourselves? After all, this is the same Prime Minister who has been governing Canada for the past nine years. What has been the result?

We have the highest unemployment since the great depression, 8.3 per cent of our labour force out of work, over one million Canadians. For every 100 unemployed, there are only four full-time jobs available. Inflation is running at 8.3 per cent, despite the anti-inflation program. We have a cash deficit of $8 billion, and the Canadian dollar has sunk to its lowest level since the depression. As well, our economy is only operating at 92 per cent of its capacity, meaning a loss of some $16 billion a year in goods and services not produced.

To top it all off, we now have a separatist government elected in the province of Quebec which is determined to break up the country. All this has occurred under the leadership of the Prime Minister who promised Canadians in 1968 a just society and a united Canada.

What justice is there to the unemployed nickel worker in Sudbury, or to the unemployed construction worker and his family in Sault Ste. Marie? What sense of unity is there for the people of Atlantic Canada who have experienced chronically high unemployment year after year, and indeed to the young Québécois who finds himself out of a job because his province equally experiences high unemployment?

After nearly a decade of Liberal rule this country is on the verge of political breakup and economic collapse. It did not happen by accident. We did not slide into this unaware. Many of the causes of the crisis we are facing today are a direct result of the policies of the Trudeau government.

What are the causes of this record unemployment? Surely a large part of the blame has to be the fact of our dependence on a resource based industry in oil or minerals or pulp and paper. We are now at the mercy of multinational corporations which manipulate world markets and prices. One has to look no further than the situation at Sudbury with the INCO Company. We have a lack of Canadian ownership and control. Ninety-nine per cent of our oil industry is foreign owned, as is 60 per cent of our mineral industry. No wonder investment decisions and layoff decisions are beyond our control.

We also have in this country a lack of industrial planning. We are still to a large degree hewers of wood and drawers of water. Jobs, of course, are where raw materials are manufactured. What has happened so often in Canada is that Canadians take the raw materials out of the ground and ship them to another country to be manufactured. It is in that other country where jobs are created. Unless we reverse that trend and get more processing and manufacturing of our raw materials here, we will never solve our chronic problem of high unemployment. Indeed, what will happen to the people of northern Ontario when the iron ore, nickel, copper and gold start running out?

● (1722)

The third reason for our high unemployment is the deliberate policy on the part of the Prime Minister and the cabinet of dampening the economy and allowing unemployment to rise as a means of attacking inflation. Between 1974 and 1976 the economy lost $25 billion and more than 600,000 man years of employment because of this kind of policy. Under the anti-inflation program more than $300 million has been taken from the pockets of workers through wage rollbacks, and when workers have less to spend on goods and services, factories have to lay off employees and other enterprises are forced to close. Today our factories are operating at only 80 per cent of capacity, business investment is down, and bankruptcies are a record high. Is it any wonder that unemployment has reached such levels?

The cost of unemployment is enormous not only to the unemployed themselves, and to their families, but also to the average working Canadian taxpayer. Unemployment insurance payments for the first half of 1977 totalled $2.1 billion, an increase of 14 per cent from 1976, and the total cost this year is projected to be more than $4 billion. The government has to supplement the UIC fund with taxpayers' money. Further, the government has lost $17 billion in tax revenues. Since the unemployed do not pay the taxes they would be called upon to pay if they were at work, working Canadians are called upon to pay higher taxes to make up the difference. In 1976 every man, woman and child lost $520 in goods and services not produced because of unemployment.

The social costs of unemployment are equally serious—family tension, marital break-up, alcoholism, increased crime and so on. Added to this one must take into account the disillusionment of young unemployed people—46 per cent of the unemployed are under 25 years of age. The cost of unemployment is so great that unless the government takes immediate and positive action there is clearly the prospect of a terrible crisis in the months ahead. Our party has outlined in this House and elsewhere an emergency economic program to create around 300,000 jobs. Details of this program have been made known on other occasions and I do not have time to repeat them now. Suffice it to say we would redirect some of the provisions in the last budget—redirect that $1.5 billion in tax concessions which the minister gave to the large corporations into personal income tax cuts to get Canadians buying more, and factories upping production. Our program for job creation is self-financing. It would not mean more deficit financing or an increase in the tax burden imposed on working Canadians.

In addition to this emergency job creation program it is imperative we develop a long term industrial strategy for Canada so that jobs are not tied to the boom and bust cycle of our resource industries. We in northern Ontario know what boom and bust means. We have seen it decade after decade. We are all aware of the plight of the 3,500 people who are going to be forced out of work by the International Nickel Company, but I say to the people of Northern Ontario that this is only a foretaste of what will happen unless we can devise an effective industrial strategy. If we are shocked by the INCO lay-offs we shall be in for more shocks in the copper, zinc and related industries in the absence of a mineral development policy.

In 1974 the federal and provincial governments published a paper entitled "Toward a Mineral Policy for Canada" in which they outlined strategy in terms of increased diversification, processing and manufacturing of minerals here in Canada, of a greater tax return from these resources and in terms of conservation. Three years ago that policy was formulated. What has happened since then? We are not advancing. I think of Falconbridge Nickel, for example, which is now exporting nickel to Norway for refining and processing. I recall that in 1975, the Conservative provincial government of Ontario, under great pressure from the multinational mineral industry, deferred for five years a tax provision to the effect that multinationals could not deduct the cost of processing Ontario minerals abroad into account when preparing their statements of provincial mining tax owed. This was a five-year postponement of a provision designed to encourage the processing of minerals here in Canada to create jobs for Canadians.

If this was not bad enough, the Conservative government in Ontario gave Falconbridge Nickel, which is processing nickel in Norway, a four-year exemption from a new Ontario requirement that ores be processed here in Canada.

Falconbridge and the other companies always threaten they will shift their operations and investment elsewhere if taxes are too high. But it is evident from what I have said that the government has no coherent development strategy to require the mineral industry to accept Canadian development priorities. My suggestion is that we set up a federal-provincial mineral export planning council to co-ordinate government bargaining and planning with respect to this industry so that there will be no repetition of the INCO lay offs in Sudbury and elsewhere.

What was the other policy objective? It was to secure a greater return to the people of Canada from taxes for the resources which belong to them. What a joke that has been! The mineral industry has got off very lightly compared to other sectors of our economy in terms of taxation. Eric Kierans has demonstrated in his report to the Manitoba government that between 1965 and 1970 they were given $2.5 billion in tax concessions. And what have we to show for that? International Nickel developing mines in Guatemala and Indonesia and laying off Canadian workers! We have got to end this kind of corporate tax concession and impose a tax regime which ensures that development occurs here in this country and that jobs are provided for Canadians.

There have been too many band-aid approaches to job creation in this country. Canada Works and DREE grants are not going to do what is needed. We need a co-ordinated plan for industrial development. We must reverse this trend to exporting all our raw materials; they must be manufactured and processed here in Canada.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That the amendment be amended by inserting immediately after the word "markets", the following words:

"all of which is clearly demonstrated by the Government's failure to develop a particular strategy for Canada's nickel industry which has resulted in INCO's recently announced lay-offs at Sudbury, Thompson and Port Colborne,"

● (1732)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being 5.30 o'clock p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section (4) of Standing Order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and to put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the amendments before the House. The question is on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Symes). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

HEALTH

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO IMPROVE STANDARDS OF RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask leave to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the government's appalling lack of concern with respect to health research in Canada as elaborated in the remarks of Nobel Prize winner Dr. Gerhard Herzberg at the recent conference of Canadians for Health Research, and having regard to the stress laid by Dr. Herzberg on the need for the better funding of health research, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the government take action to bring health research in this country up to international standards so that Canadians may enjoy healthier and longer lives.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires unanimous consent to the presentation of such a motion for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

TRADE

SUGGESTED REGULATION OF IMPORTATION OF MEAT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to put forward a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It is consequent upon the near-unanimous support given in the House of Commons and by producer groups concerned in favour of a beef import policy. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That Canada adopt a long term beef import policy and that as soon as possible parliament enact legislation to regulate the importation of beef, veal and live slaughter-cattle.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROPOSED MEETING WITH OFFICIALS OF NORANDA MINES TO AVOID LAY-OFFS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Considering that Noranda Mines Limited has announced lay-offs of approximately 500 employees during recent weeks and considering that Mr. John White, manager of Noranda's copper mine at Murdochville is now talking openly about the possibility of further substantial lay-offs in a few months time, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House instruct the government to meet with senior officials of this company as soon as possible to develop a program which will avoid the possibility of further lay-offs.

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House before such a motion can be presented for debate. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR INCREASED AID FOR RESEARCH FOR NEW FORMS OF ENERGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the gradual depletion of traditional forms of energy and since it is necessary to find immediately other adequate forms of energy to maintain the rate of progress and development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the government remove its budget restrictions and substantially increase its financial contribution to scientific research aimed at the discovery of new forms of energy.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the presentation of such motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION GUARANTEEING FREEDOM OF ACCESS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to put forward a motion on a matter of urgent necessity. In the light of the report of the North-South Institute chaired by the distinguished former Secretary-General of the Commonwealth, Arnold C. Smith, concerning the Third World and Canada's performance in which it is concluded that study and debate on international development have been badly hampered by an unreasonably restricted approach to the provision of information by the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That this House direct the Secretary of State to introduce effective freedom of information legislation without further delay.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be made at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SUGGESTION AID BE PROVIDED FOR KOOTENAY AREA OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent necessity. In view of the fact that the general development agreement between the federal government and the province of British Columbia clearly identifies three specific geographic areas of British Columbia for special assistance under the DREE program, and in view of the fact that one of these three areas, namely the Kootenays, has been ignored for special assistance in the latest series of federal government sub-agreements, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That the minister responsible for DREE immediately begin discussions with the province of British Columbia with a view to providing the forms of economic assistance which are of a priority nature in the east and west Kootenays.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to the Standing Order requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT PROMISE OF AID FOR URBAN TRANSPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provision of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House notes with regret that the urban transportation assistance program announced yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) represents only a transfer of funds from other programs already in existence and is thus a complete denial of the election promise of 1974 which was to have involved $290 million of new money to enable urban communities to solve serious transit problems; and this House condemns the government for its callous disregard of its solemn promises to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely, André Fortin, Esq., the member for the electoral district of Lotbinière, by death. Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for that electoral district.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR GUARANTEE CANADIAN STEEL USED IN CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHERN PIPELINE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I would remind him of the Prime Minister's speech in which he indicated that the building of a pipeline would mean something like some $4 billion to Canadians, would include 100,000 man years of work and involve over one million tons of steel. Is the minister now aware of the very serious questions being raised regarding the lack of guarantees for the use of Canadian steel in the pipeline? In this regard I would ask the minister whether the pipeline contract will be open to international bidding or will the bidding on the Canadian portion of the pipeline be restricted to Canadian interests?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, new legislation is currently being drafted. With regard to the Canadian content aspect, this is now under the National Energy Board's authority and they have clearly stated that opportunity to Canadians to bid will be given every preference. I might add that we are capable of rolling 48 inch, 52 inch and 54 inch pipe in Canada and that practically all of the pipe requirements can be produced in Canada, which I should like to see happen.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his usual way the minister has ignored my question. In light of the fact that the agreement calls for implicit understandings—which does not mean a thing to me—and refers to being competitive, and given the fact that the minister has said Canadian interests will be given every opportunity, which means that some room is left open for international bidding, can the minister advise, together with his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, whether he will see to it that there will be guarantees in order to protect the interests of our steel industry and those who provide goods and services which play a major part in this pipeline?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I said that Canadian content will be optimized as far as practicable. If we can do it all, we will do it all. If that overheats the steel mills and we find ourselves far out of competition with world steel prices, then we may have to rely on some help. I can assure the hon. member that the legislation which will come before the House will spell out specifically the opportunities Canadian sources will have to supply our Canadian pipe.

• (1117)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. Minister referred to the word "competitive". Is the minister aware of the fact that the United States Senate, which will have to approve this agreement, is very concerned about the slump in the steel industry in that country? Is the minister aware of the fact that there is a task force on steel in the United States of America which can, in the end result, mean that there will be further tax concessions and government involvement in order to make the steel industry of the United States more viable and competitive? When the minister talks about whether or not we are going to be competitive, is he prepared to recommend to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Prime Minister that Canadian companies should be and must be as competitive if such an eventuality occurs in the United States?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): What is he going to do about it?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, naturally we want to retain an atmosphere in which Canadian companies will remain competitive with the United States. I can assure the hon. member that some of the news reports with regard to American desires have been very erroneous with respect to the pipeline agreement.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF $150 MILLION JOB CREATION PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Last week the minister announced a $150 million additional fund for job creation. A few days ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration told the House that that money would not be used under any of the job creation programs administered by him.

Can the Minister of Finance tell the House how that money will be spent, where the money is coming from, and notwithstanding the desperate need for job creation in this country, can he assure the House that the money will not come out of the pockets of old age pensioners and recipients of family allowances?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me a very large question.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Give us a large answer.

Mr. Chrétien: The $150 million would be applicable through the FLIP program which operates within the government to create jobs.

An hon. Member: Flipflop.

Mr. Chrétien: This year it will be based on the locations and levels of unemployment and so on. Every department will be submitting propositions to the President of the Treasury Board, and the allocations will be made there. Of course, we have the money within the federal budget that was laid out by my predecessor in April. A rearrangement of the priorities of the government is being done at this time within the Treasury Board. If there is any announcement about it, it will be made by the President of the Treasury Board. I think the hon. member is not accomplishing anything by spreading false rumours about old age pensions and so on.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the minister should take up the question of false rumours with his Minister of National Health and Welfare, where the rumour came from in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: No way.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Apologize.

Mr. McGrath: Given the one million plus unemployment in this country, and given the fact that we have now substantial lay-offs and pending lay-offs in the mining industry, can the minister give the House and the country his assurance that this $150 million will not be used in the Liberal pork barrel fund, as was the case in phase II of job creation where Liberal ridings received $300,000 more than Conservative ridings, and as was the case in the government's relocation program where all relocated civil servants went to Liberal ridings?

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should be ashamed to rise in the House when the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and the hon. member for Churchill are claiming to have the greatest allocation of that kind of money.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is: Is the minister prepared to assure this House that he will give priority, in the allocation of this $150 million, to areas which have been struck by lay-offs because of the policies of this government, given the lay-offs in the mining industry, the projected lay-offs in the mining industry and the impact of this on industry towns?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is shifting ground very rapidly, but this money will be allocated strictly in accordance with the areas of unemployment in the land.

Mr. Alexander: The Prime Minister was laughing throughout that exchange.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is not very funny, Pierre.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—ALLEGED IMPROPER REMISSION OF DUTIES

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: Is the minister aware of the fact that the cabinet has recently allowed three of the major auto companies in Canada $336 million in duty remissions to which they were not entitled under the terms of the auto pact because these companies did not live up to their obligation to create the requisite number of jobs in Canada? Is he aware of the fact that the cabinet made these decisions in flat contradiction of the provisions of the auto pact and, if he is aware of it, as the new minister will he promise the House that this kind of decision will not be repeated in the future?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I am rapidly becoming aware of the Broadbent statistics.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: The House was previously aware of the Martin bureau of statistics; now it is the Broadbent bureau of statistics. The $336 million has been given out since the beginning of the auto pact, and all of that money has not gone to the three majors; some of it has gone to other than the three majors over a period of years. One of them was a truck company which is not in the auto pact, but we are going along with the remission because it is manufacturing in Canada. In my view, the hon. member's suggestion that the $336 million has been given out to the three majors in recent years is completely erroneous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I repeat the minister's own phrase "in recent years during the course of the auto pact". If the minister is not happy with my figures, I ask him to read the reports of the Auditor General of Canada. That is my source of the figures.

Mr. Horner: The Auditor General does not say it was $336 million to three major companies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will he put it forthwith?

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE CANADA PRODUCES PROPER SHARE OF AUTO PARTS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I was just going to say, Mr. Speaker, that the sheep should check their facts before they cheer the minister because he is dead wrong.

My facts come from the minister's department and my question to the minister is about the present production of auto parts in Canada related to the consumption. Recent figures show we have been consuming in parts—I ask the minister not to confuse it with vehicles—some 12 per cent of the parts produced in Canada, but we produce only 7 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Broadbent: The Canadian Automotive Parts Association and others have calculated that we are losing thousands of jobs because of this discrepancy. What steps is the minister taking now to remove that gap and to ensure that Canadian auto workers produce at least their share of the parts we consume in this country?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Let me make it abundantly clear for the hon. member that in the automotive trade, in complete automobile units, we have a net surplus over the United States of $1.5 billion. In the parts trade we have a minus of $2.6 million.

Mr. Broadbent: Heading for $3 billion.

Mr. Horner: Heading for $3 million, according to the Broadbent bureau of statistics. I told the hon. member some weeks ago that we were meeting with the three major companies to see whether or not we could manufacture more parts in Canada. If time permits me, I will be meeting with one of them this afternoon to see whether or not we could have more parts manufactured in Canada. But we have to realize that the net goal is a balance of both units and parts in both countries. In other words, to make a deal it has to be good for both sides.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1127)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister's commitment to a balance is really very encouraging, but I ask him to read the report prepared in his department and tabled in the House last spring.

Mr. Horner: That was before the 90 cent dollar.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact that the report produced within his department shows that Canada is by no means getting its fair share from the auto pact, if we combine both parts and assembled vehicles, what is the minister putting before the heads of the major auto companies who are now in the process of negotiating contracts for parts production for next year's models? Is he insisting that we get our share of jobs?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we are insisting. I told the hon. member that we are meeting with them, and I will meet with one of them this afternoon. That is exactly what we will be putting forward.

INDUSTRY

ACTION TO AVOID SHUTDOWN OF WAYAGAMACK

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, my question being directed either to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Finance, they will have to decide who will reply. In view of the very serious job crisis, it is always a painful experience to see firms such as the Wayagamack Company, in Cap-de-la-Madeleine, shut down their operations and lay off hundreds of workers. Could the minister advise the House whether he has looked into the case of this company, and explain why the federal government has done nothing to prevent the closing of this plant?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are making every effort. My department is meeting with the officials of that plant and of several others to see what steps can be taken to keep them open.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary. I surely cannot be satisfied with such an answer since the company is now closing down. The problem is so urgent that I would like to put my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Finance since it is happening in his area and, moreover, he was previously responsible for that department. Besides, I know the Minister of Finance should be more aware of the problem. So, could he give us a much more concrete answer about the urgent problem of the Wayagamack closing down?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed aware of that case which was considered last summer. However, pulp and paper matters come specifically under provincial jurisdiction since they control the whole pulp and paper industry within the province; they have considered the case and supported the company's decision to close down. It was thus difficult for us to override the province's decision.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DATE OF IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATION OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE POLICY

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Science and Technology, but he seems to have stepped out for the moment. Perhaps the Prime Minister would be good enough to answer the question for me.

My question refers to the fourth report of the special committee of the Senate on science policy, which is a scathing indictment of the government's failure in science policy. It begins with these words: "Throughout the years in Canada the stated science policy objectives of the government have not been those it implemented". When will the government implement recommendations made in this and earlier reports, particularly with regard to more resources for research and development and increased use of applied research in industries and universities?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the matter is of some importance but for my part I have not had the opportunity to read the report of which the hon. member speaks. I am convinced the minister has read it. I shall convey the question of the hon. member to the minister.

