The minister spoke the day before yesterday about loopholes and the plugging of loopholes. I am sure that the minister's former associates would look forward to an interpretation of this section with the highest possible degree of anticipation, because if there is anything that a chartered accountant or lawyer likes to do it is to try and interpret a section, to find holes in it, and to drive horses and wagons and even automobiles and railway cars through it. The longer the section the larger the openings and the more difficult is its interpretation. If this section ever becomes law every lawyer and chartered accountant of any repute will be fully employed for the next two or three years in handling cases arising from it, quite apart from the section we passed this afternoon concerning their being able to charge it up to their client.

[Mr. Rynard.]

This is a commentary on legislation which I think is most unfortunate and is unenforcible; but in view of the hour and the comments which have been made earlier on the accompanying section I do not propose to say anything more about it now.

Paragraph agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now consider the amendment.

Mr. Lamontagne: I move:

That the Income Tax Act resolution be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"17. That the income tax otherwise payable by an individual in respect of income earned in a province of Canada be reduced by

(A) 21 per cent for the 1965 taxation year, rather than 19 per cent, and

(B) 24 per cent for the 1966 taxation year, rather than 20 per cent."

Mr. Nowlan: This is an increase of 2 per cent in the coming year and 3 per cent in the succeeding year?

Mr. Gordon: It is 3 per cent each year.

Mr. Nowlan: It is 19 per cent to 21 per cent and 21 per cent to 24 per cent. Is there an error there?

Mr. Gordon: It is going up to 21 per cent instead of 19 per cent, and to 24 per cent instead of to 20 per cent. Normally it would go up to 19 per cent next year and 20 per cent the year after. It is now proposed that it go up to 21 per cent next year and 24 per cent the year after.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the Customs Tariff resolution.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, shall we call it ten o'clock? There will be some little discussion on the Customs Tariff resolution. If the minister wishes we could start now but I can assure him that this matter will take more than three or four minutes. Might I suggest to the minister that we proceed with the Income Tax Act bill?

Mr. Gordon: I should like, if the chairman will allow me, to proceed until the bill receives first reading so that hon. members will have a chance of studying it. Then if it is ten o'clock, we could start the customs resolution tomorrow.

Mr. Nowlan: As far as we in this part of the house are concerned we would be agreeable to have the committee rise and introduce the bill and have first reading of the bill.

The Chairman: Shall I rise, report a certain resolution and ask leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-91, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, if we are calling it ten o'clock I might ask for the business of the house for the balance of the week.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, we will proceed tomorrow with the debate on the Customs Tariff and if time is available the Estate Tax Act resolution. On Thursday we will be taking the Blue Water bridge bill; then the Post Office Act amendment resolution; and also if we have time on Thursday my little resolution concerning the amendment to the Exchequer Court Act. On Friday the estimates we will be dealing with will be those of public works. The reason I am not calling agriculture is because the Minister of Agriculture will not be available, as he will be attending a conference in Ottawa. That is the business of the house for the next few days.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion)

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with provisional standing order 39A, a motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that this house do now adjourn.

SHIPPING—REPORTED U.S. ACTION TO CONTROL LAKE HURON WATER LEVELS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The first question is from the hon. member for Lambton West.

Mr. Walter F. Foy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, the reason I asked the Minister of Transport a question this afternoon was because the harbours along the shores of lake Huron are becoming useless. This year I understand the drop in the level of water has reached the point where the water level is approximately three feet below average. My riding, like others in the lake Huron area, is suffering a great deal because of this. For example, Grand Bend has a number of fishing companies which produced about $750,000 five years ago, quite a large amount for a small area. This is now reduced to about $500,000 per year. The harbour has been dredged each year, but if the harbour has no water all the dredging that can be done is not going to help the fishing boats in and out of the harbour. What they need is water.

Following along the lake Huron shore of my riding I come to Port Franks, Perch creek and Point Edward where there is a great deal of commercial fishing which is very important to these areas. Business that requires river dockage suffers at the port of Sarnia. I believe the port of Sarnia is classified as part of the seaway and if the water levels of the lake continue to go down that very busy port of Sarnia will be in real trouble unless something is done. This is the reason I asked the Minister of Transport this question this afternoon.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member for Lambton West has to do with a matter that was decided in principle some years ago. According to the information available to me, at the time the dredging was started in the St. Clair river—I recall the very beginnings of that because I was minister of citizenship and immigration at the time and it affected the Indian reserve on Walpole island—the United States government also proposed that they should make a study of the possibility of putting some kind of barrier in the river just below the Blue Water bridge in order to maintain the levels as much as could be done in that way without interference with navigation, and to offset any possible effect that dredging might have.

However, this was not the kind of thing that could be done very effectively without a good deal of model testing and experimentation. The government of Canada agreed in principle to having this matter considered. The information I have is that agreement was given in 1962 by the previous administration, and I think very wisely, and that this experimentation is now going on. I sincerely hope, as I am sure all hon. members do, that it may be successful and that some definitive action may be taken as the result of it.

I am afraid, however, that however valuable this may be as a long term measure it is not going to have very much effect, and in fact cannot possibly have any effect at all, in the present season. We are faced with a very grave problem indeed not only in lake Huron and Georgian bay, and a great deal of concern has been expressed to me in this regard by many hon. members and by many outside the house through considerable correspondence. I think the hon. member for Lambton West is quite right in saying that the problem cannot really be cured by dredging.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) and I and our officials have been considering this matter and we are going to do anything we can to alleviate the situation by dredging. But the water just is not there. This is something that I am afraid can only be cured by more water.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

SHIPPING—EXPERIMENTS BY U.S. CORPS OF ENGINEERS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is along similar lines and perhaps the minister will have an opportunity to complete the second instalment of his reply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Part two.

Mr. Aiken: I have a somewhat similar question to that of the hon. member who just spoke. The low water levels on the great lakes and the Georgian bay have been causing concern for about a year now. In 1963 it was generally felt that the problem was one of a natural cycle. It was so explained to those of us who made inquiries and it was said that it would soon right itself.

However, when the ice went out in 1964 it became obvious that this was not just a low cycle. There was no restoration of the water level and, at the moment, it is not just a problem for many places along the lakes: It is a disaster. I saw pictures published in the Parry Sound North Star and in the Globe and Mail this morning which indicate how disastrous this situation is.

As the minister has just stated, members representing constituencies, particularly along Georgian bay and lake Huron, have been very concerned. The government, if I may be fair, I believe has accepted the advice it received that this was a cycle and there was not much that could be done about it. While this is undoubtedly a factor, and while undoubtedly there is low precipitation, many of us fear that underlying this may be something more fundamental, that there may be not just a short term problem but a major one such as the drainage away of water.

In asking the numerous questions that have been asked, we are not trying to attach blame. We are merely attempting to get the government to undertake some active measures to have the situation rectified. Several indicators show that the lack of precipitation is not the whole answer. Over the week end, I verified this. For example, the Muskoka lakes and most of the smaller inland lakes have normal water levels now. Lake Nipissing, according to an answer I received yesterday, has water one foot higher than it was last year or the year before. We are not suggesting that any of these lakes should be lowered because that would merely be extending the problem into other lakes.

We do feel that the studies that are being undertaken by the United States corps of engineers now indicate there is a problem to be met. We are hoping that some long term measures will be seriously considered so that we will not find the situation is a permanent one. My question is really to determine whether the government has now been persuaded that some action is necessary and that some research will have to be done. If the Minister of Transport would make a statement along those lines, then I am sure we would all like to hear that statement.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I could not agree more with what the hon. gentleman has just said. I do not pose as an expert, myself, but I do not believe, although there has been a serious lack of precipitation in the last two or three years, that is the whole answer to the problem. I did not bring the figures with me, but I have been looking at them. It is quite apparent that there has been, over two or three years, a lack of precipitation. There may be something cyclical about these things. However, it is a little questionable whether our records extend back in a really accurate way long enough to be sure about that. There is not any doubt that the rate at which water is being used at the present time, particularly in highly settled areas like the old part of Ontario, and the gradual denuding of forest cover, have contributed to what may be a long term situation. Since this situation has been partly created by man, perhaps it will need man to do something to offset it.

I would be hopeful that the ARDA program would have some effect in helping in the conservation of water. We are going to have to look quite seriously at this. With respect to some of the streams that were diverted into lake Superior, the diversions were started about a generation ago, and perhaps steps no one would have once contemplated even a very few years ago will have to be studied.

I do not think there is any possibility of doing too much research into this problem.

More and more we come to realize, not only all over this continent but throughout the world that water, which seems in many respects to be the cheapest commodity of all, is the most precious resource we have.

Speaking for myself, and I think for those of my colleagues who have a special responsibility in this matter, I will endeavour to see that everything is done that can be done to study the long term problem. Certainly we intend to do everything possible to alleviate—and I am afraid it can only be to alleviate—the immediate situation which is a cause of very great concern—perhaps of greater concern in Georgian bay than anywhere else—but of great concern to the whole of the lakes region.

HARBOURS—RIVIÈRE DU LOUP, QUE.—CONSTRUCTION OF DEEP WATER PORT

[Translation]

Mr. L. P. Antoine Bélanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, if I insisted on raising the question of the construction of a sea harbour at Rivière du Loup, it is because representations were made to me by people of great experience in matters of navigation on the St. Lawrence river. They are shipmasters who spend all their lives on the river and know it practically through and through.

Their experience acquired over many years of navigation on these waters gives them a knowledge that we do not have and could hardly acquire even with the most competent government engineers. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, what those people say? Well, they maintain that to build a sea harbour at Rivière du Loup at the cost of $7 million would be a mere waste of money, and that they cannot understand how qualified engineers could recommend such an expenditure, which will be a true waste of public funds. It is so evident that one already wonders whether that undue expenditure of public funds, if it is made will not be a typical example of plain patronage such as practised by the Union Nationale, but this time at the federal government level.

To support these statements, let me tell you that to build a sea harbour in Rivière du Loup, it would be necessary in the first place to dig deeply into the bottom of the river and to maintain it at a reasonable depth it would have to be dredged throughout the year. Then in the winter, on account of the general direction of winds, that sea harbour would be so heavily ice-bound that it would be necessary to have at least two or three icebreakers to clear it.

I would be glad for Rivière du Loup if an ocean port were established there, but it is not my fault if common sense and economic considerations indicate it would be absurd, in view of its location.

On the other hand, in the county of Charlevoix, two places are wonderfully suited to serve as ocean ports: Baie St. Paul and Pointe au Pic.

In addition, mineral resources are far greater on the north shore. At the present time, the economic slump is more severe in Charlevoix. Finally, the places mentioned have the natural qualities and meet the standards required for ocean ports. That is why it would be a tragic mistake for the Minister of Transport to go and spend $7 million where such an expenditure would be practically useless.

I suggest, therefore, that the minister be very cautious with this bill and give it full consideration before going ahead with it; incidentally, I would ask him to consider all the possibilities which Baie St. Paul or Pointe au Pic offer for a bill of this scope.

Furthermore, the establishment of a sea port at Rivière du Loup would not bring any great changes in the economy of that place, for Rivière du Loup does not suffer from lack of means of transportation; it already has the trans-Canada highway, and the C.N.R. as well as enough wharves for current business, and its economy at the present time is far more developed than that of Charlevoix county. In any case, such a harbour could not stay open all winter long, even if a lot of money were spent to keep it clear of ice.

Furthermore, it is precisely because the south shore was always favoured that part of the traffic going to the north shore passes on the other side of the river for quite a distance.

Besides, and nobody can deny this, since facts are there to prove it—it is on the north shore that one finds mining and other resources. In the long run, good sense will have to prevail; it is on the north shore that seaports and wharves should be built.

That is why I feel that the government would do well to start reversing that trend right now and stop favouring the south shore at the expense of the north shore.

Mr. Speaker, if I have chosen to speak of the riding of Charlevoix and of the harbour of Rivière du Loup, it is not so much to try to get a little more work for my riding—even though that would be commendable—but rather because I feel it is wasteful to make an expenditure of $7 million at a place where it would be useless, especially considering the deficits accumulated by the present government.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we have given close, if reluctant attention to the remarks made by the hon. member for Charlevoix.

I want the hon. member to be sure of one thing. If we proceed with the case of Gros Cacouna—which is not Rivière du Loup, located at least ten miles away—let me assure him that we do not lose—

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, would the minister allow me a question? I should like to ask him—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Questions are not permitted at this stage, according to the rules under which we are now proceeding.

Mr. Deschatelets: I should tell the hon. member that we are discussing the whole problem of the north shore, of the lower St. Lawrence and of the Gaspe peninsula.

The major project at Gros Cacouna is only the first step of a very important scheme we want to put forward for the three areas just mentioned.

We must start with one area. We are starting with that of Gros Cacouna and we shall build a deep water port which will be open 12 months a year.

If my hon. friend from Charlevoix will take the trouble to think a little about this problem, he will find that his area, that of the north shore, will directly benefit from this thoroughfare which will be open 12 months a year.

There is no doubt that the north shore coast contains extraordinary natural resources, but all the experts who have studied the communication problem in that area have agreed that the unemployment in the lower St. Lawrence and in the Gaspe peninsula is related to the fact that no concern or secondary industry will want to settle in an area where the thoroughfares are so poor.

I should like to review briefly the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Charlevoix, to the effect that the implementation of such a plan would be a waste of public funds, as we would venture to spend $7 million on a project without due consideration, due study—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister, but his time is up.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING PENSION PLAN

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I regret that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is not in his seat. My question of privilege arises out of a question I directed to him last Thursday, April 23, as reported at page 2487 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the agreement reached between Ottawa and Quebec respecting the Canada pension plan contains a provision allowing a province to change the contributions or the benefits without obtaining beforehand the consent of Ottawa and the other provinces?

To which the Prime Minister answered the following:

> The agreement is that there will be a universal pension scheme the provisions of which will be applicable to all Canadians.

At that time we accepted the Prime Minister's answer, but yesterday the Quebec premier stated in explicit, clear and precise terms, and I quote:

> I stated, said Mr. Lesage, and repeated and I repeat again that there will be a provincial pension plan in Quebec, a strictly provincial plan. The contributions will be collected by the province. They will be administered by the province. The benefits will be paid out by the province or by a provincial commission. One hundred per cent of the investments will be made by the province according to decisions made by the province. Provincial legislation will be introduced on that matter.

For the information of parliament, will the Prime Minister say whether he was aware of that matter or not? Because we were certainly misled. It clearly appears that Quebec will be given a double pension plan: one provincial and one national, according to statements by the premier and the Prime Minister. I should like the house to be informed on that matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was impossible for the Prime Minister to be in the house today, but I am sure he will give the hon. member an answer tomorrow.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: The question raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve is supposedly a question of privilege, but I notice it was not followed through with any motion. I have to determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege, and it strikes me this is more in the nature of a complaint than a question of privilege. I am sure, the point having been raised this afternoon, that the Prime Minister will reply to it in due course.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY PRODUCTS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SUPPORT POLICY

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the new dairy policy for the production year opening May 1.

I think the basic goal of all agricultural policies should be to maintain and improve the position of Canadian farmers in the national economy and to promote efficiency of production. This is the principle on which we are building our policy on all stabilization prices for farm products, including the dairy products concerned in the statement I am now making. We believe that efficient stabilization levels should ensure farmers a sound and stable return, consistent with realistic economics; keep Canadian farm products competitive both in price and quality, on the home market as well as in the markets of the world; and provide Canadian consumers with the highest quality food at the most reasonable prices possible.

A year ago I announced certain changes in the dairy support policy designed to pursue this general goal. For dairy products specifically, the changes were designed to bring consumption and production into better balance and at the same time to divert certain quantities of milk to the production of cheddar cheese.

I am pleased to be able to report that this program has over the past year been successful in meeting these objectives. For the dairy year now ending, total domestic consumption and export of dairy products are essentially in balance with production. Estimated butter production for the dairy year ending tomorrow is 352.1 million pounds. Estimated domestic consumption for the year was 357.4 million pounds. Thus domestic consumption will exceed production by approximately five million pounds.

In addition to this we have made substantial export sales of butter in the form of butter oil, leaving estimated total butter stocks, including trade holdings, at the end of the dairy year of approximately 165 million pounds. This compares with total stocks a year ago of 203 million pounds. At the same time returns to producers of milk for manufacturing purposes have been above those of the previous year, while costs to the federal treasury, other than those associated with the accrued surplus, have been down.

Meanwhile milk production has remained strong and production of cheddar cheese has risen. Production of cheddar cheese for the dairy year now closing is an estimated 134.1 million pounds, an increase of 14 per cent over that of the previous year of 118.4 million pounds. Cheddar consumption was maintained at almost the same level, at 100 million pounds for this year compared to 102 million pounds for the previous year. Exports of cheddar were higher this year by 14 per cent than for the previous year, at 31.2 million pounds compared to 27.4 million pounds. Cheddar stocks for the year are estimated at 46 million pounds compared to 37 million pounds a year ago.

In line with the action taken a year ago, changes in the dairy support program for the new year opening May 1 will be toward a further rationalization of the program. We are trying to put an emphasis on quality production while at the same time maintaining the basic support levels currently protecting the producer.

In order to narrow the gap between the support level and the selling price of the agricultural stabilization board, the board's price for butter will be set at 53 cents per pound for 40 score creamery butter, basis Montreal and Toronto. This is a reduction in the consumer subsidy of 1 cent per pound. It will transfer a slight proportion of the dairy subsidy cost from taxpayers as a whole to the actual users of butter. The change is not expected to have any effect on butter consumption and will mean a saving to the taxpayers of an estimated $3.5 million. Meanwhile the support level for producers will be maintained at 64 cents a pound by the board. This means manufacturers will be authorized to pay eligible producers 13.3 cents per pound of butterfat used for production of creamery butter.

The support for cheddar cheese will be maintained at the existing level of 32½ cents per pound, but the basis on which it is paid will be revised to stress production of high quality cheese. Instead of paying 30 cents per hundredweight on milk used for cheddar cheese production, a payment of 3.6 cents per pound will be made on Canada first grade cheddar made from milk supplied by eligible producers. This will permit manufacturers of such cheese to pay at least the equivalent of the 30 cents per hundredweight assistance for cheese milk during the year now ending. The purchase program on dry skim milk and the assistance on milk used for the manufacture of casein will be reinstated on the same basis as in effect during the 1963-64 production year. Export assistance on certain dairy products will continue in the coming dairy year with the products and levels being made known to the trade by the board in due course.

In making this announcement I would stress that these moves represent another step toward solving what has been one of the most difficult agricultural problems facing not only Canada but many other countries in the world.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in the house today in regard to dairy policy. The dairy industry are accustomed to having this statement made prior to May 1, the beginning of the dairy year, and in this instance we are glad that the minister, although leaving it to the last moment, has made this statement. We are very pleased indeed to learn that one of the major dairy problems is being brought to a close, in that we find in the announcement made by the minister today that the domestic consumption and export of butter are being brought into line with the production of this commodity. This will alleviate one of the major problems of the dairy industry.

We welcome the statement made by the minister that he is going to continue the support on cheddar cheese, that butter will be subsidized and emphasis will be placed on the production of first grade cheddar cheese. We will have to wait until we can consider this report in some detail in order to deal specifically with the different parts of the announcement that has been made today but we are certainly pleased, sir, that the minister has taken this opportunity to announce to the country the dairy policy of this government.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TRANSFER OF WOMEN'S PRISON, KINGSTON TO CORNWALL

Question No. 43—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has a decision been made to move the federal women's prison from Kingston to Cornwall and, if so, when was this decision made?

2. Was consideration given to the possible difficulties of attracting qualified staff to Cornwall?

3. In the Cornwall area are there available psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers, trained in correction and teachers who could be recruited to work in the new institution?

Mr. Favreau: 1. Yes, in January 1964, but the decision is being reviewed in the light of representations made by interested organizations.

2. No difficulties are contemplated in attracting qualified staff to Cornwall.

3. Such personnel are either available in the Cornwall area or can be recruited elsewhere to work in the new institution.

VOCATIONAL SCHOOL, POWELL RIVER, B.C.

Question No. 276—Mr. Howard:

Has any statement, commitment or promise been made by any minister of the crown to one Henry Castilou or anyone else of British Columbia that 90 per cent of the funds necessary for a vocational school in the Powell river district would be provided by the federal government and, if so, which minister or ministers made such a statement and at what time and where?

Mr. Badanai: A delegation of Indians from British Columbia, accompanied by Mr. Castilou, during a visit to Ottawa last November discussed among other things the matter of vocational training for Indian boys and girls. The delegation mentioned establishing a separate vocational school for Indians but no commitment was made that this would be done. They were especially concerned with those who had ability but did not have the academic requirements for admission to the regular provincial training programs. It was indicated that consideration would be given to a special training program for this group. The department has already moved in this direction by having the Vancouver vocational institute offer special carpentry courses for Indians. In addition over 30 per cent of the enrolment in an upgrading program conducted by the province in Vancouver has been of Indian status and the results have been satisfactory.

* FEDERAL EMPLOYEES RECEIVING LESS THAN $1.25 PER HOUR

Question No. 321—Mr. Fisher:

1. How many employees does the government have who are now receiving less than $1.25 an hour, in both prevailing rates categories and for those who work on salary?

2. Has the government an estimate on how much it would cost it per year if the minimum wage should be set by law at $1.25?

Mr. Benson: 1. The last detailed calculation that was made refers to March, 1963, and at that time there were 5,500 salaried employees and 7,900 prevailing rate employees receiving less than $1.25 per hour.

2. No estimate of the complete cost is available. However, to increase the 13,400 employees mentioned in 1 above to a minimum of $1.25 an hour would cost approximately $4,800,000 per annum. Substantial additional costs would result from requirements to reestablish differentials for some other classes already paid at $1.25 or more.

COMMEMORATION OF BIRTH OF SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

Question No. 335—Mr. Mather:

Is the government giving consideration to encouraging the suitable commemoration of the 150th anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald's birth, including the declaration of a national holiday on that date, Monday, January 11, 1965?

Mr. Davis: The government is giving consideration to a number of suggestions that have been made for the commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Sir John A. Macdonald.

R.C.M.P. QUARTERS, ASHERN, MAN.

Question No. 369—Mr. Stefanson:

What type of R.C.M.P. detachment quarters are planned for Ashern, Manitoba, and when will tenders be called?

Mr. Favreau: A standard detachment building with office space, cell rooms, married and single quarters, is planned for Ashern, Manitoba and it is anticipated tenders will be called within the next two months.

R.C.M.P. QUARTERS, NORWAY HOUSE, MAN.

Question No. 433—Mr. Stefanson:

What type of R.C.M.P. detachment quarters are planned for Norway House, Manitoba, and when will tenders be called?

Mr. Favreau: One prefabricated office building and one standard detachment type married quarters are planned for Norway House, Manitoba. Tenders will be called during the fiscal year 1964-65.

*INCREASED GRANT TO CANADA COUNCIL

Question No. 501—Mr. Orlikow:

Is the government giving consideration to the request of the Canada Council for an increase this year and for the next two years, to its endowment fund of $10,000,000 for a total of $30,000,000 so that the Canada Council can fulfil the important functions of supporting the arts, humanities and social sciences which has been assigned to the Canada Council?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but as of this moment no decision has been reached.

R.C.M.P. QUARTERS, HODGSON, MAN.

Question No. 544—Mr. Stefanson:

1. Has land been purchased for R.C.M.P. detachment quarters at Hodgson, Manitoba, and, if so, from whom was land purchased and what was the cost?

2. What type of detachment quarters do the plans call for and when will tenders be called?

Mr. Favreau: 1. No.

2. Present plans do not call for construction of new detachment quarters at Hodgson, Manitoba.

IMMIGRATION FROM INDIA

Question No. 554—Mr. Howard:

Is there an agreement in effect between the government of Canada and the government of India which restricts to 300 the number of citizens of India who may come to Canada in any one year for permanent residence and, if so, will steps be taken to rescind this agreement?

Mr. Tremblay: In 1951 the Canadian and Indian governments entered into an agreement providing for the annual admission to Canada of 150 citizens of India over and above those categories of persons who were already eligible for admission under then existing immigration regulations. The agreement was revised in 1957 to increase the number involved from 150 to 300.

On the surface it might appear that this agreement is restrictive in nature as is suggested by the wording of the hon. member's question. However, it must be borne in mind that the agreement was concluded at a time when immigration regulations were not as broad in scope as they are at present. In effect therefore the agreement took the form of an extension of the admissible categories for citizens of India.

With the coming into force of new immigration regulations in February 1962, which gave everyone an equal opportunity to qualify for admission in his or her own right, the need for the agreement from the viewpoint of the Canadian government ceased. Discussions have since been held between representatives of the Canadian and Indian governments with a view to cancelling the agreement. In the meantime the agreement has remained in effect.

I would also like to say that the hon. member, in putting his question, has given me the opportunity to qualify to some extent the observations I made previously on this subject at page 1469 of Hansard during the course of the debate on the immigration supplementary estimates on March 25, 1964.

DOMICILIARY CARE PATIENTS, VETERANS HOSPITALS

Question No. 582—Mr. Harley:

What percentage of the total of the patients in the various D.V.A. hospitals across Canada have been hospitalized and considered to be domiciliary care cases for the years 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962, and 1963?

Mr. Teillet: 1959, 49.9 per cent; 1960, 48.1 per cent; 1961, 47.2 per cent; 1962, 45.8 per cent; 1963, 46.4 per cent.

[Mr. Stefanson.]

*MENTION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES IN T.C.A. ADVERTISEMENT

Question No. 608—Mr. Bell:

Did a recent two-page advertisement in The Scottish Field, sponsored by Trans-Canada Air Lines and/or Air Canada telling of Canada's attractions, neglect to mention the Atlantic provinces and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Cantin: The management of Trans-Canada Air Lines reports that this, in fact, was the case and added: It also omitted reference to points in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The reason is that if the impact of any advertisement is to be retained the amount of material contained in it must be severely curtailed.

The management of T.C.A. is reviewing this and other similar comments received concerning their advertisements.

STUDENT LOANS—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Question No. 634—Mr. Matheson:

With reference to representations of the premier of Quebec respecting the power of the parliament of Canada to legislate on family allowances and student loans, will the government consider the advisability of referring these matters to the supreme court under the provisions of section 55 of the Supreme Court Act for consideration and adjudication?

Mr. Davis: The position of the federal government on these two matters is contained in the Prime Minister's statement to the house on federal-provincial arrangements as reported in Hansard of April 20, 1964.

GREAT LAKES WATER LEVELS

Question No. 655—Mr. Aiken:

1. What was the average water level for each of the years from 1955 to 1963 inclusive on lakes Huron, St. Clair, and Erie?

2. What was the average annual rate of precipitation in the upper great lakes area for each of the years from 1955 to 1963 inclusive?

3. What is the minimum depth of the channel between lake Huron and lake St. Clair, and when was the last significant change?

Mr. Lamontagne: 1. The yearly mean levels of lakes Huron, St. Clair and Erie, in feet above the international great lakes datum (1955), as recorded at the Canadian hydrographic service gauges at Goderich, Tecumseh and Port Colborne, which are considered representative for each lake are as follows:

Year	Lake Huron (Goderich)	Lake St. Clair (Tecumseh)	Lake Erie (Port Colborne)
1955	579.10	574.11	571.49
1956	578.16	573.10	570.68
1957	577.64	572.92	570.44
1958	577.05	572.05	569.71
1959	576.78	572.09	569.90
1960	578.28	573.17	570.66

Year	Lake Huron (Goderich)	Lake St. Clair (Tecumseh)	Lake Erie (Port Colborne)
1961	578.00	573.12	570.63
1963	576.51	571.78	569.44

2. The average annual rate of precipitation (snow and rain) in the upper great lakes area for each of the years from 1955 to 1963 inclusive was as follows:

1955	34.19 inches
1956	27.01 inches
1957	28.97 inches
1958	29.67 inches
1959	32.66 inches
1960	31.26 inches
1961	28.58 inches
1962	27.19 inches
1963	25.30 inches

3. The minimum depth of the channel between lake Huron and lake St. Clair at mid-April 1964 was 26.4 feet. The last significant change took place in 1962 when the U.S. corps of engineers completed a dredging program to deepen the channel.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION SOLICITORS, ALBERTA

Question No. 681—Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson):

1. How are the divisions in the Farm Credit Corporation in Alberta allocated to solicitors?

Questions

2. Who are the solicitors at present and how much has been paid to them in the past year?

3. For what reason has no solicitor been appointed at Barrhead, Alberta, and (a) has the government been unable to find lawyers there with the necessary qualifications to act on behalf of the corporation (b) has the corporation considered the fact that it requires farmers in that area to drive 180 miles into the city of Edmonton to have their legal work done?

Mr. Hays: 1. After consideration of the volume and distribution of its lending operations in Alberta, the corporation appointed solicitors at a number of centres throughout the province to do legal work with respect to loans in the area surrounding such centres. In determining the number and location of solicitors, the corporation has endeavoured to provide satisfactory geographical distribution, with each solicitor receiving a sufficient volume of business to become thoroughly familiar with procedures and requirements, and to encourage him to give a measure of priority to the corporation's work, so that loans would be disbursed to farmers as quickly as possible.

2. Fees payable to solicitors for processing loans are paid by the borrowers, either directly or from the proceeds of the loan, in accordance with a tariff of fees set by the corporation. The present solicitors, and the amount of fees paid to each, on behalf of the borrowers, in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1964, are as follows:

Solicitor	Fees
Arnell, G. E.	$2,465
Decore, J. V.	2,096
Holmes, J. K.	3,250
MacDonell, C. A.	2,085
MacNaughton, F. R.	2,105
Maddison, H. C. B.	2,120
Moshansky, V. P.	2,240
Rennie, G. R.	1,130
Yanosik, C.	2,180

Solicitor	Fees
Broughton, R. D.	Nil
Catonio, A. P.	Nil
Chamberlain, L. C.	Nil
Crerar, D. C.	Nil
Fowler, J. W.	Nil
Gulak, B. J.	Nil
Knaut, G. R.	Nil
Lagasse, J. L.	Nil
MacNaughton, D. P.	Nil
Medhurst, D. H.	Nil
Turner, W. O.	Nil
White, W. G.	Nil

3. (a) and (b). A solicitor was appointed at Westlock in accordance with the principles outlined in (1) and it was not considered necessary to appoint another solicitor at Barrhead, which is only about 26 miles from Westlock.

Farmers borrowing from the corporation may select any solicitor of their choice for their own share of the legal work with respect to their loans. The corporation's share of the legal work with respect to loans in the Barrhead area is attended to by the corporation's solicitor at Westlock, rather than at Edmonton.

EXPENDITURES ON BUTTER AND MILK SUBSIDIES

Question No. 690—Mr. Rondeau:

1. Since 1954, what losses have been incurred by the federal government in connection with the sale, purchase, conversion, storage and transportation of butter and derivatives including milk powder and butter oil in (a) Canada (b) Ontario (c) Quebec and, (d) the county of Shefford?

2. How much money has the federal government spent in (a) Canada (b) Ontario (c) Quebec and, (d) the county of Shefford, as a result of the 25 cent per cwt. milk subsidy, since the establishment of that subsidy?

3. How much money has the federal government spent in (a) Ontario (b) Quebec, and (c) the county of Shefford, as a result of the 12 cent per pound producers' subsidy?

Questions

Mr. Hays: 1. (a) $103,681,642 (to December 31, 1963); (b), (c) and (d) detail is not available by provinces and municipalities.

2. (a) $48,061,173.92 (to March 31, 1964); (b) $22,987,077.85 (to March 31, 1964); (c) $22,531,738.74 (to March 31, 1964); (d) $5,469,043.88 (to March 31, 1964).

3. (a) $21,154,736.53; (b) $31,913,061.23; (c) $2,759,887.37.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 698—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many juvenile offenders are now in federal penitentiaries?
2. In how many cases did the court have presentence recommendations from social workers, probation officers, psychiatrists, etc.?
3. What facilities, if any, are there for segregation of these juveniles from the adult inmates?

Mr. Favreau: 1. Nine (survey dated 31 December, 1963).

2. This information is not available within the department.

3. Although there are no special facilities for the segregation of juveniles, they are detained in young offenders' section or are sent to young offenders' institutions.

PSYCHOLOGISTS, PHYSICIANS, ETC. EMPLOYED IN FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 700—Mr. Orlikow:

How many of the psychologists, psychiatrists, physicians and dentists, employed by the federal government work full time at the penitentiaries and, of those who work part time, how many hours per week does each work in the penitentiaries?

Mr. Favreau:

Dentists, part time	3

Physicians, full time	1
Part time	3
Contract	7
	11
Psychiatrists, part time	8
	10
Psychologists, full time	14

Physicians and dentists, part time, work 15 hours per week. Those employed on a contract basis work full time.

Psychiatrists and psychologists, part time, work 15 hours per week while those on contract are employed on an arrangement prepared to meet the needs of the institution concerned.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING IN FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 701—Mr. Orlikow:

1. How many inmates of federal penitentiaries are now receiving training which is recognized by provincial and federal apprenticeship boards?
2. How many vacancies are there at present for vocational training instructors and school teachers in the various penitentiaries, and in what institutions do these vacancies exist?
3. How many hours does an inmate actually spend in vocational training shop per day, excluding taking counts and movement to and from place of training?

Mr. Favreau: 1. Seven hundred and forty two inmates.

3. From 6½ to 7¼ hours per day.

QUALIFICATIONS OF VOCATIONAL TRAINING INSTRUCTORS IN FEDERAL PENITENTIARIES

Question No. 702—Mr. Orlikow:

What qualifications are required by the vocational training instructors and industrial instructors who are employed by the penitentiaries?

Mr. Favreau: Qualifications for vocational instructors—academic standing equivalent to high school graduation with preference to graduates from recognized technical school; proof of completion of apprenticeship and at least five years' experience in the particular trade.

Qualifications for industrial instructors—minimum of grade X education, apprenticeship or equivalent; at least five years' journeyman's experience in the trade; some experience in a supervisory or administrative capacity.

COST OF ALTERATIONS, TELEVISION STATIONS CBWT AND CBWFT

Question No. 704—Mr. Stefanson:

1. What is the total estimated cost for the combined move, change of power video and audio, and change of channels for television stations CBWT and CBWFT?
2. What is the estimated cost of the move, and what tenders have been let?
3. What is the estimated cost of the new antenna, and what tenders have been let giving name of successful bidder and amounts?
4. How many tenders were received, from whom and what were the amounts?
5. What is the estimated cost of the building, what tenders have been let giving name of successful bidder and amount?
6. How many tenders were received, from whom and what were the amounts?
7. Is the work proceeding on schedule?
8. When is it expected that the new service will go into operation?
9. Will this changeover improve television reception for the interlake area of Manitoba and, if not, how soon can one expect action to be taken to bring about this much needed improvement?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. $1,167,350.

2. Only item to be moved is existing CBWT transmitter which will become CBWFT. Cost of moving this included in contract for new transmitter for CBWT, which has been awarded.

3. The antenna is included in the contract for the new CBWT transmitter and moving the existing CBWT transmitter. This contract was awarded to RCA Victor Co. Ltd. under order in council PC 1963-4/960 of June 27th, 1963 and is in the amount of $479,069.

4. Tenders were received from: Canadian General Electric Co. Ltd.; Canadian Marconi Company; Northern Electric Co. Ltd.; RCA Victor Co. Ltd. Some submitted more than one proposal and the amounts were: $455,855; $499,812; $560,476; $569,334; $581,335; $605,-750; $612,876. Lowest not acceptable as it produced only 81 kw ERP (effective radiated power) as opposed to specified 100 kw for CBWT. Next lowest accepted and reduced to $479,069 as a result of some technical changes.

5. Estimated cost of building, $78,500. Contract for building awarded to Rowland Claydon & Co. Ltd. in the amount of $81,284.

6. Four tenders received, from: Commonwealth Construction Co. Ltd.; Pearson Construction Co. Ltd.; Rowland Claydon & Co. Ltd.; Surety Construction Co. Ltd. The amounts were: $81,284; $82,810; $87,263; $87,925.

7. Yes.

8. October 1964.

9. It is anticipated that some areas of the interlake region will receive an improved service, but it is not possible to guarantee reception in specific areas. The corporation intends to conduct a survey of reception in the area following the completion of the proposed changes. The results of this survey will be used to determine what action if any should be taken.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMISTRESS, RIVIÈRE AU RENARD, QUE.

Question No. 710—Mr. Martineau:

1. Does the Post Office Department intend to dismiss Miss Hattie English as postmistress at Rivière au Renard, Quebec and, if so, for what reason?
2. Has an inquiry been held on the alleged reasons for such a dismissal and, if so, will a report of the inquiry be tabled in the house?
3. For how many years has this person held the position of postmistress at the abovementioned location?
4. Was the inquiry, if any, conducted by the civil service commission?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. Yes, the Post Office Department advised Miss Hattie English that she would be dismissed as postmistress at Rivière au Renard for violating section 61 of the Civil Service Act.

2. Yes, by a commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act. The findings of the commissioner's report show that Miss English indulged in political activities. The report will be tabled if the house so orders.

3. Twenty years.

4. See No. 2.

TENDERS FOR R.C.M.P. AUTOMOBILES, BRANDON, MAN.

Question No. 724—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Has the R.C.M.P., Brandon detachment, requested tenders for new automobiles this year?
2. What firms have been invited to tender?
3. What firms were invited to tender on R.C.M.P. vehicles in Brandon during the years 1957 to 1963?

Mr. Favreau: 1. Yes, for one automobile.

2. All bona fide dealers representing Chrysler Canada Limited, Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited, and General Motors Products of Canada Limited.

3. 1957: Victoria Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Western Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Binkley Motors Limited, Mrandon, Man.; Canadian Motors Limited, Brandon. Man.

1963: Wilton Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Canadian Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Binkley Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Western Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Brandon Automobiles, Brandon, Man.; Wheat Motors Limited, Brandon, Man.; Don Gamble Limited, Brandon, Man.

*GREAT LAKES—EMERGENCY DREDGING BECAUSE OF LOW WATER LEVELS

Question No. 742—Mr. Smith:

In view of the low water levels in the great lakes, are any investigations or plans being undertaken by the government to ascertain the need for emergency dredging in the harbours of the great lakes to assist commercial shipping this summer?

Mr. McWilliam: Yes, particularly at harbours in lake Huron. Sounding surveys have been carried out at a number of commercial harbours and more are to be done. These are to be examined to determine to what extent dredging will provide practical solutions.

PENITENTIARY CUSTODIAL STAFF

Question No. 745—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Is remunerative recognition given to professional penitentiary staff who have qualifications exceeding the minimum requirements of the penitentiary service?
2. Are there monetary incentives provided for custodial staff in our penitentiaries to improve their education and training for greater proficiency in job performance?
3. Do all custodial officers in our correctional institutions receive training in the behavioural sciences by qualified professional staff?
4. Does the federal government contemplate the provision of training grants and bursaries for its employees in the field of correction and welfare in view of the fact that moneys are now made available to the provinces for similar training in these fields?

Mr. Favreau: 1. No.

2. No.

3. Basic instruction in behavioural sciences is included in the training program for custodial officers.

4. This matter is under active consideration at this time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CLAIMS, RIVIÈRE DU LOUP, QUE.

Question No. 758—Mr. Dionne:

1. What was the number of appeals to the council of referees from claimants to the unemployment insurance commission office at Rivière du Loup in 1963?
2. How many decisions, out of the number of appeals, were amended?
3. How many decisions were maintained?
4. What was the amount overpaid to claimants who were not qualified according to the provisions of the act?

5. What was the number of claimants disqualified from receiving benefits for voluntarily leaving employment?

6. What was the number of claimants disqualified from receiving benefits for refusing to accept employment offered?

7. What was the total number of unemployed claimants at the Rivière du Loup office of the commission in 1963?

8. What are the results to date of negotiations started by the Canadian government representatives with a view to concluding an agreement with American authorities, aimed at qualifying Canadian workers for unemployment benefits in American territory, particularly in the states of Maine and New Hampshire?

9. How many workers 45 years of age or over have been employed within the district covered by the national employment office of Rivière du Loup, under the program for the encouragement of the employment of older workers?

10. Which employers in that area benefited from the program?

11. Has the government studied the possibility of extending the period during which such older workers can be hired beyond March 31, 1964?

12. What were the conclusions of the study made by the labour department on the advisability of extending the period of winter works until May 30 in areas having a severe climate?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. 518.

2. 84.

3. 434.

4. This information is not available.

5. 431.

6. 75.

7. The number of active claimants on the last day of each of the months named, was as follows: January, 5,630; February, 6,764; March, 6,840; April, 5,349; May, 1,193; June, 721; July, 575; August, 519; September, 512; October, 843; November, 1,452; December, 3,377.

8. Negotiations have been carried on over a long period with the states of Maine and New Hampshire, with a view to establishing reciprocal arrangements with them respecting unemployment insurance as has been done with almost all the other states. Toward the end of 1963 the employment security commission of the state of Maine informed the government that it is not prepared to enter into such an arrangement and it is understood there is no disposition on the part of New Hampshire to do so either.

9. Statistics on this program are only available on a provincial basis. 407 workers aged 45 and over were employed, under the program in the province of Quebec, as at March 31, 1964.

10. Names of employers are not available.

11. The program was initiated on an experimental basis. The results of the program will take a number of months to evaluate.

12. That an extension beyond April 30, 1964 was not warranted as a result of climatic conditions.

LOCAL SEAT OF GOVERNMENT, NANAIMO, B.C.

Question No. 766—Mr. Prittie:

1. Is there an installation known as "The local seat of government" at or near Nanaimo, B.C.?

2. Was this established under the Emergency Measures Act?

3. Is this installation manned at all times and, if so, how many persons are on duty and what is their rank and authority?

Mr. Drury: Emergency measures organization.

1. There is no installation by that name at or near Nanaimo. There is, however, a regional emergency government headquarters near Nanaimo to provide facilities in an emergency for representatives of both the federal and provincial governments.

2. There is no act with this title. The regional emergency government headquarters was built as part of the federal government's program for the decentralization of government in the event of an emergency.

3. Because the installation of equipment is still proceeding this headquarters is not yet manned. The Department of National Defence makes provision for the necessary security arrangements while this work is in progress.

BUSINESSES ESTABLISHED IN DESIGNATED AREAS

Question No. 768—Mr. Stenson:

Of the 34 manufacturing businesses that have been established in Canada in designated areas, how many have established in (a) each province, (b) Windsor, Ontario (c) Brantford, Ontario?

Answer: Of the 34 new businesses which are being established in Canada with the declared intention of benefiting from the designated area tax incentives program, the breakdown is as follows:

(a) Provincial
Alberta-British Columbia	1
New Brunswick	2
Nova Scotia	3
Ontario	17
Total	34

(b) Windsor, Ontario, 2

(c) Brantford, Ontario, 10.

*NAME FOR C.B.C. HEADQUARTERS BUILDING, OTTAWA

Question No. 769—Mr. Chrétien:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation chosen a name for its new headquarters building in the city of Ottawa?

2. Has the corporation given thought to naming it after John F. Kennedy, the assassinated president of the United States, a public figure greatly admired by Canada's youth?

3. If not, will the corporation consider this suggestion?

Mr. Stewart: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1. Yes. It is called the C.B.C. Building—L'Édifice Radio Canada.

2. The suggestion was considered but not accepted for the following reasons: The building is situated on Confederation Heights, the title and purpose of which are commemorative of the beginnings of Canadian nationhood and independence. The C.B.C. itself arose out of a Canadian need, the need to make the art and science of broadcasting help the cause of Canadian nationhood. The late President Kennedy was a great American, admired, respected and deeply mourned in this country. But it would appear to be inappropriate to use his name in the title of the head office building of a Canadian corporation created to provide Canadians with a national broadcasting service which is distinctively Canadian.

3. See 2 above.

DOMINION OBSERVATORY IN WESTERN CANADA

Question No. 773—Mr. Lambert:

1. Is it the intention to establish a new dominion observatory in western Canada, and especially in either the provinces of Alberta or British Columbia and, if so, has a decision been reached as to a specific locality?

2. What are the essential conditions which go to determine a suitable location?

3. What would be the estimated cost of constructing such an observatory, and how long would it take?

Mr. Benidickson: 1. The Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is presently studying a proposal put forward by the dominion observatory to build a large optical telescope of at least 150 inches in diameter, in that region of the country best suited to astronomical observations. If constructed, it is planned that this new equipment would be available on equitable terms to astronomers from every province of Canada. The specific site of the proposed telescope has not yet been chosen. However, the requirement for high altitude has limited the search to the mountainous regions of the country and more particularly to the southern parts of British Columbia and Alberta.

2. The site of a large optical telescope must be high enough to be above local dust and disturbed air (usually 6,000 to 7,000 feet). It must be in a region not subject to rapidly moving weather fronts, to great extremes of temperature, and to much auroral activity, and it must be well away from industrial development and large population centres. Low rainfall and clear skies are essential as well as steady and transparent air. These factors, however, serve only to limit the search and final selection must be made on the basis of optical tests.

3. The capital cost of such an observatory is estimated to be $9,671,000 spread over a period of six to seven years.

REVISION OF GRAIN GRADING METHOD

Question No. 776—Mr. Rapp:

Is a re-examination of Canada's grain-grading system being made with a view to bringing it into line with grain grading procedures in other countries and, if so, when is it likely that such a revised grain grading method will be introduced?

Mr. Hays: Inasmuch as Canada's grain grading system is acknowledged to be superior there is no consideration being given to bringing it into line with grading procedures in other countries. However, with the rapidly changing technology in the baking industry in consuming countries, which require somewhat different qualities in the grain that goes into the end product than heretofore, it is felt that a careful and thorough examination of all that is involved in grading grain, particularly wheat, is desirable. Consideration is at present being given to undertaking such a study.

HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANTS, ALBERTA

Question No. 777—Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson):

1. How much money has been paid to the province of Alberta under the hospital construction grants program in each of the past ten years?

2. In the past three years, what amount in construction grants has been paid to the province of Alberta for auxiliary hospitals?

3. What is the location of each hospital and the amount of money spent on each hospital under the hospital construction grants program in each of the past five years?

1. How many completed their training under the retraining of unemployed workers plan during the year 1963?
2. How many completed their training under the retraining of unemployed workers plan during the year 1962?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. 32,825 persons were enrolled under program 5, training for unemployed, in 1963, 17,627 persons completed their training that year and 9,928 persons were still in training at the end of that year.

2. 27,895 persons were enrolled under program 5, training for the unemployed, in 1962, 13,753 persons completed their training that year, 7,778 persons were still in training at the end of the year.

LETTER CARRIER SERVICE, WEYBURN, SASK.

Question No. 822—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

1. When was a survey last made in the city of Weyburn by the Post Office Department with a view to implementing letter carrier service?
2. What was the result of that survey?
3. When is it expected that letter carrier service will be commenced?

Mr. Nicholson: 1. The last survey was in January 1964.

2. It indicated that there were 2,375 calls available for letter carrier delivery service.

3. When the city has developed to the extent that there are 2,500 available calls in a compact area.

TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR CHARITABLE DONATIONS

Question No. 829—Mr. Laprise:

Has the Minister of National Revenue instructed taxation offices to disregard the regulation entitling taxpayers to claim a deduction not exceeding 10 per cent of their income for charitable donations?

Mr. McIlraith: No. Offices of the taxation division are instructed to allow claims for donations made to charitable organizations to the extent permitted by the Income Tax Act.

JAPANESE TRADE FAIR—NON-PARTICIPATION BY CANADA

Question No. 835—Mr. Enns:

Since the U.S.A., Australia, Italy, and West Germany, are participating in the international trade fair at Osaka, Japan this spring, for what reason is Canada not taking part in this fair?

Answer: In recent years there has been some liberalization of imports to Japan in a number of commodity groups. As a result new opportunities have opened for the sale of Canadian manufactured products, making it possible for the government to resume participation in the Japanese international trade fair which is held alternately in Osaka and Tokyo. However, because Canada's trade fair program is planned approximately 18 months in advance, it was impractical to schedule a Canadian exhibit before next year when the fair will be held in Tokyo.

EXTENSION TO CHARLES CAMSELL HOSPITAL, EDMONTON

Question No. 838—Mr. Lambert:

1. Has a definite date been set for the calling of tenders for the extension to the Charles Camsel hospital in Edmonton, Alberta and, if so, what is this date, and what is the date of closing of the tender period?
2. Assuming usual procedures, what would be the anticipated date of commencement of work in the light of the answer to part 1?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. No. The department understands that the consultant architects are now completing working drawings and specifications which will be submitted to the Department of Public Works for incorporation into tender documents.

2. Not known at this time.

FLOODING OF HISTORIC SITE, MEDUCTIC, N.B.

Question No. 845—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

1. Is the historic site of Meductic, New Brunswick, in Carleton county to be flooded and thus destroyed by the construction of the Mactaquac dam?
2. Has the report of a departmental archeologist been secured relative to the effect of said dam on the archeological treasures considered by experts to be available by excavation and intensive search?
3. Has the approval of the historic sites and monuments board of Canada been sought in connection with the construction?

Mr. Laing: 1. Yes.

2. Excavation of Fort Meductic is to be undertaken this summer by a professional team of archeologists under contract to the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission. An intensive survey of the proposed reservoir to be created by the dam will also be made before the land is flooded in 1966. Officials of the historic sites division of the national parks branch of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and of the human history branch of the national museum of Canada are helping to arrange both programs.

3. No; the historic sites and monuments board has no jurisdiction over the site.

BRITISH COLUMBIA PHARMACY ACT BY-LAW

Question No. 851—Mr. Mather:

Has the Department of Justice (or government) received a petition calling for an investigation of by-law 44(7) of the pharmacy act as enacted by order in council by the government of British Columbia and, if so, what action is being taken on the petition?

Mr. Macdonald: Yes. The information received is being considered by the director of investigation and research, Combines Investigation Act, to determine whether the situation is such as to warrant formal inquiry under the act. Since the letter was received, however, it has been confirmed that a private action has been instituted in the supreme court of British Columbia challenging the validity of the above regulations or by-laws and the director will of course have to take note that the matter is at present sub judice.

C.B.C. BUILDING SITE, TORONTO

Question No. 862—Mr. Moreau:

TREATMENT FOR DRUG ADDICTION

Motion No. 92—Mr. Howard:

Motions for Papers

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all briefs, plans, submissions or treatises prepared by staff members at the British Columbia penitentiary since January 1, 1960, regarding drug addiction and treatment thereof and any other penological concepts.

Motion agreed to.

AIR TERMINAL TRANSPORT LTD., TORONTO

Motion No. 102—Mr. Addison:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or other documents exchanged between Air Terminal Transport Limited of Toronto and the Department of Transport, and also any correspondence between Trans-Canada Air Lines and the Department of Transport that relates to Air Terminal Transport Limited of Toronto.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put might I say that I understand the hon. member would be satisfied to receive copies of the agreements with respect to ground transportation between Air Terminal Transport Limited of Toronto and the Department of Transport and correspondence relating to the negotiation of these agreements. The government would have to take the position that correspondence between T.C.A. and the Department of Transport is privileged, but subject to that reservation the motion is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion subject to the reservation of the minister?

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE FOR INDIANS AND ESKIMOS IN LABRADOR

Motion No. 105—Mr. Granger:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence exchanged between June 21, 1957, and April 22, 1963, between any member of the government of Newfoundland and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regarding additional federal assistance for Indians and Eskimos in Labrador.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL DISTRICT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH MUNICIPALITIES

Motion No. 107—Mr. Martineau:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all letters, memoranda or other documents exchanged since the 22nd of April 1963, between the government and any municipality within the national capital area, concerning the possible setting up of a national capital district.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL CAPITAL DISTRICT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH QUEBEC AND ONTARIO

Motion No. 108—Mr. Martineau:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all letters, memoranda or other documents exchanged between the Canadian government, on the one hand, and the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, on the other hand, since the 22nd of April 1963, concerning the setting up of a national capital district.

Motion agreed to.

EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PERIOD

Motion No. 109—Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John):

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Labour or any official of his department, and the government of Quebec, concerning the extension of the winter works period.

Motion agreed to.

STUDENT LOAN FUND LEGISLATION

Motion No. 110—Mr. MacRae:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all letters, memoranda or other documents addressed by the government of Canada to the provincial governments in connection with the proposed student loan fund legislation and any replies thereto.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

FIXING OF DUTIES UNDER CUSTOMS ACT

Motion No. 111—Mr. Moreau:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all orders by the Minister of National Revenue since April 18, 1961 under the provisions of section 38 of the Customs Act for the purpose of fixing duties.

Motion agreed to.

MAPS SHOWING ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

Motion No. 112—Mr. Martineau:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all maps, drawn up or deposited with the chief electoral officer or the representation commissioner, pertaining to the proposed redistribution of electoral boundaries in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether this motion could be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

REVOCATION OF PAROLES, MONTREAL

Motion No. 113—Mr. Orlikow:

That an order of the house do issue for a list, by name or number, of all paroles revoked in the city of Montreal during the year 1963, giving in each case the grounds for the revocation and the name of the judge involved.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF OLDER WORKERS—INFORMATION GIVEN TO PRESS RATHER THAN IN HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Chester MacRae (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege which I believe affects all members of the house. Appearing on the order paper today is question No. 826, addressed to the Minister of Labour, which reads in part as follows:

1. Up to the present date, how many workers over the age of 45 have been placed in employment in Canada through the offices of the national employment service as a result of the program by which their salaries are supplemented to the maximum of $75 per month out of public funds?

Appearing in the press of this country yesterday under the byline of the Canadian Press is a release in the name of the Minister of Labour, and I will read it in part:

Labour minister MacEachen announced Monday—

That is the day before yesterday.

—that 2,347 job openings were approved under the incentive program whereby the federal government pays a special subsidy to employers hiring and training workers 45 years and older. But by the March 31 deadline for hiring older workers, only 1,811 workers had been put in approved jobs.

Mr. Speaker, the way members have of obtaining information in this house is by means of the order paper. Many of us try assiduously to follow the rules of the house, and in an effort to do so I placed my question on the order paper on April 21. It was there on Monday last. The minister chose to give this information to the press of the country instead of answering the question in the House of Commons. I submit this is a breach of the rules of the house, it is contempt of parliament and in fact it is government by press release.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of privilege raised by my hon. friend, I may say that he will wish to revise his grievance when he realizes that the information released to the press on Monday had already been given in the house.

Mr. MacEwan: No, it had not.

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—ALLEGED INACCURATE STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. On April 24 the Associate Minister of National Defence, in reply to a supplementary question posed by me which appears on pages 2539 and 2540 of Hansard, stated that his department was doing everything it could to phase out operations at the Point Edward naval base as slowly as possible. He continued by stating:

A ship which was not scheduled to go into the Point Edward naval base has now been directed to go there in order to be refitted, so that work will be provided for a longer period and we will then be able to phase out more slowly the work at Point Edward naval base.

It has only now come to my attention that the naval vessel to which I presume he referred, H.M.C.S. Swansea, is not at the Point Edward naval base but is at a private shipyard at Sydney where only five employees from the base are employed at the moment. The result of the minister's statement, which was accepted by all the news media in the area to mean that a new refit job was available for this base, has been to promote false hopes and disappointment in the minds of the employees who are already tormented by the fact they are to be without employment in the very near future.

I am not suggesting that the minister deliberately misled the house, the employees and others in the area concerned. However, it is my hope that the hon. gentleman will now correct his grievous error and see that a naval vessel is allocated to this base so the phasing out will be slowed down as he promised, since this government appears to be quite adamant in its stand that this base must close.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): I have not had an opportunity of seeing the article to which the hon. member referred. What I said the other day was that in order to extend the work, to phase out the work at Point Edward more slowly, the government had decided to send a ship to the Point Edward naval base which had not been scheduled for that base. I shall be glad to look into this particular matter. I can tell the house that there was certainly no intention to mislead the house. It is a fact that a ship was sent to the Point Edward naval base for repairs that was not scheduled to go there.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct once more to the Minister of Labour a question I asked while he was absent.

I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has received letters from the Quebec minister of municipal affairs as well as from the mayors' and municipalities' association of the province of Quebec as regards the extension of the winter works program in the designated areas, and whether this will result in a change in government policy on this matter.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact that this is almost a daily question I can hardly rule it as so pressing and urgent that it needs to be answered at this time. Will the hon. member put it on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to keep this question for discussion at ten o'clock tomorrow night.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—INQUIRIES RESPECTING PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Now that General Gyani has spoken along the line of questions asked by the opposition, namely that the situation in certain parts of Cyprus is such that it raises serious implications concerning the role of the United Nations force, I ask the minister—we have to get this information from the press, I would point out—whether any action has been taken to do that which we have suggested, that is to give reasonable powers to the United Nations force; particularly because of an Associated Press dispatch which indicates that all the Canadian troops in Cyprus have to do is observe developments and report back to United Nations headquarters or intervene to protect the civilian population if necessary. Is the minister now in a position to give this house more complete and concise information than he has given up to the present time?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman said I gave something to the press which I had not given to the house.

Some hon. Members: No, he did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. If he had said that I was going to correct it. General Gyani issued a subsequent statement to that already referred to by my hon. friend. At the conclusion of that statement General Gyani said, and I quote:

> It is my firm belief now that peaceful conditions can be restored and maintained in Cyprus, and we in the United Nations peace force will work relentlessly to bring about active measures to reduce tension and eliminate fear and assist in every way possible toward achieving quiet and peace in the island.

Since the interrogation in this house yesterday there has been a subsiding of incidents in Cyprus. In addition, the secretary general, who is now in Paris conferring on the matter, has issued a statement and a report to the security council suggesting what course should be taken by the United Nations force in the light of the situation that developed over the week end. I had hoped that we would have the full text of this statement so I could table it in the house today. I expect it will be circulated in the United Nations some time this afternoon. I may say that this statement is partly in response to a conversation I had on Friday last—I know this does not please the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it is ridiculous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know it does not please the right hon. gentleman, but the fact is that it is partly in response to a conversation I had with the secretary general last Friday night, conversations which the secretary general has had with certain contributing countries' representatives, as well as talks with representatives of the United Nations, the United States and other countries. When the text of the secretary general's report is available it will be tabled forthwith. As a matter of fact, I believe with the permission of the house, I should table the statement of General Gyani, dated late yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to the tabling of this statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. gentleman this question. Has he made representations to the effect that the role of the United Nations force, and I refer particularly to the Canadians, shall not be that of simply a passive policeman but that the force shall undertake remedial and effective action which in their opinion is necessary?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have already answered that question twice, yesterday and partly today. I indicated that on Friday last when I saw the secretary general, I told him that in the light of the situation as it was reported to us by our high commissioner in Cyprus, and as reported from other sources, it would seem that the United Nations force was being placed in a difficult position. The secretary general acknowledged this. Because I am concerned about the operations of that force, I am precluded from going any further.

Now, I can say that the secretary general has made a statement in Paris today. His statement is preliminary to a report which he is circulating to the members of the United Nations security council, and that report will be available some time today. I ask my hon. friend to consider his question in the light of that report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have considered the question in the light of the uncertain reports the hon. gentleman has given this house on all occasions. I will be glad, however, to wait until we receive an authentic statement from General Gyani.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not want to quarrel with my hon. friend, but I do know something about the delicacy of this situation. It is not fair to our soldiers; it is not fair to the United Nations; it is not fair to the Canadian people, to say—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that I have given uncertain reports. I have given reports that were exact and precise. They have to do with a very difficult situation, and I may say to my right hon. friend, the reaction I get—and I have my appreciation of what reactions can be—is that the right hon. gentleman would do himself more credit by helping the government in a situation such as this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that last observation deserves an answer, and I simply say to the hon. gentleman that what he has said is bluff, and pompous bluff at that.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The latest report to come over the wires indicates that the British ambassador has been instructed to interview the secretary general of the United Nations regarding the inactivity of the United Nations force in Cyprus, and I want to ask the minister two questions to save the trouble of getting up on a supplementary.

First, are similar representations being made by the Canadian government to the secretary general of the United Nations? Second, does the Canadian government share the view that the presence of the United Nations force in Cyprus has effectively deprived the Turkish Cypriots of any outside aid, and therefore it is the responsibility of the United Nations force to provide sufficient protection for Turkish Cypriots?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the question, the Canadian ambassador saw the secretary general of the United Nations twice on Saturday, and he was in touch three times yesterday with Mr. Ralph Bunche, who was acting in the absence of the secretary general. In addition, he conferred with Mr. Adlai Stevenson on Saturday and again yesterday.

I may say that the United States undersecretary of state for foreign affairs is in Ottawa, and I conferred with him on this matter this morning. I have also been in touch with the foreign office in the United Kingdom. I am sure that the actions of the United Nations force in Cyprus, notwithstanding the difficulties, have had a preventive effect. I hope this effect will continue, particularly in the light of the report which we are awaiting from the secretary general.

Mr. Douglas: The minister may have overlooked the second part of my question in which I asked whether the government shared the view that, since the presence of the United Nations force in Cyprus has effectively deprived the Turkish Cypriots of any outside aid, it is the responsibility of the United Nations to provide protection for Turkish Cypriots. Is this view being pressed upon the secretary general of the United Nations?

May I also remind him that yesterday he said Canadian troops were not directly involved in negotiations in the Kyrenia pass, yet a report came in this morning that it was Canadian troops who transmitted the request for the Turkish forces to withdraw, and the rejection was transmitted through the Canadian troops to the Cypriot forces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, all I can properly do is to indicate that the Canadian government, maintaining a neutral position as a member of the United Nations force, has made representations, through its representative to the United Nations and its high commissioner in Cyprus, along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. Those representations were perfectly compatible with the desirable neutral position we must maintain.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Associate Minister of National Defence, and I may say it is also supplementary to a starred question he answered for me on Monday. Does he consider it fair to provide special allowances to our troops in Cyprus which are not equal to the allowances paid to our troops in the Congo and other overseas areas where they are serving?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is not my impression that our troops in Cyprus are getting less than our troops in the Congo or anywhere else.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I addressed a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence asking him about the special allowances which were made available in Cyprus as compared with those paid to troops in the Congo, New Guinea and other areas of the world. The associate minister told me there was no difference in the special allowances made available.

However, in the answer he provided to me as reported on page 2590 of Hansard he referred me to the public accounts of Canada, March 31, 1963, section 20, pages 23-25. From this I find that the special allowance for those in the Congo is $100 per month and that for troops in New Guinea it is $90 a month. When I look at the answer the hon. gentleman gave me with regard to the troops in Cyprus I see that the special allowance amounts to $69 a month.

I am pretty mixed up now. Either the minister has given me incorrect information today or he gave me incorrect information on Monday. He certainly gave me incorrect information at some time; and I should like to have the matter cleared up.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows the correct information was that given in the return. I apologize to the hon. member for having led him astray in this sense, that I led him to understand there was no difference in the amount of allowances that was paid. I have subsequently been informed that the special allowance for people serving in the Congo is $100 and the reason for this additional amount of money paid to the people in the Congo is, of course, the difficulty of serving in that very hot country.

Mr. Coates: Could I ask a question supplementary, Mr. Speaker, to my other question. I ask the minister, will he give consideration to increasing the amount of the special allowance for troops serving in Cyprus, in view of the great risk they are undertaking at the present time?

Mr. Cardin: That matter will be considered, Mr. Speaker.

ALLEGED U.S. INFLUENCE ON CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is based on a press dispatch from Harriman, New York, on the 25th of this month which reads as follows:

> Canadian foreign policy is circumscribed by the need to maintain Washington's good favour, President John W. Holmes of the Canadian institute of international affairs said.

In view of the fact that this gentleman is a prominent official of the external affairs department, would the minister inform the house whether in fact Canadian foreign policy is circumscribed by the need to maintain Washington's good favour?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. gentleman knows that the answer to his question is no. I suggest he read the full text of the speech. He would then see that this particular sentence, isolated from the context, conveys an altogether different meaning.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PENSION BENEFITS TO OFFICERS TO BE RETIRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. When will the government announce the compensation arrangements which are to be made with respect to the 500 air force officers who were recently forced into early retirement?

Mr. Speaker: May I suggest there is not that urgency about this question to warrant an answer at this time. Would the hon. member put it on the order paper?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, these men have been waiting for nearly a month for some decision on the question. It is a most urgent one.

Mr. Speaker: I still think it is my duty to apply the rules, and I do not see the great urgency which would justify it being answered at this time.

Mr. Thompson: Then I shall give notice that I wish to raise it on an adjournment debate.

TRANSPORT

MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TRACKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister going to resign, as he said he would do recently in Montreal, or has he had some success in the steps he took to remedy the danger created by the level crossing between Moreau st. and Viau st.?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to change anything in the statement I made concerning the case referred to by the hon. member. I must tell him that the question is under consideration.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister what delay he has given himself to resign?

Mr. Grégoire: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: Not 30 days.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was about to rule the question out at the beginning as purely hypothetical, but the minister got in ahead of me.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—CLOSING OF MILLER BAY HOSPITAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, with the high degree of absenteeism among the cabinet I do not know to whom I should direct this question, but perhaps the acting minister of national health and welfare would be able to take notice of it, or indicate to the house whether any directions or directives have been issued to or for the Miller Bay hospital near Prince Rupert, to the effect that its bed capacity be reduced and eventually the hospital closed.

Mr. Speaker: It does seem to me the Chair must point out that if there are a few ministers absent today it is for a very good and sufficient reason.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Also I would like to point out that the question has no sense or degree of urgency that it should be asked at this time. May I suggest the order paper.

Mr. Howard: I rise first on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, and with great deference to you ask what is this reason that the cabinet ministers are absent.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Perhaps I might deal with this question. As my hon. friend knows, the biannual meeting of the Canadian-United States cabinet ministers is taking place today and three of my colleagues are involved—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture, and myself; and I regret to say—

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in hospital.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should explain that the reason for the Chair making that statement was that I had been approached two days ago to loan some rooms, which comes within my jurisdiction, so I had personal knowledge of the fact that several ministers representing the Canadian government would be in conference in room 16. I therefore spoke with personal knowledge.

EFFECT ON DAIRY FARMERS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I wish to address a question to his parliamentary secretary. Is the hon. gentleman of the opinion that the dairy policy of this government which has resulted in a saving in two years of $9.5 million to the detriment of the dairy farmer is to the advantage of the latter?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

Mr. Ricard: I should like very much to have the views of the parliamentary secretary on this matter, because it is an important question for the dairy farmers of my province.

Mr. Speaker: If I may change my ruling—and the hon. member may not like this so well—it seems to me that this question is out of order. He is asking for an opinion on a matter of policy.

Mr. Ricard: Then I should like to discuss this matter at the next opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: I had better clear this up now. If the question is out of order, the matter does not arise for discussion at ten o'clock.

Mr. Ricard: I regret very much, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that it will distress the farmers of my riding to learn that you have ruled this question out of order.

WATER RESOURCES

PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY INTO GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he, or any member of the government, received advance notice that secretary of state Rusk will be taking up the question of the diversion of water from the Hudson bay and James bay watershed into the great lakes system in order to alleviate the acute shortage of water in that area?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Martineau: On a question of privilege, the secretary of state will be here tomorrow, and it is unreasonable to expect to get the answer by tomorrow, though this is a question which is of considerable interest not only in Canada but in the United States.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the importance of the question, but if the hon. member is really disturbed about it surely he could use the telephone and give notice, and perhaps he could get his answer tomorrow.

Mr. Martineau: On a question of privilege, I should like to point out that the suggestion Your Honour has made has no practical application, because the secretary of state will be here tomorrow.

Mr. Favreau: On a point of order—

Mr. Martineau: I am speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. One at a time.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue was on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I must point out to the two hon. members concerned that the Chair has a duty, too, and if there is to be order in the chamber hon. members should at least give the benefit of the doubt to the Chair. I recognize the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Martineau: Have you ruled that I have lost my right to speak on a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: I have tried to suggest as politely as possible that the hon. gentleman should put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Martineau: I was pointing out as respectfully as I could that I cannot do this while attaining any useful purpose, because the secretary of state will be here tomorrow. This question was taken up in the United States congress yesterday and today, and because of its urgency and because of the visit tomorrow of the secretary of state I thought I should address my question verbally to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I think, Your Honour, that the new rules make no exception, and that your rulings ought not to be discussed. The only consequence accepted by the house is that if an hon. member is not satisfied with an answer he may raise the matter as a grievance. He cannot raise points of order.

Mr. Martineau: In the light of what has been said may I rephrase my question?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There seems to be a general misunderstanding, and in the circumstances I suggest that the hon. member rephrase his question.

Mr. Martineau: Then may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he will be discussing this important and serious matter of water shortages on the great lakes with the secretary of state of the United States when he meets him tomorrow.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The secretary of state, Mr. Rusk, will not be at the conference until tomorrow, but I may tell the hon. member that I hope this question will be raised later this afternoon.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING FISHERIES PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him what is to be the attitude of the Canadian government in connection with the discussions to take place with United States secretary of the interior Stewart Udall respecting the Passamaquoddy power project. The information that we have in the form of press references is that this matter will be discussed, particularly in regard to fisheries and the like. Would the minister take the house into his confidence?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): I shall be meeting with Mr. Udall later on this afternoon and it is my intention to make it clear to him that, notwithstanding the importance of the development mentioned, we wish to ensure protection for our fisheries.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): In connection with the 'Quoddy talks will the question of Chignecto tidal power also be discussed, so that United States acceptance of future Chignecto power may be a part of any over-all 'Quoddy agreement?

Mr. Robichaud: This particular matter has not come to my attention and will not be discussed at this time.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I had a supplementary question to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I realize he has had to leave the house, so perhaps I could direct it to the acting minister. Can the hon. gentleman inform the house as to the present state of negotiations between Canada and the United States, as indicated by secretary of the interior Udall, with regard to this country's purchase of more coal from the United States as a result of increased purchases of power by that country from Canada; and is the minister aware of the danger inherent in these negotiations to the coal mining areas of this country?

Mr. Jean-Luc Pépin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will bring this to the attention of the minister.

URANIUM

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF STOCKPILING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Lamb (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, but in his absence I direct it to his parliamentary secretary or whoever is representing the minister. Is the minister still considering stockpiling uranium in the Cardiff mine? This mine is in my riding, and I am most anxious that this be done.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. gentleman put his question on the order paper.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ACTION TAKEN RESPECTING ALLEGED ESPIONAGE ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Why did he not decide to lay a charge of spying against the Russian newspaper man Tarasov, instead of merely taking deportation procedures against him?

Also, would the minister tell the house whether the R.C.M.P. are continuing their investigation in order to determine whether or not that newspaper man was a member of a spying network?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs considered, during the investigation, that this case should be solved through the deportation of the person concerned, following activities inconsistent with his status as a correspondent of Izvestia, which is an agency of the Soviet government.

As far as I am concerned, I agree with this method for disposing of this case, in view of all the circumstances.

Consequently, I sincerely hope that all hon. members will understand why it would not be in the public interest for me to comment further on this case.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, would the minister answer the second part of my question?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, because of my responsibility as a minister of the crown, I feel—and in that I agree with my colleagues —that it would not be in the public interest to discuss this case any further.

Mr. Paul: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There is no question of having a public debate. I only want to get some information from the minister, to find out if the R.C.M.P. is carrying out an inquiry to ascertain whether or not there was a spy ring in which that newspaperman might have been involved.

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the proceedings today the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. MacRae) raised a question of privilege with respect to answers which he said I had failed to give to the house. I suggested that my hon. friend might wish to modify that complaint—

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is already a question of privilege before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is impossible for the Chair to listen to three or four hon. members at the same time. I think the hon. gentleman, out of courtesy and in order to assist the Chair, should at least let me listen to what the Minister of Labour is saying.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, it was to assist the Chair that I rose, because we were already on a question of privilege and I thought the Minister of Labour had not noticed that we were already on a question of privilege when he raised a new one. The Minister of Justice was just rising to answer a question of privilege which had been raised, and I thought, in order to assist the Chair in the orderly conduct of business, it was right that we should hear the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Labour.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question and as a follow up to the first answer given to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I know the hon. member is trying to assist the Chair, but I must point out that under our new rules the 30 minute question period on Wednesday has expired. On the other hand, I understand that the Minister of Labour is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the proceedings this afternoon the hon. member for York-Sunbury raised a serious question of privilege and alleged that I had released information to the press prior to releasing it to the House of Commons, even though he had a question on the order paper with respect to that information.

This complaint is, of course, quite groundless. The first part of the hon. member's question was answered and the information provided in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) on Monday, April 20, 1964. That same information was not released in the way of a press release until April 27, 1964. It had been given to the house a full week prior to being released to the press. The next two questions asked by my hon. friend, parts 2 and 3, appearing on today's order paper were answered on March 16, 1964, in reply to questions asked by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr).

Mr. Bell: Why didn't he answer the question?

Mr. MacEwan: It is the parliamentary secretary's fault.

Mr. MacEachen: Read the answers that were given, and you won't have any trouble.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I point out to all hon. members that it seems to me it is becoming increasingly the habit to rise on questions of privilege which are in fact points of order. A question of privilege concerns, as we all know, the privileges of an hon. member or of all hon. members of the house, and should be raised almost by way of exception. Questions of privilege should not be raised merely for the purpose of making a complaint.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Is this a point of order or a question of privilege?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, call that a point of order or a question of privilege but as far as I am concerned I make it a question of privilege.

During the half hour allotted to questions, I rose at least 25 times to ask a question. If, during that half hour in which hon. members can ask questions, we are to hear only questions put by Conservative members, we will not put up with that and we will fight that standing order with might and main.

We are asking you to be a little more lenient toward hon. members sitting in this corner of the house so that at least once in a while we can ask one question. In fact this afternoon only one member, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) was successful in putting one question. No other member sitting at this end of the house was recognized.

[Text]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I too, for 20 minutes wanted to ask a question, but because of other questions being asked I was not recognized. I raise this matter as a point of order and would ask you, sir, to invoke the rule in respect of all hon. members and let us get on with the other business.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, with all respect, I may say that since the beginning of the question period, I rose, I did gymnastics to catch your eye in order to ask a question.

I wonder whether I could ask that question immediately since it concerns quite an important and urgent matter for eastern farmers.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rules were given to the Chair by the house; consequently the Chair is obliged to enforce the rules as given to it. Under the circumstances I call orders of the day.

Mr. Vincent: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, I have been trying since last week to ask a question in this house and I have never been recognized. I would like to ask a question today. This is very important.

Mr. Winch: I too have been trying to get the floor for 20 minutes. Invoke the rule in respect of all hon. members, sir, and not just some.

Mr. Speaker: I realize the difficulty, in a half hour period, of covering all hon. members who wish to ask questions. On the other hand there is a certain personal obligation on hon. members to notify the Chair if they have some extremely important matter to raise.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege, last Friday I stood up in this house to speak but was refused by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, on a point of personal privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Well, I will listen to a point of privilege because I want to demonstrate to the house how matters can get out of control if we do not have the full co-operation of all members. The hon. member for Hastings-Frontenac.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I have been bobbing up and down for the last two days like a cork in a rough ocean and I cannot get recognition from the Chair on a very urgent matter. I should like to direct my question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a point of privilege the Chair must hear it; but if he has a question the time allotted to the question period has elapsed by two minutes. Orders of the day.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved that schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 219a, 326m, 326n, 399a, 410c, 410d, 410e, 683 and 848, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of these items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, as was mentioned in the budget speech only about a score of tariff changes are proposed by these resolutions. About half of these, indeed somewhat more than half, stem from two tariff board reports which the government received in 1962 and 1963. These tariff board reports related to oilfield equipment and to certain glassware and chinaware for decorating, respectively. They recommended changes in tariff items which were bound by the general agreement on tariffs and trade; hence they could not be implemented until the former GATT commitments were renegotiated. This has now been done.

The effect of the first two of the four resolutions now before the committee is to implement the results of these negotiations. The third resolution provides for a miscellaneous group of amendments. Most of them are of a relieving nature, and the purpose of the others is merely to clarify or modernize existing provisions. The fourth resolution is the usual coming into force provision. It follows the traditional practice of bringing all tariff changes provisionally into effect on the day following the budget, conditional of course on their subsequently being approved by parliament.

Before resuming my seat, possibly I should say a few words relating specifically to resolution 1. As I mentioned, it represents a negotiated package stemming from two tariff board reports. However, it involves four items which did not appear in these reports. One of these is a bound item which it was desired to reword for purposes of clarification, and which was included in the negotiations as a matter of convenience. The other three items represent what I believe GATT technicians refer to as "outside compensation". By way of explanation I should point out that while the tariff board report on oilfield equipment recommended some increases and some reductions in bound rates of duty, the increases somewhat overbalanced the reductions. Accordingly, in order to renegotiate our obligations in accordance with the GATT rules, it was necessary for us to make corresponding reductions in the rates on some other items. The concessions which were agreed upon in this connection as acceptable to both ourselves and our trading partners, and which are implemented by resolution 1, affect barytes, montan wax and bread. It is proposed that the duty on barytes be reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent, and that the duty on montan wax and bread be removed entirely. I might add that these are relatively painless concessions, about which no complaints whatsoever have been received from interested parties.

Possibly we should turn now, Mr. Chairman, to the detailed schedule. Hon. members will note that the first item on the list is bread, to which I have just referred, and about which I should add only that the proposed free entry provision is exactly the same as the corresponding item in the United States tariff. The second item is the one to which I referred earlier as being reworded without any change in rates, and the third item relates to montan wax. Thereafter we get into the list of items covered by the tariff board reports.

Mr. Nowlan: Everything except the first three have been covered by the tariff board reports, have they?

Mr. Benson: Yes, in resolutions 1 and 2.

Mr. Nowlan: I notice montan wax is referred to; the parliamentary secretary said that it is free. I see it still carries a tax of 10 per cent under the general tariff, but the British preferential and most favoured nation have been abolished.

Mr. Benson: Yes. The general tariff is purely nominal, and as the hon. gentleman will realize, being a former minister of finance, it is practically never used.

Mr. Douglas: Would the parliamentary secretary care to elaborate further on paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Estate Tax Act resolution? Do I understand from what he said that these were to implement part of a package deal?

Mr. Benson: No, here we are dealing with the Customs Tariff.

Mr. Douglas: I know we have been discussing the Customs Tariff, but has the Estate Tax Act been disposed of?

Mr. Benson: No; that will be the final resolution to be dealt with by the house.

Mr. Douglas: We intend to come back to it?

Mr. Benson: We will be going on to it. We have not come to it yet.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I require some clarification on a particular tariff item. This is a matter I have raised in the house before on several occasions. Once I asked a question of the Minister of Transport and he not only did not reply but arrogantly told me to put my question on the order paper. When this was not done he had one of his own government members put it on, and even that member did not get a proper answer to the question. It concerns an item on page 18 of the budget resolutions, item 440m, which deals with tariff changes with respect to aircraft, not including engines, when of types or sizes not made in Canada.

Mr. Benson: Would the hon. member first let us move through the first two resolutions? There are four in all, and this item is dealt with in the third resolution. At that time I would be pleased to give any explanation I can on this point. If it would be agreeable to the committee I should like to deal with the resolutions in order. Resolutions 1 and 2 simply implement recommendations of the tariff board. Resolution 3 deals with a group of miscellaneous items, including the one raised by the hon. member. I can comment on his point when we reach that item.

Mr. Nielsen: Under those recommendations of the tariff board perhaps the parliamentary secretary can inform us whether the tariff board has included in its recommendations any matters pertaining to the imposition of tariffs on Canadian aircraft imported into the United States, or United States aircraft imported into Canada.

Mr. Benson: No, only two particular references to the tariff board are included in resolutions 1 and 2. There is no reference to aircraft in these.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, in the item dealing with oil well drilling equipment on page 13 the rates listed are 5 per cent, 10 per cent and 20 per cent. Have any of these been raised and, if so, why?

Mr. Benson: To really get a full answer the hon. member would have to refer to the tariff board report, which I believe is No. 130. What the tariff board did recommend was variations in duty. In some items which were of a class or kind made in Canada they recommended that there be increases in duty, and in others which were not of a class or kind not made in Canada they recommended decreases. The result was that when we were negotiating with our trading partners the increases and decreases almost balanced. However, in order to negotiate the whole package we had to throw in three extra items, of which one is the first item in schedule 1. Offhand I could not tell the hon. member which ones have gone up or down. I would be most pleased to get a copy of the tariff board report for the hon. member if he does not already have one.

Mr. Nugent: With regard to item 399a, pipes or tubes of iron or steel, I do not notice any distinction made in the tariff between those which are of a type made in Canada and those which are not, and there is usually such a provision. Certainly I know there are adequate manufacturing facilities in Canada, and I am wondering why there is no protection or no change made in that regard.

Mr. Benson: Actually this item is merely a tidying up operation. I am told that sucker rods, pony rods and polished rods were removed from the old item 399a and put in this particular item.

Mr. Nugent: Which item were they put into? This is item 399a.

Mr. Benson: I am sorry. They were taken out of item 399a and put in item 491(1).

Mr. Nugent: Do I understand then that none of these items in 399a is of a class or kind made in Canada, or are they all? It certainly seems to me that some of them are and that the same sort of rules should apply, in that there should be two classifications. I am simply wondering what the reason is for only having one.

Mr. Benson: This happens when you go to the ones moved out of 399a into 491. There are two classifications in the latter item. Some of them are made in Canada and some of them are not. The recommendations followed were those of the tariff board.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary to give some explanation with respect to item 683, barytes. Are the rates listed on page 15 the same as were in effect prior to the recommendations we are now considering? If there have been any changes made, would the parliamentary secretary explain why these changes were made?

Mr. Benson: Did the hon. member raise the question whether there had been any changes since the resolution was first introduced?

Mr. Nielsen: No.

Mr. Benson: This item was actually given as compensation. This is one of the items on which a concession was offered in the negotiations. To balance out other negotiated items we had to give compensation on three items. The most favoured nation duty on barytes was reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. The barytes covered by item 683 is used as a filler in paints, varnishes and paper or as a flux or decolourizer in the manufacture of glass. It makes the glass more malleable and increases its lustre. The imports in 1963 were $3,000 from Germany and $193,000 from the United States. The item is relatively minor in total.

