Song of a Spirit entering Heaven.

AIR .- " Home Again." Home at last! Home at last From an earthly shore, For oh! I've joined the ransomed band Who passed on long before. Here each tear is wiped away, By God, the Holy One, There's naught but songs of joy and praise, Round the Eternal's throne.

The pure in heart! the pure in heart Robed in spotless white, Have won their starry crowns of joy All gloriously bright. And some I loved so long ago, Who left me sad and lone I meet amid the Heavenly host Within Our Father's home

Safe at home! Safe at home! Oh let the echoes go, To soothe the hearts that mourn In that first home below. I'm safely sheltered in His fold Who was for sinner's slain, Through Him I've won eternal life. For me to die was gain. Safe at home! safe at home

Elisha at Dothan.

BY THE REV. GEORGE CROLY. 'Tis midnight, deep midnight, The hour for surprise From the storm-shattered ridge The warriors arise: Now the Syrian is marching

Through storm and through snow, On the revel of Israel To strike the dread blow. No light guides his march But the tempest's red glare; No ear hears his tramp In Israel's doomed camp. The hunters have driven

Now, wild as the wolf When the sheepfold is nigh, They shout for the charge, " Let the Israelite die Still, no trumpet has answered, No lance has been flung, No torch has been lighted, No arrow has sprung. They pour on the rampart-

The tents stand alone! Through the gust and the haze The watch-fires still blaze, But the warriogs of Israel Then spake the King's sorcerer " O King, wouldst thou hear How these Israelite slaves

Have escaped from thy spear? Know their prophet Elisha Has spells to unbind The words on thy lip, Nay, the thoughts in thy mind; Though the secret were deep As the grave, 'twould be known The serpent has stings, And the valture has wings,

Over mountain and plain; 'Tis noon-yet no chieftain Has slackened the rein 'Tis eve-and the valleys Are drooping with wine,

But he's serpent and vulture

To thee and thy throne !"

Salutations.

' Salute no man by the way '-Leke x. 4. In their salutations, on meeting, much time is often consumed by the Orientals in mutual inquiries and compliments, manual They are also fond of inquiring into all the business—such as the name, native place, residence, and present object of persons they meet on the road and who return their salutation. In this, no offence or impertinence is intended or taken. It is the habit of the people and the custom of the country. But a stranger, not familiar with the custom, or, from the more reserved habits of his own country, not disposed to disclose himself fully to every one he meets, is apt to be much annoyed, and finds it difficult to get rid of the questioner without exciting suspicion. The Orientals, who in general have little idea of the value of time, do not mind the loss of it which is thus involved. Yet they were so far sensible of it, that it appears to have been the practice to inculcate upon messengers who were sent upon business which required despatch, that they should not salute any man by the way Compare 2 Kings iv. 29. The restriction on this point will be the better understood when it is stated that it was a maxim among the Jews to salute every one by the way.

If we would hold fast the truth, we must be ready to unite with all who hold the truth and love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. We must be ready to lay aside all minor questions as things of subordinate importance. Establishment or no Establishment-liturgy or no liturgy-surplice or no surplice-bishops or presbyters, all these points of difference, however important they may be in their place and in their proportion, all ought to be regarded as subordinate questions. I ask no man to give up his private opinions about them. I wish no man to do violence to his conscience. And beauty sleeps on every leaf Beneath the gazer's eye; And sadly come the thoughts to-night, Of days long since gone by,

Like music on the moonlit waves, Like distant melody. I'm thinking of the hours to-night, When thou wert by my side-

When Pleasure shed her golden light Upon life's troubled tide. Now brightly on the wave of time

Sweet memories appear— Each well-remembered voice of love, That gladdened once my ear. Fond memory plumes her wings to-night,

And brings before mine eye The past-the dark and buried past With all its life of joy. Oh! never can those hours return, Yet Father! through thy care, When life's dim pageantry is past,

Work for the Month.

The more pressing and active duties of the farm are over for the year. Other du. ties there are, and important ones, as there will ever be : but as there is a time for al things, so the farmer's season of repose, of quiet contemplation approaches, when he will gather around him the recorded wisdom of others, or, perchance, record his own, or mingle in grateful leisure, in the amenities and kindly charities of life.

Some November days are devoted to felling the timber and piling the wood ready for the sled in winter months. Others, to an examination of the cellar, throwing out the rubbish, and rendering that depository clean and sweet, so that no unwholesome gases shall penetrate the rooms above. # Seed Potatoes.

A correspondent of the New England not be so much so as it seems. I think that farmers should look out for their seed forever.

There has been much discussion whether a sinking heart, he entered his dwelling, bracing himself up to meet the fury of an planting. I think that the size of the potato is a schola is not to be looked at, as much as the condition of the eye—which is of course the germ of the plant; if you wish thrity potators you should attend to this, city potators with sound germs are better for seed than the whole ones with what I office performed by the body or bub of its more than the content of the thorn the whole ones with what I office performed by the body or bub of its the first place, in it is easily all the first place, in it is easily the first stage in the first place, in it is easily all the first place, in it is easily all the first place, in the fi the seed end too closely.

Again, it is a good plan to plant sound potatues, not wilted ones that have sprouted and had the sprouts broken off several times ; why? Because every time that a sprout puts forth, it exhausts the electric power in he bulb and also takes up of its nourishment; large potatoes therefore that have sprouted several times, are better to plant than small ones whose bulbs or bodies have not been thus exhausted; you know that when we dig potatoes, we find the old seed rotted and nothing left of it but a shell; all its power has gone, its nutritive element zone, completely exhausted; it is not wholly, out partially emptied. Seed potatoes should therefore be kept, where it is cool and dry, so that they shall not sprout until after they are planted; should be kept in the dark also, that no vaporation may go on in the juices. I think that I have settled the question of large or small seed; however, I should like to hear the views of others on the subject. If my views are correct, this article time to look to the preservation of seed potatoes, so as to have them right in plant