POSSIBILITY OF INCREASING GRANTS FOR RESEARCH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I, too, am sorry the responsible minister is absent. My question is therefore directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Keeping in mind the very categorical statements and recommendations made in this report, the Lamontagne committee now accuses the government of having jeopardized the research potential in Canada by slashing research expenditures in an effort to fight inflation.

As credits and recommendations made a few years ago represented 2.5 per cent of the gross national product, which have now gone down to 1 per cent, it seems very clear, Mr. Speaker, that the committee report urgently requests additional funds proportionate to the problems we know.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us specifically whether he intends or not to recommend that, in the next budget, a positive reply be given to recommendations which strike me as very serious and which have not been made by a Conservative?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answer to a previous question I said that the matter is extremely important, that representations have been made to me personally by several members of the scientific community. We are all aware, of course, of the necessity for that community to forge ahead as quickly as possible. But the matter of funds provided by the government is always one of which the opposition is always aware as we are. The opposition always asks the government to cut down expenditures first and foremost. We did not reduce budgets in the field of science. We have merely increased them at a lower rate, and that has been the policy of the government in practically all fields.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, yesterday we asked a number of questions concerning our economic situation as well as the lay-offs and we are concerned about the lack of precise answers. Today the right hon. Prime Minister showed good intentions about those recommendations and I think he agrees with us. It is obvious that this report shows there is not enough financing and research, and that directly relates to job creation. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he intends to make personal recommendations at least to his Minister of Finance so that the next budget will include precise answers to these recommendations? In short, does he intend to respond to these recommendations of the committee, yes or no?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, a precise answer will obviously be given in the Blue Paper Book which will be tabled in this House at the usual time. The hon. member will then be able to see the amount of money we spend in the scientific field. What I say is that we are not always able to give to all sectors, scientific, artistic, educational or others, all they are asking for. We have to use in a rational way the taxpayer's money and try to make the best use of it in every field. We cannot fully satisfy everybody's desires.

PERFORMING ARTS

DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY ON FEATURE FILMS—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and relates to the present state of the feature film industry in this country. As the minister knows, the distribution of feature films in Canada is tightly controlled by seven American companies which receive 93 per cent of all film rental receipts in this country which last year amounted to some $63 million in profit. Can the minister indicate in light of the present discussion and concern about the film industry, when we will have a new policy which has as its cornerstone the principle that reasonable profits from the exhibition and distribution of films in Canada should be used to support the production of new Canadian and not foreign films?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, may I first say how much I welcome this question. It is very rarely that questions are posed to me about cultural policy. I think this is a very important aspect of the government's activities. In relation to film policy, I agree entirely with the hon. member that questions of distribution are key to a resolution of the problems which the industry faces. There are proposals which the government is now considering and I hope to be able to make an announcement before the end of this year as to the policy the government will pursue.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In light of a major article in last Sunday's New York Times with the intriguing headline "Will the next Robert Redford have to be Canadian?" And quoting a financial consultant—

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps George Hees.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): There might be a screen test for a number of hon. members, Your Honour. The financial consultant to Columbia Pictures was quoted as saying with regard to the effect on the United States film industry, that one likely effect is that "Canada will go from being an irrelevant source of film production to being one of the major film producing countries in the world." In light of this probable influx of American film-making can the minister guarantee that his new film policy will provide government assistance only for those films whose financial and creative control rests with Canadians, and particularly, will the definition of a Canadian film eligible for funding or tax assistance be tightened to specify that the production company itself must be Canadian?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, the arrangement we now have, in a sense, assures that. The formula arrangements for the capital cost write-off require a very strong degree of Canadian participation. There are the joint production arrangements in which there may be occasions when the control of the production company is not in Canadian hands. These are areas we are looking at. I think I should wait until the whole package of policy proposals is complete before I reply to that particular aspect of it.

As for a Canadian being the next Robert Redford, I would certainly be able to hold out that opportunity. I would suggest to hon. members opposite that they may be looking for alternative careers after the next election. I will make representations on their behalf—undoubtedly for the parts of villains.

ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the House whether or not he has been consulted by President Carter on the United States' initiative in the United Nations Security Council for a mandatory arms embargo against South Africa, and does the Canadian government now favour such a mandatory embargo as the United States apparently does?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when I saw President Carter in September we did talk about the subject, but he did not give me any advance notice of this particular move.

INFORMATION

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION GUARANTEEING FREEDOM OF ACCESS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Secretary of State relates to the government's position on freedom of information. A report has been released today by the North-South Institute which reveals, among other things, that it was badly hampered by an unreasonably restrictive approach and inexcusable obstacles and by real or fancied security classifications by Canadian officials in its search for even the most basic information. This topic has been studied over and over again by committees and by the government. Will the minister undertake to bring forward without delay effective freedom of information legislation in this House so that we can dispose of it in this session of parliament?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have the information to which the hon. member referred. I think it is most improbable that the analysis he described is a true analysis of the situation. In relation to the second part of his question, I have promised to have the government's green paper referred to the joint committee so that we would have their views on the questions it raises before bringing in legislation. I would not be anxious to go back on my word when I had made that commitment. I think the proper course would be for us to propose legislation to the House after we have received the recommendations of that committee on the basis of the green paper report.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: A supplementary question, to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. I assure the minister there will be the utmost support from members on this side to expedite that process but I still think it is obligatory for the government to come forward and not continue its delay of effective freedom of information legislation. The North-South Institute rates as unsatisfactory the government's development of a comprehensive and organic approach to development co-operation. Could the Prime Minister tell the House what immediate steps he intends to take to rectify this situation and in addition what his position is with respect to freedom of information legislation so that we can dispose of it in this session at a very early date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I repeat the answer given by the Secretary of State. We want to proceed with legislation at an early date but we must have the comments of the opposition in the committee process. I believe I heard from the Leader of the Opposition the other day that the other side was not prepared to put anything constructive forward—maybe it was the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. I see they are very anxious to put something forward now and we will look at it.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTION COMMITTEES BE CONSTITUTED—REFERENCE OF GREEN PAPER ON FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister, as head of the government, undertake now to use his good offices to insure that the appropriate committees are constituted and the joint committee is constituted and the green paper on freedom of information referred to that committee immediately? I assure the Prime Minister he will have the cooperation in that study from the official opposition.

● (1142)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome that very constructive suggestion. What the House leader intends to do, and we expect him back at the beginning of the week, is put before the opposition a package of proposals so that members on both sides can expeditiously use to the maximum benefit the time between now and the Christmas adjournment. There is a limited number of days. We would like the cooperation of all parties to try to program the time available in order to pass the maximum amount of measures, particularly on the economic side but not excluding such measures as freedom of information.

Oral Questions

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT OF FOUR DISSIDENTS BY CZECHOSLOVAKIA—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN PROTEST

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister. I think the Prime Minister's deep interest in fundamental freedoms fully qualifies him to answer the question. Is Canada making any protest to the government of Czechoslovakia with regard to the conviction and imprisonment of four dissidents whose sole offence appears to have been their support of the principles of freedoms expressed by the Helsinki agreement, this at a time when Czechoslovakia and Canada, both signatories to the Helsinki agreement, were meeting at Belgrade to discuss the extension and strengthening of the freedoms set out in the Helsinki charter?

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, the views of the Canadian government have been forcefully expressed in that specific area.

NAMIBIA—CANADIAN ACTION WITH REGARD TO ILLEGAL OCCUPATION BY SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also addressed to the Prime Minister. He may not choose to answer it, but I would like to address it to him nevertheless. It is supplementary to the question of the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I am not particularly concerned with what the President of the United States proposes to do about sanctions against the South African government in respect of their illegal occupation of Namibia. What I would like to know is what Canada proposes to do in this matter.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that the parliamentary secretary who answers is answering in the absence of his minister. That is quite usual practice in this House. He answered quite properly that the department had made strong representations.

On the second question, I stated in my earlier answer that a large part of my discussions in September when I met President Carter were on the whole problem of Africa and that we reviewed in some detail the situation there, but particularly with regard to Namibia, we reviewed the role of the Group of Five, of which Canada is a member, in order to bring to a peaceful solution the problem of Namibia. We are making progress. We hope we will be successful with the Canadian initiative.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY 50 IN QUEBEC

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission, namely the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Could he tell the House whether construction on Highway 50, within the Green Belt, will start in the fall? If so, what will be the federal participation in these works?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec public works minister and the provincial member, Mr. Alfred, recently gloated over the construction of that highway. They forgot to mention that it was thanks to an agreement signed with the former Liberal government in Quebec, in 1972, that such projects can be achieved and that the NCC will in fact contribute 50 per cent of the cost.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBILITY OF AGREEMENT TO AID CASTLEGAR, BRITISH COLUMBIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the minister's assurances to myself and to the mayor of Castlegar that there would be some provision in the recent subagreements signed with British Columbia to resolve the critical water shortage in Castlegar, and in view of the fact that a senior official of the minister's department has now indicated there are no provisions in these subagreements of any significant assistance to that city, is the minister now prepared to actively pursue a subagreement for Castlegar similar to the one which he signed for Fort Nelson?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if I recall correctly, I never said there would be a specific reference for Castlegar in the subagreement. What I in fact said was that the subagreement will be a program to correct most of the problems whereby both governments will be able to get involved in such projects if both governments decide this is the project that should be given priority. To say that we have launched into new negotiations for a specific program for a specific city, I am not in a position to do that today.

Mr. Brisco: In view of the fact the economy of Kootenay West is now demonstrating an upturn against the national trend, and in view of the fact that that upturn depends in no small measure on a guaranteed water supply for Castlegar on which another $500 million injection into the local economy is also dependent, will the minister now reconsider his answer and address himself to the possibility of a subagreement of $3 million for the city of Castlegar?

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat to the hon. member that when we had those discussions, I agreed with him and the provincial minister that if there was a need in that region, the province should submit it to us within the agreement which was signed and which provides for the possibility of interventions though not necessarily oriented towards the central element of this need that is a new water system. However, there might be other formulas through the present agreement which would allow us to solve at least partly the problem about which the hon. member is concerned.

However, on the whole, the agreement applies to this entire part of the province. I would like to correct the false impression that he may have created by saying that Kootenay West is not excluded from the agreement that has been signed.

TOURISM

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN TAX ON GASOLINE AND CHANGE IN AIR FARE STRUCTURE TO AID INDUSTRY

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The minister spoke to the tourist industry in Toronto yesterday, pointing out that tourism is now Canada's largest single employer. It has a huge deficit this year in the travel account, almost $2 billion. The minister pointed out that travel costs are too high in Canada compared to the United States, air fares are too high and gasoline at the pump too expensive. Does the minister agree with the government's policy of moving to the world price for oil in view of his remarks or, in the alternative, will the government accept the suggestion of the tourist industry that the federal excise tax on a gallon of gasoline be reduced from ten cents to three cents to help with this problem?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is always gratifying to know that the opposition reads my speeches.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: With regard to the increase in Canadian prices in an attempt to reach world oil prices, the purpose is to encourage exploration so that we might perhaps reach the point in Canada of being able to boast that we are self-sufficient in oil and gas. I hope we have that capability and I hope we are able to do it.

With regard to the ten cent tax on gasoline, it has been disadvantageous to the tourist industry in Canada. However, I think recent increases in gasoline prices in the United States will put us in balance with that country. The value of our dollar today at 90 cents will encourage more American tourists to visit Canada. I think I can quite confidently say that next year the tourist trade imbalance will be considerably smaller than this year and the previous years.

Mr. Crosbie: I always enjoy reading the minister's speeches, although he said yesterday he had no specific answers to the problems in the tourist industry. Air travel is much more expensive than abroad. In fact, to go from Toronto to Quebec, the consumer cost per mile is 400 per cent greater than to go from Toronto to Miami or Toronto to London. Will the minister take up with the Minister of Transport this ridiculous fare structure in Canada to get it changed so that Canadians will be encouraged to travel at home rather than to foreign countries?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, there is hope for everybody. If the hon. member had read a little further in that speech, he would have seen that I and my department clearly advocate that we want domestic advance charter bookings for Canadians travelling in Canada. The department has gone before the CTC. The CTC has finished their hearings on it. We expect a decision relatively soon, hopefully within the next couple of weeks.

PUBLIC SERVANTS STAFF RELATIONS ACT

POSSIBILITY AMENDMENTS WILL BE INTRODUCED

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. A week ago the hon. member for Ottawa West raised the question of whether any amendments would be forthcoming to the Public Servants Staff Relations Act? Could the right hon. gentleman advise the House whether amendments are coming forward this session and, if not, why not?

● (1152)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The government will have to move amendments to that Act but I cannot undertake to say, now, at what point in the session they will be moved, whether in the first part or the second part, or, indeed, whether they will be moved at all in this session of parliament. It would depend upon the work program which the House leader is discussing with the other parties.

Mr. Fraser: Is there any reason why this item has not been placed on a priority list? After all, it is almost four years since the Finkelman report came down. Those affected are employees of the government and I think they are entitled to know what is going to happen and what the extensive Commons and Senate committee of inquiry achieved and when the recommendations will be put into effect. As time goes on, those findings may be less relevant to the situation than they are now.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree with the hon. member that this is a priority question and I can tell him that it is on a priority list. I repeat what was said in the Speech from the Throne and what I have said since: in the first part of this session, we shall be dealing essentially with economic matters, budget bills and so on, and if we can proceed expeditiously with those matters we shall have time in the second part of the session to deal with other priorities such as the one mentioned by the hon. member.

POST OFFICE

DISCONTINUANCE OF SATURDAY DELIVERY TO RURAL BOXHOLDERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. For some time, now, there have been rumours that the Post Office Department intends to discontinue Saturday delivery to rural boxholders. I do not believe the minister intends to do this, and I do not know how the rumour got started. Saturday mail is very important to rural boxholders; it affects delivery of the newspaper, which some of them get only on Saturdays. Can the minister confirm or deny that he plans to discontinue Saturday delivery to rural boxholders?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): I do not know where the rumour started either. In terms of the area in which the hon. gentleman lives, there is no plan afoot to cut back rural delivery.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

MANITOBA—QUESTIONNAIRE CONCERNING SALE OF SENIOR CITIZENS' HOMES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It has to do with a questionnaire which was prepared by CMHC and circulated to senior citizens in Manitoba in which senior citizens were asked whether they would consider selling their homes to the government with the proviso that the government would allow them to continue to live in those homes as long as they wished. Is it CMHC policy to buy the homes of Manitoba senior citizens and then to place those senior citizens in public housing?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not a policy of the corporation but an investigation carried out by a few social workers in that province simply for study purposes, with a view perhaps towards advising the government on new policies to assist in the construction of housing or the use of existing houses to offer more economical housing to senior citizens.

[English]

Mr. Epp: The minister tells us that the questionnaire was prepared by social workers. The fact of the matter is that the envelope is directed right back to the CMHC. Since this questionnaire is such as to intimidate senior citizens in Manitoba, would the hon. gentleman make an unequivocal statement that it is not the policy of the government to take away homes, the only security these people have, and place these senior citizens in public housing, as has been suggested on various occasions?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member believes that we want to deprive citizens of their houses, he is completely mistaken. I can immediately assure him that we have no such intention. However, I do not see why the hon. member blames the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for co-operating with people who want to find new solutions to offer more housing to senior citizens and at less cost. I believe this action is quite justified and easy to explain.

MANPOWER

IMPENDING LAY-OFFS AT NEW BRUNSWICK MINING AND SMELTING—POSSIBLE APPLICATION OF SHARED-WORK PROGRAM

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the intention of the Brunswick Mining & Smelting Company, near Bathurst, in New Brunswick, a subsidiary of Noranda Mines, to reduce its staff by about 200 employees, can the minister tell the House whether he will ensure that the work-sharing program now provided under the Unemployment Insurance Act is offered to the employees and the company so as to avoid lay-offs? Can the minister also tell the House when the provisions of the act which provide for this program will be proclaimed?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Immediately upon receiving this information I ascertained that, fortuitously, my deputy minister was in the area. He did discuss the whole matter with both management and labour as well as with the deputy minister of labour for the province, indicating the resources which were available and which could be made available. In addition, I have had conversations with Premier Hatfield who has been successful in extending the lay-off timetable for a couple of weeks, I believe, so that we can look into the whole matter. We are examining it in some detail.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE EXPENDITURES ON HOSPITALITY AND TAXIS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I will pose my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the government has imposed strict controls on working people, on business people, can he tell the House whether he is aware that figures released to me by the government show that the government annually spends more than $5.5 million on hospitality and about $2 million on taxis? If so, would he not agree that these uncontrolled expenditures show that the government has one standard for itself and another much tougher standard for people in the rest of the country?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board is absent from the House because he is on a business trip. Of course, there are always expenses incurred by the government. Would the hon. member tell us if he absolutely wants us to cut all those things; for instance, there is the matter of taxis. Some employees, both men and women, are forced to work in the evening. There may be no bus service available at that time so the government must respect the collective agreements and supply a means of transportation. We should perhaps try to control them a little more closely but we developed some years ago a new system which further restricts the opportunity for employees to use taxis, and we always look very closely at this kind of expense.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED EXCESSIVE EXPENDITURE ON TELEGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Apparently the minister is satisfied that this $7.5 million is being well spent; he will have a hard time convincing the Canadian people, though.

My supplementary question is to the Postmaster General. In view of the massive Post Office deficit, may I ask whether the Postmaster General is aware that the government's bill for telegrams and cables in 1975 was more than $6 million and included expenditures of about $200,000 each for the Departments of Transport, Public Works, and Fisheries and the Environment? Is he aware that his own department, which regularly spends vast amounts to promote an increased use of the mails, spent more than $180,000 on telegrams and cables?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Postmaster General): We are well aware we are facing competition from faster services in the telecommunications area. That is the reality we are facing. Canada has one of the most sophisticated telecommunications systems in the world and the hon. gentleman is surely not insisting that in terms of administering the Post Office we ought not to be able to use the faster telecommunications system as in the same way as other citizens in the country?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Post Office is obviously a system for mail delivery, and there will be delays from time to time. Thus as a department, we cannot be prevented from using other quick means of telecommunications, like any Canadian, given that we have in Canada one of the most sophisticated and most developed telecommunication systems in the world.

INDUSTRY

SHIPBUILDING—DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF AID PROGRAM

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Back in March, the minister who then held the hon. gentleman's portfolio stated that in October of this year, which is now, an announcement would be made of further assistance to our ailing shipbuilding industry in Canada. Is the minister now in a position to give some indication as to what measures of assistance the government will be taking to aid this very important industry so that every effort is made to maintain the 16,000 direct jobs and the 45,000 directly related jobs in the industry?