Mr. Nielsen: This is the reason I asked the question. Canada does produce barytes and that particular segment of our mining industry seems to be lagging. Yet we have some changes here which may further retard the growth of the baryte mining industry in Canada. I was wondering what the reason was behind the reduction.

Mr. Benson: The reasoning behind it was that an item had to be found in which compensation could be given in order to negotiate the whole package. With regard to barytes, I am informed that transportation is quite an important factor. As it is a costly matter to move it, the baryte mines of Canada feel they are adequately protected with a 20 per cent tariff on the importation of this material which is the rate that was negotiated. I might also point out to the hon. member that since this item was brought forward there have been absolutely no complaints from the barytes mining industry.

Mr. Nielsen: The baryte mining industry in Canada is so small that probably the complaints would be in direct proportion to the size of the industry. I question two of the statements made by the parliamentary secretary. First, he pointed out certain difficulties encountered in transportation, and yet we have several thousands of dollars in imports from Germany. It seems to me that the Canadian baryte industry could have perhaps supplied the same product that was obtained in Germany unless, of course, the German product was of a much higher grade or standard than that obtainable at home.

The parliamentary secretary also mentioned the satisfaction of the baryte industry in Canada with the protection afforded at a level of 20 per cent. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether the department had any requests from the baryte industry in Canada for a reduction in the protection or for an increase, or whether it was the department that got in touch with some organization or some mining company for the purpose of considering the recommendation of the tariff board that the tariff be reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. Benson: Information with regard to the particular item was gained by the department from the tariff board report which dealt with barytes as used in the drilling industry, which already came in free and will continue to come in free. When the item was being negotiated with our trading partners in GATT it was felt that our tariff on this item was out of line with the tariffs of other countries on the same item, and that we could well make a concession on this particular item, which is not a major one. In addition, as I mentioned, to the best of our knowledge the industry has not objected at all to this change in the tariff.

Mr. Nielsen: That does not quite answer the questions I have asked the parliamentary secretary. I quite realize that the barytes used in the drilling industry are tariff free now, but barytes that fall within the classification affected by this tariff item are, as the parliamentary secretary has said, imported from Germany and the United States. As I understand it, and I may be mistaken on this score—if I am I should like the parliamentary secretary to set me straight—the baryte industry in Canada is capable of producing the standard or quality of barytes that is used in those industries which make use of the barytes that fall within the classification under discussion. If we import barytes from Germany instead of utilizing Canadian barytes, I should like to know why. If we can use Canadian barytes for the same purpose as those in this classification are used, then surely the argument advanced by the parliamentary secretary with regard to transportation costs would have no effect.

I ask this specific question of the parliamentary secretary concerning representations: Has he received representations from the baryte mining industry or from mining industry generally in Canada? Have any such representations been received with respect to this particular item? If so, I should like to know, and I am sure the committee would be interested in hearing of those particular representations and how they were made.

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I could deal with the second question first. No representations were made dealing with the first item. The barytes of the quality imported could probably be produced in Canada, as can many items of a quality imported in connection with other kinds of manufactured items and mining endeavours in the country. Without having knowledge of the individual importer and his reasons for choosing to import and pay the 20 per cent tariff, I can only guess at this. I would guess that for the use in a particular area it is probably cheaper to ship by boat from Germany than it is to have it hauled by rail in Canada, even though there is a 20 per cent tariff involved in getting it into Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: If I may just follow this question of the barytes up to its logical conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I may say to the parliamentary secretary that I am sure the officials sitting in front of him should have information on the point. It is my understanding that probability does not enter into it at all. The Canadian baryte industry does produce a product that can be used in the industries where the imported product is used. If this is so, it seems to me we should be doing all we can to encourage the development of that industry, rather than importing a product to the detriment of industry in Canada.

The parliamentary secretary did say the government had received no objections to the change. I suppose, naturally, the government would not receive any objection to a reduction in tariffs. My question was whether any representations had been made to the parliamentary secretary, and I understood him to say no. I asked another question about five minutes ago: Did the government request any representations from the baryte industry or from the Canadian metal mining association, for instance, on these tariff changes affecting baryte?

Mr. Benson: There were no specific requests made to the baryte mining industry or to the mining industry in Canada. However, this matter was heard by the tariff board, leading to the report. Everyone who is interested is usually invited by the tariff board to make submissions. The reason I said no objections were raised was that one finds, even in the brief experience in this department I have had, if there is a change in the tariff affecting even a small industry which they do not like, you hear about it very quickly.

People probably import baryte for many reasons. I cannot give you the reason they import baryte from Germany. I should point out that the amount imported from Germany totalled only $3,000 and the largest imports were from the United States. It is probable that even with the 20 per cent tariff they have to pay—it was 25 per cent at that point—there is an advantage in moving it across the border. Certainly, I agree with the general proposition that people manufacturing in Canada should be encouraged to buy their raw materials in Canada, but with the type of economy we have we cannot tell them that they have to buy them in Canada.

Mr. Nugent: I should like to deal with item 492, which is one of those items in which there is a difference if the article is of a class or kind made in Canada. This item deals with a very substantial quantity of goods in which I am rather interested because the industries producing those goods are located in my area. If the articles are of a class or kind not made in Canada the rather substantial tariff was removed, and I am quite sure that this is probably the result of representations made on behalf of the oil well exploring and production companies. I am sure this change will be welcomed by most of them.

However, I noticed that the reduction is also made, although not so great, where the article is of a class or kind made in Canada. This leaves a very small margin of protection for the local manufacturer. I think when you consider the small margin of protection, plus the expense that is involved in trying to determine whether an article is of a class or kind made in Canada, we will realize the local manufacturer has little or no protection here.

I may cite as an example the first item mentioned, bolted steel tanks and parts thereof. Steel tanks for the oil well industry are made up in all sorts of sizes, shapes and capacities, from relatively small ones servicing one well to some of the giant tanks which are used at the start of the trans-Canada pipe line. We can easily see that a local manufacturer who makes one specific type of tank or tank plates and has a competitor who sells a tank which is slightly larger or slightly smaller in size or a different shape, finds that it is a moot point whether or not this is of a class or kind made in Canada. I suggest that the rough and ready rule in determining the question is whether or not the article can be used for substantially the same purpose by the same people. I can see that many people are going to be upset by the decisions made in connection with this item because we can carry that same sort of argument to pumps such as chemical injection pumps. A pump can be used for chemical injection purposes and it can also be used for another purpose. It is difficult to make these distinctions.

I know there is always going to be difficulty in making these decisions. I am not quarrelling with the honesty of the officials who have to make the decisions. These decisions are difficult, no matter how skilled they are or how much they know about industry. It is for that reason I am questioning the very minor amount of protection that is left in connection with this item, where an article is of a type made in Canada. Where you have a very small amount of protection and you have no margin for error or confusion as to whether or not a person is entitled to the protection, it is going to make people discouraged. They will not invest their money in Canadian enterprise in those areas in which it would be most helpful to the oil industry.

I am sure that the question of the convenience to the oil industry is perhaps not sufficiently impressed on the minds of the officials concerned. In so far as oil production, exploration or the installation of these tank farms is concerned, usually the contractor has a contract in which a time limit is set. He has to deal with a highly technical crew, and the question of how quickly they can complete the installation becomes very important, not just from the point of view of keeping the contract but from the point of view of cost involved. The question of a slight difference in cost must always be weighed against the question of convenience, that is of having the article there. If there is any shadow of doubt about an article the contractor will import what he calls the exact one, even if the Canadian article might do, despite this 5 per cent or 10 per cent tariff, because the amount of money is negligible when compared with the time saved and the certainty the correct article will be available.

I suggest that this is a rather shortsighted approach by the government, because it is worth more than that 5 per cent to the oil industry to give encouragement to Canadian manufacturers to invest their money in building a product in localities such as my area, where it is most wanted. It is always advantageous to the user of these supplies to have the local manufacturer right at hand, where there is not a problem of quick re-establishment of supplies and quick expansion in case of demand, where he can get them quickly and where he is in direct communication with the manufacturer to speed up his production.

The manufacturer is right in the field. He knows what the demand is and what demand may be coming. He can adjust his production very quickly to meet the demand and, not only that, he can vary his product to meet more exactly the requirements and specifications of the purchaser. All of this makes me very dubious about the reduction in this instance, where there is something made mechanically.

Certainly I would be the last one to want to add anything to the cost of oil well production in my area, because it is very important there. I know many people are going to be very happy and will appreciate the reduction in free status where it is of a class or kind made in Canada; but I wonder what representations were received from the local manufacturers themselves, and what were the representations from the production people as to the reduction dealing with this specific point on the class or kind made in Canada.

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I could deal very briefly with the questions raised by the hon. member. If we look at item 492(1), although the tariff rate does involve a reduction with regard to bolted steel tanks, the large majority of the items that are contained in this new category in which there is a change in rates, were previously under the free items. I am informed of this by officials of the department.

In connection with the oil well equipment, I should point out that the tariff board had this reference made to them and took some two years in which to hear it, report back on it, and consider representations by all interested parties. The tariff board heard both sides of the question, and tried to work out a group of changes in oil field equipment which were reasonably acceptable to everyone.

You could never get a position where everybody would be happy with everything done in tariff changes, and one must also remember that when this recommendation was made and had to be implemented, there had to be negotiations with our trading partners involved in this. Under GATT to get a concession you have to give a concession. I think this is a fair way of dealing with our trade partners.

I believe the tariff board made their decision in all honesty and I am pleased the department accepted the tariff board recommendations. The net result on all oil field equipment, as I previously mentioned, was a slight increase, and that is why we had to reduce these other three items—bread, montan wax and barytes—in order to reach agreement with the people with whom our officials were negotiating.

Since these tariff items have come out there have not been any complaints received from any of the parties involved, which might indicate that, although they are not completely happy, they are not so upset that they are complaining, which usually happens if people are very dissatisfied with the sort of deal that is worked out in the negotiations.

Mr. Nugent: One of the reasons I am a little dubious on this item is the fact the tariff board sat for two years on it, but in the oil industry where there are new finds made, and where the situation can change quite quickly, a situation of two years ago might not apply today. We have all heard of a new oil field in Alberta. It is almost an extension of the Swan Hills field. It is very close to it, and it looks as though the Slave lake field is going to be as important as the Swan Hills field.

Our suppliers are going to be very happy with the new field, but when they are going to invest their money—and I am thinking in terms of the establishment of industry in my riding and the well being of those established, especially the Canadian manufacturers—they have to look at the long term picture and view it from the standpoint of steady supply and production.

The conditions have changed. The steel plant in Edmonton has made an expansion and there will be more steel available than there was previously. There have been some new manufactures established on a rather small scale in my area, and I am sure the prospect of another large, new oil field, together with the known number of them, is the sort of solid indicator that Canadian manufacturers are looking for. That is why I was asking the parliamentary secretary particularly if there were any late representations—

Mr. Benson: None.

Mr. Nugent: —from production people, and what are the late representations from Canadian manufacturers on these tariffs involved in item 492.

Mr. Benson: I should point out that the report of the tariff board on reference No. 130 was tabled on October 7, 1963, and there were over three pages of companies which made representations to the board. The tariff board report, along with its recommendations which are contained in this resolution, has been available since October 1963, and as I understand it from officials of the department there have been no complaints. Nor have there been any complaints since the resolution itself was put on the order paper and became public knowledge, which usually occurs when people have a complaint. When a resolution appears on the order paper at the time of the budget speech, usually if people are terribly upset about it they will make complaints to the Minister of Finance, but that did not happen in this case.

[Mr. Benson.]

Now to deal with the other question, there may have been changes in conditions. Of course one can assume there have been changes in conditions over the period during which the tariff board had been studying this. But the people who were aware of these changes, and who have made decisions since October 1963, have made those decisions with the full knowledge of what the tariff board was recommending in this regard. It is also very unlikely that the point of profit or loss, if one is building a new steel plant, for example, is going to be materially affected by the difference between a 5 per cent and a 10 per cent tariff on this item. Mind you, it will affect it, but I do not think a 10 per cent tariff protection would be a great tariff behind which to build an industry.

Mr. Nugent: I would not want to quibble about words when the parliamentary secretary says there were not complaints. I take this to mean there were no representations whatever.

Mr. Benson: No writing, no correspondence.

Mr. Nugent: The oil industry is usually pretty quick to make its views known, and I am therefore encouraged by the fact that there have been no representations. But with my own knowledge of the oil industry, and particularly of the production end of it, of the supply of the tanks, treaters, separators and the pipe lines, I have a strong reservation in my mind, particularly where a company is just getting established, that a 5 per cent protection is not very much of an incentive, particularly where a person is trying to establish a new industry in competition with established importers who already have their customers, some of whom are in very set lines.

Over the past two years the efforts of the government have been to try and get more and more manufacturing industries in Canada, and that is the reason I am talking about the 5 per cent rate. The 10 per cent rate seemed to be enough of a margin to enable a new manufacturer to have a price advantage, but even that price advantage might not be sufficient in his favour. He may be able to compete on even terms with his United States competitor, but the handiness of local supply and delivery can give him enough to work on. I shall do some checking on this, something I should have done earlier, with regard to some of the newly started firms in my own area.

It seems to me that if there has not been been a complaint received it is because business is good—because there is just now tremendous activity. But this activity only lasts a while and then they get back to normal, and this is when complaints may arise. I am afraid we are likely to have a lot of complaints as the new field develops to the point where the first rush of business is over.

Mr. Benson: I think the point made by the hon. member is well taken—that in boom times business is so good that one does not complain about such things as changes in tariffs. But the over-all effect of the changes in these items is in favour of the producer. In order to negotiate them with our tariff partners we had to include three items which were outside the oil field. We had to do this in order to reach agreement.

Mr. Kennedy: I should like to refer, for a few moments, to item 683—barytes. This is an important product in my area and its production employs a considerable number of men. I notice that the most favoured nation tariff is being reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent and I wonder how this will affect production of this material, particularly in the light of the fact that the market is a very competitive one. Is the recommendation of the tariff board being followed in this respect?

Mr. Benson: Perhaps the hon. member was not present earlier. I dealt with this item at some length then, indicating that when all the oil field items had been taken together there were slightly more increases in tariffs than decreases, and in order to adjust this we had to make some slight concession to our trading partners. This included three items, among them barytes. I pointed out at that time that imports of barytes were not large in 1963—$3,000 worth from Germany and $193,000 worth from the United States.

I said the question was raised as to whether or not we had written to the producers of barytes with respect to any objection they might have had to this item, but at that time my reply was that I did not know. I have since been informed by officials of the department that we did write to them, and there was no objection to this particular item.

Mr. Winch: Are we completely tied to each one of the individual items here or will there be any opportunity for us to discuss customs tariffs items outside those listed?

The Chairman: We are tied to the items before us in this resolution, and this resolution deals with specific items. The only discussion we can have here must relate to the items that are before the committee.

Mr. Winch: And the Chair will hold to that?

The Chairman: Yes, that is what I should like to do, and that is what we have been doing until now.

Mr. Nugent: Could the parliamentary secretary explain this item where it says both "10 per cent" and "free" and this continues right across the page?

Mr. Benson: Yes; the items included there come from several previous tariff rates. Suppose we take item 492. The items here come from former sections 446a, 427 and 848. Item 848 was a free item. The rates were 10 per cent, 22½ per cent and 35 per cent on items 446a and 427.

Mr. Wahn: This resolution relates to changes in schedule A, and I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether there is any particular reason for not repealing item 848a as recommended by the tariff board. I should like to refer specifically to a situation which arises under item 848a. Perhaps I should disclose the fact that the firm of which I am a partner acts for several companies interested in the production of potash in Saskatchewan.

I am advised by people who, I believe, know what they are talking about, that in this item there is a reference to muriate of potash, whereas fertilizers generally are dealt with in item 663b. The reference to muriate of potash in 848a will have the effect of placing producers of potash in a disadvantageous position as compared with producers of other fertilizers. Was any consideration given to clearing up this point, because this situation is apparently the result of an oversight in drafting the original item.

Mr. Benson: I am informed that this was not an oversight. Actually, the item to which the hon. member is referring, item 848a, is dealt with in the second report of the tariff board. The report which is being implemented is the first report, that dealing with oil field equipment. The other report, which was tabled on February 25, 1964, is not being implemented in this particular resolution.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution No. 2 agreed to.

3. That schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 9j, 156, 196, 237a, 356b, 440m1., 440n1., 440r., 521(2), 521(7), 621(8), 611a(4), 681c and 696a, and the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of these items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

Mr. Nielsen: On the matter I raised concerning the tariff on imported aircraft of a class or kind not made in Canada, may I begin by saying that those interested in aviation in Canada generally, and I am not simply speaking of the air line companies, are very concerned about the intentions of the department with respect to the imposition of what has amounted to a controversial 15 per cent tariff on aircraft exceeding a gross weight of 2500 pounds but not exceeding 4500 pounds.

The application for the imposition of this tariff was first made by an Ontario aviation company, and I understand it has been under consideration in the department, as well as by the government generally, for some time. I do not believe the government has made any decision as yet. In the absence of such a decision there is a good deal of unrest among aircraft outlets in Canada and, indeed, there has been some speculation in aircraft sales and purchases. I believe it would be in the best interests of the industry as a whole if the parliamentary secretary could now state just what is the policy of the government in this regard and say whether or not the tariff is to be imposed. From the wording of this item no. 440m, it appears as if the tariff will be imposed on and after July 1, 1965. I may be incorrect in this assumption and, if I am, I hope the parliamentary secretary will so inform me.

I know the suggestion has been made to officials of the department that rather than impose a 15 per cent tariff on aircraft of the weight in question, when imported into Canada, there should be an abandonment of the United States tariff now imposed on aircraft of a gross weight above 4500 pounds. This, of course, would result very favourably in this way, that the aircraft industry of Canada would enjoy a freer flow of trade between Canada and the United States, particularly such companies as de Havilland, who sell a good many Beaver aircraft all around the world. The Otter aircraft is another I can think of, and the Caribou is finding growing popularity around the world. If the United States were to drop the tariffs now imposed on that classification of aircraft, rather than Canada imposing its 15 per cent duty on aircraft of between 2,500 and 4,500 pounds gross weight, I think probably the side effects would be a good deal more beneficial to Canada than the result of this tax.

We are in this position, that there is no aircraft manufacturer in Canada today that manufactures aircraft of less than 4,500 pounds gross weight. Most of these are imported from the United States. Cessna Aircraft Corporation provides a good proportion of the market, as does Piper and the Beechcraft Corporation. Now we have one Canadian manufacturer—an enterprising manufacturer, I might say—who is coming along with a five-place aircraft of between 2,500 and 4,500 pounds gross weight. The immediate thought is that in order to give protection to this growing industry we will put a tariff on such aircraft coming into this country, but I do not think that is a healthy way of encouraging the growth of the aircraft industry in Canada. I will have more to say about that matter if the parliamentary secretary cannot say now that government policy is not to impose this tariff.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with item 440m(1) and 440n(1), which is an extension of the present free entry provision for a year. One of the questions raised by the hon. member was the reduction or removal of both the United States and Canadian tariffs on aircraft. This possibility will be raised at the GATT negotiations; I can give him this undertaking. As a matter of fact, detailed submissions in this regard are presently being considered by the tariffs and trade committee which was set up by the government in anticipation of the GATT negotiation. This committee is under the chairmanship of Mr. Norman Robertson, with Mr. Hector McKinnon as the vice-chairman. As to the question raised by the hon. member with respect to special types of aircraft, this speculation has arisen from a request to the Department of National Revenue by a firm in Malton, Found Brothers Aviation Ltd., for a change in the made in Canada classification of certain aircraft under item 440m. At present only single engine, fixed wing aircraft for civilian use weighing from 4,500 ot 8,000 pounds are ruled to be of a type or size made in Canada. This provides protection for such aircraft as the Otter and Beaver aircraft manufactured by de Havilland.

Found Brothers have asked that the made in Canada ruling be extended to cover aircraft weighing from 2,500 to 4,500 pounds in order to provide a 15 per cent duty for a new model which they are producing, weighing 2,950 pounds. This request is under review by the Department of National Revenue. If and when any changes are made in the present ruling, they will be issued in the usual way by the Department of National Revenue.

I cannot say that the government policy is so-and-so in this matter, because this is a matter which is under consideration at the present time and a decision has not been made at this point.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, can the committee be assured at least to this extent, that there is going to be no imposition of the controversial 15 per cent tariff on aircraft weighing between 2,500 and 4,500 pounds imported into Canada, at least until July 1, 1965? Can the parliamentary secretary give us that assurance?

Mr. Benson: I do not think I can give that undertaking, Mr. Chairman, because it turns on the decision made on the facts of the case raised by Found Brothers whether or not such aircraft are going to be classified as of a type or size made in Canada. The answer to the second question asked by the hon. member hinges on the answer that I gave to the first question; so really I cannot answer the second question in the affirmative without answering the first one positively, which I did not do.

Mr. Nielsen: What I am trying to do there, Mr. Chairman, is end some speculation that has been generated as a result of the indecisiveness of the government in this connection. Here Found Brothers have made an application to the department. This application was made several months ago, and knowledge of it has become quite general throughout the aircraft industry in Canada. Therefore you find dealers in aircraft scurrying to import them from the United States in order to stock them and sell them before what they fear will be the imposition of this 15 per cent duty.

The matter has been before the government long enough now, surely, for them to end this type of speculation and this anxiety within the industry in Canada, simply by saying what is the position. If they cannot say now, "We have decided to impose the 15 per cent tariff", surely the parliamentary secretary could at least rise and say, "We have not yet done so, but it is our intention to bring the matter to a head and announce a decision within the next two or three months", or whatever it might be—perhaps in 60 days.

Mr. Benson: I should indicate to the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, the difficulty in regard to this particular question. The particular firm, Found Brothers Aviation Ltd., which has raised this question, had until recently only produced two aircraft of this particular size. You then have the Department of National Revenue faced with having to make a decision as to whether or not specific types of aircraft are of a type or size made in Canada when there is a very small production of these aircraft in Canada. This has to be a matter of fact, and I would say one would have to see how these people are going to produce; if their production line is going to go along and they are going to produce quantities of this aircraft. After seeing what is done in this regard, one can make a decision.

As I understand it, only two aircraft have been produced, and one can hardly make a ruling that something has happened based on a very small production such as this. This is the situation we face at the present time. Nevertheless, they have asked the department to consider whether or not this aircraft can be ruled as being of a type or size being made in Canada, and the department will keep looking into this matter and come up with a decision as soon as it is physically possible.

Mr. Nielsen: This is the type of answer we have been getting to questions time after time when they have been asked in the house. Here we have speculation that is growing day by day because of the indecisiveness of the government on what seems to be a relatively simple decision to make. I think the parliamentary secretary is looking at the problem from the wrong end of the stick. Instead of saying, "We are not deciding because all we have involved here are two aircraft", he should perhaps be looking at it from our point of view and saying, "We are going to decide not to impose the 15 per cent tariff on this classification of aircraft imported into Canada", because there have been only two produced since Found Brothers went into production, if for no other reason.

But quite apart from that, the parliamentary secretary should consider, too—if my information is correct—the representations that have been made, or the feelings of the management of Beechcraft Corporation, Piper Corporation, Cessna Corporation, de Havilland Corporation. All these Canadian and United States aircraft manufacturers seem to be in accord with the principle of eliminating the tariffs entirely. This undoubtedly would redound to the lasting benefit of the Canadian aviation industry and would encourage the growth of that industry. It is astonishing if, in the face of the representations made by the United States aircraft industry in this particular field of aircraft production, the Canadian government should have any difficulty whatsoever in negotiating the mutual abolition of tariffs on aircraft crossing both ways across the border.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has indicated some indecision. I really do not believe there is any indecision, in that the department holds these aircraft at the present time as not made in Canada. Therefore the only indecision that has arisen is because of a rumour that someone starts, or speculation that someone starts, that we are going to impose a class or kind legislation ruling with regard to this particular type of aircraft. The speculation does not come from within the government; the government's position is firm in this regard. We are standing on the position that they are not at the present time made in Canada. This is our position at this point. As we have said, the government intends to keep looking at this matter as the production of these aircraft increases with this particular firm.

If a point is reached where they can say it is of a class or kind made in Canada perhaps a change in the present ruling will be made. Nevertheless the present ruling is a firm one. There is nothing wishy-washy about it and the government is not hedging in the matter. They simply say that they are not made in Canada, and all the speculation and letters written last month was a result of someone starting a hot rumour about something they did not know too much about.

Mr. Nielsen: I really cannot let the parliamentary secretary get away with that. He knows as well as I do that his departmental officials have been corresponding not in any way confidentially with people outside the department in connection with the imposition of the 15 per cent duty. So that when he says that there has been an unfounded or a hot rumour floating around the country about the imposition of a 15 per cent tariff, he is talking through the top of his head, because it is his department itself which received the application from Found Brothers. It was also his department which exchanged correspondence with Found Brothers and others, which has given substance to this consideration, not rumour. The parliamentary secretary said this afternoon that his department is considering the imposition of this duty, so it is not simply a rumour. The speculation which requires to be terminated now is that there is going to be a 15 per cent duty imposed on this classification of aircraft imported into Canada; and so that everybody in the Canadian aviation industry can rest at ease the government should end this speculation which has been generated as a result of its own indecision. The consideration of this matter, as the parliamentary secretary knows—and if he does not know he should—started in his own department back in 1963. It seems that the passage of some eight months is a little too long; that is why I say there has been an indecisiveness displayed on the part of the government in dealing with this matter.

Mr. Benson: I can answer the hon. member fairly easily. First of all it is not our department at all about which he is talking, but the Department of National Revenue. They consider this matter.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, it is your resolution.

Mr. Benson: Yes, the resolution comes under the Department of Finance. But an application was made to the department to make a class or kind ruling in this particular instance. The department then corresponded openly with people who were going to be involved in any such ruling, and it is quite necessary that they do this. For example, anybody can manufacture anything for which there is a preferential tariff, if it is of a class or kind made in Canada. An application can be made to have something ruled as a class or kind made in Canada, in which case the department will immediately start correspondence with the people concerned. But this does not mean—

Mr. Nielsen: It is not a rumour then, is it?

Mr. Benson: The rumour which I intimated was being spread was that we are going to make a certain kind of ruling in this instance. It has to be considered. Everybody concerned has to be considered, but no class or kind ruling would be made until 10 per cent of the normal market is manufactured in Canada. That is the basis on which a ruling is made. The department will continue, of course, to look into the matter and watch what is being done, which is what they should do. I think that the speculation which was rampant last month arose out of somebody indicating that a change was going to be made.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not say it was rampant. I think I should draw the matter to a logical conclusion by saying this. If I can interpret the waffling which the parliamentary secretary has done around this matter, what he is saying in effect is that the government has not yet made up its mind in connection with the imposition of a 15 per cent tariff, despite the fact that it has been under consideration for eight months or more; and that no firm word at all can be given to the Canadian aviation industry at this time. Is that the position which the government is taking?

Mr. Hahn: I rise on a point of order. I submit the argument raised by the hon. member is completely out of order, Mr. Chairman. We are discussing a change to a tariff item in a resolution. Certain tariffs are set up for aircraft of a class or kind made in Canada. The whole subject matter raised by the hon. member opposite concerns a ruling as to whether or not an aircraft is of a class or kind made in Canada. If it is, it falls under a certain tariff item; if it is not it does not. It has nothing to do with the tariff as such, so I feel that the discussion which we have had is completely out of order. We should be discussing only the item in the resolution which concerns the amount of tariff. Whether an item falls in or out of a class or kind made in Canada ruling is a matter for the Department of National Revenue and should not be discussed here.

I might say that I have strong sympathy for the case which the hon. member is trying to put forward. I do not want to see this tariff imposed, but I think that this is the wrong place to discuss it.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member may not have been in the chamber when I opened my remarks in connection with this item. The general principle which I put to the parliamentary secretary was that of the abolition of the tariff entirely, both from Canada and from the United States, on classes of aircraft now affected by this particular resolution. Then I went tendentiously into the matter of broadening the class or kind of aircraft which is going to be ruled as of a class or kind made in Canada, and it seemed to me that on that ground I was in order.

Mr. Nugent: Might I just say a few words in respect of the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary. While the hon. member for Yukon says that reports of what the government intend to do may not be widespread, may I say that I have received a great deal of communication, mostly from private aircraft users, potential purchasers, etc. Bearing in mind that this comes into effect on and after July 1, and in view of the fact that the parliamentary secretary can give us no assurance as to when the government can be a little firmer in its attitude in this connection, would the government not consider withdrawing this at this time, and bringing it forward once the industry which caused this application to be made has been more firmly established, or given some indication that they will get 10 per cent of the market. In this way there would be a little more certainty both in the industry and in connection with potential purchasers?

Mr. Benson: To withdraw this resolution at this time because the item runs out on July 1 would mean that it would have exactly the opposite effect to what the hon. member wants. It would mean that all aircraft would be subject to 15 per cent tariff coming into Canada.

Mr. Nugent: You could withdraw the 15 per cent.

Mr. Benson: No, I do not think we should withdraw it. This is a class or kind problem which arises, not just with regard to aircraft but with regard to many other items. The department must of necessity look at these matters on a continuing basis. Its present decision is not waffling. It has made a firm decision that the present ruling is that these aircraft are not of a class or kind made in Canada. That is a firm ruling, as I stated before. Someone has made an application for a change in that ruling with regard to a particular type of aircraft, asking that it be ruled as a class or kind made in Canada. This decision will not be made. One cannot rule it as of a class or kind made in Canada until the producer has obtained 10 per cent of the Canadian market. As far as I am informed, the producer has only produced a very small number of aircraft. One cannot say that the matter is closed forever because the position may change in the relatively near future or in the distant future.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Then can we wind this up with a commitment from the parliamentary secretary that this tariff will not be imposed until the company concerned obtains 10 per cent of the market?

Mr. Benson: That is true in a general way.

Mr. Nielsen: Before the item carries, as a matter of interest to me personally I should like some explanation from the parliamentary secretary of the changes proposed in item 156. I notice that whisky, gin, rum, brandy and liqueurs are affected. I will stop there because I am not interested in the next category, ethyl alcohol. I might say to the parliamentary secretary that I come from a territory known for having the largest per capita consumption of gin, rum, brandy, scotch, rye and the like in Canada. Therefore we are vitally interested if we are going to have to pay more for a bottle of whisky.

I might say that I personally was introduced to what some people call the evils of that devil rum and others call the joy of whisky by a person now in the Department of National Revenue, so these items have a certain nostalgia for me. I should like to have the parliamentary secretary explain what the government hopes to achieve by the changes proposed in this item unless, of course, sobriety is the only reason, in which case we could leave the matter there.

Mr. Benson: I can tell the hon. member very quickly what the change will be. The effect of the change in duty will be that the duty will be paid on the actual content of a bottle rather than on the hypothetical content of a bottle. Previously it was assumed that a bottle contained 26⅔ ounces. The result was that the same duty had to be paid on a bottle containing 25 ounces as on a bottle containing 26⅔ ounces of that blessed fluid.

Mr. Nielsen: Smaller bottles under the Liberals.

Mr. Benson: I can tell the hon. member generally that by putting whisky in a 25 ounce bottle rather than in a 26⅔ ounce bottle the saving in duty and taxes will be about 11 cents per bottle.

Mr. Nowlan: Did you get the approval of the association of Canadian distillers for this change?

Mr. Benson: No.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution No. 4 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the Customs Tariff. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of the resolution to amend the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. Nowlan: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Benson: Would the Chairman consider rising and reporting progress? Perhaps we could then have first reading of the bill. We might even have second reading, as the bill is the same as the resolution.

Mr. Nowlan: With smaller bottles I think we will only proceed one step at a time.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. Guy Favreau (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-92, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill be read a second time? Next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Nowlan: Next sitting of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Next sitting of the house. Does the house agree to call it five o'clock at this point?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Favreau: Agreed.

Mr. Nowlan: It is not five o'clock and if anyone is objecting I am sure the parliamentary secretary would be prepared to make his preliminary statement on the Estate Tax Act resolution.

Mr. Benson: I would be very pleased to do so if we may revert to committee for this purpose.

Mr. Nugent: Let us go on with private members' hour. I am sure hon. members at the other end of the house are just having a little fun and would not really want to see the parliamentary secretary start on his statement for a period of only a minute or two, when it would be much more sensible to proceed to private members' hour now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the house agree?

[Mr. Benson.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It being five o'clock p.m. the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

PENSIONS

SUGGESTED CHANGE OF TERMINOLOGY IN LEGISLATION

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of changing the terminology in the designation "old age" as contained in both the Old Age Assistance Act, being chapter 199 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and amendments thereto, and the Old Age Security Act, being chapter 200 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and amendments thereto, to a more worthy designation, so that the aforesaid will be known as the "senior citizens assistance act" and "senior citizens security act" respectively.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this resolution may I say that I placed the same resolution on the order paper of the house last session but at that time it was not reached for discussion. I have presented it again this session and it now appears as No. 14 on the order paper. I do not intend to speak for long. I hope hon. members in all parts of the house will have something to say on it and will agree with the resolution I have put forward.

I should like to refer to how the matter came to my attention, and perhaps it has come to the attention of other hon. members in a similar way. One day I was speaking to a constituent of mine who is a retired C.N.R. worker and who is far from what might be called old age. He retired from the Canadian National at their retirement age. He is a man who was very active while working with the C.N.R. and has been active later in many community projects.

He suggested that there should be some changes in these acts. He said to me: "I do not feel like I am old. What do you think about this?" I said to him that I had heard the designation "senior citizens" used for a number of years in various parts of the country and I told him that the best and only way I knew to bring this matter to the attention of the government was to bring it forward by way of a notice of motion in the House of Commons.

It has been my experience that many men and women in the group from 65 to 69 who come under the Old Age Assistance Act and in the group 70 and over who come under the Old Age Security Act certainly are not what one would call old. So far as political life is concerned, I must say that in working with different organization chairmen, other supporters and also constituents of mine in the last few years I have found that those in these two age groups have given me good advice and I have also enjoyed their company. My mind goes back to the days when I was attending college and working in and around the coal mines of my constituency. I recall quite well various people in these age groups with whom I worked. May I say that, although I was a young man at the time, they put me to shame by the amount of work they could do. I noticed that just within the last year or so some of these people celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary, at which time I was able to congratulate them. In my opinion, they are certainly far from old age.

May I point out briefly the history of the two acts involved in this resolution? Some of the social welfare measures which have come to occupy an important position in the Canadian system of social justice may be summed up as follows: first, the original Old Age Pension Act of 1927 provided a maximum pension of $20 per month. The federal contribution at that time was limited to one half the cost. In 1931 the act was amended and the federal share was increased to three quarters of the total cost. The original act was further amended to increase the amount of pension to $25 per month in 1943; to $30 per month in 1947; to $40 per month in 1949—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I should point out to him that the resolution before us is one to change the terminology of the Old Age Security Act and the Old Age Assistance Act. I suggest to him that a discussion of the amounts of these pensions is not within the terms of this resolution.

Mr. MacEwan: I was not trying to get into any political wrangle. I was giving the history or background of these two acts, and in doing this I assure you, sir, I will arrive at the terminology shortly. This was the history of the set-up of these acts and the names of these acts.

However, I shall go on, and I point out that a major step was taken in 1951 when the federal-provincial scheme of assistance to the aged and blind was completely altered by the enactment of the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act and the Blind Persons Act. This was a major step which was taken at that time. The principal changes were the adoption of pensions for all persons 70 years of age and over by the elimination of the means test, the introduction of contributory taxes for the purpose of financing this enlarged scheme, and the granting of assistance payments on the basis of a means test to persons 65 years of age and over.

As I have pointed out, this is a brief history of these two acts as they have come forward and the terminology adopted in 1951 has been the terminology used since that time. They have been called, of course, the Old Age Assistance Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Francis: Will the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker? In the course of his review of the legislation, which I found very interesting, did he come across any submissions which supported the claim he is now making, that there should be a change of name? It seems to me there was a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which reviewed the matter fairly extensively in 1951. Did he come across anything which would support his demand for a change of name?

Mr. MacEwan: I take it the hon. member has gone into this question more thoroughly than I have. I understand that there have been quite a number of submissions in this regard to the Department of National Health and Welfare, and possibly to the committee as the member suggests. I believe that this terminology, as I have already stated, is used throughout the country. It has been used in housing groups, low rental units for older people and even in this House of Commons. About two weeks ago during the debate on a resolution introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather), I noticed on checking Hansard that almost all of those who took part in the debate referred to our older citizens as "senior citizens".

Now, the saying goes, Mr. Speaker, that a person is only as old as he feels. If I may go back a few years and think of my own family, I know that my Scottish great grandfather, because of the independence of his race, certainly never wanted to be called old aged even to his last day. I believe the same thing can be said of other groups in this country.

Mr. Greene: Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if the hon. member is alleging that his respected grandparent would have liked to be called a senior citizen?

Mr. MacEwan: Well, the hon. member is learned in the law and can draw his own deductions. I know that I am proud to be of the Scottish race. The hon. member will make his own deductions. I think perhaps he would have liked that designation; I am quite sure he would have.

May I refer briefly to the Canada Year Book for 1963-64 to give the house an idea of the numbers in these two groups in Canada? These are the last statistics which I have available, although I believe within the last few days the department has put forward statistics which may be more up to date. I am referring first to the Canada Year Book, 1963-64, page 295 and then to page 296. On page 295, table 3, I find that as of March 31, 1962 there were 927,590 recipients of old age security in Canada. Just for the record, perhaps I may refer to the province of Nova Scotia, in which there were 42,572 old age security recipients. I refer now to page 296, table 4, old age assistance. As of March 31, 1962, there were 98,944 recipients and in the province of Nova Scotia, 5,248 recipients.

I know that various things have been said about old age. I came across a little piece in a pamphlet known as "Industry", which is published monthly by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. There is a little quotation here which took my fancy at the time and which refers to the great actor Maurice Chevalier. I quote from this publication:

"Old age," in the words of the irrepressible Maurice Chevalier, "is not really so bad, especially when you consider the alternative."

This is all I have to say on this matter. I have taken a few minutes of the time of the house and I hope hon. members, if they will not accept the designation "senior citizen" will perhaps have some other ideas. In my opinion, the designation of these two acts should be changed. I hope the government will consider the change because it would mean, perhaps, spending only a few dollars to change the letterheads of the two branches concerned. I believe these designations would be more appropriate and would be accepted by all Canadians. I hope they will be accepted by the government and by all parties in the house, and I ask for the endorsement of this resolution.

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I listened with much attention to the interesting speech made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) and I wish to congratulate him for presenting that motion to change the term "old age".

Last year, Mr. Speaker, I put on the order paper a similar motion bearing no. 30 but the session came to an end before it could be discussed.

That motion, which was put on the order paper at the very beginning of the session, that is on May 17, 1963, read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the titles of the old age assistance and the old age security acts and deleting the words "old age" from official documents, and substituting therefor a more appropriate designation which will not reflect on the status of recipients of such payments.

Mr. Speaker, I did not suggest then any particular terminology, knowing that such a matter could be discussed and that the officials of the department as well as the hon. member would certainly be qualified to make suggestions.

However, I have been pleased to note this year that the hon. member for Pictou had put a similar motion on the order paper. I note that he suggests some terms which obviously in French may not have the same meaning as in English. In English, the legislation is called the "senior citizen's assistance act" which has been translated in French by "Loi sur l'assistance aux citoyens d'âge avancé." This could evidently lead to a rather interesting debate, to wit if the French translation conveys the idea of the hon. member for Pictou when he refers to "senior citizens".

Now, Mr. Speaker, a discussion to establish whether the French translation well renders the meaning of "senior citizen" in English, would be rather academic in itself. But I entirely agree with the hon. member for Pictou.

On the other hand, when I put that motion on the order paper last year, I stirred up the rage of certain newspapermen. I believe that if the hon. member for Pictou is not yet the butt of their attacks, he will soon be. This proves that everybody cannot share the same opinion.

Last year, on May 25, that is a week after I put this motion on the order paper, a well-known Ottawa paper, the Ottawa Journal, said this in an editorial:

[Text]

Is old age a disgrace, a shame?

[Translation]

The newspaperman was referring to the term "senior citizen".

[Text]

Mr. Lachance, a Montreal Liberal, makes it sound as if it were.

He has put on the House of Commons order paper a notice of motion to have the government consider the advisability of amending the titles of the Old Age Assistance and Old Age Security acts and deleting the words "old age" from official documents.

He would substitute "a more appropriate designation which will not reflect on the status of recipients of such payments."

Age is an honourable estate, we wish our friends old age, we associate age with wisdom and we each have the ambition to make a hundred or more. If not "old age" what then? If Mr. Lachance proposes to change "old age" to "senior citizens" we hope every over-70 sends him a poison letter.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the hon. member for Pictou will be a butt for the newspapermen, if he has not already been so, following this discussion today.

As I said a while ago—

[Text]

Mr. MacEwan: Don't worry about me, worry about yourself.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Which shows that everyone cannot share the same opinion. But I think that when a person reaches about 70 years of age and receives then his old age pension, it is an honour, although some people may get it before.

Some people are inclined to think of the old age pension as a disgrace, a stigma, while in fact it is rather an honour done to our citizens who have acquired the right to be thanked for the services they have rendered to their country.

I fully agree that we should change the words "old age" and replace them by others which, perhaps, could mean or imply the receipt of a retirement social pension. It is obvious that several other names could be suggested.

I have noticed that in some districts of Montreal, one of whose ridings I have the honour to represent—and I know that this is true also in other regions of the country—one hears about "the golden age". Those are clubs of people who have reached a certain age, and their membership is large. They organize recreational activities for their members. Known as "golden age clubs", they are very popular in Montreal and their members are very happy to belong to them.

We might adopt such a name that would not reflect on people's age. I sincerely admit that it is not very pleasant to get an old age pension and feel it is something to be ashamed of. I am convinced that it is because of our standard of living that life expectancy has increased in Canada and that old age has lost so much of its importance nowadays that a person is old only inasmuch as he feels old.

We all know people who, in spite of the fact that they are well advanced in years, feel young at heart, wish to remain young and have no intention of being considered as older citizens. One is old only if he says he is old and acts accordingly. Some people are old at 20 whereas others feel so well at 80 that they set an example to many much younger persons.

Consequently, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Pictou once more. I feel the wording should be changed but I am not sure whether the words "senior citizens" would be appropriate. The expression "golden age" could surely be used. We could also speak of a "retirement social pension" or of a "national retirement pension". There are other words, but the English expression "old age" and its French equivalent "vieillesse" as in old age pension and "pension de vieillesse" are old-fashioned.

Nowadays, people are not old when they reach a certain age. What would happen if the government suddenly decided tomorrow to grant old age pensions at age 60 as it has often been suggested in the house? Would it mean that people would be old at 60 years of age? And if this process should continue, a day might come when people would receive an old pension at 55 years of age. Would that mean that because they have reached that age they would be in the "old age pension" class?

The old age pension should not be related to a matter of age. It would certainly be beneficial if the terminology relative to social legislation were to be changed, because it is not intended to stigmatize the citizens, but rather to help them and to prove to them the nation's recognition for their good work of the past.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the newspapermen, or rather the newspaperman who, last year, was good enough to express his opinion on this subject—he was certainly at liberty to do so and I congratulate him—will have changed his mind this year and that he will accept such an excellent suggestion.

[Text]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a good idea for us to take a look at the terminology of the two pieces of legislation to which reference is made in the motion now before us. Therefore I join with the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) in congratulating the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) for inviting us to have this discussion this afternoon.

I must say that there is something to the suggestion that the word "old" and the words "old age" do, sometimes, suggest something unpleasant and if we could find better terminology it would be a good idea. However, I am not completely sold on "senior citizens" as a phrase to take the place of "old age" in this legislation. As the hon. member has just said, if we bring down the retirement age we may be paying old age pensions to people who are not as senior as pensioners are now. None the less I think it would be a good idea for us to look at this. Others may come up with suggestions, and perhaps our friends in the press will not only make comments on what has been said here today but may themselves come up with suggestions. I wonder whether we cannot at least "try on for size" such phrases as "the retirement security act" or "the retired persons act" or "the retired persons pension act".

I am interested in the comment made by the last speaker as to finding a word or terminology which can be used easily in both our official languages. That will always have to be considered, but it does strike me that the word "retirement" in some form might fit a little better than the word "senior". In any case, if we can get rid of the word "old", that might be desirable.

I must say that when one talks about a stigma in relation to this legislation, not many people feel that it is so much of a stigma to have the name "old age" applied to their pensions as it is to feel the stigma of the means test in the case of pensions under the Old Age Assistance Act and the inadequacy of the amount in the case of payments under the Old Age Security Act. If we are interested in doing away with a stigma, the thing to do is to make the other kind of improvements in this legislation. I can see already the letters that some of us are going to receive after this debate. We are going to get letters from old age security recipients across Canada who will have noted this debate, and they will say: What are you worrying about the name of the act for, when what we are concerned about is having an adequate pension on which to live in this day and age in the light of the kind of economy we have at the present time? When we are talking about changing the names of this pension legislation we might bear in mind as an ideal getting rid altogether of what we now call the Old Age Assistance Act. I hope the day is not far off when a combination of the Old Age Security Act with its being made available at a lower age, together with the protection of the Canada pension plan, if we are ever to get it on the statute books, will do away with the necessity of any means test on old age pensions for those between the ages of 65 and 70.

Mr. Speaker, you have been very lenient with me. I realize I have got away from terminology. I have been talking about such things as the amount of the pension, the means test and the Canada pension plan. But I do suggest that if we are concerned about a stigma—and that word was used by a previous speaker—we must be concerned not only with the naming of the legislation but with its terms. In other words, as was said by the hon. member who has just spoken, we must be concerned not only with the terminology but with the terms of the legislation. Nevertheless I believe it is a good idea to think about this for a bit this afternoon.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): I am sorry I was not in my own place when I first rose, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to add very much to the discussion, but simply to say that I join with previous speakers who have discussed the noble enterprise of changing the names of the acts referred to. I agree there is something depressing about the names now used—"old age assistance", "old age pensions", and so on.

I wonder, though, if we cannot undertake a more complete provision and think in terms of an encompassing program to meet the total social needs of our people, and not have a fragmentation of programs dealing with old age, blindness, disability, unemployment and so forth. We find, now, that these programs have been devised in a piecemeal way to meet separate needs, and I think the time has come when we should consider some over-all social security program which would at the same time erase the names to which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) objects. Such a proposal might well eliminate overlapping costs of administration and lead to a better service to the individuals affected. I think that at the present time a great deal of money is needed to run these separate programs. We have a whole hierarchy of systems. If there were an over-all social security plan for Canada it would represent one answer to the problem raised by the hon. member for Pictou, who wants to change the names of these acts.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he realize that he may have stumbled right there upon a good name for all of this legislation—"the social security act".

Mr. Enns: I certainly have no objection to that. But I was really saying there is a more basic problem, that of erasing a fragmented approach to meeting people's needs. "Social security" might well be acceptable to the hon. member for Pictou as well.

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South): First, I would join with other members in commending the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) who brought this matter before the house. I might point out that we expect measures both enlightened and learned from the hon. member for Pictou who is an incumbent of the west block, which is rapidly becoming known as the source of most of the grey matter and intelligence of the house.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Greene: In particular, I may point out that the hon. member for Pictou is from the sanctum sanctorum of the west block, namely the third floor, the very epitome of all learning in that venerable institution. I would point out, with respect to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that I was somewhat disturbed that he did not include in his general plea for security for those in need, without the necessity of the means test, those most deserving of persons who are now faced with this embarrassment, pettiness and smallness that is emcompassed within the means test, namely the recipients of the war veterans allowance.

If I may be so bold, Mr. Speaker, I would like to embody within the remarks he has made a plea that they, too, be considered not only for increased allowances, which is very badly needed at the present time, but for the receiving of those allowances without the embarrassment of the means test, which is now their lot.

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Greene: I was also somewhat taken aback to learn that the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) had been taken to task by one of the local newspapers by reason of bringing this subject matter before this house at an earlier date. I might point out that some of the editorial writers for that venerable journal are no longer with it; they are making remarks verbally which are getting them into hot water in other places besides the editorial page of that newspaper—and it may be the very remarks that were made with respect to old age and the joys and virtues of old age indicated that very senility which caused trouble in later times and under other auspices.

With respect to another name for the bill which was suggested, apart from "senior citizens", I was very pleased to hear the hon. member for Pictou suggest that there might be other names applicable, although I was not too struck, even though he is from my own party, with the name of "the golden age bill" offered by the hon. member for Lafontaine. With regard to anything to do with gilt or gold, it is well known that the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, the official opposition, is that which is normally lined up with the great signs and sources of wealth in this country, and if it was called "the golden bill" in any form, it might be thought to be a Tory bill—and this would hardly be applicable.

I was also very pleased to hear in the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou that he was once a young man, and not too long ago I think he indicated; because some of the very morose and morbid and almost doleful remarks that I hear coming from across the floor from his side so often have indicated to me that his party and all hon. gentlemen in it must have been old for all time, because they see so little hope and so little good in the future. Therefore it is refreshing to know that not too long ago he was young.

One thing disturbs me in all this, Mr. Speaker, namely this tendency, amounting almost to a phobia to find names which are pleasing and pleasant; I think they are known as euphemisms in English definition. It is going to be a very difficult thing for this house if with every measure that is brought before the house and with every statute presently extant on the statute books we are going to have to find these euphemous names, these euphemisms, for bills; names pleasing to everyone and names which will leave no connotation of anything evil or wrong or unpopular. For instance, I see great difficulty with the representation act. It might be that we will have to change the name of that bill to something like "An act to find responsible, reputable and jolly good representation"—and, of course, this would not apply to all hon. members of this house.

Then I am concerned with the Criminal Code. We could not have that evil word "criminal" lying around loose in our statute books. We would undoubtedly have to change the name of that time-worn statute to something like, "An act for the good citizens who have temporarily strayed from the straight and narrow". I think, also—

Mr. Knowles: Oh, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: He is only killing time, anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): The Chair considers that the hon. member has strayed from the straight and narrow, and I wonder whether he would stay as closely as possible to the resolution which is before us, which deals with changing the names of two acts.

Mr. Greene: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I do feel there is some analogy with regard to other statutes which possibly should be renamed, if we are going to embark on the rather costly administrative process of renaming statutes in the interest of having names pleasing to all. I thought it might be of some help to this house if we considered the very broad area in which we might be embarking, if we do proceed on this path. Again, if we are going to amend or change the name of the Criminal Code, I think we shall have to include in the new name those gentlemen who are in favour of lotteries. They will certainly have to be included. We will not call them criminals, because I do not think that is correct at all; and in deference in particular to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) I think we should just spell out that these gentlemen are not criminals but are merely in favour of lotteries.

The statute that gave me the most trouble, Mr. Speaker, when I was considering this very wide area in which we are embarking, was the Income Tax Act, and it is very difficult to find a name which would be pleasing to all and offend none with respect to that iniquitous bill which has so long borne the unhappy name of the Income Tax Act. The best I can do in helping this house—

Mr. MacEwan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; when I introduced the resolution Your Honour suggested that I confine my remarks to it. I quickly took Your Honour's advice. I wonder if that great, knowledgeable member for Renfrew South, who adorns the west block, would now get back to the resolution itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I could say to the house that the Chair is enjoying the remarks of the hon. member equally as much as the house; but I would hope he would confine himself to the terms of the resolution before us.

Mr. Greene: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, I think we are dealing here with a matter that is on a twofold plane. We are dealing, first, with the renaming of statutes, and second we are dealing with the subject of old age. Therefore with respect I would submit that remarks referable to either of these basic ingredients of the hon. gentleman's resolution are pertinent and relevant and I trust will be of some help to hon. members in determining their respective choices in regard to the resolution. Again, on the question of renaming the acts, if it would be of some help to this house I might suggest that the Income Tax Act be renamed something along these lines, "An act for the purpose of removing coin of the realm from the pockets of those who have to those who have not". I feel this would be the type of concise and appropriate name which surely would not offend the great majority of our people. I am sure most hon. members of this house, from all I have heard since I have been here, receive little support from those who have great wealth, those from whom it would be removed; so the name should bear the approval of all hon. members as well as all citizens.

With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think when we are speaking about names, whether names have a particular connotation, whether a name is particularly offensive, or whether a certain name is better than another, it would not be right, proper or fitting if we based our deliberations on that score without considering the best words ever spoken with regard to the question of what's in a name. I quote from Romeo and Juliet, act 2, scene 2, line 40:

> O be some other name! What's Montague?
> It is nor hand, nor foot, nor arm, nor face,
> Nor any part belonging to a man.
> What's in a name? That which we call a rose
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

I offer these words of wisdom to the hon. member for Pictou and suggest that the gist of the old age pension bill and the Old Age Assistance Act is very much more what has been brought to our attention by hon. members, and certainly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), namely what is in the bill itself. How much are these people receiving, and are they getting it with a minimum of embarrassment and without a means test? I believe the old age pension by any other name would smell just as sweet if we could see to it that that pension, accompanied with the Canada pension plan which is shortly to be before the house, provides the older people of this country with the wherewithal whereby they may live out their senior years in dignity and without want. This, surely, is the important matter, not the name of the bill itself.

In the not too distant future we hope to be doing some serious thinking in regard to the Canada pension plan, which will indeed fit in with the present legislation as it now exists. If the hon. member feels there is some very great national benefit in his resolution he might raise the matter at such time, either by way of amendment in committee when discussing the proposed measure, or in some other way.

There is one other aspect to the hon. member's desire to change this name which troubles me. This is the inference that there is something disreputable or unworthy or something we should hide in the very words "old age". I submit to the house that there is nothing unworthy or to be ashamed of about this expression, or which should be hidden under a basket some place. In this regard the legislation which is being brought in, as the hon. member who presented this bill has pointed out over the years, has certainly recognized that old age is a time of dignity worthy of security and well-being. In this connection I think the writers through the ages have recognized the worth of old age. It is not a time for despair. No person should be looked down upon because he is old. I think George Bernard Shaw put it as well as any of us could when he stated something along these lines—that until you are 60 you really have not learned enough to be of much use to anyone; and until you are 80 you have not had enough practice in application to put that knowledge you have acquired to use. I think Victor Hugo put it very well when he said:

When grace is joined with wrinkles it is adorable. There is an unspeakable dawn in a happy old age.

I should like to close my remarks on this delightful and worth-while subject by leaving with the house the thought that I do not think we should do anything here to discredit old age. I do not think there is anything more attractive in the words "senior citizen" than there is in the words "old age". Old age means that a person has given a great many years to this country, to bringing up his family, to paying his taxes, and to earning that very assistance which is paid to him, not by way of any handout from a government or from parliament, but by reason of his playing his part as a citizen of this country and earning whatever emoluments we pay him.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I point out to the hon. member, through you, Mr. Speaker, that in my remarks the hon. member would have noticed, if he had been listening closely, and as he will observe in Hansard, that I said nothing to cast any reflection on our senior citizens by using the words "old age" disparagingly.

Mr. Greene: I concur in those remarks of the hon. member. I was not inferring that the hon. member had, except that in the introduction of his resolution I was disturbed by the thought that there might be left with the press and with the people the impression that either this house or the hon. member felt that the use of the words "old age" something undesirable. I suggest the words "old age" are probably those most worthy of respect and dignity: And may all hon. members of the house continue to serve long, that they will some day earn this appellation.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan) on his very generous motives for introducing this motion in the house.

Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to speak on that motion but in any case, I should like to quote from it. It reads as follows:

That in the opinion of the house, the government should consider the advisability of changing the terminology in the designation "old age"—

So, the point is to change the designation "old age" for the designation "senior citizen". Any dictionary will give you, as definition of old age, the following:

The advanced years in human life.

So, I understand that this discussion is simply an empty battle of words which does not contribute much to the promotion of public business.

Mr. Speaker, if I may be out of order for only 30 seconds, I should like to say that I deeply regret that because of our present system of procedure, parliament has to discuss during a whole hour a simple matter of terminology when there are problems of extreme importance facing the country.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) put it so well, this motion is only an attempt to find euphemisms, designations to alleviate other designations meaning the same thing.

As a matter of fact, in the phrase old age, there is absolutely nothing reflecting upon a state of life which most people are to know some day.

As a matter of fact, there are two stages in life: birth and death. The main steps between those two stages are childhood, the teen-age period, middle age and old age. Consequently, I fail to see the usefulness of dealing indefinitely with a mere question of terminology.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if we were going to deal with the terminology of each of our laws, we would get nowhere, and we would get lost in useless talking, without achieving anything.

Let us talk about the word "pension". Is it necessary to insist on that word and say that the fact that a person receives a pension establishes a certain analogy between the words pensioner and parasite? Should we not change the word "pensioner" in order that the person who receives a pension from the government will not be compared to a parasite?

When we talk about the pension to veterans, do we mean that veterans who receive pensions refuse now to fight?

When we speak of unemployment insurance, do we not throw discredit on the unemployed by considering him as a loafer?

Again, would it be necessary to change the terminology of all those acts and say that the unemployed is a loafer, a parasite, that it is an insult to call him "unemployed"?

There is in Quebec a pension for unmarried women. But what an insult, Mr. Speaker, to think that a woman has to stay unmarried. Again, would it not be better to change the terminology of that act? That is an insult to the charm and attractiveness of that sex which ought not to be called the weaker one, because, on the contrary, it exerts a far greater power than one would imagine.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there has been too much discussion, and that is why I want to return to my seat as quickly as possible. In my opinion, we have spent too much time debating a subject which, granted, shows the best of intentions on the part of the hon. member for Pictou, who wants to bring in a new expression in the hope of improving a situation which, to his way of thinking, is such as to put older people in a position of inferiority.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the proper meaning of a term or expression should not be confused with the disparaging intonation it is sometimes given. As a matter of fact, one often calls somebody "old man" or "young man". It may be injurious in both cases but it is only a matter of intonation and not of semantics or real meaning of the word.

In fact, what would the reaction of the hon. member for Pictou be if I were to tell him one day that he is not old enough to be a senator? Lmagine if he would like then to be considered as an old man.

If I told him that he is too young to be a minister, then the word "young" could be disparaging simply because of the manner in which it is spoken.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) that if we are to consider every act in order to see what term or word could be changed, parliament would waste its time, like it did tonight, whereas if the procedure were amended, we could look into far more important situations likely to prove beneficial to all the people.

[Text]

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we have had a very moving and interesting debate this afternoon on the motion before us. One must try to get in perspective the case that has been made by the mover of the resolution. He has declared to the house that he intended no aspersion whatsoever with regard to the use of the words "old age" or the recipients of old age assistance. However, in reading the resolution itself I do not think his wording was the most happy choice. It reads in part as follows:

I cannot help but agree with the contention that has been made by my colleague, the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) that there is in the wording of the resolution a suggestion that the term "old age" in the present legislation is a less than worthy designation. The contention has been made by several members on this side of the house. The hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Lachance) quoted from an editorial in the Ottawa Journal which said that they expected and hoped that everyone over 70 would soon be sending letters to the hon. member for Lafontaine for trying to change the words.

I think we all agree there is a serious problem in what we are trying to do in this day and age. We cannot escape things by changing names, although sometimes we think we are. I think there is a virtue in recognizing terms for their value and for what they are. The term "old age" has been used in our language since the beginning of time. My colleagues have pointed out that it is an honourable term. It is used with honour in our poetry, our literature and our social relations. If we try to undertake measures which in a rather superficial way make changes suggesting that we are somewhat queasy about these things or worried about them, if this is the motivation in our literature and legislation, then I think it is less than worthy of the house. I do not know whether any large number of those who come under these programs feel that they are under any stigma when they pick up their cheques. I am not aware of any resolutions passed by associations asking for this change. I am not aware of submissions—

Mr. MacEwan: There are a lot of things you are not aware of.

Mr. Francis: That may well be.

Mr. MacEwan: You have not been here very long; you will learn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being six o'clock the hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, could the house leader place on Hansard what we will be dealing with tomorrow?

Mr. Favreau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we will proceed with the second reading and committee stage of the Blue Water bridge bill. After that we will take the resolution introducing the Post Office Act amendments which will be followed, if there is time left, by the resolution introducing amendments to the Exchequer Court Act. This will be followed, always if there is time left, by the resolution introducing a bill providing for the payment of certain provincial fees and taxes by crown corporations. Then—

Mr. Knowles: Then it will be Friday.

Mr. Favreau: —it will be Friday, so that all we need know is that on Friday the committee will be studying estimates of the Department of Public Works. I wish to announce that on Monday we will have a supply motion.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 30, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACALUSO—REFERENCE TO HEADLINE IN HAMILTON "SPECTATOR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph Macaluso (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege. It has to do with a newspaper report which appeared on page 1 of yesterday's Hamilton Spectator in which a story under the by-line of Mr. Tim Creery deals with a discussion between several Liberal M.P.'s and the hon. member for Labelle prior to his defection to the Conservative party.

I have no objection to the contents of this article, but the headline is misleading, unfair and damaging to the integrity of myself and the other hon. members mentioned in the story. The headline reads "Link City M.P. to Socred's 'Bribe' Claim". My question of personal privilege is based on two things, Mr. Speaker. First, any suggestions made by the hon. member for Labelle about a bribe were not directed to any of the M.P.'s involved in the discussions. Second, while Mr. Davey and all the hon. members concerned on this side have denied any suggestion of a bribe being offered, this matter has still to be looked into by a parliamentary committee. The headline, then, is wrong when it links my name or the names of any of the hon. members involved with alleged bribery.

MR. LANGLOIS—PARTY DESIGNATION OF MEMBERS FOR LABELLE AND RIMOUSKI

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

In Hansard of yesterday, April 29, 1964, the list of members of the house still showed the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard) and the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Ouellet) as being affiliated to the Social Credit party. I consider that to be an insult to the Social Credit party and a slight on all right-thinking members.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that there be an immediate retractation and correction on the part of those responsible for such a disgrace, for we will no longer accept to be dishonoured by such ties.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: May I point out that I am informed a clerical error was inadvertently made, and that it will be corrected.

MR. NESBITT—APPEARANCE ON C.B.C. PROGRAM "VIEWPOINT"

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wish to raise a question of privilege in connection with another matter which concerns a great many members of this house. I may say to Your Honour that this is the first opportunity I have had of raising this matter because I have just received a photostatic copy of the newspaper article in question.

This newspaper article appeared in the Toronto Telegram of April 20 and was written by one Lubor Zink, a member of the parliamentary press gallery. It concerned the appearance by myself on the C.B.C. television program "Viewpoint". I am not concerned with the observations of Mr. Zink concerning myself, no matter how unfounded and bizarre they may be, but I am concerned with one of the things said in the article, which is as follows:

> I have nothing against the M.P.'s expressing their unavoidably partisan opinion over the public-owned C.B.C. and getting paid for it with taxpayers' money—

Mr. Speaker, I did not receive any fee for appearing on this program, nor have I ever received any fees from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is also my understanding that most other members of parliament do not accept fees for appearing on the C.B.C. I would draw Your Honour's attention that in view of the terms of the House of Commons Act this false allegation by Mr. Zink may well be defamatory, and I trust that either he or his newspaper, or both, will publish an appropriate apology and denial.

CONSUMER CREDIT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South) presented the first report of the joint committee on consumer credit, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Statement on Science and Research

SCIENCE AND RESEARCH

STATEMENT RESPECTING ORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house of certain decisions reached by the government concerning the organization of government activities relating to science and research.

Hon. members will recall that last December I asked Dr. C. J. Mackenzie to examine the activities of government relating to science and technology and report how, in his view, our efforts might be made more effective. On January 28 last Dr. Mackenzie submitted a report, a copy of which I now table in both French and English. I draw the attention of the house to the two principal recommendations put forward by Dr. Mackenzie in his progress report.

The first recommendation, which the government has now decided to adopt, is that a scientific secretariat be established to assemble and analyse information about the government's scientific programs and their interrelation with other scientific activities throughout Canada. This organization, which will be a small fact finding and analytical group serving in a staff capacity without executive authority, will, subject to approval of appropriate provisions in the next supplementary estimates, be established as part of the privy council office. It will, we believe, meet a long felt need in providing day to day support in the work of the privy council committee on scientific and industrial research.

Professor F. A. Forward, head of the department of metallurgy at the University of British Columbia, has agreed to serve as the first director of this scientific secretariat during its formative period. The establishment of the new office will take effect next July, and we count ourselves very fortunate in having secured the services of a man with the record, experience and ability of Dr. Forward. In creating this scientific secretariat, the government is also following substantially the course recommended by the Glassco commission.

The second recommendation contained in Dr. Mackenzie's report has to do with the proposal for a national committee on scientific policy, which again had been recommended by the Glassco commission. It will be noted from the report that Dr. Mackenzie in his report agreed in principle with this recommendation, but felt that before such an advisory committee could be brought into being we should re-examine the role of the national research council and define more clearly, in consultation with the national research council, what relationship should exist between it and the proposed new committee.

[Mr. Greene.]

The government agrees that before a new advisory committee can be established the questions raised by Dr. Mackenzie in his report must be settled. This matter will therefore be the subject of study by the government, and in particular by the privy council committee on scientific and industrial research during the coming months, and it will be one of the first tasks of the new scientific secretariat to assist the privy council committee in this study.

UNITED NATIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF SECRETARY GENERAL ON CYPRUS OPERATION

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table the report dated April 29, 1964 of the secretary general of the United Nations to the security council on the operations of the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus, to which I made reference yesterday. In view of the importance of this report, perhaps the house would agree to incorporate it as part of today's Hansard proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent to having the report printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of report referred to above, see appendix.]

PRESS PRIVILEGE

PROTECTION AGAINST DISCLOSURE OF SOURCES OF INFORMATION

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-93, to provide for the protection of news sources (press privilege).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I must state at once that this bill which I am bringing in does not have the approval of my colleagues. If enacted it would ensure that practising journalists would not be required in the courts to disclose the sources of information gained in their work. This would not, of course, be any protection against any statements, written or oral, made by journalists which could be libellous or slanderous.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REFERENCES TO STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a couple of questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He tabled the secretary general's report which, of course, we read in the newspapers this morning. I would ask him whether he noted U Thant's statement that "disarming of all except in the regular police and gendarmerie, with control of extremists on both sides" was one of the conditions. I would also ask him whether he has noted that that is one of the matters which we on this side of the house have been advocating. In addition, I should like to ask him whether the Le Devoir report of this morning is correct when it states "U Thant underlined the very restricted powers accorded to the United Nations force in Cyprus compared with those prevailing in the Congo". The report then states that in Cyprus, unlike the Congo, the forces are not authorized to resort to force.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): With regard to the last part of my right hon. friend's question, I may say that I have not seen the newspaper report. I would be glad to examine it and deal with it later.

With regard to the first part of the question, I noted the observations made by the secretary general, but I do not believe I can usefully connect his statement with earlier statements made by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Truthfully, you could not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would suggest that in examining the report and in view of what he said yesterday to the effect that Canadian forces might be mere vulnerable spectators of strife in Cyprus, the right hon. gentleman note what the secretary general said:

> I wish here to emphasize my view that the United Nations force was dispatched to Cyprus to try to save lives by preventing a recurrence of fighting. It would be incongruous, even a little insane, for that force to set about killing Cypriots, whether Greek or Turkish, to prevent them from killing each other. Yet that is exactly the dilemma which is almost confronting General Gyani in Cyprus today. On the other hand, the force cannot stand idly by and see an undeclared war deliberately pursued, or see innocent civilians of all ages ruthlessly struck down by snipers' bullets.

In this connection I would call the attention of the house particularly to the section of the report beginning on page 10 which deals with the specific refinements and the kind of action which, in the present difficult situation, the United Nations force is authorized to take.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is just one matter I want to mention. The hon. gentleman said I made a statement that the forces were in the position of passive policemen. I should like to correct that statement by citing page 2722 of Hansard, which reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. gentleman this question. Has he made representations to the effect that the role of the United Nations force, and I refer particularly to the Canadians, shall not be that of simply a passive policeman but that the force shall undertake remedial and effective action which in their opinion is necessary?

That is quite different from the way in which the minister interpreted it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I accept my right hon. friend's correction.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the six point peace proposal made by the secretary general to the United Nations seems to offer some hope of making the peace keeping functions of the United Nations force in Cyprus more effective, may I ask the minister, first, if this six point proposal has the support of the Canadian government and, second, does the minister know whether the security council has approved this proposal by the secretary general?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The security council has not been in session since this report was circulated. The report is circulated to members as a matter of course and it is made available to members of the United Nations who are contributing to the peace keeping operation itself.

With regard to the proposals made by the secretary general, they do have the endorsement of the Canadian government. They represent substantially the result of discussions between members participating in the force and the secretary general or his officers.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the secretary general the power to implement these proposals without the concurrence of the security council, or must he wait for their approval? Second, may I ask the minister since these proposals which the secretary general is now making can be made public, as they have been, is there any reason why the terms of reference for the whole operation could not also be made public?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the status of forces agreement and the aide mémoire which outlines part of the terms of reference have already been tabled in the House of Commons. The directives have not, nor is it the intention to publicize the directives, for the reasons I have already given. With regard to the powers of the secretary general in connection with these new steps that may be taken by the peace keeping force, the secretary general has that power under the resolution passed by the security council on March 4.

Mr. Douglas: They will become effective immediately?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): These are now effective.

[Later:]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell us if the report broadcast on the C.B.C. national news this morning is correct that Swedish troops under the United Nations command in Cyprus have disarmed Cypriot guerrillas and, if so, do Canadian troops under the United Nations command have the same instructions?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, whatever instructions would be given to any contingent in the peace keeping force, would apply to all the participants in that force. In this context my hon. friend will have the opportunity of reading the report of the secretary general of the United Nations circulated yesterday. With regard to the particular radio news story no confirmation has yet come to us.

INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING 12 MILE FISHING ZONE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him, in view of the fact that May 15 is the date when the 12 mile fishing limit will be established, whether the negotiations between Canada, the United States and one or two other interested nations have produced an agreement for the protection of traditional fishing rights of claiming nations such as the United States and France. What is the present position in this regard?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations with the United States, France and other foreign countries interested in the 12 mile limit are still proceeding, and I can add with satisfaction that a bill providing enabling legislation for the government to proceed with the 12 mile limit will be introduced in the other place probably today or tomorrow, and its details will then be made known.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the introduction of the bill mean that there has been agreement regarding claimed traditional rights in this regard between Canada, the United States, France, and one or two other countries? Has that agreement been arrived at, or is the legislation being introduced while the negotiations are continuing and are uncompleted?

Mr. Robichaud: I may add, Mr. Speaker, that the bill will be introduced while negotiations are still going on and being completed. As I said earlier, the details of the bill will be made known probably within the next 24 hours, and at that time I will be in a position to provide further details.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): As a supplementary question, has there been any change in the position of the government of the United States with respect to this matter as of now, compared with the position the same government took a year ago?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, while negotiations are still going on it would not be proper for me to give details of the position taken by the United States or any other countries connected with this matter.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON UNIVERSAL APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, following a question of privilege which I raised yesterday, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in the absence of the Prime Minister, stated that an answer would be given today in order to clear up the confused situation existing between Quebec and Ottawa in regard to the national pension plan. The whole population is apparently wondering if we are going to have a double pension plan in Quebec or if the plan will apply uniformly across Canada. Could the Prime Minister enlighten us on this matter today?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to clarify this point again for the hon. member. I have already made a statement in the house which I thought was a clarification. I have also received a request for information along the same lines from the hon. member for Three Rivers, who was asked the other day to put his request on the order paper.

In reply to these questions I would say that the proposal we are making is that there will be one pension plan which will be the same for all of Canada. This plan will be embodied in federal legislation. But any province that so wishes can pass its own legislation making the federal plan also a provincial one, which in that case will be administered by the provincial government.

However, as far as the public are concerned it will be the same plan, requiring the same contributions and providing the same benefits, whether it is administered federally or provincially. This, Mr. Speaker, is understood in the agreement that has been reached and the arrangements that have been made between the government of Quebec and the government of Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, is the proposal. Whether it is implemented depends on the will of parliament and of provincial legislatures, but it is a proposal in which the government of Quebec has concurred, which other provincial governments have welcomed and which I hope will soon be implemented.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Does the answer given earlier to the hon. member for Villeneuve by the Prime Minister mean that social insurance cards will no longer be required in Quebec, since that province will have its own pension plan?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is the type of question that should be placed on the order paper.

AGRICULTURE

SURVEY OF CONDITIONS OF EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the question I asked him last Friday on his estimates about possible publication of the survey of conditions of eastern farmers, and in view of the fact that this survey was made available at a recent conference held in the interlake region of Manitoba, would it be possible for members of parliament to get this report before his estimates are brought up again?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If this report is available, certainly it is available to all members of the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHANGE IN SEATING ARRANGEMENTS OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a request to which I am sure Your Honour will be happy to agree. Because there are a couple of vacant seats and no one else will have to move to make it possible, and in order that two of our members may not have to sit behind members of another party, I should like to ask that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Scott) be moved to desk No. 241, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) to desk No. 267, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) to desk No. 268, and the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. Howe) to desk No. 269.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Clerk please take note of the seat changes.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that although I have enjoyed the interesting influence which surrounds me, I am happy to get back to the safety of the New Democratic party.

COAL

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and I apologize for not giving him notice, but I am up to my ears in the Columbia water.

An hon. Member: So is everybody else.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the fact that Canada imported 13.7 million short tons of bituminous coal last year and over 1 million short tons of anthracite coal, and that this is expected to increase by over 1 million tons in 1964, does government policy provide for increasing imports of coal from the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

Mr. Herridge: Then I wish to give notice of my desire to debate this on the late night show after ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria asked in my absence if I could inform the house as to the present state of the negotiations between Canada and the United States, as indicated by secretary of the interior Udall, with regard to this country's purchase of more coal from the United States as a result of increased purchases of power by that country from Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

This question seems to proceed from the assumption that in fact there are negotiations in progress between our two countries in which these two matters are linked. No such negotiations have been held or are being held, and I would like to say that in any general discussions relating to energy, which have been going on for some time and in which secretary of the interior Udall, who is in the gallery today—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: —has been participating, the governments of both our countries have at all times been fully aware of the interest in this matter of the coal producing areas of our respective countries; and I can assure the hon. member, on secretary Udall's behalf as well as on behalf of the Canadian government, that this will continue to be the case.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BENEFITS TO CANADIAN WORKERS IN STATE OF MAINE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could the minister give us the reasons which prevent the federal government from reaching an agreement with the state of Maine regarding the unemployment insurance of the Canadian loggers who go to work in that American state?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Boutin: Mr. Speaker, I ask that this question be transferred for debate at ten o'clock tonight.

[Text]

REPORTED DISCREPANCY IN NUMBERS OF RECIPIENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a number of questions to which answers were promised earlier in the week. The first question was asked by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg with respect to differences between statistics provided by the unemployment insurance commission and the dominion bureau of statistics.

The most recently available figures on unemployment insurance beneficiaries are for February of this year, when there was an estimated average of 503,000 persons drawing benefits during the month. For the week ending February 22, 1964, there were 467,000 estimated as unemployed by the labour force survey of the dominion bureau of statistics.

The difference of 36,000 in these figures, both of which are estimates, can in part be accounted for by the sampling variability of the labour force survey and the estimating procedures with respect to the number of beneficiaries. The difference can also be accounted for because a number of unemployment insurance beneficiaries are working part time and drawing partial benefits, and therefore will not be counted as unemployed by the dominion bureau of statistics in the monthly force survey.

In addition, one of the estimates is an average of the number of people drawing benefits during the whole month, while the d.b.s. estimate of unemployment is a count of the number of people employed during the third week in the month.

THE MINISTRY

REPORTED RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF HEALTH AND WELFARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of national importance for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether current reports are correct that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) did indeed tender her resignation last evening?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If I am not mistaken, I understand that this question was asked and answered last week.

TRANSPORT

RICHELIEU WATERWAY—STUDY BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I believe my question to be important and urgent.

Could the minister give the house a progress report on the consideration by the boundary waters commission of the Richelieu waterway project?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put this on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: I would ask that this question be transferred for debate at ten o'clock tonight.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, but in his absence and knowing the interest of the Prime Minister, by reason of his recent telegram to the victims of the damage on the west coast, I direct it to him. Owing to the continuing and growing distress of the tidal wave victims on the west coast of Vancouver island, can the Prime Minister now inform the house whether the government of British Columbia has indicated the amount of federal assistance that will be required to rehabilitate those suffering this damage?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know no such information has been received, but I will look into the matter at once in case it was sent to my colleague.

Mr. Chatterton: As a supplementary question, is the government considering making a grant directly to the disaster fund, regardless of the request of the British Columbia government?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we are following the normal course in these matters, in which a request for this kind of assistance should come first from the provincial government.

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, if I might add in answer to the hon. member, the minister will be touring Alberni on May 3.

Mr. Chatterton: Pretty late.

PUBLICATIONS

DISCUSSIONS WITH U.S. MINISTERS OF PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he has exchanged, or plans to exchange any views with the United States ministerial visitors on the question of the periodicals legislation which is on the order paper, as it appears in Votes and Proceedings for March 11?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had the pleasure of an exchange of views on several subjects. There will be a report made to the house on the conference tomorrow, after completion of the conference.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that there is some urgency about this because of the pressures which are being brought to bear all about the House of Commons, I wonder if the Prime Minister is in a position to tell us whether he intends to go ahead with the legislation in the exact form in which it appears in Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. Pearson: The proposal is already on the order paper.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO FORMULATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister report any progress in the formulation of a national civil aviation policy?

Mr. Speaker: In order to assist the hon. member to get a fuller answer, may I suggest he put that question on the order paper.

Mr. Hahn: I will deal with it, if I may, after ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Transport appears to be prepared and eager to report to the house on the matter, I wonder whether the house would give unanimous consent to hearing what progress has been made in the establishment of a national air policy, it being such an urgent matter.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understood that the hon. member for Broadview had put this matter down for debate after ten o'clock tonight, so if the hon. gentleman would stay and listen I would be glad to speak at that time.

INCOME TAX

QUEBEC—PROCEDURE RESPECTING CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. It is rather blunt.

Is the minister aware that the bloodthirsty officials of the income tax division are now cutting down to the bone the receipts for charitable donations? When will he put a stop to that bureaucratic dictatorship in our province and throughout Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that is not a question. It is a statement, and I must rule it out of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. If I were to produce all the complaints which I receive these days at my office, you would not say that I am making an unfounded statement. I have proof of what I am saying, and that is why I should like the minister to give me an answer.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: There was no doubt about the importance of the question. It was the form of the question to which the Chair was objecting. It was given in the form of a statement, not of a question.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I wonder if the Prime Minister is yet in a position to answer the question I put to him with respect to the urgent request of the government of the province of Alberta concerning the motion which was unanimously passed by that legislature last month.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes. I regret not having been able to inform the hon. member of this fact previously, but the government has received a letter from the Speaker of the legislative assembly of Alberta containing the resolution in question recommending that negotiations be commenced immediately with the government of the United States. This resolution is now receiving consideration, and its subject matter has been discussed at the current meetings with United States ministers.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): I have a question for my fellow maritimer, the Minister of Fisheries. Can the hon. gentleman advise the house as to the progress of his discussions yesterday with secretary of the interior Udall respecting the Passamaquoddy project, in which the government and congress of the United States seemingly evince greater interest than the government of Canada?

Mr. Speaker: This, it seems to me, is a very good question for the order paper.

Mr. Macquarrie: On a point of order, I have never questioned a ruling of the Speaker since I came to this house, but two of the ministers of the crown have already answered questions relating to the Canadian-United States discussions, and the question I have just asked seems at least as much in order as were those other questions.

Mr. Speaker: The point of the ruling is that at ten o'clock the hon. member would have greater opportunity to explore this interesting question and probably to get a more detailed report. The Chair was, in effect, trying to assist.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AMHERST, N.S.—ACTION TO OFFSET PENDING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I have a question for the Minister of Industry. Will the minister inform the house what action has been taken to offset the substantial and serious lay-offs at Enamel and Heating Products Limited, Amherst, which are having such a damaging effect on the economy of Cumberland?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member object to putting this question on the order paper.

Mr. Coates: I will join the late, late show.

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—ALLEGED INACCURATE STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria, rising on a question of privilege, alleged that I had committed a "grievous error" in a statement I had made in the house regarding the refit of a naval vessel at Point Edward naval base. He said that the ship in question H.M.C.S. Swansea, was in fact at a private shipyard in Sydney rather than at the R.C.N. Point Edward naval base.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that my original statement was completely in accordance with the facts. The refit of a naval ship includes certain work for which the ship must be drydocked. As there are no facilities for drydocking a frigate at Point Edward naval base, a contract was let to Sydney Engineering and Dry Dock Company for the docking portion of the refit, and H.M.C.S. Swansea is at present on the slip at this company.

However, the major portion of the refit will be carried out at the Point Edward naval base with an estimated requirement of 100,000 man hours, compared to 16,000 man hours required for the drydocking. It had been the previous intention that the whole Swansea refit should be let to contract, but in order to ease the reduction of employment at Point Edward naval base it was decided, as I originally stated, to carry out the refit at the naval base. In consequence, Mr. Speaker, there was no question of privilege.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT "EMPLOYMENT AND MANPOWER UTILIZATION IN NEW BRUNSWICK"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert on April 27, the report to which he refers entitled "Employment and manpower utilization in New Brunswick" is being made available to interested departments and agencies in Ottawa for study, and obviously to provincial agencies in the province of New Brunswick. It will also be made available to members of parliament.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

AUTHORITY FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS UNTIL 1967

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. The other day in an announcement the minister indicated, or said, that the government is "at present contributing to the cost of highway construction under the Trans-Canada Highway Act, until December 31, 1967". I wonder if the minister could tell us under what authority those contributions will be made.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member would not object to putting that question on the order paper.