• (1202)

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I intend to announce very soon continued support for the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Mitges: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I thank the minister very much for the answer but, whatever that aid may be, will he give serious consideration to matching the assistance which offshore shipbuilding companies are receiving from their governments so that our shipbuilding companies can compete on a more equal footing in tendering for orders?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are well aware of the various forms of assistance which other countries are giving their shipbuilding industry and we are trying to offset that as much as we can.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN BASIC PENSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs based on the answer that he gave yesterday to my friend the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe to the effect that veterans on disability pensions will have to be satisfied with an increase in January based on the rise in the consumer price index. In view of the fact that that answer fails to recognize that it is precisely because veterans' disability pensions have been increased only in accordance with the CPI that the gap of more than $500 per year has developed between the level that was set three or four years ago in relation to five categories in the public service and the amount that veterans are receiving. In view of all this, will the minister ask his cabinet colleagues to reconsider the urgent representations of veterans' organizations for the closing of that gap?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday to my colleague for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, the government has considered this. I tried to explain yesterday that due to fiscal restraints the veterans will receive the cost of living index as of January. I also want to leave the impression with the House of Commons that when fiscal conditions become a little better the government will certainly be looking at this again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister, either by bringing in legislation or in some other way, make the necessary arrangements so that these matters can be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs and the government can have the views of that committee on this matter, on the question of the pension of widows, on World War I prisoners of war, and so on? Can we have some discussion in the committee at an early date?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I do not see any reason why this cannot be entertained, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—ALLEGED INACCURACIES IN PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENTS CONCERNING INCO

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which pertains to the answers given in the House two days ago by the Prime Minister. I understand that he could not be here yesterday for the obvious reason that he was greeting our distinguished guest at the airport, and I see that he has to leave now. That is unfortunate but I will raise the point in any case because it concerns a serious factual piece of misinformation relating to the serious situation being faced by thousands of workers who are being laid off by INCO. The Prime Minister misinformed the House not once, not twice, but three times on Tuesday. I should like to make three points and deal with each of them because the errors are serious indeed. He either misinformed the House deliberately or inadvertently, but whichever it was the record ought to be cleared up and made accurate.

Firstly, Mr. Speaker, in response to a question which I asked concerning INCO'S overseas developments, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 217 of Hansard for Tuesday:

> The fact is that the Guatemalan production is not expected to come in until 1979.

Then later in response to another question—I give this just to show that 1979 was not a slip but that he obviously intended to say 1979—he said:

> I have clear information to the effect that Guatemalan production will not reach the market until 1979.

Well, Mr. Speaker, unfortunately that is not the situation. When INCO announced that nearly 4,000 Canadian jobs would disappear, it also stated in the same announcement that Indonesian mines are continuing to be developed. Specifically, in regard to Guatemala, which is the point of the Prime Minister's answer, INCO stated, and I quote:

> Plant construction of the . . . project in Guatemala is basically complete with the fuel oil storage facility and other support items to be completed in the near future. The plant is in the start-up phase and has also produced nickel matte meeting product specification.

Then, this is the crucial sentence:

> Commercial level production is expected to be achieved in the second quarter of 1978.

Not in 1979, as the Prime Minister said, but in the second quarter of 1978, Mr. Speaker, three months after the lay-offs are to go into effect in Sudbury and elsewhere in Canada. So, the Prime Minister is clearly wrong.

Secondly, with reference to cutbacks the Prime Minister said, as reported at the same page of Hansard:

> —INCO plans a reduction in Canada of 15 per cent of its operations, whereas it plans reductions abroad of some 30 percent.

That is what the Prime Minister said on Tuesday and in terms of jobs this is a completely inaccurate statement. INCO is eliminating almost 4,000 jobs in Canada but no—I repeat no—jobs are being lost in INCO'S overseas developments. I suggested that in the House on Tuesday and it was confirmed, subsequent to the Prime Minister's answer in the House, on the telephone by people on my staff with INCO corporation officials, either yesterday or the day before. I repeat that INCO concludes that there are no job reductions in Guatemala or Indonesia; there are job reductions here in Canada.

The third point that I would make concerns the Prime Minister's response to my suggestion of a stockpile. I suggested that the federal government, in dealing with this crisis, undertake steps to ensure the preservation of some jobs for a foreseeable period in the future, on the ground that it makes more sense to accumulate stockpiles like this and sell them off than it does to pay some $22 million out in unemployment insurance claims. In response to my suggestion of a stockpile the Prime Minister said that INCO has stockpiled for a period of 12 to 14 months, and as reported at page 217 he went on to say:

> The question is: how much longer does the Leader of the New Democratic Party want the stockpiling to go on?

Here, Mr. Speaker, I will simply say that the Prime Minister's statement, if not factually wrong, is very misleading in terms of what was being proposed. They have been stockpiling—

Mr. Speaker: With respect, I have been listening carefully to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member. On the first two aspects, he is dealing with the factual correctness of statements made during the question period, which I have traditionally allowed by way of a question of privilege. It seems to me that on his third point he is now launching into an area of disagreement or into a different interpretation to be put, which would not fall within a question of privilege. On the first two aspects, I have respected his right to raise a factual incorrectness by way of a question of privilege in order to give the Prime Minister an opportunity to correct the record.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling, of course, and I will not proceed with the third point, which is a matter of interpretation. I respectfully suggest that the two other points are very serious indeed and that the Prime Minister ought to clarify and correct the record.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, The Prime Minister would like to apologize; he has had to go to meet with the Prime Minister of Guyana so he would like to reserve his position in replying to the point made by the hon. member. I think we are always subject to differences of view, but I personally was present at the meeting before the announcement was made. I heard some of the facts stated by the Prime Minister in his reply and they were mentioned by the company throughout. Obviously, we were not talking to the same people within INCO, and we will have to check who is right. Evidently, we have received information from different sources.

● (1212)

MR. McGRATH—CLOSING OF FLUORSPAR MINE AT ST. LAWRENCE, NEWFOUNDLAND—MINISTER'S REPLY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my point of order refers to a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) yesterday arising out of an answer by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to my question. The record has to be corrected, and more importantly, because of the uncertainty facing the people of St. Lawrence, Newfoundland, they deserve some direct response from the government of Canada as to the recommendation made to the government of Newfoundland in regard to tariffs and ways and means of protecting the jobs of those people who are facing the consequences of a shutdown by Alcan.

In response to the hon. member for St. John's West, the minister indicated that it was not his intention to mislead the House. I am sure the minister realizes the gravity and seriousness of the situation. As reported at page 291 of Hansard dated October 26, 1977, the Minister of Finance is quoted as saying:

> If I can provide an answer to both hon. members I will do so tomorrow or the day after.

In view of the fact that this is a serious matter, I wonder if the minister is prepared to correct the record now.

Mr. Speaker: If the minister is prepared to correct the record, I would suggest he ought to do so with the consent of the House, which I presume will be forthcoming under the circumstances. Does the House consent to the minister making that correction?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have looked into the possibility of imposing a duty on fluorspar. The fluorspar which is imported will not be used in the same fashion as the fluorspar produced in Newfoundland. Therefore, the situation will not change. The matter is being investigated.

In regard to the future of this operation in St. John's, I did not realize all the aspects of the question yesterday. The hon. member should be informed that there have been consultations among the company, the provincial government of Newfoundland and the federal government. We have agreed to share the cost of a study being conducted in Newfoundland by a specialist from England. At this time there are discussions among the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the provincial authorities and Alcan in order to find the reason the operation must stop, and if there is any solution in order to maintain the operation.

Yesterday I was confusing this problem with another problem. I was aware of the problem, but at that point I did not realize it was the St. Lawrence operation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT—CHANGE IN HOURS OF SITTING DURING NOVEMBER

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the government House leader, whom I understand is still quite ill, I wonder if I might ask the deputy House leader the government's intention with respect to House business. Perhaps he can inform the House regarding the discussions the House leader and I have had with respect of certain temporary changes in hours and rules, which I understand are agreeable to all parties.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the business for next week?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I was including the business for next week, that goes without saying.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I should like to apologize to the other House leaders in that I have not been able to fulfil my expected intention which was announced last week. When I talked with them individually regarding the business before the House, I anticipated the government House leader would have returned to this Chamber by now. Therefore, that is the reason for my intention not being fulfilled.

I think I am about as sick as the government House leader at the present time; but the business of the House which will be called for Monday is the Canada Elections Act. Hopefully that will be dealt with in one day. It is not too controversial, but it is an important piece of legislation which needs to be passed expeditiously. Following that, we will deal with the report stage of the Air Canada bill and the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. At the same time, when the Income Tax bill is brought before the House, it will take precedence over the bills I have announced already.

In so far as the other negotiations which have taken place earlier this day, they relate to three specific areas: first, a limitation on debate for the balance of the throne speech to 20 minutes, which has been agreed to by all House leaders; second, the possibility of a deferred vote, any vote which may be called tomorrow to be deferred until 9.45 p.m. on Tuesday next; and, third, relating to the hours of sitting during the month of November.

In regard to this latter point, I was approached as to whether we would sit next Friday because of the impending Progressive Conservative national convention. It is customary that we take cognizance of these things and adjust our schedule. In order to accommodate that, and the other matters I have referred to, I believe Your Honour will get unanimous agreement to the following order:

That, notwithstanding any Standing or Special Order, the House shall not sit November 4, 1977; and

That the House shall adjourn at 6:00 p.m. on November 3, 1977 and November 10, 1977; and

That, during the month of November, 1977, the ordinary time of daily adjournment shall be 10:30 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays and 6:30 p.m. on Wednesdays, provided that, on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays, proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall be taken up between 6:00 p.m. and 6:30 p.m.; and

That, for the remainder of the Debate on the motion for an Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, no member shall speak for more than twenty minutes and, if a division is demanded on the said motion, it shall be deferred to 9:45 p.m., November 1, 1977.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we seem to be dealing with two things. First, we have questions about House business, and second, we have the proposed motion that the deputy House leader has just presented.

Under the heading of House business, may I ask the deputy House leader whether he has had any discussions with the government House leader concerning a bill respecting Heritage Day. We have been promised this legislation for three or four years now. When one asked questions about it in the early part of the year, he was told that February was a long way off. February is only four months away now, and I should like to know whether there will be legislation in this session with respect to Heritage Day, and will it be brought forward in time for it to be in effect in February, 1978?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

With respect to the proposed motion regarding the hours of sitting, my party is in agreement with it. The main purpose for the cancelling of the sittings next Thursday night and Friday has to do with the Progressive Conservative Party convention which will be held in Quebec City. This is a courtesy which is usually extended to all parties. Certainly my party goes along with it. As a matter of fact, on the assumption that the convention might receive some television coverage, there would be pretty tough competition between this House and the Tory convention at the same time. So, I guess it is just as well for us to give the Tories the air.

With regard to the proposal that speeches be limited to 20 minutes for the remainder of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, we are prepared to agree to that as well. I would like to enter a caveat or make this comment, however, that we are having our usual difficulties getting places for all the speakers whom we think we should have, and since the purpose of cutting down speeches to 20 minutes is to get as many in as possible, my agreement to that is based on the fact that we would like to be sure of one speaker today and one speaker tomorrow. We are not asking for any additional speakers but we do not think we should be prevented from having members of our party who are entitled to it take part in this debate. But on that understanding, we are prepared to agree to the motion that is put. I hope I can have an answer about Heritage Day, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, the motion has to be presented at this time with the consent of the House because there has been no notice given. Furthermore, the House would have to deal with it only with consent, so I do not think we need a discussion of the conditions or agreements. However, the caveat was well advertised.

The House has listened carefully to the proposed motion put forward by the deputy House leader. Its terms relate to clear events relating to the Conservative convention and, following that, to the ability of members to participate in Cenotaph ceremonies on November 11 and then for 20 minutes in the remaining speeches in the debate on the Address in Reply.

Does the House consent to dealing with this motion at present?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion of the deputy House leader?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the deputy government House leader and my colleagues on both sides of the House for the courtesy they have extended to our party.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I think I should rise to respond to the question put by the House leader of the NDP. He wanted to know if any discussions had been held with the House leader in respect of Heritage Day. To be quite specific, no, no discussions have been held directly between me and the House leader. But discussions have been held and I think this matter would be dealt with more appropriately by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) under whose office this bill would normally proceed. Perhaps he might be allowed to answer that question.

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows of my own very strong desire to proceed with the implementation of the legislation which had been presented to the House in past sessions, although not passed. It is therefore with considerable regret that I have to tell him that, in view of the economic implications of the legislation, it is not the intention of the government to proceed with it in the coming session of parliament.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Another broken promise!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order relating to the business of the House in the interests of efficiency. Next week we are beginning to consider government legislation, the first item of which is Bill C-5, some 100 pages in length. Would it be possible for the government to give serious consideration to including an index in such bills, particularly major ones, in order that members can make much more efficient use of them? Our current procedure in presenting bills, sometimes of great length, without any index makes it cumbersome and time consuming to use these documents. I think it would not involve too much trouble in the future if these bills were printed with a workable index.

Mr. Cafik: I would simply indicate that the concern expressed by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) is one that I, as a backbencher, have shared. Until such time as there is a new form of presentation of bills, I think that the committee to which the bill is referred should in fact turn over its own staff to try to arrange the bill in such a manner that it is more easily and expeditiously dealt with.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, my point of order has to do with the announcement of the deputy House leader on the traditional statement prior to November 11. As you will recall, last year there were interferences in the form of questions of privilege and points of order which caused embarrassment across the country. I think it should be guaranteed that the statement by the minister on Remembrance Day take place at a certain time and take precedence over any other business of the House.

Mr. Cafik: I will simply respond, not by way of making a commitment, but by saying that discussions have been undertaken on whether the minister should in fact make his statement immediately at the opening of that particular day preceding the question period and for the question period to be extended beyond that period to make up for the difference in time. No decision has been made, but I can assure hon. members that I am quite aware of the concerns they have expressed and I hope an agreement can be reached to accommodate that type of arrangement.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[Translation]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dennis Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to the speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Claude Tessier (Compton): Mr. Speaker, the obligation and the duty for elected representatives to intervene periodically and more officially in this House have been today vested in me. I express my gratitude to the Prime Minister for the confidence he thus places in me. All citizens in Compton riding also appreciate that mark of confidence regarding their desire to make the reality known to all Canada, unfortunate though it may be.

Those preoccupations and the avenue open to them today would appear sterile and outrageous for some 70,000 of my fellow citizens from the province of Quebec if they endorsed without question the position of the government and particularly of the party to which I belong.

Would anyone dare presume of my convictions regarding my chief, my colleagues, my allegiance? I do not think so. Mr. Speaker, even if my modest contribution to the ideal we are striving for were in the denunciation of its weaknesses, I would be convinced to have honestly contributed and offered what I have left of sincerity as member of a party and as a member of the institution of the Parliament of Canada.

Compton riding would figure favourably in a global analysis of the situation in Quebec on the cultural, social and economic aspects. The population of Compton is 80 per cent Francophone and 20 per cent Anglophone. The level of unemployment is one of the highest in the country and we have no hope of an economic recovery as our economy has long been in a state of stagnation. The existing industry steadily curtails its operations and it seems almost impossible to get new markets.

The direct allusion made by Her Majesty in her Speech from the Throne concerning the imminence of feelings like alienation, hostility and resentment caused by a possible lack of stability and equity is now part of day-to-day reactions in my riding.

● (1232)

Mr. Speaker, although I loudly voice my appreciation, this does not mean that I do not endorse the views of hundreds of my fellow-citizens who fight constantly against the departure of our young people, the phasing out and reduction of our essential services such as rail transportation and even the postal services in some cases. Among other things and with the help of the federal government those generous citizens promoted a tourist resort in Coaticook and an outdoor recreational area in Lake Megantic that are practically unique in Quebec as regards their location and their size.

It is with satisfaction as well that I welcome the recent action taken by a few businessmen and some 360 factory workers to preserve Waterville's source of livelihood and its right to work. It is a perfect example that enables me to reassert my confidence in private enterprises while urging the government to support equitably.

Mr. Speaker, like most hon. members, I cannot dissociate the Speech from the Throne from the economic and fiscal statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). In fact, both statements appear to me as related and complementary.

The federal government can only prove its good intentions by showing positively and unequivocally its will to stimulate our economy as a whole. What about the proposals put forward by the Minister of Finance? Although commendable, do they really take into account the prime purpose, which is to establish an adequate infrastructure for the creation of permanent jobs? Unfortunately, we cannot overlook the three factors which, as the Minister of Finance stated, hinder our growth—the relative weakness of our export markets, the high cost of our production, mainly due to ever increasing wage demands, and the loss of confidence brought about by our slow growth and the political uncertainty resulting from our threatened national unity.

I recognize that these problems are not peculiar to our country. However, whereas experts are considering development models for some third world countries, we fail to take in our country a systematic approach to strengthen our own economic structure, and this often under the pretence that we are rich and that our per capita income is higher than that of most other nations.

Mr. Speaker, the constituency of Compton wants to express today its dissatisfaction at the failure or incapacity of existing formulas to meet its need to survive economically. The problem lies in the incapacity of the government to conceive the existence of the rural environment. And yet, it exists and many feel that it offers some characteristics likely to facilitate the planning of tomorrow's society. There more than anywhere else, the physical and human environment still conveys our sense of belonging and our desire to participate in the social development of our community.

Should I stress officially the necessity of creating a department of rural development or some other body—the kind that our fathers called, quite rightly, the department of colonization, even though this term is now somewhat obsolete and has a bad connotation—at the risk of being taxed with disrespect in the history of our country of which we claim to be the actors? Of course, bureaucracy does not put up very well with such a justification, but you will agree with me that Canada means more than Montreal or Toronto and that non-metropolitan areas now provide the best conditions in which to attain our goals of social and economic development.

While Montreal is overpopulated and congested, East Angus is losing its people, with the danger of becoming a depressed area. The pulp and paper industry, one of the biggest sores in the constituency of Compton, needs the federal government to take an immediate stand. In that respect, the Quebec scheme seems to me to be very well thought out, and even our serene silence itself is no longer acceptable. The federal government must take a sensible and courageous position. Consultation between the various parties involved in this debate is both desirable and needed. The federal authorities have the legal right to act. Let us therefore recognize our clear responsibility to the thousands of workers who gave up as much as 40 years of their lives, only to fall victims of our silence at 55.

On the other hand, the textile industry is entitled to the protective measures announced in December 76 by the then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Chrétien. In a joint release issued last week, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) announced that negotiations would be held on bilateral protective agreements for a three-year period. That industry wished that the extension of those protective measures be immediately confirmed, so that they may go ahead and plan their production and marketing resources on a sound basis. This is not too much to ask in order to ensure the stability of this vital sector of the economy of Compton and the Eastern Townships as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, the reference in the throne speech to the food industry warrants special attention. I have a duty to focus on it in view of the agricultural nature of my constituency and my awareness that the federal government will have very delicate responsibilities to assume in the coming months. I also have a conviction that certain farming groups will be listening to my remarks as much as they did to the simple reference in the throne speech to certain actions. I am also certain that my remarks will inform the government of certain facts, and such information will no doubt cause controversy among those mainly concerned.

Mr. Speaker, we must welcome a policy promoting agricultural development through a better utilization of our food industry's capacity. I also endorse any initiative to promote the convening of a national food conference in order to develop a strategy for the Canadian food sector. Such a conference will also insist on better information of producers, consumers and processors. It should also give renewed significance to a balanced representation at the marketing board level.

This, however, leads me to question certain apprehensions. They have to do with the role and the status of farm producers themselves, and any initiative by the federal government will have to be based on consultation with them. Here is why: they are the ones producing and the government must make sure they get a fair return for that production.

Our agricultural sector is considered as one to be copied by several other producing countries. I was myself informed during the consultations at Brussels of the envy felt by certain member countries of the European Community, and I would like here, Mr. Speaker, to elaborate on those doubts I expressed a moment ago. They have to do with the Canadian dairy policy. It would be regrettable indeed if a reputation so dearly acquired should be tarnished by a malaise that is now being felt by the government and the producers themselves.

In that sense, I do admit that some readjustments are necessary in the very short run, otherwise open pressures would be warranted to have a public inquiry carried out on the administration and publication of marketing quotas for the next four years. It seems obvious on this day that very questionable practices have crept into the distribution of those quotas and that those responsible for such an usurpation—often producers representatives themselves—are causing enormous financial harm to the majority of those producers whose honesty however is unquestioned. The awareness of that breach of right is starting to poison the relationships between the producers and the federal government, and that, Mr. Speaker, is unacceptable. The cause of the malaise is identified and that is the most relevant reason for having such an inquiry and at least the need to rethink the membership of the supply management committee. The principle of equity will then have to underly that required operation in terms of producers representation.

That will result in a more vigilant awareness of producers with respect to their official organizations and the dangers inherent in such a system, however democratic it may be, will be better controlled. It would be regrettable indeed, Mr. Speaker, if after blaming us for everything the producers were to start accusing one another.

These are my precise views on the matters which we should discuss within the next months. National unity requires that all our efforts be directed to implementing decent measures to insure stability and equity in the economy of Canada and to guarantee the support of the population of Compton riding in an eventual consultation on the benefits to Quebec of its participation in the Canadian political evolution. It is absolutely necessary that the federal government protect the integrity of Canada and propose, as I mentioned, concrete amendments to answer legitimate rights and feasible aspirations of the Québecers, and of all other provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all the frustrations generated by three centuries of cultural confusion in Quebec make it more than ever necessary for all levels of government to approach this issue with an open and understanding mind. The political development of this beloved country of ours requires a positive attitude as well as ready acceptance of a reality that is challenging us, both as members of parliament and as private citizens. What are the solutions? There are some inasmuch as the very foundations of Canadian unity will be perceived as concrete realities by the Canadian people. In this matter, it is up to the federal government to substantiate or refute the views of those who question the basis of confederation. In trying to justify its existence, the federal government should not simply argue that it is the living symbol of the Canadian nation. Instead of indulging in such sophistry, it should endeavour to demonstrate the respective merits of centralization versus decentralization and account for its past and present policies. In this sense, cooperation between the federal and provincial secretariats appears essential in order to clarify or avoid the dualism which is at the root of our recent political evolution now being in jeopardy.

The present situation offers us the choice between several options, but it should not in any case justify our absence from several frontlines on which we are being attacked. It is imperative that immediate formulas provide for a louder presence of the various caucuses of Parliament in order to weaken a political strategy through which certain political authorities in Quebec intend to influence public opinion and try to make us appear as unable to consider any kind of changes.

Mr. Speaker, the present circumstances and the Speech from the Throne invite us to affirm clearly our presence as the spokesmen for a way of being which is indispensable to reach the objectives which the post-war generation has set for itself, a passionate generation to which I belong and whose need for clear-cut solutions I echo. One can therefore deduct from this affirmation that our young people should have a say in the coming decisions which will affect them. It is a legitimate concern after all. Let it then be explained at last that the very normal feeling of belonging to a culture and social ideals is not—and by far—incompatible with cooperation with other people from different origins whose aspirations are often the same. Let it be explained again the true reason for the existence of Canada, and we should never fear to insist too much about that, by testimonies going beyond the cult of personalities, thereby stressing the personal responsibility that each of us have in this matter. Let us finally claim, as members of the Quebec caucus, that respect which is now lacking. In short let the voices of its elected representatives in this House reflect Quebec as a distinct and special entity. And let the Lower Canada of the past century represent in the statutes of today and tomorrow the true status of Quebecers. That is my intimate perception of the existence of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that firmness which we must embody, I shall conclude on the major importance for regions such as the one I represent in this House to have access to the mechanisms of interventionism. That, I suggest, is a corollary to the feeling of participation in the Canadian community. Let our calamity become a reasonable challenge, let the creation of permanent jobs become a major concern for this House. Let harmony and vigour become our obligation for the forthcoming years. And if necessary, Mr. Speaker, we should be ready to coerce those Canadians who inherited, sometimes unwillingly, those leadership reflexes at the cultural, political or economic level. Those Canadians, maybe more than others, have a responsibility towards their countrymen and the first law they must abide by is that of mutual help and tolerance.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. At the outset, I should like to express my appreciation and also congratulations to the two hon. members who moved and seconded the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood). We were honoured to have Her Majesty read the Speech from the Throne and it is an event that members of parliament will remember all their days. I am not so enthusiastic about the contents of the speech. When I say that, I believe I am voicing the opinion of a great many people in Canada.

● (1252)

I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on accepting the criticism and pressure put on government by many Canadians with regard to the iniquitous legislation which would have taxed life insurance proceeds. I received a great deal of mail condemning that proposal. Had that legislation been passed, we would have been the only country in the world taxing the proceeds of life insurance. It would have meant robbing the widows and orphans. I congratulate the government on that.

The government has finally recognized that the average Canadian is highly overtaxed. I do not know how many millions of dollars are involved, but tax reductions of $100 are being given to the ordinary taxpayers. This amounts to a little under $2 a week. It is a small enough amount, but at least it is a step in the right direction. But to pretend that it is a solution to our great economic problems is absolutely ridiculous. Canadians are fed up. They do not want handouts or short-term goodies. Why does the government not come up with serious solutions to end this economic uncertainty? The opinion of a great many people is that it is afraid to do that. The Minister of Finance made ever so slight suggestions that mistakes have been made in the past. Let's call a spade a spade. The Liberal government is responsible for the miserable state of our economy.

The latest depressing sequel to this economic mess is massive layoffs at INCO plants in Sudbury, Thompson, Manitoba, in the constituency of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith), and Port Colborne. This will have drastic effects on the economies in those areas. I hope that something can be done to save those jobs which are so important not only to the workers and their families, but to the entire community.

Down through the years the government has provided assistance to big business. Certainly assistance to many businesses is necessary. I do not believe you have to put all your eggs in one basket. We should not put our entire faith and all our resources at the disposal of big business. We should give more assistance to small business. Small business provides 60 per cent of the jobs, the majority of jobs in this country. It accounts for more than 50 per cent of the value of business that is generated. I believe our gross national product is in the neighbourhood of $200 billion. I am sure most members will agree that this vital part of our economy was virtually ignored in the Speech from the Throne as well as in the minibudget which the Minister of Finance presented to the House last Thursday.

We do not have an overall policy dealing with small business and the problems relating to it. The United States has a very significant program geared to small business. Those who were in the House last week when our spokesman for small business participated in the debate heard the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) spell out the suggestions which the Conservative party recommends to assist small business.

As a rural member of parliament, I received innumerable calls from small businessmen. This morning I received a call from a businessman asking about the advantageous interest rates on small business loans. According to the government, this is something wonderful. It was extolled by the previous Minister of Finance. However, when it comes down to the cold, hard facts, when you are in the office of the bank manager, the advantageous rates for small business loans seem to be far off in never, never land. I hope the government will do something in this session to ensure that money is available to small business establishments at reasonable rates.

I believe that the rates of the Federal Business Development Bank are down slightly. This businessman who called me this morning had a $25,000 loan approved and processed a year ago at 12 per cent. He is trying to get the interest rate adjusted. I assume that under his contract he is locked into a 12 per cent rate for the duration of the loan. When interest rates come down, the Federal Business Development Bank should be able to adjust rates to assist the small businessman. That is certainly worthy of consideration and, I hope, approval.

The Minister of Finance was pre-empted by the Prime Minister with regard to the $150 million that is to be pumped into the economy. We are still not clear how this will be administered and who will receive it. In a statement today, the Minister of Finance said it was going to certain departments. Possibly government agencies and departments will pump the money into various parts of the economy where the need is greatest. With a projected $4 billion bill for unemployment insurance before the year is over, it will certainly be needed.

There has been much talk about the auto pact. From Canada's point of view, we are now an importer of auto parts. I am aware that the auto pact is a two-way street. There have been many heated questions, including today, on this very important segment of our economy.

Despite the fact that I represent the paradise vacationland of Canada, Parry Sound-Muskoka, there are some very good industries in my constituency. There are two plants which provide auto parts for the various automobile companies. One plant in particular is not a small plant trying to survive without any funds or assets. It is a branch of Rockwell International and is located in Parry Sound. Word has gone out that the staff of that plant is to be cut by more than 50 per cent, from 220 to 100. This is very serious in an area where there is a small population. The Rockwell plant was a corporate citizen.

I had the privilege of meeting with municipal officials as well as officials of the plant. The facts they presented were shocking. I am sure many members will be interested in this. In the past five years, this plant has been faced with huge increases. Hydro has increased by 128 per cent. Five years ago they paid $8,000 a month; now, it is $14,000. Their workmen's compensation board payments increased 271 per cent. Municipal taxes are up 54 per cent. Their OHIP payments are up by 191 per cent. Canada Pension Plan premiums have increased by 79 per cent; costs due to strikes and accidents have risen by 190 per cent and labour costs by 133 per cent. They ask: How can we compete successfully in the face of increases like this and keep the plant functioning at full capacity?

• (1302)

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At one o'clock the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) had the floor, and he has ten minutes left.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, when I called it one o'clock I was speaking about an industry in my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka which was phasing down its operations, though we certainly hope it will not disappear entirely. I also cited some figures which were rather staggering and frightening, showing what this company, Rockwell, is being faced with by way of higher costs. However, I want to emphasize that the 122 jobs which are being lost are probably going to the southern states, to a branch plant of the same company in Mississippi, where the social benefits are not the same, where we know the wages are lower and workmen's compensation and other benefits, which are very excellent in Ontario and, indeed, in Canada, are not in the same category. We have no proof of this, but it is food for thought.

There is also reason to think that those southern states are subsidizing wages in some way and we are not in a position to compete. I hope the new Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) will give serious consideration to the tough competition which is faced by a good many Canadian industries in the auto parts industry. I was interested in the speech made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to a tourist group last night. He referred to the fact that we are not at the forefront in the tourist industry. This was of particular interest to me because I represent the finest tourist area in the entire Dominion of Canada.

• (1412)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I am sure the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) will agree with that, because he is a summer resident in my constituency. We are delighted to have him spending his summers there. In his speech the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce cited some very, very startling figures. He indicated that it costs too much to travel in Canada. That is no secret, so he has not given us any great pearls of wisdom. He also referred to the fact that hotels, food and gasoline cost a lot more in Canada. Again, we agree with this. He went on to say that the tourist industry has not been as friendly or courteous as it might be to tourists. Probably he was referring principally to American tourists, because the greatest bulk of our tourists come from south of the border. I will concede that there is probably some truth in this.

Our tourist operators are faced with higher costs because of higher taxes. The government instituted a ten-cent gasoline tax two years ago in order to cut down on the consumption of gasoline. It cut down gasoline consumption for the tourists, as well as a lot of Canadians. We are aware of the staggering tourist deficit of $1.2 billion last year. It is forecast as being as much as $2 billion this year. This indicates that Canadians are great travellers, but not in Canada.

The shy and retiring hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) spoke eloquently the day before yesterday and suggested that we should "ban the tan". His suggestion was that anyone returning from the United States, or any southern climate, with a tan should have to pay a tax, in an attempt to try to keep them here. A better way of trying to keep them here would be to make it more attractive to visit Canada.

There is a good deal of criticism which can be levelled at certain government agencies, unfriendly and discourteous government agencies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I am thinking of the Department of National Revenue, the customs and excise branch. There were specific cases last year of Americans crossing the border who were treated as smugglers, as if they were bringing in arms and what not. Their cars were gone through with a fine-tooth comb. In some cases Americans were fined and charged duty on groceries they were bringing into Canada. There were carloads of fishermen coming for a week. One carload had $40 worth of groceries, and they were charged $6. Fortunately, they had the $6, but they swore on a stack of Bibles and a few other things, according to the information I received, that they would never return to Canada.

Another problem is the latest customs and excise deal where the department is going after American tourists who for generations have been leaving their boats in Canada. They will be charged duty on their boats unless they take them back when they return to the United States. With regard to boats of over 20 horsepower, the duty can be as much as 40 per cent of the market value. When I was in my constituency I spoke to one tourist. He pointed to his boat and said, "I brought that boat over here and I was going to leave it here. I could be paying storage charges of approximately $800 per year to a marina. But since your damn government is going to charge me $4,000 duty on the boat, I am going to take it back with me." He indicated that he was not going to give the government $4,000. Surely we can find an answer to alleviate this exacerbating problem which is making Americans angry.

I should like to refer to American tourist operators who have tourist establishments in Canada. The customs and excise branch hauled in one of these operators, after he had gone to pick up a few parcels and pay the duty on them, and told him that his car could only be driven by himself for pleasure. This is absolutely ridiculous.

We are trying to attract our American neighbours. I will concede that we have the 90-cent dollar in our favour in this regard. As far as our imports are concerned, certainly it is not in our favour. Then we come up with methods where customs officials are showing their authority and exercising the letter of the law, which will certainly go against our efforts to attract American tourists to visit Canada. I hope something will be done to give a lesson in public relations and courtesy to our government officials as well as our tourist operators. Probably there is fault on both sides. However, a great many of our officials at the border are courteous; I have checked this out with senior officers. We could not have a neighbour in the world better than our neighbours in the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Yet we have strained and crazy relations with them at times. Our two countries engage in $40 billion worth of trade back and forth each year. In plain English, that is a hell of a lot of money. It is more than the trading which goes on between any two other countries in the world. There are 38 million border crossings each year between our two countries. Nationalists have been complaining about the United States taking over Canada. I understand the United States has $50 billion invested in Canada, which is a lot of money, with a population of 220 million. But Canadians have over $5 billion invested in the United States. That was before Canadian capital was scared out of the country, so I am not aware how high it is now. Nobody says anything about that.

These are matters which must be thought about. We must try to work with our big neighbour to the very best advantage in order that both of us may benefit. These are very, very important matters. Both our countries have so much in common, and we get along very well in so many things, that it is unfortunate the odd thing ruffles feathers. As a Canadian, I take exception to some of the things Americans say, and we cannot blame Americans for adopting the same attitude. We are first cousins; I suppose, brothers, when you come down to it. We are very fortunate to be situated side by side.

I know my time is running out, but I want to mention that I am a member of the housing committee. I was disappointed—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte).

• (1422)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I am thrilled to speak during the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, especially since Her Majesty herself delivered the speech.

Mr. Speaker, we could have expected on that occasion that the Speech from the Throne would be more substantial and show some maturity on the part of Parliament in general and the government in particular. Unfortunately, I think that it was a lost opportunity to make something interesting and original. On the contrary, it can be said that we heard the same trivia delivered in a royal fashion.

Mr. Speaker, within the present Canadian context it is extremely important that hon. members in this House cast aside their prejudices, parochialism and overcome their bitterness and disappointments. The time has come for us to demonstrate our maturity and serenity and try to resolve problems which are assuming crisis proportions.

Mr. Speaker, we must realize that, unfortunately, this government does not seem to have yet accepted the choice the province of Quebec made about a year ago. Cabinet members, starting from the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself, vent their bitterness and resentment and I am afraid, and this is very serious, they are even trying to hinder the work of the Quebec government. Mr. Speaker, this is not mature behaviour. It is irresponsible and childish. On the election night, last year, we heard all kinds of poppycock by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who went so far as to say: You will not get any more money in Quebec. That will teach you how to behave. After they got that off their chests, you could expect they would calm down and get off Quebec's back whether they liked its government or not.

Mr. Speaker, a year has now passed. It seems to me they should have regained their composure by now but they have not. And we saw the Prime Minister try a bit of brinkmanship and go down to Washington where he, a man credited with a high intellect, did something quite stupid: he said that Quebec independence was a crime against mankind. Mr. Speaker, what an irresponsible statement! It is going overboard! It is a total lack of respect for Canada. Yet he did not stop there. In the Speech from the Throne he decides on a referendum war. There will be a referendum and a cross-referendum. The Prime Minister will make people in Quebec and the rest of Canada say whatever he wants them to say. Where is his sense of responsibility, Mr. Speaker? When will our good friends opposite cease to equate red-blooded patriots with people bent on the destruction of our country?

Mr. Speaker, it is a falsehood. When our friends opposite claim that the hon. member for Champlain and the Quebec government and people are separatists they are making malicious allegations. As far as I know the Quebec government and the hon. member for Champlain feel the way the Socred M.P.s demonstrated they felt last week end. They want to live in harmony in this country. They want the real, concrete groups which make up this country to live their own lives and shape their own futures.

There is therefore nothing negative about the decision made by Quebecers last year. Why is the government taking such an attitude? Would it be, Mr. Speaker, to try to hide the enormous weaknesses in the economy? Would it be to make people forget about unemployment? Would it be to hide inflation? Would it be to make people forget the incompetence of cabinet members? Mr. Speaker, we may well wonder when we see a prime minister over-react and fight windmills like Don Quixote.

Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the Parti Québécois now in power in Quebec only said that it wanted a new agreement in Canada, that it wanted a new partnership based this time on the elementary justice principle of true equality. What is wrong with that? What is so wrong that we should go and say in Washington that it is a crime against humanity? Mr. Speaker, let us be calm and let us see things as they really are. Why should we want to convey a false impression to those who do not want Canada to survive, because if it does, it will be once again thanks to the spirit of Quebecers who until now have acted as a sort of buffer, as a catalyst to prevent Canada from being simply a geographic extension of the United States. We no longer want to play such a secondary role. We want a positive role. We want to assert ourselves as we are. That is why, in my opinion, Quebec is now able to show the way towards the implementation of this new Canada, a Canada restructured according to everybody's needs, a Canada where everyone will be truly free to develop to one's liking, a Canada where there will finally be true equality, a Canada where there will no longer be absurdities as there now are.

I was listening the other day to the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé). I must say that I always thought she was very serious, but in her speech the day before yesterday, she did not speak very seriously since, when discussing language bill 101, she said that it ran counter to such and such a thing, in other words, that the Quebec government should not have passed it. Mr. Speaker, we have a democratically elected government who introduced legislation in the National Assembly and this legislation was passed in principle even unanimously in the National Assembly, since everyone recognized the need to legislate in this area because of the countless injustices that have always existed.

Mr. Speaker, when we have a prime minister and ministers who say: No, we shall not disallow Bill 101. It would be too dangerous, Quebecers as a whole would resent the government if it did, but we shall adopt an insidious strategy by paying those who want to test the legislation. Mr. Speaker, there is something diabolical about this. Why should the taxes of René Matte, member of parliament for Champlain, Quebec taxpayer, who is in perfect agreement with the Quebec government, be used to bring charges against me? We have been masochistic long enough without this. I was listening to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) yesterday. What he said was terrible. Perhaps the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Tessier) had him in mind when he said that Quebec members are a "gang of nobodies". Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. The hon. member for Compton is reported as having said, and I quote:

> As he stated in his document of last July, Mr. Tessier maintained yesterday that Quebec Liberal members have never taken the necessary steps to improve their image or to put forward Quebec's views.