Mr. Howard: I would, to an extent, for this reason. As I understand it, the Trans-Canada Highway Act prohibits any contributions to the various provinces after May 31, 1964. It is because of the urgency attaching to that date that I ask my question, which is akin to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition a few moments ago in which the date May 15 was referred to. My question is, I submit, just as urgent.

Mr. Speaker: Of course the Chair always tries to accommodate as many hon. members as possible, and if I am correct it does appear to me that the Minister of Public Works has the answer. In order to save the time of the house perhaps the minister would answer the question, if he has an answer ready, and we will dispose of the matter.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): May I simply say to the hon. member that a few months ago this extension was granted by the house by way of supplementary estimates.

PENITENTIARIES

DRUMHELLER, ALTA.—CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER TO MEMBER FOR BOW RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): May I take this opportunity to deal with a reply I gave to a question asked by the hon. member for Bow River a few days ago. Although the hon. member had informed me of his intention to ask his question, I did not have the text of the question beforehand. In this question the word "misleading" was used and I mistakenly thought it applied to myself when in fact it did not, as Hansard shows. I answered that if confusion existed it was in the mind of the hon. member.

I have always tried to be fair and just in my replies to questions in the house, and I wish to state here that I would never have used the term I did if I had not interpreted the question incorrectly.

URANIUM

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO KEEP MINES OPERATING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. Because of the seriousness of the situation in Bancroft and the urgent need for action, aggravated by recent press reports which are contrary to the pre-election commitment given by the Prime Minister, what action is contemplated in order to keep the uranium mines in operation, thereby assuring the survival of the Bancroft community?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not accept the hon. member's statement that there was any pre-election commitment on this matter at all. The steps which have been taken have been made known to the house, and further steps will be made known if possible.

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, I have the commitment here. It was published four days before the election. It says "Mr. Pearson has promised—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is the time for questions.

CROP INSURANCE

LEGISLATION TO REINSURE PROVINCES AGAINST LOSS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the provinces are now in the process of signing up farmers for crop insurance, would the minister inform the house if the government contemplates introducing legislation this session to reinsure the provinces against losses under this program.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): We hope we shall be able to deal with this legislation during the present session.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COURT OF CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): My question is addressed to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that today is the last day upon which recommendations were to be received from Indian bands in Canada on this legislation, the proposed Indian claims commission, can the minister assure the house and the Indian people of Canada that he will proceed with this matter and introduce this legislation at an early date?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): We shall be very glad to receive any comments by members of Indian bands in Canada on this legislation, and I hope it will be brought before the house during the second part of the session.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that there are going to be two sections to this session—possibly the Prime Minister did not hear the words but apparently we got that information by way of indiscretion—would the Prime Minister give his views thereon?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely my right hon. friend will not begrudge the house a week or ten days some time in August?

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the plan, that there is to be a break in the session some time in August? Is this a serious answer, or is it one of those flippant answers in which the Prime Minister sometimes engages?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if we do not make further progress than we are making now, we may not even get that week.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I have a question for the Secretary of State. Perhaps in his absence the acting minister would answer it. Will the hon. gentleman ascertain from the C.B.C. upon what grounds it follows the policy that whenever a controversial matter arises on which the government needs aid, it calls upon a well known Liberal partisan propagandist to appear on its network and present his views in the guise of commentary?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on a good-size picture in the Gazette this morning in which the minister is shown leaning across the conference table, apparently in anger, toward United States delegates at the Canada-U.S. conference. The caption under the picture reads:

> Canada-U.S. conference: External affairs minister Paul Martin leans across the conference table for a word with U.S. interior secretary Stewart Udall.

My question is this. Does this unusual picture of the Canada-U.S. conference represent the minister protesting to the United States secretary of the interior his attempt to obtain further control over Canada's natural resources, or is it merely a publicity stunt to impress the Canadian people?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all agree that this is a very important question. What I was doing was telling the United States secretary of the interior how enthusiastic my hon. friend was for the Columbia river treaty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It looks as though you were saying "Give us back our water".

SHIPPING

AUTHORITY FOR EMERGENCY WORKS ON GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE HURON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Has any special authority been given for emergency works to give access to docks and navigation facilities left high and dry on lake Huron and Georgian bay? Has there been any special or emergency authorization?

An hon. Member: Pray for rain.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that the hon. member put this question on the order paper. It is an important question and I am sure could be adequately dealt with later.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JULES SIOUI—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CASE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice?

Could he tell us whether the consideration of the case of the Indian chief Jules Sioui, imprisoned for almost a year, is now completed and if so, what decision was reached?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I asked to be informed on the case of Jules Sioui who has been in jail for almost a year and I realized, just by looking at the record, that this case was never submitted to my department. However, I asked my officials for a report in order to know how I could help him.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the Minister of Justice make the statement that he has made. The case of a man in jail for one year because he believes he is a martyr to a principle deserves the consideration of the minister. I do not want to make a suggestion, but I do place before him this thought; that consideration should be given, in view of this Indian's desire to protect his people and the kind of offence charged against him, which is ridiculous in the extreme, to whether it is not a case for a free pardon.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PROTEST TO RUSSIA RESPECTING ALLEGED ESPIONAGE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) is not here, I will put my question to the Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to send an official protest to the Soviet authorities about the abuse of privilege committed by the Russian journalist Tarasov?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Port Arthur asked a question on April 23 with respect to the maritime transportation unions trustees. This question has been referred to the trustees, and I am told the trustees held no formal interviews with the press in the preceding week. In his capacity as administrator of the seafarers international union of Canada Mr. Millard did see the press on one occasion about a specific matter concerning the S.I.U., namely an application for certification of an S.I.U. crew on a vessel.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer given by the minister. If I make available to the minister the news reports that indicate that Mr. Millard in fact met with newspapermen in the S.I.U. building and gave a demonstration of the perquisites that Mr. Banks had had, would he then consider reapproaching the trustees to see if they would be willing to appear before a House of Commons committee?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Millard did talk to the press with respect to one specific matter, namely the request for certification. A visit to the S.I.U. headquarters ought not to be construed as disclosing information to the press which is not available to members of parliament.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the minister has not answered my question. In view of the information that was released in that case, would the minister consider asking the trustees if they would be prepared to appear before our standing committee on industrial relations?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on two previous occasions during the session I have approached the chairman of the board of trustees, and after considering the matter the board decided, in their view, that they would not wish to meet a committee of the house at this particular stage because of the kind of negotiations and arrangements which are still under consideration.

BRIDGES

SARNIA, ONT.—ESTABLISHMENT OF BLUE WATER BRIDGE AUTHORITY

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-4, respecting the international bridge over the St. Clair river known as the Blue Water bridge.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if the house would be agreeable I should like not to speak myself but to have the hon. member for Lambton West, who is intimately acquainted with the situation, explain this bill very briefly.

Mr. Walter F. Foy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on Bill No. S-4, respecting the international bridge spanning the St. Clair river between the village of Point Edward and the city of Port Huron, Michigan. This bridge is known as the Blue Water bridge. A number of members in the house have asked me whether this is a new bridge, and to clarify the matter I should like to describe the background of the Blue Water bridge.

The bridge was completed some time in 1937. At that time the Michigan state bridge commission was formed and agreements were prepared regarding Canadian maintenance of this bridge, tolls, etc. The approaches to this structure, I might say, are in the most advantageous and commercially developed area of the village of Point Edward, Ontario. In the original agreement the village of Point Edward was to receive $5,000 in lieu of taxes each year. The original agreement did not provide for any Canadians to be appointed to the bridge commission although it is an international bridge.

The agreement further stated that when the bonds and debts of the bridge were retired the tolls would be discontinued. This took place in 1961. The original agreement also stated that when the bonds and debts were retired the taxes to the village of Point Edward would cease.

The present quandary in connection with this matter results from an obvious disparity in the legislation concerning this bridge. As I have stated, on June 1, 1961 the corporate obligations of the commission were already satisfied and the commission took the position that by operation of law the portion of the bridge situated within the province of Ontario reverted to the Dominion of Canada and that all liability of the Michigan state bridge commission for taxes levied by the village of Point Edward or for any payment provided for in lieu of taxes would cease. Of course, Mr. Speaker, no taxes or payments in lieu of taxes have been paid to the village of Point Edward since 1961. I would also point out that when the original payment of $5,000 was agreed on back in 1938, operating expenses for the village were much lower than at the present time, and simple arithmetic will show that this very low payment is much too small and should be adjusted.

This Bill S-4 should be passed with all possible haste for the reason that the maintenance of this bridge has suffered, as well as the village of Point Edward. I am very gratified to note that this new Bill S-4 provides for the new bridge authority to consist of four Canadians and four Americans.

It has come to my attention, Mr. Speaker, that there is no maintenance staff looking after the Canadian side of the Blue Water bridge. Therefore unless immediate steps are taken to correct this situation there will be no grass cut, no painting or maintenance of the bridge, refuse will not be collected and the beautiful entrance to Canada from the United States will certainly be a mess. The surrounding area of my riding, including Lambton-Kent, is also very conscious that something must be done to correct this situation. I am sure my friend the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) will agree with me that the passage of Bill S-4 is long overdue, and I would ask the house to pass it with all possible haste.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to compliment the hon. member for Lambton West on his clear and concise statement in support of this bill. It is not often that I find myself in practically complete agreement with the hon. member for Lambton West, and in view of this I am forced to conclude that his thinking is changing for the better. In support of what has already been said I should like to add one or two brief comments as background to the bill.

In about 1928 the St. Clair Transit Company was incorporated under special act of the government of Canada. It was authorized to build, finance, maintain, operate, and charge tolls in respect of the Canadian portion of this international bridge at Point Edward, Ontario. The statute further provided that upon the retirement of all corporate obligations of the company or of any person to whom it might assign its rights, the operation of the bridge within Canada should be conveyed to the Dominion of Canada. The St. Clair Transit Company subsequently passed out of existence, but prior to this time it assigned all its authority to the bridge commission of the state of Michigan.

The Michigan state bridge commission constructed the bridge and has, since its opening to traffic during 1938, operated and maintained it in a most efficient manner. It was operated so efficiently, in fact, that the capital debt of the structure was fully paid off on June 1, 1961.

No problems arose until this capital debt was paid off. However, at that time, due to a provision in the United States federal law and the insistence of the United States bureau of public roads, grants in aid of a Michigan highway project would be withheld unless the state of Michigan lifted all toll charges in accordance with the terms of the grants made by the United States federal government to the Michigan state highway department to aid in the construction of the Michigan approach.

Since that time, or I should say since 1962, the bridge has operated toll free. As of now they have run out of money. Indeed, in order to provide for the continued operation of the bridge until the government of Canada could act, the province of Ontario has voluntarily assumed responsibility for winter maintenance, snow removal, sanding and the electricity necessary for the lighting of the bridge. The government of Canada has kept up the customs and immigration buildings. Recently, in fact within the last few days, all the maintenance and supervisory staff have been laid off as a result of a lack of funds.

As the hon. member for Lambton West has pointed out, there are many other important aspects of this matter. For example, he mentioned the taxes due the municipality of Point Edward. However, the maintenance and upkeep of the bridge is very important. Here we have a great structure joining two great nations. Are we going to allow it to fall into disrepair because the federal government has not got around to setting up the authority with power to operate this essential public structure?

As a matter of interest, Mr. Speaker, may I say that during the period April 1963 to April 1964, traffic crossing this bridge was as follows: United States passenger cars in, 568,128; United States trucks in, 50,324; Canadian autos in, 519,400; Canadian trucks in, 14,707; total passengers in all vehicles, 3,959,179.

An hon. Member: What year is that?

Mr. McCutcheon: It is 1963-64. These figures could very well be doubled, because they refer only to vehicles entering Canada. One could assume that almost the same number of vehicles left the country. This, Mr. Speaker, more than justifies the vision of those who many years ago planned this great project. With all this traffic it is essential that the structure should be policed, that service vehicles should be available and that maintenance should be kept up.

The purpose, then, of the bill before us is to provide for the establishment of a commission that will be charged with responsibility for having those things done. I should like to point out further that this matter has received the closest scrutiny in the other place. May I appeal, therefore, for quick passage of this bill so the commission might be set up to operate this service in co-operation with its United States counterpart and to accept for Canada what, by law, belongs to Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this request seems to be a reasonable one and we are happy to agree to it.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Having travelled across this bridge many times, having friends living in the cities located at either end of the bridge, and having heard a clear explanation of the need for the passage of this bill, we give our wholehearted support to it.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-4 is a very interesting bill, especially when we are told that from 1963 to 1964, that is during one year, more than three million people crossed the Blue Water bridge which spans the St. Clair river and connects a point in Ontario to the United States.

If it is true that the province of Ontario had to meet alone the costs of maintaining the bridge from the time that tolls were discontinued, that is since 1961, I think it would be reasonable that the federal authorities see to it, under this Bill No. S-4 which provides for the establishment of a joint Canadian-American authority, that people using that bridge contribute to its maintenance.

Mr. Speaker, we will not prevent the immediate passing of this bill.

Mr. Foy: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Blue Water Bridge Authority

Mr. Foy: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member for Lambton-Kent a question.

Mr. Knowles: Why not do it in committee?

Mr. Foy: That will be too long to wait.

Mr. Knowles: We will go into committee right away.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Cameron (High Park) in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 12—Application of revenues.

Mr. Olson: There is just one point that needs clarification in clause 12. This clause indicates that the bridge authority may not increase any liability not dischargeable wholly from revenues or funds receivable by the bridge authority under this or any other act of the parliament of Canada or the United States. I should like to ask the sponsor of the bill if there is any provision for revenue from any other source than tolls.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that is the only source.

Mr. Olson: Then the passage of this bill will not place any financial burden on the government or the parliament of Canada at all?

Mr. Pickersgill: No. That is my advice, and that is why it was possible to introduce it in the other place.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 13 to 25 inclusive agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, could I take a minute to ask the hon. member for Lambton-Kent a question?

The Chairman: By consent.

Mr. Foy: In my remarks regarding the bill I referred to the hon. member for Lambton-Kent as my friend and I really meant it, but I noticed that in his remarks he said something about my attitude improving. I wonder whether he would explain this. Before that I should like to say that the speed which this bill has been dealt with is phenomenal, and it must be due to the eloquence of the hon. member for Lambton-Kent and my fine introduction.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether it could be read now, by leave.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles: By leave.

Mr. Pickersgill moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DELIVERY RATES ON PUBLICATIONS

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rates for first class mail and for all newspapers and periodicals other than those published more frequently than weekly; to establish a minimum rate of one half cent per copy to each separate address for all publications other than those to which local delivery rates apply or that have postage free privileges; to make the four cent a pound postage on specimen copies of publications subject to either the local delivery rate or the minimum rate, whichever is applicable, and to extend to certain cultural and technical publications the privileges now granted to newspapers and periodicals devoted to religion, the sciences or agriculture.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, the purposes of this resolution are threefold; first, to initiate legislation which if passed, and I hope it will be soon, will provide the Post Office Department with additional revenues by abolishing the local delivery rate, by establishing a minimum rate per piece, that is per copy piece, for other than daily, weekly or semi-weekly newspapers, and by making the per pound postage rate on specimen copies subject only to the minimum rate or to the local delivery rate. The second purpose is to extend to certain cultural and technical publications relating to fisheries, forestry and other fields the privileges now enjoyed by other periodicals devoted to religion, the sciences and agriculture. The third purpose is to abolish the local delivery rates on newspapers and periodicals published less frequently than weekly.

The first of these three recommendations is in line with recommendations made by the royal commission on government organization, the Glassco commission. The commissioners made certain recommendations that revenues be brought into line with expenditures.

The second and third objectives are to implement in part the recommendations of the O'Leary commission with respect to these publications.

Traditionally the Post Office Department has endeavoured over the years to break even in its operations while at the same time providing a satisfactory service at a reasonable cost to users of the mails. According to the accounting practices in use over the years, this goal would seem to have been achieved. If you look at the annual reports of the Post Office Department, even the one filed a few weeks ago, you will find that year after year there would appear to have been either a small surplus or a small deficit. In fact in the last 10 years you will find that five showed surpluses and five deficits.

Unfortunately the accounting system employed does not reflect the actual facts. A number of major services chargeable to postal operations are supplied by other departments. Chief among these is the cost of the accommodation provided by the Department of Public Works. In other words, the post office buildings and other so-called federal buildings that exist from one end of Canada to the other have been supplied free of charge, and even some of the services being used in these buildings are provided free of charge.

In addition, the superannuation account for postal employees has been a direct charge against the Department of Finance and not against the Post Office Department as such. This fact was brought out very clearly in the Glassco report. It is reliably estimated that after the inclusion of all interdepartmental credits and charges, including franking privileges and other things, the Post Office Department would have faced a net operating deficit in excess of approximately $37 million in the current fiscal year.

Steps have been taken by my predecessor and myself to adjust these charges where this could be done without legislation. However, the changes I have mentioned today, more particularly the one having to do with the abolition of the household or local delivery rate or, to put it colloquially, the abolition of the four cent rate, need the authority of parliament.

I should like to direct the attention of hon. members to the estimates for 1964-65 which were tabled by the Minister of Finance some weeks ago. I draw attention to page 351 where under the heading "Post Office" hon. members will see the following at the top of the page:

> Approximate value of major services not included in these estimates.
> Accommodation (provided by the Department of Public Works), $25,298,000.

The amount is slightly lower in 1964-65 than in the previous fiscal year.

> Accounting and cheque issue services (comptroller of the treasury), $584,300.
> Contributions to superannuation account (Department of Finance), $8,510,500.
> Employee surgical-medical insurance premiums (Department of Finance), $1,170,100.
> Employee compensation payments (Department of Labour), $261,900.

The next item is the carrying of franked mail. I am not referring to franked mail such as mail sent out by members of the House of Commons. I am referring to the mailing that is done by the Post Office Department itself which, if it did not have a franking privilege and was paying for the services it is getting, would involve an expenditure of another $1,008,000.

These amounts total $36,832,800. In addition to these amounts that are not included, and which have not been included in the estimates in the past, you will recall, Mr. Chairman, there were very substantial increases in wages and salaries to postal clerks, as part of the regular review, which increases were introduced in 1962 and made retroactive to a date in the previous year. They are carried into the estimates this year. They affect the estimates, but nevertheless when you are considering the position for the 12 months ending on March 31 they would distort the picture if they were not in the estimates.

When a deficit reaches the proportions it has in the case of the post office, a deficit that will be at least $37 million if we had not made any changes, it is a matter of grave and serious concern for all of us. If the post office is to operate within its revenues, as the royal commission suggested, we must not only continually examine our operating efficiency but we must continually study and up-date postal charges for the services being performed.

I believe there is general agreement that the postal service of Canada has established for itself and is maintaining a high reputation for efficiency in world postal service. This becomes more evident when one travels and has the opportunity to compare the postal services of other countries, even those of our neighbours to the south and those in western Europe.

A review of the Post Office Department services by the Glassco commission has produced a real tribute to the work of the department, as recorded at page 309 of volume III of the Glassco report:

> "The Post Office Department has attained a commendable degree of efficiency."

Improvements are continuing in the postal services and it has been my privilege to visit post offices in large and small centres. My first visit was to the post office in Quebec city, which is one of the two most modern in Canada. Quebec and Halifax are regarded as the two most modern, although some equipment has recently been put in the Winnipeg post office, which is still more modern, and which is being used on an experimental basis. From Quebec I went to the air mail post office in the airport at Montreal, and I have visited post offices in London, Ontario, in parts of New Brunswick and British Columbia.

I think I am a reasonably informed person and I must confess I was very impressed with the job being done in these post offices by the men performing the duties of postal clerks, and delivering the mail. However, great improvements are still needed. Automation is being introduced in practically every modern postal system in the world, and we should introduce more of it in Canada, if we are to meet the demands of the modern day and age, and if we are to keep costs under a reasonable amount of control.

The one thing that struck me, even within ten days of the time I assumed office as Postmaster General, was that the rising costs of new equipment and the rising costs of wages have to be taken care of by an increase in revenues. There is a serious discrepancy in our rate structure. Even before the Glassco commission made its report, Mrs. Fairclough, when she was postmaster general initiated a study to see how the rate structures stood in relation to the services being performed. The report from this study was laid before my predecessor and, before he had time to deal with it, it reached my desk.

In the meantime, certain minor adjustments that could be made by the postmaster general were implemented by my immediate predecessor, and others more recently by myself. For instance, we have increased charges for registered mail, special delivery letters and money orders. They were increased on November 1 last year and will produce $1,875,000.

The postage rates on third class mail, c.o.d. charges, and the mailing of newspapers and magazines, which took effect on April 1, likewise will bring in a substantial amount, some $6,265,000. But even with these two increases we are still short very close to $30 million in what we need to bring revenues in line with expenditures.

The first amendment that is proposed deals with what is called the local delivery rate, and it is estimated it will bring in some $8½ million per annum. I should point out that there are now two rates of postage on letters posted for delivery in Canada. When I say letters I mean first class letter mail, sealed letters as distinct from third class mail. There is a four cents rate for local delivery and a five cents rate for delivery anywhere else in Canada.

There was a great deal of merit in having these two rates when they were first introduced. The local delivery rate, as many of us will recall, was intended for letters that are posted and delivered in the same post office. In other words, a letter was placed in the post box, picked out, and put in a private box in the same local post office. In fact the rate for this service was in force even before confederation. Today, with the extension of metropolitan areas, this same four cents rate will cover the delivery of a letter perhaps 25 miles away, a letter that has moved by automobile or by rail, and has perhaps gone through half a dozen different hands.

If I may make a personal reference here, my hon. friend the member for New Westminster wired me congratulations the day I took office as Postmaster General, and drew attention to the fact that from north or west Vancouver you could mail a letter to one side of a certain road in New Westminster for four cents, but if you mailed it to the other side of the road it cost five cents. This just did not make sense. It just does not make sense, that a letter which is put into the mail has to be sorted, put in a bag, transported, then re-sorted at the other end before delivery should pay only four cents. In addition, we have rural delivery services and letter carrier services, particularly in the metropolitan areas, where most of the four cent stamps are used, and these additional services increase costs greatly. It is interesting to note that those who are getting most advantage from this four cent rate are commercial firms. I think they account for the use of 55 per cent or 60 per cent of the four cent service. In the light of the deficit of $37 million, these firms are not paying their way; they are being subsidized by the taxpayers generally. When these facts, collected in part while the previous government was in office, were brought to my attention I had no hesitation in recommending that the local four cent delivery rate be abolished and that we have one first class delivery rate, a five cent rate. That is the first recommendation contained in this resolution.

A second one is the extension of a special rate to certain cultural publications and to fisheries and forestry publications. This involves an adjustment in the second class mail rates which combines benefits to the publishing industry with a fairer distribution of the postal charges. The first benefit is represented by the proposal to extend to the publications devoted to the fisheries, forestry, arts, literature, and so on, the special rate of 1½ cents per pound which is now granted to publications devoted to religion, the sciences, agriculture and to extend this special rate to small weekly, semi-monthly and monthly publications with circulations under 10,000. I do not think any member of this committee would argue that a magazine devoted to forestry or fisheries should not be treated in the same way as a magazine devoted to the sciences or agriculture.

The O'Leary commission recommended free distribution privileges throughout Canada for the first 5,000 copies per issue of publications referred to as "non-profit cultural" and "little" magazines. I know that many members of this committee have gone into these recommendations in detail. I myself have made a study of them. You may recall that the report ties in this proposal with a test relating to advertising content. But how impracticable it would be if we were to make postal officials in all the different districts responsible for determining how much advertising material was contained in each of these publications. Determination of the profitability or otherwise of magazines is difficult enough even for chartered accountants, and I do not think an attempt should be made to pass that responsibility on to the Post Office Department. We have gone as far as we can in seeking to implement this recommendation of the O'Leary commission and we have done it in the way suggested in this resolution.

We also propose the repeal of the local second class postal rates. This proposal is also included in the resolution. The second benefit to the publishing industry is the repeal of the local second class mail rates for newspapers and perodicals published weekly or less frequently. The local second class rate is a piece rate. This does not apply to all the publications I have been referring to; but in some instances where charges are based on weight, we recover as little as one fortieth of a cent per piece. This is ridiculous today when so much of our work is taken up with the handling and distribution of mail. The largest part of the load carried by our postmen is made up frequently of mail for distribution of which the department receives from one fortieth of a cent up to half a cent. In other instances we were getting up to two cents. Now, by a recent change, we will be getting three cents. The charge today for such local deliveries is one cent for the first two ounces, one cent for the next two ounces and one cent for each succeeding four ounces or fraction thereof. These rates are imposed by weight—they are rates per pound—and as a result it is possible to deliver a Montreal newspaper in Winnipeg or Vancouver cheaper than one could deliver the same newspaper in Toronto. There is no sense in it. There should be a minimum rate applicable to each piece of mail rather than a poundage rate, and that is what is proposed in this measure.

The extension of this special low rate and the repeal of the local delivery rate will result in no great revenue to the post office. Actually it will mean a loss. We will lose about half a million dollars on this item, and recover some $450,000 from the introduction of a minimum rate per piece, so there is, in all, a loss of $50,000 or so to the post office. As it is, we are carrying this mail on a poundage basis, and until parliament gives us the right to make the change to which I have referred the anomalies that I have mentioned will continue. However, when the change is brought about it will have the effect of putting the operation as a whole upon a sounder basis. At the risk of repeating myself, I will point out that approximately 80 per cent of the costs incurred by the Post Office Department today are incurred in the handling of mail. The department has had to gear its operation to handle individual items as against bulk mail. We now wish to extend that minimum rate principle to certain kinds of second class mail.

I do not think there is much more I can say at this stage. I shall, of course, be glad to answer any questions which hon. members may raise.

Mr. McBain: At the outset, may I offer my congratulations to the Postmaster General on his new appointment. I hope he can avoid some of the pitfalls into which the former postmaster general fell, unless of course he has his eye on the vacant Senate seat in British Columbia. I may say we hope we may not lose the present Postmaster General because we feel he has the ability to do the work assigned to him if given the opportunity.

I should also like to pay tribute to the 50,000 persons who are responsible each day for seeing that the mail is delivered in good condition and on time. I believe the employees in this department of government are a dedicated group whose devotion to duty is the foundation of the Canadian postal service. It is a devotion of which Canadians can be justly proud. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, no doubt there has also been a certain amount of frustration in the operations of the postal department for it has had two postmasters general within the past 12 months. The report of the postmaster general for the year ending March 31, 1963 was tabled on Friday, April 3, 1964. The Postmaster General has already made reference to this report. There was some discussion a number of days ago in the house concerning this report when I asked the Postmaster General a question and pointed out that the report contained a letter addressed to His Excellency Major General Georges P. Vanier, Governor General of Canada, signed by the present Postmaster General under date of September 1, 1963.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the hon. member, if he would permit an interjection at this stage, I would say that that date was put on the stencil after I signed it, and it was corrected as soon as I noticed it. Also, the detailed answer to the hon. gentleman's question has been prepared and will be given on Monday.

Mr. McBain: I appreciate that reply from the Postmaster General, Mr. Chairman, but would point out that there must have been considerable confusion within the department or these errors in the original report would not have occurred. I am also concerned about this, that while this report was ready last September 1, it was not tabled until April 3, 1964. Perhaps the Postmaster General can explain that at a later date. While I am dealing with this report, I wonder whether the Postmaster General will table the revised report—perhaps he has already done this—so that the sessional paper will be correct in its entirety.

The resolution before us deals with the elimination of the local delivery rate for first class mail and makes reference to certain other changes relative to mail other than first class. My understanding is that the only portion of this resolution to which parliament has to give approval is the increase of the local delivery rate on first class mail from four cents to five cents. I think the Postmaster General pointed out that this rate has been in effect since confederation; that is, the rate for local delivery mail has been less than the rate for mail outside local delivery since confederation. To me it would seem that the local delivery mail rate should still have a preference over the rate for mail delivered outside the local area.

In his presentation the minister mentioned the fact that in the city of Toronto this mail may have to go through a number of hands before delivery in that area, but I still fail to see why it would cost any more in the Toronto area. I think it would cost less to deliver in the local area than some piece of mail delivered from Toronto to his own city of Vancouver. I understand, also, that the other increases mentioned in the resolution went into effect or could have been imposed as of April 1 without the consent of parliament. If this is correct, one wonders why all these other changes were included in the resolution.

The last increase in local first class mail rates occurred in 1954 when the Liberal government of that day, after removing the excise tax on cheques previous to the 1953 election, imposed a one cent increase to offset the loss from the revenue on the tax on cheques. Prior to that increase the first class letter rate for local delivery was three cents, and at that time it was increased to four cents. The previous four cents rate for mail delivered outside the local post office was increased to five cents. The previous increase was, I believe, back in 1942, so it appears that every ten years or more the Post Office Department finds it necessary to increase the rate on first class mail. The 1954 resolution was very clear and concise. It read as follows:

> That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to increase the rates of postage on letters posted in Canada from the 1st day of April, 1954.

Then it goes on to say:

> (a) on each letter for delivery within the postal area in which it is posted, from three cents to four cents for the first ounce or fraction of an ounce, and from one cent to two cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce—

Part (b) of the resolution dealt with the increase from four cents to five cents. The resolution we are asked to approve today is, to my mind, a jumbled-up affair. The first three lines of this resolution read as follows:

> That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rates for first class mail and for all newspapers and periodicals other than those published more frequently than weekly—

I suggest, therefore, that if we accept this resolution in its present form it means that first class rates for local mail are completely abolished and there can be no more first class local mail delivery. I would hope, therefore, that the Postmaster General will give serious consideration to withdrawing this resolution and introducing a new resolution in a more concise form, similar to the one introduced in 1954 when first class mail rates were increased.

I believe the figures the Postmaster General was using in his remarks today were those for the year 1963; that is to say, the fiscal year ending March 31, 1964. Of course, he is the only one who has access to those figures. The figures I will be using are taken from the 1963 report of the Postmaster General. This report shows a surplus of some $3½ million. We must consider that this surplus was obtained under the very capable leadership of the former postmaster general, Hon. Ellen Fairclough.

One also wonders why local mail was selected as the target on which to raise revenue for the postal department. Whom will this increase affect? First of all, it will increase to some extent the cost of living, for it is the small businessman and individual who will suffer the most under the increase. Local businessmen make great use of first class local delivery mail for mailing information to their customers, monthly bills, and so on. Again, Mr. Chairman, I wonder why local delivery mail was selected as the target to be increased, because the Postmaster General's report shows a general increase in first class mail in the years 1961-62 and 1962-63. The increase for the 1962-63 fiscal year was $115,899.87, while fourth class mail for the same year showed a decrease in revenue of $40,900.45. There is an item showing loss from theft and fire amounting to $38,646. We hope the Postmaster General will be able to tell us, before this resolution is passed, what is the loss by theft up to the present time.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I can answer that question very quickly. Our losses are limited to $100 per package, regardless of how much is involved.

Mr. McBain: I am very pleased that the Postmaster General has answered the question in that way, but we would also like information as to what has been the loss from thefts which have occurred within the last six weeks or so. In recent weeks questions have been asked of the Postmaster General regarding mail thefts occurring in the Montreal and Three Rivers areas, and the minister has been quite vague in his replies as to the amount of money stolen. I am wondering whether he is withholding this information. Is he afraid to divulge the actual amount involved, for by not doing so he raises the suspicion that the amounts are very large, possibly the largest of any mail robbery yet perpetrated in Canada. I have been waiting for a reply to a question asked on Friday, April 10. This question, as reported on page 2033 of Hansard, is as follows:

> I wonder if the minister is able to give us any additional information regarding the unprecedented robberies from mail vans in the Montreal and Three Rivers areas. Can he assure the committee that mail clerks are now being given adequate protection, and are armoured express trucks now being used to carry large sums of money? If that is the case, is this being done only in Quebec or is the practice being followed in other parts of Canada as well?

The Postmaster General has made a reference to the increase being necessary in order to meet pay increases for postal employees. I do not think anybody would suggest that the employees should not have a generous increase, for many of these employees have been waiting a considerable length of time for this increase to come through; I for one believe that they are very deserving because of the nature of their work. However, the Post Office Department is not the only department of government which has had to face increases in salaries. I do not recall in any other instance that a department has been told it must produce sufficient revenue to pay for salary increases and changing working conditions. The Post Office Department is the only department producing revenue in this way, and apparently the public users of postal facilities are to be saddled with the increased costs.

The Postmaster General mentioned that the Department of Public Works supplies accommodation to post offices all across Canada. In many instances that is quite correct, but I am thinking of a revenue post office where the local postmaster is required to provide his own accommodation. The Department of Public Works supplies accommodation to most of the other government departments, and they are not expected to raise revenues within their departments to meet the cost of these accommodations.

Going back to the increase in mail, I am sure that many postmasters in their own post offices have been deluged with mail coming through which should now carry a three cent stamp. I am referring to unsealed letters containing printed matter. I know that the local postmaster in my area has been deluged with this type of mail. The senders of the mail are not quite familiar with the new regulations and are still sending this mail out addressed to the receiver under a 2 cent stamp. In the interests of efficiency and expediency in handling the mail the postmaster of the local post office attaches a card and expects the receiver of the mail to pay an additional 2 cents. When these increases come into effect I wonder if something could be arranged to provide more adequate information to the senders of this type of mail, so that they are informed of the proper postage. I know it becomes embarrassing to them as well as to their customers to whom the mail is sent.

I was pleased to hear the minister say that the rural weeklies are still going to receive certain facilities along the line of the postage rates they have enjoyed over a number of years. I feel that these rural weeklies are providing a service to the areas interested and should naturally be given some consideration in mailing rates.

There is one other matter before I take my seat, Mr. Chairman. I note that a new stamp issue carries a flag bearing three maple leaves on stems with a white background and a blue bar at each end. I hope the Postmaster General can inform us what this depicts. Does it represent a kite-flying activity on behalf of the Prime Minister for his design of a new flag for Canada? I will close my remarks at this point, Mr. Chairman, and I hope that some of these questions I have posed to the Postmaster General will be answered in the course of the debate.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, normally one might expect the minister to wait until comments have been made by other members, but in case other hon. members in the house might fall into error by statements made, in good faith, by the previous hon. member I think some of his statements should be corrected. Before making these corrections I should like to thank the hon. member most sincerely for his complimentary references to myself and, more particularly, for the well justified complimentary references to the nearly 50,000 employees of my department.

The hon. gentleman is in error when he says that the only part of this legislation which has to be approved by parliament is the abolition of the local delivery rates. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he reads sections 11 and 12 of the act he will see that every single item in this resolution needs the authority of parliament before it can be put into effect. The hon. member need only read section 11, which deals with mailing charges for newspapers and periodicals, to see most of these items. If he reads the resolution he will see the first part of it is confined to first class mail that is the abolition of the local delivery rate; but the second part deals with the establishment of a minimum rate of one half cent per copy to each separate address for all publications other than those to which local delivery rates apply, or which have postage-free privileges, and that necessitates a change in the act. The third part of the resolution concerns the 4 cent a pound rate on specimen copies of publications and is tied in with an existing section of the act, section 12.

The last part of the resolution, which deals with the minimum rate for cultural and technical publications, is again tied in with a specific subsection of the act, section 11(3). So that all three of the other amendments I mentioned necessitate legislation before they can be put into effect, that is before the fisheries, forestry and other publications can take advantage of the suggestions which have been made, and before minimum charges for handling certain items can be taken advantage of.

Mr. McBain: Mr. Chairman, may I inform the Postmaster General that I was using information contained in a press release under date March 7. It appeared in my local paper, the Times-Journal, and referred to the fact that a post office spokesman had said that the changes are expected to raise $8.5 million per year. I assume this news release came from the office of the Postmaster General or from his department, and it outlines more or less that the only change which need take place is the increase from 4 to 5 cents.

[Mr. McBain.]

Mr. Nicholson: Let me assure the hon. member that I saw the press release which went out and it dealt with more than the abolition of the local delivery rates. The one which caught the eye of people in the cities and towns was undoubtedly the abolition of local delivery rate, because such people were not as interested in publications dealing with forestry, fisheries, agriculture and similar matters.

Another matter which I might deal with, to save time later on, is this. I mentioned that it was estimated that the abolition of the local delivery rates would bring in an increase in revenues of roughly $8.5 million. The hon. member for Elgin suggested that this should not be done, that there might be some other way to bring the two things into balance. Might I point out to the house that the post office handles some 12 or 13 million pieces of mail per day, roughly two thirds of which is first class mail. All we are trying to do in this resolution is to make each class of mail pay its own way. First class mail is today not paying its way. If we increase our revenues $8.5 million for handling nearly 60 per cent of over four billion pieces of mail a year, we are not going to add greatly to the load on this particular class. There is no other source of revenue from which to obtain this amount unless the hon. member wants to advocate the abolition of free mailing privileges for newspapers in rural areas. We could do something there. However, I do not believe that would be politically palatable to members on either side of the house.

If you are going to get any real help it has to come from the first class mail. When you consider there has been no change in rates for ten years, despite the extension of services in rural areas, the extension of walks and everything else, I think this is a modest increase.

Mr. McBain: Does the Postmaster General suggest that the figures I have taken from the 1962-63 report which show first class mail as having a balance over the deficit are not correct?

Mr. Nicholson: I know the hon. member was listening, but he may have been working on his notes. If he had heard my figures he would see that there are some $37 million worth of genuine expenses of the postal department that are not included in the 1963 figures and which should have been included. Perhaps I, as Postmaster General, in view of the delay in filing the report to which the hon. gentleman has referred, might have disregarded the whole report. This report was prepared early in the year 1963. It reached the deputy minister, as the report indicates, some time in April or May of last year. Eventually, it was sent to my immediate predecessor, but he did not sign it at that time. It had been addressed to him in good faith, and all I had to do was transmit to His Excellency the Governor General a report that had been addressed to the previous minister. I did not think it was for me, particularly since a year had gone by, to change the figures in that report.

I can assure you that when the estimates for 1964 were being prepared I saw to it that these additional figures were given for the information of the members of this house. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Elgin, and perhaps other members, may have been misled. I am sure that if the other figures were considered and it was realized that first class mail, by itself, is 53 per cent, and if you take parcel post along with it, it brings it up to over 55 per cent, and there are certain other first class items that bring the figures up between 55 per cent and 60 per cent, it would be clear that if you are going to get your proportionate share of the $37 million deficit the only way to get it is by changing the delivery rates on first class mail.

I might say that I am relying on the information of the experts, and our figures show the average rate for handling first class mail is more than four cents per piece, and, while I would concede at the outset that it costs more to deliver a letter in Ottawa, Vancouver or Winnipeg, I think all members will agree that a charge of four cents to deliver a letter from any part of downtown Toronto anywhere in greater Toronto in the metropolitan area, is too small. I have been shown that a 4 cent delivery rate is not adequate to take care of the situation. There is no thought on the part of the postal department of having first class mail pay more than its fair share of operating expenses of the department. The same statement would apply to third class mail. The mail users of third class mail are largely commercial users and advertising people. The bulk of the users of first class mail in Canada, and this can be detected through the metering machines, are the people who use the mails for commercial purposes.

The Chairman: It seems to me we are not going at this in the proper way. I feel we should give every opportunity for the making of opening statements on this resolution. Perhaps questions might be asked of the minister later on, and just now I should like to see the hon. member for Danforth.

Mr. Scott: In rising to comment on the resolution stage of this measure, I should like to join the previous speaker in extending the congratulations of our party to the minister upon his appointment. Many of us have had occasion to deal with him since his appointment and we have been impressed by his ability and his desire to improve the status of his department.

I recall that last year when the estimates of this department were before us, under his predecessor, I referred to working conditions and labour conditions under which the employees of this department operate. I do not intend to review my position at that time on this resolution because I would be out of order if I did. I merely mention it because I wanted to indicate to the minister that since that time we have amassed considerable information relating to labour conditions and working conditions of employees of the postal department. When his estimates come before us, we will be looking to him for a fairly detailed statement of his intention, programs and policies to be inaugurated to alleviate the revolting working conditions within the post office itself. The minister has only been in office a short time, but I am sure he is cognizant of these conditions. We shall be looking to him, when his estimates come before us.

Dealing with the proposals before us now, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the members of my party will deal with various aspects of the resolution and I shall deal with only one portion which relates to the proposal to increase local rates by 25 per cent, that is from 4 cents to 5 cents.

I wanted to indicate to the minister that unless a great deal more information is available to convince us otherwise, we intend to oppose this as vigorously as possible during its passage through the house. The reason advanced for the increase is that it will increase revenues, for one thing. The minister has read to us a statement of some of the unseen expenses, buildings and other services made available to the post office, which indicate the cost, over and above the figure we have been given of $36 million. I presume the increase is intended, in some way, to meet this unseen deficit.

However, sir, the other reason advanced, as I understand it, is that it will help the minister in drawing the boundaries for local mail. His remedy is that instead of trying to draw boundaries he will make everybody pay 5 cents, and presumably that will be the simplest solution. I believe, Mr. Chairman, very few people will agree. The evidence that we are able to obtain indicates that first class mail already shows a profit. The figures made available to us, for example, for 1959 indicate that first class mail showed a profit of $35 million. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if these figures are accurate, then first class mail today is not only showing a profit but is showing a sufficient profit to almost equal the unseen costs the minister outlined to the house.

This proposal is borne out in the Glassco commission report, the third edition, page 324, where it says:

> The most significant facts emerging from the above table are that first class mail is shown to yield a profit sufficient to carry all the other services and produce an approximate break-even.

If these facts are true it seems to me that in any attempt to deal with costs and deficits in the post office we should be leaving alone any classification of mail which is paying its own way and which in fact is already showing a substantial profit. It appears that the real deficit is when you get into the area of second class mail. Again the 1959 figures that are available to us indicate that this class of mail showed a loss of $26 million. Mr. Chairman, these are newspapers and periodicals that are well able to pay the freight and carry their own expenses. I really cannot understand why the users of first class mail should bear on their backs the burden of the unprofitability of second class mail.

From recent figures we understand that first class mail is carried at a profit of 1.8 cents a piece, second class transient mail shows a loss of 10 cents per piece and newspapers a loss of 4 cents per piece. What I would be interested in hearing is some explanation from the government for this subsidy to the newspaper industry. I really do not understand why this particular preference is given.

I recall that when this item was drawn to our attention by the Auditor General in the public accounts committee last year and we asked him why there was this subsidy of millions of dollars to newspapers and periodicals he smiled, and the only thing he could say was, "Well, this is the way it has always been done"; but no rational reason, no economic justification, could be given. Therefore as this legislation goes through the house we will be looking to the minister to convince us, if he can, that we should withdraw our opposition, because at the present moment it seems to me that if the people who use first class mail are paying a rate which shows a handsome profit they should not be further burdened by granting an even greater subsidy to newspapers and other publications.

Again referring to the Glassco commission, Mr. Chairman, they attempted to analyse this problem, and as found on page 326 they state the following with regard to this type of special treatment:

> It dates from the early part of the last century when the general level of literacy improved to a point where mass media had an audience. In response to the public demand for current news, and because newspapers and magazines were the only means of reaching the public on a broad scale, governments adopted a policy of subsidizing the costs of distribution.

They go on to say:

> Today, the situation is vastly different. Other media of mass communication have developed and the underwriting of publication costs by advertisers has substantially altered the economics of publishing. Publications have grown enormously in bulk in the past 100 years—the four page newspaper of the last century appears today with mammoth editions of over 100 pages—and the costs of the post office have necessarily increased very materially.

They go on to point out this interesting fact:

> The advertiser, responsible for from 40 to 70 per cent of the content of many present day publications (90 per cent was noted in one case), has become a beneficiary of the government's policy of subsidizing distribution of second class mail.

They say they cannot go into the area of public policy in this regard but they do make this recommendation:

> An annual grant be made by parliament in amount sufficient to cover the costs of the post office in handling second class mail, to the extent that such exceeds postal revenues arising from the rates set by parliament.

In short, they are urging us to withdraw this subsidy or in the alternative to bring it above board. They are saying that the government, rather than loading this cost on the backs of the first class mail users in order to justify this subsidization of the periodical and newspaper industry, should frankly admit it and put a specific amount in the estimates to cover it, rather than trying to hide it among the estimates of the department.

There is anoher aspect of this matter on which I should like the minister to comment. It arises from the avalanche of American mail coming into Canada for which our post office receives no compensation. The Postmaster General, in reply to a question asked by a member of our party, indicated that during 1961 and 1962 the deficit for handling second class mail from the United States addressed to people in Canada was $3,900,000. According to the royal commission on publications, Canada's loss on second class mail from the United States in 1960 was approximately $6 million on publications alone. How much it was for other printed matter was not stated.

It is estimated that in 1962 Canada imported printed matter to the value of $300 million, at least 85 per cent of which originated in the United States. To my knowledge there is no other comparison in the world for this relationship between two countries. We in Canada absorb 35 times more printed imports per capita than does the United States. This has occasioned grave concern, for example, in the graphic arts industry. In one of their bulletins they point out the huge flow of printed imports year after year represented by incoming second and third class mail from the United States delivered without any remuneration by our Canadian post office. All postal revenue for this material goes to Washington because of the universal postal convention which compels us to carry United States mail without compensation. Since the flow from Canada to the United States is in no way comparable, our post office is saddled with a daily mounting debt in this regard.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is good cause for a re-examination of the relationship between Canada and the United States in this regard. I understand, for example, that the loss incurred by our post office on Time and Reader's Digest is $1,400,000 a year. To me it is incredible that we should be in the position of distributing these fantastically wealthy publications and carrying them in our mails at a loss. These are only a few of the points that I—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock and in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business it is my duty to now leave the chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock p.m. the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, papers.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MAPS SHOWING ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue) moved:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all maps, drawn up or deposited with the chief electoral officer or the representation commissioner, pertaining to the proposed redistribution of electoral boundaries in Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I make it quite clear at the outset that the purpose of this motion is to procure all the information which, in my view, hon. members need in order to examine and intelligently discuss Bill C-72, which is already before the house. I wish to make it equally clear that in presenting the motion I do so without any desire whatever of casting doubt or criticism upon the work that is being performed in this regard by the representation commissioner who, I know, enjoys the full confidence of members on both sides of the house.

If these maps are being drawn up, they are being drawn up in accordance with a statute passed by this parliament. The necessity for hon. members to have access to them is, first, to put an end to rumours that have circulated widely in the house and outside it with regard to what the maps really are, what they portend to be, and how the different electoral constituencies are being carved up.

It could be that some hon. members have seen the maps. I have nothing to say on that. Personally I can say I have not seen them, but among hon. members who have seen them there has been great discussion regarding the new boundaries. We must remember that if Bill C-72 becomes the law of the land it will be initiating something very new. It will not only be a redistribution but a real revision of every electoral district in Canada, carried out in a manner different from that used in the past, namely by the appointment of independent, provincial commissions.

The importance of having the maps is to be able to decide exactly whether or not the proposal contained in clause 13 of Bill C-72, which stipulates a tolerance of 20 per cent from the provincial average of population, is a reasonable proposition. How can that be done without having access to maps, whether they be definite or hypothetical, complete or fragmentary? At least they are maps which will give hon. members some indication how the constituencies will look if this 20 per cent tolerance is adopted.

Another reason for my insistence upon this motion is to put an end to the aura of speculation and rumour under which the proposed redistribution is couched. I understand that at the moment there are three sets of maps, each made up with a different tolerance or margin, upwards or downwards from the average. I am told one is set up with a proposed tolerance of 10 per cent, another with a tolerance of 20 per cent, and a third with a tolerance of 30 per cent or 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would permit me to interrupt him at this point to recall that I gave an answer to this question in the house. He may not have been present when I did so, but it was a definite answer from the representation commissioner, who said he had prepared rough drawings on a 10 per cent and on a 20 per cent tolerance, and was in the course of preparing another series on a 25 per cent tolerance. We do not need to rely on rumour on this particular point.

Mr. Martineau: I thank the minister for his information.

Mr. Pickersgill: The information was given to the house four or five days ago.

Mr. Martineau: It is new information so far as I am concerned because, unfortunately, I was absent and did not hear the words of wisdom of the minister on that occasion. But his intervention only sets out in clear light the necessity to have these maps produced. Surely if we are to decide whether we should have a 10 per cent, 20 per cent or 25 per cent tolerance, we should be able to see them?

When has a court ever deprived a jury or itself of the means of getting information pertinent to a subject? This is what I am seeking at present—information pertinent to the redistribution bill. From what the minister has said today, and from what he said on a previous occasion, we know there are two sets already drawn up and a third one is being prepared.

The tolerance can be applied in many different ways in each individual constituency. In other words, you could chop off the north end of a constituency and add something to its south end, or take away from its east side and add to its west side. To give a concrete example I mention my own constituency of Pontiac-Témiscamingue. Geographically it is one of the more extended constituencies in the country. It is also one that comes far below the required minimum of population proposed by Bill C-72. Its population is about 41,000, and the average constituency population in Quebec will be something like 70,000. If we take a tolerance margin of 20 per cent this means that constituencies in Quebec should have a minimum of 56,000 population and a maximum of 84,000.

There is another factor with regard to Pontiac-Témiscamingue that I wish to mention, namely that it is made up of two counties which are different from the counties in most constituencies. They are separated by forest or bushland some 200 miles in length and breadth, which means that two counties really have no direct contact between them. One part is a northern county, so far as the province is concerned, and the other is a western county, with this large tract of woodland in between with no inhabitants in it.

One would think that the logical way to deal with such a situation would be to attach the northern end of the county of Témiscamingue to the constituency of my hon. friend from Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), who at one stage represented the county of Pontiac, and to attach the lower end to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but I am sure he will recognize the very narrow limits of this debate. The only question before the house is whether or not the documents in question should be produced. May I quote to the house a ruling in this regard made by Mr. Speaker Michener during a debate on February 8, 1962. It will be found reported on page 682 of Hansard of that year. He said:

> Before the hon. member proceeds further with that line of argument I think I should say to him that my view of the scope of the motion is that it is limited to the desirability of the production of the documents. The motion is one calling on the government to produce the documents referred to in the motion and the question in issue is whether or not they should be produced.

May I go on to read what was said by Mr. Speaker Lambert on November 18, 1962, as reported on page 1427 of Hansard of that year. Mr. Speaker Lambert said:

> I should like to draw attention to the very narrow limits of the debate at this point. The matter under debate is merely whether the documents should or should not be produced, not whether under a certain act, something could or could not be done.

I am sure the hon. member recognizes the narrow limits of the motion before the house and I would suggest he confine his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Martineau: Thank you very much. I do indeed recognize the soundness of the ruling you have just made, and if I have referred to constituencies, to my own constituency in particular, it is in order to show why it is desirable that these maps should be before us. It was to show that if a certain tolerance is adopted, you have a constituency with a certain appearance; if another tolerance is adopted, the constituency has a different appearance. At a later date, the committee of the whole house will have to decide whether or not the tolerance of 20 per cent which was proposed is the best which could have been chosen, and it would be infinitely better I think if the committee in carrying out this task could have the maps before it. That is why I am quoting the example of the constituency of Pontiac-Témiscamingue where one set of maps would for instance, bring the town of Rouyn into the constituency and another set might bring in a large section of the constituency of Gatineau. I think that is pertinent information for the committee to have in its possession before reaching conclusions about certain aspects of this bill.

The purpose of this motion is to provide for members of this house the fullest possible information on a question which is of vital interest to them and to the country. I am asking for the production of this material so that hon. members, as legislators, may be sure that Bill No. C-72, to which I presume the house will give its attention again in due course, is a proper solution to the redistribution problem. That is the only reason. To summarize—I see I do not have many minutes left—let me say I think it will be useful for the house to have these maps, first in order to put an end to a plethora of rumours and, second, so that members may have before them in diagramatic and vivid form material on the basis of which they can better decide whether or not clause 13, as drafted at present, is acceptable and fair to all concerned as the basis for redistribution and as a basis, also, for the work of the commissions which are to be appointed. When the maps are before the committee it can determine whether or not due regard is being given in the legislative proposal to the immense geographical and territorial differences which exist between some constituencies and others. If, with the maps before them, members of the committee can see that what is being proposed is absolutely unrealistic and incapable of being performed satisfactorily, they may then decide on some other course, some other tolerance, or some other way in which to act so as to give adequate representation to all sectors and to all people in Canada. If the maps reveal that because of very large territorial differences, because of physical obstacles, because of a large number of hamlets spread out over immense areas, hon. members who will be called upon to represent such constituencies would find themselves faced with a completely hopeless task, I say it will be the duty of the committee at that stage to decide on some other course in order to ensure to Canadians the best possible representation.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The motion seeks to compel the representation commissioner to produce certain documents which the other day, in response to a request from the other side of the house, I informed hon. members were in existence. I also informed the house that those documents were, virtually, mathematical exercises which could not conceivably bear any relationship to the ultimate disposition of the problem which will come before commissions which have as yet not even been created and which, if the legislation we are considering in another context is adopted, will require the exercise of the independent judgment of independent persons.

So what the motion is asking for is something which has no relationship whatsoever, except as an exercise in map drawing, to what will eventually emerge, if there is any disposition on the part of this parliament to deal with this problem and to deal with it in any reasonable time. Because the house is being asked to produce documents prepared by an officer of parliament I wish to make it clear at once that there is no question of confidence in the government involved in this matter. The house has a perfect right to ask its officers to produce any documents it wishes, and in speaking today I am speaking only as one of the members of this house. However, I hope that the reasons I am about to give for opposing this motion—and I certainly intend to vote against it—will commend themselves to every member, and that I may convince the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) of the unwisdom of having made this suggestion and of the wisdom of withdrawing it without putting the motion to the house at all.

I intend to deal seriatim with the points the hon. gentleman made. He said the purpose of this motion was to permit hon. members to discuss the bill intelligently by procuring the information they needed. I contest that point directly. I say that exercises which will assist the commission, when commissions are set up, constitute the kind of information which would only serve to confuse and obscure the issues, possibly not among members in this house, but certainly among the public. I say this because we all know that when pictures and diagrams are published in daily newspapers, which most people do not read very carefully, an impression is bound to be created that something definite has been decided when, in fact, nothing definite has been produced. As for hon. members being able to consider this subject more intelligently, an offer was made, through my mouth, by the representation commissioner, to all parties in the house that they could choose a few of their members to look at these maps and have them thoroughly explained by people competent to do so in order that they would know exactly what they were and what they were not, and could exercise their intelligence on them. So there is no suggestion on the part of the representation commissioner of concealment. Moreover, the hon. gentleman was careful to say and, I am sure, most sincerely, that he had the utmost confidence in the representation commissioner. It is the view of the representation commissioner who, after all, is the only person with any experience of having these maps produced, that publication of them would result in confusion and the misleading of the public.

As to the suggestion of putting an end to rumour, I suggest there are no rumours about these maps whatsoever which have not been created by some hon. members or by some other hon. members—and I am making no imputations on anyone. But there could be no rumours unless they had been started by ourselves. Moreover, a means of dispelling these rumours has already been recommended to the house. They could easily be dispelled, and I have a very strong impression that they do not exist outside the house at all. In fact, I think we take ourselves a lot too seriously about this matter. The rest of the public is not concerned, in the way we are, as members, about the size and shape of our constituencies, and when we express all this vast concern about the size and shape of our constituencies I suggest we are thinking of ourselves, not of the public, and that we should remember that no matter what the size and shape of one's constituency may be there can only be Canadian citizens in it as voters, that if we do not have enough appeal to them we shall not be elected, and if we do have sufficient appeal then, regardless of the boundaries, our constituents are going to elect us.

I suggest we are displaying a somewhat vain posture when we show too large a concern about the shape or size of our constituencies or talk about how desperately disappointed our constituents will be if they happen to be represented by somebody else, whereas, in fact—and I am sorry to have to say this—most of them do not care a great deal. They want to be represented in the house, and they want to be represented fairly in the house. In that context, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue of this point. He said that in Quebec, with a 20 per cent tolerance the smallest constituency would have a population of 56,000, and the largest a population of 84,000. If you had any constituency with less than 56,000, it means you must have another one somewhere else with more than 84,000; and this is something that sometimes seems to be forgotten. I do not know why it should be thought that some constituencies should have a population of 90,000, so that some other hon. member will only have to represent 50,000. I suggest this is, again, thinking of one's own interest more than the public interest. I will not continue with that theme, Mr. Speaker, because you will be calling me to order; this is perhaps only indirectly related to the question of the publication of the maps.

The best reason the hon. member gave for not producing these maps was that the tolerance could be applied in many different ways—and so it can. Therefore, if these maps were published, where the tolerance has necessarily to be applied in one particular way, it would be bound to create a false impression because almost certainly the commissioners, if they do their job properly the way we expect them to do it, will not accept any of these maps but will use their own judgment. Otherwise we are wasting our time; otherwise we might just as well tell the representation commissioner to do the whole job himself.

If we are going to set up commissions that are not going to exercise an independent judgment, we are wasting public money by suggesting it; and I do not think we are, because I do not think the representation commissioner by himself could do the job, and I do not think he should do it. I do not think it should be done by any one man. I think it does require a proper consideration of geographical, historical and other factors that cannot be in the knowledge of the kind of people who would draw the original drafts here in Ottawa in some office. It will have to be subjected to all those practical considerations that we expect the commissions to weigh and which it will take at least a year to do. There is only one thing that can happen if these maps are made public; that is to create all kinds of false impressions and rumours beside which any rumours that exist now will hardly be noticeable.

In other words, it is hard to believe that any hon. member could seriously support this motion unless he was anxious to create in the public mind a false impression, instead of a true impression, of what was being done.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. minister is not beginning to impute motives.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no; I merely—

Mr. Martineau: If he reflects a little on his last sentence, I think he will realize that no other inference can be drawn.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is an old adage about the cap fitting, sir. I did not impute motives to any individual member of the house at all; I just said I feel that any hon. member who would, on reflection, after hearing these arguments, still support this motion would, I think, be seeking to mislead the public—

Mr. Martineau: Such modesty.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and create false impressions. The hon. member said we ought to see these maps because we are the jury. That, sir, is another very, very unsound—

Mr. Martineau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; I did not say we ought to see these maps because we are the jury; I simply used the example of a court and a jury. Before making any decision, the members have the right to have full access to all pertinent information. I do not see why the minister should persist, on the one hand, in—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, may I finish stating my question of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: This is not a question of privilege; it is just taking up my time.

Mr. Martineau: I am speaking on a question of privilege. I say that the minister, on one hand, is insisting on imputing motives. He said, "If the cap fits, let him wear it". I happen to be the sponsor of the motion, so it is reasonable to assume that I support the motion. But the minister always comes around to some argument imputing motives, on the one hand, and on the other hand twists the words that are used. I reject his imputation on both grounds.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows there is no question of privilege at all there. He may feel he has been misquoted by the minister; but he has an opportunity later in the debate to straighten out the facts or to explain what he said. However, that is certainly not a question of privilege.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to raise a question of privilege, a phony one, about the motives just imputed to me by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Martineau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Martineau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The minister has just again stated that this was a phony question of privilege—

Mr. Pickersgill: So did the Speaker.

Mr. Martineau: —and he is thereby imputing motives. I submit that I raised the question of privilege frankly and in a sincere way, to set the record straight.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must rule, again, that there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Martineau: Surely, Mr. Speaker, you are not going to condone the minister making the charge that I put forward a phony question of privilege? Perhaps it was not an acceptable question of privilege, but it cannot be phony, because I raised it in good faith.

Mr. Pickersgill: A lot of phony things have happened in good faith, as all of us know.

Mr. Martineau: But "phony" has a particular connotation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was rising to say that I was not going to raise any kind of question of privilege about the motives just imputed to me by the hon. gentleman, because so many motives have been imputed to me in this house from that side that we would have nothing but questions of privilege if I was as thin skinned as hon. gentlemen opposite seem to be—but happily, I am not. The hon. gentleman did use the word "jury" and he used it in precisely the sense that he rose on his so-called question of privilege to define. He said that we needed this information in order to exercise our judgment as legislators.

Mr. Martineau: That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: We do not need this information in order to exercise our judgment as legislators, at all. What we decided by a vote of this house, by a unanimous vote of this house, was that we were not going to exercise our judgment as legislators about the shape and size of the constituencies, beyond fixing the tolerance. That is what we decided when we accepted the second reading of this bill. We decided we were going to appoint independent juries to look at the maps and to make recommendations. Therefore I contend that it is none of our business at all to see these maps until the work has been done, and that in effect to see these maps is really an attempt to make a gerrymander by the back door.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: When I have concluded. I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman when he was making his remarks, and I would like to conclude mine. I say that the suggestion that we should concern ourselves about the work of the commissions is to do precisely what the right hon. gentleman who sits opposite now condemned so strongly in 1951 and 1950 in this house. We would be trying to interfere with the process that we decided upon by a unanimous vote to give to somebody else. That would be the effect of trying to do it in this back-handed fashion. We would be trying to bring in a gerrymander by the back door. That is precisely why I think this motion should be defeated. I would be happy if it could be withdrawn, realizing what we would be doing after deciding not to have a political redistribution, after deciding to have it done openly in the house. We should not try to do it in an indirect fashion by devices of this kind.

I think that is the strongest of all the reasons why this motion should be rejected. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that if the maps were published—I do not think it would be a very serious thing if every hon. member of the house examined them—it would be a very serious interference with the work that we entrusted, by act of parliament, to the representation commissioner, whom we appointed by act of parliament. If these maps were published, my own opinion is that no amount of explanation that they did not represent what the ultimate results would be would ever catch up with the maps, and impressions would be created all over this country that this was all arranged already, when it has not been at all; and the possibility of having a fair and independent redistribution by commissions which would be appointed as the result of legislation passed by this parliament would be destroyed.

I had hoped that when we set our hands to this task and did it in the non-partisan spirit of taking this whole business out of politics and keeping it out of politics, we would go through with it and not start faltering half way. I do not impute any motives to the hon. gentleman; I just impute a certain lack of reflection, a certain lack of consideration, a certain lack of judgment, shall we say, that we normally expect from him and normally do get from him, because he is one of the more sagacious members of the house in matters that are perhaps not of such direct concern to him as this. But I do say again that the publication of these maps will not end rumours. It will start more rumours and create more false impressions. The hon. gentleman said he wanted to get the facts before us. There are no facts at all in these maps, because they will bear no relationship, except purely accidentally, if they do at all, to what will eventually result from a proper redistribution if we pass the kind of legislation we are now debating in this house. All they could possibly do is make confusion worse confounded.

Therefore it seems to me that if we are sincere and honest in our desire to end gerrymandering for good and to take out of partisan politics the redistribution of the representation in this house, we will reject every kind of device which will make that more difficult. I feel sure that production of these maps would have that effect.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. member permit a question. He stated that it was none of the business of members of parliament to have access to those maps. Why, then, at the outset of his speech did he say that members on all sides nominated by a whip or someone from each party could see these maps, if they have no business to see them? Surely the minister is not suggesting that these maps are merely exercises in futility?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, they are not exercises in futility, any more than building the foundations of a house is unnecessary to the house. But if you produced a picture of the foundations and said that this was the completed house you would certainly be creating a false and misleading impression. That is exactly what we would be doing by producing this kind of map. The hon. gentleman said that I said that it was my opinion that it was no business of the house to see these maps at all. That is my opinion but—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should have liked to finish that sentence.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have stated on several occasions, both in the last session and in this one, that I think it is a high point in the history of the Canadian House of Commons that we have decided to take redistribution out of politics. I think the decision we took when we passed the bill in the last parliament appointing the representation commissioner was a tremendous step, and we can take pride in the fact that Bill No. C-72 which is now before the house was given second reading with unanimous support. It is because I am so proud of the decision that parliament has taken to put an end to redistribution by political committees on the basis of political considerations that I think we should go down the line with that decision, and on that basis I hope that the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau), after debate has continued a little while, will see fit to withdraw this motion.

It seems to me that to ask for these sketches—or transparencies, as I have heard them described—to be produced would not only add to the confusion in the way the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) has indicated, but it would give the appearance of parliament wanting to keep its finger in the drawing of these maps. I listened to the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue making a very plausible case for our needing to see them so as to make up our minds whether or not we would support the legislation; but I would suggest that either we believe in the principle of independent redistribution or we do not believe in that principle. Either we believe in giving the matter to people outside parliament or we do not. Either we believe in the principle of certain tolerances and standing by them or we do not.

The hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue wants us to defer our decision on a matter of principle until we have seen what the results of applying that principle would be.

Mr. Aiken: Right.

Mr. Knowles: Someone says "right". I think that that is a mistake and is a retreating from the high point which we reached when we in this parliament, both with respect to the bill passed last session and on second reading of Bill No. C-72 this session, decided to go for a non-partisan, non-political redistribution.

Mr. Martineau: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. I wonder if the hon. member would tell us whether in his view the question of tolerance, whether it be 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, or whatever it may be, may be discussed without in any way affecting the principle on which this house has already agreed, namely that of independent redistribution? If the hon. member answers that question affirmatively, does he not think that certain documents and maps placed before the committee would be helpful in deciding whether one tolerance is right, or whether it should be some other tolerance?

Mr. Knowles: I not only think the matter can be discussed without seeing the maps, but I think it can be discussed far better without seeing them. If we agree with the idea that we should approach representation by population, either we decide scientifically upon certain tolerances and stay with them or we admit that we do not believe in the idea and want to decide on a tolerance which will produce the kind of boundaries we want. That is what we have done in the committees which handled redistribution across the years of our history, and I think we should get away from that.

I should like to read two or three sentences dealing with this question of doing the job independently, which I think are classical statements and bear repetition. They are to be found at page 1651 of Hansard for April 18, 1950. My first quotation is as follows:

> I say that the time has come to consider the adoption of a system of redistribution of constituencies every ten years as the population changes, not in accordance with political considerations or personal bias, but that scientific consideration should be given to redistribution on the basis of population by a commission composed of the chief electoral officer, the surveyor general and one judge or more. No political considerations would be involved in such a commission. I would place them in a position where they would consider the whole matter of redistribution without denying to parliament the final say in connection therewith.

Mr. Martineau: We agree.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend says the Conservatives agree. Please note that the request made then was that this commission be put completely beyond political considerations. The suggestion was that the only place parliament should come in would be at the very end. To request that we now see these maps is, I submit, to suggest that we have some finger in the pie as far as the work of the representation commissioner is concerned, and that we are interfering in the job even before it gets started.

May I read one more sentence and then I suspect that hon. members will know whom I am quoting. In the next paragraph the same speaker said:

> I feel now, with redistribution at least two years removed, the time has come to look into the matter of establishing a commission which would be free from political considerations to determine this question, not with a view to the political outcome in the ensuing election but in order to assure that democratic procedure shall be maintained in our country.

I have taken those words from a speech made in the House of Commons on April 18, 1950, by the then member for Lake Centre, later prime minister and now the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). I ask hon. members to ponder those words, that clear clarion call for putting the drawing of the boundaries of the constituencies of members of the House of Commons beyond political considerations. Yet it is now suggested that even before we have passed this bill, while we are still considering it, we ask to see, and to have made public for all the country to see, the exercises which are being made before we finally decide whether we agree to the principle and before we finally decide on the tolerances.

I am opposed to this motion because I believe to vote for it would be to cast a vote inconsistent with the vote which this house has already cast on second reading of Bill No. C-72. I would also point out that this same bill contains a clause, clause 17, which provides for the commissions, once they have been appointed and have done their job, to hold public hearings and to make the maps public for everyone to see—citizens generally, members of parliament, whoever you will.

In this motion it is asked that we be given some special privilege ahead of time to see these maps. It is asked that something be done now, even before the commissions are appointed, and which the commissions are not supposed to do until they have surveyed the whole situation and done their work. I think we are not only confusing the public, but we are certainly putting the members of these commissions in a very difficult position if we are going to see these sketches, these exercises, ahead of time, because we will inevitably state opinions about them and confuse the whole situation.

I feel about this as I feel about every other aspect of this whole question of redistribution. I think that parliament has done itself proud in getting over nine decades of the worst kind of redistribution. I think that parliament has done itself proud in the unanimous decision which it has taken, a decision agreed to by all members of all parties, to go for redistribution by a completely independent body, and I hope we will go all the way through with this decision.

I am not going to get into another argument which has been raised in another connection; suffice it to say that as far this aspect is concerned let us be consistent and go all the way. Having decided that we are going to give the job to people whom we will not control or meddle with, or to people whose work we will not try to influence, let us stay with that decision all the way down.

This is a terribly important issue, basic to the whole constitutional set-up. I regret the matter is being delayed. This is 1964 and the last census was taken in 1961. It would be a tragedy, almost a treason to the constitution of Canada, if because of delays on this matter the next election had to be fought on the constituency boundaries which were drawn on the 1951 census. I am afraid that if these sketches are produced this would add to the delay. Hon. members would start complaining about what is going to happen to their constituencies—and that is an anomaly right there. The constituencies are not ours. We are concerned with the rights of the people of Canada. As I say, I think that anything that delays carrying out the requirement of the constitution of Canada for redistribution after every decennial census is treason to the constitution itself, and regardless of who is responsible for the delay, whether it is the opposition that is holding up the matter or whether it is the government that is not bringing forward the bill, I believe that we should get on with the job.

I deplore the delays and I deplore any move to retreat from the very highminded decision of principle that parliament has taken to put redistribution beyond partisan politics, beyond the kind of thing we have had for the last nine decades. Therefore I hope that when this debate is over the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) will be consistent with his vote on second reading of Bill C-72 and will ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Mr. Korchinski: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: Gladly.

Mr. Nasserden: May I ask a question?

Mr. Knowles: Certainly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Rosthern.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member who has just taken his seat will tell us whether he has seen the maps?

Mr. Knowles: I am told there are no maps so far. Therefore one cannot say he has seen maps. However, in response to the suggestion that was made I have seen some of the sketches that are referred to as transparencies, consisting of lines drawn on transparencies that are put over old maps.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute. These are what are referred to, and if they were published I am satisfied they would confuse the situation. I say quite frankly in reply to the hon. member for Rosthern that what I have seen does not make me happy in terms of personal self-interest. I should like to see Winnipeg North Centre stay as it is, but any sketch I have seen indicates that many changes are going to be made. But what is involved is a matter of principle.

Indeed, all parties in this house have taken a stand on the principle that the seats in the house are not ours, that the House of Commons belongs to the people of Canada and that the boundaries should be drawn in a way that will best serve their right to have proportionate representation in the House of Commons.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Cariboo. There is so little time left and as there are a number of members who still want to take part in the debate I wonder whether we could let them proceed.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am only going to say a very few words, chiefly to register my opposition to the production of any drawings or working sheets of any kind by the commissioner. In my opinion, if there is anything that could be termed meddling this would be it. I feel very strongly on the matter. It seems to me that if these documents were produced we would be defeating the very thing we have started out to do.

I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that certainly the first thing we must do is to put those who are going to be charged with the task in a position where they can go to work and get the job done. The situation in which we find ourselves, namely arguing over some transparencies or drawings, is in my opinion a reflection on the members of the house from the point of view of what we are really trying to do here. Either we must be on the side of removing this matter from politics or we must be on the side of keeping it in politics. We cannot be both.

of redistribution, instead of removing them. I do not think we should put ourselves in the position of trying to predetermine the work of the commission. After the commission has done its work we will be able to make representations to it. People will be able to make representations then, if they see something that they think makes representations necessary. In the present position we are just guessing a half and multiplying by two or guessing a quarter and multiplying by four. This only aggravates a situation that is wrong in the first place. I say: Let us get on with the business of getting the commission operating when we go back to the bill. I would also ask on behalf of the members of this house that the motion be withdrawn before the debate ends, so that we can get off on the right foot.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I heard the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) say that the electoral maps which were made available to the members in the past few weeks were only mathematical exercises, but I fail to see the necessity of doing mathematical exercises in the redistribution of electoral boundaries.

According to all members, we should remove politics from the new redistribution. The best way to remove politics from that very important issue would have been first, not to invite the members to see those maps because then it was an attempt to get those who are in politics to discuss with the chief electoral officer the way a riding should be reorganized.

On the other hand the minister told us that he wished that those maps which in fact can be seen—I have seen them myself—be not even studied by the provincial commissions. Why draw up those maps then? By not doing it and letting the provincial commissions prepare the new maps, this afternoon's debate would not have taken place.

In fact, I do not think that a single member is satisfied with those maps which we have seen at the office of the chief electoral officer. As a matter of fact, hon. members go back to their own riding spreading rumours right and left, as mentioned a while ago by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau). They are asking themselves what 10, 20 or 30 per cent might mean in their ridings or their regions? If the matter is to be settled definitely by the provincial commissions, a stop should be put to the drawing up of electoral maps in Ottawa and the provincial commissions should be left entirely free to determine the new boundaries of the federal ridings for future elections—

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, it is six o'clock—

Mr. Boulanger: No, it is five to six.

Mr. Caouette: Someone said it was six o'clock. I do not know who it is but I think it is my hon. friend for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who is always in a greater hurry than anyone else.

Mr. Speaker, concerning the mathematical gymnastics which the chief electoral officer has been required to do, now that we have seen those maps, it is obvious that he will also have to do geographical gymnastics.

Now, several people are dissatisfied with the new electoral boundaries which are to be suggested to the provincial commissions. In that connection, I should like to repeat what I said a moment ago:

First, the minister should never have invited the members to see the maps if he wished to keep politics out of the question.

Second, such mathematical and geographical gymnastics should not have been imposed on the chief electoral officer either.

Third, the whole thing should have been left to the provincial commissions. Then, we could have said at last that the matter was free of politics and that we approved the decisions made by the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows:

[Translation]

The hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), extension of the winter works period.

[Text]

Second, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn), national civil aviation policy; third, the hon. member for Queens, discussions with the United States representatives with respect to the Passamaquoddy project. The house will now resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

Post Office Act

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DELIVERY RATES ON PUBLICATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Nicholson—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rates for first class mail and for all newspapers and periodicals other than those published more frequently than weekly; to establish a minimum rate of one half cent per copy to each separate address for all publications other than those to which local delivery rates apply or that have postage-free privileges; to make the four cent a pound postage on specimen copies of publications subject to either the local delivery rate or the minimum rate, whichever is applicable and to extend to certain cultural and technical publications the privileges now granted to newspapers and periodicals devoted to religion, the sciences or agriculture.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of privilege which affects every member of this house.

Mr. Knowles: We are not in the house.

The Chairman: Order. I think I should bring it to the attention of the hon. member that he can only rise on a question of privilege affecting the members of the house when the Speaker is in the chair. He cannot rise on a question of privilege that affects the house in general when we are in committee.

Mr. Kindt: Then what is the procedure for getting a motion before the house at this time?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for MacLeod, that the committee rise and report progress, in order to enable the hon. member to bring his question of privilege before the house.

Mr. Knowles: But we do not even know what it is.

Mr. Nielsen: Will Your Honour please put the question?

The Chairman: I have no motion before me. It will have to be transmitted to me in writing.

Mr. Nielsen moves that the committee rise and report progress. I assume, if I may change the formula, it should also request that the committee have leave to sit again later this day or the next sitting of the house as the case may be. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

PRIVILEGE

MR. KINDT—REPORTED AMALGAMATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIR LINES SERVICE

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (MacLeod): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege affecting every member of this house. Two national news broadcasts, between six and seven o'clock this evening, carried the information that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) had given his blessing to the amalgamation of T.C.A. and Canadian Pacific Air Lines, at least in the international field, and discussions are proceeding with this objective in view.

My point of privilege is that the Minister of Transport has released this information before informing this house. This is a direct affront to the members of the house. The Minister of Transport is not a new member, and therefore should know better, but the move on his part was undoubtedly deliberate and directly opposed to the rules, rights and privileges enjoyed by members of the house.

I should like to be charitable to the minister, but if he persists in this type of action the only correct procedure is to press for his resignation.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): May I speak on the point of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister of Transport.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I have made no statement of any kind to the press. Anything that has appeared anywhere is speculation. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn) attempted to ask me about this matter this afternoon, and no doubt excited some speculation by doing so.

The matter is set down for debate at ten o'clock this evening, and I intend at that time to make a statement, but the statement I am going to make is a matter that has nothing to do with the business of the house. It has to do with the administration entrusted to the government and it would not be the kind of statement that would normally be made on motions in any event, so that on every count there is no reason why the time of the house should be taken up with a matter of this kind, except as a matter of debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, may I speak on the point of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest, sir, there cannot be any debate on this matter unless there is a motion.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of privilege—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the right hon. gentleman, who is erupting like a volcano, realizes any hon. member may raise a point of order, even a minister of the crown—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and my point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps hon. members may wish to say something after I have spoken, but the way I see the matter is that this has been brought to the attention of the house as a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Kindt), based on a statement alleged to have been made by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

The Minister of Transport denies having made such a statement, and my understanding of the rules and the practice of the house is that hon. members have to accept the veracity of a statement made by another hon. member. In the circumstances I have to rule that there is no question of privilege, and since there is no motion before the house there cannot be debate. I trust hon. members will co-operate with me in this difficult matter and recognize that there is no question of privilege, at least at this time.

Mr. Kindt: On a point of privilege, I for one have listened to the broadcast tonight on two separate radios—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please.

Mr. Kindt: —and my point of privilege is that this is something affecting all members—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat for just a moment, unless he has another point of privilege to raise different from the one he has brought to the attention of the house? He has made his point. We have heard an explanation from the minister, brief and to the point, and I do not think that there is any debate possible at this time. The ruling of the Chair is that there is no question of privilege, and I would very earnestly ask the hon. member to accept the ruling of the Chair at this time.

Mr. Kindt: But it was a pack of lies given by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The house will now resume in committee of the whole.

Post Office Act

POST OFFICE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DELIVERY RATES ON PUBLICATIONS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Nicholson—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair:

That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rates for first class mail and for all newspapers and periodicals others than those published more frequently than weekly; to establish a minimum rate of one half cent per copy to each separate address for all publications other than those to which local delivery rates apply or that have postage-free privileges; to make the four cent a pound postage on specimen copies of publications subject to either the local delivery rate or the minimum rate, which ever is applicable and to extend to certain cultural and technical publications the privileges now granted to newspapers and periodicals devoted to religion, the sciences or agriculture.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at five o'clock I had been dealing with the submission made to us by the minister, in which he purported to justify the increase in the mail rates. I looked over his statements during the dinner hour and, comparing them with the information contained in the Glassco commission report, I find it very difficult to reconcile his statements with the information and recommendations given by the royal commission in question.

The minister's main contention is that the department needs more money and the best place to get it is from first class mail. He also made the submission that it was his intention to have each class of mail pay its own way; in effect, be self-sufficient. The minister then outlined some of the deficits that were not included in the estimates. Over the dinner hour I was reviewing the report of the Glassco royal commission as it relates to the post office, because it gives some interesting information concerning these two types of mail. On page 325 there is a table which summarizes the receipts and the disbursements of first class and second class mail. The first class mail shows a surplus of slightly over $35 million.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, interested as we might be in this, I think it would be helpful if the hon. member drew to the attention of the committee that those figures were for 1959.

Mr. Scott: That is right. I am not trying to hide anything of that nature, but the commission itself indicated—

Mr. Douglas: Perhaps if the minister kept quiet and listened for a while, he would find out.

Mr. Scott: These were the most accurate figures at which the commission could arrive after undertaking a very careful method of analysis. If the minister would read it, he would see this is an attempt to be very very fair to his department. If he has other figures for later dates based upon the same statistical detail then let us have them in the house and we will be glad to examine them. I do not want him to impute motives to any member of the house.

Mr. Douglas: Or betray his ignorance.

Mr. Nicholson: No, I was not imputing motives; but I thought it fair to point out that the figures were for 1959.

Mr. Scott: To go on, Mr. Chairman, the figures in question show that first class mail had a surplus of slightly over $35 million, and second class mail showed a deficit of slightly over $23 million. The table on page 326 allocates between these two groups the unseen charges that the minister mentioned this afternoon, amounting to some $31 million. Even after these are allocated, still the first class mail shows a surplus of over $19 million and the deficit on second class mail climbs to $29 million. I really do not understand how the minister can tell us that what he is attempting to do in this legislation is anything other than force the people who use first class mail to dig deeper into their own pockets in order to subsidize second class mail. I would also like to know from the minister why he has ignored the recommendation of the Glassco commission in this regard, why he is throwing this recommendation out the window, because it says quite clearly:

—the imposition of an obligation to subsidize second class mail from its own pocket—

That is referring to subsidizing second class mail from first class mail:

They make certain recommendations to the minister in this regard; that he should, rather than have this method of subsidization, be frank with the country and vote the mail subsidy in the estimates themselves. We will want some pretty cogent figures from the minister before we will be convinced that this is not the case. The commission came to the conclusion that the deficit in the Post Office Department roughly equated the deficit in second class mail, and I cannot for the life of me understand why we should be asked to pay subsidies to newspapers and periodicals and, more particularly, to the advertisers in those journals, because that in essence is what we are doing.

We have also asked the minister to outline to the committee what steps he intends to take, if any, to deal with the disparity between the large losses suffered on United States mail carried free in Canada and the extent to which this is offset by Canadian mail carried in the United States. I have outlined the tremendous disparity, and although this may not be easy, we feel that explorations along this line are more warranted than digging deeper into the pockets of those who use first class mail.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, we want to know what serious consideration the government is giving to the other recommendations of the Glassco commission in which are outlined very precise steps which it is felt will give a truer financial picture of the operations of the post office and will effect very far ranging economies. It is suggested, I know, by the commission that various government departments should be charged for the services they receive and should charge back for services rendered, rentals and matters of that kind. Until we have this information we do not have before us a correct financial picture of the post office and we simply cannot make an intelligent adjudication upon the proposals submitted by the minister.

Mr. Douglas: We never have had.