Mr. Speaker, if there was no development in Hull, it is because some members, like the present member for Hull, have always managed to prevent development from taking place on both sides of the Ottawa river. I find he considers the federal government and the Parliament buildings in Ottawa as an umbrella, as a kind of Santa Claus. This hon. member is rather late, Mr. Speaker, whereas since Quebecers have decided on their own to bend down on their knees no longer, to creep no longer, they have decided to hold hands with the rest of Canada and to say from now on: Let us give this country a real striking force which will be held as an example throughout the world. Let us give everyone the opportunity to develop as he sees fit.

At noon I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). Mr. Speaker, in the very region which the Minister of Finance represents a company has just laid off some 300 to 400 workers. What has the federal government done to prevent Wayagamack from closing down? What has it done? Nothing, because it would be quite pleased to see this company close down. It would be quite pleased to see Quebec at grips with an even higher unemployment rate, and then tell the people: Do not go off on your own, just see what will happen if you do! You will go bankrupt!

Mr. Speaker, such a behaviour is terrible. Somebody must denounce it. It is terrible, but that is what they are doing. So, the Minister of Finance who represents the riding of Saint-Maurice, 10 miles away from Wayagamack, prefers not to do anything in order to prove to the people in Quebec that they made a bad choice in the last election. It is shocking, but that's the way it is, Mr. Speaker.

And the threats made by the regional economic expansion minister (Mr. Lessard) are carried out. They will not save Quebec, and above all they do not want things to run smoothly in Quebec. What is one to think of people who act this way, Mr. Speaker? What is one to think of people like the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé) who also said, in order to prove that Quebecers all agree with the federal government and disagree with the Quebec government: In my riding, I have distributed 5,000 gadgets? Puzzles, Mr. Speaker, when I am considered a separatist. Good heavens, give us puzzles! Everybody also likes that in my constituency. Are we now to base our policies on gadgets and to determine what the people in Quebec want according to the distribution of gadgets? What a poor argument!

Mr. Speaker, since a solution has to be found to a global problem, let us stop the name-calling and let us start being positive. Maybe our party views the matter differently from the party now in power in Quebec, but it all comes to the same thing. We want all the provinces to consider completely renewing the Confederation, so that we may first negotiate an association on equal terms. If that does not work, we will fully agree to independence. Maybe the Parti Québécois views this from another point of view because they say: First we become independent and then form an association. That is the only difference between our party and the Parti Québécois.

From now on, Mr. Speaker, it must be known that our goal is simply to restructure Canada as we really want it to be, without being unfair to anybody, by creating a healthy climate instead of being mean or imputing motives to others.

And then, we will no longer have committees which we want to be unbiased while they are not. Every time I hear about committees on Canadian unity, I wonder what it means, in terms of what Canadian unity is related to the Prime Minister's conception of it. Is there anything wrong with a Canadian unity that would involve five areas where sovereign states would agree to draft a new constitution, where each would freely determine the fields that must be shared, which ones should not be affected?

Mr. Speaker, if we were sensible enough to reflect on such matters, we would see why this government is trying to create trouble where there is none. In yesterday's paper, there is a report of what Mr. Lévesque said in British Columbia:

Mr. Lévesque stated that he favours a proposal whereby a Canada made up of five partners each representing one large area of the country would negotiate a new form of Confederation.

Mr. Speaker, far from being against the confederative principle, I should like Canada to become a real confederacy, that is to say a union of sovereign states. We should not forget something very important. Of course there are other issues, but because this includes all the others, I do not mind devoting some time to it. The necessity to deal objectively with this issue stems from the fact that the future of our country depends on it. If, from the point of view of history, Quebec insists on being considered as a separate entity, as a nation, nobody can blame it. If it can help Ontario adopt similar views for itself, why not make Ontario independent as well? Why not make the Prairies independent? Why not make British Columbia and the Maritimes independent? And with these five independent entities, we could build a marvelous and diversified Canada, yes, an harmonious Canada where it would be nice to live and where there would be no subordinates.

As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of such a proposal, far from seeking the destruction of our country, is to make it greater and progress still further. We shall achieve this purpose only if we realize the need to deal objectively with this issue, and later with other issues, such as the economy and social affairs. This is something important and urgent, Mr. Speaker, but it is a fact that Quebecers will no longer agree to go where the money is and forget about such things as pride and dignity, for I shall make a point of telling Quebecers and making them understand that wealth is the reward of pride and dignity.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the responsibilities of the Secretary of State are a little like a cafeteria; there is an enormous range of responsibilities, including official languages policy, protocol, state funerals and education. There are a variety of things I could speak about this afternoon, and I would like to speak about them all, but given the time constraints I will concentrate my remarks on the responsibilities I have in relation to official languages policy.

There is a very marked difference of view between the government and the official opposition in relation to official languages. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) regards two official languages in Canada as a divisive force within our country, almost a millstone around our necks, or at best, to be fair to him, he regards them as a regrettable necessity. We on the government side, on the contrary, regard our two official languages as an opportunity, something to be welcomed and something to be made a real and vital force in our society which will strengthen a distinctive Canadian identity.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) pretends that the official languages policy has been a cause of the present tensions in our country. That view of his is the reverse of the truth. Of course there have been some errors in implementation, but by far the majority of our efforts have been successful. That is not merely the view of the government; that is the view, as well, of Mr. Spicer, the former Commissioner of Official Languages, who indicated that, in spite of some criticism, 80 per cent of our efforts were useful and successful. Nor, as the Leader of the Opposition would have us believe, are the forces of separation simply a reflection of Canada's economic problems. I do not minimize for a moment the importance of the economic challenges to this country—challenges to governments, to management and workers alike. But to believe that solving these economic problems will in itself lead to the end of the thrust for separation is either wilful misrepresentation or simple-minded innocence verging on irresponsibility.

The roots of separation in Quebec are much more complicated than that simple-minded analysis. The forces for separation have increased despite unprecedented prosperity in our country over the past 15 years. The thrust for separation reflects more than anything else a sense of insecurity, whether justified or not, and pessimism over the ability of the French language and culture not simply to survive but to thrive in a North American society which modern technology and communications make more and more complex and integrated.

[Translation]

We will succeed in staying the forces working for separation only if we can honestly say to French Canadians that one of our ultimate goals is to see to it that throughout Canada a climate proper to the development of French language and culture will prevail. And if Anglophones cannot find in themselves enough generosity to work toward this goal, if we cannot honestly give them this assurance, then Canada's days are numbered. The Leader of the Opposition did not understand that, and he takes a negative and pernicious approach on official languages.

[English]

I mentioned earlier that there has been a substantial measure of success in our official languages policy and its implementation. Nevertheless, all members of the House will recognize that this policy has continued to be the object of some large degree of misunderstanding on the part of certain sections of the Canadian public. In the face of this, the government felt it necessary to review its policies and develop a new expression of the proposals that have guided its actions in relation to official languages over the past ten years.

The newly expressed principles formed the core of the document "A National Understanding" which outlines the kind of relationship that must exist between Francophones and Anglophones in this country, a relationship based on equality. The document sets out in clear terms the basic principles that, taken together, constitute the official languages policy of Canada. It is the purpose of these principles to give concrete expression to the equality of status of English and French as the official languages of Canada. It is the hope of the federal government that these principles will be accepted by all Canadians and by the provincial governments, in order to safeguard the fundamental linguistic duality of Canada within the framework of its cultural diversity.

With this in mind, the federal government has reassessed its own situation in the public service and, given the progress made to date in providing services in both official languages, is now in a position to implement the gradual elimination of the special language training efforts in the public service, expecting that the educational system will thereafter provide the necessary bilingual candidates to meet its needs.

The emphasis that must be given to this area gives special importance to the negotiation of new education arrangements with the provinces which are presently under way. Let me add that those negotiations are not merely a recent response to the problem. Over the past decade, for about seven years the government has provided something like two-thirds of $1 billion to provincial governments to assist them in expanding their school systems for second and minority language education. We are concerned that the present negotiations make the objectives of the agreements more precise and establish criteria and methods of evaluation so that all levels of government may be aware of the degree of success of our joint efforts.

But I should make one thing clear. The federal government does not regard the efforts of the provinces in this area as a special concession or favour to the federal government. They are, rather, a response to the needs of the citizens of their provinces, and it is exactly the purpose of our statement in "A National Understanding" to urge the provincial governments to accept for themselves the application of official languages policy within their own areas of jurisdiction, including education.

We have all been encouraged by the response of the provincial premiers at their conference this summer in St. Andrews, New Brunswick where they committed themselves to working out ways of improving the educational facilities available to French-language citizens across Canada. We await the results of their studies with considerable interest and optimism.

I referred a few moments ago to the passage of the Official Languages Act. That was a crucial step. Those who argue that our official languages policy has been a cause of division in this country should pause for one moment and reflect honestly on what the situation would be if we had not undertaken this commitment. Assuredly, Mr. Speaker, we would not now be agonizing over keeping this country together. Failure to have embarked on the official languages policy would have torn the country apart long before this.

The Official Languages Act has stood the test of time well. There are, however, we believe, useful changes that could be made to it to reinforce its effectiveness. I shall, therefore, be presenting to the House amendments which will, especially, strengthen the powers of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

[Translation]

We will see to it that the Commissioner of Official Languages, who is a representative of Parliament and has the support of Parliament, can in the shortest possible time apply the principles of the official languages policy established by Parliament.

The situation of the official language minority groups in Canada is another area of very special concern. Every Canadian who has at heart the future of Confederation really must recognize how important it is to ensure in fact the survival of the official language minority groups, and their survival and development not as isolated enclaves but rather as integral parts of life in Canada. I am of course referring to the French-speaking minorities outside Quebec and English-speaking minorities in Quebec.

Our government really wants to see that French and English minorities get fair and equitable treatment and not be regarded as second-class citizens.

As for the French-speaking minority groups, last spring the government received a revealing report entitled "Lord Durham's Heirs". The study recommended many steps which could be taken to ensure real survival of Francophone groups outside Quebec. The government studied that document in very great detail.

After consultation with the hon. members who are the legitimate spokesmen of Francophone minorities outside Quebec, I intend to announce what the federal government proposes to do to serve them well. I trust I can hold those consultations within a month and, therefore, announce within a few weeks what new measures we intend to take.

Most of the recommendations contained in the report "Lord Durham's Heirs" apply to provincial and municipal governments. That is why, in fact, the government has suggested an amendment to the constitution, in line with the proposal made last month, in the field of education, to the provincial premiers, and also in line with the Victoria charter with regard to other aspects of the rights recognized in conjunction with the official languages. That would be the surest way of achieving our objectives. If Anglophone provinces see the need for amending our constitution in that way, they will thus prove to the francophone minorities, and even the Francophone majority in Quebec, that the whole country accepts the principle of the equality of both official languages, and that attitude should dissipate expectations of separation.

In this vital area, how to combat the forces of assimilation which threaten the survival of Francophones outside Quebec, co-operation between the federal and provincial governments is desirable. I shall, therefore, also be consulting with the provincial governments over the next few weeks on how we may best respond to the needs of these endangered communities.

When we speak of official language minorities, there is a tendency for some to think only of the Francophone communities living outside Quebec. But we must also remember that in Quebec there is another official language minority, the English-speaking population of 800,000. This minority, historically strongly established, now feels threatened. As a result of the present policies and future objectives of the present Quebec government, the Anglophone community feels undermined and insecure. Many of its members feel that the objective of the present provincial government is to force them out of their province into other parts of Canada. The federal government, just as it is concerned with the threat of assimilation of Francophones outside Quebec, is concerned over the sense of insecurity presently felt by Anglophones inside Quebec.

I have recently received approaches from the community for help to document their concerns, especially with regard to the shifts in population as well as businesses, and to outline the economic effects of these changes. As with the Francophones outside Quebec and the help of a similar nature which we gave them some years ago, we feel disposed, in all fairness, to offer similar support to the Anglophones in Quebec if requested, so that they can better understand their future and make representations to the relevant authorities for their survival. We are prepared to support projects that encourage creative rapprochement between English and French-speaking Quebeckers, activities that assist English-speaking Quebeckers and their associations to become bilingual, and programs which enable English-speaking Quebeckers to preserve their cultural heritage.

In all the other provinces there are strong associations representing the Francophone minorities, but for a variety of historical circumstances such an association has not developed in Quebec. If it appears that English-speaking groups are now ready to co-operate with each other and develop the basis for an organization or structure of organizations representing them as an official language minority in Quebec, we would be prepared to encourage and support this development. I believe such a structure could be a positive intermediary between the English-speakers in Quebec and the provincial government, as well as a valid spokesman vis-à-vis the federal government.

[Translation]

To give concrete proof of its interest in Francophones outside Quebec, and Anglophones within Quebec, the government has decided to increase considerably the credits earmarked for the official languages minority groups program. We intend to set aside for this program an amount of $75 million in the next five years. Thus, we will be better able to meet the needs of official language minority groups in the various parts of Canada.

[English]

My remarks this afternoon have focused on the language policy. I do not have time to describe at length the problems and opportunities we face in cultural policy, although this is an area of my department's responsibilities about which I have intense concern.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): You told us earlier today you would.

Mr. Roberts: As the hon. member says, earlier in the question period today I did express my strong interest in this area of activity. I say to members of the House, frankly I would like to receive more questions and more inquiries about our cultural policy. It is an area of policy which is extremely important and which, with exception of the parliamentary committee, has not been examined in great detail or depth by members of the House. I want to assure members of the House that this is an area of importance. I hope to be able to announce new directives in a variety of areas over the next few months; perhaps in the House, perhaps outside of it. My own preference, as hon. members know, is to present my views on this matter to members before speaking outside the House.

I do not have time to describe at great length the challenge to this country on cultural policy, the difficulties we have in maintaining within the Canadian market a place for the expression of Canadian creativity reflecting Canadian experience. There are difficulties which are particularly strong in areas where there is high commercial involvement, such as films, television, publishing, commercial objectives which are mingled with the cultural objectives we have. These areas are extremely complicated. Earlier in this House, during the question period, we touched on the aspect of distribution in relation to the film industry and the difficulties that poses for the expression of Canadian creativity. It is the problems of distribution which are the key in many of these areas—such as publishing, television, and records as well. It is my hope to be able to elaborate a detailed policy in these various domains in a few months. I will be anxious to discuss not only these problems, but the way in which we can respond to them, with members of the House at greater length. Perhaps the standing committee would be a useful vehicle for that examination.

I had hoped to have 40 minutes to speak to members of the House. I find, for reasons which I understand very well, that I have been restricted to 20 minutes. Therefore, there is not time for me to develop today at great length the challenge that we face and our positive response to it. I wish to assure hon. members that that opportunity will come in the very near future.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) would permit one question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the minister accept a question from the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)?

Mr. Roberts: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State why he has not chosen to speak about some of the other areas of his department, such as Canada Council grants, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has urged Canadians to get tough because they are getting too soft. Within the area of Canada Council grants we have an established writer living in Westmount who is getting a travel grant from the Canada Council. That may be one area in which the government can start getting tough. When is the Secretary of State going to start asking applicants to show a sense of need before they get a Canada Council grant, so that artists, pseudo-artists and dilettantes can be separated in the whole maze of applications?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question. I had intended to speak about the effects of the proclamation of the new citizenship act and the development of the citizenship policy, the establishment with the Council of Ministers of Education of a continuing arrangement to discuss mutual concerns relating to education. Also, the opening of negotiations with the provinces on agreements for the support of extending minority and second language education; a progress report on the performance of Open House Canada which will enable 20,000 young people to exchange visits across Canada.

I intended to talk about "a national understanding"; to recount to the House the progress we are making with the elaboration of Canada Day celebrations; the very marked advances we have made in relation to the migrated native peoples' program; the introduction of corps funding for native peoples' associations. I wanted to note the very good work that the Department of Secretary of State had done in arranging for the royal visit which all members of the House welcomed. I particularly wanted to discuss, for the hon. member's benefit, the expansion of $13½ million of funding, if parliament approves it, over the next 18 months for the support of the arts in Canada. This will enable the Canada Council to undertake more effectively its support for creative people in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. minister's time has expired.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I wish to begin with a few words on multiculturalism in Canada. I am not sure whether the intentions of the government in 1971 were serious when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced such a policy. I do not know whether that policy was introduced by the government for the purpose of political expediency, to woo the ethnic voters in Canada who comprise more than 30 per cent of our population.

I do not know whether it was an honest attempt to involve Canadians whose origin is other than that of the two founding nations, English and French, to bring them more into the mainstream of Canadian life and no longer regard them as second-class citizens. Whatever the motives of the government, I can assure them that with their introduction of a multicultural policy in Canada they now have a tiger by the tail and dare not let go.

• (1502)

Despite all the vehement protestations to the contrary by various spokesmen on multiculturalism on the government side, the objections of certain Quebec caucus members to multiculturalism have been so great that there is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister and the cabinet would have terminated this policy once and for all had there been any let-up in the flak produced by this side of the House and the protestations from many of the 71 or so ethnic groups against such a move.

Mr. Speaker, I like to look upon myself as an optimist as far as as multiculturalism in Canada is concerned. We now have a minister who I think is interested in the subject and sincere in his idea for the further progress of multiculturalism in Canada. This is not to detract from the three former ministers; I am sure they did their level best, under very trying circumstances and in the face of much cabinet opposition, to push forward programs designed to further multiculturalism. The new minister has come out vigorously in support of qualified persons of ethnic origin occupying more positions of high responsibility in government and in Crown corporations, the greater involvement of "ethnics" in the broadcasting field and other areas.

The minister may be filled with good intentions, and there is certainly nothing wrong with having good intentions. But it remains to be seen whether those good intentions will lead to action and firm direction, and how much influence the minister has with his cabinet colleagues. As the critic for multiculturalism on behalf of my party, I am willing to give the minister a little more rope, a little more time in which to familiarize himself with his new portfolio before I cross-examine him for the good of multiculturalism across Canada.

I should like to say a few words about our country. I shall speak very bluntly. It is necessary to be blunt, not because there is any particular virtue in inflaming passions, arousing resentment or making people uncomfortable, but because this country will only recover from its national despondency if we are all prepared to tell it as it is and, further, to persuade all our people that the country is worth saving. This means facing reality and understanding it, and having the moral courage to insist on the best that is in Canadians because the times demand the best.

There were, and still are, people who say the idea of Canada is illogical, that it cannot work, that assimilation by the United States is inevitable, that our country defies the laws of trade, and that it is impossible to contain in one country many different linguistic and cultural groups. Such arguments have been with us since the beginning. They are being resurrected again, not only in Quebec but in other parts of Canada. But the reality defies those arguments because, on the whole, since confederation we have been remarkably successful. We have built a great country under circumstances, at times, of immense difficulty. Moreover, this has been done within the framework of three parliamentary institutions and a high degree of civility under the rule of law. We have not been perfect, and given the nature of mankind we are unlikely ever to be perfect. But we most certainly have not been a failure. This is the first reality and it is the starting point for any debate on where we go from here.