Mr. Scott: As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam says, we never have had this in the history of the post office. I would have thought that action along those lines would have been more becoming in the circumstances. I feel, in conclusion, on the basis of the evidence we have heard today, on the basis of the minister's statement, that no case at all has been made for increasing the rates on first class mail. It is clear, from all the evidence to which we have access, that it not only pays its own way but shows a very substantial profit. The real deficit at the moment occurs in the hand-out given by way of subsidization to second class mail, newspapers and periodicals; and until something is done in this connection we intend to oppose this move. We also want to hear about the United States agreement, and what the minister really intends to do in regard to the recommendations of the Glassco commission. Does he intend to honour them; does he intend to put them into effect, or does he intend to throw them out the window as so many other recommendations have been treated in the past? That is all we want to say at this stage, Mr. Chairman; but until we hear more we intend to oppose this move.

[Translation]

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Chairman, as we are considering the resolution to amend the Post Office Act, I want to mention that our Canadian postal system is recognized as one of the best and most efficient in the world, thanks of course to our postal employees who are qualified and to all this devoted staff looking after the delivery of mail throughout Canada and attending every day to the distribution of correspondence so that all Canadians may have the best possible service.

I take this opportunity to pay special tribute to one and all.

I see in this resolution that it is intended to abolish the local delivery rate, which would amount to a disguised tax increase.

Of course, I appreciate the requirements of the postal administration because, like all other fields, it is affected by the treacherous inflation resulting from a financial system which is basically wrong.

Fortunately, we have some hope for the future, because after counting all those who favour monetary reform, I arrive at almost 25 per cent of the members of this house.

It is obvious that the post office is not a profit organization; but I realize how difficult it is to get fair treatment in that service. I know that personally, because I was a postal employee after my studies and I know that, when I left the service, two men were hired to replace me.

I should like to mention the case of the Chicoutimi post office which, for more than three years and a half, has yearly receipts of over $240,000, which means that it qualifies as grade 12. Its turnover this year will probably amount to $300,000 and I think it would be normal to classify it the way it should be.

I avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate the minister who, I believe, is able to understand the problems that exist at the present time in his department, since his administrative genius is acknowledged, and I hope that these small details will be corrected in due time.

May I add that I am happy to hear that post offices will be built in my constituency, namely at Laterrière, St. Honoré, St. Ignace and in a few other places. I hope that those projects will materialize as soon as possible.

In conclusion, I would like to point out to the Postmaster General the case of Port Alfred which I submitted to him recently. This town has been asking for home delivery for more than 15 years. I have set forth a fair solution which I think should win his approval.

That was all I had to say on this matter, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that we should take every means to enable the Canadian postal service to operate efficiently and give the best service possible.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, allow me first to congratulate the new Postmaster General. I wholeheartedly hope that we will not have again to deplore the irregularities which we witnessed under his predecessor.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if, in future, the minister intends to give some consideration to the elected members and to inform them of any action taken by the Post Office Department in their respecting ridings.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but, as he is aware, the hon. members must limit their remarks as much as possible to the matter under discussion. Since we are now dealing with a resolution concerning certain amendments to the Post Office Act and the transportation of mail, I suggest the hon. member should confine himself to that matter.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, you are very kind. But I was just following in the footsteps of some of my fellow members whom you tolerated so patiently.

I am now coming back to the subject matter. I simply wanted to convey to the minister some ideas we wished to express, and blaze the trail for the future administration of the department, because, when a resolution with regard to the post office is presented to the house, we necessarily must deal to a certain extent with the postal service.

Before going straight to the core of the matter, I hope I may ask the minister a second question. Will he maintain the partisan custom in his department of consulting people entirely outside politics?

We have now received the departmental report, and I wanted to congratulate the minister tonight for issuing it. Yet, I somehow feel ill at ease commending him, more particularly when he says:

> That it is expedient to amend the Post Office Act to abolish the local delivery rates for first class mail and for all newspapers and periodicals other than those published more frequently than weekly—

Mr. Chairman, I want to tell the house that the suggested amendment, and more particularly the last words I quoted, affect us, and especially our small local publications to a great extent.

To my mind, this motion is nothing but a new tax on local delivery in Canada. It is not just any tax, but a specific imposition on private business. This is another case of the small local business being the whipping boy for the large corporation. The small man will again pay for some nonsense or some extravagant expenses the minister or the post office officials will incur.

Mr. Chairman, it is rather strange that, as soon as a deficit is foreseen in some department, it is immediately compensated by a new tax. Not the slightest effort is made to scrutinize the budget to see whether something could be adjusted in the estimates. None at all. Instead of making an effort in that direction, as soon as a deficit is foreseen, the imposition of a tax is immediately suggested. Always the same scapegoat.

The small man is always the one who pays in the end. When I find that the annual report shows a surplus of $3,486,449.02, I wonder why a new increase in postal rates is being proposed, after a surplus has been made public. As a matter of fact, I think that this attitude is even less understandable than the tax itself.

I must point out to the house that such action is unfair, and that if this resolution is passed tonight, it will simply be discriminatory toward the first class mail, as well as toward all our local publications.

Once more, we forgot, maybe intentionally, the big newspapers, the foreign newspapers which flow into our country and for which Canadian people pay higher and higher taxes.

I am taking part in the debate this evening merely to mention that anomaly within our administration, and I suggest to the Postmaster General, instead of considering a new tax before going to bed tonight, to go over his budget and determine whether there is no extravagance in the salaries or if there are expenditures which could be eliminated in order to balance his department's budget because, in my opinion, it is the easiest budget to reduce. In fact, the Post Office Department is supposed to be administered, most logically without having the small taxpayer pay higher postal rates.

On the other hand, if the minister has a mania for taxation, let him tax the rich. In short, let him tax those who can pay. Let him tax the owners of newspapers with a large circulation or those who run American magazines. But he should leave alone—and surely once in ten years is not too much—the small local businessman, the small Canadian undertaking which can barely make ends meet in our towns but which is trying to do something for the province of Quebec.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the few remarks I wanted to bring to the attention of the minister and I hope he will consider them seriously overnight.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I wish to join with my colleagues who spoke before me to congratulate the Postmaster General on his appointment.

I also want to pay tribute to the employees of the Post Office Department who work hard in the public interest.

I have two suggestions to make to the Postmaster General.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

I suggest that post offices should be closed on Saturday as they are in the Netherlands. It would be logical, in my opinion, if the civil servants had their week end free like the citizens in other social classes.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his remarks bear such a vague relationship to the subject matter of the resolution that I cannot allow him to carry on.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I believe this relates somewhat to the resolution, for if the post offices close their doors, the amendments referred to in the resolution will automatically be affected. Also would the minister even amend his resolution along this line, in order to grant a holiday to postal employees on Saturdays, for they surely deserve a normal week end as any other Canadian citizen. In such a case, only the members of parliament would be at their offices on Saturdays, but, as far as they are concerned, they discharge a mandate of public interest.

I do not mean that postal employees are not devoted to the service of the public.

The Chairman: Order. I have listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member, but he has not yet established in which way they relate to the question before us.

Mr. Pigeon: I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I believe my second suggestion will relate a little more closely to the question before us.

I am suggesting that the Postmaster General compel the owners of two and three storey houses to co-operate with their tenants in establishing letter boxes on the first floor, so that the postmen may not have to climb the second or third floors as happens at present.

I think it is inhuman to have such a state of affairs. The minister is acting in good faith and he will surely consider the situation with officials of his department.

On the other hand, the Canadian weekly newspapers association is a bit concerned over the resolution. Canadian weeklies can now distribute 2,500 free issues every week through the mail without paying a penny.

You are no doubt aware, Mr. Chairman, of the competition which dailies give to local newspapers across Canada. As a matter of fact, that competition is rather strong. I believe that the weeklies have a role to play in our social life and I wonder why the Post Office Department, according to this resolution, intends to impose a special tax on weeklies mailing over 2,500 copies. I would ask the minister to amend the resolution so as to leave unchanged section 11 of the act, especially paragraphs (c) and (d) of subsection (2), so that Canadian newspapers may enjoy the same privileges as before.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I urge the minister to reconsider his policy concerning new issues so that a stamp may be issued to commemorate the centennial of the death of Sir Louis Hyppolite Lafontaine who was in a way a forerunner of confederation since, at one time, he presided over the destinies of the two Canadas with Robert Baldwin.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: To continue—

The Chairman: I should like once again to call the hon. member to order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I would be most happy if the minister could tell us what he intends to do about the request submitted by the association of Canadian weekly newspapers and also about the three proposals I made to him. Knowing his devotion and the care he takes to inform the house, I am sure he will give an accurate reply as usual.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I would like to take this opportunity to make a few remarks about the resolution before us.

Like the hon. members who spoke before me, I would like first of all to congratulate the Postmaster General, because the administration of his department being undoubtedly a very important responsibility, to be entrusted with it by his leader, evidently bears testimony to the minister's administrative abilities.

I would also avail myself of the opportunity to express my appreciation and pay tribute to the numerous employees of the Post Office Department who discharge their duties and responsibilities with tact and efficiency.

I would have liked, Mr. Chairman, the present Postmaster General's predecessor to be in the house today, to hear his successor state that the deficit foreseen for the coming year will be around $37 million. As a matter of fact, last year, if we remember rightly, the former postmaster general who is sitting, today, in the other place, which is much more peaceful than ours, was blaming the deficit on the poor administration of the Conservatives who were facing him.

Well, we have at present a Liberal administration which foresees a deficit of about $37 million.

I would also like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that those who will provide the additional revenue that the Postmaster General is looking for will always be the taxpayers. It is said that last November increases yielded some $8 million and that it is not enough. During a period of one year, Mr. Chairman, it is the second time that the Postmaster General comes forward to ask for additional revenue. Last November, there were quite large increases in some cases. For instance, registered letters rate varied from 35 to 60 cents; letters by postal delivery went up from 10 to 25 cents, that is an increase of over 15 cents; postal parcel rate went up from to 20 to 35 cents, while money orders went up from 20 to 25 cents. Since April 1, 1964, there was another substantial increase for what is called commercially c.o.d.'s. We must also recall, Mr. Chairman, that to send our wishes next December, we will have to pay 50 per cent more than last year.

Added to increases provided for now, it will be an amount of $37 million, according to the Postmaster General's figures, that the taxpayers will have to pay over what they used to.

May we point out that according to the minister himself, it is mostly commercial and industrial businesses which will have to carry the load of that new increase. It is hard to understand, Mr. Chairman, that in one office, the distribution of first class mail should be increased.

In view of all the boasting about their own talent as administrators we heard from those people now occupying the treasury benches, something on which they all agreed when they were in opposition, it would seem to me that the Postmaster General himself is also heading quite the wrong way in taking steps which will certainly result in an even higher cost of living.

I have no intention whatever, at this time, of indulging in a speech on this matter, but I cannot refrain from pointing out to the house that what the Postmaster General is now asking us to do will surely entail an increase in the cost of living.

I suggest that the Postmaster General should look for other means of getting the money he needs without adding to the burden of the taxpayer in general by an increase in postal rates as steep as the one he is contemplating, especially in view of the fact that it is the second one in less than a year.

Mr. Chairman, that is what I wanted to say. I am convinced that the businessmen and industrialists in my riding would not have been pleased had I let this increase in postal rates go through without telling the house that they oppose it.

[Text]

Mr. Webb: Mr. Chairman, before this debate commenced I had hoped to receive a statement from the minister with regard to a question I asked him some time ago as a result of the increased cost of sending newspapers to husbands and sons serving overseas with Canadian forces. I am certain that the introduction of this measure by the Postmaster General is to increase the revenue of the Post Office Department, yet the total cost of this increase will be borne by Canadians and is a hardship upon the people of Canada.

With regard to these proposed increases in rates I should like to point out that the profits of the Canadian editions of Time and Reader's Digest for the year 1959 were revealed by the royal commission on publications to be $937,000 in the case of Time and $1,158,000 in the case of Reader's Digest. No Canadian periodical makes such profits. The unfair part of it is that the postal subsidy given to these papers, according to post office figures, show that there is a loss to the Post Office Department each year on account of handling the distribution of Time of about $600,000, and between $600,000 and $900,000 in the case of Reader's Digest, depending on the method of calculation. The inequity of this is that Reader's Digest, a United States publication, pays a rate of one and three quarter cents a pound. Star Weekly, a Canadian publication, pays three cents a pound compared with this one and three quarter cents for a United States publication. Our Canadian newspapers pay more than three cents a pound. I hope that during the course of this debate or when the Postmaster General answers questions he will give the committee an explanation of his reasons for this action.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, some of us had the pleasure of watching the Minister of of Justice last night on "The Nation's Business" when he was interviewed by or had a chat with the hon. member for Northumberland. He introduced an argument at that time which it seemed to me the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General might have considered before bringing this legislation in front of us.

The Minister of Justice painted the picture in these words: Yes, of course, the provinces are going to get, not 17 per cent but right up to 24 per cent under a certain formula, but we will not get less. It is going to be a bigger pot; there is going to be growth. We are not going to get less. He did not make any mention of the fact, which I suppose the Postmaster General will, that costs are going up, wages are going up, expenditures are going up. All we got from the Minister of Justice in connection with the new tax agreement was how wonderful it is. Everybody gets more and nobody gets less.

An hon. Member: Pie in the sky.

[Mr. Webb.]

Mr. Fisher: It was real pie in the sky. I should like to know why the Postmaster General did not give us some of this pie in the sky. The fact is he has given us a different kind of pie and it is quite an argument he has brought forward. If I may refer to a local setting, the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William are adjacent to each other and they were very proud last year, the chamber of commerce in particular and with some reason, that they had managed to get the local delivery rate between two cities. The post office authorities, the postmaster general at that time and everybody else were very pleased about it. Everybody was estimating how many thousands of dollars local businessmen were going to save because of this action. Everybody was saying: This is justice which should have been extended to us long ago because we were obviously paying too much for postage.

What comes along a few months later, with this magnificent, competent government that always does things so well? They have got the genius for administration, you know. Port Arthur and Fort William lose their little percentage of benefit, but it is all in the name of putting the books in better shape. The department is going to have things look better.

I received a letter a couple of years ago from the postmaster general at that time, William Hamilton, and I want to put it on the record because the minister has said nothing in his introductory statement to indicate that this situation does not exist. The situation that is portrayed by Mr. Hamilton is the real problem here. The minister will not come out and really say it is. Instead he is going to get money from first class mail that he should be getting from some other kind of mail. Mr. Hamilton's letter reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Fisher:

During the discussion of my estimates in the House of Commons you asked me for certain information breaking down, as between Canadian and United States publications and as between newspapers and other periodicals, some earlier information I had supplied covering revenues and costs in this field.

In this letter I will try to do so but I must immediately caution you against assuming any particular accuracy for these figures.

I take it he meant that he was giving accurate dollars and cents figures, and his point is that generally they are accurate but not in particular.

I should also point out that we have no breakdown whatsoever as between newspapers and periodicals such as magazines; for our purposes these are all second class mail and no analysis we have ever made has attempted to make a division between the two.

Regarding my caution on the accuracy of the figures, I think this is understandable. Millions of pieces of mail are handled every day and any assessment of volume, class and so on can only be on a sampling basis. Furthermore, since the job is so big and tends to interrupt the normal flow of the mail we make our studies only at fairly lengthy intervals; the detailed cost ascertainment study, for example, is done only every three years.

Finally, the further one attempts to break down cost figures and obtain details, the more uncertain those details become. For example, I am inclined to think that our total allocation of costs as between various classes of mail and our over-all estimate of the volume in each class is reasonably accurate; when one begins to break down a particular class into further groups, it becomes less accurate for a number of reasons.

You will remember also the running battle which has existed in the United States for some time over the basic question of how costs should be allocated as between various categories of mail and this has applicability to our Canadian costing systems as well since costs accountants will always argue over the basis on which overhead has been applied to various categories and what are direct and what are indirect costs.

Within this framework, you will remember that our cost ascertainment statements for the fiscal year 1958-59 show the following figures relative to second class mail:

Second Class Matter
Volume (originating)	531,148,886 pieces
Receipts	$ 6,189,125
Disbursements	27,879,068
Disbursements over receipts	$21,689,943

I gather that the figure for disbursements over receipts is now up to $26 million so far as these particular categories are concerned.

Based on surveys which were made in 1955 and 1956, we estimate that the Canada post office handles about 120 million pieces annually of publications mailed in the United States and having the postage paid there, and about 40 million United States publications which are mailed in Canada and have the postage thereon paid to the Canadian post office. Our estimate of the receipts from the latter is $900,000.

Our cost calculations have always been based on the principle that they disregard mail matter originating and paid outside Canada and subsequently handled by the Canadian post office for delivery in this country. This principle is based on the fact that most letters generate a reply and that therefore there will be an equal volume of this kind of mail into and out of the country. Thus, while it produces a lower figure for the actual volume handled than would be the case if mail originating outside Canada was also included in the volume figures, and therefore a higher cost per piece figure when the volume is divided into the total operating costs for a particular class of mail, there is an approximately equivalent benefit to the Canadian post office by the fact that about the same volume of mail is sent out of Canada and handled at no delivery cost to us by other countries.

These principles are universally accepted by postal organizations and are, indeed, the basis on which it has been possible to organize such a smooth flow of mails between most countries in the world without any one country demanding payment for the work it does for another country in so far as first class mail is concerned.

While we have applied the same principle to all the classes of mail, in the case of periodical publications it must certainly be admitted that a far greater flow comes to Canada from the United States than goes to the United States from Canada and if we are going to take into account, as you would wish to do, the United States publications mailed and paid for in the United States this will require a downward revision in the cost per piece which was quoted in the cost ascertainment figures tabled in the House of Commons. You will remember that the cost per piece over-all was there shown as 5.249 cents; to apply the total costs of $27,879,000 over all publications handled by the Canadian post office—including those mailed in the United States—the cost per piece will have to be reduced to 4.299 cents.

Once one is in possession of the foregoing information it is possible to estimate the figures you require, but to save you the trouble—

Mr. Hamilton was a very agreeable minister.

—I am going to set them out below:

Canadian publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	$21,114,698
U.S.A. publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	1,719,800
U.S.A. publications mailed and postage paid in U.S.A.	5,044,570
Disbursements	$27,879,068

The best breakdown we can establish of the receipts figure of $6,189,125 given on page 2 is as under:

Canadian publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	$ 5,289,125
U.S.A. publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	900,000
Receipts	$ 6,189,125

The best breakdown we can establish of the disbursements over receipts of $21,689,943 given on page 2 is as under:

Canadian publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	$15,825,573
U.S.A. publications mailed and postage paid in Canada	819,800
Disbursements over receipts	$21,689,943

The date of this letter is July 27, 1960. Mr. Hamilton went on to say that he hoped this was the basic information I wanted. I remember that at that time the hon. member for York Humber, who had not yet joined us as a parliamentary colleague, was also interested in this question. I was hoping he would see fit to come forward at this time to give us the views that he used to present to the various members of parliament around the corridors of power, as they have been described, when he was in his previous function.

Mr. Cowan: I have not changed my mind.

Mr. Fisher: The hon. member says he has not changed his mind. I am glad to know that because if he has not changed his mind he must be very worried over the fact that the reason we have this resolution before us, the reason we are going to have a bill, is that the Post Office Department and the government have not been able to come up with an answer to this tremendous loss, this tremendously exaggerated disbursement cost, not in the area of first class mail.

I would like to suggest that if you want an emotional or qualitative difference between first class mail and the distribution of periodicals and publications of various kinds that come under other categories, there is a natural division to make. It is a division all of us make in our minds in connection with mail services, the difference between first class mail treatment and the mailing treatment of other kinds of periodicals.

I am not downgrading the other portions of the work the department does, but I would like to put it to the minister that first class mail in this country really means something. There have been complaints at various times about the service, but in the main the Postmaster General can be proud of it. But I do not see how he can be proud about coming in here and whacking people in this country by putting up the cost of the first class mail, when the first class mail is not losing money.

Why do the minister and the government not come up with some kind of solution where the problem really lies. In order to do this the minister has to come in and tell us something about the government's policy on periodicals and publications. His predecessors did try to take some steps a couple of years ago to make some adjustments, to get more of the United States periodicals mailed in Canada, which had some effect but were not effective enough. It is also quite apparent that many newspapers and periodicals have rates that do not come anywhere near meeting the costs.

I believe the hon. member who spoke just before me made the point, in connection with the estimates, regarding the subsidy the Post Office Department is giving Reader's Digest and Time magazines. The figure runs, as it has been given to us, at somewhere between $600,000 and $900,000 a year. I think each member of the house who has been around his office has encountered the lobbyists, and it is no disgrace to name them and say that this estimate has been prepared by the Montreal Star, the Family Herald, the Toronto Star, and the Toronto Star Weekly. These are the people who are trying to find the heart and capture the soul of the Liberal backbenchers, to see if they can do something about the government's position on periodicals.

That estimate may not seem much, but when you take the two of them it gives you a figure of over $1 million, and in effect it is a subsidy. This is one of the reasons why the people of Canada will have to add that extra cent when mailing their letters to their loved ones, or whenever mailing business letters. In other words, we are going to have the wonderful chance of helping to disseminate Time and Reader's Digest around this country. That may appeal to some, but personally I am against it and my colleagues are against it.

If the minister cannot come up with better proposals than this to meet what is a relatively minor deficit in terms of the kind of services the department provides, I think we should vote against them. When I say it is a minor deficit, I mean in terms of the department's total revenues and expenditures; but there is, as I tried to point out earlier, a very substantial deficit between the cost and the income that come from a certain kind of mail. I have tried to point out where losses are really coming from, and I think it is rather disgraceful for the minister, representing this government which is so full of administrative genius, to come in and tell us he is going to put an extra cent on something that is already paying its way.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, I thank my hon. friends opposite for their cheers, undoubtedly hoping that I will throw bouquets at them. Let them not delude themselves, but since it is my duty to congratulate the new Postmaster General for the high office to which he was just appointed to and which he will undoubtedly discharge just as well as his predecessor, it is with pleasure that I offer him my congratulations.

I would not want to forget to congratulate also the efficient staff of the Post Office Department and all those who do their share to make our Canadian post office system one of the best in the world.

What puzzles me, Mr. Chairman, is the silence which paralyses our friends opposite. After all, not one of them rose to his feet to protest against an increase of $38 million in new taxes. And knowing the objectivity of the members of the press gallery, I am sure that tomorrow we will see in all the newspapers across the country the following headline: "$38 million increase in federal taxes." Then, the population will be adequately informed about that new tax the government is attempting to impose tonight through the Postmaster General.

It is somewhat like the sales tax on building materials. It is done by stages. First of all, an increase was imposed starting November 1, 1963: the point was to find $1,800,000 in round figures; then, an increase on certain postal matters starting April 1, 1964 which will yield for the department receipts amounting to some $6 million and, today, we are presented with the grand finale which looks rather like a cap. It caps it all.

In any case, the increase has reached $30 million. And our friends opposite are glad and they cheer when a member of this house, conscious of his duty and his responsibilities, rises to question the efficiency of the Post Office Department.

This afternoon, the minister tried by every means to have the house believe that this administrative measure was absolutely necessary. It is no doubt to celebrate the election of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) as leader of the Quebec members that we are offered this $30 million in new taxes. And to top it all, Mr. Chairman, the Liberals give this measure a rousing welcome.

They will certainly refrain, during the next election campaign in their respective constituency, from telling how much partisanship they have shown in this house this evening, to the prejudice of the Canadian people. A new tax is levied and once again we see them, dumb as a fish, show their political solidarity, to the detriment of national interests and Canadian citizens.

This afternoon the Postmaster General was the errand boy of the cabinet. He is a new minister, and probably has little experience in administration, and they take advantage of the situation by making him bear the deficit of certain other departments. When the Postmaster General announced this rate increase this afternoon, he referred to page 351 of the estimates for the year ending on March 31, 1965. He told us that the approximate value of important services not included in the departmental estimates imposed administrative costs of some $36 million to the Post Office Department. However, if we consider with objectivity the expenditures and revenues of the department, we find an administrative surplus of $3 million. I do not think that this department is one whose ostensible purpose is to fill the coffers of the treasury, but that is what we are led to believe by this legislation.

The minister told us also that the Post Office Department benefited from administrative expenses made by the Department of Public Works, owing to the fact that the latter spends approximately $25,298,000 to provide postal accommodation. To that effect, I therefore ask the minister the following question. Is his department, the only one to get free accommodation from the Department of Public Works? Do the departments of labour, justice and many others not get the same advantages? Then why give that reason which in itself, does not only apply to the Post Office Department, but which is a matter of administration for all the federal departments.

Another reason given by the minister is:

Accounting and cheque issuing branch (treasury comptroller).

Can the Postmaster General tell us whether he benefits from a preferential treatment from the treasury?

Contributions to superannuation account (Department of Finance).

Is not the Minister of Finance in charge of superannuation for all civil service employees in any department?

Employee surgical-medical insurance premiums (Department of Finance).

Does not the Minister of Finance assume this same obligation on the part of all other departments of the federal government?

Employee compensation payments (Department of Labour).

Is the Post Office Department the only one to take advantage of surgical-medical insurance?

Carrying of franking mail (Post Office Department).

In order to have a better balanced budget, would it not have been better if the Postmaster General had charged mail transportation cost to other departments rather than granting them franking privileges?

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the reasons given by the Postmaster General are not serious and that by acting in this way he becomes the mouthpiece for the financial requirements of the government. Under the guise of such administrative expenses charged to the budget of the Post Office Department they want to recoup from Canadian citizens a sum of $38 million.

Should we pass this measure without a word, as our Liberal friends would like us to do, we may be sure that other departments will put forward the same administrative reasons that have been advocated by the Postmaster General this afternoon. Then, we shall have to put up with other increases; that is what stamps this government anyway.

An excellent tax was imposed on us during this parliament's first session and still another one is being imposed today, namely one of $36 million which will result in increasing the already too high cost of living in Canada, without mentioning the fact that the mail service—

[Text]

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but where does he get that figure of $38 million? He has used it several times. It was $8 million, not $38 million.

Mr. Paul: Perhaps I made a mistake but I was sure the minister this afternoon spoke about $36 million. Perhaps I made a mistake of $2 million. But for the Liberal party, $2 million is peanuts.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that an increase in the cost of the mail transportation would raise the cost of living.

On the other hand, if the minister had stated that this increase would improve the postal service, give the Canadian people twice-a-day mail delivery in the cities, as claimed by his predecessor and Liberal members when they were in opposition, or if he had said: "Yes, there is an increase, but the Canadian people will benefit by it", we might have agreed with him. But no, that does not enter into the picture at all and that is why I believe we should know what the members on the other side are thinking.

Gentlemen, do you accept that increase in rate or do you disapprove of it? If you are against it, stand up, exert pressure on the Postmaster General, and on the man you chose last Saturday in Montreal, to change the disastrous measure that the Postmaster General wants us to swallow.

It is not by putting forward false reasons like the one mentioned by the Postmaster General—reasons which are not particular to his department but seem to exist in all departments—that the government will get us to agree to that resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the government is urgently in need of money and that it will collect that tax to the detriment of all Canadian taxpayers. That is why I am anxious to hear the experts, including the hon. member from Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pépin), who is always eager to make high sounding statements on all matters dealing with trade in particular.

He will no doubt tell us his opinion; he will tell us why he approves this tax and whether or not it is in actual fact prejudicial to taxpayers of his riding as well as to taxpayers throughout Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the minister will undoubtedly be able to give us explanations. I hope especially that he will be in a position to show us that the treatment his department receives from the Department of Public Works is preferential treatment, and that the accommodation provided by the Department of Public Works seems to be the reason for the proposed increase. I hope the minister will show us that his department enjoys preferential treatment, which may justify the increase in the postal rate proposed by the minister.

Personally, I do not intend to support this measure, because, once more, it is a tax in disguise, an hypocritical tax. Even if it is introduced in good faith by the Postmaster General, it is an hypocritical tax, disguised, unjustified, and it must be fought, not by the silence of our hon. friends of the other side of the house, but, by participation in the debate, to enlighten the minister about the error he is about to commit by imposing a new tax on the mail delivery in this country.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) is prepared to speak tonight.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in the debate but since several hon. members saw fit to do so, even if the bill has yet to be introduced, and in view of the fact that we are only at the resolution stage, I would be remiss if I did not say a few words, first to congratulate the Postmaster General on his appointment and then to say that, after hearing the hon. member who has just sat down, one would be inclined to believe that under the Conservative government taxes did not exist in Canada, that the only party which has imposed taxes in Canada or ever proposed an increase in taxes, like the one we are dealing with now, is the Liberal party.

The hon. member would have us believe, it seems, that the Conservatives never imposed any tax in Canada, never raised taxes, that there never was a million Canadians unemployed. In fact, they seem to be angels since they are in opposition.

Mr. Chairman, this does not mean that we accept the government's proposals especially the increase in the postal rate all over the country, or even the abolition of the local delivery rate for first class mail because, from now on, it is going to be more expensive to send mail first class.

The government proposes also to establish a minimum rate of half a cent per article of mail to each separate address.

Why does the Postmaster General recommend an increase in postal rates for regular mail such as personal letters, etc.? I am told it is because the department is short of money, and the only place where the government can find the money it needs to administer the Post Office Department is in the pockets of millions of Canadian taxpayers.

While he is at it, I wonder why the minister does not do a full job. Half a cent per copy for each separate address is not enough. That will not give the government enough.

The government should have gone all the way and increased postal rates so as to have enough revenues for the department to show a profit. It would have thus given the people a true image of the government's great solicitude when it levies taxes and still more taxes, and even imposes taxes on the taxes, when that is possible. Then, the Canadian people would realize that the old parties have to be replaced by something new on the Canadian political scene.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice is ready to speak tonight.

[Text]

Mr. Fisher: In my previous remarks I forgot to touch on one aspect of this subject —I was reminded of it by another hon. member—and I wish to draw this to the attention of the Postmaster General. In effect, he is asking us to feel sorry for certain men. He is asking the ordinary individual who uses the services of the post office to come through with some more money. I was reminded in Toronto recently that some of the people who are getting this grant for improving the breed of horseflesh are people who really need it—people like E. P. Taylor. I wonder why the house does not join me in prayer for barefoot boys like Roy Thomson, now Lord Thomson of Fleet. As a matter of fact, he is coming over to Canada soon. Someone said he was swimming because he was so hard up. Anyone ever heard about John McConnell? He has a farm paper, the Family Herald and Weekly Star. I think McConnell is in rough shape, if the minister is obliged to come up with something which will force the ordinary fellow using the post to contribute a little bit more, instead of asking him to do so. Then there are people like the Southams. Everybody knows how hard up they are.

The Chairman: Order, please, I do not see that the remarks now being made by the hon. member relate directly and essentially to the resolution now before us. They may relate to the resolution, but I would ask the co-operation of the hon. member to indicate to the Chair how they do.

Mr. Fisher: I thought the chairman was more acute than that. Obviously farm papers and daily newspapers with a circulation of below 10,000, which have a special low rate which does not come close to meeting the cost, are one of the reasons why there is a deficiency in the department, why the minister has brought in this bill. I was just calling the attention of all members to who it was that was being assisted, these poor, hard-up people like Lord Thomson, John McConnell and the Siftons. I think this is worth noting. Someone pointed out that if you raise the price of postage for farm periodicals, it will hit a co-operative newspaper such as the Western Producer. I can shed all kinds of crocodile tears for the Western Producer. It almost breaks your arm as you throw it into the wastepaper basket, it is so loaded with advertisements. It is obviously in dire poverty.

There is something wrong when the Postmaster General will not face up to situations like this. Here we have newspapers and publishing interests in this country, and it is just laughable to think of them being close to the wall. These are prosperous enterprises. Here we have a man who has gone on, on the strength of a little newspaper with a circulation of below 10,000 that he got nothing out of in northern Ontario in the Timmins and Kirkland Lake region, until he is the greatest purse bearer in the world. What is the Post Office Department doing by this kind of subsidy in a situation such as this? I think the minister should give us some frank answers as to why there has not been more planning to go after revenue in areas such as this, instead of wiping out the local delivery rate and planning to increase the first class mail rate.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, if the minister wishes to answer these questions, I will defer to him. I would think, in view of the discussion that has taken place, that if the government takes some action on this resolution now they will not be acting in accordance with the wishes of the people, because I think it is very clear to the postal department and to the house that this resolution, if it indicates correctly the contents of the bill, will not pass this house, and I think rightly so. I believe there is a great deal of sympathy for the Post Office Department. There is a great deal of sympathy because it is something that is so common to everyone and everyone uses its facilities. The average person uses the facilities of the department when he goes down and mails a letter and puts on first class postage. There are great numbers of such people, and they have supported the post office to the extent of creating the only profit the department enjoys.

We know that the post office fits into a different category, and the revenues necessary to operate it must be considered different to those of other departments. We expect that the Post Office Department will be a liability. We expect this because we ask them to do so much in so many fields from which no money flows. In quite a number of other countries the post office has been separated from government; it is no longer a department of government but is established as an independent agency of government. In that case departments of government, things like periodicals, and so on, have to make a profit on their own and have to make their regular contributions. But we are being asked in this resolution, not to equalize the expenses of the post office to provide enough money to cover the costs of its operation, but to pay a rate of first class postage in this country that will continue to pick up some of the deficit.

I did not follow something that was said in this debate; perhaps it was the translation or my inability to follow the argument. I heard one hon. member from the province of Quebec use the figure of $36 million. Then the minister rose and said, "No, it is not $36 million for the province of Quebec; it will be $8 million". Surely we are not dividing off how much this tax is going to cost each particular province and naming them by provinces and saying, "This is going to be your contribution to the $200 million or $300 million that was arranged in the agreements arrived at recently by the federal government". Surely the post office is not going to be the first of the departments that will come before us with the suggestion that this is the contribution to the $200 million that you have to be prepared to make.

I believe there is not a member of this house who, if he has the opportunity of sitting on this resolution for two or three weeks, will not do so. By that I mean, having the opportunity of going back to his riding after the discussion has taken place in the house and before the advent of this bill. If they did this, hon. members would come back here firmly convinced that the people of Canada do not want Reader's Digest or Time magazine, and certainly do not want them if it is going to cost them one cent more to mail a letter. I think this is a fact, and I think the minister will find it very difficult to sell that kind of proposition. Arguments have been raised, some of which have not, in my opinion, been ethical, by some of the magazines in question in the lobbying they have done that is not normally undertaken in this sphere of our Canadian parliament. But I believe that, laying aside the promises which the Prime Minister has made to Reader's Digest and Time and the statements that have been made, the Canadian public are not prepared to subsidize second class mail at the expense of providing additional revenue by reason of first class mail.

The minister has had much experience in the realm of business and I wonder just how he justifies dividing the difference off into departments, and then saying that the one that is making the money today should bear the increased cost, and the one that has a deficit should have the deficit position worsened by not increasing the rate with regard to periodicals. I subscribe to one of the Thomson newspapers and it is a fact that this paper has gone up year after year in subscription rates. They have been in the position, in my opinion, to take care of some additional costs in the mailing of their papers.

[Mr. Peters.]

I am sure this is true of all the other magazines in question, and it is certainly true of many of the technical magazines which the minister mentioned specifically. If you go to the newsstand you will find these have increased substantially in recent years, and they are now in a position where part of the profits they have made could be used for their mailing services.

I do not know whether the minister really wishes to consider this resolution. A resolution, as you know, Mr. Chairman, concerns the putting before parliament of the idea of a bill to come, and ascertaining from the house and its members their wishes and aspirations in terms of the resolution. The practice of this house has been to bring a resolution in because it is demanded by our standing orders, and to have the bill drafted, prepared and all ready to present as soon as the resolution is presented. If the house leader really wishes to consider the mood of the house I think he will give very serious consideration to this resolution and the representations that have been made, because it is my opinion that this is going to be "knock 'em down, drag 'em out" fight and the Canadian people and their representatives in this house are not prepared to allow an increase in the rates on first class mail at this time, for the reasons outlined by hon. members.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Chairman, I would first like to congratulate the new Postmaster General on his position. I congratulate him, too, on bringing forward this resolution to try to help the Post Office Department. But I think he was in too close conversation with the Minister of Transport when he drafted the resolution, and to his own detriment, I believe, before he is through. I do not think this is where the trouble is at all. I do not think it is in the increase of mailing rates at all that action is required. If we had some of the money spent in transporting and delivering the mail I think we would be hitting the nail on the head.

I can remember very well a few years ago when the trains were carrying the mail. The trains belonged to Canada, and in order to discontinue some of the feeder lines of the C.N.R. the mail was taken off the trains and carried by truck. I think if hon. members would go back over the books they would find that a great deal of expense has been created right there. You cannot carry mail by truck as cheaply as you can carry it on the train, as long as the train is travelling on the track.

I think this is one place where the department has lost a great deal of money. I have been in this house long enough to remember very well that the revenue of the Post Office Department was always very high and they helped many other departments of government that were in the red. If they had not taken on such a volume of truck delivery I think the Post Office Department would still be paying their way and would not be in the red, and it would not be necessary to increase the rates on first class mail. There is such a difference in the amount of mail coming in from the United States, out of which we get nothing compared with what we send into the United States, that there again we lose money, although I do not know how that could be corrected. I suppose there is an agreement with regard to that, but something should be done about it. The population in the United States is ten or 11 times that in Canada so we could not be expected to keep up with them; yet we buy far more from the United States than they buy from us. However, that is not a problem for this minister.

I should like the minister to remember back a few years when mail was taken off the trains and trucked all over the countryside, with the result that the railways were deprived of revenue. In some cases lines were discontinued altogether because they did not make enough money. We have a side line in our area through Kincardine to Stratford which they have been trying to discontinue for 20 years, but it is still there. There is one train a day, although there used to be two, but they cannot declare it is not making money because it is. However, I expect that before too many moons have passed that line will be taken out too. Therefore I advise the minister not to pay too much attention to some of his colleagues on the government side of the house when a measure like this is brought before the House of Commons, because I think there are other steps which he can take.

[Translation]

Mr. Martineau: I had no intention of taking part in this debate, Mr. Chairman, and if I do, it is simply to give my support to the convincing arguments put forth by my colleagues on this side of the house.

As opposed to what some hon. members have said, I believe that the resolution the Postmaster General—incidentally, I must congratulate him on his recent appointment; he is a businessman and has a great deal of experience—has brought forward suggests that he is inclined to consider the administration of his department, and especially the postal services it provides, as a business enterprise which should show some profits or at least balance its budget each fiscal year.

The postal service does not exist to yield a profit to the Post Office Department. I do not think either that it is logical to state that the postal service must pay its way, that is the Post Office Department must derive a sufficient income to meet its expenses in order to provide their service.

It is a vital service for the country, and its costs should be borne not by an increase in rates, which according to everyone, are sufficiently high, but on the contrary, out of the general revenue levied through the Department of Finance.

I think that on such an occasion, the Postmaster General should turn towards his colleague the Minister of Finance. He also is a businessman with a wide experience. Before being named Minister of Finance, he often held forth on the necessity of balancing the budget. Since he is Minister of Finance, he manages to submit the largest budgetary deficits since the war. He realizes therefore that the administration of the country costs much more than he thought and too much to enable him to balance the revenues with the expenditures.

But the main concern of the Postmaster General should be to provide the Canadian people with the essential postal services called for by everyone, without considering an increase in postal rates which are already too high. With the introduction of this resolution, he is just imposing a new tax by a devious, indirect means.

I respectfully submit that this is one of the most odious types of tax and that the burden of such a tax will fall precisely on the Canadian people, the modest taxpayer, the owner of a small newspaper—and when I talk of a small newspaper I am speaking in general of course and I am not referring to the Petit Journal—in short, about the owners of all those publications which can hardly afford such an increase in their general budget.

I hope that after hearing the serious objections raised by all the members from this side of the house, the minister will reconsider the resolution he introduced in the house and that he will withdraw it in the interests precisely of a good administration which must ensure, at all times, an adequate service at prevailing rates.

Should the minister definitely wish to effect economies, all he has to do is to read over again the Glassco commission's report, where he will find many suggestions in regard to the way of doing it.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask just one question to find out whether the Liberal lieutenant for the province of Quebec, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), intends to speak his mind as to this $36 million tax increase which will have to be borne by the Canadian people; if he refuses, then we will put the question to the former Liberal lieutenant for the province of Quebec, who has now been reduced to the ranks, namely the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne).

[Text]

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, in attempting to put the question to members of this committee you phrased it as follows: "Shall the resolution carry?" I do not think it should carry now. I do not think it should ever carry because it is, as other hon. members have pointed out, merely an attempt to gouge one portion of the population of Canada in order to protect another portion. In keeping with the historical actions or attitude of the Liberal party whenever it has been the government of this country and has dealt with postal rates, that process of gouging and protecting has been in keeping with their tradition, namely the protection of their friends at the expense of the general population.

Earlier today, in an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, occasioned initially by an off-the-cuff comment by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, there was some reference to a summer recess. The Prime Minister intimated that if the business of the house was not conducted more expeditiously there might not be any summer recess. We realize that one party in this house, namely the largest one numerically which sits in opposition, has done its utmost to obstruct matters to the point of grinding parliament to a halt, without sort of being too open about it; but if the intimation of the Prime Minister is that we have to rush things through or there will not be any summer recess, then I think that at least the members in opposition—we know the government backbenchers, even though many are privately quite critical of the resolution before us, will not say anything openly or publicly because of the rule of rigidity which exists on that side—should be prepared if necessary to grind this parliament to a halt over this particular item now before us.

I say that, because it means precisely what I said earlier, that it is merely an attempt to gouge the average citizen, the fellows in the low income groups, the small businessman and the old age pensioner, who a little while ago got $10 a month increase but who now, if he lives in a large metropolitan area and wishes to write a letter to a friend of his on the other side of the city, has to pay an extra penny each time. It is a disgraceful situation. Maybe it is only a penny. Maybe the Postmaster General, paraphrasing the late C. D. Howe, instead of saying "What's a million?" says "What's a penny?" However, if one were to count up those pennies in the pockets of the old age pensioners, people on fixed incomes or on other types of pensions, he would find it totals many millions of dollars. This is all designed to protect the friends of the government opposite, who protect the government editorially in their various newspapers.

This is a disgraceful state of affairs. Those of us from British Columbia thought that our province had been sort of insulted when the Prime Minister shuffled his cabinet and demoted the present Postmaster General from his prominent position as minister of forestry. We in British Columbia thought that with his background and knowledge of forestry he would have been quite an asset to British Columbia in that position. We thought it was an insult when he was demoted, but perhaps we see the reason why now.

It may not be that members of the opposition are desirous of filibustering or obstructing or delaying this particular measure, and if that is not the general desire then there is not much point in attempting to do so. But from my own point of view in matters such as these, I think that every means possible within the rules of the house should be used to delay the passage of the resolution, to prevent the introduction of the bill and to attempt to defeat the bill. If in the process of delay, obstruction and objection to this very iniquitous resolution the government happens to collapse and we have an election on our hands then, whether or not the people of Canada generally are desirous of having an election, we should blessed well have one, because there is no better issue to go to the country on than an attempt by the government to gouge the little people of this country in order to protect millionaires and others in preferred positions.

I do not have much more to say, except to leave that thought with the committee. Once again I express my own regret and sorrow, and the sorrow and regret of the people at home that such a measure as this is before us at this time. If and when this measure is passed by the house I know there is going to be great wonderment why this phalanx of Liberal backbenchers, the nouveau Liberals with the new ideas, did not stand up and say anything about this matter in parliament. I am not going to mention the names of any individuals. This is certainly not in keeping with common practice or what is correct, but people generally will wonder why some of these people on the backbenches, including the Minister of Fisheries who has, I see, relegated himself to the backbench, did not get up and say something about this measure. Is it because they are afraid? Is it because they do not mind whispering privately that they wish the government had not brought in this measure, but publicly they do not want to say anything? Where is this emergence of response between the grass and the brass?

An hon. Member: Jealousy.

Mr. Howard: Jealousy? I would never in my life be jealous of anyone holding any position within the Liberal party. In particular I would not be jealous of the position held by my hon. friend who is pounding his desk in glee. Perhaps he is one of those who secretly really does not like the resolution before us, but does not want to get up and say anything.

Mr. Moreau: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, is the hon. member addressing his remarks to the Chair or to me in particular?

An hon. Member: A brilliant interruption.

Mr. Douglas: Made in a public place, too.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member obviously was not serious about that interjection, Mr. Chairman, which was not in the least a question of privilege. Hon. members can laugh and chortle if they like. What is serious is the whole attitude of the government toward the general public of Canada.

When the election took place last year and there was a change from a Tory to a Liberal government the expectation in the minds of many people in Canada was that there was going to be a change in attitude, that there were going to be new ideas and concepts and the people of Canada would realize that finally they had elected a government that was going to pay attention to their individual needs, and was going to protect them. But obviously this is not the case. Oh, fine words come forth by way of press releases from the Prime Minister's office, from the Minister of Justice's office and everybody else's office about what they would like to see; but the proof of the pudding is in the eating. This, coupled with all the other things that have taken place, is proof that the Canadian people were hoodwinked and flummoxed the last time they went to the polls if they expected to get anything worth while from the election of a Liberal government.

I might as well point out in a rather direct way what I am attempting to do, and that is to retain my position until ten o'clock because I do not think this resolution should pass.

Mr. Fisher: You would concede to a Liberal backbencher.

Mr. Howard: I would gladly sit down if a Liberal backbencher would care to get up and express his own opinion.

Mr. Pigeon: The Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Howard: If the Postmaster General is ready to make any sort of sensible reply or, better still, if he is willing to withdraw this resolution I will gladly sit down. Good heavens, in the last few months this government has shown that apparently its sole desire is to introduce things and then withdraw them, or revise, alter and change them when the least criticism of them is offered. How about doing that with this measure? How about it, Mr. Minister? Tell the house publicly what your backbenchers are saying in caucus about how much they object to this measure. How about telling us that? If the minister wants to stand up and say anything at all about this resolution I will gladly sit down.

An hon. Member: What does your leader say about you in caucus?

Mr. Scott: He is a nice fellow.

Mr. Howard: These figures have been put on the record so often that perhaps some people will think they are merely put there for purposes of repetition, but they need repeating. We find that on first class mail, which is four cents or five cents postage—although if this measure passes it will all be five cents,—the profit has been 1.827 cents per piece of mail handled. As a matter of policy I do not particularly believe that we should consider a service such as the Post Office Department supplies in terms of profit and loss. However, in the case of periodicals and other such publications we find that the loss is a substantial one.

As my colleague, the hon. member for Port Arthur said earlier, this measure is merely an attempt to make old age pensioners and other such people subsidize the Thomsons, the Sifton-Bell interests and people such as that, so they can continue to flood the mails with their material. Mr. Minister, won't you please withdraw this measure?

Mr. Scott: Don't plead: Demand.

Mr. Howard: The minister sits there. Did he say yes?

An hon. Member: Certainly not.

Mr. Howard: I would be very happy to hear the minister say that he would be willing to withdraw this resolution, but as such is not the case perhaps we might call it ten o'colck and wait until tomorrow.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Smallwood: Is the order of business the same as announced last night?

Mr. Favreau: Last night I stated the order of business from now until next Tuesday. Tomorrow, of course, we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Public Works and on Monday we will have a supply motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with provisional standing order 39A, a motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that this house do now adjourn. The hon. member for Lapointe.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention the fact that a few weeks ago we suggested to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) that the winter works program should be prolonged in designated areas. The Minister of Labour did not say yes or no. He said he would take the matter into consideration. We do not often see a minister ready to take a matter into consideration and to study a suggestion made by a member of the opposition. For that reason I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour because he agreed to study that suggestion we made, and he did so, but in the end we received the answer that there would be no continuation of the winter works after April 30.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Labour has agreed to take the matter into consideration and to report to us, I would like to know what has taken place in his mind and in the minds of his officials between the minute he agreed to take our suggestion into consideration and the minute he answered no.

What were the arguments in favour of the extension of the winter works program in the month of May and what were the reasons against such an extension after April 30 in designated areas?

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the following conclusion. According to the estimates tabled recently, that would not have cost the government one cent more. Most designated areas have a harsher winter than others. Applications for various winter works to keep the unemployed busy have been submitted by those areas in November, December, January and February. What is happening today, or rather what is going to happen tomorrow is that just because the work could not be completed in those designated areas on account of the severity of the climate, projects will come to a stop even though they have been approved by both the federal and provincial governments and the necessary funds have been allocated.

When one knows that in the ridings of Roberval, Lapointe, Villeneuve and others there are still today six, eight, 12 inches, even two feet of snow, that permission was asked to carry out various projects, for instance, instal sewage systems, dig trenches or pour cement for sidewalks, and that in some municipalities, such projects, even if they were approved—the hon. members for Timmins (Mr. Martin) and Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) tell me that the same conditions prevail in their ridings, as well as in a Liberal riding of the Gaspe peninsula—have to come to a stop, one wonders why. Those projects had been proposed by the federal and provincial governments; they had been approved, funds had been allocated, but they are stopped before completion because weather conditions make it impossible to keep them going.

However, those amounts were provided for in government expenditures.

And those designated areas get the same treatment as other regions, like southern Ontario, British Columbia, or southern Alberta, which are very much privileged because even in February, March or April, digging, street repairs and sidewalks projects can be carried out.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that there is discrimination against some regions in Canada, because the regions favoured by a better climate can take full advantage of that winter works legislation, while others less privileged in regard to the climate, can take advantage of it only to the extent of 40 to 50 per cent.

So, let the Minister of Labour try and give us an explanation on that score. I am sure that he could not do it because the climate is not the same all across Canada and all regions cannot be treated on an equal footing and be enabled to take full advantage of that federal legislation, because too many of those ridings are handicapped by the severity of the weather.

I am not suggesting that the Minister of Labour is responsible for the weather, but I do say that he should be clever enough to see to it that the act is amended so that it will take into consideration the various circumstances which may exist in different regions.

The Minister of Finance was the first one to recognize that the main problem in Canada was that of unemployment and that especially in certain regions, it was a regional problem of unemployment. Besides, did not the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay) talk about various types of unemployment: regional, cyclical, structural, frictional and other unemployment. But it remains that unemployment is the most important problem, the first problem facing this country, and the Minister of Labour refuses to do his share by extending the winter works period in designated areas, where unemployment is most acute and where it would be most profitable.

There is still one more day, tomorrow. The Minister of Labour can still announce tonight that in designated areas the works already accepted and approved might be continued, but only the works approved in designated areas. By taking such action, he would prove his good faith and would show initiative at a time when this government lacks constructive ideas to fight unemployment.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the hon. member for Lapointe for his vigorous appeal for an extension in the municipal winter works program to cover the designated areas. I share with him an interest in this problem and in any proposal which may be used effectively to extend employment opportunities in these and in other areas of Canada.

However, one must not forget the original purpose of this program. As originally developed it was intended to provide additional jobs in the period of high seasonal unemployment in the winter months, when seasonal unemployment accounts for 25 per cent of the total number of unemployed. For the past several years the municipal program extended over a period of seven and a half months, and the practice in certain parts of the country has been to begin the work in the fall, reduce it in the winter months when unemployment was really high, and then take it up again in the milder spring months and complete the work. The effect of this was to destroy the purpose of the program which was, as I said, to create jobs in the period of peak unemployment.

This year we reduced the duration of the program from seven and a half months to six months and as a result we have created a much greater amount of employment over fewer months of the year. This has been the best year, ever. More jobs have been created in a shorter period of time and the province with the most definite improvement is the province from which the hon. member comes. So it has been a distinct success.

As far as designated areas are concerned, we have increased the federal payroll contribution from 50 per cent to 60 per cent in those areas so as to assist them more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret very much that I must interrupt the hon. minister, whose time has expired.

AIR TRANSPORT—INQUIRY AS TO FORMULATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): This afternoon I asked the Minister of Transport if he would tell us what progress he is making in bringing into being a national policy for civil aviation in this country. In the few minutes I have at my disposal I should like to say why I think this is an important question.

The air carriers of this country and the air transport industry generally have been crying in the last few years to have a statement of policy from the government. The aviation press, the reports from the various segments of the aviation industry and the number of visits made to Ottawa are ample testimony of this fact. The previous government attempted when in office to provide competition. It provided unlimited competition in the unscheduled charter section of the business—

Mr. Rhéaume: On a question of privilege,—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There can be no point of order or question of privilege raised at this time under the terms of the standing order governing this debate.

Mr. Rhéaume: Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has said something which constitutes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must ask the hon. member to resume his seat. If we follow this procedure, which is very strict and which has been recommended to the house by the committee on procedure, the hon. member asking the question is allowed seven minutes and the minister has three minutes in which to reply. We cannot allow points of order or questions of privilege. I believe this is the way in which we have operated up till now and I certainly urge hon. members to continue along those lines.

Mr. Rhéaume: With due deference, under standing orders as they now exist I am obliged to raise a question of privilege as soon as I understand that a breach of privilege has occurred—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? As he has said, a member has to raise a question of privilege at the first opportunity, but since it cannot be done now I presume that the earliest it could be done would be some time tomorrow.

Mr. Nielsen: Do I understand that your ruling is that the amendment, the provisional standing order, does not allow the raising of a question of privilege or a point of order in any circumstances?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is so.

Mr. Hahn: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the previous government introduced competition to the charter segment of the industry. They also introduced competition to the scheduled carriers across the country. They created competition, but in so doing they created a certain amount of chaos in the industry because they failed at that time to also create a comprehensive policy for air transport in the country. This is something that the industry desperately needs, because it is a highly complex industry comprising several parts all of which are inter-related. I would like to take just a minute to look at some of these parts and some of the problems.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question at this point?

Mr. Hahn: I am sorry; I do not have the time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The provisional order under which we operate and have this adjournment debate does not permit any questions by hon. members. Even if the hon. member were to allow a question, I do not think the Chair could allow it.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member will only be expostulating a lot of nonsense if he does not answer a question.

Mr. Hahn: We have heard a lot of nonsense from that side; I think it is time for a few facts from this. The first segment of the industry is the international, trans-oceanic section of scheduled carriers. It is very important in this section that our two national carriers not compete against each other, but they must together compete against the carriers from the rest of the world. They have to sit down together, with one voice, when Canada is negotiating air routes; they have to be in agreement when we are trying to negotiate in ICAO air fares, and so on, that extend internationally.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if Your Honour would draw the attention of the house to where it says in the amended standing order that we cannot raise a question of privilege or a point of order in this period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might say, if the hon. member will co-operate with the Chair, that I do not have before me the amended order; but I was a member of the committee, and it was definitely the understanding of the members of the committee that this was the basis on which we were to proceed. The hon. member might allow the Chair the opportunity to look at this matter when the opportunity affords itself.

Mr. Nielsen: I have the order before me, Mr. Speaker, and I can see nowhere—and perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) can assist us in regard to the question I have raised—that a question of privilege or point of order cannot be raised during these proceedings.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have resisted offering any advice, because anything that is said now detracts from the seven minutes allowed an hon. member. I thought this had been clearly outlined in regard to our procedure at this time. But the words are there:

> There shall be no appeal against any decision made by Mr. Speaker under the provisions of this standing order.

That is in provisional standing order 39A. You have made decisions, Mr. Speaker, and those decisions cannot be appealed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I please have order for just a moment. It seems to me the reference that has just been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is quite clear. It is clear to the Chair in any event, and I am sure it is the intention and purport of this provisional standing order that during the brief period of time, seven minutes, allowed to hon. members on both sides of the house to ask questions or make statements during the adjournment debate, and the three minutes allowed to ministers, there can certainly be no question that we should engage in debate or raising points of order or questions of privilege, which would obviously defeat the whole purpose of the provisional standing order.

I might also refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 105 at page 96, which says:

> It is the practice in the House of Commons to bring up a question of privilege after prayers, and before the house has taken up the orders of the day. Only in very aggravated cases, requiring the immediate interposition of the house, will any business be suddenly interrupted.

The point was raised by an hon. member a moment ago that he wanted his question of privilege raised at the first opportunity, and I suggested to him—and this is supported by this citation—that the time to raise his question of privilege would be tomorrow, as is suggested in the citation which I have just brought to the attention of the house.

Mr. Nielsen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the rule, quite apart from the interpretation put upon it by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), refers only to appeals from Your Honour's ruling; it says nothing whatsoever about raising points of order, apart from the citation Your Honour has just quoted, during this period. I think hon. members have every right to raise a point of order during any proceedings of the house. If the order was intended to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is, in any event, the well considered and, I believe, objective ruling of the Chair at this time, and I would ask hon. members to abide by this ruling. The seven minutes which had been allowed the hon. member have actually expired. I fail to see anywhere in the provisional standing order any provision whereby we may supplement the time the hon. member has lost by taking questions of privilege, which means that the whole premise of this debate would be defeated every time by hon. members raising points of order, thus depriving an hon. member of the short, brief time set aside for him. Actually the only conclusion I can come to now is that the hon. member's time has expired and I would ask the Minister of Transport to make his statement.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have given the decision of the Chair. A point of order has been raised and the Chair, after considering the matter, has decided there is no point of order or question of privilege. The standing order clearly says there can be no appeal. Therefore, I suggest to hon. members that as we are operating under a new standing order which is being put to the test from day to day, and in view of what has happened tonight perhaps the matter might be referred to the procedure committee for further consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. member for Lapointe has followed the short debate which has just ended, he will recognize that the ruling of the Chair is to the effect that there can be no point of order on the adjournment debate. So I shall ask him to be kind enough to abide by this ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say a word to ask whether your decision is a precedent—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Grégoire: —under the new standing order because it is not at all in that way that we have understood it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister of Transport.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, this house has surely not come to the position—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor and I intend to proceed even if the baying across the way—

Mr. Starr: —that a member of this house cannot raise—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I fail to see how the hon. member for Ontario can have the floor at this time. The Chair has recognized the Minister of Transport and I would ask the Minister of Transport to speak now.

Mr. Starr: I am rising on a point of order. I do not think you can—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order; the minister's time has also expired.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps the obvious solution to this difficulty into which we are now getting is to recognize that the time allotted to the Minister of Transport has now expired.

Mr. Starr: That is right; he cannot speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Therefore I call on the hon. member for Queens.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, that is not what the new regulation means. If an hon. member is not permitted to speak because of the opposition, the new rule does not provide an answer to such a situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the ordinary rules apply. The Minister of Transport is not to blame if he was prevented from speaking, the opposition is. In that case, he should be given the floor. What has happened tonight is not normal.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lapointe is also a member of the special committee on procedure which tried, up to now, to improve the rules of the house. It is possible that the interpretation given to the new standing order tonight is neither exact nor in conformity with the spirit thereof. I think it is up to the Chair to give a ruling in this matter. I thought it had been agreed during the proceedings of the committee that discussion would never extend beyond 10.30 p.m. What I would suggest, and once again I rely on the co-operation of the hon. member for Lapointe, is that our committee be given the opportunity to review that interpretation in the light of this difficult and complex situation that has developed this evening.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, what I cannot accept is that you allowed the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to express his opinion, while refusing me that privilege, though I was sitting on the same committee.

To my mind, this is discrimination. All hon. members should be treated alike, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as well as myself. I had the right to air my views, as well as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because I was a member of that committee, and indeed, so were you. The views you expressed a few moments ago did not tally with the section which was passed when the committee discussed the matter. I do not accept your ruling, and would like to know whether you established a precedent or not. I expect a decision thereon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall not rebuke the hon. member, but I did hear his argument. He might have wanted to expound it more fully, but he has—

Mr. Grégoire: You did not leave me enough time to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member submitted the essence of his argument, and I asked for his co-operation, so as to enable the committee, if it served some purpose—and I think it would—to reconsider the provisions of the new temporary standing order.

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might suggest that the hon. member for Queens should not be penalized because of the disgusting conduct of his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think there should be any comment about the discussion we have had so far. If it is the unanimous desire of all hon. members that the hon. member for Queens be allowed his full seven minutes to make his presentation, I would certainly be prepared to hear him.

Mr. Starr: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gratuitous remarks of the Minister of Transport not be included in Hansard, because they were gratuitous only and did not add anything to the dignity of this house.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all agree with the minister's suggestion, as long as he agrees that none of the remarks were intentionally disgusting.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, all I can say to hon. gentlemen opposite is that they ought to remember December 20 a year and a bit more ago.

Mr. Starr: Any contribution the Minister of Transport makes does not add to the dignity of this house at any time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not even allowed to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand we have the unanimous consent of all hon. members to hear the probably somewhat more gentle remarks of the hon. member for Queens?

Mr. Starr: But not from the Minister of Transport.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: I agree, provided the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is allowed to make the statement he wished to make a moment ago when he was prevented from doing so by hon. members opposite. I feel that such a solution would be fair to both parties.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Obviously things are getting a little more complicated and perhaps a little bit out of hand. We have now reached the time of adjournment. There is a motion before the house for adjournment and the motion is deemed to have been carried. Therefore, it being 10.30 p.m. this house stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

APPENDIX

CYPRUS—REPORT TO UNITED NATIONS BY SECRETARY GENERAL

1. UN peace keeping force in Cyprus, on the date of issuance of this report, will have been operational for about one month, that is to say, for one third of the time foreseen in the security council resln of Mar 4. This initial period has been devoted to the deployment of the force, to intensive efforts to prevent a recurrence of fighting and to contributing to the maintenance and restoration of law and order in accordance with the mandate given to the force by the security council. The commander of the force and his staff, during this period, have had the opportunity to become intimately acquainted with the nature and complexity of their tasks and the situation in Cyprus, and to establish contacts with all the parties concerned on the island. In this period, at least until last week end, there had been a relative improvement in the situation in Cyprus, in the sense that except for some sporadic fighting in the Kyrenia range area no—repeat "no"—major military clash has occured and situations which might lead to such major clashes were being contained. For such developments UN operation in Cyprus may claim no—repeat "no"—small credit. The outbreak on Apr 26 of serious fighting in the area of the Pentadaktylos range (Kyrenia mountains) is, of course, a setback.

2. Ultimate responsibility for a return to normal conditions in Cyprus must, obviously, rest primarily with the authorities and people of Cyprus themselves, since normality can come about only as a result of a determination by the two communities, so many of whose members on both sides are now armed and active as a sort of loosely organized militia, to lay down their arms and seek to live again in peace. The relationship and the tension between the two main groups of the population continue to be a cause for gravest anxiety. Since UN force became operational in Cyprus, there have been a number of isolated incidents of shooting in which innocent civilians have been the victims, incidents which have been utterly senseless and are disturbing in their indication of an attitude of irresponsibility and callousness toward human life on the part of those doing the shooting. UNFICYP received reports of a large number of persons missing before UN operation began, and since then further reports have been received that cases are still occurring of persons missing, whose whereabouts are unknown.

3. UN cannot—repeat "not"—be indifferent to savage acts of this kind and I appeal in strongest terms to all concerned to take immediate steps to bring an end to them.

4. UNFICYP, on its part, has the duty to take all possible steps available to it which might facilitate the resumption of normal life in Cyprus. It must seek always to prevent a recurrence of fighting, while also taking reasonable initiatives designed to lead to a return to conditions in Cyprus under which an ordinary man may move about freely and carry on with his day's work without fear or hindrance. Only slight progress has been made so far toward implementing this third aspect of UNFICYP's mandate. But much careful thought has been given to this aspect of the task and the conclusion has been reached that there are initiatives which can be taken by the operation holding out at least a hope for success, and that these must be undertaken without delay by means of intensive discussion and negotiation with the parties concerned. Toward this end, the mission in Cyprus needs urgently to be strengthened by the addition of a top level political officer, who, on behalf of SecGen, could conduct negotiations for the implementation of the program mentioned in para 10 below and outlined in annex I to this report. This need has been underscored by General Gyani, who for too long now has been carrying, with devotion and distinction, the dual load of commanding the force and conducting negotiations on a variety of essentially non-military matters. Nothing in this sphere, of course, has been done or will be done which would in any way impinge upon the efforts of the mediator to find solutions to the basic problems. I wish to reiterate my full confidence in both General Gyani and Ambassador Tuomioja as mediator. As commander of the force, General Gyani, with great ability and complete impartiality, has sought to make the force effective in the discharge of its mandates from the security council.

5. General Gyani, in pursuance of my instructions and, indeed, in accordance with his own views, has consistently sought to achieve the desired and defined objectives of the force in Cyprus by peaceful means, that is without resort to armed force, the arms of the force being carried only for clear purposes of self defence. Despite concerted effort by General Gyani and the force, and my own earlier appeals, fighting persists in Cyprus, with lives of Cypriots—Greek and Turk alike—being needlessly and pointlessly sacrificed. I wish here to emphasize my view that UN force was dispatched to Cyprus to try to save lives by preventing a recurrence of fighting. It would be incongruous, even a little insane, for that force to set about killing Cypriots, whether Greek or Turkish, to prevent them from killing each other. Yet, that is exactly the dilemma which is almost confronting General Gyani in Cyprus today.

6. On the other hand, the force cannot—repeat "not"—stand idly by and see an undeclared war deliberately pursued, or see innocent civilians of all ages ruthlessly struck down by snipers' bullets. In view of the security council's objective of ending fighting, the action at St. Hilarion of the past few days is especially serious since it clearly was a planned and organized military effort.

7. Both sides have given to General Gyani their versions of the present fighting situation and their reasons for it. Greek Cypriot authorities assert that the action was urgently necessary because armed Turkish Cypriots occupying positions in the hills of the sector were harassing Greek villages by firing against them, endangering lives of the inhabitants and preventing them from cultivating their fields and grazing their animals; because of the building by the Turkish Cypriots of an air strip at the bottom of the range, and the blocking by them of the Kyrenia road, the only access to Kyrenia. The Turkish Cypriots, on the other hand, justify their holding on to this area militarily because to the south of the range there are three main Turkish villages and in the north one, which, they assert, would be endangered and harassed if Greek Cypriots controlled the range.

8. Moreover, General Gyani had no—repeat "no"—notice or knowledge of the action in advance, and therefore he could take no—repeat "no"—steps to prevent it. He immediately took up this question with the Cypriot authorities, pointing out the implications of a military action of this kind for the future status and effectiveness of UN force in Cyprus. Ever since the fighting began, General Gyani has been exerting every effort to stop the fighting and toward this end has been seeing top officials on both sides. On Apr 28, he received assurances of peaceful intent from both the president and vice president of Cyprus. The two statements in connection with these matters issued by General Gyani in Nicosia on Apr 28 are appended as annex II. As of Apr 29, the fighting has stopped and quiet prevails. There was no—repeat "no"—interposition of UN force in this situation because the fighting broke out unexpectedly and an interposition under heavy fire would be neither feasible nor—repeat "nor"—helpful. The effort of the commander, therefore, has concentrated on bringing an end to the active fighting, which now seems to have been achieved.

9. UN force, in view of its mandate to use its best efforts to prevent a recurrence of war, must do all that it possibly can to stop fighting. It has been seeking to do this by all means short of bullets, and it should be solidly backed in this endeavour by all members of UN. In this it has my fullest support. In this context, I also call attention to para 1 of the security council resln of Mar 4 (U/5575).

10. The force was deployed in Cyprus because govt of Cyprus, the govts of Greece, Turkey and UK, and all of the members of the security council had reached the conclusion that there had been too much fighting, bloodshed and destruction in Cyprus and it should now come to an end. There was no—repeat "no"—assessment of blame for what had happened and none is made now. But there must be an end to fighting and it will surely become necessary to determine responsibility if it continues.

11. It is the parties themselves who alone can remedy the critical situation of Cyprus. The authorities of the govt of Cyprus and the leaders of the Turkish community must, with a high sense of responsibility, act urgently to bring completely to an end the fighting in Cyprus, if that island country is to avoid utter disaster. This can mean only that high officials of the govt and the Turkish Cypriot leaders will voluntarily and immediately renounce recourse to force as the way to solution of the problems of Cyprus. That is the critical and decisive need at this juncture. Because it is so, I feel bound to appeal most strongly to President Makarios and Vice President Kuchuk to announce publicly, without delay, that, in accordance with the letter and spirit of the security council resln of Mar 4, and in view of the operational presence of UN force in Cyprus, there is no—repeat "no"—reason for further fighting in Cyprus and therefore they renounce it, calling upon their respective adherents throughout the island to heed their call. Then, UN force in Cyprus could begin to function effectively, for it could underwrite security for all, for both Turk and Greek Cypriot, and help to restore normal conditions of life for all Cypriots.

12. The mere presence of UN peace keeping force in the island and its day to day efforts at the military level to prevent or stop armed clashes and to help in the maintenance of law and order are not—repeat "not"—alone enough to effect the kind of improvement in the over-all situation which can really bring about a basic relaxation of tension and a fundamental betterment of deplorable conditions of fear, insecurity and distress in which very many of the inhabitants of Cyprus now live. Such an improvement is also vital if the efforts of the mediator to promote a peaceful solution of the problem are to bear fruit. On the other hand, in the prevailing climate of mistrust and hostility, the communities concerned in the Cyprus problem are themselves often inhibited from taking the kinds of initiative which might lead to a substantial reduction of tension and conflict, and when proposals are put forth they are likely to be rejected—less on their merit than on the fact of their origin in one group or the other.

13. Taking such factors as the above into account, and in particular having in mind the urgent necessity of making progress in order to avoid having the operation in Cyprus stand still and eventually bog down, I have formulated, with the assistance of the force commander based upon his experience of the past four weeks, a program of steps and objectives toward the implementation of which, I believe, UN peace keeping operation should now concentrate its efforts. This program, about which, as a matter of course, the several parties and govts concerned have been informed, will require the co-operation of all those involved as well as their good faith and their confidence in UN peace keeping operation, if it is to be effective in producing the improvements which all desire. I believe, however, that the security council resln demands no—repeat "no"—less than earnest co-operation from all concerned, in the interest of the people of Cyprus and of the maintenance of international peace and security. The program which I have in mind, and which is annexed hereto, is by no—repeat "no"—means exhaustive, but it can serve as a yardstick against which the govts and peoples concerned, and the members of the security council, may measure the progress that is being made towards the objectives outlined in the security council resln of Mar 4, and reaffirmed on Mar 13.

14. In situations as complex as that now prevailing in Cyprus, the worst enemies are suspicion, fear and lack of confidence, breeding, as they so often do, hatred and violence. I believe that it may be useful, therefore, for SecGen of UN to make public at this particular time a program of reasonable objectives which all parties should readily find it possible to support. I earnestly hope that on the basis of the practical goals set forth in this program, Cyprus, with the assistance of UNFICYP, may be able to move significantly toward peace and normality.

ANNEX I

Objectives and interim aims of a comprehensive program of action for UNFICYP:

1. The task of UN force, as given in the security council resln of Mar 4, is to use its best efforts toward the following objectives: (A) to prevent a recurrence of fighting; (B) to contribute to the maintenance and restoration of law and order; (C) to contribute to a return to normal conditions.

Efforts in any of these directions must, to have their maximum effect and durability, be made in a concerted manner, bearing in mind that (A) and (B) above are decisive steps leading to the over-all objective of the restoration of normal conditions in the daily life of the people.

2. The following is a suggested list of some of the objectives that could be defined as part of the program of action designed to implehensive program of action for UNFICYP:

(A) Achievement of freedom of movement on all roads in Cyprus, including the Kyrenia road.

(B) Achievement of freedom of movement for all communities within the whole town of Nicosia and other cities under conditions of security.

(C) Progressive evacuation and removal of all fortified positions held by Greek and Turkish Cypriots, with priority given to Nicosia.

(D) Exam of the problem arising from the div that has taken place in the Cyprus police between the Turkish Cypriots and the Greek Cypriot members and the negotiation of necessary measures for their progressive reintegration.

(E) The progressive disarming of all civilians other than the regular police gendarmerie and the Cyprus army by the Cypriot govt and the Turkish community. UNFICYP, if requested, would assist in facilitating and verifying the disarming and the storage of arms under conditions of security.

(F) The control of extremists on both sides.

(G) The formulation of appropriate general amnesty arrangements.

(H) The arrangement of security measures and other necessary conditions to facilitate return to normal conditions and particularly of economic activity.

(I) The facilitation of the return of Turkish Cypriot civil servants and govt officials to their duties, including the public services, such as postal, telecommunications, etc.

(J) The normal functioning of the judiciary.

The process of consultation and negotiation on these aims would continue side by side with the day to day efforts of the force to carry out its mandate.

3. While efforts to make progress on the above points continue, certain interim aims should also be established and pressed in selected localities and on particular problems. The following are suggested:

(A) The removal of emplacements, fortifications and trenches in selected areas of Nicosia with a view to repeating this measure subsequently in other areas.

(B) A determined effort in selected areas of Nicosia to re-establish normality by returning to their homes, under UN security guarantee, refugees, as, for example, those from Hamed Mandres to Omorphita who would not—repeat "not"—carry arms, and attention to the development of a program for the rehabilitation of their dwellings.

(C) A careful formulation of ways in which UNFICYP might be helpful in meeting the problem of the excesses by individual policemen in the course of searching and seizing civilians which at present causes much tension. Such a plan, which would largely depend on the use of UNFICYP police, would require a reliable system of reporting of abuses and a regular follow through by UNFICYP in every case, and would also require a high degree of liaison and confidence with all Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot members of the Cyprus police.

(D) The institution of procedures for inquiry into every serious instance of shooting, especially when casualties occur, so that a full record of such incidents, the reasons and responsibilities for them, can be determined and maintained.

(E) The elaboration of a plan for the reintegration, with UNFICYP assistance and guarantee, of the Turkish Cypriot policemen into the Cyprus police force, perhaps starting in one or two carefully selected Turkish Cypriot communities.

(F) The use of UNFICYP good offices with both sides to improve the existing unacceptable living conditions through resuming essential public utilities and services and finally to ensure normal living conditions for the Turkish Cypriot community in tense areas, such as Ktima and Polis.

(G) Initial efforts to facilitate the return of Turkish Cypriot officials and civil servants to their positions in govt service.

(H) An appraisal of the possibility of establishing in certain areas Cypriot Greek-Turkish-UNFICYP joint patrols as a means of restoring confidence and promoting a return to normality.

(I) Efforts, with UNFICYP if necessary providing security, to revive meetings of Greek and Turkish Cypriots, both official and non-official, and at all levels.

ANNEX II

Statements issued on Apr 28, by Lt General PS Gyani, commander of UN force in Cyprus.

1. Quote—The scale of and the manner in which the operations have been carried out by forces under the authority of the govt of Cyprus in the areas of Pentadaktylos range (Kyrenia mountains) on Apr 26 and 27, indicate that these operations had been preplanned. HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 1, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—STATEMENT BY TRANSPORT MINISTER ON TELEVISION RATHER THAN IN HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Douglas: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: —affecting all hon. members of this house.

Mr. Speaker: I am faced with two questions of privilege. Is the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Douglas: Yes, I am.

Mr. Nielsen: I too am rising on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members of this house.

Mr. Douglas: My question of privilege has to do also with the rights of members of this house, and I would like to state it.

Mr. Speaker: In cases of doubt, I have to give it—

An hon. Member: To the official opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Thank you; the Chair is able to make up its own mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I have to make the judgment of Solomon, and little factors have to be taken into consideration. I must say that the hon. member for Yukon did speak to me just before the opening of the sitting, and he did say he would raise this question.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question of privilege involves two matters the first being of serious concern to all hon. members of the house. It would appear that it arose for the first time last evening. It concerns the application of new provisional order No. 39 and the belief, mistaken in my view, that the strict application of the rule would mean that no questions of privilege or points of order can be raised between 10 and 10.30 p.m. I suggest, sir, that the rule be again considered by yourself and clarification brought down to the members of the house in this regard, or referred back to the rules committee.

I will be very brief on this particular aspect of the question of privilege. If Your Honour will refer to Votes and Proceedings for April 20, Your Honour will notice that the last paragraph of provisional rule 39(5) stipulates as follows:

> There shall be no appeal against any decision made by Mr. Speaker under the provisions of this subsection.

The provisions of this subsection refer to the rule that the discretion of Your Honour is to be accepted as to whether a particular question asked on orders of the day is urgent. I submit to Your Honour that the provision prohibiting an appeal relates strictly to a decision of Your Honour on a question of urgency. If Your Honour rules a question out of order on any other ground except that of urgency, I submit that the ordinary rules apply.

The second part of this matter relates to the absence of any reference in the new rule to points of order and questions of privilege being raised in the half hour between 10 and 10.30; the new rule is absolutely silent on this matter. If it was the intention of the rules committee that there should be no questions of privilege or points of order raised in this half hour, I submit it should have been so stated in the new rule. As it stands now, the new rule being silent on the subject, it will be my submission that questions of privilege and points of order can be raised, under the ordinary rules of the house. I submit that we need clarification on these points from Your Honour or by reference back to the rules committee.

The other portion of my question of privilege has to do with the circumstances as they did arise last night. On the orders of the day the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn) raised an absolutely planted and connived question with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: —with respect to a national air policy. The Minister of Transport was obviously prepared to answer on orders of the day; he had a written statement in his hand.

He was prevented, however, by Your Honour from doing so; in other words Your Honour ruled the question out of order and it was transferred for debate on the adjournment at ten o'clock last night. The question was again raised last night and a question of privilege was attempted to be raised by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume), when we got into this situation.

The situation would never have arisen if the minister had followed the usual custom and practice of making government policy announcements on motions, even if he had to resort to the practice followed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) the other night when he asked at six o'clock to revert to motions in order to make an important announcement concerning government policy. We have had the occurrence time and again throughout this session of ministers leaking or releasing information on government policy to the press before the members of this house are informed.

The vehicles that are used, too, come in for some criticism. Here we have a publicly owned broadcasting system for which the minister is responsible, or which at least reports through the minister to parliament; and he uses his position of responsibility in order to make public announcements over the C.B.C. This practice of the minister is quite reprehensible to me, and I am quite sure to a good many other members in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre just a day or two ago expressed his view to the minister that we should not submit to having to read announcements on government policy in the press. That is what happened. The Toronto Globe and Mail was on the streets this morning at 8.30. It contained the release about which the house has still not heard because of the minister's disregard of the rules in not making an announcement on motions yesterday. The Globe and Mail had the information by five o'clock yesterday, and I had that information from the Globe and Mail office by seven o'clock.

The house is entitled to an explanation of this conduct—this disgusting conduct, since the minister himself used that phrase last night—in making this type of release outside the house. We have been waiting for weeks for an announcement on air policy. Hon. members have been asking questions since as far back as February 26. The minister, in contempt of the rights of the members of this house, has chosen to release the information to the press, as he has on other occasions, before informing the members of this house. This is a practice which we think is in need of correction, and in order to bring it forcefully to the attention of the government benches it seems that a substantive motion is in order. Accordingly I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler):

> That this house condemns the action of ministers from time to time in announcing outside of the house policy decisions which should be announced in the house, an example of which being the announcement yesterday outside the house by the Minister of Transport of air policy, such action being a flagrant disregard of the custom, practices and privileges of this house and its members.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, before Your Honour decides whether there is a question of privilege, and since the hon. member invited me to make an explanation, perhaps I might be permitted to explain the circumstances attending this whole matter.

I considered very carefully last Friday morning whether the very tentative decision which was taken by the government to carry on another stage in the formulation of air policy, which has not yet been formulated and which I am sure will not be formulated for at least another month, justified my coming to the house and taking up the time of the house in making what might be called a progress report of what the government is doing about this matter.

I came to the conclusion that I should abide by the rules of the house, which, as I have always understood them, provide that ministers should not use the period on motions—and there have been many complaints about this on the other side—for propaganda purposes to advance the position of the government by way of trial balloons. I understand the rules to provide that ministers should not make statements on motions unless they are factual and deal with some matter which has been definitely decided and is final, and which would then require action of some kind by parliament in due course.

In other words, if I had had anything to say which would have led immediately to legislation, I think it would have been a discourtesy to the house to make the statement elsewhere. If I had had anything to say which was definite and would involve a request for expenditures, then, since the government is responsible to the house and cannot spend public money without a vote of the house, it seems to me that one should not make these statements outside the house, when the house is sitting, without first letting the house know that the government is going to ask for that expenditure to be made; in other words that is a matter which is going to become the business of the house. However, if it is an ordinary part of the administration entrusted to the government, about which hundreds of statements are made every day, we would have no time left for the carrying on of the legislative and other business of this house if the time of parliament was cluttered up with matters of that kind.

Having considered that very carefully, I came to the conclusion it would not be a proper thing to do on motions, then or later, nor was it a matter that necessarily needed to be announced to anyone at all. But after I had met the presidents of the two railways and the presidents of the two air lines on Monday morning, it was drawn to my attention that they had themselves been seen coming into my office and that there was some curiosity about this. I was approached by several people, and I indicated to them that there was nothing secret about this matter, and if anyone made any inquiry about it I would indicate to the public exactly what I had intended to indicate to the air lines as to the lines along which they were being asked to proceed.

This is not government policy. This is just a stage in the formulation of government policy; and when an hon. member asked a question about this matter, as was done in the house yesterday, I would have responded except that the Speaker decided the question was not of that degree of urgency. The hon. member then put it down for debate after ten o'clock. After that had been done I was, as is quite natural, approached by several members of the press to see if they could find out about this matter. I was told also that there was a speculative story in the Financial Post. I said "I am going to tell the House of Commons, after ten o'clock tonight, in a very general way what I told the air lines, and I would rather you listen then but there is nothing secret about it." It just so happened, because hon. members felt it more desirable to use the time in other ways, that I was precluded after ten o'clock last night from answering the hon. member's question, and to him I apologize for that although it was not really my fault.

But, sir, these principles which I communicated to the air lines are not a statement of government policy at all. They are a statement of certain principles on which the government feels air policy should be based after there has been discussion, first with the main line carriers and then with the regional carriers and other interested bodies. I thought the house was entitled to have a legitimate curiosity satisfied about this matter, but since it was not a matter that the house was going to be called upon to deal with I did not feel I should have taken the initiative in inflicting it upon the house.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has presented his motion, and I think we should hear from other hon. members.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is arguing that the statement which he made last night is not a matter of government policy. After examining it carefully I would say that it has very serious implications with respect to government policy. I would go further and say that for me it is a cause of great concern, because I can already see the shadow of the axe falling on certain activities of Trans-Canada Air Lines.

If the minister did not think it was an important statement of policy, I want to know why he suborned the C.B.C. into allowing him to make a statement on national television last night, which he was prevented from making in this house because of his failure to comply with the rules of the house. I do not condone the actions which prevented the minister from making his statement last night on the adjournment procedure, but the fact is that the fault lies mainly with the minister himself. It was apparent that there was an important statement to be made. Whether it was on the formulation of policy or a final decision on the matter of policy, the minister was desirous of making a statement. Instead of making it on motions, which was the proper place so that a member from each party could have made some comment on it—and I personally certainly would have been extremely interested in making some comments on the statement the minister made last night—instead of following this proper course the minister very transparently had a question planted, which was asked by the hon. member for Broadview. Your Honour ruled that the question might more properly be placed on the order paper, whereupon the hon. member for Broadview had it transferred to the adjournment proceedings.

I make no excuse for those who prevented the minister making his statement on the adjournment proceedings, but having failed to do that the minister could have made a statement on motions today. The house was entitled to have that statement made in the house where members could comment on it and ask questions about it. Instead, the minister virtually compelled the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to allow him to go on the air last night on television and on radio this morning to make a statement which the house had not yet heard.

I saw the television broadcast on the eleven o'clock news last night. There were two things that were quite apparent to anyone who viewed it objectively. The first was that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was embarrassed at having to put the minister on, and it was very apparent that they were doing so under pressure. The second thing that was quite apparent was that the minister was in a tantrum. If I had been picking a title for the production I would have called it "Pick in a Pique".

Mr. Speaker, I want to appeal to the Prime Minister. No other member of this house, having failed to get the floor to make a statement, is allowed to go to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and compel them to allow him to make a statement to the people of Canada which he has been unable, because of the rules of the house, to make in parliament. The minister said a while ago he did not want to be popping up giving what might appear to be government propaganda. What does he think talking to two million viewers last night was but government propaganda?

I would appeal to the Prime Minister to intervene in matters of this kind. If every time ministers find they are balked in some respect in the house, particularly a minister who until a few months ago was in charge of the C.B.C., they are to be permitted to go to the C.B.C. and order that body to put them on the air so they can go over the head of the House of Commons and appeal to the people of Canada; if that right is to be given to the Minister of Transport or any other minister, then it must be given to all members of the house.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion that has been made is one of the most serious that has come before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that those on the other side ridicule the opposition, but the C.B.C. must be kept free from political influence—

[Mr. Douglas.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —from without and within. Let that be clear. Too often recently the C.B.C. has apparently been subjected to the kind of control that last night took the form of intimidation on the part of the minister. I should like to ask the Secretary of State this question. Who was the medium of communication between the Minister of Transport and the C.B.C.? It was very obvious last night from the words used by Mr. DePoe that he felt that what was being done was improper. He made it very clear and definite that what was taking place was improper, and it was.

Are we to find ourselves in parliament in this position; that a minister, because his dignity has been hurt and his susceptibilities have been exacerbated, can rush to the C.B.C. and make the kind of statement which was made last night, a statement which was the epitome of Liberal propaganda? Certainly the time has come when this house and the country should find out the degree to which there is interference on the part of this government with the C.B.C. That could not have happened unless there was intervention by someone with influence. As I listened to what Mr. DePoe had to say, it seemed clear to me he objected to the C.B.C. being used as a cat's paw by the minister, and we want to find out the full circumstances in this connection.

Now, the minister says this was not an announcement of policy; it was just a kind of declaration of potential consideration of the problem. Is it potential consideration for the minister to say to T.C.A. and Canadian Pacific Airlines "This is what we want to achieve"? Even a suggestion, coming from one of the august eminence of the Minister of Transport, would have a tremendous effect on those who are subject to him, and that is what it amounts to.

Apparently it was leaked out elsewhere. The hon. gentleman mentioned the Financial Post. He called it a speculative article. Well, more and more, since this government came to office, government policy has become the subject of announcements through speculative articles. Last night what was denied to parliament was made available elsewhere.

I was not here for what took place last night, but I can say this; that the minister, yesterday, was obviously disturbed all through the day, sputtering like a squib, obviously annoyed about something. I do not know what it was, but he showed it all day yesterday, and his performance on the C.B.C. last night should earn for him one of the Oscars for nonsense.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Perhaps in view of the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition I might be permitted to say a word on this matter. The right hon. gentleman concluded his statement, after making some offensive personal remarks about the minister concerned, by saying that certain information was denied to parliament. Mr. Speaker, that information last night was denied by the opposition, so that parliament and the people could not hear it.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Was he in the house yesterday when the hon. member for Yukon—and we were all in agreement—offered unanimous consent to allow the minister to make his statement on the orders of the day?

Mr. Pearson: I was not in the house, any more than certain other hon. gentlemen were in the house. But it was clear that the minister—

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (Macleod): On a point of order. With regard to the statement which has just been made by the Prime Minister blaming the opposition for doing certain things and keeping this information away from the house and the public, I think in the light of the explanation which has been given by the leader of the New Democratic party the Prime Minister should withdraw his statement.

Mr. Pearson: I said that last night, after ten o'clock, this information was denied to parliament by the actions of the opposition, and that is strictly accurate.

However, this does bring up some important questions. It is perfectly obvious that under the change we have made in our rules on a trial basis, a minister who is replying to a question raised at ten o'clock has three minutes only in which to do so, and that if questions of privilege and points of order are brought up in that period it is perfectly easy to prevent him saying anything at all. I think that should be looked into.

Now the question has been raised—and it is an important one—about making statements on motions rather than making them in reply to questions; in short, how the procedure on motions should be used, and I would hope that the committee on procedure would deal with this matter in its next report so that we can clear up this difficulty—because it is a real difficulty—of when to make statements on motions and when they are more suitably made in reply to a question, which can be followed immediately by supplementary questions. We have now a situation where if a statement is made on motions there can be four comments made, one after another. In any event, I think this is becoming an increasingly important matter in our procedure, and I hope the committee will be able to do something about it.

Perhaps I do not need to go into the charge which has been levelled at the minister and which is reflected in this particular motion, because the facts are clear; but in bringing this matter to the attention of the house this morning the Leader of the Opposition was careful to emphasize that no pressure should be brought to bear on the C.B.C. by any member of the government. I could not agree with him more. We should get away from this idea that a member of the government should try to persuade the C.B.C. to do anything, or that if they do not do something heads will roll. I am informed that no pressure whatever was brought to bear on the C.B.C. last night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: It is all right for hon. gentlemen opposite to laugh. The right hon. gentleman opposite made his charge without any evidence at all except his own intuition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Pearson: I think the C.B.C. will have to deal with this matter itself and issue a statement as to whether pressure of any kind was brought to bear. They are the people who know. I may add that we have to be awfully careful here. The C.B.C. puts on a program which has been free from political partisanship over the months and the years; and the other night, for the first time, a member of parliament from the Conservative party appeared on that program, to the surprise of a great many people. At that time we did not suggest that some pressure must have been brought to bear on the corporation to allow a Conservative member of parliament to make a partisan statement on a "Viewpoint" program. I did not get up in the house and complain, with contrived indignation, that this was the result of pressure brought to bear on the national broadcasting system.

It is clear that the hon. member who moved the motion and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam did not have any evidence to support their statements, and if they are going to make a charge of this kind against the government they should be careful not to make it without any evidence to support their allegations. They said, without any evidence except their own intuitive reaction, that pressure was brought to bear on the C.B.C., and they said that the question which started all this was a contrived and planted question. They gave no evidence at all to support that statement, and when charges of this kind are made in parliament I think members on all sides should be careful to support those charges with evidence. That has not been the case with regard to these particular charges.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I am sure no one in this house is very happy about what took place last night. There has been a reflection on the C.B.C. and, to a degree, on the committee which worked so hard to try to help out in the adjustment of the rules so that certain improvements could be made in the way we carry out our business. The rules committee which has been working toward the betterment of the situation in the house is to be commended for the work it has done. We do not expect that perfection will result from the first efforts, and this was acknowledged by the fact that the present arrangement is tentative.

There has also been a reflection on the C.B.C.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Leboe: In my opinion there has been a reflection on the C.B.C. It has been said it yielded to pressure. That is the claim, as far as I am concerned; and it constitutes in my view a serious reflection on the corporation. While I am speaking on this particular subject I would remind both the government and the opposition that with regard to time allotted for political purposes, a partisan view is very evident and we have objected to this state of affairs for a long time.

As to the matter of planted questions, this is a practice which has been going on for a long time, and both major parties of the house have been equally responsible during the periods when they have held office. It has been going on during all the eight years I have been here.

As far as I am concerned, this is a case of the pot calling the kettle black, and it depends, in my view, on whose ox is getting gored as to who does the squealing. We have also found here that if we are going to agree with the minister that this was not government policy, then we must also agree with the Leader of the Opposition, who says it is propaganda. It cannot be both propaganda and policy. The Leader of the Opposition says it is propaganda; the minister says it was not government policy, so we have to take it from there.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, if you will keep the snakepit quiet, I will say a few words. The Minister of Transport, referring to the broadcast of last night, said it was not a policy statement but a progress report. It strikes me as rather odd that the minister found it necessary to rush to the C.B.C. studio last night to give the nation a progress report on a policy which he said will not be completely formulated for at least another month.

The Prime Minister, in reference to the statements made from this side of the house, said that charges were made without any evidence whatsoever. In the event that the Prime Minister failed to catch the broadcast last night, I would call his attention to the fact—and I am sure that many of his colleagues will inform him of this—that the evidence was very much to the forefront when the C.B.C. correspondent found it necessary to tell the minister, before the broadcast started, that it was not the intention of the C.B.C. to provide ministers of the crown with a platform for announcing government policy. "Policy" was referred to in that particular newscast last night on more than one occasion. The minister himself said he had a policy announcement to make but was prevented from doing so.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the minister's use of the word "illegal". Is it illegal in this house for any member to rise on a question of privilege when he understands that the rules provide that he must rise when that question comes to his attention? This is what happened last night.

There was also a reference to the fact that the opposition had filibustered this question. I would draw your attention again, sir, to the fact that the minister's time was three minutes; and if a procedural argument takes three minutes is the minister imposing upon us in this house, as he imposed himself upon the C.B.C. last night, the thought that any procedural argument that takes three minutes is to be referred to in the future as a filibuster? The evidence was very much in effect, and I suggest that if the Prime Minister reads the remarks of the Minister of Transport he will find that evidence there.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, as regards to the statements made this morning, one might say that three different questions of privilege have been raised about a single question of privilege.

First of all, there is the question of privilege concerning parliamentary procedure as it was followed last night. There, I must admit that, despite the fact that I am a member of the committee on procedure, I was rather surprised myself at the way the new standing order was applied. In this case I would ask that the problem be referred once again to the committee so that the technical points respecting the adjournment motion period, which extends from 10 to 10.30 p.m., may be clarified in the interest of all members of this house.

As for the second point, Mr. Speaker, it is a statement made outside the house.

In our opinion it was certainly a statement of policy on the part of the government since the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) expressed an opinion or a new policy about the management of the two main Canadian air lines. It is a matter of policy and the statement was made outside the house.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) stated that the opposition had prevented the Minister of Transport from making his statement in the house. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must point out to the house that last evening as reported at the bottom of the right hand column of page 2802 of the English edition of Hansard, I said:

> I agree, provided the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is allowed to make the statement he wished to make a moment ago when he was prevented from doing so by hon. members opposite.

As shown by the record, the Minister of Transport was given the opportunity by the opposition to make his statement. If he was unable to make it, it is because the Speaker put an end to the discussion and adjourned the debate. But the Minister of Transport was allowed to make his statement by the opposition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the third question of privilege, the whole matter arises again. First, reverting to the second question of privilege, I must say that such statements of policy should be made in the house, and that the C.B.C. should not be used as a political forum in an attempt to influence the Canadian people. Such a statement should first be made in the House of Commons.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the third question of privilege which was raised, namely that the C.B.C. had to submit to that propaganda, assertions have been made by some members of the opposition as well as denials by the Prime Minister and probably by the Minister of Transport.

On that subject, I think it would be of no avail for us to discuss this point as long as an investigation has not been made. I submit that an investigation should be set up and that the Prime Minister should request that such an investigation be made—a serious one—possibly by the committee on privileges and elections, so as to know whether members of the cabinet took it upon themselves, yesterday, to put undue pressure on the C.B.C. to get it to broadcast announcements or statements by certain members of the government.

For our part, we do not wish to make any charge. We have no proof. However, in view of the facts, I feel that an investigation should be held by the government or by the privileges and elections committee to determine whether members of the government have the right to convey messages, by means of force or pressure, through a crown corporation such as the C.B.C.

I know quite well that such a right would be denied us so I do not see why it should be given to other members.

In fairness to all hon. members and all parties in the house, that point should be cleared up.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, just a few words on that matter. A while ago we heard the Leader of the Opposition say that the rights of parliament had been violated; on the other hand we heard the Prime Minister say that the rights of the minister had been violated, that they had not been recognized, and that he had been prevented last night from making in the house the statement made over the C.B.C. However you look at it and under no circumstances has he the right to make a statement outside the house about a matter of policy, as he did yesterday, when we ourselves heard over the C.B.C. the announcement to the effect that a certain amount of competition between the two great Canadian air lines had to be eliminated. It is all very well to charge certain persons or ministers with making political capital through the C.B.C.; but as for us, we do not want the corporation to be used as a political springboard. However, there are high officials in the C.B.C. who mix politics with their duties. It is then up to parliament to rule whether such political interference should be allowed in the C.B.C.

We notice, for instance, that members of the Liberal and Conservative parties are invited by the C.B.C. more often than they deserve, while members of the third parties are completely ignored. Who is responsible? We do not know, but what we know is that it is done at the request of a high ranking person.

Consequently, ministers should make their statements of policy in the house instead of using the C.B.C. to announce new government policies. We will fight that as strongly as we can.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If I may, it seems to me that the Speaker is entitled to make a few remarks—and I hope they will be useful and helpful; that is my purpose and object in intervening at this time—without deciding right now whether the motion is in order.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, am I to assume that your remarks will not prevent me from making a few remarks later?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The hon. member will see very quickly why I am making these remarks. I think it might be useful at this time to recall to the attention of all hon. members that, contrary to the system followed in the United Kingdom, where notice is always given of oral questions and where the man occupying the chair has some opportunity to consider a question carefully in order to determine whether it is in order, we do not have that provision under our practice in Canada, and the Chair is obliged in a split second to render a decision which may or may not be good. Even in the courts of our land a judge at least has the right to take time to consider whether his judgment is properly drafted; and even then the court of appeal, in dealing with a matter of principle, has time to consider it. But under our system the Chair must decide on the spot whether a matter is right or wrong, and consequently the position is not as easy as it may appear. Thus when we come to borderline cases it is possible for the Chair to make mistakes.

With regard to the question of yesterday, it seemed to me—needless to say there was no communication with the Chair before the question was asked; there was no notice given, and the Chair had absolutely no advance information—as I suggested, that the question should be put on the order paper, under the instructions given to me by the house, which are that a question should not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer. It was obvious that if the minister was going to reply and outline a whole policy with regard to the aviation industry, it would require considerable time; and under the rules as given to me, questions should be asked as shortly as possible and the answers to questions, as it says here, should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised and should not provoke debate.

Consequently it seemed to me that this question was one for the order paper, which of course would mean for discussion at ten o'clock. That is the basic reason, which I still consider sound, why action was taken in that respect. In view of the discussion last evening it seems to me that perhaps the matter could have been raised on motions, but that is a matter for the minister to decide, not the Chair. I must say that the Deputy Speaker in my opinion carried out in a proper manner the rules as given to him by the house.

May I at this time point out to the house that the view of the occupant of the chair at the present time is very simple, and I think is quite correct, namely that it is not up to the Chair to make rules; it is up to the Chair to do its best to interpret the rules as given to the Chair. Consequently, although I happened to be selected as chairman of this committee on procedure and organization, I took steps as soon as it was possible to set up three subcommittees, one of which is the subcommittee on procedure. The members of that subcommittee chose as its chairman the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); and I think that is right in principle, because it means that the subcommittee will decide what rules the house should or should not adopt and that these suggestions, if accepted by the house, have been drafted by the members of the house and then handed to the Speaker for interpretation. I think it is a very important principle that the Speaker do not impose his ideas on the house. He must carry out the instructions of the house.

With respect to the interpretation of this new standing order 39A, I think it might be very useful at this time if the chairman of the subcommittee on procedure, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, explained to the house once more the purpose of this rule. If, of course, the house is not satisfied with that particular section it can be changed, because this is only a trial period. But the importance of the provisional standing order and the reasons for bringing it in are fundamental, and how the standing order should be applied depends to a great extent on the understanding of the purpose and the object of the standing order. I think that at this stage if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would give us briefly once more the purpose of this article it might help all hon. members at this time.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, even before the invitation you have just given me was made it was my intention to say a few words on the question of privilege that has been raised. I had intended to start by saying that though I have strong feelings about all the aspects of the point that has been raised this morning, it would be my purpose to confine myself to the question of the operation of provisional standing order 39A. It was also my intention previously, and it certainly is now after the invitation Your Honour has given me, to speak in a low key despite the feelings which have been ventilated this morning.

I should like to say right at the outset that it is my intention as chairman of the subcommittee on procedure to call a meeting of that subcommittee just as soon as all of its members are available so we can review what happened last night and consider whether any suggested changes should be made.

Perhaps hon. members will forgive me if I take a few seconds to indicate the personnel of the subcommittee. We are getting along very well and I hope we may be able to make further suggestions which will be helpful to the procedures of the house. I have with me on the subcommittee the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, who is also the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen); the hon. member for Stormont, who is also Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Lamoureux); the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin); the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken); and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). I give these members notice now that at the earliest possible moment we will be holding a meeting to consider what happened last night.

Having said that, may I give what I think was at least my understanding of provisional standing order 39A as we proposed it to the house on a trial basis. As hon. members are aware, one of the first in the house to suggest that we provide for debates at the adjournment time to make up for difficulties during the question period was the Leader of the Opposition. I happen to have had the honour of drafting this particular provisional standing order 39A, but it has been accepted unanimously by the house. Our idea was that we should approach the problem created by the orders of the day question period in a two-fold way; that on the one hand we should try to cut down the time used on the orders of the day question period, but that we should provide for members an escape valve or some recourse so they would not feel that their rights were being curtailed. That was the reason this extra half hour was provided.

I would emphasize that the extra half hour which has been provided at night is, in a sense, a gift, something new for members, something we did not previously enjoy, and I think all hon. members have been accepting it in that way. Personally I have been pleased at the interest shown in it. I think if we can judge by the two week trial basis, even in spite of last night, its purpose is being achieved. We have been able to cut down time used on the orders of the day question period, yet we have this escape valve, and interest has been shown in the operation of the escape valve itself.

When we drew up the terms for this half hour debate at night we had to face a number of problems. One of the problems was this. Are we going to have a piece of machinery under which the adjourned sitting of the house might go on and on? Are we going to get back to the eleven o'clock adjournment which we had a few years ago and tried to get away from? We felt that in fairness to ourselves, in fairness to the staff and in fairness to everybody else we should not have an extended period at night, so we drew up the order with a view to it being confined to a half hour period. We provided seven minutes for a member and three minutes for a minister, three times a night, and we made the specific decision that if 30 minutes went by and the matters had not been concluded the house was to be adjourned at that point.

I think it is fair to say that we did have the feeling that the only way this could work would be if there were no interruptions. If people were interrupted, either in the seven minutes given the member or in the three minutes given the minister, by points or order, questions of privilege or what have you, it was our feeling that it would defeat the purpose of this new rule. It would mean that time given to an hon. member would be taken away from him, or that we would be running into an extension of the time and in that way create something which hon. members would not want.

We did not spell this out in detail. The members of the main committee which was presided over by Your Honour, if you remember the discussion on this matter in room 16 on the day this order was passed, felt that the provision at the end of provisional standing order 39A—not the one at the end of provisional standing order 39(5) but the one at the end of 39A, which reads—

> There shall be no appeal against any decision made by Mr. Speaker under the provisions of this standing order.

—implies that points of order and questions of privilege were not to be raised.

Not only was there the experience of last night. Since then I have had discussions with various hon. members—backbenchers, middle benchers and front benchers—and there is concern. Their feelings have been expressed to me in these terms: "Yes, you have to limit this to a half hour period or we will be in trouble. You have to try to avoid interruptions, otherwise you defeat the whole purpose. Yet on the other hand, can you close out completely the right of a genuine question of privilege? If in the course of a question or an answer one member says something about another member which is defamatory, libellous or offensive, can you close out completely a question of privilege?" That is a real question, and maybe provisional standing order 39A as we have drafted it does not take cognizance of that possibility.

I feel that if we are going to make some provision for a point of order or question of privilege to be raised we will have to make it very specific. We will have to make provision for this to be done in a period outside the seven minute and three minute periods. There is no point in providing seven minute question and three minute answer periods if they can be interrupted, as was the case last night, and their whole purpose defeated.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to address myself to the house in a low key, but though my voice may be up I am trying not to assess any blame for what happened last night. Let us say that the provisional standing order is capable of some misunderstanding or misinterpretation. I think the Deputy Speaker did right in the light of what he had in front of him last night; but since there is a feeling on the part of hon. members that perhaps we should take another look at it, I undertake that an early meeting of the subcommittee on procedure will be called to do this.

In the meantime, if we do not get a report back to the house before Monday night, which is the next time the adjournment question and answer period will be in operation, I hope hon. members will consider that the purpose of this half hour is to provide seven minute and three minute opportunities for members and ministers, and I ask hon. members to restrain themselves from indulging in the kind of behaviour which occurred last night until such time as we can bring in recommendations which can cure any defect that there may be.

I do want to say that I am grateful to the many members of the house as well as the members of the press who have spoken to me personally about this, particularly for the way in which they have expressed pleasure that we have produced something which does the two things we needed to do; that is to cut down the question period yet preserve for members the opportunity or recourse to deal with a matter if they feel they need to do so. I think we are making progress, and I may say to the Prime Minister that we have another report in the mill. One of the things that we will deal with in our next report is the question of statements on motions, and maybe we will have to take another look at that in the light of what happened yesterday.

We are working hard. We have a good committee. The house has shown confidence in us, and I am sure the house will appreciate what we in the committee and in the house are trying to do, to put our procedures on a proper basis. With that confidence and appreciation I think we can make real progress.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say briefly that we seem to be getting completely away from the general tenor of the motion which has been introduced and the complaint which has been made. The real question relates not to the procedure, which undoubtedly broke down last night, but to the fact that following such a breakdown in procedure the minister, not being able to make his statement in the house, went and made it elsewhere. This is the real question of privilege that is before the house, and that is the motion the hon. member has made.

I may say, on the question that has been raised, that I believe we found out last night there are shortcomings in this procedure, but I should also observe that I do not believe either the committee or the house anticipated that this period would be used for a planted question, in reply to which a minister could make a statement that should be made on motions. The danger is very obvious, that having made such a statement there was no opportunity for comment by any members of the opposition parties.

This is where the minister and his colleague fell into a trap of their own making. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that there was a breakdown. However, I do not think the breakdown was in the rule but in breach of the intent behind it.

We must now consider the real substance of this motion. There is a motion before the house and, in accordance with Beauchesne citation 105, it should be dealt with forthwith.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I may not have an opportunity of saying this later, so I think I should say now that in my remarks in raising the question of privilege and putting my motion, I may have said something which was inaccurate in relation to a member of the press gallery, with regard to the comment I made that I phoned the Globe and Mail office. What actually transpired was that I phoned the office and was informed that the story of the national air policy was on the Canadian Press wire at five o'clock, so that what I said bears no reflection on any particular member of the press gallery.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I might be permitted to say a word on that. The story on the Canadian Press wire did not purport to come from me, and did not come from me.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to decide whether the motion as presented this morning is or is not in order. Right at the beginning I would like to refer hon. members to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 71 (6):

> In all matters of doubt, the Speaker will consider attentively the opinions of members of experience, or sometimes, instead of expressing his opinion on either side, may ask instructions from the house or reserve his decision on the point in discussion, or suggest that the house may, if it think proper, dispense with the rule in a particular case.

This morning, if I am correct, we have had 60 minutes of discussion. We have in the time at our disposal, made careful research; and when I say that I do not know of any instances where statements outside the house have been declared by the Chair to constitute a prima facie breach of privilege, we have not, in the short time at our disposal, been able to find any case to the contrary.

In the past it has been considered as a grievance and, as I say, we have had very considerable discussion this morning. Therefore it seems to me that the motion presented by the hon. member for Yukon is, as stated, in the nature of a substantive motion which would require notice. However, in my opinion it is more of a grievance, and inasmuch as I understand that on Monday and Tuesday there will be a supply motion, where this matter may be discussed thoroughly and at length, and in view of the discussion this morning and the explanations given, serious though the matter is and though it was quite properly raised, nevertheless in my opinion, I do not believe the motion should be accepted by the Speaker at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I feel, with great deference to Your Honour's ruling, that the matter goes far beyond a simple grievance. We have had the action of government ministers, and of this minister in particular, which requires some redress. All hon. members of the house have been held in contempt by the minister's action. That is why I put the motion, and I respectfully ask Your Honour to put the motion to the house.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry I did not hear the last sentence, as I was interrupted.

Mr. Nielsen: My last sentence, to which I would respectfully request a reply from Your Honour, was that you put the motion to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I appreciate the reasons which motivate the hon. member, but I do not think it is up to the Chair to appeal its own ruling.

Mr. Nielsen: Then with the greatest respect, Your Honour, and because of my differing views with Your Honour, I would with regret appeal Your Honour's ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The house has heard the decision of the Chair from which the hon. member for Yukon has appealed to the house. All those in favour of sustaining the decision of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

> The question is an appeal to the house from a ruling of the Chair, which is as follows: The hon. member for Yukon, rising on a question of privilege, proposed to move—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Division

Mr. Speaker: I think this is a rather important point, and therefore I should put the question.

The hon. member for Yukon, rising on a question of privilege, proposed to move:

"That this house condemns the action of ministers from time to time in announcing outside of the house policy decisions which should be announced in the house, an example of which being the announcement yesterday outside the house by the Minister of Transport of air policy, such action being a flagrant disregard of the custom, practices and privileges of this house and its members."

The Chair, having stated that the motion as drafted was in the nature of a grievance rather than a question of privilege and as such an opportunity to raise the question should be available on Monday next, ruled that the motion could not be put at this time.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was sustained on the following division:

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

MARINE AND FISHERIES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador) presented the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) presented the first report of the standing committee on public accounts.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested that motions for concurrence in these reports might stand until Monday, rather than ask for unanimous consent to proceed with them today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if they could not all stand.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

First report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Godin.

ESTIMATES

First report of standing committee on estimates—Mr. Pilon.

TRADE

REPORT ON MEETING IN OTTAWA OF JOINT U.S.-CANADIAN COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In accordance with the practice followed on previous occasions, I should like to report that we have had a visit to Ottawa of United States cabinet members and senior officials who attended a two day meeting here on Wednesday and Thursday of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs. This meeting provided an opportunity for Canadian ministers to discuss at first hand with the United States secretaries a range of important matters in Canada's relationship with the United States.

This was the ninth meeting this body has held since it was set up in 1953. It was evident in our discussions that good progress has been made during the past year in resolving the difficulties which exist in relations between the two countries. There has been a general improvement in our relations. There is today a determination in both countries that we should co-operate closely in resolving problems and promoting the interests of the two countries in economic and trade matters. The United States recognizes that there is an imbalance for Canada in its trade and payments with the United States, and agrees with our desire to improve our current account through an expansion of exports.

We had good discussions of ways in which we can expand our mutual trade and our trade with the rest of the world in manufactured goods, industrial materials and agricultural products. We have a common interest in working for the success of the forthcoming Kennedy round of GATT tariff and trade negotiations which opens next Monday in Geneva. These negotiations could lead to important gains for Canada's export trade.

During our two day meeting we dealt with many other trade and economic matters of importance to Canada, such as difficulties Canadian exporters are encountering as a result of the recent reclassification of the United States tariff. We are hopeful that United States restrictions on imports from Canada of lead and zinc and cheese can be eased. A program of studies relating to the utilization of the energy resources of the two countries was initiated.

We also had a good discussion of the Canadian automobile program which was introduced last November with the purpose of rationalizing production in Canada and increasing the efficiency of the Canadian industry. Our program is already showing itself to be successful. During recent months trade in motor vehicles and parts has been increasing substantially in both directions.

This visit to Ottawa of Mr. Rusk and his colleagues provided opportunities for Canadian ministers and their United States counterparts to have talks on other matters of joint concern. As the Prime Minister indicated in the house yesterday, we discussed the question of improving the highway to Alaska. We heard from the United States their ideas on the possible development of Passamaquoddy tidal power and we discussed great lakes water levels. I was particularly gratified to have an opportunity to review with the United States secretary of state a number of problems of critical concern internationally, particularly in view of the fact that he has just returned from visiting two countries in Indo-China.

Our discussions here on Wednesday and Thursday demonstrated clearly the wide range of common interests between Canada and the United States and the readiness of our two governments to co-operate in furthering our common interests. Where problems exist, these discussions at cabinet level serve to bring about a better understanding of each other's interests and policies. We are exploring the possibility of further developing principles which would facilitate co-operation in economic and other policies. We look forward to the next meeting of this committee, which will be held in Washington within the coming year.

Mr. Speaker, for the information of the house I wish to table copies, in French and English, of the communiqué which was issued at the end of the meeting yesterday.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the communiqué which has now been tabled will be found on examination to be a most bland document; it is notable for its omissions. There is no mention of the situation on the great lakes or the turning over of the S.I.U. to the control of one who is in turn controlled by Mr. Hall, the head of the international union. There is no mention of the Passamaquoddy, although the minister made a passing reference to it. Certainly these meetings are beneficial in bringing together the ministers of both countries and in discussing economic matters; but when the minister a moment ago referred to the good progress that has been made in the last year in regard to the solution of problems between Canada and the United States, you may have missed it, sir, but there was a flicker of a smile on his face as he said that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The right hon. gentleman has much licence in this house but he must not impose too much on the judgment of the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman is interrupting all the time—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, there was no flicker of a smile on my face. The fact is that the right hon. gentleman does not like it, but the relations between our two countries have very considerably improved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is smiling again in the same way—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am smiling at the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —for he realizes the hollowness of his statement. One has only to read what the under secretary of state, Mr. Ball, said the other day to give a "Ball-ed" answer to the statements made by the hon. gentleman a moment ago. It would have been of interest to learn what the United States representatives said in support of Mr. Ball's contention that under this government there have been punitive and discriminatory tax measures taken, directed against American investment. It would have been of interest to hear Mr. Ball's contribution as a member of this group, and I would like to have known what the Canadian attitude was in this regard and which viewpoint was expressed on behalf of Canada. Was the viewpoint expressed that which is heard from time to time from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance? The other day the Minister of Finance spoke in New York and said, in regard to foreign investment in Canada, a matter of tremendous interest to any economic meeting of ministers:

> But Canadians are worried about the consequences of all this foreign investment upon the control of Canadian industry—
> Rightly or wrongly, many of us feel the rising trend in the absentee ownership of our key industries poses a threat to our economic independence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. One does not like to interrupt, but surely the right hon. gentleman will recognize that in introducing that speech which was made altogether outside of yesterday's conference, and which was discussed by my hon. friend on Friday, he is away out of order. All he should now be allowed to do is discuss per se the statement that I made, and not introduce matters which are extraneous and which have nothing to do with the subject matter of the conference.

An hon. Member: It is embarrassing for you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I need only add that it was the minister himself, by his extraneous statements, his opening statements, who brought this about. He made statements that I challenge immediately; statements that had no reference whatever to the meeting but were simply for self glorification. I am simply asking—and I wait for your ruling—whether the views expressed by the cabinet were the views of the Minister of Finance, or were they rather the views of the Postmaster General who, speaking the other day, on April 29, said—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —"American domination"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had hoped that with the approach of the week end we might be able to make faster progress. The question is a point of order, and generally speaking the interpretation of statements on motions should be restrictive; they should be limited to a discussion of the matters raised in the statement. I am glad to tell the house that I hope the subcommittee on procedure will be introducing some refinements very shortly; but in view of the fact that the Leader of the Opposition is a man of very considerable parliamentary skill and experience I know he will listen to the suggestion I make, that if possible the clear interpretation of statements, and answers or criticisms of statements in the house, should be limited to the statements.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as always I bow to your ruling; and you would have also ruled if I had interrupted, I am sure, that the extraneous statements made by the minister impelled and provoked me into answering them, and he was afraid of the answer. I was endeavouring to ascertain what the viewpoint of the Canadian government was on this matter, because two viewpoints have been expressed, one of the Minister of Finance and the other of the Postmaster General, who contended that "American domination" was "invoked to ridicule Canadian authority, to shame Canadian national pride". I wondered which viewpoint had been expressed with reference to the communiqué.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the applause is well timed. Up to the present time I was answering the remarks of the hon. gentleman that were outside of the communiqué, and having done that I now proceed to deal specifically with the communiqué.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The communiqué says:

> The committee discussed policies which each country was following to improve its balance of payments.

That raises the whole question of the discriminatory legislation introduced by this government against United States investment. We should have liked some information in this regard. There was the pious expression of the view that the principles of non-discrimination should achieve this objective. That particular portion of the communiqué is in line with the viewpoint of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, which has consistently opposed the economic tinkering in which this government has engaged.

Next the automotive program was stressed by the minister, as it is in the communiqué. We have taken the stand that the course followed by the government in this connection is one that could only bring about retaliatory measures on the part of the United States, and that is what has happened. The communiqué says:

> Canadian ministers expressed concern about increases in levels of certain United States tariffs arising from the recent reclassification of the United States tariff, including rates on parts and components.

That has been the position of automobile workers across Canada, that as a result of the action taken by this government in bringing about discriminatory legislation, rather than proceeding by way of encouragement through incentive, there would be retaliation; and there has been. Then the communiqué says:

> They urged—

That is referring to the Canadian government:

> —that the United States government take action to correct this situation.

There is need of action in this regard. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —has referred to this fact, and I point out that because of the retaliatory action taken by Mr. Hodges, and threatened by him, various industries in Canada, including the farm machinery industry, are suffering as a result of the imposition of a 10 per cent duty in the United States.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. The Leader of the Opposition is obviously debating the subject matter of the announcement, and that is not permissible. What is permissible is for him to make a brief comment, which is a courtesy extended under the rules for the first time in recent years, directed to the announcement which has been made and to the propriety or non-propriety of making the announcement. The right hon. gentleman is not permitted, however, to debate the subject matter raised in the announcement itself. I hope the Leader of the Opposition agrees with that proposition, particularly when he remembers that the courtesy is one which is not granted to leaders of the other parties.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I want to say this. I am reading from the communiqué to which reference has been made. This communiqué has been tabled. Am I to be denied the right to support what I have to say by arguments to the effect that the 10 per cent retaliatory tax imposed, which is affecting our farm machinery industry and our automobile industry, is a direct result of the failure to act on the part of this government?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if this is turning into a debate on this statement which has just been tabled, could the rest of us have copies of it? We have not seen it. I do not know how the Leader of the Opposition has it, but we do not have it. Certainly I do not think the matter should be debated under the circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I might point out distribution was made, and apparently the hon. gentleman has not gone through his mail this morning.

Mr. Speaker: In order to assist the house may I suggest that statements be brief and factual.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, mine are both. Then there is this reference.

> United States members expressed their concern over possible Canadian measures which might adversely affect certain United States publications.

We should like to know what happened. What did the Canadian government say? Did it say that it was going to exempt Time and Reader's Digest?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is simply the statement—is the Minister of Trade and Commerce aroused, too?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I would be very happy to answer all the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition at the proper time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Good. In the meantime, if the minister will keep silent I will finish my argument. We should like to know what was said in this regard. This generalization is no good. Are Time and Reader's Digest still to be exempt or not? When I look over this statement it is one of bland generalization and does not represent anything like the fulsome description given to it by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The very matters mentioned here are still objects of deep disagreement between our countries, and the house has the right to know what is the meaning of this. Why these generalities? Why did the minister not tell the house exactly what took place, instead of producing a document which is meaningless in its generality?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair could it be agreed that the communiqué will be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house so agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of communiqué referred to above, see Appendix "A".]

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at one o'clock I was about to make a comment on the statement which had been made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin).

Like the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) I had not received a copy of the communiqué to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs referred, but I have since secured a copy. I would like to say that I think these meetings between ministers of the Canadian government and their advisers, and representatives of the United States government and their advisers, serve a very useful purpose.

Whether there has been agreement or not on all the questions discussed, the mere fact that there has been an exchange of views and a better understanding of the position which each government takes vis-à-vis certain problems, gives a better chance for some viable solutions to be worked out between the two governments. Any two countries that are as closely intertwined economically, and as closely located geographically as Canada and the United States, have to work out the answers to their problems around the council table.

These problems cannot be solved at arm's length, and certainly not by name calling or vituperation. They have to be worked out on the basis of consultation and an exchange of views. Of course that does not mean Canadian representatives need to surrender on every issue that comes before them, but it does mean that meeting with representatives of the United States government can be the beginning of a great deal of progress in Canadian-United States relations.

I have not a copy of the minister's statement, but I notice the communiqué mentions several important matters and I want to say a few words briefly about each of them. First of all it refers to the very important matter of trade and says:

> The United States members expressed agreement with Canada's desire to improve its current account through an expansion of exports and stressed the importance of adhering to the principles of non-discrimination in achieving this objective.

This is important in a country like Canada where 68 per cent of our imports come from the United States, and 62 per cent of our exports go to the United States. There is probably no country in the world which has as vulnerable an economy as ours, and is so completely dependent for its economic prosperity as is Canada with reference to its trading relations with the United States. But though this statement is made in the communiqué, the fact remains that after saying both parties stressed the importance of adhering to the principles of non-discrimination, it was good to see that the Canadian ministers expressed concern over increases in levels of certain United States tariffs, arising from recent reclassification of United States tariffs, including rates on parts and components, and urged the United States government to take action to correct this situation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is an important matter which ought to concern the government; that it is not enough to talk in generalities about removing discrimination if, at the same time, by process of reclassification, Canadian exports to the United States are adversely affected.

I was also interested in the fact that the two governments are going to establish "a joint working group to prepare a program of studies relating to trade in all kinds of energy between the United States and Canada". It is important that the Canadian government keep in mind that Canada has great natural advantages in the matter of sources of energy, and that it ought not to lose these natural advantages.

The tendency in the Canadian economy has been for a major part of our investment to be in the extraction industries, and we are exporting raw materials and increasingly exporting energy in various forms. This does not, of course, make for the development of secondary and tertiary industries which are the large employers of labour. It would be a sad thing if we were prepared to accept the role of being a mere supplier of raw materials, a country of extraction industries with a relatively small labour force, just to supply our powerful neighbour to the south with raw materials and the energy to turn them into manufactured products.

I had hoped that somewhere in the statement given by the government there might have been some remarks from the Minister of Finance, because I think all hon. members were greatly concerned about the statements made by the United States under-secretary of state, Mr. George W. Ball, at Harriman, New York, on April 26. I am not going to quote from that speech, but it is very difficult to separate Mr. Ball and his official position as a spokesman for the United States government.

I do not at all question Mr. Ball's right to take the strong position which he did. I only hope that the Canadian ministers took an equally strong position with Mr. Ball and those associated with him, because Mr. Ball made it very clear in his address at Harriman, New York, that any changing of the ground rules could have substantial repercussions, and he made particular mention of:

> —measures by governments designed to induce a change in the character of investment from equity to debt...or to refuse national treatment to capital that had earlier been welcomed, or to bring about the transfer of production from one country to another.

—which he says—

> —can be seriously disruptive.

This, it seems to me, challenges the whole question of Canada's right to direct its trade program, its tariff policy and its investment policy with a view to strengthening the Canadian economy. If Canada is ever to be other than just a branch plant economy, if it is to develop a strong economy capable of exporting into the markets of the world, it is going to have to re-examine its tariff policy, its investment policy and the allocation of its resources.

I hope that the Canadian representatives to the conference of recent days made this perfectly clear to Mr. Ball and to the other representatives of the United States government, that Canada must increasingly gain a greater measure of control over its own economy, that this is not a reflection on the United States, and is not the result of any attempt to be a bad neighbour. It is simply a desire on the part of the Canadian people to retain their own identity and their economic and political independence.

In spite of Mr. Ball's little lecture to us in his speech when he said—> —the maintenance of political independence, however, depends more on the state of the national will than on economic relationships—

—I would say, if our independence depends on the state of the national will, then it is the responsibility of the government to make it very clear to the United States that it, and the Canadian people, have the will to build a strong, viable Canadian economy that is not completely dominated by outside investors, and that will never become an economic satellite of any power on the face of the earth.

One other item in this communiqué says that the United States members expressed their concern over possible Canadian measures which might adversely affect certain United States publications. I had hoped that the Canadian government would have made some elaboration on this point, and I hope that before too many days elapse the Prime Minister will tell us the intention of the government with respect to the legislation which has been announced, whether the government intends to water down further the recommendations of the O'Leary commission. I should like to know whether or not it was made clear to the United States that they themselves, if the shoe were on the other foot, would not condone for a moment the control of their magazine and periodical fields by outside publishers as is the case in Canada.

I hope the Canadian government has made it abundantly clear to the United States that, contrary to what Mr. Ball said in his speech of last week, we are not seeking to cramp ideas, we are not seeking to prevent the exchange of points of view. What we are seeking to do in Canada is to retain a Canadian identity and to adopt the same policy with respect to outside periodicals that the United States itself applies in the field of publications.

One last thing, Mr. Speaker. It is not in the communiqué, but I gather from the closing words of the statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that some mention was made of a discussion having been held with respect to southeast Asia. The minister did not elaborate on that. He simply said that certain American officials had recently visited southeast Asia and had made a report to the group. The fact remains, however, that American official's have stated publicly in recent weeks that they have been bringing pressure to bear on the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization asking them to supply forces for Viet Nam. It is true they conceded that since Canada was a member of the truce team in that area our contribution might be limited to medical and hospital services. I want to say now and to give warning to the government that any attempt to involve Canada in the struggle which is going on in Viet Nam will certainly be resisted strongly by the members of this party. If Canada wants to play the role of being the fly on the flypaper I do not know any better way to do it than to become involved in the Viet Nam situation.

We have had no opportunity to study the communiqué, Mr. Speaker, and I merely make these few remarks with reference to it. I do think, however, that the government would be well advised to provide an opportunity at an early date for a fuller discussion of the question of United States-Canadian relations and that we might have from the respective ministers a fuller account of the position which Canada took at this conference and the position which the Canadian government intends to take in the immediate future regarding the problems that were discussed at the conference.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss at any length the details of the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning. However, I should like to make some general observations with respect to the purpose of the discussions that have been held recently. If we are to maintain the happy relations we have enjoyed so far with our neighbours to the south it is imperative that we meet with them, discuss our problems together and work out harmonious solutions. I believe there are many areas in which conflict has arisen and in my view it is always the better part of wisdom to endeavour to resolve these conflicts of views before they reach the point where tensions develop and amicable relations are threatened.

I do not think that recriminations and counter-recriminations in any field ever contribute to a mutually satisfactory solution of problems. Therefore I would say that the occasions for meetings which are presented, such as the meeting recently held with United States officials, are certainly most worth while.

Some reference was made in the minister's statement this morning to trade discussions having to do with tariffs, etc. May I say there is real uneasiness, especially in agricultural circles, as to the possible outcome of the discussions having to do with tariff arrangements. I am thinking particularly of the people engaged in the growing of fruits and vegetables. They are most concerned about the possible outcome of these discussions. I am sure that those who are representing Canada will see to it that Canadian interests are protected in every possible way and that no action will be taken that will militate against the best interests of our own producers. I just wanted to make these general references and observations with regard to the type of discussions held and to urge that such discussions be continued and extended as need may arise.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations which are taking place between the United States and Canadian authorities with regard to trade certainly hold an increasing importance for the future of the Canadian economy.

It is understood that we must come to terms with the Americans, and it is interesting to note that this government is taking action in order to improve, as much as possible, our trade relations with our neighbours to the south. We must not forget that we possess, in Canada, natural resources which have great attraction for the Americans. But, for all that, the export of those natural resources should not be allowed for the sole benefit of our neighbours to the south and at the expense of the Canadian people.

When one considers, for instance, that the iron ore extracted in our country and more particularly in the province of Quebec is being exported to the United States as raw materials at a ridiculously low price and that it is processed in that country to be resold here afterwards, no wonder our country has a trade imbalance with the United States. On the other hand, if we sold those raw materials at a reasonable price and if they were processed here before being sold to the United States, our trade imbalance would disappear.

Of course, we are all for trade with the United States, but we do not want it to be one-sided, always to the advantage of the United States and to the disadvantage of the Canadian people. We want the Canadian government to take the necessary steps, and it seems to me that those matters should be studied carefully when federal-provincial conferences are held, so that our natural resources will not be left to foreigners for a mere pittance, as I said a while ago, but will benefit the Canadian people.

We need some American products that we do not manufacture here, but we should try at least not to give the United States the raw materials they lack and depend on to maintain their industry and keep their economy flourishing.

Let us think also of promoting the Canadian economy by making transactions in the interest of the Canadian people, not always for the benefit of foreigners.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—SUGGESTED RECONSIDERATION OF MCLAUGHLIN APPOINTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know who is acting as Prime Minister—

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am acting in the place of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that Hal Banks has been convicted and the matter has been concluded in the courts, questions may be asked which could not have been asked earlier. I should like to direct to the Acting Prime Minister the words of the special federal prosecutor, Jean Martineau, Q.C. in the course of his argument toward the conclusion of the trial. Mr. Martineau characterized Banks as an "uncivil and dictatorial" man who is still a power in the affairs of the S.I.U. "What existed before, still exists," he said. "Banks controlled the union and found himself controlling each man's job".

In view of this considered opinion on the part of the federal government's special prosecutor, I should like to ask the minister whether those words should be brought to the attention of the board of trustees to the end that they reconsider having Leonard McLaughlin who, up to the present time according to the Norris report, has been a puppet of Banks, placed in a position of responsibility as president of the union.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, I have not had the advantage, as the right hon. gentleman has, of seeing the words which he quoted—and I am not questioning them at all—but I am sure the Minister of Justice will be getting a transcript of those words and if the board of trustees have not seen them already I am sure we would be glad to make sure that they do see them. However, I do think it would be presumptuous on the part of the government or, indeed, on the part of any member of the house, to attempt to usurp the functions which were given to the trustees by a vote of this parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I put it to the minister that there is no usurpation in making a suggestion when that suggestion is based on a statement made by the special prosecutor appointed by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I indicated that steps would be taken to make sure that the board of trustees are acquainted with what the special prosecutor said. But I do not think we should attempt to substitute our own judgment for theirs.

HAL BANKS—POSSIBLE CANCELLATION OF IMMIGRANT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is it the intention of the minister to take action to cancel the landed immigrant status of Hal C. Banks in view of the judgment of the court?

Mr. Speaker: Important as this question is, and despite its great general interest, I really do not think the minister should be called upon to answer it without notice. May I, therefore, suggest it be put on the order paper?

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO FORMULATION OF NATIONAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of the statement he made last night regarding national transportation policy. Before I do so, I wonder if I might ask if he intends to put that statement on record, either by tabling it or as an appendix to Hansard, or by reading it, so that we may have something definite to deal with. All we have at the present time are press reports which may or may not be an exact account of what the minister said.

But to proceed with my question, the minister made three points. I shall not take up the time of the house by enumerating them, but the second was that the main lines of T.C.A. must be safeguarded by protecting their economic position. The third was that the smaller regional carriers would be encouraged to get a larger share of the load, and it is suggested in this press statement that this would be achieved by handing over to them some of the profitable T.C.A. runs. I should like to ask the minister this: How would it be possible to protect the economic position of T.C.A. while giving away some of its profitable lines?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I should be very happy if I were permitted to table this statement, or have it appear as an appendix to Hansard—if it can be called a statement. It is not a statement at all.

An hon. Member: Policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not policy. It sets out the principles on the basis of which the government hopes, in the fulness of time, a policy will be evolved. That policy has not yet been evolved.

The question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was in the nature of a debating question and there would be some doubt in my mind whether it would be appropriate for me in those circumstances to answer it, especially as it involves highly complex matters. But I think he will find, when he reads the actual statement I made, that there is nothing in it anywhere about transferring any lines from any one company to any other air lines.

Might I have consent to putting the statement on record?

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent?

[Mr. Speaker.]

An hon. Member: As an appendix to Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can I keep it for a minute?

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. Would the minister care to elaborate on the first point in this statement with reference to the merging, in respect of their overseas or international routes, of C.P.A. and T.C.A.? Is this to be done by merger or by allocating certain routes one to the other?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think, once again, that when the hon. gentleman reads the statement he will see there was nothing about a merger in it as the only possible course. May I point out that three different ways of achieving the object in which the government was interested were suggested. One is amalgamation, one is partnership and the other is a clear geographical division of fields of operation.

Mr. Douglas: Has any decision been made as to which of these choices the government proposes to follow, or is the matter still in the discussion stage?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is precisely what I said at the beginning of the day. If there had been a decision, I take it that would have been a policy. In fact, we have asked the two main carriers to discuss these various possibilities and see if they can make some suggestion to the government on which they could agree. I think that is a most sensible way in which to proceed, instead of the government trying to appear all-wise and lay down a dictate to the air lines.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They certainly do not appear all-wise.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question. I have read the minister's statement and I base my question on the second clause of the policy statement which found its way into the hands of the press. Is it not a correct interpretation of that statement to say that clause 2 means, in effect, that anything which savours of competition with T.C.A. or which is likely to prejudice its balance position, is to be choked off?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not a correct interpretation, but the hon. member is a free member of a free parliament—and I hope some of the rest of us will be regarded in the same way. He is perfectly capable of placing any kind of interpretation he likes on those words; but as far as I am concerned the words speak for themselves and I do not think there is any need to interpret them.

Mr. Nielsen: As I understand the second clause of the statement, no policy which will place T.C.A. in the red is to be followed by the government, and the operations of airlines other than T.C.A. will be curbed if they have that result?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder sir, if these questions—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I might point out that I cannot rule on questions until I have heard them.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize.

[Editor's note: For text of statement referred to above, see Appendix "B".]

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I have a further supplementary question to address to the Minister of Transport with regard to his broadcast statement. Is he aware that Mr. DePoe, the interviewer on the show last night, has indicated in a written statement that the hon. gentleman was invited to appear on the C.B.C. news because of an expected policy statement to be made in the House of Commons?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course, I regard Mr. DePoe as a free citizen of a free country and I do not think I am responsible for what he may have said.

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: I have a further supplementary question to direct to the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's complaint, which was aired widely this morning on the C.B.C. news, that he had no opportunity to make an announcement concerning air transportation policy in parliament, how does he reconcile this position with the disclosure that his statement of policy has been available since last Tuesday at least, the day on which the Financial Post went to press with substantial details of his policy supplied either by the minister or one of his officials?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not know whether Your Honour would feel it proper to prolong a debate which, I thought, had been concluded by the house. But, I repeat, I had no statement of policy to make. When there is a statement of policy to be made, if the house is sitting I will make it in the house.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State who is responsible for the C.B.C.

Could the minister assure the house that he had not been in contact with a C.B.C. employee or official so as to permit the Minister of Transport to appear on the C.B.C. network last night?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Pigeon: We are not sure.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising from the statement of policy, or non-policy, the Minister of Transport made concerning air lines. I wonder if the minister or the house leader can inform us whether the transport estimates will be coming before the house soon, so that this matter can be fully debated.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transport is one of the three departments whose estimates will come before the house on the occasion of the supply motion scheduled for Monday.

Mr. Nielsen: Over the C.B.C., or in the house?

FINANCE

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport who, as I see, is acting for him this afternoon. Here is my question. Following a statement made a few days ago by the Minister of Finance, we would like to know whether the report of the Porter commission on banking and finance will be deferred to the committee on banking and commerce, and thereby to parliament. Has the government reached any decision in this regard?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think this is the kind of question that the Minister of Finance should answer himself.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

WOOD BUFFALO—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING TRANSFER TO PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence E. Kindt (McLeod): In the absence of the Prime Minister I should like to ask the Minister of Transport, who is acting for him, a question concerning Wood Buffalo national park. Is it the intention of the government to transfer all or part of this park to the control of the Alberta government? Would the acting Prime Minister inform the house as to the policy of the government on this matter, and tell us exactly what the situation is?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper?

SHIPPING

REPORTED RECOMMENDATION FOR INCREASE IN SEAWAY TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): I have a short question for the Minister of Transport. Could the hon. gentleman advise us if the St. Lawrence seaway authority has made a proposal to the government for an increase of 10 per cent in the tolls on the seaway and, if so, when does he expect a decision or statement of policy will be made?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the St. Lawrence seaway authority has made no such recommendation.

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S. RESPECTING GREAT LAKES WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the statement he made earlier this morning, but in his absence perhaps I should direct my question to the acting heir apparent—

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. gentleman direct it to the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Industry.

Mr. Martineau: Very good; I will do that. The minister in his statement this morning mentioned that he had discussed the question of the great lakes water levels with his ministerial colleagues from the United States. Is the minister in a position to say whether any specific proposals in this regard were submitted by the United States delegation for consideration by the government?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, no specific proposals were advanced by the United States delegation.

Mr. Martineau: Could the minister, then, give some enlightenment as to the nature of the discussions which took place on that subject?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will recognize that these were private consultations and discussions and one should do no more, in reporting them, than merely give an outline of what was discussed and the general conclusions reached. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated that the question was raised and examined but, as I have just said, no specific solutions were proposed.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE OF ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works; I have given him notice.

Does the minister anticipate a change in the layout of the trans-Canada highway in the eastern section of Montreal?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure, in view of the opportunity which will be given shortly this afternoon to get all the information, the hon. member will not mind my suggesting that he wait until the estimates are up for consideration.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN POSITION OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of his reference this morning to his having seen the president of Canadian National Railways, may I ask the minister whether he is now in a position to answer my question of February 27, March 20 and April 15 concerning the possibility of improving the pensions of Canadian National Railways' employees who have already retired.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say I am able to answer that question, although I wonder whether it falls within the hon. gentleman's definition of urgency which he put forward. As the answer is very short, I will give it. It is that I spoke to the president about this and he said he will be glad to be questioned about this matter when he appears before the parliamentary committee.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JULES SIOUI—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Is the minister aware of the fact that a resident of Quebec has been held in jail for seven months following his sentence of one month's imprisonment for removing an electoral list and if so, what steps have been taken to correct this grave injustice?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question yesterday with regard to Jules Sioui.

FISHERIES

CONSERVATION MEASURES TO PREVENT KILLING OF SEALS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question arising out of earlier questions to the Minister of Fisheries in connection with the amount of correspondence that all of us are receiving respecting the urgency and importance of legislation to put an end to the inhuman method of killing seals. The minister said the other day that he would be in a position in a day or so to make a report. I wonder whether he is now in that position.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in reply I wish to agree that there has been exceptional interest shown this year particularly in the methods used to kill seals. I have stated in the house before that some of the representations that have been made may have been somewhat exaggerated. What I meant by this was that these methods shown on film do not represent those used by the great majority of the fishermen engaged in the sealing operation. I have said that more restrictive regulations will be brought in before the opening of the 1965 season. This we intend to do. Those new regulations will deal with better conservation measures and better control of the methods used for the killing of seals. With this in view, and in order to get full information, I have called a meeting at Moncton on May 20 of those interested in the sealing operation. A few days ago I received representations from a delegation of the S.P.C.A. and have outlined to them what we intend to do, and they have appeared to be entirely satisfied with our intentions.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement just made by the minister that new regulations will be brought into effect for the 1965 sealing season, would the minister when drafting these regulations give some consideration to prohibiting the slaughter of seals through the use of helicopters? It would appear that this method is most cruel in that helicopters, when used to catch seals, disturb the females even before the young are born. I think the usual method could be maintained, with some limitations. But I would ask that the minister give some consideration to prohibiting the use of helicopters in the slaughtering of seals.

Mr. Robichaud: I cannot say at this time, Mr. Speaker, that the use of helicopters will be prohibited. Helicopters have been used to transport the sealers to the site of operation. The whole operation, whether it is carried out with the use of aeroplanes, helicopters, vessels, or whatever it is, will be taken into consideration; but it would be improper for me to state at this time exactly what decision will be reached, because, as I have said, such decisions will be reached after consultation with those interested in this industry, which means a revenue of $1½ million a year for certain areas of the Atlantic provinces.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I presume that the minister is taking under serious consideration the recommendations of the fisheries council of Canada that aircraft of all types be prohibited from being used in seal hunting?

Mr. Robichaud: Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that every representation that has been made to us in this respect will be taken into consideration. However, it would be improper for me to make a definite commitment at this time as to what will be done.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Some weeks ago I asked the minister if he would procure a copy of the film which it was alleged certain newspapermen in Montreal had taken, showing that baby seals were being skinned alive. The minister promised to secure copies of this film. I wonder if this has been done. If so, and if the film has been seen, have the facts alleged turned out to be true?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): As I promised the house Mr. Speaker, we attempted to obtain a copy of those films. They were not available at the time, so I sent officials of my department to see the films in question in Montreal. They have seen them and have reported to me what they saw. I understand that another film will be shown on the C.B.C. on the 17th or 18th of this month. I cannot but emphasize the fact that what is shown on these films does not represent the entire sealing operation. It represents what is being done by inexperienced sealers who have been engaged in such operation only within the last year or two. Those are the people we want to bring under control, so that these inhuman methods will be stopped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

GATT—PERSONNEL OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Who will be leading the Canadian delegation at the GATT meeting in Geneva, and will the government be represented there by a cabinet minister?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the hon. gentleman that I shall have the honour of leading the Canadian delegation at the meeting which opens next Monday. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been looking for a pair.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

RETALIATION BY U.S. IN RESPECT OF FISH PRODUCTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the absence of the Minister of Finance. Could the minister say whether he has received an assurance from his United States counterpart or from the minister concerned that the United States will refrain from any retaliation of any sort by way of duties or other means imposed against fish products if the Canadian government takes action in the future under the legislation which has recently been introduced in the Senate?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject was not discussed during the series of meetings which concluded yesterday.

POWER

PASSAMAQUODDY— REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Can we expect a further detailed report on the Passamaquoddy talks, particularly in view of the statements that were made before the talks began that Canada's interest was lagging, if not delaying, progress? When will such a report be made?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that there is no lagging on the part of the Canadian government. As was stated yesterday, no involving commitment has been made by either country, the United States or Canada, on the 'Quoddy project. On Wednesday afternoon I met with the United States secretary of the interior, Mr. Udall, and we discussed that aspect of the project that could affect the fisheries in the bay of Fundy. We both agreed that if and when it is decided to proceed with this project, it will be preceded by a thorough study of its implications on the fisheries of the bay of Fundy, taking into consideration the interests of the province of New Brunswick and those of the state of Maine.

Mr. Bell: Can we be assured that no statements will be made in Fredericton or Washington unless they are made simultaneously here? I refer to official statements in this connection.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I have no control over statements that might be made in Washington or in New Brunswick, but I want to assure the hon. member that if such a statement has to be made in which the Canadian government is involved, it will be made.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, in his capacity as house leader.

In view of the fact that the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections seems to be prevented from presiding over meetings, can the Minister of Justice tell us when that committee will meet to study the matters referred to it?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we hope that this committee will meet around the middle of next week.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

1. General administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $12,114,500.

The Chairman: This item in the main estimates may be found at page 380 of the blue book, with the details at page 383. Shall the resolution carry?

[Translation]

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, I have the honour to submit to the house my estimates for the year 1964-65. I propose to proceed as follows: I shall make certain general observations on the estimates, as submitted, and speak briefly on the additional responsibilities entrusted to the Department of Public Works; I shall do it in English. I will then put forward general and personal ideas, after which I will invite my honourable colleagues to make comments thereon.

I do not intend at this stage to discuss any particular items listed in those estimates. I shall make an important additional statement on the item concerning the national capital commission.

[Text]

Mr. Chairman, the departmental estimates for 1964-65 total $201.9 million, and this represents an increase of $28.2 million or 16.2 per cent over the 1963-64 estimates. Of the increase, $15 million reflects new responsibilities being assumed by public works from the Department of National Defence. They are, first, the northwest highways system, $10 million, and second, Fort Churchill, $5 million. A further $10 million increase results from the extended application of the trans-Canada highway contribution. Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, since on Tuesday last I read a statement in the house on the trans-Canada highway program and policy, I do not intend to deal with this matter any further today unless hon. members would like to ask a few questions about it.

An amount of $2.7 million of the increase can be identified with two major construction items; building construction, which is up nearly $2 million, and harbours and rivers up nearly $1 million. The balance is a net increase arising from normal adjustments of other items.

Before proceeding further, Mr. Chairman, I should like to mention a certain change in the way in which the estimates are presented this year. Hon. members will no doubt have noticed that there has been a considerable simplification of the vote structure for this department. This rearrangement will be noticed throughout the estimates of all departments and reflects the wish of the government to make the estimates more comprehensive to parliament. Hon. members will recall that these changes were recommended by the public accounts committee in its third report to the house in December 1963.

I should now like to deal as briefly as possible with some of the features of the new year's estimates. As indicated above, a significant change has occurred in the transfer of the northwest highways system and the administration of Fort Churchill to this department. The responsibility for the highways system is one which I particularly welcome because of the importance of its communication facilities to Canada. The staff of public works is now in the area and it is the government's intention to continue the high standard of maintenance which has been achieved by the Department of National Defence. At this stage, however, our main concern is to achieve in the most orderly way possible this transfer of responsibility from the Department of National Defence. I know there is considerable interest in the long-term government plans for this highway, the length of which is approximately 1,200 miles, representing nearly the distance from Halifax to Toronto. As I said in the house, we are making a complete study of this situation to determine the need for and feasibility of the rebuilding and paving of this highway. We are concerned not only with the total cost but also with the time schedule within which this could be effectively achieved.

Concurrently with this, public works has made arrangements with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who have a special interest in the development of the territory, to undertake an economic appraisal of the benefits to Canada during the rebuilding, upgrading and paving program. When in possession of this information we will be able to explore with other governments any suggestions or proposals which they may wish to make concerning the improvement of this highway.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word about the Haines road, which is about 160 miles in length of which 100 miles is in Canada and the balance in the state of Alaska. A great desire was expressed by the state of Alaska to keep this highway open on a year round basis, and as an experiment the Canadian government agreed to co-operate with the state of Alaska in keeping this road open during the past winter. This work is still in progress at this date and the department is now collecting and examining information and figures resulting from snowplowing operations throughout the winter, as well as the service provided. In light of this experience we will be in a position to decide whether it is advisable to give further consideration to this type of operation. It might be of interest to hon. members to know that up to 600 inches of snow can be expected in the area during winter.

The other major transfer of responsibility is the turnover of Fort Churchill to the Department of Public Works. Our main interest at this time is to protect the substantial federal investment in the area in view of maintaining the existing plant and utility and at the same time, consider with other civilian departments, alternative uses to which these facilities may best be put. We are also hoping for an improved co-ordination between Fort Churchill and Churchill townsite itself, which will eventually permit the province to carry out its constitutional responsibilities in the area. I must say that in that respect we have made an official approach to the province.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with another important matter which was raised by several hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Cariboo. It has to do with the Peace river power development. As the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands mentioned, British Columbia did not apply for a licence for a dam on the Peace river, as it argued that there was in fact no navigation on the river in the relevant area.

Hon. members will recall that months ago we had secured an opinion from the Department of Justice to make sure that at the point of dam construction the Peace river was navigable. The question has also been raised as to whether the legislation as it stands is binding on the crown in the right of a province. These are questions of legal interpretation as to the precise terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act. There are a number of amendments to that act that would be desirable, and when they are brought forward action will be recommended to remove the uncertainty to which I have referred, and to make clear the extent of the application of the act. In the immediate case, as the project is now under construction, a licence cannot be applied for, under the terms of the act, until the work is completed.

In the interim the main concern is to ensure the protection of navigation, particularly downstream on the Peace river where it is of some present importance, and on the Slave river below the Peace river. This can be achieved by co-operation between the British Columbia hydro and power authority and the Department of Public Works.

On April 6, 1964, the deputy minister of the Department of Public Works wrote to the chairman of the British Columbia hydro and power authority indicating the department's concern for the preservation of navigation rights on the Peace river and the Mackenzie river system. In his letter he requested information on the proposed schedule of filling for the reservoir and the proposed method of operating the power project. I am pleased to advise the committee that the chairman of the British Columbia hydro and power authority has assured the department of the co-operation of the authority. The requested information is being prepared and will be forwarded as soon as it is complete.

It is intended to review this information with the British Columbia hydro and power authority to make sure there is no risk of prejudice to navigation and, as I said previously, amendments to the act would be desirable to remove the uncertainties; and we intend to introduce such amendments. In the meantime there exists complete co-operation with the British Columbia hydro and power authority to ensure security of navigation in the area. I hope this information will be found satisfactory by those hon. members most interested in the matter.

I would now like to deal with a very acute problem in which not only my department but also some of my colleagues, particularly those representing affected areas, are taking a great interest. It is the problem of water levels in the great lakes, and particularly in lake Huron. As hon. members know, the Department of Public Works has a responsibility to undertake dredging in navigation channels and public harbours. Our program, however, generally deals with what is internationally known as normal water levels. Unfortunately from time to time cyclical situations, which are different from the normal, occur, and at the present time the low levels in some areas have created serious problems for some industries requiring navigation facilities in certain harbours.

As was mentioned by my colleague, the Minister of Transport, thorough studies on the control of water levels are under way on an international basis, but it would be unrealistic to expect that early solutions can be achieved. We are therefore faced with a great demand to increase our dredging in areas affected by this problem. We are of course sympathetic to these requests, but I must point out that in many cases dredging itself is no practical solution, particularly where a wharf design is based on a normal water level. In some cases dredging to a greater depth would cause the collapse of a wharf facility, or the elevation of a wharf may be such that the greater depth of dredging would render it practically useless. Hence, in some cases dredging alone is not the complete solution to the problem. A practical solution therefore involves not only dredging but also complete replacement or modification of wharf facilities.

In other cases, dredging to a greater depth in the navigation channels simply could not be maintained, or else would be impractical in relation to existing elevations of lake beds and soil conditions. This is therefore a difficult and complicated problem, but so far as we can we will take all steps to deal with it. We are now receiving our field information on harbours, with respect to locations where additional dredging may prove effective, and I propose to present these dredging projects to my colleagues not only as emergency requirements but as priority projects.

I would now like to deal with a last topic in English before reverting to certain special aspects of the operations of the department, which I intend to deal with in French. There has been a considerable interest in developments on parliament hill, no doubt stimulated by the work which has been done to provide facilities for parliament in the west block. My department has been working with the Speakers of both houses, and their committees, on a program for renovation within the centre block, which we all recognize is urgently needed, both from the point of view of the amount of accommodation provided for members of parliament as well as the standard of the facilities.

This program is one which must receive very careful and detailed study, particularly where renovations must be carried out consistent with the operation of parliament. There are many things to be done and to be considered, including a complete revamping of the electrical and mechanical services, which is badly needed if we are to have a modern air conditioning system, and adequate translation recording services.

Planning for these alterations is very complex, as all these things must be scheduled so as to permit us to continue our deliberations. For example, even the ceiling over our heads is in urgent need of repairs. There must be replacement of the leaded glass in the ten large windows on the east and west sides of this chamber where we intend to instal a coloured, opalescent glass to permit light to enter the chamber but eliminate the glare. This would permit the removal of the canvas awnings over these windows. The time needed for these alterations might be a matter of months.

Our planning extends to the east block, in which some of the alterations and provisions for accommodation are involved with the provision of a new headquarters building for external affairs, recently announced.

In some other aspects earlier solutions are possible, such as for the parking problem with regard to which plans are now in hand and being studied for the provision of sufficient space in order to leave the vista of parliament hill free of cars. It is our intention that the work will be put under contract this year.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words concerning our plans for the parliament building. I wish to say how important it is and I know this importance has not escaped anyone's notice.

What is the parliament building, if not the house of the people. So we should have all the facilities to greet the thousands of visitors coming from everywhere, from all provinces in Canada. No complaint should ever be heard that we have too many visitors. The public must know that here they are at home and we must make the necessary improvements on parliament hill and the surrounding grounds so that people will feel at home and so that when they leave they will be proud of their parliament. I suggest this is important, not only because of the problems we must deal with in this year 1964, but because in 1967 this national capital and this parliament hill will be stormed. We should make plans to get ready, so that the people who come here will take pride in what they have seen when they leave.

I now want to say a few words with regard to some aspects of the department's responsibilities. When I speak of the importance of the department, I mean the part it is playing and should play in this country's economy. Hon. members know that the Department of Public Works is one of the oldest in the government, but, as Canada develops, the concept of the department must evolve accordingly. For many years the part played by the Department of Public Works remained inconspicuous and static. People got into the habit of considering it as the contracting agency for public buildings, harbour and wharf projects.

I think that the first important development with regard to the part this department was playing about ten years ago, when perhaps the largest project ever conceived and carried out by the Canadian government was carried out by the Department of Public Works, and I am thinking here of the trans-Canada highway, the cost of which, when completed, will perhaps be twice that of the St. Lawrence seaway.

I must tell my hon. fellow members that one of my greatest wishes, as long as I am Minister of Public Works, is to contribute and to associate myself with those who now occupy the higher positions in that department to extend and increase the idea and, therefore, the importance of that department, and the role it has to play in this country's economy.

I think we should take resolute action to the effect of contributing, through major improvements in strategic sites, to the establishment of important industries, which would have repercussions, not only inside our boundaries, but also with regard to foreign trade. Well, that trend has already started; we even have several projects among those submitted to hon. members, which I associate with that new concept of our responsibilities, and I shall name one or two: the Canso project, for instance, in Nova Scotia, which means promoting jointly the establishment of a private business, that is, an ultra modern fishing industry, which will give jobs to several hundred workers.

A private company told us: If the government agrees to build a wharf, a breakwater or agrees to do some dredging according to the plans submitted, we will build there a plant that will give work to hundreds of people.

There is the Cap Noir project which also reflects a similar initiative.

A few days ago there was talk about the Gros Cacouna project indicative also of the new pattern according to which a study is made in a district in order to determine the measures that can be taken to spur economic activity.

There is no need to mention something everyone knows. The lower St. Lawrence region and the Gaspé peninsula are faced with serious problems due to a lack of easy, modern and adequate means of communication.

Concerning the Gros Cacouna project, I wish to say that it is the first stage of several major projects which will not only have a great impact on the economy of the whole area but will also contribute to bring the area out of the economic stagnation in which it has been for too long.

Mr. Chairman, our responsibilities include planning and economy. That is why, as has been suggested in certain circles, it might be desirable one day to change the name of the Department of Public Works for one which would reflect more specifically the various fields of activity in which it is engaged. The names of "planning and works department" or "building projects department" have been suggested.

I hope that my honourable colleagues will not show any reaction as to that.

My colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) will deal during the debate on his estimates, with this important, this major subject matter—as a matter of fact, the second most important in Canada—namely the tourist industry.

I will have to deal indirectly at this stage with tourism and to say a few words on a matter in which hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of people in Canada are most interested, namely the marina projects.

[Text]

The Chairman: Order. The minister's time has expired, unless he has the consent of the committee to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deschatelets: I thank my hon. colleagues and I shall try not to abuse their kindness.

I was talking about marinas. If we consider what is going on in the United States, we see that there has been in the last years an explosion in the activities consisting in the creation and construction of marinas and also in the dragging of various rivers in order to link them together. That is done jointly with the central government and the local administrations.

I think that investments in the United States, if I am well informed, will reach almost $1 billion for the establishment of marinas everywhere in the country where it would be possible to build them.

In other words, our neighbours to the south consider as highly important the tourist and economic aspects of this question which spur major economic activities.

The idea is not new to us. For several years now we have been wanting to build marinas in Canada. In my opinion, we should not fail to recognize this new type of installation which can and does greatly contribute to such an important industry as the tourist industry.

I wish to point out to the committee that even though we have not yet defined precisely our policy on marinas, we are already quite conscious of the bearing they have on the economy. We believe that when a clear-cut policy is established in that respect, it would be in the interest of all areas in the country if negotiations were undertaken with the provinces to consider the possibility of entering into joint programs to get full benefit from the operation of this new source of activity.

Mr. Chairman, last year while discussing the estimates, some hon. members showed great interest for the improvement of our architectural designs. Having been associated for a few years with the association of architects of the province of Quebec, I cannot be indifferent to this matter which is even more important than some people may imagine.

When we are building a federal building, whether it be in a large city or a small village, we must not forget it will represent the federal government in the area. In my opinion the more we seek to achieve a thing of beauty, something pleasant to look at, if not something expensive, the greater will be the importance of the results. I believe that a little village post office can be such as to create among the people the desire to improve their own homes and to adopt town planning for their locality.

I discussed that question many times with the chief architect of the department. I want to praise here his understanding and his ardent desire to raise the standard of our architectural plans. We are obviously pleased with what is being done, but we can never be entirely satisfied before we have considered the possibility of doing even better. I can assure the hon. members that we have already put the emphasis on this aspect in order to achieve this object.

I thought of and tried to establish a system to show that we are really interested in reaching that goal. We are now examining the possibility that the Minister of Public Works would each year, for instance in December, recognize officially the best plans submitted by architects and engineers during the year and judged the most meritorious. I can assure my hon. friends that if it can be done we shall do it with pleasure.

As far as construction is concerned, permit me to express here a personal opinion. I think that important buildings should not necessarily be erected in the centre of large cities—and I speak here of Ottawa, but I could say the same thing for Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver—because less important municipalities should not be neglected. They, too, are entitled to their share of federal government services.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word here about the problem I discussed a few months ago with the Canadian builders' association and the general association of cement contractors, that of our tender system. We do not know of any better system but perhaps it would be possible to improve it. If you follow the situation closely you will find that sometimes—I would say too often—a contractor who has been awarded a contract by the government is in financial straits and is unable to complete a project because his tender was too low.

That affects not only the contractor himself, but also the subcontractors and the workers—who sometimes are underpaid or not paid at all—as well as the material suppliers. But what interests us particularly is the quality of the work done. Well, I pointed out the problem but there was never any suggestion to abandon our system of public competitive tenders, and I think it is a good thing for this department which works in close co-operation with general organizations, like the Canadian builders' association, to ask for their advice on matters like these and once again, if my hon. friends wish to make suggestions on that matter, we will welcome them because while we are satisfied with the present situation, we are always prepared to welcome new suggestions which might bring some improvement to our system.

Mr. Chairman, those are the estimates I have the honour to bring before this house and I do not want to stretch the privilege given to me a while ago. I, therefore, submit them to the hon. members for discussion and approval, and I shall appreciate their suggestions which I surely will take into consideration, like all the views they might wish to put forward. I attempted to deal with the main points we never have an opportunity to discuss. Of course, I overlooked individual items, because we will review them and I hope I will be given credit for initiating the discussion on the highest level possible.

I ask my hon. friends to clearly understand that this is a very elaborate and very complex department with much diversified activities and we are the first to admit that. Undoubtedly, several sectors may leave room for improvements; and we shall do it gladly in order to serve the best interests of all Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago it was my first anniversary as Minister of Public Works. As a matter of fact, it was at this time last year that I took up my duties. The discouraging thing about it all is that the more I learn about it, the more I realize I have to learn.

However, in closing my remarks I am sure that my hon. colleagues will allow me to join them in my appreciation of the work of all those who have some responsibility in this department: the deputy minister, the assistant deputy ministers, the high officials as well as the employees of lower rank, for their conscientious work. I hope that today hon. members will pay tribute to them for carrying out their duties no matter on what side of the house they are sitting.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, my first words on the minister's estimates, since it is the first opportunity that has been given to any of us to do this, must be of congratulation to the deputy minister. He is a new man in the post, having come from the Department of Veterans Affairs, one who has not only an extremely distinguished war record but also a distinguished record in the public service of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: Second, Mr. Chairman, I would like to assure the minister, as I have privately in discussions with him on the telephone and in his office, that we of the official opposition will do everything in our power to assist him in expeditiously passing his estimates through the committee. The minister ranged widely in his opening remarks on the estimates of his department. His department is an extremely important one as is indicated by the amount of money he is charged with spending in the discharge of his responsibilities—well over $200 million. I realize that his responsibilities have been enlarged by the addition of the responsibilities he has mentioned with respect to the assumption of control of the maintenance of the northwest highway system, which passed to him on April 1 of this year from the Department of National Defence, and with the assumption, too, of the responsibility for Fort Churchill. I will be participating again in the discussion on these particular items when they arise, for I am certain the minister is aware of the great importance economically of the work of the maintenance of the Alaska highway to the economy of the Yukon generally and to a goodly portion of northeastern British Columbia. It is extremely encouraging, though, I might say briefly at this point with respect to the northwest highway system, to learn that the improvement and paving of that highway has been the subject of talks between members of the Canadian government and those of the government of the United States.

I am sure all hon. members are aware that representations have been made over the years by chambers of commerce in the United States, Canada, Alaska, and legislatures. These have come from not only politicians but businessmen of note in the whole of western Canada and the United States. So that the progress which is now apparently being made toward coming to some joint agreement for the improvement and paving of the Alaska highway is indeed warmly welcomed.

The minister's remarks concerning the Haines road responsibility, too, were of interest to me, and I draw his attention to the coincidence that I should be leading off the discussion on his estimates, on the part of the official opposition, at a time when two of his added responsibilities happen to be located in my particular constituency. But I would draw to his attention the fact that the 600 inches of snow that he mentioned as falling on this road from time to time, fall in the province of British Columbia and not in the Yukon. This link with tidewater is the only road link which exists between the Yukon and the Pacific ocean. It is an extremely important communication facility and one which eventually we hope will receive the same treatment as the Alaska highway in its improvement and paving.

However, I am somewhat concerned over the cost. I know the government concluded with the state of Alaska an agreement whereby that state undertook to maintain this road during the last winter season at a set cost to the Canadian government of $127,000. I believe the minister will not argue with my statement that the road is going to cost much more than this to maintain. Once the minister is in possession of the full cost figures in this respect, I am rather fearful that the decision will be made not to maintain it next winter, on the basis that it is uneconomic to do so. I hope this will not be the result, particularly in view of the fact that the maintenance of this road on an all-weather basis, as well as the paving of the Alaska highway, was one of those several promises made to the electorate of Pacific northwestern Canada during the last election campaign by the Liberals.

The minister, as I have noted, has an extremely wide responsibility. He has the responsibility of a department which is charged with the construction of wharves and docking facilities throughout Canada, one which provides housekeeping and maintenance services to all departments of government and has the responsibility of acting as the agent for other departments of government in the construction of public buildings. The opportunities for abuses entering into procedures that are adopted by the government in the construction responsibilities I have outlined are many, and unless the most careful watch is kept over the various projects as they are dealt with, these abuses are bound to arise. I will have a few more words to say in a moment in connection with contract tendering policies, because I have one or two suggestions that I thing might be useful to the minister in considering whether a change should be made in the existing system. Before leaving this particular aspect of the minister's estimates, I would like to suggest to him that he be not too quick to take pride in the type, standard and quality of post offices that are being constructed throughout the country. It may not be news to him to learn that in many areas of Canada where these $25,000 post offices are being constructed, the inhabitants of the smaller communities in which they are being constructed refer to them as the Grit biscuit boxes. So the minister perhaps might take a second look at the standard and quality of post offices being constructed, in keeping with the policy of providing these facilities to the smaller communities in Canada.

The minister has said nothing about the progress that has been made with regard to the Saskatchewan river dam, which of course he will recall vividly was commenced under the previous administration after years of dilly-dallying by the Liberals of the day. I think we should have a word from him on that matter. Perhaps we might wait until the specific item is up for discussion. But in view of its cost and in view of its importance to the prairie regions of Canada, and Saskatchewan in particular, I am sure hon. members would be interested in hearing from him on this matter.

I do not intend to comment on his remarks with respect to his plans for parliament hill itself, save to suggest to him that there may also be room for improvement here. A questionnaire was circulated quite recently asking all members whether extra social and recreational facilities could be provided which were not now provided for members of parliament. I am sure the joint committee will in due course communicate the recommendations of their body to the minister.

The minister's comments, too, were very brief concerning the national capital commission. There is a particular matter of great concern to the residents of this area and this city, with which he will have to deal when the item is raised. I am thinking of the future of the air station at Rockcliffe. A good many residents of the city of Ottawa are concerned with the maintenance of this airport as an airport. As I understand it, the eventual program is to completely eliminate Rockcliffe airport, in order to make way for the national capital commission constructing a highway right through the existing airport. If this is done, of course the airport goes by the board and the minister will be in direct conflict with his colleague the Minister of Transport, who is trying to establish a policy of separating general aviation from the large commercial operations that exist at Uplands. I feel that this matter has to be clarified by the minister in order to set at ease the minds of the residents with respect to the future of that airport, not only of this city, but also those interested in maintaining the facility as such.

I think, also, a word is deserving here on the existing policy of the minister as to the manner in which public projects are announced. As I understand it, the minister is in accord with the view that public projects, projects that are undertaken by his department, should be announced by the member of parliament who is sitting for that particular constituency. If the minister is in accord with that view, and I believe he professes to be, he should set up some system whereby sitting members of parliament will be advised in advance of a project being undertaken in a sitting member's riding, and also as to when it is completed. I think the minister will agree that it is an obligation of a sitting member of parliament, if his parliamentary duties will allow, to attend opening ceremonies at new public buildings in his constituency.

The practice of advising defeated Liberal candidates of construction projects in a riding where there is a sitting member in the opposition is a reprehensible one. I do not care whether this practice has been the custom over the years or whether it has not. It is my belief that if it did exist before it existed wrongly, and if it exists now it exists wrongly. I suggest to the minister that in keeping with the responsibilities, duties and obligations of a sitting member of parliament he should be one of the first to advise when public projects are going to be undertaken. He should also advise when the tenders will be open. So that a member may express interest in attending on behalf of his constituency when public buildings are opened in public, if for no other reason than to ensure regularity in the proceedings he should advise as to completion of these projects, and as to any opening ceremonies which are going to be undertaken in conjunction with the occupation of public buildings.