The second reality is that the complaints raised with regard to our country have all been voiced before. Quebec separatism, or independence as Premier Lévesque chooses to call it, is not new. A deep and constant sense of nationalism has always been part of the French-Canadian presence and in its extreme form has never been far from the idea of separation. Western alienation is not new. Atlantic Canada's grievances did not begin yesterday. Because of the vast geographic size of Canada, its diverse economic opportunities and the linguistic and cultural differences which characterize it, there have been, and probably always will be, strains within confederation. That is no reason for wringing our hands and giving up. What it means is that we must resolve these problems, perhaps not to the satisfaction of every dissident in the country, because that is impossible, but to the satisfaction of the large majority of our people. It means we cannot take things for granted. It means that the dynamics of our society imply constant change, and that the task of government and citizenship is to face up to reality and find solutions.

Those of us whose heritage is neither British nor French realize that our cultural aspirations may well be severely limited during the next few years as the federal government and provincial governments continue their negotiations on the political integrity of Canada. We may well be asked to compromise certain of our multicultural ideals for the sake of accommodating the linguistic demands of the present Quebec government. The disturbing fact is that the government of Quebec is determined to protect the culture and linguistic rights of the French-speaking population of that province, while showing little concern for the rights of other minority groups, including those of French-Canadians outside Quebec. I should like to take a little time in which to review and examine the assumptions behind Canada's policy of multiculturalism in order to place my remarks into context.

There were several sound reasons for the development of a multicultural policy. Those reasons are as valid today as they were six years ago when the policy was first enunciated. Let us consider two of the assumptions behind that policy. First, the degree of cultural diversity which exists in Canada rules out the melting pot approach to national unity. It has been argued that cultural diversity has been of positive benefit to the development of Canadian society. There are few people who can look back over the last 20 years—to the Bill of Rights, to the centennial year and EXPO, to the Olympic Games and, more recently, to the establishment of a Human Rights Commission—and fail to realize to what extent these events have drawn upon the strength of a country whose culture rests upon the full and equal participation of all its ethnic groups. The events of the past year have not lessened the reality that Canada's vitality depends to a large extent on its cultural diversity. Indeed, many would claim that this is the example which Canada sets for the rest of the world.

In the second place, the cultural diversity of this country is a significant bulwark of our democratic principles. Tolerance of cultural diversity in a nation is one of the best measures of the strength of its democratic institutions. Conversely, when democracy is on the wane, minority groups are often the first to suffer. In this respect, I think any multiculturalism policy must establish very high standards of racial, religious and ethnic understanding for us all. I do not believe we are prepared, as a nation committed to democratic freedoms, to accept anything less.

We should now proceed to examine the role of the recently elected Quebec government in the context of our concern for the preservation of the cultural diversity of Canada and the security of our democratic traditions. Undoubtedly, there is a great deal of sympathy among Canada's ethnic minorities for the aspirations of Quebec's Francophone population—probably more than René Lévesque is aware of. In particular, roots which have their origin in territories under Soviet occupation must possess an excellent understanding of the concern of French-Canadians for cultural survival.

Sympathy and understanding should not, however, stop us from being critical of the activities of the Parti Québécois when it threatens our vision of a Canadian nation based on tolerance and encouragement of many different cultures, especially since that vision should not, and does not, conflict with the special rights of French-Canadians.

Two recent examples of the Lévesque government's reaction to multiculturalism are its stand on native language rights and the imposition of bill 101. Both these situations leave much to be desired in terms of tolerance and respect for minority rights. The government's reaction to the James Bay natives demands that English continue to be their second language, a matter which is guaranteed by law, has the appearance of being very high-handed and something of an overreaction, to say the least. The situation respecting the educational freedoms of other minority groups further demonstrates that the Lévesque government holds less than a sincere desire for a new and separate multicultural state which it continuously expounds.

On the basis of this kind of evidence, I believe Quebeckers have the responsibility to pay very close attention to the intentions of their government. The integrity of the Lévesque government will depend, as far as the multicultural community is concerned, on the implementation of policies which match the democratic freedoms and cultural tolerance of our over-all Canadian society. There is no doubt that the Parti Québécois has introduced an element of uncertainty with regard to Quebec's future, to say the least. Whatever the troubling aspects of the Quebec election, there is, in one sense, a possible benefit from it for the entire country. I think the election has started Canadians thinking seriously about what Canada means to them and what each of them would lose in both a material and an emotional sense if this country ever broke apart.

Those of us of non-British and non-French origin stand to lose if Quebec should leave confederation. In so doing, we must face certain realities, the first of which is that Canada might well not be a multicultural country if not for the French-Canadian presence. It is an accepted fact that the French-Canadian determination to preserve their language and culture provided the basis for other groups to make similar demands. The best evidence of this can be found in the proceedings of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission. It was not until a royal commission was set up to study the bicultural nature of Canada that members of Canada's other ethnic groups found the opportunity to demand official recognition of the multi-ethnic or multicultural character of Canadian society. However, just as the French-Canadians set an example by their struggle for cultural survival, they would also set an example by their secession. The fear that Canada's cultural diversity could contribute to the country's fragmentation would suddenly become a reality.

Ironically, however, French-Canadians have also provided some of the strongest opposition to multiculturalism. This opposition has stemmed largely from a fear that multiculturalism was oriented toward placing French-Canadians on the same level as other ethnic groups, and that this situation would lead to their slow but inevitable assimilation into the Anglophone community. This opposition to multiculturalism on the part of French-Canadians is the second reality that we must face. Thus, if we have concern for preserving Canada as a united and multicultural nation, we must accept certain obligations. Above all, we must counter the separatist argument that the Canadian kind of community is not worth preserving. The separatists offer different reasons for their position—some cultural and some economic. To all but the most romantic separatists, we can demonstrate that it makes better economic sense to change arrangements within the country than to set up a separate shop.

There is no question that we live in a world of mass production where economic security depends upon the production of large volumes of goods and, as well, access to large markets. In the modern world, as the Belgians, the British, the French, the Germans and others have found, the way to make more money and to keep more money is in having larger trading units, not smaller ones. One of the most effective weapons against the separatist inclination in Quebec, in the west or wherever else it might arise, would be a coherent national economic policy to stimulate steady economic growth, and to provide real job opportunities for all Canadians. But an equally compelling case is cultural. The culture we value, whether it is Québécois, or Ukrainian-Canadian, Greek-Canadian or Albertan, can only thrive in a broad community like Canada whose tradition is to respect differences.

Multiculturalism works toward heightening the awareness of Canadians to the importance of cultural diversity. It sensitizes Canadians to the important connection between languages and culture. It refutes the argument that the minority must conform to the will of the majority on all issues. Any step in the direction of a more just and a more democratic society can only serve to benefit not only French-Canadians but all Canadians.

In conclusion, let us remember that only by recognizing the legitimate aspirations of others can we ensure the recognition of our own.

Hon. James Richardson (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne read to us by the Queen calls on Canadians to rediscover the spirit of unity. My purpose in entering this debate is to make what contribution I can to the achievement of that all-important goal. I fully agree with the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) when he said that national unity was the main subject contained in the Speech from the Throne. I should like to express my appreciation to him and to the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood) for the thoughtful and confident way in which they opened the debate. I might also include a word of congratulation to the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) who preceded me and also, if I may, to one of his colleagues, a fellow Manitoban, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp), for the outstanding contribution which he made to the debate earlier.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: I want to talk about national unity as I see it and as I understand it. As a member of this House for almost ten years, I say to colleagues on both sides that no one wishes to see a united Canada more than I; and no one wishes to have Quebec and Quebecers as a part of Canada more than I. I want to say with equal conviction and, I hope, Mr. Speaker, with equal clarity, that I believe the government has been trying to achieve unity in the wrong way. I believe the government has been leading us in the wrong direction. The evidence for what I am saying is everywhere. We are not achieving unity; the country is more divided than ever.

In these circumstances, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government have no choice but to ask themselves whether the policies that they have been advocating are in fact unifying, or have their policies contributed to the serious division that now exists in Canada? I believe there is an answer to Canadian unity, Mr. Speaker. I believe it is not too late for Canadians as one people to achieve true unity. But before we can state the answer clearly, we must find out what went wrong.

I should like to speak about four fundamental reasons why Canada is now a deeply divided country, four examples of the way Canadians have been led in the wrong direction. First of all, as many other members have done, we must look at our history. For the first 100 years we were on the right track. We were working together. We were building the grand design set out by the Fathers of Confederation. From confederation to Expo we showed every evidence of becoming the model nation of the world. We increased our productivity. We increased our population. We fought and helped to win two world wars in the cause of freedom. In this and in other ways we continuously increased the respect in which Canadians were held by other peoples around the world. At the end of our first hundred years Canada was standing on the threshold of greatness. What went wrong? I believe the verdict of history will show that the decade of the sixties was the decade of division. In the 1960s Canadians were taken off the track.

● (1522)

If we are to identify one day, one point in time and place where Canada took the wrong turn, that day would be July 19, 1963. It was on that day the government established the terms of reference of the Bilingual and Bicultural Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: For the first time Canadians were told by their government that they were not one people. In the terms of reference, the government instructed the commissioners to recommend the steps to be taken to develop the Canadian confederation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races. Canadians should realize that the concept of two founding races is a myth. All Canadians are builders and founders of Canada and it is wrong to suggest that there are only two founding races or two founding peoples.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: From that time on, instead of talking about all that unites us, led by the government, Canadians talked increasingly about what divides us. Instead of talking about unity, the government preached diversity, as the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) was still doing in the debate this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: Instead of talking about unity, the government talked about the duality of the Canadian personality. Since the mid-sixties, since the fatal turning point in 1963, we have increasingly been negotiating with each other, not so much as Canadians but as two separate and competing peoples, and we have been led to believe that the granting of concessions is somehow the road to unity. This is our second fundamental mistake.

I should like to say as clearly as I can that if the granting of concessions to Quebec, whether in the form of increased power for the government of Quebec or in the form of increased language rights, could achieve unity I would be the first to be calling for more concessions. But all the evidence and all our experience to date shows that instead of creating unity, the result of concessions of this kind is to increase disunity. The net effect is to strengthen Quebec nationalism, instead of strengthening Canadian nationalism. This paradox, that concessions that are intended to achieve unity actually result in disunity, has been set out clearly and explained in recent articles by Canada's most eminent historian, Donald Creighton.

A third cause for the deepening division within Canada is the conviction of the Prime Minister about the advantages of national bilingualism. Nowhere is the Prime Minister's misunderstanding of the reality of Canada more apparent than in his speech to the House last week. As reported on page 38 of Hansard for October 19, just after he talked about equality for the French and English languages the Prime Minister made these remarkable and revealing statements: "We are made for bilingualism", and "bilingualism is the very condition of our existence".

I listened to him say these words in the House and wondered how it was possible for anyone to so seriously misread and misunderstand the reality of Canada. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister to ponder his own words. Through you, I wish to tell the Prime Minister that millions of Canadians do not feel they are made for bilingualism.

An hon. Member: Millions do.

Mr. Richardson: Millions of Canadians who fully respect the use of the French language in Quebec and who want to accommodate Quebec's aspirations within a stronger Canada do not believe that bilingualism is the very condition of their existence. Do the people of Halifax or Edmonton believe that they are made for bilingualism? Do the people of St. John's, Newfoundland or Vancouver, British Columbia, really believe that bilingualism is the very condition of their existence? If that is how the Prime Minister sees Canada, it is easy to understand why this country is so divided.

Another part of the Prime Minister's speech last week revealed the potentially most serious and dangerous cause of division in Canada, and that was in his reference to the constitution. If we read carefully the Prime Minister's words as set out on page 38 of Hansard of October 19, it is clear that he wants his words and his wishes, his kind of Canada, to be locked into the constitution. It is clear that the Prime Minister would like his vision of Canada to be placed above parliament and beyond the reach of parliament, now and in the future. He talks about arrangements to guarantee in the constitution that the French fact will be inalienable in Quebec by any government, any administration, any federal parliament.

To make his position clearer, he goes on to say that rights should be written into our constitution so that they become definitely inalienable and cannot be abolished through a whim or arbitrary decision by any government. Mr. Speaker, who is being arbitrary? When did the will of parliament become a whim? The Prime Minister knows that legislation passed through parliament by his majority can be amended or changed by parliamentarians in the future. He is not prepared to leave the judgment to future parliaments. He wants to entrench his vision of Canada, his concept of appropriate language rights, in the constitution. He seems determined to place these rights beyond the reach of parliament, beyond the democratic process.

The proposal he is now trying to sell to the provincial premiers is that language rights be entrenched in the Canadian constitution and that the constitution cannot be changed in the future without the approval of the province of Quebec. Of all the changes to the constitution being proposed by the Prime Minister, this House should be most concerned about the procedure being recommended to amend the constitution. This concept of a "single province" veto over changes in the constitution of Canada is undemocratic and unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: It is the majority of Canadians, not one province, who must have the right to approve or to disapprove changes in the constitution of Canada. Perhaps now that the Prime Minister has shown some interest in holding referendums, he will take up a suggestion I made more than a year ago and give consideration to the proposal that important changes in the constitution be made only with the approval of a national referendum. In this way the majority of Canadians could determine the kind of Canada they would like to have in the future.

• (1532)

My message has always been that it would be wise for Canada to keep our serious language difference at the level of statutory law, which is amendable, and not at the level of constitutional law, which is not amendable except by a rigid amending formula. Canada's Official Languages Act is amendable. In fact, the Speech from the Throne calls for amendments to the act, regardless of what those amendments are. None of us in this House should forget that it is the ability to amend statutory law that gives Canada the flexibility to grow and to change and which confirms the supremacy of parliament.

Surely this is not the time to try to make our differences permanent. I warn the House and I warn the Canadian people that if we entrench the concept of duality in our constitution, if we lock our difference into our fundamental law under a Quebec veto, we will have become two nations and we will have divided Canada forever. The Prime Minister and some others would like Canadians to believe that there are only two options: the separation of Quebec, or a bilingual Canada. This is not the case. By far the best option is to build in the future on the foundation set out by the Fathers of Confederation. It is not necessary to destroy Canada or to change Canada fundamentally in order to build the great Canada in which most of us believe. The Fathers of Confederation did not talk about two founding peoples. They did not talk about two equal national languages. They did not try to write into the constitution an amending procedure that would give a single province veto over future constitutional change.

Here in this House and across Canada, the only way we can be of use to each other is to be honest with each other. If truth is to be found anywhere, I have always believed it should be here on the floor of the House of Commons. It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I now want to state what I believe to be the answer for Canada. There is an answer that reflects the reality of Canada, a natural, common sense answer. The true answer is that there is only one Canada and Canadians are one people. The answer is to rediscover the spirit of one Canada which we have known in the past and which we can know again.

To do this we must learn that the true spirit of unity is not divisible. Unity can never be found by emphasizing duality and by accentuating diversity. To be one people we must increasingly find ways to be united by language instead of being divided by language. I believe we can do this and at the same time preserve the French language and culture. The answer is for two groups of Canadians to become increasingly bilingual. More English-speaking Canadians in Quebec should be learning French, and more French-speaking Canadians should be learning English. Fortunately, there are strong economic advantages, as well as cultural advantages, to be gained by both of these groups in learning, in each case, the majority language. It is obvious that English-speaking Canadians in Quebec are able to work more effectively when they are able to speak the majority language of Quebec.

It is equally obvious that opportunities for Quebecers are multiplied many times when they are able to live and work in the majority language of Canada and in the majority language of North America. It seems reasonable to believe that English-speaking Canadians who live in Quebec should want to learn the language of their province, and it is equally reasonable to expect that French-speaking Canadians should want to learn the language of their country. My heart tells me, and fortunately all the surveys confirm it, that the majority of Quebecers want to share in all of Canada and I know the overwhelming majority of Canadians want Quebecers to share equally in all of Canada. Once the reality of one Canada is understood and accepted, Canadians will be united as never before in our history.

The only workable, common sense goal for our country is an increasingly bilingual Quebec in a common language Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to enter this debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I join others who have extended congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson), who is in the chamber this afternoon, and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. Wood).

We have heard a very interesting speech by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) a few moments ago on the issue of national unity as he sees it. I was interested in his remarks, spoken, as they were, with the greatest sincerity and with great attention to delivery. I recall that the hon. member for Winnipeg South is one of those who joined a number of members who have left the cabinet for reasons of their own. At the time that he left the cabinet he indicated that he was not in a position to give unlimited support to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the issue of national unity.

I also recall another very telling fact, I think. If I am not quoting him out of context, I believe he pointed out that in his estimation, having served in the cabinet for a considerable length of time, this administration did not have the interests of western Canada at heart and was not serving western Canadians in the way it should.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I also want to make some observations on the important issues before our country, and on this administration. I have had the opportunity to observe this government since my election to the House of Commons in 1974 and it is from that perspective that I want to address my remarks today. I came to the House in 1974 with certain ideas about the role which western Canadians in particular should play in the House of Commons, and the role we should all play with respect to the question of national unity. My concern at that time, which continues today, is for the future of our country.

[Mr. Richardson.]

I want to say at the outset that some of the statistics and facts which I may quote have given me cause for great concern, a concern which is probably felt by the majority of members of the House. The fact of the matter is—and the hon. member for Winnipeg South alluded to it in his remarks—that the Prime Minister and his administration have given their whole attention and priority, almost to the exclusion of everything else, to the so-called issue of national unity. There is not one of us in the House who would not support in general the "motherhood" concept of continuing as one country on terms that are most acceptable to the majority of Canadians, terms that are flexible enough to accommodate all people and all provinces in Canada. But what has concerned me more than anything is that, in light of our very serious economic situation today, it does no good for ministers to suggest that we in this country are better off than people are in Bangladesh, and that we have a better standard of living here. That is not what we are here for. We are here to look at the situation in Canada and try to accomplish this country's potential on the basis of the resources and the people in it. We are not here to compare ourselves with the lowest common denominator in the world, whatever that may be.

• (1542)

While we have these serious problems—and I hope to document and underline some of them—the Prime Minister continues to play a game of politics with the the national unity issue. I suggest that is irresponsible, and it will also be dangerous to the continuation of Canada as one country in the future if the Prime Minster is elected for another term. When this debate was focused on the problems of our economy, the Prime Minister attempted again, in a way only he is capable of doing, to divert and deflect the debate away from the serious economic problems we have, to the question of national unity, by dropping the suggestion that he was considering holding a referendum. I thought it was a possible déjà vu for all of us. On the question of plebiscites and referenda, the Prime Minister was almost saying, as my colleague the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) said in her remarks, that we in Canada are faced with the proposition of a referendum if necessary, but not necessarily a referendum. It harks back to the old conscription controversy during the Second World War.

As head of this administration, the Prime Minister has given us a legacy, with respect to national unity and with respect to the economy of our country, in which we cannot take very much pride. I do not want to look back to ancient history, but I wish to point out some facts from the days when this parliament commenced in 1974 and compare with them some of the statistics and facts we are faced with today.

In June of 1974, 469,000 Canadians were unemployed. Today, that number is 886,000. In 1974, in my province of Saskatchewan, 9,000 people were out of work. Today, there are twice as many, approximately 18,000 persons out of work, and this in a province which has had one of the lowest inflation factors in the country. Since 1974, prices have risen in the vicinity of 30.4 per cent. When we talk about the success of the anti-inflation program in holding down inflation, I am not sure that figure gives much comfort at all to the people of the country generally.