I was interested in the minister's remarks concerning the establishment of some system of awards for architectural designs submitted by individuals in Canada, and I am wondering how he is going to reconcile this with what might be a winner in the design of the world fair symbol, of which this parliament was rather critical but which is going to be implemented regardless.

Now a word or two about the minister's responsibility in the calling of public tenders for projects undertaken by his department. The present system, I feel, can be improved in several ways. At the moment my understanding is that in those areas where there are builders exchanges, tenders are called through those exchanges. This is so, even though there may be news media in smaller communities in the provinces where these builders exchanges exist. Perhaps the policy has been altered so that today not only are tender calls circulated through these builders exchanges, but they are also published in newspapers circulating in smaller communities. That should be the case, if it is not.

I believe that at one time the system was that the department was not required to advertise in the local newspapers. In order to give an opportunity to the residents of a community in which a public project is to be undertaken to bid, a proper policy—and it is not a costly policy; as a matter of fact it would probably prove to save the government money—would be to cause advertisements calling for public tenders to be placed in local newspapers.

I am sure the minister is well aware of the nefarious practices of unconscionable contractors in bid peddling and shop bidding. This is a field in which I know it would be difficult for the minister to develop a policy which would be consistent with dealing only with a prime contractor and not with subcontractors, but I feel some action must be taken to prevent this type of practice. The practice, of which I am sure he is aware, in some cases is for a prime contractor bidding on a public project sometimes worth several millions of dollars to call one subcontractor for, let us say, the installation of electrical material and services in a public project. The prime contractor will call one subcontractor and will ask him: "What can you give it to me for?" Then he will call the next subcontractor and tell him: "I have a price of so much from the first call; can you do it for less?" Sometimes he will suggest perhaps a lower price might be more in keeping. Then he will go on down the line of perhaps five or six subcontractors, and will do this throughout the whole field of subcontracting—plumbing, heating, ventilating, and so on—and the prime contractor will defeat the very purpose for which the tenders system was set up. I am sure the minister is aware of such things happening. Not only does this put the subcontractor in an untenable position but it completely destroys the purpose for which the tenders system was set up in the first place.

My suggestion to the minister, in order to get around this procedure and to cure this undesirable practice—this dishonest practice in fact—is to set up a bid depository system whereby the subcontractor could, unseen by the eyes of the prime contractor, submit his bid for the subcontracting work in a sealed envelope and have it held in the same manner that the bids are now held which are submitted by the prime contractor, and then opened at the same time. If the subcontractors' bids, having been sealed in the interim, are opened at the same time as the bid of the prime contractor is opened, and if the prime contractor is then required to take the lowest bid of the subcontractors' bids, then I think we would cure a long standing situation which has worked to the disadvantage of the subcontractor and to the disadvantage of the the government.

I believe that most of our prime contractors in this country operate under a system of ethics which does not permit this type of practice; but there are a good many who pay much more attention to the dollar than to good business ethics, and it is that type of contractor who is defeating the public tenders policies of the government.

I make that suggestion for improving the existing system which the minister has called for, namely the setting up of bid depositories. They can be in the builders exchanges. They can be wherever the prime contractors' bids are now required to be submitted. The depository for the subcontractors can be set up in the same location. If there are defects in my proposal which would permit the minister to be critical and to say it will not work, then I think we should hear those criticisms.

There is only one possible weakness in this system which I am suggesting to the minister, and that is that the prime contractor may not want to have the subcontractor who makes the lowest bid do the job. There may be some personality differences between the prime contractor and, say, the plumbing contractor, which would mean they would always be at loggerheads on the job. However, I do not think this would be a usual happening. I think normally the prime contractor is going to be happy to get the lowest bid, and I am sure the government will be happy to get the lowest bid because it means the saving of taxpayers' dollars. So it will only be the rare occasion where you would find the prime contractor unsatisfied with the subcontractor who is successful in submitting the lowest tender. This is the only weakness I can see in the proposal which I have made. There may be others, and if there are, then I think we should discuss them a little further.

I see, Mr. Chairman, that I have approximately five minutes left, and in that time I want to say that there will be others in the official opposition who will be dealing with the specific sections of the minister's estimates concerning harbours, rivers, and also engineering, a matter with which I have dealt but little in my remarks. There will be others who will be dealing with the building and construction branch, and who are much more qualified than I to discuss such matters.

Before sitting down I want to join wholeheartedly in endorsing the remarks of the minister with respect to the personnel of his department. In the few years I have been here in Ottawa I have had nothing but the highest sort of co-operation from members of his department, particularly his two assistant deputy ministers, Mr. Jackson and Mr. Williams; and I hope that by mentioning their names in the house I am not administering to those who highly qualified gentlemen the kiss of death. They are very highly qualified civil servants and are extremely capable in their jobs. Everyone familiar with the work of assistant deputy Jackson is well aware of his work in the civil service and the great contribution he has made in that field. Also, I think anyone who knows assistant deputy Williams knows the very high degree of capability that gentleman has with regard to engineering matters. I could mention others in the minister's department, such as the father of Eddie Litzenberger, a very famous hockey player. By and large the minister can be proud to be surrounded with the types of individual he has in his department. So far as I am concerned, they are very highly qualified and respected people.

Mr. Prittie: At the outset I should like to compliment the minister on the presentation of his estimates today. Watching him during the past year I have been quite impressed, and he certainly gives the impression of quiet confidence. On top of that he seems to be a man of ideas.

I rather like his ideas concerning architecture, and I should like to make a specific suggestion concerning it. Construction of the new terminal building at Vancouver international airport, which is in my riding, will begin shortly, and I would suggest an attempt be made to get something of a local character into this building. It is very beautifully located, backed by mountains. Rather than build airports on a standard line, I think they should reflect something of the local areas. Perhaps there could be more use of wood in this terminal, because it is one of the main products of British Columbia.

I have one small complaint to make. The report of the Department of Public Works for the year ended March 31, 1963, and the report of the Trans-Canada Highway Act are still with the printers. It would have been useful if these had been in our hands before considering the estimates of the department. Probably this is not the fault of the department, but the government should have taken it into account when scheduling these estimates to come before the committee.

Not so long ago the hon. member for Northumberland talked about the need for research assistants for members of parliament, and it is at a time like this that I keenly feel this need. It is not too difficult to talk about public works in one's own riding, but if you want to deal with a very large department and all its operations, on only a few days notice, this is when you need a little help. The minister has a great deal of help at his disposal, but despite not having these reports I shall try to make a few intelligent comments on the work of his department.

I propose to deal briefly with the national capital commission, the trans-Canada highway and the organization of the department itself. It is almost a standard joke to complain about the roads in Ottawa, but really they are quite bad, as anyone knows who has bumped and thumped along them. I am sure the cost of the depreciation of automobiles in this area must run into hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, and I am certain Jean Paul would do a better job of building roads than Charlotte.

The only good roads I have come across in this area are those built by the N.C.C., or the department of highways of Ontario. I do not know what is the reason for this. Perhaps Ottawa lacks the tax resources to do an adequate job, and if that is the case we would be much better off it this job could be transferred to the national capital commission.

In recent months some suggestions have been made about the creation of a federal district embracing Ottawa and Hull, a district that would be neither in Quebec nor Ontario. This has been resisted vigorously by the people on the local councils, but I have spoken to a good many local residents and not all of them are opposed to the idea. It is a practical suggestion and I am sure it could be negotiated. No doubt the province of Quebec would be agreeable if it were made a completely bilingual district where the traffic signs would read "slow" and "lentement" instead of just "slow". But if we cannot have a federal district I would like to see better construction of roads in this area. I am really quite ashamed when people come here from other parts of Canada, or from other countries, and I have to take them over the roads in this city.

The minister did not have very much to say about the trans-Canada highway, but some time ago he made a statement concerning the need for a second trans-Canada highway and the requests that had been made to him. According to the last report, which I read some months ago, about 1,700 miles of the highway are still incomplete, that is, they are not built up to trans-Canada highway standards, but I think we can agree that what has been completed is a very good highway and serves a very good purpose.

Presumably one of the purpose of the highway was the same as the purpose in building a trans-Canada railway, to help knit the country together. I would like to give a good example of how this serves the national purpose. Now that the Rogers pass portion of the highway is complete it has knitted the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta much more closely together.

Until it was completed it was the tendency in B.C., and I think in Alberta, for tourist travel to be directed towards the states immediately south of those two provinces, but now that the Rogers pass section is completed there is much more travel between Calgary, through the Okanagan valley into Vancouver, which has resulted in an increase in tourist business in the interior of B.C. This is a good example of bringing two parts of the country together, and stopping the tendency of Canadian tourists to go south into the states.

In recent months there has been some talk about a second trans-Canada highway. This is an important topic, but some people have proposed something more important, the adoption of a national highway policy. The provincial ministers of highways in several provinces agree with this idea, and many organizations in the country that are concerned with roads and travel have expressed their views on it, such as the Canadian automobile association, the Canadian construction association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian lumbermen's association, all of which have joined together in asking for a national highways policy. If we had such a policy the question of a second trans-Canada highway could be fitted into it.

I am sure the minister and his officials are well aware of the fact that the United States federal government is much more involved in highways construction than the Canadian federal government. We have restricted ourselves to the trans-Canada highway, to highways in national parks, and now the Alaska highway, but the United States federal government has gone much further than that. It has contributed not only to the main arterial highways of the country but also to many interstate highways, and to many highways confined within states.

The formula by which it contributes to the state authorities is quite a complicated one and I do not intend to go into it at this time. The important thing is that the federal government is committed to it and, as a result, per capita there is much more highways construction taking place in the United States than in Canada.

The type of highways which I feel should receive federal help are those that are interprovincial but which may not be part of the trans-Canada highway, and roads which are international, running towards connecting highways in the United States. In this connection I am thinking of the main highway which runs from Vancouver south to the United States border, connecting up with U.S. highway 99. This highway from Vancouver was built entirely at the cost of the provincial government, whereas in the United States the part coming up through California, Oregon and Washington right to the border was built with federal participation.

This is a heavily travelled road, something like the road in Alberta from Edmonton and Calgary south to the United States border, or the road from Winnipeg to the border, which eventually connects up with Minneapolis. In addition there are provincial highways which could be improved, such as the one across the northern part of our prairies from Edmonton to Saskatoon, and from Edmonton on to Prince George and eventually over to Prince Rupert.

I know that a couple of weeks ago the minister announced that this matter had been discussed to a certain extent with provincial departments, and at that time it was decided not to proceed with further deliberations concerning a second trans-Canada highway. However, I would like to suggest that this idea of a national highways policy should not be forgotten.

It would have many beneficial results. For one thing it could provide a common standard of highways construction throughout the country. The trans-Canada highway standard is a good one, and so are the standards of most of the provinces, but a national highways policy would ensure the same common standard. Further, participation by the federal government would help some of the provinces which are not proceeding with highways to do more of this work. Some provinces, particularly Ontario which is a large province, can proceed on its own, as it is doing with its highways construction, particularly the 400 series which are excellent highways; but this is not true everywhere. I think it would help to co-ordinate highway planning from one province to another. The Canadian automobile association made a submission to the government in 1959, I believe, and I want to quote one paragraph. They state:

> The present responsibilities for highways in Canada are not sufficiently co-ordinated nor clearly enough understood to justify hope that a national system of highways, without direction, would eventuate. The Canadian automobile association believes that it is a matter of mutual interest for all road building agencies in Canada to recognize the essentiality of co-ordinated planning.

The situation may turn out all right with every province working on its own, but it may not. I think we should have this co-ordination. I feel that some of the most important and most expensive highway construction in the country is that which takes place around our major metropolitan centres. This is very expensive, particularly since highways of many lanes have to be built and also because expensive land acquisitions are involved.

I know that the question of federal involvement in provincial matters is a very touchy one these days, but I should like to see some method worked out whereby our major metropolitan centres, which have tremendous bills for highway construction, could get some help. This is done to a limited extent in the United States. I know that a few years ago in Vancouver a scheme was presented for extensive highway and freeway construction for the metropolitan area. I know that the building of freeways does not solve all traffic problems, but certainly some roads of this type are needed. This project was abandoned because the local areas involved simply could not pay the bill.

At the present time Montreal is in the midst of a very expensive highway construction program. They are fortunate in that they are receiving some help by reason of the road-building in connection with the world fair. This may be quite legitimate, but nevertheless it does help the Montreal metropolitan area. The minister can correct me if I am wrong but I believe some money was allocated from the trans-Canada highway fund for roads in the metropolitan area.

Mr. Deschatelets: This is part of the trans-Canada highway, and as it is the most expensive part the province is entitled to have the 90 per cent which we have to pay on one tenth of the whole length applied there. We have done the same thing for all provinces. In this case it would not have been possible for the city of Montreal to enter into such an undertaking without the help of the province of Quebec. The province is paying nearly $100 million, I believe, while the cost to the city of Montreal is $35 million or $40 million.

Mr. Prittie: I do not want to be misunderstood. I was not suggesting to the minister that because he is from that area parliament is giving any special help to the city of Montreal. Perhaps more city roads should be declared to be part of the trans-Canada highway. This might solve the problem.

I believe the minister said in his statement two weeks ago that he did not want to proceed with a further conference on a second trans-Canada highway, because of the financial commitments that the federal government had made to the provinces. I can understand this, but it seems to me that if we could develop a national highways policy under which some of the construction costs of highways in the provinces would be paid by the federal government the provinces would have less reason to demand more and more funds from the central government. Along with education the building of highways certainly involves the greatest expenditures by the provinces. I hope the minister will not give up on this idea entirely. I am sure that agreement could be reached with the provinces on this matter and it would have to be a necessary prerequisite of such an agreement, of course, that the federal government had sufficient funds available.

Some of us are a little alarmed at the growth of the autonomy of the provinces and the amount of money they are demanding from the federal government. I want to see the central government have enough money to participate in those things which serve national purposes,—and such roads do serve national purposes. I am sure the minister will hear more about a national highways policy in the future from others, if not from me.

Finally, I thought the minister might have made some reference to the recommendations of the Glassco commission as they apply to his department. The commission made quite a few recommendations which are found mainly in volume 2 of their report. I am going to quote some of them. On page 35 of volume 2 of the report of the royal commission on government organization I find the following recommendation dealing with land:

> We therefore recommend that: (2) The Department of Public Works be made responsible for the development of a complete inventory of properties owned or leased by the federal government and its agencies, and its maintenance as a perpetual record by posting to it all future acquisitions and disposals as they occur.

Here is another recommendation dealing with land:

> The Department of Public Works, in its organization for real property management, assigns staff to be responsible for land use aspects of federal property ownership and to consult and co-operate with other levels of government and their agencies for the future development of urban, rural and regional areas.

Under the heading of "Property Management" on page 36 they recommend as follows:

> 1. The Department of Public Works be constituted the sole authority for real property management outside the defence sector.
> 2. Except for defence purposes, the acquisition of property by purchase or lease be made by the Department of Public Works and title thereto be held in its name.
> 3. The disposal of all surplus property of the federal government, including property declared excess to the needs of the armed forces, be the responsibility of the Department of Public Works and that under a form of organization appropriate for the purpose, aggressive efforts be made to identify and dispose of unneeded real property.

Under the heading of "Construction" they point out that at the time of confederation the Department of Public Works was the only department concerned with construction, but over the years other departments have got into the field, notably the Department of Transport and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. As a matter of fact, they state that the Department of Public Works is doing about 40 per cent of actual construction work, and on page 47 they make these recommendations:

> 1. The Department of Public Works be made responsible for the planning and supervision of all construction required by civil departments and agencies and the employment of all professional, technical and supporting staffs needed for such purposes.
> 2. The Department of Public Works be made responsible for the planning and supervision of construction for the Department of National Defence of all classes of property other than those at present provided for through the planning and construction staffs of the armed forces.

They make further recommendations concerning property operations. I will not quote them but they are found on pages 58 and 64. Beginning at page 65 they have a section entitled "The New Role of the Department of Public Works". I realize that many of the recommendations of the Glassco commission are probably still being discussed in government circles. There may even be power plays going on with regard to who is going to control what. I do not know, but certainly I should have liked to hear a commentary by the minister concerning the recommendations of the commission. I am not really qualified to know whether or not these are good recommendations, but presumably competent commissioners studied this matter and came up with these recommendations. Therefore I should like to hear the minister's comments on them.

I was pleased with the final remarks of the minister. He gave some personal views as to what he thought the role of the department should be. Generally I liked the views he expressed. I liked the views he expressed concerning the building of marinas. I do not know whether in this day and age he has run into difficulties with the provinces in this regard, or whether because harbours are involved this is an exclusively federal matter, but it is a very good idea. So far as the lakes in the east are concerned, and the waters on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, there are many people from the United States who would like to travel by pleasure craft in the summer and would make very good use of marinas. I hope this idea is pursued.

I have no particular comments to make on his suggestions with regard to tendering. I do not know very much about that subject but our party leader, the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, has had great experience and I believe he will be commenting on that matter later. I was pleased to hear the minister say that improvements will be made on parliament hill and in the centre block. Before the minister mentioned it here I had read that our ceiling may fall on us at any minute. It is made of Irish linen which is rapidly becoming quite rotten. But the problem seems to be that we have to get parliament out of here for several months before the work can be undertaken and I do not know how that is going to be accomplished in the next year or so. I should like to conclude by congratulating the minister again on his presentation and on the view he has of the operations of his department, but I also warn him that there will be a great deal of criticism when we come to particular items later.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes left to me I want to deal very briefly with one or two items and I think it would be as well for me to cover them at this point rather than on the particular votes. First of all, I should like to deal with the Alaska highway paving program. It will be recalled that there was some paving done under a former Liberal administration, and then the paving projects ceased.

There was a conference in Whitehorse on September 11 and 12 of last year and at that conference it was my pleasure to mention to the delegates the experience I had had with the Department of National Defence. It is no secret that the Department of National Defence did not wish to pave the highway, using funds which it would much prefer to spend in other directions. I am particularly pleased that the suggestion which I made at that time, that responsibility for this project should be transferred from the defence department to the Department of Public Works is now to become an actuality. I wish to compliment the minister and thank him for the work done in this regard.

I understand, in connection with the Alaska highway, the thinking, that all the details as far as the engineering is concerned should be worked out before any building is done; that negotiations now in progress between the United States and Canada should be cleared up. We know of the bills which are before the congress of the United States in the names of Mr. Mansfield, Mr. Bettin and Mr. Olson—ostensibly, the same bills. We realize, too, that a resolution has been passed by the Alberta legislature. In the few minutes at my disposal I should like to make a plea, however, that those parts of the Alaska highway which fall within the alignment in the final survey should be paved at the earliest possible moment—I have in mind those sections where no major reconstruction program is needed. It would relieve the traveller if he could get on to a little paving once in a while. Even more important, it would reduce the danger which results from present conditions, because when a traveller is following a heavy unit which is kicking up dust, and this goes on mile after mile, he is tempted to take risks in order to pass. He dashes out into the dust and faces the possibility of a collision with an approaching vehicle. If there were occasional strips of paved surface it would help drivers a great deal.

I see my time has expired, and since I have one or two other things to say on this subject, I should like to call it five o'clock.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

PROVISION OF STATUTORY HOLIDAYS WITH PAY FOR EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill C-30, to provide for pay for statutory holidays and for pay for work performed on statutory holidays for employees in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

He said: This is a bill which by now must be quite familiar to hon. members of this house. It provides for one of the elements of what ought to be a national labour code. Specifically, it provides for statutory holidays with pay for certain employees in Canada.

Let me make it clear that the employees to be covered by this bill are those who come under federal labour jurisdiction. I have noticed that on some former occasions when this measure and companion pieces to it have been under debate in the house, some reports have suggested that this and the other bills dealt only with federal government employees. That is not the case. Those we talk about when we refer to employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction are all those who work in the sectors of industry which, by the terms of the British North America Act or by the terms of various decisions, come under federal labour jurisdiction, including, for example, railway and other transport workers, grain elevator employees, employees of banks, employees in certain fields of communication and so on. There are many groups of this kind whose labour relations are the subject of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Actually, in percentage terms, about 10 per cent of the workers of Canada are in employment which comes under federal labour jurisdiction. The other 90 per cent are in employment which comes under the labour legislation of the various provinces.

For our part, we hope the day will soon come when there will be legislation right across Canada, both federal and provincial, to provide for statutory holidays with pay for all our workers. But, of course, in the federal parliament the only ones on whose behalf we can legislate are those who come under federal jurisdiction. We feel, also, that if the federal parliament would take a lead in this matter the provincial legislatures would follow, and this is one of my reasons for urging this measure upon the house. I mention this because many employees who come under federal jurisdiction already have statutory holidays with pay along the lines spelled out in this legislation. For example, federal civil servants have statutory holidays with pay as provided in the Civil Service Act. There are many other employees in various industries, for instance, in the transportation and communications field, who have a certain number of statutory holidays with pay which they have won through collective bargaining. Nevertheless, there are still many employees in the federal labour field who do not enjoy the provisions set out in this bill and our purpose in bringing in the measure is to extend these provisions to all those employees and also, as I said, to give a lead to the provinces in the hope that the day may soon come when we shall see statutory holidays with pay provided for all our workers.

The bill does set out the eight holidays which it is proposed should be recognized for the purpose of holidays with pay provisions. Those eight holidays are: New Year's day, Good Friday, May 24, or whatever day is celebrated in lieu of May 24; the first of July, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day. I would point out that the bill not only provides that workers shall get these days off, and get full pay for them; it also makes provision for overtime rates to be paid in case employees are required by the necessities of their employment to work on any one of those statutory holidays.

In arguing for this kind of legislation I am really preaching to the converted. Every party in this house stands for a national labour code; every party in this house stands for the kind of conditions that are contained in this measure, and in other companion pieces to it that are on the order paper in the names of those of us in the New Democratic party. But the fact of the matter is that we have been waiting a long while for some of these things to be implemented. I know it will probably be said during the course of the debate this afternoon that the present government has promised a national labour code and therefore we should possess ourselves in patience; that we should wait and let the government bring in that code and be confident that it will include the measure that is set out in this Bill No. C-30. I know, too, we will also be told—because this has been said in previous debates—that it is not good enough just to bring in one measure, and what my friends on the Liberal side of the house in particular want is a comprehensive measure. I would like to answer that first. I know that if we brought in a bill that had in it two, three, four or half a dozen elements of a national labour code, we would be told the very opposite; we would be told that certain members could support our bills if they were precise on one point, but it is too complicated to have several things covered. So no matter which way we bring it in, we get this kind of criticism.

On this point of waiting, on this point of having confidence in the government, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out one or two things. I suppose my friend, the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne), if he deals with this matter, will probably expect me to refer to ancient history. The fact is that the Liberal party first started promising the elements of a national labour code in 1919, 45 years ago. When are we going to get it? Some pieces of legislation that now come before the house give dates in the future. It is interesting, for example, to pick up Bill C-75 and find in it dates going as far ahead as the year 2015. When we get there I do not know whether we will say "twenty-fifteen" or "two thousand and fifteen". I said "when we get there"; I suppose I should have said "if".

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it might be a good idea for the Liberal party to tell us if it is their intention to implement their program of 1919 before 2019. After all, that is only 55 years away, so it might be a good idea to have a clear statement from the Liberal party on this question. At any rate, we have been told for 45 years that it is the program of the Liberal party to bring in a national labour code. I will not give all the history of all the times this has been promised during those 45 years, but I point particularly to the fact that in the last parliament, the twenty fifth parliament, the last, short, Diefenbaker parliament, the Liberals who sat over on this side of the house supported by their speeches—and one of the most active supporters was the present Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen)—our various proposals for a national labour code. In the election which the Liberals won on April 8, 1963, they promised that they would bring in a national labour code.

We tried to pin the government down in the first session of this parliament as to when this would take place, and we were told by the present Minister of Labour on November 8 last year that a national labour code would be brought in at this session of parliament. Well, that is beginning to get a bit nearer. It is a long time from 1919 to 1963, but finally we were assured that a national labour code would be brought in during 1964. Why don't I just take the government's word for it, Mr. Speaker? The government goes further than that. We were told in the speech from the throne that commenced this session that a national labour code would be brought in. The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in his speech in this house on the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne confirmed that a national labour code would be brought in at this session. The Minister of Labour spoke in that debate, and he said it would be brought in at this session. There have been questions asked and answers given in the house, and we have been told time and again, "Yes, a national labour code will be brought in at this session".

I attended some of the sessions of the Canadian Labour Congress convention in Montreal a week or so ago and heard the Minister of Labour say to the delegates attending that convention that a national labour code would be brought in at this session. When I asked him when, he gave us the usual answer, "Soon". And so we go on. This is the fifty fourth day of the session and still there is no sign of a national labour code on the order paper. So it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have to continue playing the role that some of us seem to have had to play for many years, that of trying to prod the government to do something about things in which it says it believes. Therefore, because a national labour code has not yet reached the order paper in any way, shape or form, it seems to me we have to try to bring this to the attention of the government by bringing forward bills such as this with various elements of a national labour code in them. We have brought such bills before the house from time to time.

I think it would be a good idea if this House of Commons this afternoon would show on the one hand that it wants a national labour code passed at this session, and on the other hand that it wants the government to act, by giving support to the principle of this bill, by passing it on second reading. That would be an indication that the House of Commons wants action. If that happens, as I hope it will, I would be prepared to move that the bill then be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations, and it could rest there for a while to see whether the government brings in its measure. If the government does, and its measure is as good as or better than this one, the government bill can go through; but if the government does not bring it in, it seems to me that at least this element of a national labour code ought to be enacted by this parliament at this session. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the house will give favourable consideration to this measure that every party and every member supports, and I hope that favourable consideration will result in this bill being passed in this hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and we have acquainted ourselves with the principle of his Bill No. C-30 and of the explanatory note which reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that all employees in Canada who come under federal labour jurisdiction shall receive their regular pay for at least eight statutory holidays each year, without having to work on those holidays. It also provides that when any such employee is required to work on any statutory holiday, as defined in the bill, he shall receive pay for such work at double time in addition to his regular pay for such holiday.
> Nothing in this bill affects any provision for statutory holidays with pay enjoyed by any employees where such provisions are more favourable than those enjoyed herein, but this bill does supersede any provisions which are less favourable than those set out in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just explained to us the necessity of such a legislation or such a bill knows that for 20 years his own party was in office in Saskatchewan and that during those 20 years they forgot to apply what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asks us to accept here in this federal parliament.

When we see—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Is the hon. member aware that Saskatchewan is one of the two provinces in Canada that does have legislation like this?

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Caouette: Which is the other one?

Mr. Knowles: Manitoba.

Mr. Caouette: They have legislation, but not for all Saskatchewan, just a part; because all the federal employees in Saskatchewan are treated the way they are in Quebec or anywhere else in Canada.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit me to say he is correct on that point, that the Saskatchewan legislation covers only those employees that provincial legislation can cover. It cannot cover employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction. But all employees in Saskatchewan who can be covered by provincial labour legislation, are covered.

Mr. Caouette: But does the hon. member know that in Saskatchewan the conditions regarding provincial employees are restricted to just the hours of the day they can work, and double time is never paid in Saskatchewan. That is for the hon. member's information.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I visited Saskatchewan—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Tell us about your province.

Mr. Caouette: Our province is in exactly the same position as Saskatchewan, because there is no difference between the Liberals and the socialists.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: Things will improve out there now.

Mr. Caouette: You should go out to Alberta and British Columbia and see the difference in those provinces.

Mr. Knowles: They do not have this kind of legislation at all.

Mr. Caouette: No; they have better legislation, because they are Social Crediters.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when I take—

[Text]

An hon. Member: You might as well give up Social Credit.

Mr. Caouette: No. You have to work, but you do not have to work for nothing, as you do under Liberal administration.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, section 1 of Bill No. C-30, under the short title, says:

1. This act may be cited as the Statutory Holidays With Pay Act.

Whereas section 2 states:

2. In this act,
(a) "deputy minister" means the deputy minister of labour;

Very well.

(b) "employee" means a person of any age, —of the age of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

—of either sex who is in receipt of or entitled to any remuneration for labour or services performed for an employer;

Now, paragraph (c), probably the most important paragraph, reads as follows:

(c) "employer" means any person, firm or corporation employing one or more employees and includes every agent, manager, representative, contractor, subcontractor or principal and every other person who either:
(i) has control or direction of one more employees; or
(ii) is responsible, directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, for the payment of wages to, or the receipt of wages by, one or more employees;

Mr. Speaker, we do not object to all federal employees, or employees coming under federal jurisdiction, being dealt with in a logical fashion, so as to be recognized as human beings and not as so many numbers in the federal administration.

During extended debates of parliament or, for instance, during Easter recess or periods like the present one, when employees are called upon to arrive in the House of Commons at nine o'clock in the morning to go back home in the evening at ten o'clock or half past ten, having worked on days which are supposed to be statutory holidays, on such occasions, we do not object to salaries being double pay. If legislation, and the over-all administration in Canada, does not proceed at a faster rate than at the present time, it could not be blamed on civil servants, but rather on the representatives of the people sitting here in parliament, who impose extra work on those employees. In that case, we have no objection in seeing the salaries doubled, no objection to double time for the days which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests are legal holidays, that is days when federal employees should take time off.

Mr. Speaker, even that would not settle the whole problem. We have other solutions to suggest. The point would be to improve the national administration and also our parliamentary debates which are so long and proceed so slowly that there is a considerable loss of time in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pépin: You do not set a good example.

Mr. Caouette: I hear the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska tell me that we are blocking the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Pépin: No, I said you did not give a good example.

Mr. Caouette: An example of what?

Mr. Choquette: You give the example of an hon. member speaking empty words.

Mr. Caouette: That is precisely what both those hon. members did in their own ridings during the last election. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who was a professor at the University of Ottawa, realized, since he was elected and became a parliamentary secretary that he is losing his time in the ranks of the Liberal party. Surely, he will come back to better feelings toward Social Credit when he gets back his freedom.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Who told you that?

Mr. Caouette: He told me. He was educated and was going to educate his students to Social Credit philosophy. I am not the one who told him; he told me.

Mr. Knowles: Is that where the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) got the idea of debt free money?

Mr. Caouette: Probably.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we, in this corner of the house, sincerely believe that improvements should be made, and that not only from one, but from all sides of the house, the recognition of the rights of federal employees should be made a fact. Even if some Liberal members, or others, want to interrupt, we believe that the federal employees, throughout Canada, should be fairly, logically and humanly treated.

The bill before us is a very complex one. I understand, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said a while ago, that there are involved some purely political matters, questions raised for the whole of Canada, whereas one province, because it had the opportunity to do so for the last 20 years, could have given an adequate treatment within its own boundaries.

We of the Social Credit, believe that the system of economic treatment should not be conceived as a general regimentation. On the contrary, the system should be conceived and administered in consideration of the individual, of the human person, and as long as we do not take the human person and the respect we owe to the individual into account, it will be useless to introduce such bills. We shall get nowhere, whatever party be in power. We hardly could expect other results. But, when we consider the importance of the human person, then we shall be able to legislate accordingly, with the greatest respect for men, women and children in Canada.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, may I make a few short remarks with regard to the bill now before us.

This legislation contains a principle which we should favour, because it is a general trend in the world today and if I may do so later, I shall quote a few relevant statistics. There is, in the whole world, a general tendency to have shorter working hours.

If I may be allowed to make a digression, as I represent an essentially rural farming county, I would like to pay a particular tribute to our farmers, who, I think are the only ones in today's society who are not always asking for paid holidays, which means that the praiseworthy labour and the doughty persistence of our farmers are always worth mentioning and that those people derive their strength and their greatness of character from the fact that they are never afraid to face work.

However, Mr. Speaker, a dividing line must be drawn between farming and industrial labour.

To come back to the bill now before the house, I repeat that the principle of the bill is particularly acceptable and in spite of the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has tried to refute the arguments against the bill, I agree that the bill could not be passed separately, because it would be much better if it was integrated in a set of laws.

It would be wiser not to mention immediately the term "labour code" since the hon. member has mentioned it a moment ago. Such a measure should have been introduced in this house years ago, but every time, some way was found to put off the discussion of such a bill.

Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps deplorable that this parliament is at a standstill at the present time; it is unfortunate and we strongly deplore it. Without blaming anyone—but the constituents will be in a position to judge and they are bound to do so. I think that it is advisable to denounce with the member for Winnipeg North Centre the fact that no positive and substantial legislation could be passed by this parliament, on account of a disconcerting slowness, a true paralysis. We are faced with a systematic obstruction that we must denounce with all our might.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Who is obstructing this?

Mr. Caouette: The Conservatives.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of preventing this bill from being passed, because I maintain that its principle is acceptable, but that its text, in its present form, can certainly not be approved today and not until it has been subjected to further study. Indeed, the bill itself contains 18 clauses, each having its own importance, and it should be referred to a committee of the house for further study.

Mr. Speaker, the principle that I accept is in accordance with recommendations made in June 1962 by the international labour organization. During that session, the organization adopted the following general principles:

> Every member should formulate and follow a policy which would promote, through methods taking into account conditions, national traditions and the situation of each industry, the principle of the progressive reduction of the normal working period.
> Every member, by means adapted to methods now in use and likely to be introduced to regulate the work period, should promote and, to an extent compatible with national conditions and traditions, ensure the application of the principle of gradually reducing the normal work period, in accordance with the following paragraph.
> The principle of the gradual reduction of the normal work period could be applied through legislation—

That is, by means of a bill such as the one now before the house. I continue:

> The normal work period should be gradually reduced, when suitable so as to achieve the social standard indicated in the preamble of the present recommendation, without resulting in any way in less pay for the workers—

Such an aim is consistent with the principle of the bill now under consideration. I proceed with the quotation:

> —following the reduction of the work period.

Mr. Caouette: What would be the length of that period?

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I shall come back to this matter in a little while, and for the information of my hon. friend, I must tell him that those statistics were taken from an indisputable authority, namely the Labour Statistics Yearbook.

Mr. Caouette: How long would be the work period?

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the present trend is to establish a 40 hour work week. I feel that if the miracle theory of Social Crediters were ever applied, nobody would have to work any more, because dividends would be distributed to everybody, large quantities of money would be printed and no one would have to work.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Should that be the case, the hon. member for Lotbinière could benefit therefrom, because he has done very little since he came to the House of Commons.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, this is such a childish comment that I feel it would be better to ignore it. Besides, I shall point out to the hon. member that one must not assess the quality of the work performed by a member by the number of sterile speeches he makes in this house.

Mr. Caouette: Except for the member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Choquette: Except Mr. Speaker, for all the members of the Social Credit party, the Caouette branch, who since the beginning of this session and during the last one, have made the most trivial speeches, so completely useless that they have never served the public interest.

I am now going to continue my statement and I shall refer to the recommendation made by the International Labour Organization. Another principle reads as follows:

> The principle of progressive reduction of the normal duration of work, as expressed in paragraph 4, could be applied by stages, without it being necessary to determine them at the international level.
> Such stages could be spread over a period of time and include progressively various sectors of the national economy; the two previous methods could be combined; any other method that might seem better suited to conditions prevailing in the country and to each field of economic activity, could be followed.

Consequently, the method providing for stages spread over a period of time could very well correspond to the one suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which provides for statutory leave with pay.

Mr. Speaker, allow me also to refer to the suggestions made by the Canadian Labour Congress. The congress invited the unions affiliated to the C.L.C. to ask for higher wages or a shorter work week, or both, since mechanization and automation increase production.

It is precisely on account of the automation problem that it is necessary to establish that principle of a progressive reduction of the work week.

At a meeting held in Chicago in 1962, the executive council of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. moved a resolution asking for a shorter work week without any reduction in take-home pay.

Mr. Speaker, all that is in accordance with a state of mind which prevails practically throughout the world, namely that in our affluent society, in the context of the technological revolution that took place over the last decades, it is possible to give more comfort and prosperity to all the workers of the world.

Mr. Speaker, a look at some statistics compiled in 1960 will give an idea of the average work week throughout the world.

Taking Algeria for instance, we notice that in 1960, the average work week was 45.7 hours; it was 46 hours in 1961. In Egypt, the average work week was 48 hours in 1961 and 46 hours in 1962.

In the United States, during the last ten years, the average work week was as follows: 1955, 40.9 hours; 1956, 40.9 hours; 1957, 40.5 hours; 1958, 40.1 hours; 1959, 40 hours; 1960, 40 hours; 1961 and 1962, 40.1 hours.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, we notice that in America, especially in the United States, the objective is a 40 hour week and it is somewhat toward that objective that Canadian citizens are also looking.

That is why, considering the recommendations of the international labour organization of the C.L.C. and of other labour organizations, we feel that the proposal under consideration should be considered exhaustively.

However, Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that it is not in the one hour's time that—

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, these two members are diametrically opposed. One is reactionary and the other is progressive.

Mr. Speaker, the present bill deserves the most careful consideration.

One is reactionary and the other one is progressive.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—

Mr. Caouette: North Centre.

[Text]

Mr. Choquette: South Centre is what I meant. Winnipeg South Centre and Winnipeg North Centre—they represent two extremities.

[Translation]

I commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for the generous spirit which led him to introduce this bill which deserves the most careful consideration.

However, as I said a while ago, it should be integrated into much wider legislation and, in my opinion, it should be referred to a committee where more time could be given to its study and where the necessary amendments could be made.

For instance, if we look at section 2 of the bill, we see that statutory holidays are enumerated. Here again, this is merely an insignificant detail, but a detail which nevertheless should be rectified, because the statutory holidays listed in the bill do not correspond at all to what is considered as statutory or non legal holidays in the province of Quebec.

For instance, the member for Winnipeg North Centre suggests that New Year's day be a statutory holiday. Well, New Year's day is one of the non legal holidays recognized under the civil code. There is also the day of Epiphany, on January 6. But, in the bill we are considering, January 6 or the day of Epiphany is not recognized as a statutory holiday. To my mind, there could be some citizens in the province of Quebec who would like to have January 6 as a statutory holiday.

There is also December 8 which is, for the people of the province of Quebec, a day of very special significance while for other members, it would not have the same importance.

You also have Victoria day. Certain other people would prefer to celebrate on that day the reigning monarch instead of a former monarch. And this, no matter what ideas have been expressed previously. In my opinion, it would be far more appropriate to celebrate the anniversary of the reigning monarch rather than that of a former queen. Therefore, the anniversary of the reigning monarch could be a statutory holiday, more so than Victoria day. The members on the other side of the house, those of the Conservative party, suggest the creation of a Sir John A. Macdonald day; that day could become a statutory holiday.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: With pleasure.

[Mr. Caouette.]

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Is he not aware of the fact that the current practice is to celebrate on what is called Victoria day the birthday of the present reigning monarch?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Yes, Mr. Speaker, but some people have such devotion to the reigning sovereign that it would be necessary to have two separate days to celebrate both anniversaries.

You also have Dominion day, which is rather celebrated as Canada's day. Here again, this is merely a detail in reference to the text.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, should we study this bill section by section, we would find out that it needs many adjustments and that a good number of suggestions would have to be made. Therefore, I do not think that we would be able within an hour to approve in full the bill as it is being proposed. This is the reason why, while agreeing with the principle and advocating it at the same time, I maintain that this text should form an integral part of the legislation as a whole and should be given much greater consideration than it is being given at the present time.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Then we agree. Would the hon. member permit another question?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: With pleasure.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: If he thinks it is impossible to do this within one hour, does he not think it should be possible to do it within 45 years?

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: I know that what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is saying, is said in jest, but after all, the present social legislation has been established by the Liberal party. If our labour legislation is as progressive as it is today, the Liberal party has something to do with it, made its contribution to it.

The labour code does not exist, and I agree that it should exist.

We have done much more than any other party in the house in the field of Canadian social legislation.

[Text]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is very apparent that my remarks will be quite brief. In fact, they are going to be briefer because of remarks that have been made this afternoon. I fully realize that another party in the house wishes to put its views on record in support of this measure and that will make it unanimous.

It is very difficult for me to add anything to the arguments developed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in support of the merits of the bill, which he has once again sponsored in the house. I do not intend to take much time of the house other than to congratulate him and to refer to two statements which have caused me to consider the time left for discussion.

During the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) there was an exchange with the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pépin). I did not quite catch the entire exchange but my interpretation of it was that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska was accusing the hon. member for Villeneuve of blocking legislation. In addition, the speaker who has just resumed his seat referred to the fact that slowness and obstruction were preventing legislation from going through the house.

I would call attention to the televised remarks of the Prime Minister on April 19—I emphasize the date and the person making the statement—who said at that time in answer to a question put to him by an interviewer that as far as the work of the House of Commons was concerned he was quite satisfied with developments over the past 44 days. The 44 days brought us up to April 19. Having regard to the necessary time taken for the budget debate, the throne speech debate, a supply motion and so on, I would point out to the member who has just resumed his seat that he is in disagreement with his own Prime Minister, who made the statement on a national television program that he was more than satisfied with the progress during that 44 day period. If the hon. member is assuming responsibility for the government when he refers to slowness and obstruction, and having in mind the remarks of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska that legislation has been blocked, I only hope there will be time enough left for a member of the Social Credit party to support this legislation, and that that member will see fit to leave enough time for government supporters in order that we may see what they may do, so far as slowness and obstruction are concerned. With the hon. member's co-operation we will give them ample time to accept this very worth-while bill.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would not respond on every occasion when invited to do so by the hon. member, but I am going to respond on this occasion. I regret that my colleague, the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe), has left the chamber for a few moments. He intended to speak on this measure but I will have to say a few words about it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has introduced this or similar bills on other occasions and we have supported the principle of them. Therefore I do not hesitate at all to express my support for the measure now before the house. I believe that this matter should not only be talked about, but that definite action should be taken. Many times we are in danger of giving lip service to fundamental principles and having given lip service just setting matters aside. When the same thing comes up on another occasion it is often bypassed.

But I believe this matter should be given urgent attention and a decision should be made by the parliament of Canada. The suggestion has been made that the bill be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations for detailed study and analysis. I would certainly concur in that suggestion. I simply wish to indicate my support for this measure and I agree that it should be referred to the committee on industrial relations.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it has been indicated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that this legislation has been talked about by the government but nothing has been done about it. It is a fact that considerable legislation was forecast in the speech from the throne, but so far we have been unable to do anything about it. There are various reasons for our not being able to bring this legislation before the house. However, I can assure the hon. member and the whole house that it is the intention of the government to bring forward a bill which will have the effect of incorporating, I would hope, most of the provisions contained in Bill No. C-30.

Following the conference held some weeks ago with the provincial ministers of labour, the federal Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) said that this matter was discussed with them in order to get their opinions and to determine how various business enterprises in their provinces might be affected.

The Minister of Labour, speaking on March 11, had this to say of the proposed labour legislation in answer to a question put to him by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr):

Statutory Holidays with Pay

These proposals in general were discussed at the conference of the labour ministers. It was not sought at the conference to ask for agreement on these matters; what was sought were the views of the provinces.

Obviously, the provinces have been considering these matters for many years. They realize the problems which a government faces when it is required to bring forward economic legislation which regulates the bargaining position as between labour and management. The provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba are the only two provinces which have legislation providing for statutory holidays with pay and, to its credit, the province of Saskatchewan names eight statutory holidays. I must say they turn out to be a little less progressive than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). The provincial legislation provides for opting out, to use an expression which has become popular these days. If I may quote from a report of the Department of Labour entitled "Provincial Labour Standards" at page 14:

By agreement between an employer and a trade union representing a majority of the employees in an appropriate bargaining unit, another working day may be substituted for any of the eight listed holidays.

The bill before us makes no such provision. In addition, the provincial legislation provides that hospitals, restaurants, hotels and so on need not be bound by the legislation. I am saying this simply to show that there are many matters to be considered and that we cannot cover such an important subject in the limited time provided for discussion of a private member's bill. No other provinces but those two have legislation dealing with this matter. Other provinces do provide for minimum wages—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being six o'clock the hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX "A"

COMMUNIQUÉ OF JOINT U.S.-CANADIAN COMMITTEE ON TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

The ninth meeting of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs was held in Ottawa April 29-30, 1964. The committee noted with satisfaction the progress which had been made in matters of interest to both countries and the general improvement in relations between them.

The committee received from Mr. Arnold Heeney, on behalf of himself and Mr. Livingston T. Merchant, their interim report of progress on their joint study of United States-Canadian relations. They were appointed by President Johnson and Prime Minister Pearson to examine the desirability and practicability of developing acceptable principles which would facilitiate co-operation in economic and other policies. Their report noted agreement on method of procedure and stated that preliminary investigations have been initiated.

The committee noted that economic activity in Canada and the United States had continued to expand and that another favourable year was anticipated for 1964. They agreed that the two countries should continue to follow policies designed to stimulate economic growth and employment in the context of economic stability. They noted that trade between the United States and Canada was running at record levels. The committee discussed policies which each country was following to improve its balance of payments. The United States members expressed agreement with Canada's desire to improve its current account through an expansion of exports and stressed the importance of adhering to the principles of non-discrimination in achieving this objective. The committee also noted the recent improvement in the United States balance of payments position and expressed the expectation that this improvement would continue.

The members of the committee looked forward to the opening of the GATT tariff and trade negotiations in Geneva, in which both countries would be participating actively, for the reduction of trade barriers and the expansion of trade in both industrial and agricultural products between the two countries and with the rest of the world. They took note also of the progress at the current United Nations conference on trade and development and agreed on the importance of continuing international co-operative efforts to assist the less developed countries to expand their trading opportunities and facilitate their economic development.

The committee discussed the trade in automobiles and automobile parts between Canada and the United States. United States members stressed their concern over the possible adverse effects of the Canadian automotive program on certain United States parts producers. Canadian members emphasized that the program is designed to promote increased specialization and lower production costs in the Canadian automotive industry.

The committee examined problems affecting trade between the two countries. Canadian ministers expressed concern about increases in levels of certain United States tariffs arising from the recent reclassification of the United States tariff, including rates on parts and components. They urged that the United States government take action to correct this situation. They requested that action should be taken to remove long standing United States restrictions on imports from Canada of lead and zinc, and cheese. The United States members expressed their concern over possible Canadian measures which might adversely affect certain United States publications. A number of other matters were discussed including great lakes water levels, tourist customs privileges, and the trade in softwood lumber and coal.

The committee discussed the energy resources and energy problems of both countries and their relationship to economic efficiency. There was general agreement that United States-Canadian co-operation should be encouraged in areas where such co-operation serves the long term mutual advantage of both nations. They established a joint working group to prepare a program of studies relating to trade in all kinds of energy between the United States and Canada.

The meeting concluded with a general review of the international situation by Mr. Rusk and Mr. Martin.

The Canadian delegation included Mr. Paul Martin, Secretary of State for External Affairs; Mr. Walter Gordon, Minister of Finance; Mr. Mitchell Sharp, Minister of Trade and Commerce; Mr. Harry Hays, Minister of Agriculture; Mr. C. M. Drury, Minister of Industry; the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. L. Rasminsky; Mr. Norman Robertson, the chief Canadian trade negotiator; the Canadian ambassador to the United States, Mr. C. S. A. Ritchie, and other advisers.

The United States delegation included Mr. Dean Rusk, Secretary of State; Mr. Douglas Dillon, Secretary of the Treasury; Mr. Stuart Udall, Secretary of the Interior; Mr. Luther H. Hodges, Secretary of Commerce; Mr. Orville L. Freeman, Secretary of Agriculture; Mr. George W. Ball, under secretary of state; Mr. Walter W. Heller, chairman of the president's council of economic advisers; Mr. William M. Roth, deputy special trade representative; the United States ambassador to Canada, Mr. W. W. Butterworth, and other advisers.

APPENDIX "B"

STATEMENT BY TRANSPORT MINISTER ON CIVIL AVIATION POLICY

The principles recommended as a basis for civil aviation policy are:

(1) In the international field, air services provided by Canadian air lines should serve the Canadian interest as a whole; these services should not be competitive or conflicting, but should represent a single integrated plan, which could be achieved by amalgamation, by partnership or by a clear division of fields of operations.

(2) In the domestic main line field, while the principle of competition is not rejected, any development of competition should not compromise or seriously injure the economic viability of T.C.A.'s main line domestic operations which represent the essential framework of its network of domestic services. In other words, there must not be the kind of competition which would put T.C.A. into the red; and, in the event that competition continues, the air transport board should ensure an opportunity for growth to both lines above this basic minimum.

(3) In formulation of policy based upon the foregoing point, a reasonable role for regional air carriers providing scheduled and regular air service must be established; this role must provide for a relationship between the regional air carriers and T.C.A. (and any other licensed main line transcontinental carrier) which will give the regional air carriers a reasonable chance to operate without government subsidies.

April 24, 1964.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 4, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INTERPRETATION OF PROVISIONAL STANDING ORDER 39A

Mr. Speaker: I should like to make a brief statement to the house with reference to provisional standing order 39A, under which certain questions are debated after ten o'clock on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays.

The chairman of the subcommittee on procedure, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), undertook on Friday that the operation of this standing order would be reviewed in the light of certain misunderstandings of last Thursday night. That subcommittee has reviewed the matter, and the results of its deliberations thus far were reported to the committee on procedure and organization at noon today.

As a result of our discussions the Chair feels that it will be possible to interpret standing order 39A in a way that will be fair to all hon. members, and the Chair expresses confidence that with the co-operation of all hon. members, difficulties of interpretation can be avoided. The subcommittee has suggested certain guide lines which the Chair feels will be most helpful. If further difficulties arise the subcommittee will recommend an appropriate amendment to the standing order, but it is hoped that this will not be necessary.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

RECOGNITION OF TWENTY FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF ESTABLISHMENT

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would not want to let the twenty fifth anniversary of the national film board, a corporation which Canada should rightly be proud of, go by without mentioning that fact to the house.

It was on May 2, 1939, that the royal assent was given to the bill establishing the national film board. If we look up the record, we see that the members unanimously recognized the necessity of creating an agency whose function would be to produce and distribute films in the national interest.

The act clearly defined the role of the board: to produce, among other things, appropriate films which would get Canadians to know one another better and make everybody more deeply aware of the scope and diversity of their country. In the National Film Act, as revised in 1950, one of the tasks of the national film board was defined along the same lines but in a broader sense. The new act provided that the board should produce and distribute and also promote the production and distribution of films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to dwell at great length on how well the national film board has achieved those stated objectives. I believe this has been amply proven in the past 25 years. Moreover, recognition has been won throughout the world in open competition against the best films that other countries could produce. National film board productions are being shown to groups in communities here and abroad as well as on theatre screens and on television in Canada and in more than 100 other countries. Every day brings further evidence of the value and influence of national film board productions as a positive force for telling Canada's story effectively.

On this twenty fifth anniversary of its formation I should like to extend sincere congratulations to the national film board, its management and its personnel for the effective results achieved in its first 25 years, together with the wish that the future may enhance the board's usefulness to Canada and add further laurels to the many it has already won.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, as far as the statement just made by the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) is concerned, I would not like to miss this opportunity to add our congratulations to the management of the national film board for the wonderful work that organization has accomplished in the last 25 years. It has trained technicians, specialists and qualified people in the field of film industry.

But even if we celebrate today the twenty fifth anniversary of the national film board, this should not be a time to rest on our laurels, especially when there is a very pronounced trend in Canada toward the setting up of a film business even more extended and developed. I think it should be time for the national film board to take the responsibility of creating, maybe in another field of the film industry, full-length films which are not made in Canada at the present time. I think that this is essential in view of the efficiency of Canadian technicians and because of the value of the artists we have in Canada—to whom I take pleasure in paying a tribute—because of the numerous stories and writers we could use to produce full-length films. It is an industry which is practically non existent in Canada and which could be set up.

Now that the national film board is entering into its second quarter of a century of existence, it should participate in the setting up of an industry of full-length films in our country.

[Text]

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the statement of the Secretary of State. The New Democratic party joins with others in wishing success to the national film board in its next 25 years. The teaching profession of Canada is well aware of the good work done by the national film board. They have made many films which have been shown in Canadian schools and have been able to interpret the various parts of the country to each other. I suggest to the Secretary of State that these films have been in rather short supply in many of the provinces, and it might be a very good idea for the centennial for the film board to consult with the departments of education of the various provinces for the purpose of seeing that more films interpreting Canada to Canadians are prepared. The film board has done a good job in this connection and we wish them well in the future.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, no matter how hard one tries to expedite the business of the house one finds it is impossible because of the proliferation of parties. All of us must have been in agreement with what was said. Because all would be in agreement I neglected to add my words to what had been so well said by the Secretary of State.

URANIUM

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO STOCKPILING PROGRAM

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to make the following statement regarding uranium stockpiling. The government has reviewed the uranium situation in the light of the latest available information and has come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable to extend the stockpiling policy beyond the one year period specified in the Prime Minister's announcement of June 26, 1963.

By the end of this period the government will have invested about $25 million in a uranium stockpile. This policy was designed to provide a breathing space for the affected communities by enabling certain mines to maintain employment until July 1, 1964.

While the present stockpile will be useful in ensuring continuity of supplies, it is the government's view that continued stockpiling would have a depressing effect on the markets for uranium. It would hold back the revival of demand for which, as the Prime Minister said in his June, 1963 statement, the eventual prospects are good. In the meantime the government is continuing to explore the development of alternative sources of employment in the communities where there are uranium mines.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the announcement just made by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce may I say that I know this announcement will come as a great blow and shock to the people of the Bancroft area. Some will perhaps say that the mining industry in any locality is not permanent, and this is to some extent true; but in order to provide hydro, water services, accommodation, schools and churches to meet the demands of such industry the local municipalities and councils must make plans and spend large amounts of money. With the cessation of operations the taxpayers of the area are then left holding the bag and must somehow meet the extra taxes and debentures that are levied against the municipalities.

I said a moment ago that the announcement would come as a blow and a shock. I say this because many of the people of the area had put their faith and trust in the statements made before the last election, and at this time I should like to read into Hansard a statement which appeared a few days before the last election.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Statements on motions should be short and factual.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I assure you it will be factual. The statement is contained in a full page advertisement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe this point arose last week and was ruled against. The fact is that this is not the time to do this.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, this morning just before lunch I received a telegram which I should like to put on the record.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not the time for debate. This is the time for short comment on the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, I will not read the telegram. I will produce it later. Once again the government is befuddled and is making decisions before it has the facts straight. Would it not have been better to call in experts in the field of uranium and electrical power production and get the views of these experts?

It has been stated in the evidence submitted concerning the Columbia river treaty that electrical power can be produced for as little as four mills per kilowatt by means of thermal power. Only this week the Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that Canada had moved to the front in the world production of nuclear power projects. If no provision is made to keep the present uranium mines in production at the termination of the present contracts this summer, two uranium mines will be left in Canada, one a crown corporation with contracts to 1967 and the other a Canadian subsidiary of a foreign company with contracts to 1970. With two uranium mines to provide fuel for nuclear power, these two mines will benefit from increased prices for their product and no nuclear power industry will suffer as a result of the lack of fuel supply. A reasonable stockpile of uranium would cushion the impact. Mines encouraged to operate at a reduced rate over a period of slack demand would be in a position to assume a normal operating role and sustain a normal nuclear power development.

The people of Bancroft, Mr. Speaker, will think of this as black Monday rather than black Friday, a day for which the Liberals are now famous. The people of Canada are again living in fear because they do not know what those who occupy the front benches will bring forth next.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for his spontaneous, objective and non-partisan comment on the statement.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I believe the Prime Minister's observation was improper. He knows very well the promise he made to the people of Bancroft.

Mr. Pearson: If I may speak to a point of order, since the right hon. gentleman intervened, I would point out to him that this government has invested $25 million in order to give these communities a chance to get out of the mess in which the previous government left them.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This does not answer the fact—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —that the statement the Prime Minister made with regard to Bancroft was entirely unjustified by subsequent events, and that is the reason there is objection to the reading of what the hon. gentleman wished to place before the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Webb: I had not quite finished my statement. A few days ago—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do hope the statement will not continue too long, and that it will be conciliatory in tone.

Mr. Webb: It is very brief. A few days ago, in reply to a question asked by a member on this side of the house concerning low water levels in the great lakes, the reply from the Liberal benches was "Pray for rain".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This has nothing to do with the matter under discussion.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I am not aware that remarks on motions are supposed to be non-partisan, Mr. Speaker. This is certainly a new interpretation of the rules. The comments of the Prime Minister are hardly likely to set a good example in that regard.

There will be widespread disappointment in some of the mining areas of Canada at the government's announcement that it is going to discontinue the stockpiling of uranium after the end of the year. I have not got a copy of the minister's statement, but I gather from his remarks the government feels that to continue stockpiling uranium would, in some way or other, adversely affect any recurrence of demand that might take place in the future. That is a very difficult contention for me to accept. It seems to me if the government is convinced that there is going to be a recurrence of demand, this is all the more reason for having a stockpile on hand to meet that demand.

What is even more important is that steps be taken to keep the uranium industry alive as a viable operation against a demand which the government itself says is likely to recur in the near future. I hope the minister and the government will give further consideration to this before finally cutting off the present stockpiling arrangements which will mean the end to many communities, and which will mean the day may come when we will want to produce uranium and shall find we have not the necessary industrial organization to do so.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, I think the government would be very well advised to reconsider this sudden cutting off of the stockpiling measures introduced a year ago. With some pride Canada has been the leader in the development of the peaceful uses of uranium. On a number of occasions the Minister of Trade and Commerce has mentioned this to the house, and this step in cutting off the program will have a severe impact on many communities which it has kept going through periods of slack demand.

As I say, I think it would be advisable for the government to reconsider this matter and perhaps introduce a gradual decline rather than a sudden cut-off.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, on hearing about this very important question of uranium production in Canada, I could not help thinking of the riding of the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Pearson), namely Algoma East, where Elliot Lake is situated and where people had to rely on their savings and energies eight or ten years ago to survive.

That municipality is not the only one of that kind. Last night I was in the Asbestos mines area, in Thetford Mines, where between 650 and 700 employees and heads of families who had been working for 15 or 20 years will be laid off within a month or 60 days. The question is the same all over the country.

Mr. Speaker, the uranium question was very important just a few years ago, when we had a Conservative government with the present Leader of the Opposition as prime minister of Canada. At that time we could have obtained 25 year contracts with Great Britain, but we were satisfied with the promises of the Americans who told us: We will give you better orders.

Today we are facing problems which should have been settled four, five or seven years ago.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not true.

Mr. Caouette: This is true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, a complete invention.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I say to the Leader of the Opposition that this is true, and he knows that Elliot Lake was going exactly where it is today when he was the prime minister of Canada.

[Mr. Douglas.]

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that situation is not new. It repeats itself, for instance, year after year, or every five or ten years.

Today the Prime Minister of Canada is faced, in his own constituency, with the problem arising now in Thetford Mines, concerning asbestos.

I will say this: as long as we have a government, be it Conservative or Liberal, which plays up to financial interests giving orders from the United States, we shall never become masters of our economy.

There is not a single one of us who does not want to help all his fellow citizens, be they from Elliot Lake, Thetford Mines, Rouyn-Noranda or wherever they may be in Canada. We wish to help them, but we will do so only if we assume our responsibilities.

In my opinion, under the present circumstances the Prime Minister of Canada and the present government must assume their responsibilities and not to do as I saw on T.V. a few days ago, when the Quebec premier told us that we were becoming our own masters in Quebec while the General Motors Corporation was establishing an industry in the Montreal area, namely at Ste Thérèse de Blainville. Who will profit by that industry? The workers? No. Who? The General Motors Corporation. Who owns the General Motors Corporation? The Americans. Who owns at the present time any important corporation in Canada? The Americans.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not General Motors and the potential establishment of a factory; the question is uranium mines.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that we want to control our own economy. But, on the other hand, it is up to the Canadian government to assume its responsibilities. In so far as it will do so, we, members of the Ralliement Creditistes or of the Social Credit, shall support the government, but we shall refuse to go along with freakish or nonsensical projects unlikely to bring about any improvement in our province or in other provinces.

Indeed, we want to become responsible for, as well as control our own economy. To this end the government must necessarily assume its responsibilities. And we are ready to endorse the government to that extent.

[Text]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the announcement today with respect to uranium would the Prime Minister be prepared to say whether there was any basis for the advertisement in the Stirling News-Argus of April 4, 1963, which read as follows: I am just taking an excerpt:

In the near future the present contracts will be terminated and Conservative government has not committed itself to any action to continue the mines.

Mr. Pearson has promised the Liberal candidate—

That is William A. Shannon.

—that if he is elected he will invest in the future and will maintain the mines in operation and stockpile uranium until required.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of having made that statement in that form, but I will be glad to look into it.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved that the first report of the standing committee on public accounts, presented to the house on Friday, May 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bernard Pilon (Chambly-Rouville) moved that the first report of the standing committee on estimates, presented to the house on Friday, May 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Question No. 410—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What was the gross and net income of the C.N.R. in 1962-63?
2. What were the expenses of the C.N.R. in 1962-63?
3. What is the total debt of the C.N.R.?
4. What was the increase of that debt in 1962-63?
5. How many former railways did the C.N.R. acquire since its inception?
6. What amounts were paid for the purchase of each of those railways?
7. How was the payment made in each case?
8. What was the amount of the debt taken over in each case by the C.N.R.?
9. What is the amount of interest the C.N.R. has paid toward each such debt since the purchase of those companies?
10. Does the C.N.R. intend to acquire other companies in the immediate future?
11. How many miles of railroad does the C.N.R. own in the United States?
12. What agreements govern this property in the United States, and when are they renewable?
13. What was the total amount of business of the C.N.R. in the United States in 1962-63?
14. Is the C.N.R. governed by the same regulations as the American companies in its operations in the United States?
15. Does it benefit from special privileges, and, if so, what are they?
16. Does the C.N.R. employ American personnel and, if so, how many, in what positions, and what salaries were paid them in 1962-63?

Questions

Answer: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Gross railway operating revenues: 1962, $701,622,754; 1963, $725,181,334.

Net railway operating income or (loss): 1962, $(5,819,337); 1963, $5,011,665.

2. Railway operating expenses: 1962, $707,442,091; 1963, $720,169,669.

3. Total long term debt as at December 31st, 1963: $1,791,253,526.

4. Long term debt decreased in 1963 by $51,092,340.

5, 6, 7, 8, 9. The subject matter of the question involves capital revision proposals which have been submitted to the government in relation to the financial structure of the system. As it involves complex technical calculations, the proposal, in order to be understood, must be reviewed in the whole and, therefore, it is not possible to give a brief answer.

10. Nothing in contemplation.

11. 1,593 miles.

12. There are no agreements governing the company's property in the United States.

13. The railway operating revenues of U.S. subsidiary companies were: 1962, $69,038,691; 1963, $72,826,478.

14. Yes.

15. No.

16. Yes, there are 6,873 persons employed in the company's United States operations.

MACTAQUAC DAM—EFFECT ON NAVIGATION

Question No. 450—Mr. MacRae:

Has any study been made of the possible effects on navigation between the Mactaquac dam and the mouth of the Saint John river after completion of the dam, it being generally understood that the water level of the river would be reduced and, if so, what were the conclusions reached?

Mr. Pickersgill: The executive director of the Atlantic development board advises that:

The federal Department of Public Works has made studies of the effects of Mactaquac on navigation on the lower Saint John river in co-operation with the provincial authorities. It is not expected that the operation of the dam would have any appreciable effect on average water levels.

GRANT TO PEACE RESEARCH INSTITUTE

Question No. 455—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Does the government intend to give a grant to the Canadian peace research institute and, if so, when is this to be done and what is the amount contemplated?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At present the government is not contemplating a grant of funds to assist the Canadian peace research institute. In response to requests by the institute for advice and other assistance the appropriate departments of the government have responded favourably and have attempted to meet these requests. To the extent possible, informal assistance of this kind will continue to be provided.

MACTAQUAC DAM—RIVER POLLUTION STUDIES

Question No. 479—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

Have studies been made as to the effects of pollution of the Saint John river following construction of the Mactaquac dam?

Mr. Pickersgill: The executive director of the Atlantic development board advises that:

We are informed that the New Brunswick electric power commission and the New Brunswick water authority have already carried out certain studies on this matter, and further studies are under way.

MEETING OF EDUCATIONAL AUTHORITIES

Question No. 538—Mr. Orlikow:

Is the government giving consideration to the requests of the Canadian teachers' federation made in their brief to the Prime Minister in November 1963 "that the federal government take the initiative in calling a widely-representative meeting of provincial ministers of education, their advisers, and those national bodies most vitally concerned, to consider the feasibility of co-operation in searching for a means of alleviating the inequalities" (in education) "which now exist"?

Mr. Davis: At the federal-provincial conference of November 1963, the Prime Minister referred to the representations which the Canadian teachers' federation had made to the federal government. These had been received some two weeks earlier. As there was no response from the provinces it could only be assumed that, in their opinion, this matter should not be subject to federal-provincial consultation at that time. Nor has any representation since been received from the provinces which would suggest any basic change in their position regarding this matter.

*RESEARCH INTO EFFECTS OF FLUORIDATION

Question No. 576—Mr. Marcoux:

1. What research has the Department of National Health and Welfare carried out on the general effects of water fluoridation upon the human body in general, in addition to research on its effects on the teeth?

2. How much money has been provided for such research?

Mr. Munro: 1. The Department of National Health and Welfare, in its studies, primarily investigated the dental effects of water fluoridation. However no ill-effects of a systemic nature attributable to the presence of fluoride in the water supply have been reported by the health authorities or by the practising physicians in the fluoridated cities studied by this department. The medical aspects of fluoridation have of course received a great deal of careful scrutiny in the world scientific literature.

2. Cost estimates are not applicable.

FEDERAL LABOUR CODE

Question No. 637—Mr. Langlois:

1. What progress is being made toward the establishment of a federal labour code?

2. Who are the officials on that committee?

3. When will this project be completed?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. Proposals in the labour standards field are under active consideration at this time.

2. No special Commons committee exists for this purpose.

3. It is hoped proposals will be placed before the house later this session.

*WATER LEVELS, GEORGIAN BAY AND LAKE HURON

Question No. 661—Mr. Rynard:

1. What studies have been made on the extremely low water levels in Georgian bay and lake Huron?

2. What has been the annual precipitation per year over the last 12 years in the Georgian bay area?

3. Has there been any communication with the international joint waterways and, if so, what have been the findings?

4. Is any consideration being given to a dam at Sarnia similar to the one on the St. Mary's river?

Mr. Stewart: 1. Water levels and run-off in the great lakes basin, including lake Huron and Georgian bay, have for many years been recorded and studied as part of a continuing program of research into major Canadian water resources. Special studies have been made from time to time in response to requests from the international joint commission; in this context, see the statement by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the House of Commons on April 14, 1964 (Hansard, page 2126).

2. The annual precipitation (snow and rain) per year over the last 12 years in the Georgian bay area has been as follows:

1952	31.25	inches
1953	32.24	"
1954	37.99	"
1955	29.61	"

1958	26.32	"
1960	32.81	"

3. Although the international joint commission has not been asked to study the matter of levels of lake Huron, some consideration was given to the question as part of the investigation of factors affecting the levels of lake Ontario under a reference to the commission from the governments of Canada and the United States dated June 25, 1952. The commission was not, however, requested to make any findings in so far as the levels of lake Huron were concerned.

4. No. Consideration is being given to the placing of submerged sills in the St. Clair river which would have the effect of improving the low levels of lake Huron and Georgian bay.

MACTAQUAC POWER DEVELOPMENT, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 689—Mr. MacRae:

1. What program is envisaged for multi-purpose development of the Saint John river valley resources under ARDA?
2. If the Mactaquac hydro electric project is proceeded with, what is the estimated expenditure on behalf of the federal government?

Questions

3. What officials of ARDA are specifically involved?
4. Has a firm of consultants been engaged to carry out studies in this regard?
5. What is the estimated expenditure of such projects on behalf of the federal government and on behalf of the government of New Brunswick?
6. What departments of government are involved other than the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. Sauvé: 1. There has been some discussion between officials of ARDA and the government of the province of New Brunswick regarding the possibility of ARDA being involved in the development of the Saint John river valley. To date no request has been received from the government of New Brunswick for consideration of an ARDA project in this area.

2 to 5. N/A.

6. Both the departments of agriculture and forestry have been involved in these discussions.

ARDA PROJECTS APPROVED, MANITOBA

Question No. 693—Mr. Stefanson:

What projects have been approved with the province of Manitoba which come under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act since January 1, 1964, giving date of approval and the cost of each project?

Mr. Sauvé: Five projects have been approved in the province of Manitoba under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act since January 1, 1964. These projects the date of their approval and the cost of each are listed as follows:

Project	Date	Cost
A study of the interlake region with the objective of facilitating rural development.	Jan. 30, 1964	$67,000
To investigate various types of well development and construction in glacial till.	Apr. 3, 1964	15,000
To continue work in Manitoba in connection with the Canada land inventory during 1964-65.	Apr. 10, 1964	21,500
A study to determine those factors which influence occupational aspirations and school drop-outs in the interlake area.	Apr. 13, 1964	10,750
To investigate and evaluate ground water supplies in southwest Manitoba.	Apr. 13, 1964	39,000

INQUIRIES ON ARDA PROJECTS

Question No. 694—Mr. Gauthier:

1. In implementing ARDA, what amounts has the federal government paid to each province in 1962-63 and 1963-64?
2. In implementing ARDA, what amounts has the federal government granted to each province for drainage and water conservation?
3. Under ARDA does the federal government authorize payments to the provinces only for specific and jointly approved projects?
4. Under ARDA, if a project is accepted by a provincial government, is it accepted automatically by the federal government?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. In implementing ARDA, the federal government paid to each of the provinces, for the year 1962-63 and the year 1963-64 up to now, the following amounts:

Province	1962–63	1963–64
Nfld.	—	$73,038.04
P.E.I.	$14,984.43	777.10

Sask.	161,672.72	586,885.34
Alta.	—	221,011.13
B.C.	—	30,549.44

2. In implementing ARDA, the federal government granted to each province for drainage and water and soil conservation, for the fiscal year 1962-63 and 1963-64 up to now, the following amounts:

Province	1962–63	1963–64
Nfld.	—	—
P.E.I.	$ 4,761.99	—
N.S.	16,648.00	$38,253.68

PRESERVATION OF EUCHALON RUNS, PACIFIC COAST

Question No. 720—Mr. Howard:

Has any complaint been brought to the attention of the government regarding herring seiners on the Pacific coast catching euchalon in their nets and, if so, what was the nature of the complaint, the area involved and the suggestions, if any, made to preserve the euchalon runs?

Answer: The department's attention was drawn to allegedly large catches of eulachon by herring seiners. The allegation was to the effect that eulachon were being taken in quantities from a few pounds to thousands of tons.

The facts are that on March 8 because of poor fishing three herring seiners moved into Iceberg bay in the Nass estuary to prospect. This was not normal in that sets for herring are not usually made above Somerville island. One seiner made a set and found eulachon rather than herring. He immediately spilled the net. However, some eulachon did hang up in his net and they were sold with the herring he had.

It is felt that the circumstances were unusual and that present protection for eulachon will be ample.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

*CITIZENSHIP CERTIFICATES, MR. AND MRS. JOSEPH BUCKIE, HAMILTON, ONT.

Question No. 721—Mr. Howard:

1. Has one Joseph Buckie of Hamilton, Ontario applied for and/or received a certificate of Canadian citizenship and, if so, what was the cost thereof to him?

2. Did Mrs. Buckie have to pay any money regarding her Canadian citizenship and, if so, how much and for what reason?

3. When did Joseph Buckie come to Canada and what age was he then?

4. Did Joseph Buckie serve in the armed forces of Canada and, if so, during what dates did he so serve and in what areas of the world and for what purposes?

5. Was Joseph Buckie wounded during his years of service in the armed forces and, if so, how many times?

6. Is Mrs. Buckie a natural born Canadian?

7. Does any authority exist for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or the governor in council to refund the moneys paid by Mr. and Mrs. Buckie and, if so, will that authority be exercised favourably?

Mr. Badanai: 1. Yes. Mr. Buckie applied under section 10(1) of the Canadian Citizenship Act and was granted a certificate of Canadian citizenship on March 12, 1964, paying a statutory fee of $10.

2. Mrs. Buckie was born in Canada but lost Canadian status upon marriage in 1945. She reacquired Canadian citizenship on October 22, 1963, under section 10(3) of the Canadian Citizenship Act, paying the statutory fee of $1.

3. Joseph Buckie came to Canada on December 1, 1926, at the age of 11.

4 and 5. I am advised by the Department of Veterans Affairs that a Joseph Buckie served in the armed forces of Canada from September 19, 1939, to June 26, 1945. He served in Canada, the United Kingdom and continental Europe, and participated in the raid on Dieppe. Mr. Buckie served as a private and as a lance corporal in the infantry. His unit was the Royal Hamilton Light Infantry. Joseph Buckie was wounded on two occasions during his period of service in the armed forces of Canada.

6. Yes.

7. No authority is provided by the present legislation for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration or the governor in council to refund the moneys paid by Mr. and Mrs. Buckie. In view of the circumstances, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is writing to Mr. Buckie today and, as a gesture of gratitude and respect for his war service, Mr. Tremblay is forwarding to Mr. Buckie a personal cheque in the amount of $10. The fees at present required under schedule B of the citizenship regulations have received study by the minister and are to be the subject of recommendations to the government.

PROPORTION OF PAYMENTS UNDER ARDA

Question No. 727—Mr. Gauthier:

1. Are the 50 per cent federal payments to the provinces under ARDA conditional on the payment by the provinces of 50 per cent of the value of work done?

2. In carrying out an ARDA project, can a provincial government obtain payment of part of its 50 per cent share of the cost of the project from the taxpayers living where the work is performed?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. In order for the government to make a payment to a province, that province must have in fact incurred some expenses. The federal government computes its payment on a part of those expenses.

2. The amount of expenses shared is supposed to be that of the net expenses incurred by the province after deduction of any income or reimbursement collected by the province.

INVESTIGATION INTO PRICE FIXING IN STEEL

Question No. 732—Mr. Prittie:

Has the government reviewed the action of the anti-trust division of the department of justice of the United States wherein six anti-trust charges have been laid against steel producing companies since 1962 and, if so, has the director of investigations and research (Combines Investigations Act) carried out any investigation during the past 12 months to determine if there is any evidence of price fixing by steel producing companies in Canada?

Mr. Favreau: The director informs me that press reports of these proceedings in the United States have come to his attention. The general practice, however, is that no information is given out as to whether a particular inquiry has been or is being pursued with respect to a particular group of companies or individuals, unless and until a report is published.

FLOODING OF C.N.R. RAILWAY LINE BY MACTAQUAC DAM

Question No. 734—Mr. MacRae:

What is the value of the Canadian National Railway line that will be flooded as a result of the building of the Mactaquac dam?

Mr. Pickersgill: The executive director of the Atlantic development board advises that:

We are informed that the cost of relocating this line has been estimated at approximately $11 million.

HEALTH STUDY, LOWER SAINT JOHN RIVER

Question No. 746—Mr. MacRae:

Have studies been made as to the effect on public health of the lower level of the Saint John river between Mactaquac and Saint John city resulting from the construction of the dam?

Mr. Pickersgill: The executive director of the Atlantic development board advises that:

Since in the opinion of the provincial authorities the level of the river below Mactaquac would not be appreciably affected by the dam, the matter has not arisen.

SEWAGE DISPOSAL UNITS NECESSITATED BY MACTAQUAC DAM

Question No. 747—Mr. MacRae:

1. How many sewage disposal units will be constructed following the construction of the Mactaquac dam?

2. Where will they be located?

3. Will the city of Fredericton be reimbursed for expenditure for any sewage disposal plant made necessary by the lower level of water resulting from the dam at Mactaquac?

Mr. Pickersgill: The executive director of the Atlantic development board advises that:

We are informed by provincial authorities that the question of sewage disposal on the Saint John river is a matter of continuing study.

*INTERPROVINCIAL GAMES, QUEBEC

Question No. 750—Mr. Marcoux:

Has the government agreed to pay a share of organizing the next interprovincial games to be held in 1966 at Quebec and, if so (a) is there any reason for delaying the announcement wtih regard to the payment of any such grant (b) have representations been made to the province of Quebec to have the games postponed until 1967, the centennial year?

Mr. Munro: The possibility of federal aid for the interprovincial games for 1966 has been receiving active consideration. The president of the Canadian amateur sports federation, which has requested support for the games, has been asked to supply certain information regarding capital costs. When this is received it is hoped that a decision can be given regarding federal aid to the project.

(b) No.

REPLACEMENT OF LAND FLOODED BY MACTAQUAC DAM

Question No. 753—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

Will the government undertake, under the ARDA program, to secure land of satisfactory quality to replace cultivated land to be flooded by the Mactaquac development on the Saint John river in New Brunswick which has been proven to have special characteristics for growing special crops and, if so, what portion of the total cost of such land will be paid by the federal government?

Mr. Sauvé: Although there have been discussions regarding studies being undertaken under the ARDA program in connection with the Mactaquac development on the Saint John river in New Brunswick, no submission has yet been made by the government of New Brunswick to Ottawa under the ARDA program. Accordingly, no details are available as to what will be requested and no commitments have been made by the federal government under the ARDA program.

TELEVISION RECEPTION, CHICOUTIMI DISTRICT, QUEBEC

Question No. 757—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. Have surveys been made in the parishes of L'Anse Saint John, Petite Saguenay and Rivière Eternité to determine the quality of the reception of television programs from station CJPM-TV of Chicoutimi and station CKRS-TV of Jonquière?
2. Is consideration being given to the erection of control towers or relay stations?

[Translation]

Answer: 1 and 2. In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned, the answer is "No".

M.M.R.A. MOTOR VEHICLE TENDERS, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 763—Mr. Coates:

1. For what reason was the firm of D. A. Casey Limited, Amherst, not invited to tender on three of the four motor vehicles purchased by the M.M.R.A. in Cumberland between April 1, 1963, and March 31, 1964?
2. Was a Ford dealer invited to tender on the motor vehicles purchased by the M.M.R.A. from Cameron & Wilson Ltd. on two occasions and Rivers & Dickinson Ltd. on the other occasion?
3. Did G. H. Harrison Ltd. tender on any or all of the four motor vehicles and, if so, where is this firm situated and what automobile agency do they hold?

Mr. Sauvé: 1. None except that D. A. Casey Ltd., Amherst, did not handle a vehicle having the specifications required for two of the three vehicles.

2. No Ford dealers were invited to tender on the three vehicles as Ford vehicles did not meet the specifications required for two of the vehicles.

3. G. M. Harrison Ltd., Church street, Amherst, who held a dealership for Chrysler, Plymouth, Fargo and Valiant products, tendered on one of the four vehicles.

ANNUAL REPORT OF POSTMASTER GENERAL

Question No. 764—Mr. McBain:

2. What was the total cost of printing?
3. Were there errors in the first report?
4. Was a second printing carried out in order to correct pages 3 and 5?
5. Was the whole report reprinted, if not, what portion?
6. What was the cost of reprinting this corrected report?
7. Does the Postmaster General assume full responsibility for the errors?

Mr. Nicholson: 1. 1,550 (English); 400 (French).

2. $1,750.81 (total cost including reprinting).
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. Yes, the whole report.
6. $308.63.
7. Yes, to the extent that the minister is responsible for clerical errors made by employees of his department. The errors in question were detected by the minister and immediately corrected as reported in Hansard of April 16.

WANIPIGOW, MAN., POSTMASTER

Question No. 784—Mr. Slogan:

Has a postmaster been appointed for Wanipigow post office in Manitoba and, if so, what applications were received and what is the name and address of the successful applicant?

Mr. Nicholson: Yes. Applications were received from the following: Mr. Lyle Edwin Barker, Mr. George Bushie, Mrs. Lorraine Moneyas.

The appointment of Mr. Lyle Edwin Barker, Wanipigow, has been approved.

CHARCOAL PLANT, FORT ALEXANDER INDIAN RESERVE, MAN.

Question No. 785—Mr. Slogan:

Has a request been received by the government for the carrying out of a feasibility study for a charcoal plant or other industry at Fort Alexander Indian reserve and, if so (a) will the Department of Citizenship and Immigration be participating in this study (b) what part will it play (c) what financial assistance will be given to this project by the Indian affairs branch (d) when is it anticipated that such a study would be carried out?

Mr. Badanai: Yes. (a) Yes; (b) and (c) the extent of departmental participation and financial assistance is under consideration; (d) during 1964.

NEW INDUSTRIES, BRANTFORD AREA

Question No. 787—Mr. Hales:

1. How many new industries have settled in the "designated area" of Brantford since the order in council was passed?
2. What are the names of these new industries?
3. What are the estimated incentive payments that will be made to each firm?
4. How many employees are presently employed by each firm?
5. How many of these firms are American subsidiaries?
6. Where were they situated before moving to Brantford?

Mr. Drury: 1. Since this legislation was enacted on December 5, 1963, and up to date May 4, 1964, 16 new businesses have declared their intention to establish in Brantford in such a manner as to benefit from the designated area tax incentive program. This was contained in paragraph 3 of the resolution on the Income Tax Act adopted by the house on April 28.

2. Any announcement of a particular firm's intentions regarding location, type of business and planned employment is made by the firm itself. Premature disclosure by the government could affect adversely the establishment of a new business.

3. Eligible businesses receive a three year exemption from the federal income tax and special capital cost allowances on machinery, equipment and buildings. No forecast of the value of the advantages to the new businesses is available.

4. The planned employment reported by the new businesses is 1,313. No breakdown is given for the reasons shown in 2 above.

5. The program is administered irrespective of the national ownership of the new businesses. According to such information as is available, four firms are subsidiaries of American companies.

6. Two only of the new businesses have vacated premises elsewhere to locate in Brantford.

NORTHERN TRANSPORTATION CO. LTD.

Question No. 788—Mr. Nugent:

1. When was Northern Transportation Company Limited formed as a separate entity from Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited?

2. Who are the present shareholders of Northern Transportation Company Limited, and what is their present shareholding?

Answer: 1. Northern Transportation Company (1947) Limited was incorporated in 1947 under the Companies Act, and in 1952 the name was changed to Northern Transportation Company Limited. The company is the successor of a company known as Northern Transportation Company Limited, organized in 1934 under the laws of Alberta. In 1936 all shares in Northern Transportation Company Limited were acquired by Eldorado Gold Mines Limited. These shares were a part of the assets of Eldorado Gold Mines Limited (which in 1943 became known as Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited) acquired by the Crown when the shares of Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited were expropriated by order in council P.C. 535 of January 27, 1944.

2. Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, 1,514 shares; each of six directors, one qualifying share each, held in trust for Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited.

ELDORADO MINING LIMITED PROFIT

Question No. 789—Mr. Nugent:

1. Does order in council P.C. 535, January 27, 1944, expressly state that Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited shall not make a pecuniary gain to the company?

2. Did Eldorado make a profit and, if so, how much while this order in council was in effect?

3. How much of this profit, if any, was attributable to the operation of Northern Transportation Company Limited?

Answer: 1 and 2. Order in council P.C. 535 January 27, 1944 states in part as follows:

"Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited is hereby declared to be a body corporate and politic within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada, but, on the issue of letters patent by the Secretary of State, as hereinafter provided, shall be a body corporate and politic without share capital, and shall consist of such persons as are from time to time named by the minister of munitions and supply, and shall have for its purpose the exercise and performance in Canada or elsewhere, without pecuniary gain to such corporation, of such of the powers and duties conferred or imposed on the minister of munitions and supply as the minister of munitions and supply desired to delegate to such corporation."

Pursuant to this order, a charter was issued by the Secretary of State to Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited (under the name of Eldorado Mining and Refining) which charter replaced the charter originally issued under the Ontario companies act.

By order in council P.C. 8265 October 27, 1944 the incorporation was approved of a company known as "Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited", to which was to be conveyed, transferred and assigned all property, assets and rights of Eldorado Mining and Refining in consideration of the assumption by Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited of all the obligations and liabilities of Eldorado Mining and Refining, and the issuance of fully paid up shares of the capital stock of Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited in an amount approximately equivalent to the net value of such property, assets and rights, all of which shares (other than the qualifying shares of directors) were issued to the minister of munitions and supply in trust for His Majesty the King in right of Canada. No pecuniary gain, therefore, resulted to Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited while the said order in council P.C. 535 was in effect.

3. Answered by 1 and 2.

Has the committee appointed by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to study the effects of parnate yet made a report and, if not, when can such a report be expected?

Mr. Munro: The committee of experts appointed to advise as to what special restrictions, if any, are necessary on the future sale or distribution of drugs such as parnate and parstelin had its first meeting on April 6. It is now studying the medical and scientific information on this class of drugs and met again on April 29 and 30. Although recommendations will be made as soon as possible, the committee must be given the time necessary for a careful study and a full discussion of this difficult subject.

DEEP WATER HARBOUR, CHANDLER, QUE.

Question No. 821—Mr. Vincent:

1. Has the Department of Public Works made a model for the construction of a deep water harbour and breakwater at Chandler, Gaspé?

2. Has the Rimouski office of the Department of Public Works drawn up plans and specifications for this work and, if so, when were the plans drawn up, and what was the estimated cost for carrying them out?

3. Did the former minister of public works and the former deputy minister make any agreement as to cost sharing for this work and, if so, what agreement was made?

[Mr. Nugent.]

4. Did Canadian Industries Limited make a survey at Chandler in order to determine if the rock required for the work could be obtained on site and, if so, when was the survey made, how much did it most, and what did it establish?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. No model was made of a deep water harbour and breakwater at Chandler. A model study was, however, carried out on possible breakwater protection for the existing wharf.

2. No.

3. Cost sharing with Gaspesia Pulp & Paper Company Ltd. on the basis of 65 per cent of the construction cost to be borne by the crown, up to a $975,000 limit, was approved in principle by the treasury board, but no formal agreement was concluded with the company.

4. A survey for suitable rock was carried out in late 1959 and early 1960 by the department, and a quarry opened up to determine the quality and quantity of rock available. Canadian Industries Limited advised on blasting techniques. The cost of this work was approximately $25,000, and it established that suitable rock is available.

1. Has a definite date been set for the calling of tenders for the extension of the postal terminal and post office in Edmonton, Alberta and, if so, what is the date, and what is the date of closing of the tender period?

2. Assuming usual procedures, what would be the anticipated date of commencement of work in the light of the answer to part 1?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. Yes, tenders have been advertised with a closing date of June 30, 1964.

2. Subject to satisfactory tenders being received and allowing for the usual procedures, it is estimated that the contractor will commence work on this building by about the third week of July, 1964.

FINANCING OF UN CYPRUS CONTINGENT

Question No. 832—Mr. MacEwan:

1. Is it the intention of the government to continue to finance the Canadian contingent in Cyprus after the three month period which expires on June 27, 1964?

2. Will the government continue to press to have the UN forces in Cyprus made a collective responsibility of all UN members?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): 1. If the UN peace keeping force is maintained on Cyprus after the initial three month period, it will be necessary to study the methods of financing the force for any additional period of service. The decision of the government concerning financing the Canadian contingent will be made in the light of circumstances prevailing at that time.

2. Yes.

TREATMENT OF TUBERCULOSIS BY DRUGS

Question No. 839—Mr. Rynard:

1. What percentage of cases of tuberculosis are arrested or cured following the use of antibiotics or drugs?

2. What complications or disabilities have followed the use of such antibiotics and drugs?

3. Are there any indications that fewer patients are responding to treatment by the use of antibiotics or drugs?

4. How many new cases of tuberculosis have been discovered in Canada in the past year?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. During 1962, 7,210 active cases of tuberculosis were treated in sanatorium. Activity on discharge was as follows: inactive—1,780 cases (24.7 per cent), active improved—4,167 cases (57.8 per cent), active unimproved—505 cases (7.0 per cent), undetermined—27 cases (0.4 per cent), quiescent—731 cases (10.1 per cent).

Treatment is usually continued for a prolonged period following discharge from sanatorium and the ultimate cure rate is believed by tuberculosis experts to lie between 90 per cent and 95 per cent.

2. The most common complications following drug treatment of tuberculosis are minor gastric disturbances. In older individuals deafness and giddiness may be a problem. Allergic skin reactions may occur rarely.

3. No.

4. In 1963, 5,715 new active cases of tuberculosis were discovered.

RETURNS UNDER CORPORATIONS AND LABOUR UNIONS ACT

Question No. 840—Mr. Woolliams:

1. How many (a) corporations (b) labour unions, have made returns under the Corporations and Labour Unions Act?

2. What is the estimated number of (a) corporations (b) labour unions, that are required and failed as yet to make any returns?

Answer: 1. (a) For the reporting period 1962, complete returns have been received from 29,245 corporations which were required to report under the act. (b) For the same period, returns have been received from 96 international and 43 national unions.

2. (a) The total number of corporations required to report under the act is not yet available, although all corporations known to be reporting corporations under the act have submitted the required returns for the 1962 reporting period. Information is being sought from 450 additional companies in order that their status under the act can be determined and until this information is provided it will not be known whether or not these corporations are required to file complete returns.

(b) All international labour unions required to report under the act for the 1962 reporting period have submitted a return. For the same period 43 of the 54 national unions covered by the act have submitted returns. While 11 national unions have not filed complete returns for 1962 reporting period, five of these unions have reported for the 1963 period.

WINTER WORKS APPLICATIONS, KAMOURASKA CONSTITUENCY

Question No. 844—Mr. Dionne:

1. How many applications for winter works subsidies were received during the winter of 1963-64 from municipalities in the constituency of Kamouraska?

2. How many applications were approved, and what amount was granted to each municipality receiving such subsidy?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. Eighteen applications were received from the municipalities in the constituency of Kamouraska under the municipal winter works incentive program 1963-64.

TRAINING OF OLDER WORKERS

Question No. 859—Mr. Rynard:

1. Has the government received any reports from employers as to the "on the job" training of workers over 45?
2. How many workers have received such training?
3. Has the training been such that these workers are now able and equipped to hold jobs in competitive industry?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. No.

2. 1,811 workers have been placed and are receiving on the job or other training.

3. Insufficient time has elapsed under the program to provide this information.

MULTI-MILK SALES

Question No. 860—Mr. Rynard:

1. Why are multi-milk sales not reported by the dominion bureau of statistics with the figures on whole milk sales, 2 per cent milk sales and skim milk sales?
2. What are the sales of multi-milk in 1962 and 1963 for (a) Toronto, and (b) Montreal milk sheds?

Answer: 1 and 2. Multi-milk production is reported to the dominion bureau of statistics as a concentrated milk product rather than as a fluid milk product. Monthly volume of production is included with other whole milk products in the report Dairy Factory Production. Sales data are not collected.

ST. SIMEON, QUE.—WHARF CONSTRUCTION SUPERVISORS

Question No. 877—Mr. Bélanger:

1. How many supervisors were hired by the government for the works under way at the St. Simeon wharf?
2. What are the names of these supervisors?
3. What salary do they receive?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. Three.

2. Flavie N. Belley, Paul Émile Fortin, Georges LeBlond.

3. The rate of pay is $1.90 per hour.

WHARF IMPROVEMENTS, SUGAR LOAF, N.S.

Question No. 888—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. What are the plans of the department concerned for wharf improvements at Sugar Loaf, Victoria county, N.S.?
2. How soon will these improvements commence and at what estimated cost?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. It is planned to renew the stringers and deck plank over the entire wharf. Minor repairs to the fender system are also under consideration.

2. The work is expected to start in late May at an estimated cost of $3,500.

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Question No. 892—Mr. MacRae:

How many civil servants in Canada are in each of the following salary brackets (a) less than $2,000 per year (b) $2,001 to $4,000 (c) $4,001 to $6,000 (d) $6,001 to $8,000 (e) $8,001 to $10,000 (f) $10,001 to $12,000 (g) $12,001 to $14,000 (h) $14,001 to $16,000 (i) $16,001 to $18,000 (j) $18,001 to $20,000 (k) over $20,000?

Answer: Information available on number of federal civil servants in Canada, as at September 30, 1963, in each of the following salary brackets:

(a) less than $2,000 per year, 524; (b) $2,001 to $4,000, 51,044; (c) $4,001 to $6,000, 63,633; (d) $6,001 to $8,000, 12,470; (e) $8,001 to $10,000, 5,110; (f) $10,001 to $12,000, 1,936; (g) $12,001 to $14,000, 735; (h) $14,001 to $16,000, 516; (i) $16,001 to $18,000, 131; (j) and (k) $18,000 and over, 40.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN MINES CONVENTION

Question No. 897—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Was the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys represented at the convention of the Canadian institute of mines and metallurgy held recently at the Queen Elizabeth hotel in Montreal?

2. Did the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys subsidize in any way the organization of the convention?

3. If officials of that department took part in the convention, what are their names and in what capacity did they participate?

4. To what extent did the federal government participate in that convention?

Mr. Benidickson: 1. Yes, (a) The minister was represented by Mr. Jean-Paul Drolet, assistant deputy minister, at the annual meeting of the John T. Ryan safety awards held on Sunday, April 12, 1964. The meeting and annual dinner were held in the Queen Elizabeth hotel.

(b) The minister was also represented by Mr. Jean-Paul Drolet, assistant deputy minister, at the Monday luncheon held the following day, April 13. Mr. Drolet greeted the delegates (approximately 2,400) on behalf of the minister.

(c) The minister was present at the annual dinner of the Canadian institute of mining and metallurgy held on Tuesday evening, April 14, in the Queen Elizabeth hotel.

2. No.

3. The following representatives of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys took an active part in the convention:

Mineral resources division: Mr. W. K. Buck, Mr. H. D. Worden.

Geological survey of Canada: Dr. L. W. Morley, Dr. D. W. McCartney, Dr. R. Thorsteinsson, Mr. E. A. Schiller, Dr. C. S. Lord, Dr. R. E. Whitmore, Dr. R. W. Boyle, Mr. L. L. Touchette.

Mines branch: Dr. John Convey, Mr. T. Cochrane, Dr. J. Walsh, Mr. J. Reeves, Mr. A. Hitchen, Mr. V. Haw, Mr. D. Parsons, Mr. L. Casey, Mr. R. Collings, Mr. D. Pickett, Mr. J. Ingles, Mr. F. Kelly, Mr. A. Ignatieff, Mr. L. E. Djingheuzian, Mr. H. Woodrooffe.

The above 25 representatives all had a part to play in the annual meeting. Most of them presented technical papers while the others acted as chairmen of technical meetings related to their work. It should be pointed out that only 25 were official representatives of this department; several others, with the authorization of their branch directors and also of the deputy minister, were given permission to go to Montreal for one or two days in order to attend technical meetings of interest to the department. In this latter case, their expenses were not paid by the department.

Mr. Jean-Paul Drolet, assistant deputy minister, also attended the said meeting to act as the official representative of the minister of mines at various functions. Mr. Drolet was awarded the gold medal of the institute for 1964 at the annual dinner of the C.I.M.M. Tuesday evening, April 14.

4. The answer to this question is included in answer No. 3.

SKINNING ALIVE OF BABY SEALS

Question No. 899—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many complaints has the Minister of Fisheries received as a result of certain film sequences shot during the seal hunt in the gulf of St. Lawrence, which sequences show baby seals screaming as they are flayed alive?

2. Who, in the Department of Fisheries, is responsible for the supervision of seal hunting in the gulf of St. Lawrence?

3. Has the Minister of Fisheries received a report on this matter from his subordinates and, if so, what is the nature of such report?

4. What steps have been taken to prevent a recurrence of this state of affairs?

5. Did any hunters have their licences revoked or were any fined, and, if so, how many of the hunters fined have paid, and what was the amount of the fines?

6. What sections of the Fisheries Act might be amended so as to prevent any repetition of such actions?

Answer: 1. Several hundred letters of protest have been received but it is not possible to determine which letters resulted from reports of film sequences taken during the seal hunt.

2. The fishery officers located in areas where sealing operations are conducted.

3. Reports containing information on all aspects of sealing operations have been received.

4. A thorough review of sealing operations is being made and more restrictive regulations will be in effect before the opening of the 1965 season.

5. No.

6. New regulations are made by amending the seal protection regulations enacted under authority contained in the Fisheries Act.

REINSTATEMENT OF SEAFARERS UNION IN C.L.C.

Question No. 902—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has a report been received by the Minister of Labour from the board of trustees concerning progress made regarding the reinstatement of the seafarers' international union as a member of the Canadian Labour Congress and, if so, what was the general content of the said report?

2. Have representations of any kind been made to the minister by the C.L.C. on this matter?

3. By whom were they made and of what nature were they?

4. Were the trustees of the board invited to study these representations and, if so, what observations did they make?

5. If the trustees were not invited to study these representations, for what reasons were they not invited?

Mr. MacEachen: 1. No.

2. No.

3, 4, 5. Not applicable. It might be added that a liaison committee has been established by the Canadian Labour Congress to deal with the trustees. This liaison committee was established some months ago and the trustees have worked closely with it. The Canadian Labour Congress has also, I am informed kept closely in touch with developments.

POST OFFICE, WILLOW BUNCH, SASK.

Question No. 906—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

1. Is the government giving consideration to building a new post office in Willow Bunch, Saskatchewan?
2. Who owns the present post office building in Willow Bunch, Saskatchewan?
3. What is the present cost per year for post office accommodation in Willow Bunch, Saskatchewan?
4. When does the present lease expire?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. No.

2. Mr. Jean Champigny of Willow Bunch.

3. $1,750 per annum.

4. October 31, 1965.

INCOME TAX—CHARITABLE DONATIONS

Question No. 946—Mr. Caouette:

1. Does the Income Tax Act provide for a maximum deduction of 10 per cent of net income for charitable donations and, if so, is this provision applied uniformly across Canada?
2. What procedures do departmental officials follow when processing income tax returns claiming deductions not exceeding 10 per cent and accompanied by receipts for charitable donations?
3. Are receipts for charitable donations ever questioned and, if so, are deductions ever arbitrarily reduced by departmental officials?
4. In the reduction of allowances for charitable donations are officials acting within the authority of the Income Tax Act or by some special authority granted to the Minister of National Revenue and exercised with his knowledge?
5. What appeal is open to taxpayers who feel that they have been dealt with in an arbitrary manner?

[Translation]

Answer: (a) Yes. (b) Yes.

2. The amounts claimed as deduction are granted except if there are good reasons to believe that the submitted receipts are not genuine or that the amounts for which they were made out are mere estimates and not based on any bookkeeping with regard to the sums actually received from each donor by the charitable organization.

3. (a) Yes. (b) No. Not if it means "without reason". If a charitable organization does not keep books showing the amounts received from each donor, and if the total deduction claimed by all donors is higher than the total amount actually received by the organization, the deduction claimed by each donor may be reduced in consequence.

4. Within the authority of the Income Tax Act.

5. The taxpayer should first of all communicate with the district taxation office and supply detailed information concerning the contributions he actually made to the organization concerned as well as every available evidence or proof thereof. If he is unable to convince the officers of the taxation office that the amounts involved are higher than the deductions granted at the time of assessment he may produce a notice of opposition on form T400A. Two duly filled-in copies of that form should be sent by registered mail, within 90 days of the mailing date of the notice of assessment, to the deputy minister of national revenue (taxation), in Ottawa.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CIVILIANS CARRIED IN R.C.A.F. AIRCRAFT

Question No. 665—Mr. Peters:

1. How many civilians have been carried in R.C.A.F. aircraft between (a) January 1, 1963 and December 31, 1963 (b) January 1, 1964 and March 31, 1964?
2. In each case (a) what was the name and address of the civilian (b) what was the extent of the flight (c) why was it approved by the air force in each instance?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the Secretary of State for External Affairs tabled the statement made by the secretary general of the United Nations regarding the situation in Cyprus. I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether, as a result of the proposals contained in that statement, the situation has improved any and if there is some hope that we can prevent it from degenerating into what the leader of the opposition in the British parliament has called "supervised genocide".

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the situation in Cyprus has very considerably improved since the additional objectives and steps were outlined in the report of the secretary general to the security council. As a matter of fact some measure of tranquility began, as my hon. friend will recall, the day before.

While I am on my feet, I may say that Australia and New Zealand have agreed to send police detachments in answer to the request of the secretary general. Austria has already sent a police component and a hospital unit. There are some grounds for thinking that another country may send a battalion of troops.

MALAYSIA—REPORTED THREAT BY PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for not having sent him notice. Has the hon. gentleman taken note of the so-called "action command" of President Sukarno of Indonesia to 21 million volunteers to fight to crush the Malaysian Federation, and would he tell the house whether any action by way of consultation or otherwise is proposed by the Canadian government either in connection with the commonwealth or with the United Nations in order to meet the threat?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have taken note of the declaration made by President Sukarno in this instance as well as his other declarations on the situation in Malaysia. Malaysia, as a commonwealth country, will naturally continue to receive the interested concern, not only of Canada but of other commonwealth countries, with respect to the problems resulting from this declaration by President Sukarno.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the house whether he is giving the same consideration and expressing the same concern with respect to the declaration made by the government of the United States in relation to operations in Viet Nam?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): While there is no relationship between the two questions, the hon. gentleman will recall the very satisfactory reply I made to his question along those lines the other day.

Mr. Herridge: The hon. gentleman did not tell me a thing.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Over the week end the minister stated that thousands of immigrants are needed, in Canada and in the province of Quebec, to ensure our country's economic expansion. As an economist with a high reputation in some quarters—not everywhere, in some quarters only— could he tell us what steps he intends to take so that our 500,000 unemployed can find reasonable work to ensure Canada's economic development?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if the hon. member would put this on the order paper. The reason I am asking is that questions should not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I ask that my question be dealt with at ten o'clock tonight.

[Text]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECRETARIAT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Could the Prime Minister give the house some details regarding the central secretariat which is to determine and co-ordinate the federal-provincial policy, whose establishment was announced during the week end by the Minister of Justice?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to prevent any short answer but it seems to me that this question requires quite a detailed and long answer, and under the rules as given to me I suggest to the hon. member that he might put it on the order paper.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, the only observation I have to make is that the Minister of Justice announced the formation of this secretariat during the week end, and I would think that as it involves government policy the Prime Minister might like to let the house know something about it.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the formation of this secretariat was also announced in the house some weeks ago.

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister, in Espanola, spoke of symbols when referring to flags, is it his intention to give Canada two flags, the red ensign and the maple leaf?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has been answered more than once in the house. It is too bad my hon. friend does not listen to these answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister spoke of several symbols, of several flags.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Under our standing orders the hon. member has not any right to insist on an answer.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MONCTON, N.B.—ACTIVITIES OF CHRISTIAN ACTION MOVEMENT AND INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister receive a telegram over the week end from the mayor of Moncton, New Brunswick, about activities in Moncton of the so-called Christian action movement and the Canadian intelligence service, and will the strange manoeuvring of this fringe group be fully investigated consistent with our basic freedoms?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram which was on my desk this morning, and I am looking into the matter. I appreciate its importance.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SASKATOON—SUGGESTED NAME FOR NEW VETERANS HOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The government having seen fit to name the airport in North Bay after the late Hon. John Garland, with which action I agree, would it not now name the new veterans home in Saskatoon the "Harry Frank Jones home" in memory of the late member of parliament for Saskatoon?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very appropriate suggestion for the hon. member to make, of course. As to the first part of his question, which I take it is not related to the latter part, this announcement was made after a unanimous request made to the government by the North Bay municipal council.

CROWN ASSETS

VANCOUVER—DISPOSAL OF SITE OF R.C.A.F. STATION KITSILANO

On the orders of the day:

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister give the house an assurance that no final government decision will be made on the question of the disposition of the Kitsilano R.C.A.F. base, transferring that land either to the C.N.R. or to any other government agency or department, until after the delegation from the city of Vancouver has been heard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to discuss this matter with my colleague the Minister of National Defence.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTHERN RHODESIA—INVITATION TO PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position to advise the house whether, despite Ghana's objection to Southern Rhodesia's representation at the prime ministers' conference, Canada's position is that Southern Rhodesia should have representation.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): As we have not yet been consulted on this matter by the government of the United Kingdom, which is the host government to the conference, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on it. However, the prime ministers of independent commonwealth governments, including Canada, would naturally expect to be consulted before invitations to attend a commonwealth prime ministers meeting were issued to the representatives of countries which are not fully independent. Until we are approached in this matter, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make any statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I agree with the Prime Minister. He tells the house that there has been no presentation made by the United Kingdom government as yet. This being so, the right hon. gentleman's answer completely satisfies us.

SUPPLY

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

FAILURE TO DEVELOP CANADIAN WATER RESOURCES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): This motion provides an opportunity for members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition to raise subjects which we consider to be of vital importance to the nation generally.

The subject which I should like to discuss briefly this afternoon has to do with a matter which for many long years in Canada was completely neglected at the federal government level. Though there may have been a brief flurry of interest at the turn of the century, when certain attempts were made by the government of that day to deal with the question of Canada's natural resources, there was no continuing or consistent program of development or exploitation put forward by any Canadian administration until recent days.

I think Canada's record following the end of the second world war was particularly dismal. Those of us who were in the House of Commons in the late forties and early fifties will recall that an attitude of complacency, indeed almost of indifference, prevailed as far as the state of Canada's economy was concerned, particularly with regard to the development of our rich natural resource heritage. Of course this was to be expected when one recalls that the attitude of the federal government was one of complacency concerning most of the major problems which existed in Canada at that time. For example, I could refer to education, agricultural policy, and the challenge of a rapidly changing economy as we moved from a basically agricultural rural environment to an urban industrial environment. There were no major attempts, I submit, to formulate a national policy on the part of the federal government until fairly recent years.

I think the first attempt on the part of this house to come to grips with this problem took place in 1956 on a motion such as the one before us today a motion to go into supply. The leader of the opposition of that day moved an amendment which provided an opportunity for a comprehensive discussion on the development of Canada's natural resources, or what was referred to as a program of natio nal development. The leader of the opposition at that time, Hon. George Drew, delivered a speech which in my view outlined the pattern which has been pursued ever since that date which I think was July 9, 1956. He was supported by other members of the opposition of that day including my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who was, within a fairly short period of time, to become the leader of the opposition and then, in an even shorter period of time, leader of the government in this house.

I do not intend to review the speech made on that occasion because it has, I suggest, become a well known point of reference from which have flowed the major developments which have since taken place at the national level through the activities of this parliament. It was referred to in basic terms as a national development program. However, perhaps I should mention one of the highlights just to indicate how pertinent the statement was and how consistent the Conservative policy has been since those days.

First of all it referred to Canadian participation in the development of our natural resources. That was a positive approach, not a punitive one as was the case in the famous Gordon budget of 1963. The mistake would never have been made if the new Liberal administration had followed the positive and constructive proposals that were made in 1956. It referred to the necessity of providing tax incentives.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member a question. Is he now going to bring in what the Conservatives did in the six years following the statement to which he has referred?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am preparing the way for the amendment I shall move, and I think the hon. member will discern fairly soon the direction in which I am heading. This is my introductory statement, and I am sure that in a very short time the hon. member will have the precise statement of the amendment that will be moved.

Mr. Winch: Are you going to leave out the six years you were in office?

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps I might continue with the statement I was making. I was pointing out that the second vital aspect of the program was to use tax incentives in order to encourage research activities in every part of Canada. This has since become a part of federal government programming. It was recognized in those days that Canada was far behind at all levels of fundamental research.

The question of Canada's vulnerable position in relation to trade was also mentioned. It was at that time that the problem of the disastrous imbalance of trade was brought before the house, and policies were initiated by the previous Conservative administration to stimulate Canada's trade. These basic policies have largely brought about the very beneficial situation that prevails today.

The speech also made reference to industrial development and the necessity of the government of Canada encouraging the trend then naturally under way by virtue of the very process of social change. This was also to become part of the policy introduced by the former Conservative administration to encourage industrial development.

Mr. Winch: May I ask the hon. member what the point of grievance is that he is raising?

Mr. Grafftey: This is not a grievance period.

Mr. Dinsdale: The next major step forward in this program was the statement made in February, 1958 in the city of Winnipeg by the then prime minister of Canada, now Leader of the Opposition. That was the occasion when in specific detail the national development program of the government of that time was put forward. The city of Winnipeg was chosen for a very good reason. It is right in the centre of Canada geographically. It has always been regarded as the gateway to the west and the north, and it would seem to be the pivotal point around which any major, massive, national development program should take place.

I want to pick out one specific point that was raised on that occasion. At that meeting the prime minister of that time called for the convening of a conference on conservation, on the wise management and multiple use of Canada's renewable resources. The challenge issued was a challenge to all the people of Canada. All levels of government and industry as well as the educational leaders of the nation were challenged to come together in a conference that would be convened by the federal government in order to deal with the critical situation in Canada's natural resources.

The crisis was all the more urgent and deepseated because of the long years of neglect to which I have already referred. To show how quickly the challenge was met, I point out that the first meeting to bring about a conference of this kind took place on November 17, 1958, I believe, and the response to the challenge as demonstrated at that meeting was overwhelmingly positive. It was a clear indication that all levels of government, particularly the provincial governments, were aware of the situation that had been outlined by the prime minister. A steering committee was formed which was made up of representatives of each of the provincial governments, and plans proceeded rapidly to bring about a gathering of Canadians from all walks of life in order to meet the challenge of the crisis that had been created by long years of neglect.

Perhaps it would be useful to outline why the situation had been allowed to deteriorate to the serious level which made such dramatic action necessary. It was only in the early part of this century that Canadians began to realize that our resources were not unlimited. We had been largely motivated by the frontier concept of there always being new worlds to conquer; therefore we had proceeded to waste our rich heritage of natural resources, particularly our renewal resources.

The first attempt to which I have referred briefly, occured in the early part of the century, but it was a conservationist approach in the negative sense. The problem was approached from the static concept which conceived of saving or preserving resources rather than making the best economic use of them. The challenge that was issued by the prime minister in 1958 involved a new, positive concept of wise management and the planning of the development of our resources in that it was geared to the economic needs of the nation. Instead of being a static, preservationist concept, it viewed the development of these resources in terms of the economy into which Canada was moving in the post-war world.

The basic problem, of course, in meeting a challenge of this kind is that of overcoming the areas of jurisdictional dispute. The resources belong to the provinces. The initiative to develop national policies belongs to the federal government. I think this is the major reason why for years there had been such serious neglect. The old buck passing or log rolling technique had been used with a vengeance by both the federal and provincial levels of government. If a problem was brought before the house it was ignored simply by making the statement that this was a matter that came under provincial jurisdiction. In order to get anywhere with a national development program the buck passing technique had to be overcome. The fundamental approach, therefore, of the planning for what became known as the resources for tomorrow conference was to deal with this area of dispute as between provincial responsibility and federal responsibility.

The warm, positive response of the steering committee was manifest from the outset and was a demonstration of the success that was going to crown the efforts of this important federal initiative. More important even than the steering committee, made up of provincial ministers, were the advisory committees that were organized to develop and support the efforts of the steering committee. There was brought together for the first time a group of Canadians who represented a broad body of knowledge in the field of renewable resources. This was the first time any attempt had been made to bring together Canadian human resources capable of meeting the challenge of this problem.

During the period of preparation, which occupied some two years, there was brought together a group of experts on soil, water, wildlife, forest conservation, and so on. Background papers were prepared numbering more than 80 I think, important as the conference itself was, this great body of experts and body of information that was brought together in order to make that resources for tomorrow conference the great success that it was, when it finally took place in 1961, was even more important. I believe too that it was the first successful model for the type of co-operative federalism that has been mentioned in recent months. This discussion and preparing of plans for our renewable resources was described as an exercise in co-operative federalism. It was quite a different exercise from those that have taken place in recent months. This was consultation in anticipation and not retroactivity. In other words the federal government, realizing it was making initiatives in a very sensitive area of federal-provincial jurisdictional dispute, consulted with the provincial leaders. As a result there was complete harmony when the conference took place which ushered in the positive results with which I shall deal in a moment.

Unfortunately this term "co-operative federalism" has been bandied around to such an extent that it describes all sorts of encounters between the provinces and the federal government. It is almost in as much disrepute semantically as the word "peace" used to be in the days when those who were not necessarily in pursuit of peace used to refer to themselves as "the peace loving peoples of the world". If you are going to get co-operation in dealings with the provinces, I submit to the government you cannot get co-operation after the event. We have had enough experience with the problems that have been created by the failure to consult, by the failure to give recognition to the area of authority of the provincial government in recent months. You must consult in anticipation rather than following frustration in dealing with these problems.

As a result, even before the conference itself was held various positive results began to be seen, and this in the face of changes of government at the provincial level while these preparations were going on, changes of ministers at the federal level and at the provincial level. For example, the so-called quiet revolution in Quebec took place during the period of preparation for the conference, and it was thought that there would be difficulty with the new administration in Quebec. The minister who joined the steering committee representing Quebec was Hon. René Lévesque, who was the holder of certain viewpoints concerning matters pertaining to federal-provincial co-operation. Mr. Lévesque joined the steering committee, and it is interesting to note he became one of the most enthusiastic supporters for the idea of the resources for tomorrow conference, an excellent illustration of how a reasonable and responsible approach to these matters can achieve results. When it was decided to proceed with the program it was decided that the resources ministers council, backed by a secretariat, would be located in the city of Montreal. Incidentally, it was to be a completely bilingual secretariat. This action represented a new concept in overcoming this jurisdictional problem in that it was a secretariat responsible to Ottawa and responsible to the provinces, and also at the service of the universities, and private industry. Canadians interested in the resources field felt that this was a major break-through in real co-operative federalism.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just for the record, what was the date of that?

Mr. Dinsdale: The establishment of the resource ministers council took place in September, 1962, I believe, and the meeting was held in the city of Toronto.

In order to demonstrate the sincerity of the intent and purpose of the federal government, to indicate that we were following what could best be described as a basis of co-equality between the levels of government—because when you are in the sensitive area of resource development it has to be approached on the basis of co-equality—the device of a rotating chairmanship was created. The chairman of the steering committee was the federal minister. He was also chairman of the conference, and the first chairman of the resource ministers council. The chairmanship then passed on to the representative of the province of Ontario. The next chairman was the representative of the province of Quebec, and it was during the period of his chairmanship that the character of this program that could genuinely be called co-operative faderalism was initiated. The current chairman is the minister of resources for Prince Edward Island, and the fact that this is the centennial year for Prince Edward Island was one reason the torch was passed to that minister during this very important period in the history of that province.

Here is a successful and genuine effort at overcoming one of the major problems of national development by an exercise in co-operative federalism in anticipation instead of by hindsight.

Mr. Diefenbaker: After frustration.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, after frustration. As I was pointing out, this enthusiasm, contrasted with the frustration in programs of mutual responsibility today, was such that the governments agreed to proceed with the major program of resource development before the conference had even met. I refer to the ARDA program, the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act passed by this house in the spring of 1961. The conference did not take place until the fall of 1961. Here is a major breakthrough in rural redevelopment, in the wise management and the multiple use of our renewable resources. If it is applied with the initiative that is necessary at the federal level it could go a long way in dealing with the problem I am specifically going to bring before the house this afternoon.

The national wildlife federation emerged out of the resources for tomorrow conference. It is the first attempt in this country to bring together, on a national basis, the problems of conservation in the important area of wildlife. The federal-provincial parks conference was another by-product of the resources for tomorrow conference, but unfortunately it has been dormant in recent months, again because the initiative must come from the federal government level.

In the interest of recreational development and the wise management of all our renewable resources, the national parks association got under way early last year. This was a spontaneous response by the people of Canada to the conference. It is not connected with any government. It is the coming together of people interested in the wise management of resources. One of the leading figures in the movement is Mr. William Baker, who had been the co-ordinator for recreational and parks matters in planning for the resources for tomorrow conference.

As could be anticipated, Mr. Speaker, there was participation in that conference at the top level. The Governor General launched the conference. The prime minister of Canada made a major statement, as did the premier of Quebec and other leaders representing the other parts of Canada. The prime minister's statement was most significant because he was the leader charged with the responsibility of continuing the momentum that had been established by this very excellent conference.

Realizing that he was dealing in the sensitive area of resource development he prefaced his proposals with the words "with the consent and co-operation of the provincial governments," but we in the federal government had to bring something to a head. We had to take advantage of the good will that was generated by this important conference. I shall mention three of the proposals which the then prime minister made. His first was that there should be regular conferences of this type in order to continue the momentum. That was pointed out three years ago, but unfortunately in the interim there has been a slowing down of the momentum.

Second, he proposed the resource ministers council which has now become a reality, and is operating most successfully in the city of Montreal. Third, he urged the establishment of a national advisory land and water use board, and he specifically emphasized the urgency of the matter in respect to water resources because already the crisis was upon us. Unfortunately, up to the present time nothing has been done in this area. There has been a whole slowing down of the process of co-equality, intergovernmental co-operation, and the initiative represented by ARDA, the federal-provincial parks conference, and the other matters to which I have referred, all because there has been a lack of leadership at the federal government level.

Indeed, there has been so much dispute, controversy and misunderstanding during recent months that one could hardly anticipate it would have been possible. I have reviewed the history because unless we reviewed the sudden change in the co-operative climate of Canada which has taken place since April, 1963, it would be impossible to appreciate the enormity of that change. In the resource area we moved together with absolute understanding and co-operation, and I may say this is the most sensitive area of federal-provincial jurisdictional dispute. Unfortunately the whole picture has been blurred and disrupted just at the time when the conservation crises was becoming most severe.

Why did the right hon. Leader of the Opposition suggest and urge that a national advisory board be established on water conservation? The answer is abundantly clear. It became abundantly clear during the preparation of the resources for tomorrow conference that we had reached a point of no return in the wise management of this basic resource. Water is basic to the well being of the nation. It is basic to all human life. Though the North American continent, and Canada in particular, seemingly has an abundance of fresh water resources, Canada, with its relatively small population as compared with other industrialized nations of the world, is already faced with critical problems in the water resource area.

Right here on our doorstep we have water pollution in the Ottawa river. This is one river which has been badly polluted in recent years. We have a water shortage in the great lakes. There is a critical water shortage problem throughout southern Ontario. It is a problem that covers the whole area of the Canadian economy as well as all aspects of life. Whether you fish in it, whether you sail boats on it—this is the recreational aspect—whether you put it on crops or whether you build summer cottages beside it, water is vital and fundamental to the continuing progress and prosperity of the Canadian economy.

It is the one vital renewable resource and, if it is to be wisely managed for the future, it must have applied to it the multiple use concept that was put forward in that speech in Winnipeg in 1958. Why have we neglected it thus far? The remarks I made with reference to our general attitude to renewable resources apply here. There is the seeming abundance of it.

The British North America Act was a very wise document but it failed to recognize the interrelationships that exist among all our renewable resources, and up until recent times the only federal initiative in the area of water resources was the interest of the Canadian government in navigation and fishery matters. It was the provinces who led in attacking the problem. They were forced to because there was no response from the federal government. The province of Ontario, under a Conservative government—and it is more than coincidence that Conservative governments have always been identified with positive approaches to conservation matters—established the water resources commission in order to deal with the problem in Ontario. But a province by itself cannot deal with it. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will be fully aware that it is beyond the capacity of an individual province to deal with.

In bringing this matter before the house this afternoon I do not have to go into details. We have the documentation of the resources for tomorrow conference, three volumes of which spell out in detail the message that the crisis is upon us. It was for this reason that the prime minister of the previous Conservative government put his finger on this one aspect as the most urgent and critical problem. It was for this reason that the previous Conservative administration introduced the sewage disposal plan which has been so eminently successful, at least in one area, that of dealing with the problem of pollution which had reached such a crisis that the major cities of Canada were short of adequate, fresh water supplies. It was for this reason that we used the Canada Water Conservation Act, which had been on the statute books of Canada since the early 1950's but had never been used, to support such major watershed control programs as the metro Toronto water conservation program where, for the first time in Canadian history a comprehensive and massive approach is being made to resolving the water problems of that city. It was for this reason that the government proceeded with the construction of the Saskatchewan dam, which project had been criticized by the previous Liberal administration, with the exception of the minister of agriculture Hon. James Gardiner, who was one of the first to congratulate the government of Right Hon. John Diefenbaker when it made the decision to go ahead with this vital, multiple-use water control program on the prairies. It was for this reason, too, that the water control program on the Saint John river was proceeded with.

These all went forward in the comparatively short period that the Conservative government was in office, and the initiative was indicated by that important statement that was made in 1958. I would suggest to the government, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a slow down; there has been a tragic loss of momentum. The problems were urgent and critical a year ago; they are more so now, because there has been no new initiative of any kind in this area, notwithstanding the promise of the present government of 60 days of decision that would shake the nation. There has been no new initiative in this area of renewable resource development. Therefore, Mr. Speaker—and others will be specific concerning ARDA and other problems that I have merely outlined to the house in preparation of the amendment—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming):

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and substituting therefor:
> This house condemns the neglect of the government in failing to establish a co-ordinated national water policy and in ignoring the imminent national crisis in water resources management, which is evidenced by the critical low water levels of the great lakes and other national waters, the increasing pollution of national waters—

Perhaps we could—just by way of aside—have included in that "the increasing pollution of the political life of the nation", but that is not in the amendment here. It says—and I repeat the last few words—

> —the increasing pollution of national waters, and the urgent necessity of conserving water resources for the benefit of national resource development in Canada;
> And urges the government, in the interests of national development, to take immediate action to make up for their year of neglect of this problem by forthwith:
> (1) establishing a national advisory committee on water resources to assist in co-ordinating national resource development;
> (2) accelerating the application of ARDA policies to the problems of national resource development, and,
> (3) vigorously continuing and expanding the water and other resource development programs conceived and established by the previous Conservative government.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to wait my turn until later, but if no other hon. member at this moment is prepared to speak on this very important subject, I would like to speak on it myself, with particular reference to water levels. I would particularly mention the very serious problem facing this country in connection with water levels on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence seaway system. There are actually two grounds of complaint that I wish to put forward in supporting this motion, which sets out the very clear and consistent policy of resource development that was initiated by the previous government, and the fact that no continuation of this policy is in evidence.

I want particularly to mention first the failure of the present government to recognize the dangers of the situation which has developed since last summer with regard to low water levels; and second, the complete breakdown as far as we can see of any co-ordination of effort on the part of the government. These are the two particular subjects with which I wish to deal. As far as the first is concerned, the failure to recognize the dangers of the situation, despite persistent questioning by members of the official opposition over the past several weeks, there is no evidence of any real concern on the part of the government in regard to this serious problem. When any individual member of the government is pressed into a corner by persistent questioning, we get the general answer which is, in effect, "There is nothing we can do". We have pressed our questioning on various members of the government in an effort to find out whether they really understand that there is a serious situation and that something can be done about it.

Despite many useful suggestions with regard to courses of action that can be taken, we have had no indication from the government that any such action is contemplated or is under consideration. It may be said that there is not anything that can be done, that this is an act of God and is caused by a lack of precipitation, and that we just have to pray for rain, as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) once stated. There are many people in this country, and I am one of them, who believe that there is something that can be done. There is something that can be done on a short term basis, and there is something that can be done on a long term basis.

For example, last week we had indications in the press that there were major works being contemplated at the exit from lake Huron by the United States corps of engineers. They are proposing to construct certain concrete weirs or, as they were described today in answer to a question from the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), submerged sills, which will have the effect of slowing down the outrush of waters from lake Huron which ultimately find their way out of the St. Lawrence river and into the sea. We did have an indication that this was being done. Last week another hon. member and myself raised this matter and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) answered it in general terms. He said that there was a water problem but made no reference whatever to the question of co-operating with the United States corps of engineers.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that an inquiry should be undertaken into the amount of water being taken out of the great lakes at Chicago and elsewhere. This question has been raised year after year and we are still in doubt as to whether or not the amount of water being removed from the great lakes system at Chicago is that which is contemplated by the international agreement. Many people believe that there is more water being taken out than is realized. There is before the house at the present time a notice of motion in the name of the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) concerning the grand canal concept, which is a diversion of waters from the Harricanaw and other rivers flowing into James bay to be taken into the great lakes system. It is interesting to note that the United States authorities have indicated that this seems to be the only answer they can devise to offer any long term solution. We have not heard anything from this government as to whether or not they are going to undertake feasibility studies on this project. Since this is the only answer which has been forthcoming on the long term, surely the government is giving some thought to the question; and I am sure that the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue will be raising the matter again at the very first opportunity. It is something which can be done, even if it is a long term project. Feasibility studies on this project would undoubtedly prove successful and we hope that the project can be undertaken.

Another project which can be undertaken, Mr. Speaker, concerns temporary access to wharves on the great lakes and on Georgian bay. I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) in the house because he made a statement on Friday during the course of his estimates with regard to dredging. I agree that as far as he went there is ground for caution in connection with dredging along the edges of wharves which are now troubled by low water conditions. I am sure that this is something which has to be dealt with carefully. But there is an aspect about which I questioned him the previous day and which he did not deal with, and I should like to draw it to his attention now. This is the question of access to wharves where there is sufficient water but where the wharf is now five or six feet above the surface of the water. For example, in my riding two or three major wharves on Georgian bay have plenty of water for boats to get in, but there is no way of reaching the surface of the wharf from a small boat, or even from a medium sized boat. Temporary emergency measures are required in order to provide steps or a temporary platform, or something by means of which people can reach the top of the wharf. I am sure there are many wharves in this position.

I have been told that on one of the wharves on Georgian bay at Pointe au Baril people have to beach their boats some distance away from the wharf and walk around to it. A week last Saturday night a man fell off the wharf while trying to get onto it from his boat, because the top of the wharf was too high above the level of the water. Emergency measures should also be undertaken to construct walkways where there is insufficient water to use the wharf. I think these matters must be considered, and in addition dredging is feasible in some places. Here are four or five definite projects which could be started on immediately, one of them long range, others short range and immediate, to reach the waters and to keep navigation going.

This is not just a local problem on the great lakes and Georgian bay; it is a national problem. Its first and major effect is on shipping, and not just on the small boats but also on the larger vessels. It affects the carriage of grain, which in turn affects all of Canada. There is difficulty in getting into some of the elevators. There is a difficulty in connection with elevator facilities. I am told by the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Noble) that some of the grain boats are finding difficulty in getting into the Owen Sound elevators. I am also told by the hon. member for Simcoe East, who is listening, that there are problems involving delays to shipbuilding at Collingwood. These problems which I have mentioned concern more than just small boat navigation; they are major problems.

Then there is another point relating to small boats, which is directly a tourist problem; and unless some action is taken immediately or some long term project is promised, I am sure there is going to be a serious discouragement to tourists and a decline in the use of tourist facilities. It is going to be very serious this summer. People are prepared sometimes to put up with minor inconveniences if they expect to put up with them for just one season, and that the following year there will be improvement; but unfortunately the forecast I have seen is that there may be, and most likely will be, a water shortage again next year.

I believe it is essential that the government give some indication that they are doing something about this problem and can give us some hope that late in 1964 or in 1965 this work will be done. Many people believe that a quick answer is available with regard to the slowing down of the outflow of water from lake Huron, but we have had no indication of this. If the tourist business suffers this year it will result in one of Canada's major sources of foreign currency being badly cut down. Since about 1961 there has been a constant increase in our currency exchange with the United States, owing to tourist revenues. Prior to 1961 the situation was bad in that regard, but it has gradually improved, and if this improvement is now damaged by the discouragement of tourists we will have not only a local problem on the great lakes and in Georgian bay but a currency problem for all Canada.

We also have loss of water resources. If it is true that there is an unusual outflow of water from lake Huron and that it is escaping more than ever into the St. Lawrence river and thence into the sea, we are losing all of those benefits which come with water. I have tried to outline only some of the serious dangers we are facing in Canada in this regard. I hope the government is undertaking measures which will relieve the fears of so many people, but so far we have had nothing except evasion, and evasive answers to questions.

The purpose of this motion and of my complaint is not to place the blame for the low water on anyone. It is a situation which we have to face. My hon. friend from Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) indicated that a water resource policy had been embarked upon, but that it seems to be slipping. Regardless of what has happened in the past, it is obvious from the figures that the levels of water in the great lakes are seriously low. I do not blame the government for this in the short term. I am trying to show—and I hope to be able to prove this before I am finished—that low precipitation is not the sole cause. This is where blame attaches to the government; they have accepted too easily this plausible explanation—lack of rain. Certain figures were given to us today in answer to question 661. It is true that precipitation has been lower, but the shortage of rain does not seem sufficiently serious to explain the results in terms of the significant lowering of water levels. There must be other causes. I have suggested some of them, and I think the government would do well to recognize that the present situation is a result of causes other than lack of precipitation. If the government really believes that this is just a matter of insufficient rain, and that we shall have to wait until more rain falls, then I think the administration deserves the condemnation of the house.

I blame the government for not having taken action when the problem became apparent. I blame them for not making a full inquiry into the situation. I blame them for not having taken action to meet the immediate difficulties and I blame them for failing to indicate long term plans designed to prevent a similar situation in the future. The government's attitude, I believe, was succinctly summed up by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) when he told us to pray for rain. I would remind the hon. gentleman of another saying: "The Lord helps those who help themselves" and I think we shall have to do something in this case to help ourselves, not merely sit back and wait for rain. Lack of precipitation has simply been used as an excuse for not taking action. Certainly, precipitation was lower in 1963 than it was in 1962 and previous years. But it was not lower by very much. In answer to question 655, it was stated that precipitation for 1961 in the upper great lakes area amounted to 28.58 inches. For 1962, it was 27.19 inches, and for 1963, 25.30 inches. There has been a decrease of about three inches in total precipitation in those three years. But in 1956 precipitation amounted only to 27.01 inches, and this is not abnormal.

We were given an answer today to question 661 in relation to a slightly different area. We find that in 1961, precipitation amounted to 30.52. In 1962, it was 28.62 and in 1963 it was 27.32. It is true there was a slightly smaller amount of precipitation in the latter year but the decline is not related to the great difference of between three and five feet in lake levels over the same period of time. The one situation cannot be the sole cause of the other.

This brings me to the question of lake levels. In 1962, according to the answer to a question asked recently, the United States corps of engineers deepened the channel between lake Huron and lake St. Clair by some six feet. It has been stated on several occasions that since the water levels of lake Huron and lake St. Clair are approximately the same it would not really matter whether they deepened the channel by 20 feet—the outflow would be no different. But in question 655 I inquired as to the lake levels of lake Huron, lake St. Clair and lake Erie. The answer is a direct indication of the flow of water. The figures began in 1955. According to the international great lakes datum the level of lake Huron was 579.01 feet. Lake St. Clair was 574.11 and lake Erie, 571.49. In other words, lake St. Clair was five feet lower than lake Huron and lake Erie was two and a half feet lower than lake St. Clair.

In 1963 we find the level of lake Huron was 576.51 feet; lake St. Clair was 571.78 feet and lake Erie was 569.44 feet. These figures indicate that there is definitely a very considerable difference between these lake levels, and therefore that any outflow of waters would be seriously increased by the deepening of the channels. We also find that between 1962 and 1963 the level of lake Huron went down by one foot, and lake Erie only by six inches—these are average levels. This indicates an uneveness in the outflow of water from lake Huron. These figures belie the casual statement that there is no difference in the outflow of waters caused by channel construction. It is obvious that there is a difference, and it is a serious difference.

We also notice that the level of the St. Lawrence at Montreal has not declined to the extent of the upper waters; while it is lower, the difference is not serious. So we are faced with a situation where water is being drawn out from the upper lakes and allowed to flow through the St. Lawrence seaway to the ocean. We would like to know whether more water is escaping from the upper lakes than ought to be escaping.

I mentioned the United States corps of engineers. Very recently we found they were experimenting with weirs or sills to see if they could slow down the outflow of water from lake Huron. I believe the very fact they have been undertaking these experiments indicates their belief that there is another factor besides precipitation involved and, in the second place, that there is something which can be done about it. The Canadian government has certainly given no indication that it is any more than casually interested in these experiments.

Last week I gave the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) the opportunity to state that his department was involved in these experiments. Both the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Foy) and myself raised the same question on the same day and became involved in a sort of competition to see which of us could get the right to make use of the adjournment debate procedure. In fact we both were successful in getting the right to speak in the adjournment debate on the subject of the experiments being undertaken. The Minister of Transport spoke for three minutes in answer to the question of the hon. member for Lambton West and for three minutes in answer to my question and he never mentioned the experiments at all. We wonder how much co-operation there is and how interested the government is in seeking a solution to the problem.

Another indication is the levels of the inland lakes. If the problem was purely a lack of precipitation one would expect to find that the water levels in most of the inland lakes would be low. This is not the case. The water level of lake Nipissing, which empties into the Georgian bay through the French river, on April 23, 1964 was one foot higher than it was last year and approximately the same amount over the level in 1962. This surely does not indicate that there is a shortage of water. Certainly lake Nipissing has a control dam by which, under an agreement, the level is kept as close as possible to where it should be, but if the water was just not there the level certainly could not be maintained no matter how many dams were installed.

The same thing applies to the Muskoka lakes. I reside in that area and I am very well acquainted with them. The Muskoka lakes are normal—a little bit down, a matter of inches, but in effect their levels are normal. In most of the other inland lakes in Ontario about which I have inquired the levels are normal, and if the problem were a straight case of no precipitation then surely the levels of these lakes would be down as well. These are the things that make us wonder whether the very simple answer, lack of precipitation, is in fact the whole answer. I think there is something more involved.

After expounding on what I believe to be the lack of action on the part of the government and an improper assessment of the real situation, I should like to go on to my second point. It concerns the lack of co-ordination in the government with regard to this particular problem. No one has tried to tell us that there is no problem. One needs only to look at the pictures that appeared in the Globe and Mail last week and in the Parry Sound North Star, which is closely associated with the problem, to see that all the large wharves are right out of the water. You can walk around them on dry land. There is a problem, and no one has denied it.

But we have not seen that real concern about the problem which has brought about a cabinet group, or has brought the cabinet as a whole together to try to find an answer to it. We in the opposition have to try in the question period to ferret out from the government what they are doing and who is acting. We began by addressing our questions to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets). The hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Noble) was persistent in his questioning for a number of weeks and we got very casual answers. Then we started to address our questions for a while to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) because he is concerned with water resources as such. He answered our questions for a short time, until he made that unfortunate statement about praying for rain. We have not had an answer from him since.

When the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources seemed to be no longer connected with the problem we started to ask questions of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) because the news release concerning the U.S. corps of engineers said that they were working with the Department of Transport. The Minister of Transport started to answer our questions. He took advantage of the adjournment debate to deal with a couple of questions. He stated that he knew there was a problem, that he had discussed it with the Minister of Public Works and they really could not see anything they could do. This was the effect of his answer. He said, as found on page 2698 of Hansard, that he had discussed the matter with the Minister of Public Works and they did not see that much could be done because "the water just is not there".

Here again in my opinion is an indication of the lack of concern. On April 15 the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) questioned the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) about the matter. If you cannot get answers or acceptance of responsibility from other ministers, then you ask the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said on April 15 that the water problem seemed to be cyclical and that he did not know of any conversations with the United States about the problem. Two days later he tabled an appraisal of water levels by the international joint commission.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), because of his connection with the international joint commission, has made a number of incursions into this problem. He tabled a document, made an evasive answer and then withdrew leaving the field to some of his other colleagues. We have never had any definite answer from him but he has answered the odd question and made the odd statement.

As I mentioned, the Minister of Public Works came back into the act again when his estimates were before the house and made a statement about dredging. He said that they did not think dredging could do anything to solve the problem because it would undermine certain wharves. If that is the case I cannot argue on that point, but there are other things that can be done. That was the sole statement he made.

The Minister of Transport said that possibly ARDA was one of the answers and, along the lines set forth in the motion, he suggested that we have to develop our natural resources and that perhaps the development of more forest cover would be helpful. We are somewhat confused at the moment with regard to whether we should address our questions on this point to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) or the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) or to whom we should address them. But certainly we have had no statement from either of these ministers.

In summary, there has been no collective or co-ordinated effort on the part of the government to deal with this problem. I do not know whether there is any cabinet committee. If there is not there certainly should be, but there has been no announcement in the house and no indication of any collective action. This is why we complain. If the problem is what they admit it is, then surely the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and any others who are essentially interested could get together and draw up a statement telling us what they are doing in order to relieve the minds of people in the tourist business, shipping and various other commercial enterprises. This they have not done. The whole system has broken down. As far as we can see, there is absolutely no co-ordinated effort. It seems to be a case of returning to the days when the Liberals were formerly in power, at which time each of the ministers attended to his own department and did not concern himself at all with the others. It appears that this is actually what is happening at this time.

We believe that the problem is not being regarded in a serious manner. We believe that the government is not looking for short or long term solutions to the problem. We have seen no evidence of it. We believe that the government has not co-ordinated its efforts along lines that are absolutely necessary, and that there has been a complete breakdown in the government's approach. We have, therefore, to make the strongest condemnation. We ask them to pull themselves together, to get going on this problem and to give the people some answers. Even if they cannot suggest an immediate solution, they should tell us that they are doing something and tell us what they are thinking about the various solutions I have mentioned, as well as other suggestions that have been made. The only suggestion from the United States authorities has been the grand canal project, and that is certainly a long way in the future. We do need this, it is true, but we also need some immediate action to alleviate the problem, not only this summer but next year as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that the matter is almost as dry as the water situation in the great lakes at this time.

I think that there are so many important problems in Canada on a national scale that the official opposition might have found another subject matter which the whole population of this country would consider truly significant. This proves without doubt a certain lack of imagination on the part of the official opposition, that is the Conservative party. It shows also the lack of imagination of its leaders and of those who previously dealt with this matter. I have to admit that you would need genius to speak on a matter such as this for two days, and the Conservative members are rather bold to inflict it for two days on the house.

Mr. Speaker, there would have been some important problems—I see that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) considers this a laughing matter. But would it not have been more appropriate at this time to discuss and examine a significant issue like agriculture in this country?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grégoire: I see that the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau)—

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, but not two at the same time; I am very sorry, but each one in his turn.

[Text]

Mr. Martineau: I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member for Lapointe knows the rules well.

[Translation]

The hon. member is well aware of standing orders. Perhaps the subject does not please him, or perhaps he forgot to talk about it. However, he must specifically speak to the subject matter moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would not suggest this subject is not important, but I may say that some others are much more important, at the present time, in Canada.

Mr. Pigeon: May I ask a question?

Mr. Grégoire: The subject chosen by the Conservative party shows its lack of imagination, and that is indeed the reason why it was defeated in the last election.

Mr. Pigeon: I only wish to direct a question to the hon. member.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; is the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm rising on a point of privilege or to ask a question?

Mr. Pigeon: To ask a question.

Mr. Martineau: I think Your Honour should rule on the point of order. The hon. member should remain on the subject. It is broad enough, and surely he has some pertinent remarks to make.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I presume the hon. member for Lapointe has a copy of this amendment before him. I hope that during the debate which will follow he will stay as closely to the subject matter as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: I wish to put a question to the hon. member for Lapointe. If he reads the motion, he will see that he can deal with ARDA, which is an exceedingly important program: agricultural rehabilitation.

Does the hon. member not believe ARDA could, in the long run, greatly assist all social classes, including farmers?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm that I have read the motion so well that I have prepared an amendment concerning paragraph 2 and ARDA.

However, if I read the motion over again:

Accelerating—

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that we received this motion in English only. Besides, that is customary for the Conservatives; that is what they usually do. While we try to supply our motions in both languages, they do not show us the same courtesy.

Mr. Pigeon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We had two copies of the motion in French. The hon. member should know that.

Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi): We did not get any.

Mr. Grégoire: The group to which the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Côté) belongs did not receive one in French either. If there are any, they should send them to us.

I am precisely quoting the paragraph concerning ARDA:

[Text]

—accelerating the application of ARDA policies to the problems of national resource development—

[Translation]

Since when does the development of natural resources come under the federal government? The constitution always taught me it was a provincial matter. That goes to show once again the centralizing tendency the Conservatives always followed when they were in office.

Mr. Speaker, I shall stick to the matter now before us, but you will understand, as I do, that this matter, not only does not belong to the category of our most important problems, but also flies in the face of the general outline of the Canadian constitution.

[Text]

This house condemns the neglect of the government—

[Translation]

They are always ready to criticize, but they neither consider nor realize what they did themselves for five whole years. Still, they are ready to criticize.

Since it came into office, the Liberal party has not pulled out of the muddle. We still need lots of improvements, the government should bring us a sensible policy in order to improve the economy. The Conservatives are always ready to criticize everybody while, for the five years when they were themselves in office, they did nothing at all, except put Canada in a state of economic stagnation.

[Text]

—to establish a co-ordinated national water policy—

[Translation]

Who is in charge of rivers? If there are power resources in the province, do they come under the control of the federal government? Who is responsible for rivers, for the development of our rivers and all our waters? These things are under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

Since when are centralizing programs like that one established?

And he goes on to say:

[Text]

—ignoring the imminent national crisis in water resources management—

[Translation]

In other words, who is responsible for the co-ordination of water resources, if not the provincial governments?

After that, when they are in opposition they do not hesitate to give us wonderful speeches against the centralizing leanings of the government, but they overlook what they did themselves when they were in office.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to put forward an amendment which would delete from the motion everything which does not concern the federal government. I intend to base my amendment on subsection 2:

Accelerating the application of ARDA policies.

Not necessarily in relation to national resources development problems, no, but in relation to ARDA itself, the rural development program.

It is probably one of the main problems which we have to solve in Canada at the present time, and it is probably the cause of stagnation in our country today, especially in eastern Canada, in the maritime provinces as well as in the province of Quebec.

I have noted, for example, in my constituency or in the Saguenay-Lake St. John area, some farmers who have an average annual income of $1,500, $1,600 or $1,800. And this is not a new condition. Let the Conservatives tell us what they did, which was any more than the Liberals, to help the farmers of the province of Quebec. It is a well-known fact that farmers in western Canada could benefit from several thousand dollars a year in the form of loans, while in the province of Quebec, there were scarcely 100 to 105 a year under the Conservative government. But why did they not accelerate the application of ARDA policies, as they say in their motion? They certainly did nothing of the sort in our area, in the maritime provinces or in the province of Quebec.

Those policies were drawn up with western farmers in mind, and they saw to it that those farmers benefited therefrom. We have nothing against the fact that western farmers were able to develop. On the contrary, we are happy about it, but we ask that farmers throughout Canada get the same treatment.

Why are our own regions not offered the same advantages as western areas? We do not wish to take anything from western regions which have benefited from that legislation. On the contrary, we are happy for them, but at least the same thing should be done for our province and the maritime provinces, so that it would apply all across the country and not only to some provinces where the farmers may develop their business and see their economic situation benefit therefrom.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about waterways, drainage of lands and a little of everything in that field. What has been done in the eastern part of the country under ARDA, regarding drainage? Absolutely nothing, when it was to the great advantage of some individuals. I refer to the ARDA program—I shall remind the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) that ARDA is also a program for land drainage and other purposes. He should read it over again, and he would see that this is so. But in the province of Quebec or in the maritime provinces, it was not put to work. Action was taken only in some regions of the country.

Mr. Speaker, all this means that when the time comes to consider a motion like the one before us, which will be debated for two days, there are very important problems to discuss and there is no other opportunity to do so.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

This is the second supply motion presented to us and it is the second time that the opposition offers us dull subjects to discuss at the national level.

The House of Commons is certainly not to blame if it rains less or if the water level is dropping. Perhaps there are remedial measures to be taken. But have the technicians considered these remedies carefully when the Conservative party was in office? Never. Clear evidence of this is that no investigation was ordered at that time. Such motions should have been used instead to call the attention of the government to important problems such as agriculture.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the amendment we intend to move, so that we may at least deal with a matter of national importance.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Beaulé), that the first paragraph be deleted and that, in the second paragraph, all the words be struck out after the word "action", as well as paragraphs 1 and 3, so that the motion reads as follows:

That, in the interests of national development, this house urge the government to take concrete steps immediately to accelerate the application of ARDA.

That, Mr. Speaker, is relevant to the main motion which has left us a very narrow opening indeed. We will now be able to discuss a more particular point, the application of ARDA in the east as well as throughout Canada.

Let us now come to the point. There is in Canada at present a definite set of facts and economic situations. I shall relate all my remarks to that later on, but I should like to start with a few preliminary observations.

We are concerned over unemployment being rather high, but we are taking very weak action to alleviate it, as for instance the winter works program. This cannot really be called a planned or broad program to put an end to unemployment in our country. It is just like bringing coal to Newcastle, and that started a few years ago. Now we are giving Canadian citizens pick and shovel work in winter in order to lower unemployment.

However, there are causes to the unemployment situation. If we care to examine the problem closely, we will see that one of the causes is, partly, the stagnation of our agriculture at the present time.

I will give an example in my own region of Saguenay, many farmers are leaving their farms to go and find work in the city. This increases, nevertheless, the number of unemployed in our municipalities.

Here is another example. It is noted that in the province of Quebec there is, at St. Hilaire, a sugar beet factory which produces a small percentage of the table sugar used in our province and in the country as a whole. Now, if we were to organize, within the framework of ARDA, other sugar beet industries, say, in the Saguenay area, the Gaspé peninsula and New Brunswick, then, a good many farmers of the surrounding districts could work and earn a substantial income from that product. At the same time these sugar beet industries could provide work for a number of city workers. This would at least alleviate unemployment and concrete results would be obtained in both cases. It would help some farmers and some unemployed to find work.

What is being done instead? Our sugar is bought somewhere else, when we would be able to produce large quantities of very good sugar in eastern Canada.

Previous governments, however, have always neglected agriculture, as known in eastern Canada, to consider exclusively the wheat problem. They forgot that there existed land capable of producing sugar beets, potatoes, onions, carrots and green peas, etc. Subsidies were given to western Canada only. Once again, we have nothing against these people out west who got those grants. But why not do the same thing in the eastern part of the country where crops are still more diversified?

If we had had more sugar beet factories, if that had been possible under ARDA, then our farmers and workers would really have been helped. Instead, we merely import our sugar from elsewhere, and since the troubles with Cuba—not us but our friends south of the border—we see the price of sugar rising tremendously and, once again, the Canadian consumer suffers the consequences.

Mr. Speaker, some people recently boasted —and this is a good illustration of what I am going to say—that there were signs of economic development, because some large corporations, like General Motors, had established themselves in the province of Quebec. It is true that this corporation will give jobs to a thousand people or so in Ste Thérèse de Blainville, and around Montreal, but why always wait for foreign industries to build plants and reap the profits and the dividends? But what about us in Quebec and Canada, in that context? We are only wage earners, employees, whereas foreign industrialists build up their business in this country, and remain its masters, getting the profits, and we poor Canadians always remain employees, wage earners in those foreign industries.

Mr. Speaker, that is the great drawback of our economic system. We are unable to assume our responsibilities and develop on our own, to remain the masters and owners of our natural wealth, of our industries and our trade. All we do is wait for some foreigners to settle here and do it instead.

I admit that the management of the General Motors Company has been bright enough, and had enough initiative to realize that there was a market for 100,000 cars a year in this country, and hastened to build this plant at Ste Thérèse de Blainville. Now, why should our economic system not allow us to build our own automobile industry, which we would own and control completely, so that we could have our own brands of cars, like many smaller countries, such as Belgium, Yugoslavia and Sweden?

I believe a sugar beet industry could easily be developed if we accelerated the program under ARDA. Had this been done in the past, had this program been applied throughout the country, secondary industries such as canning, could have been established, and the sugar beet industry could have been developed, along with others, and we would not be faced with this situation at the present time. Farmers are no longer able to live on their farms, they leave for the cities and overcrowd the labour market; they contribute to increased unemployment.

If we considered developing our economy in all sectors, in all fields, if we exerted ourselves to diversify it and profit by it, instead of waiting for foreigners to come and do it for us, then, we would be the masters. Why not try to produce at home what we can use, instead of importing? I remind you of the example I just gave, that of the sugar beet industry, which could be developed in the province of Quebec. At the present time, we produce only a small percentage of the sugar needed for Canadian consumption. We would be able to produce much more, and we would thereby avoid importing almost all the sugar we use in Canada.

Then, the farmers would work and enjoy a much happier life. They would have better living conditions and the number of unemployed would be reduced.

What I mean is that we do not feel capable of progressing by our own means. Let us do it ourselves.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member?

I know that in theory his suggestion to the effect that we become masters in our own house is excellent. But would the hon. member think that the Arvida plant should be closed because it is owned by foreign interests?

Mr. Grégoire: For those who are superficial, that may seem true at first sight, but I was explicit in the statement I made at the outset of my observations, when I specified the condition of the industries which could be developed at the national level, that is by the country itself. That is an industry of a national character. The aluminum industry in Arvida is an industry of an international character, because it imports bauxite from foreign countries such as Venezuela, for instance, to process it in Canada. The finished product is then sold on world markets. It is typically an industry of an international character, but when I talk about the sugar beet, which is primarily a raw material which could be processed and sold here, the matter is quite different.

If the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm were a little less superficial, he would analyse the kind of industries according to their own nature and would realize that it is possible to develop our industries ourselves and for ourselves, while some other industries have an international character which it would be difficult for one country such as Canada to control. If, for instance, Venezuela should nationalize the bauxite industry, Canada would be seriously affected, and then an industry of an international character could not be maintained.

On the other hand, a number of purely national industries, like the sugar beet industry which I just mentioned as an example, might be developed. As I say, of all our industries, the sugar beet industry is one with a national character; we have the raw material, and it could be developed and we would have a market for sugar.

All that should be installed, organized, put into operation as soon as possible, by accelerating, as it is requested in the motion, the application of ARDA, as provided in the act. Why is it not done? Because it seems that the government does not want to take long term, middle term or short term steps in the efforts it makes in all fields.

The policy of this government seems rather directed at alleviating certain conditions by half-measures, like for instance, winter works. Men are required to work with pick and shovel to build drainage systems, in order to give work to the greatest number of unemployed. That is the purpose of winter works. Why not put them all to work by giving them table spoons and putting machines and steam shovels in garages? Why are those men not used to build industries in the country, to build the country and develop it? There are claims to the effect that we need power developments, electric grids. Why not take our unemployed and put them to work on those projects according to a definite development program? In so doing, Canada would experience a rapid development, our economy would be put back on its feet and we would be doing Canadians a service. The government has only been able to find half-measures which are far from being the solution to the development of this country. They simply tend to alleviate slightly the existing unemployment, and only in areas which are of benefit to but a few regions, such as with winter works. Where the climate is more severe, where snow stays longer than elsewhere, winter works are affected and those regions cannot benefit from the measure to the same extent as regions with a more temperate climate. The latter can derive much greater benefit than the former.

We do not approve this motion in its present form because the development of water resources comes under the provinces. To infringe upon that field would be to advocate centralization. It would accelerate centralization and transfer to Ottawa a sphere of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. For instance, paragraph (1) states the following:

> —establishing a national advisory committee on water resources to assist in co-ordinating national resource development.

I say that watercourses do not come under the federal government but under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that the government now has at its disposal an act which, if applied more elaborately, more rapidly and more extensively, could help to improve and strengthen our economy.

For instance, if ARDA was adapted to all areas of the country, in the east as well as the west, it could be useful. But, as I already said, it is not adapted as it should be. In western Canada it is easy to secure a $25,000 loan. I think that for a farmer with 1,000 acres of real estate, it is easy to secure a loan. On the other hand, in the province of Quebec the farmer has 100 acres only, but if these 100 acres are well developed, if the farmer uses modern machinery, he can produce as much, from the standpoint of value, as the western farmer who cultivates 1,000 acres but grows wheat only.

But today the Farm Credit Corporation lends much less to the eastern farmer, to the Quebec farmer. Why? Because the Quebec farmer has only 100 acres in land, whereas the western farmer has 1,000 acres, ten times more. Then, the eastern farmer gets a loan five times smaller.

And yet the eastern farmer can in all probability develop his land, get it to produce as economically as the western farmer whose farm covers 1,000 acres.

No help was given the eastern farmer to enable him to modernize his operation and put it on a more economic basis. That practice is not followed in eastern Canada. Why? Because the fact that eastern and western Canada go in for a different type of farming was not recognized.

I am happy to note that Canada enjoys such a diversified farm production. We produce wheat in the west, but we must also take into account the production potentialities of the east. That production might be extremely diversified, and I am glad of it, but I also think that we must pass legislation and accept principles, in short regulations, allowing all kinds of culture, and not the development of only one in quality and quantity.

The ARDA program is not achieving its purpose at the present time in the eastern part of our country because it is not adjusted to the type of farming which can be done there.

It is for those reasons that I am going to move a subamendment, and I will send you a copy thereof, Mr. Speaker.

I am sorry that I have only one copy and that I did not have time to prepare it in English. I apologize to my Conservative friends, but the amendment was submitted to us at the last moment, and since I prepared my subamendment from my seat—

Mr. Pigeon: Both languages are official. Preach bilingualism by your actions and not by your words.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I know that both languages are official, but when it is an official document, such as a motion, an amendment or a subamendment, a copy of which is sent to other members, I feel that it is only a matter of courtesy and good will to make available to them a copy in both official languages. This contributes to make bilingualism more official. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec East:

That the first paragraph be deleted and that, in the second paragraph, after the word "action", the other words be deleted, as well as paragraphs 1, and 3, so that the motion will read as follows:

That in the best interests of national development, the house urge the government to take concrete steps immediately to accelerate the application of ARDA.

[Text]

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my comments this afternoon I want to concentrate specifically on long term planning for water development. Water serves many needs. Some of these, particularly the consumptive uses, are becoming more demanding with the passage of time. Canadians have traditionally thought of water as a great source of energy, a source for the production of hydro-electric power; but increasingly it is becoming important for industrial purposes, for irrigation, for pollution control, process steam, and so on. These other needs are becoming more valuable. In many areas the usefulness of water for power production purposes is still unchallenged, but in time this will certainly change.

Not only are these needs changing in character, and their nature becoming less oriented toward power production, but they are becoming crucial in widening areas of the country. A few decades ago there were only one or two spots in eastern Canada where water was in really short supply. This need has now extended to other areas. It is reaching the proportions of river basins. For example, the St. Lawrence river basin is now in some difficulty, and as these consumptive needs increase the effect of shortages will become more acute. This is a progessive development, not year by year because there are significant cyclical fluctuations but over the longer term; and certainly provision must be made to look after these requirements as they develop. They are moving from purely local problem areas to broader regional areas. In the United States they have become of great consequence from an inter-state point of view. They are becoming national in importance and I would underline the expectation that in the longer run they will also become of great concern on a continental basis. River basins will no longer be regarded as isolated one from the other; water diversions will be made from one area to another in order to relieve shortage. Surplus water areas literally hundreds of miles away from areas in which water is in short supply will be called upon to meet these increasingly valuable and urgent requirements.

I think one might look many years ahead and conceive what might be termed a broad continental approach to water development. If we look far enough into the future it would certainly seem unlikely that all our great northward flowing rivers would flow in their whole amount and uninterruptedly to the sea. Their flood waters, in part at least, will be turned southwards and redirected toward the areas of greatest requirement. They will be directed across the continent in an eastward direction as well as generally southwards. This water will be picked up at points of very high elevation and will swing down around the contours of the continent, so to speak, and used where it is most precious. This will happen earlier in the pre-Cambrian shield area. There is one minor diversion presently in existence, that of the Ogoki, whereby waters flowing into Hudson bay have been diverted ever since the early forties into lake Superior, and this has helped to relieve the initial problems of power production in that area and consumption problems in the great lakes area.

With the passage of time we will be looking at schemes such as the grand canal scheme, which will turn—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lapointe on a point of order.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is an amendment before the house. Now, it seems to me that the hon. member is still speaking about the main motion while, according to standing orders, he should be restricting his remarks to the amendment now submitted to the house. This amendment precisely deals with the speeding up of the ARDA program while the main motion deals with another subject about which the hon. member is now speaking.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order, I wish to point out to Your Honour that, according to the practice, we should discuss both the main amendment and the subamendment at the same time. Moreover, even if we were a little more severe in enforcing the rules, the hon. member's remarks would still be relevant, because while discussing the subamendment specifying the deletion of some elements of the main amendment, there is reason to discuss whether or not those provisions of the main amendment should be deleted.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it seems to me extremely difficult to separate the subamendment from the main amendment. It has been customary in debates of this kind to deal with both at the same time. I have not before me a copy of the subamendment. I imagine that copies will be available, but as the hon. member read it I gathered that it strikes out all references to water conservation and river pollution and confines itself entirely to a discussion of ARDA. I do not know how the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) can discuss the merits of the subamendment, which narrows the whole discussion, unless he discusses the importance of the much broader question. It seems to me that to confine him to a discussion of the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act is to narrow the debate in a manner which would not be in the best interest of a full discussion.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I too do not have a copy of the subamendment, but in following the remarks of the hon. member who now has the floor I think the area he is covering does have application to ARDA if we include the whole context of the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it would appear that if the hon. member who now has the floor is not permitted to speak on the main motion there would be some question whether the amendment proposed by the hon. member of the Ralliement Créditistes would or would not be in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I might refer hon. members to citation 172 (2) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which says that an amendment to the amendment on a motion for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply is——intended to strengthen or weaken the amendment to which it must be relevant and upon which it is dependant.

My understanding of the practice in these debates is to consider both the amendment and the subamendment at the same time and not to be too restrictive so as to eliminate all discussion which might not be strictly relevant to the subamendment.

I think we should take into account that in order to be acceptable the subamendment must relate in some way to the main amendment. This would indicate that remarks of the type now being made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano are relevant.

Mr. Davis: I should like to continue by painting briefly a picture of the type of diversion I have in mind. On the Harricanaw river there are freshets flowing into the James bay area during the late spring and early summer, none of which can be captured on site for power production. The great part of this water flows wastefully into the sea. How much better it would be to make use of this water by pumping it back to the divide in the Canadian shield and allowing it to flow into the great lakes system. Power which was, apparently, lost in the course of this operation could be recovered at Niagara falls and at the seaway plants. Thus, the power capacity which was involved near James bay at a very great distance from the main centres of consumption could be recovered ultimately at such points as Niagara and Lachine, where transmission difficulties are relatively slight and where the economics of distribution are much improved.

One can conceive in the fullness of time of water being brought from the northern part of British Columbia and from the Yukon to points further south where it is urgently needed. This is an area of high precipitation, a region where the winds coming across the Pacific drop most of their water burden. It falls on those high mountains and, by and large, it flows to the sea through the Mackenzie and Yukon rivers. Great opportunities exist for diversions, by pumping and the building of canals, which would bring water down to the prairie provinces. As shortages develop in Alberta and central Saskatchewan, this water could be made progressively available in this way by diverting rivers such as the Athabasca and, subsequently, the Peace river. Later, the Liard and other rivers could be diverted, working backward to the great sources of water I have mentioned. This is one way in which use could be made of all the water that is picked up in the great areas of the Pacific and dropped in those northern mountain regions.

Later on it will be necessary to bring water in some quantity to the arid areas of the prairies. Conceivably, those diversions could be continued even to the great lakes basin. In other words, after decades of time and after the progressive evaluation of planned development, great schemes could be put in hand, not only for the diversion southward of water now running to the north but also for the diversion of water resources in British Columbia and the Yukon east across the prairies to the great lakes system. In this instance, as well, there is a need to put in energy in order to raise this water over divides. I would point out that it is possible to develop power plants earlier in those areas because there is an on-site need to do this. And it is possible to recover a large part of that energy in another place, notably in central Canada. Some of this pumping could be done in the northwest using fossil fuels; perhaps a use could be found for the vast quantities of energy which exists in the oil shale deposits of northern Alberta. There is even the possibility that this water flowing through canals, in some places, could serve as part of a transportation system, at least in summer.

So there is a multi-purpose aspect, here—water, energy production and transportation. Certainly, irrigation is a great consumptive requirement which will have to be met on the prairies, and provision will have to be made for the growing needs of southern Ontario, as well. There is, indeed, a whole field here, for exploration. Some of the projects which could be undertaken are small and are of relatively modest proportions. We should at least ensure that these individual projects fit into a broader plan for the optimum water resource development of this continent.

There is also the whole question of exporting water. I think we have to face this in much the same way as Canadians have belatedly faced the problem of exporting hydroelectric power. Once we commit ourselves to the long term export of water we cannot hope easily to repatriate this resource. It involves a service which moved flow into the factories and homes of thousands, even hundreds of thousands of people on the other side of the boundary. Thus, we have to be most careful about the such commitments. I think it is obvious that the only way to supplement the water supplies into the St. Lawrence system in a substantial manner is by diverting the waters which flow northward into James bay and Hudson bay. They are creating a fair amount of havoc in the north at the moment. They are contributing to the muskeg and to conditions which are not favourable to agriculture and the growth of harvestable forest cover. These diversions will, therefore, conceivably improve the prospects of the far north. But they will, inevitably, be associated with the United States because, by entering into a great watershed half of which is in Canada and half of which is in the United States, they will become more fully available to both countries.

We are faced with a special situation in the diversion of water at Chicago into the Mississippi. There are only a few feet of difference in elevation between lake Michigan and the upper tributaries of the Mississippi river system. Indeed, it only takes a shallow ditch to divert water from the St. Lawrence into the Mississippi. This was discovered years ago. At one time, more water flowed south from the St. Lawrence system into the Mississippi than is flowing today. The United States has from time to time considered making larger diversions but it has, in fact, limited those diversions. I believe the United States has behaved in a neighbourly manner in this respect when one considers that the value of this water and the useage to which it is being, and will be put, are rapidly increasing.

We have an opportunity here, I think, to capitalize on the moneys which could be raised for diversion purposes, and we must carefully assess the long term consequences of diverting rivers such as the Albany and the Severn which flow into Hudson bay so that part of this water would, perhaps, flow out to the Chicago diversion.

We must explore such matters as these in great depth and consider carefully all the contractual relationships involved before any commitments are entered into. Perhaps we have at hand a device by which the water shortages of southern Ontario can be solved along with the water problems of those states of the United States which border the great lakes. In the case of power, different ways have been found of generating electricity. Operations have become larger in scale and cost has steadily decreased. For this reason it is now possible for us to enter upon long term power export commitments with a sound expectation of being able to repatriate the export power when we need to do so. There is as yet little indication that water can be produced cheaply.

There is some hope that nuclear power plants run primarily for energy production can also be used to produce water. They throw off a great deal of waste heat and most of this at least can be used to make sweet water. Programs of that kind will undoubtedly develop in areas like California and along the Texas gulf coast. Conceivably they can be fitted into an export program which Canada could contemplate. In other words, progressive repatriation may be possible. But these are only possibilities and their economic justification has yet to be proven.

I should like to refer to the financing of great projects of this kind. We have an interesting example embedded in the protocol to the Columbia river treaty. In that instance there has been a substantial need in the United States which has been growing more rapidly than our Canadian need for water and for power. It has therefore been possible through advance lump sum payments to have various interests in the United States finance major developments in Canada. Some of these major diversions, first, the waters flowing into James bay and Hudson bay and perhaps later waters in the northern Rocky mountains, could be financed in this way.

Literally hundreds of millions of dollars could be raised in the United States, They could be accumulated as lump sums. They would be anticipating the revenue over many, many years from the sale of the water. Over such a long period of time the lump sums involved would be very large. More important still to Canada, I think, is the fact that they could be raised at lower interest rates than are generally available in Canada and certainly to individual Canadian provincial governments or utilities. In other words, large amounts of capital could be mobilized cheaply in this way. I believe that they will be offered within a few years time. They will be offered in effect at very low interest rates and their very size will reflect in part the lowness of the interest rate. The lower the rate the higher the lump sum commitment, and Canada will be well advised to look very carefully at these commitments with a view to accelerating the development of some of our northern water resources.