Less than one year ago, our dollar—which is a reflection of the confidence of the people around the world in Canada—was worth $1.04 in United States money. Since then it has slipped to a low of 89 cents, and there is no indication that it will stop there, and no reaction on the part of the government except that it wants the dollar to float to what the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), I believe it was, said would be a realistic rate of exchange in relation to the American dollar. In 1974, we had a $673 million government spending deficit. Now we have in the vicinity of a $9.2 billion deficit—almost one-twentieth of all the wealth we produce.

On the basis of these statistics and on the basis of the performance of the government in the last three years, if this administration is allowed to carry on for another three years the consequences will be catastrophic. In 1973, we had a balance of payments surplus. Now we have a $5 billion balance of payments deficit. In 1974, we exported crude oil. Now we import something like 365,000 barrels a day. In 1974, we had a relatively united country, compared with the situation today. Only last year the Prime Minister said that separatism was dead. Now we have Rene Levesque. In 1974, our real living standard rose by 4 per cent. Next year, in the final gasp of controls, workers will actually have their living standard reduced by about 2 per cent.

Those are the facts and the statistics we face as we start off this session of parliament and look toward the legislative program and measures this government is bringing before us for consideration. If the Prime Minister is sincerely interested in maintaining his cry for national unity, he will give priority to the state of our economy, because I suggest that that aspect of our business in this House is certainly an important factor in maintaining unity.

A person in Quebec who is unemployed is just as unemployed as a person in Saskatchewan. He has just as real a feeling of resentment about the system as an unemployed person in Saskatchewan. He has the same feeling, in every respect, that he is not being served by his government. While the question of the French language is important, it is not the only consideration. The sooner the Prime Minister discovers that, the better off our country will be.

I want to refer to the situation which existed at the time I entered this House, and to what has transpired since. I want to look back to some of the things we were promised in 1974. There were a number of promises and undertakings by the Prime Minister and this government. In the 1974 election campaign, the government promised a future far different from the one it actually delivered. In the elections of 1968 and 1972, the government bribed the electors with their own money. The government made $3 billion worth of promises. The government was far from telling Canadians, "They have to be told they are soft", to quote the Prime Minister, and "When the dollar falls about 10 per cent in one year it is because the world is telling us we are living beyond our means". That is what the Prime Minister said last Sunday, October 23.

The Prime Minister also said that Canadians need discipline, "and if they don't discipline themselves, we will discipline them". By "discipline" the Prime Minister was apparently referring to the whole proposition of controls, or worse. The Prime Minister was presumably referring to the government's promise, made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in his mini-budget, to limit increases in wages and salaries to 6 per cent in the last year of the program. As I mentioned before, this will result in a reduction of about 2 per cent in the living standard of a great many Canadians. Obviously, one had to read quite a lot between the lines of the 1974 election rhetoric to find this reality. Just before the Prime Minister came into this House in 1974, he said:

> One thing about the freeze is clear. We can't freeze the prices on goods coming into Canada from other countries. They won't accept our freeze. So while your wages are frozen, those prices will be going up. Wage and price freezes have already been tried in the United States and Great Britain. It didn't work there. And they won't work here.

The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), then the leader of the opposition, did not talk about reducing workers' incomes. The answer of the Prime Minister in 1974, in continuing his tradition as a confrontationist, was that he was going to wrestle inflation to the ground. On the basis of the statistics and the facts I have given, when the Prime Minister makes a statement of government policy I wonder whether we are to believe what we are hearing and whether we are to accept any statement of the Prime Minister as government policy.

One thing that has impressed me about the Prime Minister is that if he says something categorically, the chances are he will do the opposite, and if he equivocates the chances are that he will in some way carry out the proposition he has placed before the House.

I am glad to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) in the House, because I want to remind him of some things that were said about transportation, particularly as it relates to western Canada. I recall when the minister told a public meeting that if the Liberal government were re-elected, not one railway branch line on the prairies would be abandoned as long as producers delivered to elevators on the line and the elevators continued to operate. It sounded something like an Indian treaty, Mr. Speaker—"as long as the grass is green and as long as the sky is blue". I ask the minister if he has changed his position from that time and whether this was a commitment on the part of the government, because we now find rail line abandonment taking place. Promises were made concerning agriculture, also, during the last election campaign.

Now I want to turn to something else that is of interest to me. In the field of energy, promises were made that have been kept in the same way as were those made about transportation. In the past few days there has been some discussion about nuclear policy and the allegations concerning an uranium cartel. I am concerned about this and the revelations which have occurred in the last year, because of the substantial deposits of uranium in my province of Saskatchewan. During my time in this House I have been concerned about lack of a coherent policy for nuclear or uranium export and import. This area has been concealed by a cloak of secrecy almost as if we were still fighting World War II and were dealing with atom bomb secrets.

As far as I can make out, policy decisions regarding uranium exports and nuclear energy are made with very little, if any, public consultation. As a result, people have no way of assessing whether Canada is adopting the correct position regarding nuclear policy. A great number of matters have given rise to the fear that wrong decisions have been made in this area and that the federal government has not fulfilled its responsibilities.

Uranium is the responsibility of the federal government, yet we find this government has taken the "hands off" approach and has left it to provincial governments to hold public hearings on the matter. In Ontario there is the Porter commission dealing with nuclear energy, and in Saskatchewan there is the Bayda commission dealing with uranium policy. A good part of the terms of reference of that commission are outside the jurisdiction of the province and are within federal jurisdiction.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has called for a public inquiry by a standing committee of this House or some other agency to ensure that the national responsibility set out in law will be honoured. As yet there has been no response from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) or anyone on his behalf. The government has failed in this area of responsibility. On the basis of the things that have happened in this area with AECL, unless the government comes to terms with it we are not only failing in our moral responsibility to this country, but in the moral responsibility we have to the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Serge Joyal (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, as the old saying would have it, history has whims but no habit. Speaking this afternoon after the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), I feel that this maxim is not entirely accurate. Some of my colleagues have recognized that the first paragraph of the throne speech took up again, one hundred years later, a statement made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1877:

We are here, said Sir Wilfrid, under the government of the Queen, happy and free.

It was during the reign of Queen Victoria at the time when the sun never set on the empire and when, to reassert the wish of Canada for its independence in front of its neighbouring republic, the monarchy seemed the best rampart. A hundred years have elpased since. The English sovereign, as the Canadian head of state, despite the pompous rhetoric and commotion surrounding her travels, is only a symbol.

Yet, if in earlier times we have been able to display the crown and the sceptre to show ourselves different from our neighbours, we must recognize today, as our country is going through an identity crisis, that the throne no longer hold its mystic virtues, at least for most French-speaking Canadians. Being the well advised person she is, Queen Elizabeth was quite aware of this, for she stated during her Quebec visit in 1964:

A dynamic state should not be afraid of re-examining its political philosophy.

The soul, the character of a people is expressed through symbols. "Any culture", wrote André Malraux in Le Musée Imaginaire, "is the incarnation of a legendary soul; but no culture is based only on legends, and if ours is more than fairy tales for grown-ups, it is because for us the story of Antigone is that of brothers who were enemies . . . Antigone was a young woman who, knowing that she may be buried alive, buries two princes who had died fighting—one for his country, the other against it—because they were her brothers . . ."

Sophocles' drama haunts our "national" conscience, so great is the risk of burying hope by staging a mortal combat pitting against one another two brothers whom history has changed into enemies.

Symbols are as essential to Canada's political culture, and thus to the knowledge of itself, as the imaginary and timelessness are to the arts of civilization. The legendary soul of a people does not express itself merely through its copper or stone monuments, figures that Beaudelaire calls "viable monsters", it continually feeds itself on the inexhaustible source of its symbols. Some authors, philosophers I must say, even maintain that the ills and crises of modern societies can indeed be explained by the absence of a myth particular to them. When Jung wrote one of his books Modern Man in Search of a Soul, he suggested that the modern world was in search of a new myth, which alone would enable it to find a new spiritual source and give it back its creative forces.

Pragmatists, and they are numerous in politics in the wake of Bentham, do not take exception to the obsolescence of the mythical language of Canada's political society. What is the use of symbols, they ask. This question, innocent in appearance, receives complex answers. Levi-Strauss, Barthes and Lefebvre have suggested difficult avenues. According to these authors, the symbol is exclusive: it should not be disputed in respect of its content, its sense, its meaning. The integrity of its qualities, they maintain, give it a power of gathering, of consensus. If it is contested, it loses its proper value, it cannot any longer be a mark of belonging.

● (1602)

By its very nature, said Levi-Strauss, a political society finds its own symbolic expression in institutions.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, symbolic efficiency is vital to the unity of the Canadian political society. Those who think that the symbolic language of our political culture is veracious, or that, in any case, the relevancy of the monarchy does not really matter, avoid part of the essential debates, that is to clarify the confusion which exists in the Canadian system between the function of Head of State of Canada and that of head of the government.

Anyone who claims to be honestly searching for a new sense to national unity will not forever be able to clarify that ambiguousness. If we think that it is possible to build a politically mature country, we must ensure the relevancy of its symbolic vocabulary. Never will we succeed in unifying this country if its capacity for abstraction is cramped.

As long as the majority in the country forces upon the minority symbols which do not reflect its conception of the world, the Canadian society will go through growing pains which might not create a stir on the surface but will certainly prevent it from developing the same political culture—a body of references to an heritage which could be shared by two majorities.

In a study he published the year before the November 15 election, political scientist Léon Dion wrote, and I quote:

Rather, they concluded that to rule it was enough to provide bread and games—to alternate between the carrot and the stick—on the assumption that people, today as yesterday, are not very sophisticated in social and cultural matters. Here can we best see the importance the Parti Québécois could have for French Canadians. The task that devolves upon that party is indeed far-reaching: will it be possible for that party to help giving at last a political expression to the culture peculiar to Quebecers as it is shown today by the "chansonniers", artists, labour unions, intellectuals, citizen groups and young people? This is ultimately the great, in fact the only challenge to be taken up by this party: independence and social democracy are only a political reduction of the real problem, a problem which concerns the "vouloir être", the soul of the people.

The authors of the speech read last week would like to seek in the human mind the cause of the present state of dissatisfaction in the midst of plenty, concluding that this is also where the unity of the nation will have to take its roots. This thesis, taken from a Renan conference in the Sorbonne in 1882, leaves out one essential dimension:

Everything created by the mind, Giédion states, will have to be humanized, which means compensated by sensitiveness.

Too many Francophones, including a number of proponents of changes in the socio-cultural order, federal institutions have never been able to express completely the sensitiveness, the "vouloir être" of the culture which is peculiar to French-speaking people. The great political debates which have agitated Canada have always left Francophones humiliated, wounded, offended in their "vouloir être".

The majority of Canadians, in times of great decisions, used all their weight to break the differing will of its revolted minority. Though Francophones had to bow, in 1885, in 1917, in 1942 and again in June of last year before the fanaticism of the controllers and pilots, their right to differ, their will to resist have only grown stronger from it. And now I quote Karel Kocik:

From the political point of view, the vanquished is the one who allows the adversary to impose his views upon him, who judges his own actions through the eyes of his adversary.

If we are to rediscover a sense of unity, it will have to be through means entirely different from those taught us by the political history of Canada. Today, some would try to legitimize the political institutions established some 110 years ago by a national or local referendum. How demeaning for the lessons of history.

In October 1866, 21 Francophone members of parliament sent Lord Carnarvon, chief Secretary of State to His Majesty for the colonies, a petition requesting that the federal project be submitted to the approval of the population before receiving the royal sanction at Westminster. The petitioners, with judicious pen, wrote that if Confederation were accepted, and I quote:

. . . without the sanction of public opinion, and it is discovered at a later date that it is unacceptable to the majority of the people in some of the provinces, which (they believed) would certainly happen in Lower Canada, there will inevitably be violent unrest, either to have it recalled or to have it amended, which will lead to an era of trouble and dissatisfaction which will be highly detrimental to the interests of the various provinces and very awkward for the statesmen of the Empire.

This request was never granted, Mr. Speaker. The assembly disposed of the project of Confederation by a rather embarrassing vote; 26 French-speaking and 11 English-speaking members voted in favour, 22 French-speaking and three English-speaking members voted against. To submit to public approval a constitutional piece of legislation passed 110 years ago, after having rejected public consultation on the same issue, would be forgetting history. We must read over the speeches of the supporters of public consultation before Confederation came into being to realize that, long before us, members from Quebec had seen in the public will the basis of the political institutions of a nation.

It seems unacceptable to me that one should think of forcing a majority of Quebecers to stay within the present institutions because that is what the rest of the country wants. Nor could we reasonably want to have a constitutional framework approved today, when their representatives were denied public ratification 111 years ago. If this constitutional referendum that the federal government is considering is to have any meaning, it can only be after a new proposed constitution would have defined a new form of political society and provided French Canadians with new guarantees. Some will argue that all this is already in the legislation, the commitments, the statements of the federal government. It would be ignoring the reality to think that existing formulas are perfect and that we only have to adjust their implementation.

It is not enough to proclaim the equality of languages for this to become a fact in institutions and in practice. It is not enough to proclaim the equality of opportunities to make people forget that political dynamics is essentially a relation of strength in which the majority always wins when it wants to, unless the rules are rigorously modified, otherwise the objectives will be completely distorted.

A constitutional referendum is therefore simply a strategy to surprise or defeat adversaries. It comes first of all from the profound conviction that the participation of citizens in decisions which affect their future is a basic democratic value. Therefore, it should be determined if it is through a desire to apply this concept of democracy and include it in the constitutional amendment process that the federal government will introduce a referendum bill. Otherwise, it will be diverting for its own purposes a form of democratic institution whose contents and meaning are far above tricks and strategies.

When we go through democratic channels to decide the faith of states, we must ensure identical requirements and meanings for rights and freedoms. After the events of October 1970, members of the federal government denounced publicly the weaknesses of Canadian legislation, and the War Measures Act in particular, to meet such exceptional situations while respecting as much as possible civil and political rights and liberties. It is unfortunate that despite the commitment made by the government leader in the House on October 27, 1975, a bill designed for such situations has not yet been introduced and the government has made no mention of it in its inaugural message.

As soon as there is a conflict—

—wrote Julien Freund—

—man is immediately willing to take side with one of the opposing parties, precisely to give it a retributive value, even by distributing guilt unilaterally. Is this not an admission that we give strength to the value of a judgment when we recognize that the cause of one of the opponents or antagonists is good and just and that of the adversary is wrong and iniquitous?

The crisis with which we are now faced is too likely to give rise to bellicose manicheism for us not to recognize as urgent the need to restrict the power of the state. The commitment to serve rights and liberties can be measured first of all by the urgency with which we prevent and solve situations where they could be threatened. The elimination from our statutes of potential abuses of power is a necessity which must command all our attention in our present uncertain situation.

To exist as a country, can Canada have other institutions than those defined in the act of 1867? That is the question that many of our fellow citizens, including sincere men and women whose commitment to the defense of a more open and more just society has been proven, are asking themselves about the alternatives that have been identified as a "third option."

Those people are indignant because of past injustice, worried, perhaps in a Montaigne kind of way. People who do not want destruction or disruption, those frequently used words in politics, but try in sober thought and in respecting other people's opinions, to reach a consensus around values which might bring about a common will to live which is closer to everyone's aspirations. That approach, which is essential in the definition of the balance we are aiming at, lies in fact on two virtues: tolerance and idealism.

The first comes from what Mounier once called "la dramatique d'autrui". The second comes from an understanding of freedom which says that "the theory where truth will arise is the attitude of a man who distrusts himself".

That should reassure all those to which individual as well as national independence are not absolutes. To try and specify values which the act of 1867 did not foresee is a process which cannot find a solution in obsolete formulas.

Far from being the so-called wizards of constitutional alchemy who unwittingly fell into the semantic trap, the "damned of the third option" stand a far better chance of being the explorers of the rediscovery of the sense of unity than of being the heretics of the official orthodoxy.

The inaugural address dealt at length with the present economic conditions; if it suggests immediate steps to face the setbacks of an ailing economy, it barely touched on the more exacting concerns of those who beyond the immediate feel as Pisar that "the economic and moral aspects of our future cannot be dissociated".

This awareness of the stakes conveyed by the trend of the economic growth is not ignored by some government members. Did the Minister of National Health and Welfare not state on November 3, 1975 that:

Few are aware, for example, that in 1973, the families included in the lower 20 per cent of the economic ladder received only some 6 per cent of the total income, while one fifth of the people at the higher level got about 39 per cent. It has been extremely difficult to alter those ratios throughout the years, the gap being almost similar in Canada in 1951 as it is 25 years later.

This cool and clear-headed finding appeared a few weeks later in the Prime Minister's remarks at the end of the year:

We have not been capable of making good use of our free market system. What this system has eventually brought us is nothing but very high unemployment and inflation rates. We cannot go back and keep the same habits, the same behaviour, the same institutions.

There is no need to recall, Mr. Speaker, the outcry that these remarks generated mainly from banking and credit circles. The present structures simply cannot modify the power relation that has been established in this country between its various economic components. Although Canada sets aside more than 28 per cent of its budget for transfer payments, such operations have only helped at best in freezing the gap between incomes as it stood in 1951. They do not contain the seeds of a reduction of that gap. It seems that we have reached a certain ceiling in the capacity of the present programs to modify the scale of incomes. In a study released in March 1976 by a committee formed under the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs called "Dynamic change and accountability in a Canadian market economy", the elements of a new approach were formulated which opened avenues for a redefining of the role and the limit of government action within the framework of a free market economy.

The lack of reference to this subject in the Speech from the Throne leads us to believe that for the present, the government is more concerned about lowering the rates shown by statistics than about performing an exercise of deep reflection on the orientations, the choices and the inequalities brought along by our present economic structures.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks by saying that our country is engaged in a period of deep and intense reflection. Simplifications, historical shortcuts and mystifications must not prevail and make us lose track of what has always inspired the century-old resistance of Francophones throughout the times—their refusal to become assimilated and be part of an homogeneous society.

They have historically asked for justice; they have always recognized their own minority rights which were broader than they ever were granted elsewhere in Canada. They have always thought that being just was a way of questioning freedom as practised by the various seats of power, be they of a governmental or business nature. They have come to a moment in their history when they will no longer plead or beg for the right to be different, they just want to "live their difference".

This is the sole responsibility resting upon us: to review entirely our political society to make sure that the laws and institutions of the country are a guarantee and reflect, in their action and their operation, the difference which has always characterized us.

Mr. Friesen: Would the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont permit a question?

Mr. Joyal: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Friesen: Thank you. I noted with interest that the hon. member referred to a play by Sophocles, the play "Antigone", in which the central character was driven by what the critics call hubris to separate himself so much from society that finally he destroyed himself. I wonder why the hon. member did not elaborate on that aspect, rather than on one of the minor elements of that play.

[Translation]

Mr. Joyal: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will gladly remind my colleague on the other side of the House, that Antigone did not commit suicide, but was condemned to be buried alive and that she symbolized love in mythology, in classical drama. As she was being walled in Antigone said: "I was not born for hatred but for love". And both her brothers lost in action specifically represent the hope she entertained of symbolizing love when, accepting the verdict of the jury, she preserved the two forces which had led to her death—hatred and love.

[English]

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I shall pursue that line of debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Pigott: I am delighted to take part in the discussion of the Speech from the Throne. It is a great honour to have such an opportunity after the recent opening of parliament by Her Majesty the Queen.

October 18, the day of the throne speech, was a day of very special meaning to me, because it marked the first anniversary of my election to parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: So it was especially meaningful to me to hear the fine moving and seconding speeches of two members who also came into parliament as a result of by-elections. This first year has brought many insights and a new appreciation of the extent to which the spirit and decisions of this House reach out into our national life. I am proud to represent the people of Ottawa-Carleton. They have taught me, inspired me and shown me time and time again that it is not the great systems or the great laws which make a nation, but the life of its people.

The one event of the royal visit which stood out for me was the mingling of people of all faiths and ages, some of them in wheel-chairs, at the interfaith service as they gathered beneath the beautiful Peace Tower to pray for Canada. I felt hopeful that morning.

I do not wish to get into a debate at this time about the role of the monarchy in Canadian history, but I should like to mention one thing: during the royal visit, our attention was drawn to a woman who has performed her duty for 25 years in a most outstanding way as Queen of a Commonwealth embracing 36 nations and a quarter of the world's population. The superb record of Her Majesty the Queen is a great example to the government of this country which has repeatedly promised that the role of women is going to be more fully recognized, though I am afraid they have paid only lip service to that idea. Why could not the government have marked the visit of this outstanding woman by making a firm commitment to appoint a significant number of women to all boards and commissions, in appreciation of the role of women in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Pigott: Cultural and linguistic equality are important, but sex equality is also important to this country.

I would like to speak for a few minutes about decentralization, Mr. Speaker. There are many upsetting aspects of the recently announced program of decentralization of government departments. Most disturbing to me is the fact that planned decentralization, which could well have been a positive step, has been replaced by a kind of manipulation and blatant political opportunism which has created what a local newspaper has called "The new Acadians."

Public servants recognize that many companies in private industry move their employees, and it is an accepted practice in the armed services. The method of decentralization, however, leaves much to be desired. So much of decentralization has placed planning second to political expediency that public servants, I am certain, feel like chessmen on a board—pawns in a game.

● (1622)

Would it not, Mr. Speaker, have been more humane to decentralize by establishing new government agencies away from Ottawa, as was done, for example, with Petro-Can, rather than moving existing operations? If we examine the decentralization being carried out as an investment in human and financial terms, little credit can be given to the "broker". There is, for example, little indication that local labour markets will be improved by jobs moved to the regions from Ottawa and staffed from the capital too. Duplicate staffing is inevitable in order to facilitate communication between Ottawa and the regions. Overhead costs will rise as new buildings are erected to replace existing government-owned space left empty in Ottawa. As my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), explained in his fine speech the other day, it is silly to argue that decentralization will help unemployment when specialized agencies are moved to other parts of Canada.

The most critical weakness in decentralization planning is that it overlooks the fact that people are being moved, not just entries on an organizational chart, or desks and chairs. The government cannot claim to have the best interests of Canadians at heart when decentralization is being carried out without consultation, and when 13 or 15 units being moved are destined for areas important to Liberal election hopes. As one observer pointed out, if private industry attempted such a move, the government would step in to protect the workers on the grounds that it was not part of the original agreement when they were hired.

There has been no consultation. The Public Service Alliance of Canada has called for a committee comprising government representatives, departmental people and union officials to work together in planning decentralization. Lack of such consultation poses a serious threat to morale in the public service. The task force on decentralization is an internal inquiry. The cost of decentralization is unknown. No master plan is available. The government has argued that only 11 per cent of the United States public service is based in Washington—ignoring the fact that 80 per cent of the so-called decentralized units are within 40 miles of that capital city. In any case, is the U.S. example appropriate to the Canadian situation?

This lack of information is compounded by the fact that many employees affected by the moves learn of the decision through newscasts or a memorandum issued on the same day that the moves are announced. The number one employer in Canada gives little evidence that it comprehends or cares about the lives of its employees. Planning appears to be a game in which a roll of the dice determines how many people will move, and a spin of the political dial determines where.

I should like to speak for a moment about housing and urban affairs, for me a new area of concern. Mr. Disraeli said: "Man is not the creature of circumstances. Circumstances are the creatures of men." Housing in Canada is proof of Disraeli's words. Over two-thirds of Canadians live in urban areas. Housing and urban development are important issues in this country. Canadian housing policy must recognize the wide-ranging nature of the housing sector. Suitable shelter is a basic right of every Canadian. Housing is a consumer item; it is the major investment of most families, and it is a part of industry, providing jobs, income and tax revenue. The development of our urban areas is a critical part of the quality of life of Canadians.

One of the most significant aspects of the housing sector which faces those forming policy is its extreme regional nature. Local conditions accelerate fluctuations on the urban scene as economic and social factors change rapidly. The steadying hand of long-term objectives and meaningful consultation among all levels of government must guide short-term measures aimed at specific problems. The present ministry of housing and urban affairs has grown in isolation, losing its flexibility and sacrificing consultation for expediency.

The recently announced home insulation program is a sad example of this situation. Since the fall of 1975, the Progressive Conservative party has urged that energy supply measures be matched by energy conservation measures. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) made this point clearly during the special energy debate in August, 1977. The International Energy Agency has questioned the apparent gap between promises and performance on the part of the government in relation to energy conservation.

I think the insulation program came into being because there was an August or September election looming in the distance, but a look at the insulation program discloses that it is discriminatory in that larger, non-taxable grants are allotted to the two provinces which, curiously enough, have Liberal governments. The program is inadequate. The estimated cost of insulating an average home is $900, while the maximum grant is $350. The head office for this program has been placed in a province which is not taking part in the insulation program. The lack of adequate regulation in this program has been a windfall for "quick buck operators". Inept installation and outright opportunism could cost Canadians more than money. As my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has said, many people are turning their homes into fire traps.

I should also like to mention an area of concern to me which is very much part of my responsibilities but, more than that, for me is the focus of great interest. I refer to the handicapped. In mentioning a revised social services act, the Speech from the Throne touched on an area which is of great concern to me—the future of the one in seven Canadians who are handicapped. We too easily assume that an arthritic person is lazy or that a deaf person is slow. It is convenient to be sympathetic and patient about the obvious disadvantages of the handicapped. We do not often consider that we have our own, less visible handicaps which they must tolerate.

The Canadian Council on Social Development has pointed out that much of present policy as it affects the handicapped is fragmented, badly co-ordinated and inadequate. In fact, we must recognize that disabled citizens are entitled to access to the same community services as other Canadians. Birth defects could be prevented, rather than cured, if budgets were revised. Medical rehabilitation is a hit and miss affair. Responsibilities are so scattered that integration of services to the disabled is impossible. Disability payments are often wasted on administration instead of services. We have made age a handicap. How much consideration has been given to some sort of phased retirement, short work week or part-time work for the elderly?

On June 11, 1977, redistribution became official and new electoral boundaries were established in Canada. Since the Chief Electoral Officer is charged, among other things, with issuing instructions to election officers, and since the Chief Electoral Officer is responsible to the President of the Privy Council, a great opportunity exists for the government to issue specific orders to local deputy returning officers in each of the federal constituencies to ensure complete accessibility of polling stations to those Canadians who are handicapped, especially the 100,000 or so Canadians who are wheel-chair users. I urge the government to consider these measures not as a matter of charity but as a matter of right. Harry Kemp once said:

I pitied him in his blindness
But can I boast, "I see"?
Perhaps there walks a spirit
Close by, who pities me.

Just a word about the future. Events of the past year have turned the thoughts and concerns of Canadians toward the future of our country. Options of many kinds have been brought forward. Changes in attitudes, however, may be more important than constitutional changes. The strains on national unity reflect many other serious problems. The spirit of trust necessary to sustain and build a strong Canada will develop only when citizens from all parts of Canada are able to explore solutions to our problems together and in good faith. We should remember that we talk of our resources and still largely ignore the energy and management potential of the half of our population who are women. Government employees are expected to be public servants, but they have so small a role in the decision to decentralize that they might as well be slaves.

● (1632)

Our urban centres, the largest of which could be provinces in their own right, must develop while coping with a lack of guidance, co-ordination and consultation, from an Ottawa government which does not co-operate or consult with the provincial governments about their concerns. We talk of democracy and then effectively block the ballot box for one in seven of our voters.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mrs. Pigott: Our future will be assured when this government begins to listen to the voices of the people and replaces the kind of politics which respond only to election promises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege to participate in the throne speech debate, especially in the Silver Jubilee year of the reign of our sovereign, Queen Elizabeth II. We were honoured, and indeed grateful, to have had Her Majesty participate in the opening of the third session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

As I make my speech today, I vividly recall my emotions of excitement and humility when I delivered my maiden speech in 1957, at which time the Queen opened the first session of the Twenty-Third Parliament of Canada. Today, 20 years later, as we begin this session under the glare of television lights and the scrutiny of several cameras, my feelings are no less intense. I hope televising our deliberations in this chamber will help to make our work more efficient and, above all, give our people a chance to see parliament in action.

Also, I welcome this opportunity to say how proud and grateful I am to represent the people of Parkdale in the House of Commons. They reside in an attractive part of west end Toronto on the shore of Lake Ontario. Parkdale has an interesting history of tradition and change about which we will hear more as its residents prepare for the celebration of its centennial in 1979. Many of my constituents were born in this great country, but many are immigrants or first generation descendants of immigrants who have adopted Canada as their country and, with their fellow Canadians, are generously contributing their work and their talents to make Canada an even better place in which to live and raise their children.

Parkdale is a reflection of the Canadian multicultural mosaic. Its people have family ties in other parts of the world and, therefore, international developments interest them very much. Many of them are closely following the Belgrade review meeting of the Helsinki agreement and the final act of the conference on European co-operation and security to which Canada was a signatory nation, along with 34 others, on August 1, 1975, in Helsinki.

As in some other countries, we have organized a parliamentary Helsinki group, reading the reports from Belgrade and watching the actions of governments. We have a parliamentary observer group in Belgrade and a group in Canada keeping in touch with concerned Canadians. The Helsinki agreement review conference, without a thorough examination of respect for human rights would be a mockery of the solemn commitments of 1975 and an abdication of the responsibility of governments to their people. I am sure the Canadian government will not be dissuaded from pursuing its humanitarian concerns so nobly begun and carried out during the initial negotiations of this conference.

We are particularly happy to hear in the Speech from the Throne that the goal of enhancing the rights and freedoms of Canadians can also be pursued through commitment to the principle of open government. An example of that commitment was the enactment of the Human Rights Act, the recent appointment of the Human Rights Commission and the Privacy Commissioner. In the future promotion of open government, parliament will be asked to approve the establishment of the office of ombudsman to deal with complaints arising from federal administrative actions.

As a member of parliament during the past several years, I have been astounded by the number of complaints from my constituents. Unfortunately, it is difficult to help them, in view of the bureaucracy and lack of such an office as that of federal ombudsman. Many of us who have been advocating such an office welcome this announcement of our government and hope it will bring greater and swifter redress to those Canadians who have been wronged.

I truly believe that the present session of parliament is shaping up into the most important and the most crucial session in our parliamentary career. Canada and the world are confronted with many serious problems. Our industrial civilization is very seriously challenged by the energy crisis, inflation and unemployment. Governments and their people must rally and mobilize their will and resources to fight this grave threat to our socioeconomic survival.

Along with other members of the House, I welcome the government's initiatives announced in the Speech from the Throne which are evidence of the federal government's determination to give political leadership, strong government and an unwavering confidence to Canadians who are impatiently awaiting our best efforts in these difficult times. Therefore, this is not the time for half measures or petty politics.

During this period of wage and price controls, which had to be adopted to fight galloping inflation, Canadians have co-operated to restrain their demands on the economy and have achieved some successes. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) reported to us in his mini-budget address last Thursday, many companies have learned to deal with the problems of rising prices. We welcome the minister's announcement of measures designed to achieve a sustained growth in our economy of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent in order to bring down the unemployment rate and that the expansion should be led by exports and business investment.

As well, the minister explained the operation of the three root causes of our economy's setback, namely, weakened exports, increased costs of production, and lack of confidence. Then he proposed a five-point program to stimulate the economy without increasing the danger of inflation, namely, a phase-out of controls beginning April 14, 1978, a personal income tax cut of up to $100 for low and middle income taxpayers; further job creation programs; an employment credit for job creation, and the maintenance of strict restraint on government expenditures.

Also, he appealed for the help of all Canadians because government cannot do everything itself. He appealed to the opposition members in parliament to stop politicking and to start swiftly enacting measures proposed in the last budget and in the mini-budget of last Thursday. Time is precious, and each hour lost delays the benefits to our people and increases costs in general.

In the long term we must try to get all sectors of our population to co-operate with the government in developing without further delay an economic and an industrial strategy. Many of us have been asking for this for a long time, and I hope we will not have to wait much longer. The battle to provide more jobs, increase growth and ensure a stable economy will not be won without firm action and definite planning, and especially without the consultation and co-operation of business, labour and, indeed, all levels of government.

The recent reports of the Science Council of Canada and of our Liberal caucus's industrial policy committee should be given serious attention by our government in planning future economic and industrial strategy. In particular, the Canadian manufacturing industry should be strengthened in the face of lower tariffs which are now being negotiated in Geneva at the GATT meeting. Some economists are even advocating a "Buy Canada Act", and others are recommending a greater effort to buy goods made in Canada. At this time I would like to appeal to the ministers in charge of the large economic portfolios to do everything possible to help save the jobs of employers of Northern Telecom, Anaconda Brass, and INCO where we hear that mass lay-offs are impending.

In harnessing our major programs to the objectives of a national industrial policy, we should try to create tax revenues instead of giving subsidies, and to develop industrial competence instead of relying on research from abroad. But the tax environment is very important to all such linked industrial objectives as specialization, research and development, and the processing of raw materials. The tax regime must be set so as to reinforce other measures and be related to achieving competitiveness. I think, also, it is time to re-examine and reform our tax structure as it applies to primary resources and secondary manufacturing industries, and to encourage the initiative of our businessmen, with tax incentives, to build and invest in Canada. Unfortunately, we hear that too many of our business and financial institutions are investing in states such as Florida where the tax structure is more favourable to them. These businessmen and investors are asking for more stable tax policies which would give them time to make long-term plans.

I also agree with the government that a special, comprehensive small businesses act is urgently needed to serve the needs of the smaller owner-managed sector of our economy, and that at this time of high unemployment our manpower training programs should be upgraded and made more practical, such as, for example, that the unemployed on these retraining programs be trained on the job. I think this will go a long way toward successfully relocating the unemployed people of our country.

We are particularly happy to hear from the Minister of Finance that this year and next year the government will be spending over $1 billion on direct job creation, and also the announcement by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) that a special fund of $5 million will be made available to train our unemployed youth. We should also implement the 14-point program announced by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Munro), together with the establishment of a national consultative forum and fair comparison bargaining in public and essential services, as they are important elements of an over-all industrial strategy.

Some philosophers state that we are what we think, and some nutritionists state that we are what we eat. I believe that both are right. I also believe in the adage attributed to Juvenal about a sound mind in a sound body. That is why I was happy to hear about the new national policies on food and amateur sport. We are awaiting with impatience the forthcoming policy on recreation and physical fitness which is an important part of the government's legislative program for this and the coming year.

We learned with satisfaction, in the throne speech, that the government is taking new initiatives in the development of a comprehensive national food policy by calling a national food conference next February after having received submissions from major sectors in this field. Canada does need an up-to-date food strategy, and I hope that during that conference expert nutritionists will be present who will study the problem of nutrition in Canada and, above all, the effect of the many food additives that are being allowed in our food products at this time.

The world is facing a food crisis which may be even more serious than the energy crisis. World stocks of grain are at a very low level, and there is increasing evidence that the pressure on food resources will not lessen. As was stated yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), Canada has a unique and immense potential to increase its food production, in spite of its severe climate. The Canadian labour force and investment community have the capacity to develop a gigantic food industry in this country, as some economists have stated, such as Dr. G. Korey and Professor K. Eckhard, who in a major paper presented not long ago stated that Canada has the potential to become a world food bank, not only by bolstering secondary industry and becoming a great food exporter, and thereby reducing our trade deficits.

As a physician, I cannot refrain from reiterating my appeal to the government to increase its vigilance over the many new chemicals and other products introduced into our work and home environments. These new chemicals are dangerously altering our environment and are exposing man to growing amounts of harmful pollutants. As a result, today we are faced with the great problem of environmental diseases, including cancer, caused by asbestos, vinylchloride and other substances. We are faced with other environmental diseases, including birth defects, mercury and arsenic poisoning, chronic respiratory diseases, deafness, and many others. However, the proposal of the Minister of Labour for the establishment of an industrial safety and health centre should help to identify occupational health hazards and recommend any changes that are necessary as well as the strict enforcement of regulations.

I should like to propose, also, that the federal government enact laws and regulations regarding special toxic substances, making it the responsibility of manufacturers to prove that their products are safe before they are put on the market. Such measures would help prevent new toxic substances entering the environment and endangering our health and lives, as well as upsetting the delicate ecology of our earth. We Canadians have reached a crossroad in our national life. Redesigning national socioeconomic policies is fundamental to the achievement of national unity. The urgency of constitutional reform and an economic strategy is made more acute by the separatist challenge from the Parti Québécois government elected last November 15. So we welcome the intiatives of the government and the leadership of the Prime Minister expressed in his statement, that he is profoundly dedicated to the spirit and achievement of unity. The work of the task force on Canadian unity should assist Canadians to participate more actively in the debate and make a greater contribution to the future shaping of our country.

We are looking forward to the measures relating to the constitution of Canada so that a new federalism will emerge and receive the support and devotion of Canadians everywhere. We welcome the historic "Statement on Language" approved at the meeting of provincial Premiers last August, and the proposal to entrench in the constitution language rights in education. At this time I want to join with those Canadians who abhor the abrogation of English language rights in Quebec's language bill 101, and appeal to the government to assist the minority of Quebec to fight for its language rights.

I am sure we all welcome the government's proposal to amend the Official Languages Act and to clarify the role of the courts in safeguarding the equality of status of the official languages within the jurisdiction of the government of Canada, and the government's commitment to ensure greater availability of education in both official languages. I am sure we all agree that the great majority of Canadians are dedicated to the strengthening of bonds between Canadians speaking our two official languages and those belonging to our many different cultural backgrounds.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but his allotted time has expired. Nevertheless, he may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Mr. Ellis: I am sorry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): There not being unanimous consent, with the permission of hon. members I would like to make the House aware of the proceedings on the adjournment motion.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Dawson for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in being able to participate in this debate because it allows hon. members to digress from the tedious rigidity of normal debate and to elaborate on some of the problems which are of particular concern to us, our regions, our provinces and our constituencies.

This is a particularly critical time in our country's history. It seems that every conceivable challenge which must from time to time be met by governments in the free world has been thrown at us. We are divided from within, in terms of geography and cultural goals and objectives. We have lost the confidence of our friends abroad, who are expressing discontent to us in economic terms. We are forced to direct all our attention to issues of national unity and to making patchwork repairs to our national fibre. This leaves us little time to address ourselves to the massive problems of unemployment and inflation which have caused much anxiety and fear among our population.