Mr. Prittie: Would the hon. member permit a question? He has been referring to the Columbia river treaty. Would he agree that some of the water that will be stored in Canada, if the treaty passes, will be used for consumptive purposes in addition to power purposes? Would he also tell me if there is anything in the treaty that will compensate Canada for consumptive use in the United States? I am thinking that some of this water will find its way to southern California yet.

Mr. Davis: As the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) knows, there are provisions in the treaty which permit both countries to divert for consumptive uses, and it is this use which I am attempting to stress in my speech today. In other words, the waters of the upper Columbia may, during the life of the treaty, be diverted, for example, to the prairies.

Mr. Cooper: Does the hon. member concede that there is a rider to the treaty that the water cannot be used for power purposes? We need water on the prairies, and the Columbia river project is selling our birthright to the United States.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member is reflecting the concern that a lot of Canadians have voiced in years gone by about hydroelectric power. We have the right to divert for consumptive purposes. During the life of the treaty we do not have the right to divert for purposes which are exclusively the production of hydroelectric power, and I think hon. members will discover that this protects us from diversion in the United States as well.

Mr. Clancy: Will the hon. member permit a question? Have we got the right to divert water for domestic consumption?

Mr. Davis: Yes. The Columbia river treaty quite specifically states that Canada reserves the right to divert water for consumptive uses.

Mr. Clancy: What clause is that?

Mr. Davis: I am afraid I do not recall, but it is a clause in the treaty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Clancy: I asked him what clause it was.

An hon. Member: Clause 13.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have attempted in a very general way to sketch out these long term opportunities. I have also tried to emphasize that we should be looking ahead with respect to these great alternatives with a view to ensuring that the projects we undertake in the next few years, over the next few decades, are consistent with a more comprehensive plan of development. I have struck a note of caution about the difficulties involved, political and legal, in the export of water. I think they are akin to those which we have experienced in respect of power, but I think we will overcome some, if not all of them.

Finally, I should like to refer to one even larger concept, the diversion of the waters of the upper Yukon river. These can be pumped over into the Peace river system and in turn brought down across the prairies to eastern Canada. This river, if no needs develop in northern British Columbia and the Yukon, will be developed largely in Alaska. It will be developed by the U.S. army corps of engineers and other United States federal government agencies in much the same way as the Columbia was developed in Washington and Oregon in the Pacific northwest. Gigantic vested interests will accumulate in Alaska. They will utilize these flows and it will become politically at least, if not in terms of treaty arrangements, more difficult to divert the waters of the upper Yukon when Canada needs them. Were we to enter into some vast scheme ultimately with the United States whereby the diversion eastward of some of the flood waters of the upper Yukon would be undertaken at a relatively early stage, this would anticipate the other difficulty of repatriating water supplied from the Yukon in the years to come.

In speaking specifically to the amendment and focusing particularly on the current difficulties around the great lakes, I might point out that this water supply problem can only be resolved by essentially long term planning. Five years, six years, maybe even a dozen years may be required to carry out the initial stages of these major diversions. Hence a shortage which is occurring today, a little more than 12 months after the present government came to power, cannot be blamed on inadequate measures taken by the present government. Works to look after these shortages in any very specific way would have had to be started in the late 1950's or by 1960 at the latest. In other words, we must look well ahead. We must not be blaming each other for the current shortage, which may pass for a few years but will become inevitably more difficult to solve with the passage of time unless we do something about it.

So we need long term planning. We obviously need the co-operation of the provinces who own these resources. We need to be very careful about measures such as the Navigable Waters Protection Act, which defends the national interest so far as rivers are concerned, and make sure that the provinces do not open great holes in that act so that in the future it becomes virtually impossible for the federal government to co-operate with the provinces on an interprovincial or interregional basis.

I should like to leave hon. members with the thought that we certainly need more long term planning, more co-operative effort, more discussion with the provinces. I agree with the first speaker that the first resources for tomorrow conference was an excellent one. It was well executed and a number of ideas were brought forward then which have been invaluable in the formation of the first plans of this government. But we need more of these conferences and I am sure we will see more of them in the future under the present government.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the hon. member a question? I understood him to say that the Columbia river protocol did not permit the diversion of water to be used exclusively for the generation of hydroelectric power. May I ask him where he gets the word "exclusively"? I cannot find anything in the protocol which says that water cannot be diverted where it is going to be exclusively used for hydroelectric power, or if it is going to be used for hydroelectric power at all.

Mr. Davis: In answer to the hon. member, I must admit that I am not a lawyer. I have discussed the subject matter with lawyers who agree that this is so, and certainly the government has taken the advice that this is so.

Mr. Cooper: I agree in so far as the hon. member is talking about three or four years, but I want to look at it for 30 years.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Cooper: I am asking a question. I want to know about the situation 30 years from now. What are you going to do about the prairies if you sell our birthright to the United States in this Columbia project? What are we going to do for water on the prairies? I am thinking in terms of the Saskatchewan river dam which will be completed in two years. It is said that about 10 per cent of the water from the Columbia, which is a very small diversion, will double the flow of the Saskatchewan river, and in 20 or 30 years western Canada is going to need that water. You are talking in terms of four or five years—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but perhaps he should ask a question if that is what he intends to do.

Mr. Cooper: Thank you. Are you looking ahead in terms of 20 or 25 years when this water will be needed in western Canada?

Mr. Davis: I should like to reassure the hon. member that the Columbia river treaty certainly looks ahead. It provides for the diversion of water out of the Columbia river in Canada at any time for purposes which are primarily consumptive, for instance, irrigation. Incidentally, this diversion can take place without having to pay compensation to the United States for the interests affected, whereas prior to the Columbia river treaty we would have had to pay that compensation. In other words, we are freer to divert water for irrigation on the prairies than we were before.

Mr. Clancy: Would the hon. member explain to me how he can take the water right back, when he has given it away?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call on the next speaker, I might perhaps mention, in connection with the subamendment submitted to the house, the Chair has before it at the moment only the English version of the amendment and the French version of the subamendment. During the last few minutes the Chair has attempted to relate the one to the other in order to find out to what extent they can be connected. It seems a very difficult task. Perhaps over the dinner hour the Chair might have a chance to see both the French version of the amendment and the English version of the subamendment. While the subamendment may not be out of order at the moment, unless something be clarified during the translation there may be some question as to whether or not it is regular in form.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, you may rest assured that I will inform our whip of the statement you just made.

I must say I found the comments of the hon. member for Lapointe rather strange, because, after stating at the outset that our amendment was of no interest to him, he nevertheless succeeded in dealing with it for at least 30 minutes. I take this opportunity to congratulate him.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the amendment now before us is concerned, I intend to deal with three subjects:

First, I shall refer briefly to the record of the Conservative party in the field of national resources.

Second, I wish to take the opportunity afforded me by this debate to criticize the initiative of the present government in that field during the past several months.

Third, I intend very seriously to make a few definite and constructive suggestions.

[Text]

Before I proceed this evening, Mr. Speaker, and since I anticipate the possibility of points of order, I should like to inform hon. members exactly the basis on which I intend to proceed. I believe the only possible way in which to better the problem we have before us is by improved co-operation between the federal government and the provinces. If there has been success in the field of resource planning, be it in the field of water or other resource planning, if there have been successes or failures, those successes or failures have depended, in my view, primarily on the state of federal-provincial co-operation.

I know many of my hon. friends opposite have often lamented the lack of polarization of debate in this house. I should like to underline the clear difference of approach toward the subject under discussion as between the two major parties in this house. I am not saying that the government I supported in this house was perfect in the field of federal-provincial co-operation. However, if we did have successes in planning in the resource field, if we did have success in our experience with ARDA, it was because the Conservative administration which I supported knew the true and basic meaning of co-operative federalism. We did not just talk about it. This is the reason I want to doubly underline the successes mentioned by the hon. member who led off in this debate this afternoon.

The government I supported understood the real meaning of co-operative federalism and the facts of life of confederation in 1964 as well as in 1957 or 1958 at the time this party came into power. It is no accident of history that a Conservative government understood the true meaning of co-operative federalism because we were the party of confederation. The longer the present administration remains in power the more the people of Canada will realize that, although we may have made mistakes and I am the first to admit that we made mistakes—we did not make the colossal mistakes the present government has made since it took office. During the years we were in power the ARDA program was the result of a dynamic, new and constructive approach to the field of federal-provincial relations. It was not just a pragmatic sort of ad hoc shooting from the hip; it was based on our party's principles.

I know hon. members opposite smile. They have adopted pragmatically the notion of co-operative federalism in the year 1964. It is an adoption of convenience because a party which has for years supported a doctrine of centralism cannot turn a somersault in five minutes and support the idea of co-operative federalism.

If the present government has failed to initiate and carry out new ideas in the field of resources, water, and ARDA, it is because it does not understand, or care to understand, the true and basic meaning and the principles of co-operative federalism. It has only adopted the slogan because it thinks it is a good slogan to adopt in the year 1964. Our party, between 1957 and 1962, with its ARDA approach and the establishment of the resource ministers conference, established the real and basic idea of co-operative federalism, based on the principles of our party.

[Translation]

When the former minister of finance (Mr. Fleming) succeeded, in agreement with the premier of Quebec at that time, Mr. Sauvé, in settling the problem of university grants, the news was not published in the papers the next morning as an extraordinary fait accompli. Indeed, it was only natural that a Conservative government had entered into a discussion and reached such an agreement with the provinces.

[Text]

I would like to say, sir, when the right hon. prime minister of the day, with Mr. Fleming, the then minister of finance, reached the accord he did with the province of Quebec and its premier of that time, the late Paul Sauvé, relating to university grants, it was not spoken of in headlines across the nation, for the very simple reason it was only natural that a Conservative government, realizing what it was to co-operate with the provinces, naturally did this sort of thing.

As I say, our treatment of the provinces and our co-operation with them between 1957 and 1962 was not matter of convenience. It was no accident of history because the party of confederation, under the direction of the right hon. prime minister of that time, deeply felt and knew the necessity for maintaining national unity and confederation by thus co-operating. So, we saw at that time real and dynamic leadership in the field of resources, in ARDA and in relation to many problems such as the development of our water resources that we are discussing this afternoon.

What are these principles of our party? We recognize that while we must have a strong central government, there is also the need to decentralize in a country like Canada. We also believe that the father of many of our party's principles, Burke, knew what he was talking about when he elaborated the principle of local self-agency, which simply means that very often people on the local level know what is best for them and how best to govern their local affairs.

I agree with the present right hon. Prime Minister when he says—and it is obvious—that each government, be it provincial or federal, must remain strong and able to carry out its responsibilities as given to it by the constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say briefly to the house that if the Conservative party had such a success with regard to national resources, just after it came to power, it is mainly because of its co-operation with every province of the country.

[Text]

Sir, now I come to the second general theme which I want to treat this afternoon. I would like to ask myself and all hon. members the question: Why has there been a slowing down of the momentum, as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) so ably described it a while ago, in relation to any dynamic program for the development of our resources? Many people in all corners of the country are wondering why there has been a slowing down, not only in this program but in all major economic programs that were meant to be undertaken by the government.

I find it amazing that people should be surprised that there has been a slowing down, because in this day and age, on May 4, 1964—

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to inform the hon. member—

[Text]

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member makes remarks from his seat. I understand he is one of those bright, new sophisticates in the Liberal party who speak from their seats. He is intellectually emancipated.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to tell the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi that whenever I will have something to say in this house, I shall rise and say it, for I will really have something to say then.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I am sure of one thing, there was no point of order there. Perhaps the hon. member will be able to understand the rules better after a few years spent in this house.

I should now like to go on with my observations.

[Text]

It should not be surprising that such a state of affairs exists on May 4, 1964, not a slow down but a complete cessation of activities not only in the field of resources but in the field of all economic activities that the government meant to undertake. The hon. member continues to babble from his seat. I would like to ask him to extend to me, while I am speaking, the courtesy that I intend to extend to him when he makes his maiden speech in this house, if he has not already made it.

Mr. Turner: He has made it.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, there should be no surprise on the part of the Canadian people that such a state of affairs exists. While hon. members opposite have, as I said in my initial remarks, called for a polarization of debate I would simply like to say—I have said it many times and I say it this afternoon with a stronger voice than I have ever used before—that the party of centralization bases its activities on the doctrines so often expounded by the Secretary of State, bases its activities on the Pearson plan, and on the book called "Troubled Canada". I ask all hon. members if they will not admit that the Pearson plan, the book by the Secretary of State, and the book by the Minister of Finance are all exposés, if you will, of the doctrine of centralization. Let us stop trying to bring red herrings into this debate; let us put our cards on the table.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before calling it six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock are as follows: the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) on negotiations with the United States in respect to the Passamaquoddy project; the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Boutin)—

[Translation]

—as concerns unemployment insurance in the case of Canadian lumbermen who travel to the state of Maine in order to work; third, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), the closing of Miller Bay hospital in British Columbia.

[Text]

It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McIlraith (for the Minister of Finance) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Dinsdale, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Grégoire.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As I indicated prior to six o'clock, the Chair had some difficulty in relating the context of the subamendment presented in the French language with the context of the amendment presented in the English language. I indicated that through the dinner hour I would have the opportunity to look at the two texts and try to relate them to one another. Having done so, the Chair is of the opinion that to give effect to the subamendment as proposed by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and as set forth in the last paragraph of his motion, certain alterations should be effected as follows, so that the French text would read:

[Translation]

That the amendment be amended as follows:

In paragraph 1, delete every word after the words "this house".

In paragraph 2, delete the words "and it" in the first line, delete every word after "immediate action" and replace them with the following words: "in the best interests of national development, to take concrete steps immediately to accelerate the application of ARDA".

I might mention that the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) and the hon. member who seconded the motion have accepted that this change in form be made. If the house will give its unanimous consent, the change will be made.

[Text]

Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks before six o'clock, I stated that if our Conservative government, under the leadership of the then prime minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), was really successful in the field of resources, it was because our Conservative government had readily realized the necessity of cooperating with the provinces. That is why we were successful in our ARDA policies, as well as in the setting up of a council of resources ministers.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, as I did at the outset of my remarks before six o'clock, that if the government I supported had success in the resources field, in the field of ARDA, it was because our government, supported by a party and directed by a prime minister who knew the true meaning and spirit of co-operation with the provinces, brought these things into being. I would like to state again that I believe there has been a slowing down of the momentum in these programs. Why? Again I say, because the party of centralization has been basing its activities on the doctrines so often expounded by the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) and on the Pearson plan. Far too many people blame the ministers, but it is the Pearson plan that is underlined by a high notion of centralization which cannot be applied to the facts of federal life in 1964. This government has been basing its activities on the book called "Troubled Canada", and all these ideas expound the glories of centralization and leave no room for any idea of co-operative federalism; there is no room for any idea of co-operation with the provinces.

Why then, we should ask ourselves, has there been failure in planning for resources by the government that sits opposite? It is just not an accident; it is because they have based their governmental activities on the doctrines of centralization, which they are doing their best to disown but which they cannot disown.

I say the Liberal government's failure under the Pearson plan, its failure in policy in the field of resources, is based on the same reason for their having failed in all their economic activities as a government. It is because they have failed to consult with the provinces; they have failed to consult with local authorities; they have failed, as ministers, even to consult among themselves. One minister makes one sort of speech on economic planning, another minister makes another sort of speech. I often wonder whether Mr. Kent vets these speeches out, or whether he should not start doing so pretty soon. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, this government might mouth the glories of co-operative federalism, but they do not believe in co-operative federalism.

The next remark I want to make is this, Mr. Speaker. I have made it very often before inside and outside this House of Commons. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) is surrounded on the treasury benches by some very senior and very able ex-senior bureaucrats. I happen to be one of those—and I am not just saying this to flatter—who think that we Canadians are blessed with one of the finest of civil services in the world. But the right hon. Prime Minister, an ex-senior bureaucrat himself is surrounded by whom, and from whom does he take his advice? He takes it from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and his book "Troubled Canada". Does this not underline the glories of centralization? The Prime Minister takes his advice from the Secretary of State, (Mr. Lamontagne) who wrote one of the great exposés on the glories of centralization and who just the other day, because he thought it was convenient, did a somersault and said, "You know, ladies and gentlemen, that was in the province of Quebec. I think, after all, that decentralization is really a very good thing for federalism".

There is a senator in the other place who said just a few years ago that his party, the Liberal party, was wallowing in the quagmires of pragmatism. Well, Mr. Speaker, they cannot turn somersaults and get away with it that easy while we are in the opposition. Our successes in these fields were based, again I say, on the principles of our party. Those who surround the Prime Minister today have shown time and time again that this notion of centralization cannot be applied to the facts of federal life in 1964. From whom does the Prime Minister take his counsel in regard to economic matters? We have seen that the Pearson plan and the right hon. Prime Minister himself are dominated by the centralizers. This leaves no room for the party that forms this government to advance sincerely any notion on co-operative federalism with the provinces.

With many other Canadians I rejoiced the other day when it seemed that the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) attained a certain amount of agreement with the province of Quebec with relation to the pension plan. I rejoiced, as I think did every other hon. member, thinking of the old people of our country and putting country before party. But what about all this nonsense that the premier of Quebec and the Prime Minister of Canada have saved confederation? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if a friend and I were to set fire to a house and we watched it burn, and then just before the house was almost destroyed we called in the fire brigade and with the fire brigade we saved that house, could we honestly be credited with saving the house? The Prime Minister with his centralist activities nearly sabotaged national unity and the spirit of co-operative federalism, which is so necessary to put programs like this into operation. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) added a little gas to the fire and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) added a little more gas to the fire. Then they called in the fire brigade, and all the Liberals in Canada stood up and said they had saved confederation. This is just so much palpable nonsense.

The facts of life, Mr. Speaker, are that Mr. René Lévesque, realizing that Liberalism in the province of Quebec does not say the same thing as Liberalism here in Ottawa, which is based on the centralist approach, is demanding the separation of the Liberal party in Quebec from the federal wing. There is no other reason—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am wondering if the hon. member does not feel as the Chair is inclined to feel, that he is digressing to some extent from the motion before the house.

Mr. Grafftey: Well, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to develop the theme that most Canadians are beginning to realize, that it is not just an accident that the Liberals are not having success with getting action on economic programs, such as the ARDA program and resource programs, because their whole system of activity is based on the idea of centralization, which cannot be put into effect today. While it might seem that I am getting out of order, I am relating my remarks to the subject before the house today in an attempt to show why the government are experiencing such failures.

I think that spokesmen for the government in Ottawa as well as spokesmen—I hope I am not out of order in saying this—for the government of Quebec are doing national unity and the future of our country great disservice when they confuse—I will not say intentionally, but if it happens too often in the future I shall have to say intentionally—ordinary, every day problems concerning provincial rights with the problems of bilingualism and biculturalism. I submit that in many ways they are two distinct things. I think the present government of Quebec and the government at Ottawa are doing a great disservice to this country if and when they intentionally confuse these two matters.

In relation to federal-provincial relations, Mr. Speaker, we are told by many people that all of a sudden the present government have a new plan. They are going to come to the House of Commons and put forward legislation, and then after consulting with the provinces, etc., they are going to be willing to amend this clause, that clause, and so on. I am not going to argue that a certain amount of this under present day conditions is not necessary, but I am going to say that this is no excuse for the past performance of this government in regard to federal-provincial relations. This government has put legislation time and time again before this House of Commons without any consultation with the provinces, and subsequently they have wondered why their whole economic program, including resource planning which we are discussing today, has floundered on the rocks. It has floundered on the rocks because they do not believe deeply in co-operative federalism; they only talk about it. I ask the Secretary of State how he, having written an exposé on federalism a few years ago, can suddenly adopt overnight the Conservative principle of decentralization and at the same time keep a straight face?

Mr. Lamontagne: Have you read the book?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes, I have, and in many instances I congratulate the minister for writing a very interesting and good book. But if the minister's mind really turned a somersault overnight I cannot congratulate him either for his sincerity or his pragmatism. This new idea of introducing legislation in this House of Commons without consultation with the provinces and then saying that the government are willing to amend it in the spirit of co-operative federalism is just a pure lack of preparation.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to stress something that I have often stressed in this house before with regard to the problem we have at hand. I do not believe that this government are going to make any advances in the field of resource or water planning, in the field of ARDA, or in the field of any economic activity, unless they improve relationships with the provinces immediately. Without improved relationships with the provinces there will be no improvement in the situation mentioned by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) this afternoon. It must be realized that the Canadian constitution is the first constitution in the world which combines a federal system of government with a parliamentary system. A federal system of government seeks to combine a measure of unity with a measure of diversity. I should like to quote a remark made by the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King after the publication of the Rowell-Sirois report. He remarked:

> This arrangement of continuity and permanence is necessary, because co-operation between the dominion and other provinces is too vital a matter to be left entirely for intermittent conferences and to correspondence between governments.

Mr. King made this remark after the government of Nova Scotia at a prior federal-provincial conference had spoken out regarding the necessity for the establishment of more sophisticated approaches to federal-provincial affairs; after the province of Nova Scotia had spoken out for the necessity of creating a permanent secretariat for federal-provincial affairs. What did the Rowell-Sirois report have to say on this subject, Mr. Speaker? It said:

> But co-operation between autonomous governments is difficult to achieve. Administrative authorities responsible to different legislatures are not always interested in co-operation; indeed, non-co-operation may on occasion serve their immediate interests.
> Autonomous governments may thus tend to become rival centres of power rather than agencies for co-operative pursuit of the public weal.

I do not pretend that the problem facing the present government is an easy one to solve. But I am saying this: It will have to initiate and adopt more sophisticated measures than have been used up till now; it will have to create, or help to create, more sophisticated bodies for the guidance of federal-provincial relations than any which exist at present if any headway is to be made in economic planning or the planning of resources, such as we are discussing this evening.

The Rowell-Sirois report, in dealing with this aspect of the subject, states:

> There may be certain disadvantages in not having a single department in each government charged with the responsibility for inter-governmental communications. Each province must, of course, decide for itself the expediency of establishing such a department, but the commission is inclined to think that the delay and inconvenience of having the voluminous correspondence, which is today necessary between governments, conducted by one department would make the suggested innovation undesirable.

The commission goes on to recommend the establishment of a permanent secretariat, and I believe that although the Prime Minister has taken upon himself responsibility for federal-provincial relations, the initiative shown up to this point has not been sufficient. I understand initiative has been shown by certain departments of government, among them the Department of Labour. I understand that certain officials in various departments have been in contact with their counterparts in the provincial governments. This is commendable, but it is not good enough. I repeat: A permanent secretariat for federal-provincial relations must be set up on the premiers and Prime Minister level; otherwise the federal government in its dealings with the provinces will go from one crisis to another, and they might as well forget about planning in the field of resources, the field of ARDA, or any other economic venture.

Hon. gentlemen opposite should put first things first and get on with this job. It is all very well to have reached an agreement a few days ago regarding pensions with the province of Quebec. But at what price? The minister laughs; but I happen to live in the province of Quebec and I know what takes place when we have Liberal governments in Quebec and in Ottawa saying one thing inside the province and another thing outside it. Yes, "conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription"—I am not too young to remember that; and hon. members opposite are doing the same things today. Before an agreement was reached on pensions, this country was divided as it never was before. Mr. Lévesque knows that; he realizes Liberalism means one thing in Ottawa and another in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: Same old bunch.

Mr. Grafftey: I know some hon. members thought I was getting off the subject, but I am dealing now with one of the reasons for the failure of the government in the fields of economic and resource planning. They think all the wisdom resides here in Ottawa and that the centralizers and the ex-bureaucrats have all the answers. But that is not true. While we rejoice in the arrangement made in the pension field, unless such a secretariat as I have mentioned is established, and established soon, the Prime Minister has simply stuck a little band aid over a major wound. Unless co-operative federalism is not merely preached but sincerely put into operation, confederation will suffer again as soon as we are confronted with further provincial problems. I think most Canadians realize this.

I know that in debating this subject this evening I have gone far afield. I believe the observations I have made in entering into this debate could be repeated from time to time with a direct bearing on most of the activities of the present government. The government has already failed dismally to show any initiative toward improving the economy of this nation, and if hon. members opposite are sincere in their protestations about co-operative federalism they will soon make sure that the former senior bureaucrats, and those others who have the Prime Minister's ear, change their notions about relations with the provinces. I say this not only in a partisan sense but as a young Canadian who is interested in the unity of this country in the future. Rather than stumble from crisis to crisis with the provinces it is time the government did some long range thinking and began at least to initiate the establishment of a secretariat along the lines I have advocated.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has rendered the house a service by directing the attention of the chamber to this very important question of the need for a water conservation policy in Canada.

We have been very slow in Canada in recognizing that water is a commodity of basic importance to our economy. It is essential, as hon. members know, for the generation of hydroelectric power, for industrial development, for domestic use and for recreational purposes. On occasions, it has even been used for drinking purposes as a last resort. Our friends to the south, in the United States, were much quicker to recognize how important water is. In this northern half of the continent we pride ourselves on having almost limitless supplies of water and we have done very little to conserve our water resources. But during the same period the Americans, who had gone through the industrial revolution much earlier than we, became aware of the fact that the growth of their economy was largely dependant on the supply of water which could be made available to the great urban and industrial centres. This is why during the 'thirties, while we were keeping roughly a million people on relief in Canada, the Americans spent hundreds of millions of dollars building some of the largest dams in the world both for the purpose of water conservation and for the generation of hydroelectric power.

Since the war, the Americans have used their army engineers to work with the state governments to launch tremendous water conservation projects in almost every part of the country. They have piped water hundreds of miles in order to turn their deserts into gardens and make possible the extension of their urban communities and the establishment of new industries in places where it would not be possible without adequate supplies of water. But we in this country are only beginning to appreciate the problem. If anyone had told us 20 years ago that in the southern part of Ontario, surrounded by the great lakes and close to Niagara Falls, the day would come when we would be threatened with a water shortage, such a person would have been laughed to scorn. The fact is that the problem is already upon us and it will increase with the passing of the years. There is a drastic need for the government of Canada in conjunction with the provinces of Canada to work out water conservation and water usage programs.

The amendment which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has moved draws our attention to the fact that there is an imminent national crisis in water resource management and it makes reference to three things: First, the low levels of the great lakes; second, the increasing pollution of national waters and, third, the need for a conservation of resources program. May I say a word about each of those very briefly.

The question of the critical low water levels of the great lakes is, of course, of tremendous importance to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, not only because of the supplies of water for domestic purposes but because the great lakes have become the great inland transportation network of industrial Canada. The necessity of doing something about water levels on the great lakes is something which I am sure no one needs to stress in this house.

The matter of water pollution is a subject which has been long neglected. We are polluting most of the rivers in Canada and a number of lakes. It is hard to believe that in this age of sanitary engineering there are cities in Canada which are still discharging raw sewage into our rivers and lakes, polluting our water resources and killing fish. Industrial effluents are being poured into our national waters which are having a damaging effect on the use of the water for livestock and other purposes.

This amendment asks the house to condemn the neglect of the government in failing to establish a co-ordinated national water policy and for ignoring the national crisis in water resources management. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how we can select this particular administration for condemnation. I think each successive government in Canada has been negligent in dealing with this matter. Both this administration and the previous one have been negligent.

The first move that was made to conserve water was taken back in the 1930's when Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, minister of agriculture in the administration of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, introduced the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. Under this legislation a very good staff was built up over the years. They did excellent work on the prairies by helping farmers to establish small dugouts for their livestock. They built a number of small dams which had very beneficial effects on the prairies. This organization could have done much better work had it been given more money, but I think credit must go to it and particularly to the former director, the late L. B. Thomson, for the work which was done and for the foundation that was laid for a much broader program which has not yet materialized.

P.F.R.A. and its staff laid the groundwork for considering the South Saskatchewan river development project. Here I think that credit has to go to the previous administration under the leadership of the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). For 20 years the Liberal government had talked about the South Saskatchewan dam. In the 1945 election the Liberal party went so far as to say: We have the money, we have the men and as soon as the material is available we will begin to build the South Saskatchewan dam. But 10 years later, although the money and the men and the material were all available, nothing had been done about building the dam.

I have some rather unhappy memories of those days when the federal government kept saying to the provincial government: If you will just offer to contribute a little more to this project we can go ahead. In spite of repeated offers an agreement was never signed. I give credit to the government of the present Leader of the Opposition in that when they came to office we were able to negotiate an agreement and work was started on the South Saskatchewan dam.

Lest members from other parts of Canada go away with the idea that the federal government is paying all the cost, I think I should point out that when that project is completed the people of the province of Saskatchewan will be paying a little better than 60 per cent of the total cost and the government of Canada will be paying about 40 per cent.

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Douglas: Did somebody say "come off it"?

Mr. Cooper: Are you speaking of the building of the dam?

Mr. Douglas: My friend from Rosetown-Biggar knows the story very well and he can be sure I will give all the facts, if he will just sit still. On the building of the main reservoir the federal government is putting up 75 per cent of the cost and the provincial government 25 per cent. But this represents only in the neighbourhood of $100 million while the total cost of the project will run to well over $165 million. When the hydro installations are put in, when the ground is levelled, when the canals are built, when the lateral ditches are installed, when the land is prepared for irrigation and the ancillary works to take water into the Qu'Appelle valley are completed, the people of Saskatchewan will have put up better than 60 per cent of the total cost of the whole project.

I say that for the information of members from other parts of Canada. I do not say it to detract in any way from the generosity of the federal government in proceeding with the project. I am convinced that the construction of the dam will be a turning point in the economic life of the prairies and particularly western Saskatchewan because it will make possible not only irrigated land on which there can be diversification of crops, the growing of sugar beets, the building of sugar factories, market gardening, canneries, quick freezing units, but it will also mean backing water up into the hills so that in many areas livestock can be raised where they could not be raised before because of lack of water. It will make possible urban growth, recreational facilities and industrial development. In my opinion it will be a great forward step in western Saskatchewan and, indeed, in all of western Canada because the South Saskatchewan dam will back water up for 142 miles so that there will be a great lake 142 miles long and about five miles wide. The effect of that body of water cutting across the Palliser triangle will be tremendous so far as the climatic conditions in that semi-arid plain are concerned. I give full marks to the government of that time for proceeding with that project.

I give them credit also for the resources for tomorrow conference which was well organized and well conceived. It brought together a number of top flight people across Canada who were concerned about the problem of resource conservation. I think that out of the conference there came many good ideas and the foundation was laid for a real attack on this problem. Out of this conference came the idea of ARDA which also was a worth-while concept.

However, Mr. Speaker, when you have said that you have said it all. A conference, in itself, does not conserve resources. The ARDA program, although it contains the germ of a good idea, has not yet produced any great projects to deal with the problem that has been raised in this amendment. I therefore return to my thesis that none of the governments of Canada have really tackled this problem. To blame the present administration, which has been in office for about 12 months, it seems to me is something like the pot calling the kettle black.

I believe that instead of trying to apportion blame, and I am not trying to do that, we have to recognize that both the major parties have made some obeisances to the need for doing something about water conservation but we have never, in Canada, tackled this problem on anything like the scale on which it needs to be approached. We have not even closely approximated what our friends in the United States have done, even having due regard to the difference in population and financial resources of these two countries. Apart from the South Saskatchewan dam, we really have not done anything of major proportions about conserving some of the great water resources of this country.

We have done nothing at all about river pollution—neither this Liberal government nor the Liberal government that was in power for 22 years or the Conservative government that was in office for some six years. None of them did anything about this question of river pollution. I recognize the necessity for the co-operation of the provinces and municipalities in connection with this problem. We cannot continue to pollute the national waters of this country without paying for it and our children and our children's children will pay for poisoning of our rivers and our lakes with industrial effluents and raw sewage. Unless we tackle this problem fairly soon, the bill will be delivered in the not too distant future.

When we speak of water conservation—and members on both sides of the house paid tribute to the value of conserving water—it seems to me somewhat ironical that the party that has moved this amendment and the party against whom it is directed have both entered into an agreement to turn over the entire flow of the Columbia river to the United States. This is the fourth largest river on the North American continent, and we have not only allowed the United States to determine the flow of that river, the extent to which water will be diverted from it, but we have actually limited ourselves for the life of the agreement in connection with our right to divert water.

This afternoon the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) talked about our right to the consumptive use of water from the Columbia. He said, we cannot take it exclusively for the generation of hydroelectric power. I asked him where he found the word "exclusively", and he said some lawyers told him it was there. He said he was not a lawyer, and neither am I, but I know that no lawyer, by even the most subtle interpretation, can put a word there that is not there. Article 1 of the treaty, clause (e) defines consumptive use. It says:

> (e) "Consumptive use" means use of water for domestic, municipal, stock-water, irrigation, mining or industrial purposes but does not include use for the generation of hydroelectric power;

The protocol which was supposed to rectify this situation contains nothing but mild generalities and says:

> Canada and the United States are in agreement that article XIII(1) of the treaty provides to each of them a right to divert water for a consumptive use.

In other words, water can be diverted but only for the purposes which I read a moment ago from clause (e). It can be diverted for irrigation or municipal purposes, but it cannot be diverted if the generation of hydroelectric power is involved. As every member knows, in this modern age it is uneconomical to divert water except for a multi-purpose project, and the only thing that makes possible a large scale diversion is the use of water for several purposes. You can use it to develop power, pass it through the turbines and use it for stock-watering, for irrigation, for domestic and industrial purposes. Unless it can be used for all of these purposes, then it becomes uneconomic to divert water. Here are two parties, one of whom drafted the agreement and the second is now in the process of putting it through the house, who pay lip service to water conservation, and in the same breath they give away one of the greatest assets in this country, the tremendous volume of water which we have at hand. Before long we shall be condemned for this failure to discharge properly our stewardship in looking after these resources, of which we are only the trustees.

Someone sent me a rather interesting clipping from the Phoenix Gazette, printed in Phoenix, Arizona under date of April 7, 1964, which tells of a meeting in Arizona in which the engineers and other experts were concerned about how they were going to get enough water in Arizona. I quote:

> It was agreed that the 1.2 million acre feet which could be provided by the central Arizona project from the Colorado river would still leave the state with a water deficit of almost two million acre feet a year. Better water conservation practices could wipe out some of the deficit, but long range planning indicates the need for a larger and more permanent source of water, it was noted.

Then the article goes on to outline how they hope to get enough water down in Arizona.

It says:

> So this leaves outside sources, and while officially no one would say just where these sources might be, privately some agreed that the huge Columbia river probably would hold best promise of a future supply. Water experts have said the state might possibly get up to 12 million acre feet annually from such a source.

Then it says:

> The Columbia river is in the Pacific northwest.

Well, I do not suppose the people in Arizona care whether it is in the Pacific northwest or not, or whether it is going to come from Canada. What they are concerned about is that they get 12 million acre feet of water a year sent across the line into the United States, with no controls whatever as to how it is used, how it is diverted and where it is diverted to; whereas on the Canadian side we are going to have our hands tied, and are going to wait for the next 60 years with this valuable resource pouring across the line, at 90 million cubic feet per second, into the United States.

This debate has been concerned with the matter of water resource management, and I had expected someone from the government side would tell us what the government's policy is going to be with respect to water. So far the only statement was that by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis), who is the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister, and I hope to heaven he was not speaking for the government because he outlined a great program of diverting our rivers from northern B.C. and northern Ontario down south, for the purpose of exporting water and selling it to the United States.

They used to have a saying in the army, "If it moves, salute it, and if it does not move, paint it." The Liberals seem to have a slogan, "If it is profitable, export it." They seem to look upon Canada as a great source of raw material, from which we will export pulpwood, oil, minerals, aluminum, gas, electric power and water. Last year we exported nearly 40,000 people to the United States.

I would like to think of Canada, not as a country of only 20 million people, developing extraction industries to sell raw material to the United States where it can be made into manufactured products and shipped back to us, but of Canada some day being a nation of tens of millions of people, using its energy resources, its water resources and its natural resources to develop not only extraction industries but secondary and tertiary industries to retain employment opportunities in this country, and to develop a great nation. No country ever became a great nation by being merely a hewer of wood and a drawer of water.

I must confess that when I listened to the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister this afternoon I was absolutely frightened at the prospect that now, in addition to exporting power and raw materials, we are going to set about exporting the great water resources of our country. Surely we, as Canadians, have got more imagination and a greater sense of reality than to think that the only use that can be made of the resources of the country is to see how quickly we can get rid of them.

I had hoped that the government would give the house the benefit of its ideas with regard to what it was going to do about water conservation and utilization. Up to now we certainly have had no intimation as to what the government's policy is.

I do not join in condemning the government for the fact that it has failed to establish a co-ordinated national water policy and ignored the imminent crisis in water resource management. It has only been in office about a year. These are problems which have gone on for a long time, but I think the house is entitled to a statement from the responsible ministers as to what the government is going to do, in the course of the next few years, about our water resources. I hope they will tell us something better than the statement made this afternoon, that all we can think of doing about our water resources is export them to the United States. The only consoling thing about the statement of the hon. member for Coast-Capilano was what he said about it taking decades of time. The Liberal party always seems to think in geological terms of time, and I think that is why it is moving as slowly as the glaciers.

It probably will not happen quickly, but I seriously ask the government to formulate a policy, because time is important. Already in the great lakes area of southern Ontario water is a problem. On the prairies water is a problem. The prairies have now reached a maximum of agricultural production under dry farming methods. If there is to be increased agricultural production on the prairies more water is a necessity. The big crops of the past two or three years were due to the fact that rain came at the right time. If it were possible on the prairies to have, not irrigation, but a sprinkler system through plastic or aluminum pipes, so that a very small amount of water could be sprinkled on the fields at exactly the right time, production per acre could be increased by five or eight bushels.

Water is vital to the future development of the country. Fortunately we have great resources of water, more water than our friends to the south, and that is why our friends to the south would be very happy to spend a few billion dollars in Canada if they could get access to our water resources. But if we are going to build a country that will have a great future we must plan how to regulate our water resources, how to make water available to the areas that need it, and how to keep free from pollution the great national waters which constitute the life blood of our country and its economy.

I hope the government will not treat this question lightly. I do not offer words of condemnation but I make an urgent appeal to the government to take action very quickly in setting up the kind of machinery by which the provincial governments and the federal government can sit down and plan a water conservation policy, map out the necessary programs, and then find the required financial resources to put those programs into effect.

This country will grow only as fast as it is able to make water available to a growing and expanding economy. I hope the government will rise to the challenge and, if it does, it will have the gratitude of future generations. If it does nothing about it, and we continue to drift, with water levels dropping, with large areas of Canada in a semi-arid condition, then those who come after us will feel we have been very poor trustees of the responsibilities given to us by our forefathers.

Mr. Marcoux: The hon. member has talked about a planned economy. I would like to ask him how socialist planning would prevent the exporting of our wheat and grain to communist China and Russia?

Mr. Douglas: I have never objected to exporting. Any country lives by exporting. There is a great deal of difference between exporting wheat or exporting shoes or lumber on the one hand, and exporting things we need in our own country, such as supplies of water, gas and electric power especially if those resources can be used in Canada to turn our raw materials into finished products. We can turn our raw materials into finished products and export them. I do not quarrel with exporting surplus goods to the United States or any other country; as a matter of fact, we must do that in order to live. But my contention is that for too long Canada has been content to develop extraction industries which give employment to relatively few people per million dollars of capital investment, to ship these raw materials to the United States, to ship to the United States the energy and electric power to turn those raw materials into finished products, and then to buy them back.

I think we could use those same resources in Canada, manufacture the finished product and then export it. What we have been doing, really, is exporting jobs. I think we ought to start exporting finished products or semi-processed products wherever that is possible.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit one further question. I may be mistaken, but I thought I heard him say that P.F.R.A. was introduced under the government of the Right Hon. Mackenzie King. It is my impression, although perhaps I am mistaken, that P.F.R.A., although perhaps under another name, was introduced by the Bennett government.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not make myself clear. The legislation was introduced in the last year the Bennett government was in office, but the administration was set up mainly by the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this opportunity on a supply motion to have the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) select the subject matter for a two-day debate. I think this is one of six supply motions that must come before the house, and it is a very welcome opportunity for some of the members of the opposition, particularly the Leader of the Opposition, to determine what the subject matter for that two-day debate shall be. Having said that, it seems to me they have successfully moved an amendment pointing to a very serious problem in Canada and then the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) have proceeded to actually condemn the administration that was set up under their own government during the years in which they had the power to do something about the problem raised in the amendment.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, because the third point they raise in the amendment is this:

> —vigorously continuing and expanding the water and other resource development programs conceived and established by the previous Conservative government.

If there had been resource development programs actually established and under way to retain the water levels in the great lakes, I suggest that the first part of their amendment would not be valid. That is to say, they condemn the government of today for "ignoring the imminent national crisis in water resources management, which is evidenced by the critical low water levels of the great lakes"; and surely no reasonable member would suggest that the critical low levels of water in the great lakes today is something that has happened in the last few months. Surely if there had been satisfactory programs established such as the amendment says, this problem would not have been before us today. I join with the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) in suggesting that these problems which are facing Canada today, and which are accurately described, I think, as amounting to an "imminent national crisis in water resources management", are something for which the immediately preceding government will have to shoulder the blame as well as the present government.

Getting back to the question of water, Mr. Speaker, and the preservation and conservation of our water resources, I think it is well for us to consider the position of Canada today in relation to the water resources that we have, and also to rely on some of the experiences other nations have had, so that we can in fact look into the future and develop programs that will help Canada to avoid these other problems. I think that one of the first requirements in developing a national water resources program is to accept the statement that was made by Kenneth Holum, assistant secretary of the interior for water and power in the United States. He says this:

Experts estimate that our needs for water will triple by the year 2000.

This is the United States. Then he goes on to say this:

One thing, however, that there would be no more of, is water. The aggregate amount of water in the rivers, streams and lakes, in the underground aquifers, in the clouds floating across the skies, and in the seas and oceans would be substantially the same as it is today.

That is in the year 2000. Then he says:

We can't produce more water. Our job is to use what we have. We have to learn to use the water we are wasting, and to use it over and over and over again. We must do a better job of maintaining quality, so that water can be reused, and improve the quality of poor water so that it is usable.

The United States have come to some pretty agonizing conclusions respecting this matter of using the water which they have, and it is interesting to note the price that they put on water today. For example, in the issue of the Christian Science Monitor of March 18, 1964, there is an article captioned "Water for everyone" which says this:

The problem is that nature's water system just doesn't coincide with human requirements, says a world famous geophysicist as he describes the research frontiers this presents in the last of ten articles on "on the water challenge passed by growing water needs of the United States.

In this article he quotes Nathaniel Wollman of the University of New Mexico and says:

Nathaniel Wollman...has concluded that the money worth of water in the United States adds up like this:

This is all over the United States:

Industry—$3,000 to $4,000 per acre-foot.
Recreation—$250 per acre-foot.
Agriculture—$51 per acre-foot.

If you compare that with some of the water resources that are available in Canada today, it certainly points up the fact that we had better look after these resources now.

During the course of the debate which took place in this house on March 5 mention was made of a report of a study made by the engineering firm of Crippen-Wright. I think this survey and report was paid for by the government of Saskatchewan and it dealt with the cost of diverting some of the water now running into the Arctic ocean and Hudson bay from the southern prairies. It was pointed out that to divert water from the North Saskatchewan river and the Clearwater river into the South Saskatchewan river through the Red Deer river would cost about 40 cents per acre foot. Compare that, Mr. Speaker, with the value which the United States puts on water of $51 per acre foot. In addition to that, there was a second possible diversion, which was to divert the Athabasca into the North Saskatchewan, and I think subsequently into the South Saskatchewan as well through the Red Deer river, at a cost of $1.60 per acre foot, making available 4,500,000 acre feet. A third possible diversion was from the Peace river into the North Saskatchewan which would allow 19 million acre feet to be developed at a cost of $2.70 per acre foot. Then there was a fourth possible diversion from the upper Fraser into the Athabasca at a cost of $3.10 per acre foot, making available for development 1,090,000 acre feet. The fifth in order of cost was the possibility of diverting 5,430,000 acre feet from the Columbia at a cost of $4.60 per acre foot.

Mr. Douglas: That is the gross cost?

Mr. Olson: Yes, gross cost, that is correct. One other very important program in Canada which could be undertaken and which has not yet been touched, and which I suggest is cheaper than any of the diversions referred to in the report I mentioned, is the building of upper level storage on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. Outside of some very small reservoirs on the Bow river there are no dams and no storage facilities provided in the upper regions of any of our rivers coming through the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. I know that shortly there will be in the Peace river dam, but on the tributaries of the North Saskatchewan river and on the South Saskatchewan river there are, outside of the Bow river, absolutely no storage facilities or what is called upper storage. There are sites which I think are reasonably cheap in terms of cost and development, at which large storage facilities could be built at a cost of even less than 40 cents per acre foot, which is the cheapest of the diversions to which I referred.

We in southern Alberta have had quite a lot of experience with irrigation. I think that today most of the irrigation projects in western Canada which have been undertaken —that is, the major irrigation projects—are in fact located in southern Alberta. We know there are times, such as in May and June when there are large flows of water, when we simply have to let this water go by because we do not have any storage facilities to contain it. This water is water which flows naturally into river basins without diversion of any sort. We also know that it is impossible for us to divert into irrigation reservoirs even 10 per cent of this water when it goes by in the months of May and June during the high run-off period.

Therefore I want to put this very positive proposal to the government. I suggest that one of the first undertakings with regard to water conservation should be the large scale development of upper storage on the eastern slopes of the Rocky mountains. I say that because whenever water is stored at its highest position it is obvious that everyone downstream can make optimum use of that water for all purposes. It can be used for irrigation; by municipalities which rely on these rivers for water, as well as providing a uniform flow of water for hydroelectric generation. In my opinion that is the most important project which should be the first to be undertaken.

Following that consideration should be given to some of these diversions of water into areas which require it. However, it appears to me that it will be 40, 50 or perhaps 60 years before we will be able to utilize all of the natural flow which runs down the South Saskatchewan river even now. This water will have to be conserved on a 12-month basis, because something like seven million acre feet of water flows annually down that river at the present time. I am not quite sure of those figures but I think that more than four fifths of that water escapes us during the high flow season when we simply do not have the storage to make use of it.

If I may turn for a moment to the question of the utilization of this water, I want to say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), and to other hon. members who may think that building a large irrigation system and building large structures necessary to deliver the water to the land means that you have reached the point where you are going to have a lot of prosperous farmers, that we have found over the years that we run into very serious difficulties, particularly during the first 20 or 25 years, in getting farmers to make proper use of this water. As far as their growing grain, cereals and other crops is concerned, compared with the lower cost of operation of dry land farming they have felt that these units are economic failures. The day may come 50 or 60 years from now when the value of cereal grains and the market for cereal grains will be such that they can be successfully and profitably grown on acres which are under the ditch. But that is not true today. We know there are crops which can be grown successfully and profitably, such as sugar beets, vegetable crops and a certain amount of beef and dairy production, in irrigated areas of southern Alberta. There are some very serious problems, however, in the marketing of these crops which have not as yet been fully resolved. I think there is a very real case for both the federal government and the provincial governments to set up some kind of processing and marketing facilities for these crops in the initial stages. We know, for example, that into Alberta today thousands of carloads of fresh vegetables are imported, mostly from the United States, which could be grown right in southern Alberta. We know there is more than one reason why this would be beneficial. For example, there is our international balance of payments which keeps cropping up as a problem. I suggest there are millions of dollars worth of these crops we could grow right at home if we only had the processing and distributing facilities available to us.

This is not an easy matter. It is difficult to get anyone to invest money in processing plants and distribution channels until there are a relatively large number of farmers in the area successfully growing the crops which it is intended should be produced on a larger scale. On the other hand, it is difficult to get farmers to begin to grow some of these crops and to gain experience unless there is a processing plant and a market available so that the work is profitable. I think the solution is to have producers co-operative enterprises underwritten by financing from both levels of government.

In addition, there is a very real need for a national sugar policy which would put some kind of stability into sugar prices both for the benefit of the consumer and the producer. We know that during the last two years or so sugar prices have been very high. In my opinion they have been too high. The sugar beet producers in my constituency agree that the price does not need to be as high as it is today. If they could be given some assurance that there would be a long term price guarantee in exchange for lowering the price a little now, they would be very happy to accept this.

I believe the government has been offered sugar on a long term basis at a price substantially less than Canada is paying today. All the government needs to do to take advantage of this is to commit Canada to buying the sugar over a period of seven or eight years into the future. This, in my view, would have a doubly beneficial effect. It would lead to an immediate reduction in the price of sugar to Canadian consumers and, second, it would provide that long term stability for which the beet producers have been asking for years. I hope that when we consider the better utilization and conservation of water we will also remember that these other problems of marketing and processing exist, and that it is the business of government not only to set up the capital works in the first instance but to follow through with some kind of assistance; and I suggest some kind of financial underwriting of these establishments would be the most useful, so as to see we make the optimum use of this water when it comes.

There is one other matter I wish to deal with and it relates to the subject of ARDA, which is dealt with both in the amendment and in the subamendment. There is another vitally important water resource which has been barely touched in Canada, namely groundwater reserves. As hon. members who are interested in this subject know, the Alberta research council has been doing a great deal of work to find the extent of our groundwater reserves and has been successful in finding some aquifers. There is an important one running right into Medicine Hat and I am told there is an enormous one going across Montana into Saskatchewan—it is probably the old river bed of the Missouri river. I do not know that this ground water reserve has been completely delineated and I suggest there is some important work which could be done in drilling of the area to find out where this reserve runs, to mark its edges and to determine its capacity. It is of particular importance this summer because in southern Alberta and southwestern Saskatchewan the traditional source of water from the spring run-off has been almost non-existent as far as surface water for stock watering is concerned. I think that under P.F.R.A., or under the auspices of any other government agency, such as ARDA, there is a very real need to do further work to locate the groundwater resources we have. It would make it much easier for farmers to drill wells if they had a reasonable assurance that they were likely to find water at certain levels.

I think it is a good idea for us to have taken part in such a debate as this. It seems to me there is general agreement in all political parties that some discussion on water resource management is needed. But I do not believe we can lay all the blame on the present government for the particular difficulties we are experiencing at the moment.

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I listened with interest this evening to the observations of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) and also to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) who, in analysing the water resource policy of this country, thought it well to say that the erosion of generations could not be laid at the door of a government which has been in office for just over 12 months, and that the responsibility for water management in Canada, although subject, quite properly, to review in this house from time to time, is not a matter upon which condemnation ought to be levelled against the present government.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment is phrased as an attempt to hold the present administration responsible for the work of generations. When one reads it, it becomes evident that it attempts to hold a government which has been in office for 12 months responsible for low water levels on the great lakes, although any student of the situation or any reasonable citizen of Canada will realize readily that this is a cyclical process dependant on factors altogether outside the scope of any particular administration in the short term.

Mr. Smith: What about dredging?

Mr. Turner: I would say that this afternoon the official opposition certainly had to dredge up a pretty weak argument—

Mr. Smith: Just dredge our harbours.

Mr. Turner: —and muddy the waters, if I may say so, in an attempt to find some subject on which to criticize this administration. So far as water levels are concerned, and the cyclical trend, I will cite figures later to show that this has been a gradual process.

Let us look at the second subject, pollution. I might say that no steps of any consequence were taken by the previous administration with regard to pollution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Turner: I see there is a lively reaction on the other side. The first concrete step that was taken was the reference earlier this spring, as the result of a debate held in this chamber on March 9, of the matter of pollution to the 10 provincial ministers of natural resources by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing), so that the Canadian council of resource ministers could make a study of this problem.

I have mentioned the first two headings under which the government is being criticized, low water levels and increasing pollution, and the third heading is the conservation of water. At the outset I should like to draw to the attention of the house that the first legislation enacted in this country, involving the various provincial, municipal, regional and federal bodies having jurisdiction over the water resources of the country, was the Canada Water Conservation Act which was enacted on the 14th of May, 1953 under the former Liberal administration.

I cite this history, Mr. Speaker, because in listening to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) it was hard to divine just what he was criticizing the government for. He began by talking about what he called the long years of neglect, and we wondered for a moment whether we were being criticized in this amendment to a supply motion in May, 1964, for what had happened prior to 1957. It was quite coincidental, I am sure, that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who after all should know the facts and should know better since he once held the national resources portfolio, did not cite any facts with which to back up his argument. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the facts prior to 1957 do not bear the type of scrutiny that he avoided.

What were the facts? I have cited the Canada Water Conservation Act of 1953, the first conservation act passed by a federal parliament. Prior to 1957 there were agreements made with Ontario concerning the Shand dam, the Fanshaw dam and the Luther marsh dam.

Mr. Nielsen: For the Saskatchewan dam?

Mr. Turner: My friend knows his geography better than that. One of my confreres suggests to me that in the circumstances perhaps I am being a little generous in making that remark. In any event, the policy initiated by the government prior to 1957 was continued by the previous Conservative administration, but only in 1961. It was four years before another agreement was signed. The upper Thames conservation authority agreement was signed in 1961 and the same year the metro Toronto and region conservation authority and the Parkhill dam project were initiated.

Mr. Alkenbrack: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has either inadvertently or purposely left out the agreement in 1957 concerning the Napanee river conservation authority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I have to advise the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox that there is no point of order.

Mr. Turner: I was citing a particular piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, and I doubt whether the learned member opposite could fit the particular project he has in mind into the particular piece of legislation I was citing.

Mr. Alkenbrack: On a point of order, the conservation authority signed an agreement with the Ontario department of development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Alkenbrack: It is the same category.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): I should point out to the hon. member and to the house that if the hon. member disagrees with anything the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is now saying, he has the opportunity of refuting it when he rises to speak but his objection to anything the hon. member is saying now constitutes neither a point of privilege nor a point of order. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

[Mr. Turner.]

Mr. Turner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Subsequent to April 8, 1963, under legislation to which I have been referring we have under negotiation Fraser river diking at an estimated cost of close to $5 million. If I may turn to other legislation prior to 1957, the Red river basin investigation was started in 1950 and completed in 1953 at which time the federal government prepared, as the house well knows, comprehensive plans for flood control. I would also recall to the house the lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba board, the purpose of which was to study the resources of water flowing into and out of lakes Winnipeg and Manitoba. This study was initiated in 1956 and the reports were submitted in 1958.

Then there is the Fraser river board which was established in 1949, reconstituted in 1955 and directed to report its findings with respect to the effective regulation of that great river for flood control and power generation, and the resultant effects on fisheries, navigation, silting, erosion and irrigation. This is my answer to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris who said that in the matter of the control, management and conservation of water resources there had been long years of neglect.

Then he went on to say that he wished to criticize the present government for the slowing down of momentum. He referred to it as a tragic loss of momentum and said that there had been no new initiative in the area of renewable resources. Let us look for a moment at the momentum which existed, if it did, in the years 1957 to 1963.

Mr. Nielsen: Did it ever.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I hear the voice of that speedy Gonzales from the north. When he is not flying home he is flying by the seat of the pants in the house.

Mr. Nielsen: It is better than flying blind.

Mr. Turner: What were the facts between 1957 and 1963? The hon. member for Brandon-Souris said he did not want to go into details, and I do not blame him at all. He mentioned the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in Winnipeg in 1958. What happened after that speech? There were three silent years. Finally, in October, 1961 there was the resources for tomorrow conference, which was a considerable achievement. But where was that momentum?

What explains that three year vacuum between that great speech at Winnipeg and the conference that was finally held in 1961? If that is the record we are supposed to emulate I can say with some confidence now that we have no fear that record will be surpassed under this administration. The previous administration, if this is moving with deliberate speed, waited until October 1961 before it finally established the Canadian council of resource ministers, and a plenary meeting was held in September of the next year. There was a four and a half year period that elapsed before the first plenary meeting of the resource ministers council which was forecast in Winnipeg, that central point in our confederation. If that is the type of speed we are being asked to emulate, again I think I can say on behalf of those on this side that we have no fear of being able to equal or surpass that type of record.

When this administration took over, there was just the shell of a program. The first meeting of any consequence was held last fall, on November 20 and 21. For the first time the ten provincial ministers of natural resources and the federal minister of resources met under the chairmanship of the minister from Quebec, the Hon. René Lévesque—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Turner: —who, I might say, was a very able chairman indeed. For the first time some substance was given to this organization. As a result of these meetings all the present resource agreements between the provinces, and between the provinces and the federal government are being looked into by a permanent secretariat. The secretariat was set up by this administration, after four long years of waiting, following that great speech in Winnipeg. There was nothing but an idea, virtually nothing but a vision for four and a half years under the previous administration, and this project was finally put into action by this administration.

As I say, currently the renewable resource agreements between the provinces themselves, and the provinces and the federal government are being reviewed by this permanent secretariat which was set up by this government. There is being undertaken, under the jurisdiction of this national council of Canadian resource ministers, a review of the existing wildlife and fisheries agreements of this country. There is being undertaken an assessment of the ARDA program so that there can be a full discussion of the adequacy or otherwise of the ARDA projects at the next plenary meeting of the council this June in Prince Edward Island. Participation and planning of Canada's part in the international hydrologic decade was approved by this council last November. Preliminary work is now under way in connection with further important aspects of water conservation and water resources, among which I have already mentioned pollution. Now, this being so in so far as federal-provincial resource management of renewable resource development is concerned, this administration has nothing of which to be ashamed. On the contrary, within the last seven or eight months, the Canadian council of resource ministers has begun to function as a permanent body with a full time secretariat with projects which it can accomplish and which should be a credit to the country.

Let me say that I listened with great interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) whose efforts must have exhausted him. He spoke about co-operative federalism. He accused some of us of smiling. Perhaps there were some of us who were thinking of that great project of co-operative federalism in the area of water resources undertaken during the term of the administration which he was so bravely defending, the Columbia river treaty. He talked about the necessity for consultation between the federal and provincial governments. Here we have a treaty signed with great ceremony in November of 1961 and, lo and behold, someone came to the realization that the provincial jurisdiction over the resource, the entity whose water it was and the people who had the primary access and right to that water, had not given any agreement to what had been transacted by the federal government.

If this is an example of the co-operative federalism which the hon. member from Brome-Missisquoi had in mind, of course we had occasion to smile. Surely no greater example has been given to us in the history of the federal process as it deals with the resources of this country of a lack of proper consultation, of a lack of proper agreement, than the failure of the last administration to take the province of British Columbia into its confidence before signing an international treaty.

Without the protocol, Mr. Speaker, without the sales agreement, British Columbia would not have participated. It was through the efforts of this government and the negotiating team led by the minister of external affairs in this administration that what was once a hopeless morass, became something fulfilled, something truly co-operative.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said he was frightened by what the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis) had said. He outlined an argument he has used before, as has his seatmate tonight, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge).

Mr. Herridge: Because they are unanswerable.

Mr. Turner: Unanswerable?—they have been answered for five weeks in the committee on external affairs.

Mr. Herridge: By whom?

Mr. Turner: It is strange, you know, that a party that prides itself upon its imagination should really be so reactionary, so frightened, about dealing in Canada's natural resources and dealing with the future of this country. It is possible today to divert one watershed into another. Modern engineering has given scope to this country and utilization of its greatest natural resources for the benefit of all the people of Canada. Does he not realize, Mr. Speaker, that given the engineering feasibility, at any point in time, any kind of engineering solution can become economically practicable, and Canada has unlimited horizons, unlimited possibilities to develop its natural resources?

I am turning now, if I may—

Mr. Douglas: When did you change your mind about the Columbia?

Mr. Turner: I always had my mind made up about that particular treaty, when properly negotiated.

An hon. Member: Like the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Turner: There was a parks policy mentioned this afternoon. Let me say to the house that for the first time, on November 18 to November 20, a federal parks conference met not merely at the technical level as had occurred under the previous administration, but at the technical and ministerial level, so that for the first time there was an opportunity to combine technical management and policy. I might say that as a result of that conference in November this country can now look forward to a review and a development of certain of the important aspects of our parklands. At that meeting there was discussed the assessment of non-urban parklands, the factors relating to the selection of parklands, the relationship between provincial lands and national parks, park planning and design, and zoning as a step in the over-all planning of large parks. Finally, in co-operation with the ten provincial jurisdictions and the federal government, we have a co-ordinated parks policy.

Mr. Nielsen: What about the territories?

Mr. Turner: I would not, of course, overlook the territories and I think the learned member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will quite realize that, but for the moment I think the general term federal be wide enough to encompass the lands he has described.

Nothing could be more important to this country than water. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) was citing water levels to the house and was trying to relate them in terms of a recent change in climatic and geographical conditions to the responsibilities of the government. I want to read into the record the water levels for lake Huron during the last four years, all taken during the month of March. The long term average level over the period from 1860 to 1963 was 578.36 feet above sea level. In March 1961 the level of lake Huron, below that average level, was 0.53 feet; in March 1962 it was 1.02 feet; in 1963 it was 2.11 feet and in March of this year it was 2.97 feet.

I am citing these figures to illustrate that this trend or cycle in water levels had begun as early as March 1961, and was part of a long term cycle that has been prevalent in Canada over the years. Let me now deal with the annual outflows from lake Huron. The long term average over the same years was 189,000 cubic feet per second, or 11.6 inches of the drainage basin. In 1961 the annual outflow was 182,000 cubic feet per second; in 1962 it was 177,000 cubic feet per second and in 1963 it was 163,000 cubic feet per second, so that the trend as long ago as three or four years, was the same trend that we are experiencing today.

I now wish to emphasize to the house that the outflow from lake Huron has decreased in relation to the increase in water levels. To make the figures clear, I have to set out the annual inflows into lakes Michigan and Huron, where the long term average has been 189,000 cubic feet per second. In 1961 the inflow was 165,000 cubic feet per second; in 1962 it was 149,000 cubic feet per second, and in 1963 it was 153,000 cubic feet per second, so that the inflow below normal of a small amount has a large effect on the lake levels, because the level also of the drainage basin was lowered from the long term average of 11.6 inches to 10.6 inches in 1961, 9.1 inches in 1962 and 9.4 inches in 1963. Here again the trend has not been a sudden one. The trend was something that was foreseeable, something which has been a gradual process.

This government is conscious of the value of water, and tomorrow we hope to illustrate to the house what its policy is with respect to its management as a resource. It is not merely a question of level; it is a question of the interaction of all the interrelated resources. It has to do with the run-off from timber lands, the run-off from cultivated rural areas, the increased consumption of water, and precipitation. It has to do with a number of interrelated factors which are all brought together to an end result, so that any water policy must take into account not only the present yield and profit of water but also the inventory and the deferred benefits.

We will suggest to the house that in a well managed watershed we need an interrelation of forest policy, of agrarian farm policy, of preventives against erosion, against the waste of soil, control of industrial use and of sewage in order to control pollution, together with a fire prevention policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before I yield the floor to the hour this evening may I say that I feel the official opposition in presenting this motion and in trying to attribute water levels, that have been developing in cycles, to the actions of this administration is merely indulging in a partisan manoeuvre. The management of our water resources is something in which we are all vitally interested as Canadians, and the official opposition is trying to convert this problem into a trumped up motion of want of confidence.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I would like to ask the acting house leader if he can forecast the business for Wednesday and the rest of the week?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday we will take the final budget resolution, namely the Estate Tax Act resolution. When that is completed we will take the second reading of Bill No. C-92, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, then the resolution to set up the special committee on defence matters, and finally the second reading of Bill No. C-90, an act to amend the National Defence Act.

Mr. Churchill: What about Friday?

Mr. MacNaught: I cannot forecast Friday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with provisional standing order 39A, a motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that this house do now adjourn. The hon. member for Queens.

POWER—PASSAMAQUODDY—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question upon which I would like to spend much time. It is a question of great concern to the Atlantic region, a region which is greatly needing those factors of industrial growth which have brought prosperity to other parts of the country. We are greatly concerned about these matters in the Atlantic region because, according to the latest returns, 13 per cent of our employable population is unemployed.

We in the maritimes, and this is not confined to New Brunswick alone, have been much interested in the prospect of the great potential development of the Passamaquoddy power project. We feel that this might be an important and major device which would assist us to help ourselves economically, along with those other great projects which I could list in order of priority as the causeway, the corridor road and the Chignecto development.

This Passamaquoddy development should concern all of us in this national parliament. I have been wondering in recent months whether the government of the nation is in fact as concerned as it should be about this important matter. I have read what Premier Robichaud has said; I have read what the leader of the opposition, Mr. Sherwood, has said; and we all know, thanks to his brilliant head and fine mind, what Brigadier Wardell thinks. We know how he has galvanized the interest of the maritime provinces in this matter as well as in other laudable projects. We in the maritimes, who have lost so many brains, have finally received one from another area. Brigadier Wardell is in the foremost category of such persons and he has become a tribune of the maritimes.

We are interested, too, in the tremendous concern which the United States, at the congressional level and at the state level has in this project. The executive level and the state of Maine have shown they are tremendously interested. Their government has moved motions to have something done about the Passamaquoddy. We ask, what is the government of Canada doing; what is it thinking? I looked and listened the other day when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) reported on the Canada-United States meeting. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, with all his many virtues, is not one given to laconic brevity, but out of his fulsome report we found only this: "We heard from the United States their ideas on the possible development of Passamaquoddy tidal power." I ask, Mr. Speaker, for some of the ideas of the present government on this hopeful, important, tremendous potential development of the Passamaquoddy.

Is the dominion government interested? What steps will it take, other than listening to the suggestions of the United States, which is apparently prepared to extend tremendous amounts of money to provide for us power at cheaper rates than we have ever had vouchsafed to us before. I hope that the dominion government—and we have some ministers from the maritimes—will be able to tell us that Canada is at least as interested as the United States; that they will listen to their colleague Premier Robichaud, who on this matter is very perceptive, very persuasive, and will bend their energies in this direction. We would like to know, what is the concern of the Minister of Fisheries in this regard. "Passamaquoddy" is an Indian world meaning bay of pollock. Perhaps it is sardines rather than pollock.

What is the reason for seemingly so little interest? I will not even take up all my seven minutes, Mr. Speaker, because I am solicitous of the Minister of Fisheries. I want him to tell us, in the most fulsome way possible, what this government is doing about this particular matter. In the maritimes we had new hope for six years; we found many things that were long neglected were being looked after. We do not want the clock turned back. We do not want the continuation of that neglect which all of us regretted so much in our hearts and souls for a good many years.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to reply to the hon. member with regard to a question which I was prevented from replying to, through no fault of mine, on Thursday last. I agree with the hon. member that we in the maritimes are much interested in the development of the Passamaquoddy project, and I want to assure the hon. member that the government of this country is interested in any project that will benefit the maritimes. He has asked, what is the government of Canada doing? I answered that question which was directed to me on Friday last and which is reported at page 2830 of Hansard. The question was asked by the hon. member for Saint John-Albert (Mr. Bell). As I said, I met with the secretary of the interior, Mr. Udall. We discussed the Passamaquoddy project, particularly its implications on the fisheries of the bay of Fundy if such a project were carried on by the United States government. I want to assure the hon. member that no definite commitment has been made to the government of this country by the government of the United States regarding the Passamaquoddy project. Meetings have been held but they have been exploratory.

I want to assure the hon. member that if a decision is reached to proceed with the project we will see to it that a full study is made as to the effects it will have on the fishing industry. I know that during the last six years the maritimes have had new hopes. But the maritimes cannot live on hopes alone, and in the years to come they will have action.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—BENEFITS TO CANADIAN WORKERS IN STATE OF MAINE

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-André Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, the point I wish to deal with tonight has been raised on several instances in the house. It has to do with the unemployment insurance of Canadian lumbermen who go to work in the state of Maine.

Indeed, the question has been brought up here for more than ten years, and very seldom has a minister of labour been able to give a satisfactory reply.

The delay in solving this problem is rather hard to understand, considering that the two governments involved get along so well together when it comes to signing an agreement on nuclear arms or sending troops to a foreign land. This goodwill between them should not keep them in the clouds; they should come down to earth and realize that the thousands of people who live near the Canada-United States border wish to see their problems solved satisfactorily as soon as possible.

Agreements have been signed between Canada and 46 American states so that Canadians and Americans who go and work across the border are still entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. Only four states, namely Maine, New Hampshire and two others, have not yet come to terms with Canada in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the reasons why such an agreement cannot be reached with the state of Maine in favour of the lumbermen who go over there to work.

I would like the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) to tell us, on behalf of the government, the reasons why an agreement cannot be reached with the state of Maine concerning Canadian lumbermen.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, a simple exchange of correspondence between that state and the Canadian government is not good enough to settle that ticklish problem and, futhermore, I do not know whether serious meetings have been held between officials of that state and the Canadian government. I would like to obtain information in respect of meetings which may have been held between the authorities concerned, and if no negotiations have been undertaken I would ask the Minister of Labour to negotiate an agreement with the state of Maine on behalf of the Canadian government.

I hope the Minister of Labour will permit me to offer him a solution to that serious problem. Could he not include in the Unemployment Insurance Act a provision whereby any lumberman going into a neighbouring state, especially Maine, to work at his trade would be eligible to receive unemployment insurance benefits upon his return.

In my opinion the lack of an agreement to this effect between the state of Maine and the Canadian government constitutes a burden for the latter, since a growing number of bush workers have stopped going to the United States because they find that, when they come back to Canada after working over there five or six months, they are unable to get unemployment insurance benefits. We find such cases especially in my riding and in the neighbouring constituencies of Beauce, Lotbinière and Bellechasse, where more and more bush workers are unemployed.

The minister is a very hard worker who wants to reduce unemployment and help the jobless in Canada.

Therefore, I wish he would tell me what obstacles stand in the way of such an agreement between the Canadian government and the state of Maine in particular.

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): In the short moments at my disposal I should try to give the hon. member the information he desires in this connection. There is no lack of desire on the part of the Canadian government or of the unemployment insurance commission to enter into a reciprocal arrangement with the state of Maine. Negotiations between the commission and the state of Maine on this problem have continued for a period of 18 years, and shortly after I became the Minister of Labour I discovered that in all those years the state of Maine had said neither no nor yes to the proposals which had been made by successive Canadian governments.

I undertook last September to go down to the capital of Maine where I met with the governor and the head of the employment security commission, and put forward as forcibly as I could the strong reasons why Maine ought to agree to an arrangement of this sort between herself and Canada. The assurance I received was that Maine would give a definite answer. Five or six weeks later the chief commissioner received a letter stating that Maine would not enter into this kind of reciprocal arrangement.

The hon. member will understand the reasons for this refusal; they are understandable if not commendable. Because of the experience-rating system operative in the state of Maine under the employment security arrangements, the less employment prevailing in any industry the smaller the rate of contribution by the employer, who is the exclusive contributor to the unemployment insurance fund. This constitutes a vested interest in denying coverage for Canadian workers who would otherwise enjoy the benefits of unemployment insurance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the minister, whose time has expired.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—BRITISH COLUMBIA—CLOSING OF MILLER BAY HOSPITAL

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Knowing that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in hospital I should like to wish her a speedy recovery. I hope she overcomes her difficulties as quickly as possible.

The royal commission on government organization, commonly known as the Glassco commission, made the following recommendation in one of its reports, with respect to Indian health services. I should like to quote from page 201 of the third volume of the report which advises—> —that a positive program be developed for the more rapid transfer of Indian health care to normal community facilities in populated areas of the provinces.

Because of this and because of the government's decision with respect to veterans hospitals I raised this matter by way of a question to the minister on the 30th of March and I got the answer that there was to be no change, and that there would have been an announcement if there was going to be a change. Subsequently I received a copy of the local newspaper, the Prince Rupert News. It contained an article quoting the speaker of the provincial legislature and a reference by him to the minister of health of British Columbia. The effect of the article was that the Miller Bay hospital, which comes under the jurisdiction of the federal department, was to be closed.

Based upon that report I asked another question. Finally, on the 13th of April I received a lengthy, detailed answer read by the parliamentary secretary to the effect that the Miller Bay hospital would be closed at some time in the future as a hospital for the treatment of tubercular cases and as a hospital for general care purposes, but that no time limit had been established. I posed a supplementary question and got an answer by way of a letter which I think should be put on the record because it should have been put on Hansard in the first place. The letter is dated April 16, 1964. It is from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), and the relevant part reads as follows:

> Any special grant made on behalf of the Indian population would have to be the subject of a request from the Prince Rupert general hospital and would be dealt with on its merits when costs involved were presented to the department.

Because of the implications of that letter I think it should be on Hansard so that the general public, and particularly the people involved in Prince Rupert, will be able to see it. There are reports circulating in Prince Rupert and in the Miller Bay hospital at the present time, which reached their peak a day or two ago, to the effect that the Miller Bay hospital is to be reduced from its present 187 bed capacity to only 14 beds by the end of 1965, and there are also rumours that it will be closing shortly thereafter. But nowhere has there been any official declaration that this is not to be the case. Consequently there is great concern.

This is a very serious matter, Mr. Speaker, because the hospital is the only one of its sort in northern British Columbia. Between five and ten thousand native Indian people are involved, and in my opinion the government should make a statement of policy about its intentions not only with respect to the Miller Bay hospital specifically but with respect to all the hospitals which come under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. We would welcome such a statement so that everybody will know where they stand. I would ask the government to keep in mind that the minister herself had no difficulty in getting into a hospital, but if the Miller Bay hospital happens to close many native Indian people in northern British Columbia who may want to get into a hospital will not be able to because the facilities will not be there.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would point out to the hon. hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) that in the answer to his question given on April 13 last it was pointed out that this hospital was originally to service tubercular Indians, and the case load of tubercular Indians has been reduced to such an extent that the hospital has been gradually converted to a general hospital. In the answer it was also pointed out that the hospital was not going to be phased out, so far as use by the Indians in the area is concerned, until such time as the Prince Rupert general hospital had adequate beds available for the Indians. The reason given for even contemplating the phasing out of the hospital at Miller Bay was that it was of old wartime construction, was not an adequate facility, nor by implication safe.

I am sure that the department is concerned, as a result of the hon. member's representation, that the Indians have proper medical care. However, I do not see anything in the answer which is indicative of the policy of the department which should unduly disturb either the hon. member or the Indian, because it is clearly stated there is no intention of closing out the hospital. I do not believe we should be too concerned about rumours the hon. member may have heard, since there is no intention of closing out the hospital until adequate facilities at the Prince Rupert general hospital are available to take care of the Indian.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MARCOUX—STATEMENT BY JUSTICE MINISTER RESPECTING JULES SIOUI

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

As related on page 2761 of Hansard, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), in reply to a question put by the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) concerning the Indian chief Jules Sioui, answered:

Mr. Speaker, I asked to be informed on the case of Jules Sioui who has been in jail for almost a year and I realized, just by looking at the record, that this case was never submitted to my department.

In all fairness to the Department of Justice and for those who dealt with the case, I must inform the house that I myself instituted proceedings to have Jules Sioui released.

I do not want to insinuate that the minister knowingly misled the house, but I think he was misinformed by his own officials, so that the answer he gave on April 30 last was wrong.

In order to clear up any misunderstanding, I shall read the correspondence I had with the former minister of justice, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, and with the attorney general for the province of Quebec, Hon. Georges-Émile Lapalme.

On June 10, 1963, I wrote the following letter to Mr. Chevrier:

Dear Mr. Chevrier:

On May 10, 1963, Mr. Jules Sioui, an Indian of the Huron reserve, was sentenced to a month in jail for having "maculated electoral lists" placed on the reserve.

And at this stage I should like to inform the house that the Indian reserve is located in my riding. I continue:

The jury had then asked for the leniency of Justice Gérard Lacroix.

Immediately after the sentence, Mr. Sioui expressed his wish to appeal from the judge's decision. He then had to sign a bail enabling him to prepare his new trial before the court of appeals. But almost immediately, a justice employee tore up the signed document.

At the termination of the jail term, on June 6, Mrs. Jules Sioui—a 75 year old woman—went to meet her husband at the Quebec jail. A jail officer then told her that Mr. Sioui had to post a bond to keep the peace for a period of 18 months. The sentencing document was shown to her.

Mrs. Sioui noticed that the characters in which the mention of bail was written were different from those which had been used for the original sentence.

Mr. Sioui, who was surprised by that addition, refused to sign the document. He has been kept in prison ever since.

And, which is a fact worth mentioning, the letter is dated June 10, 1963. I go on with the letter:

We maintain that he is now illegally detained in the Quebec jail.

I therefore respectfully submit that a request for the immediate liberation of Mr. Jules Sioui is under your jurisdiction.

I trust that your intervention will ensue at the earliest opportunity and remain, sir, yours very truly.

(Signed) Guy Marcoux
Member for Quebec-Montmorency

On June 26, 1963, I received from the minister of justice, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, the following letter:

Dear Mr. Marcoux:

I thank you for your letter of June 10 last concerning Mr. Jules Sioui, an Indian from the Huron reserve, near Quebec, who was recently sentenced to a month's imprisonment, after having being convicted of smearing up election lists. The chief electoral officer, as well as the lawyer he appointed to conduct the preliminary inquiry in the Sioui case, informed us that they had not been aware of the developments mentioned in your letter. On the other hand, I should tell you that when the Sioui case came up for trial, it was in the hands of one of the substitutes of the attorney general for Quebec.

On the other hand, the employees of the various courts of justice are under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Quebec and the contents of your letter lead me to believe that this is a matter which comes under the jurisdiction of the attorney general of Quebec.

Consequently, and again according to the purport of your letter, it seems to be a case in which my jurisdiction does not entitle me to intervene.

I remain, dear Mr. Marcoux, yours very truly,
Lionel Chevrier.

On July 5, 1963, I wrote a letter to the attorney general of the province of Quebec from which I shall read only a few excerpts:

Moreover, I approached the chief electoral officer of Canada, who confirmed the text of the sentence and the fact that the matter was under your own jurisdiction. (He wonders why it should be so.)

I ended my letter in saying:

I respectfully submit, therefore, that it seems obvious that Mr. Sioui is now being illegally confined to the Quebec jail and that you alone can order his immediate release.

Question of Privilege

On July 15, 1963, Mr. Speaker, I had to write once again to the attorney general of the province of Quebec, since I had not received any reply to my letter of July 5. I shall spare the house the reading of that last letter.

On July 16, 1963, I received a letter from the assistant deputy attorney general of the province of Quebec concerning file No. 23233-63, in which it was written:

As you mentioned in your letter, on May 10, 1963, Jules Sioui was sentenced to a month in jail for an offence against section 72 of the Canada Elections Act. In addition, he was ordered by the court to provide a $500 bond as a guarantee that he would keep the peace for 18 months.

The judgment passed by Justice Gérard Lacroix stipulates that this $500 bond is to be signed at the expiration of the sentence and that Jules Sioui must not be released until it has been signed.

We are informed by the prison authorities that Sioui refuses to sign the bond on the grounds that he would be submitting to federal authority if he did.

P. Frenette
Assistant Deputy Attorney General

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, that is quite a complicated matter which the Minister of Justice will surely wish to clarify for the house, since we learned just a few days ago that, for no apparent reason, Justice Gérard Lacroix released the prisoner at the end of the period he spent in jail.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any contradiction between what the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) has just stated on a question of privilege and the reply I gave the other day in the house. This is what I said at that time:

—and I realized, just by looking at the record, that this case was never submitted to my department.

The statement is clear, Mr. Speaker. The accusation was laid under the Canada Elections Act by the chief electoral officer acting on his own. The Department of Justice does not interfere in such cases because the chief electoral officer is responsible to the House of Commons, not to the government. He appoints his own counsel and the case was prosecuted in Quebec city with the assistance of the Quebec attorney general's office, which looks after the administration of justice in that province.

The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency claims that he intervened in May and June 1963. The situation was brought to my attention and although I knew that I could not intervene directly since the question was outside my jurisdiction, I asked my officials to communicate with the Quebec attorney general's office, since the case was somewhat pathetic in view of the fact that the prisoner refused to help himself. The provincial authorities must have taken the necessary steps, since Mr. Sioui has now been released.

PROCEDURE

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present the third report of the special committee on procedure and organization. At this time I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Your Honour's committee on procedure and organization, may I inform hon. members that we would like to move concurrence in this report on Thursday of this week. The subject matter is that of the making of statements on motions.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

ANNOUNCEMENT OF TRAINING COLLEGE FOR OFFICERS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement regarding a matter of policy. For some time the government has been considering the establishment of a training college for new entry officers for the Canadian coastguard. It has now been decided to take advantage of the availability of surplus facilities at the Point Edward naval base at Sydney, Nova Scotia, to get this essential project started. This, of course, will be subject to the provision of the necessary funds by parliament.

In recent years the work of departmental ships has expanded from the maintenance of aids to navigation and some local surveying and icebreaking to a whole range of marine activities. This fleet now mans the weather stations in the north Pacific ocean, covers Arctic supply convoys, escorts the increasingly important winter traffic into east coast ports and the gulf of St. Lawrence, supports scientific work afloat, and provides a special rescue service.

Including ships now building, the coastguard will have grown in 15 years from 27 to 60 ships, plus some 150 large work boats, tugs and barges. The modern units in this growing fleet are increasingly complex and costly, and they are required to operate in situations of special hazard.

Up to the present the department has relied on the maritime industry to provide officers for this important fleet; but the expanding need for officers has been met by drawing on sources that cannot be tapped again, such as the former Canadian National

West Indies service, other flag transfers and direct recruiting abroad. These sources have not provided many Canadian recruits. The efforts of existing marine schools in various parts of Canada are directed mainly toward meeting local needs of a less complex nature.

To the extent that schools such as the marine school at Rimouski, Quebec, and the new college of fisheries and navigation at St. John's, Newfoundland, and other local institutions can meet the standards and syllabus requirements of the new college, arrangements will be made for cadets to take basic training in navigation and other agreed portions of their course at these institutions. This plan will prevent duplication of resources and enable the new college to concentrate on needs that cannot be met in existing schools.

In view of the critical shortage of new officers for the coastguard anticipated in the next few years, it is the intention of the government to proceed with the establishment of the Canadian coastguard college as quickly as possible, as soon as parliamentary approval has been received. Specific entry requirements and other related information will be made public as soon as the detailed arrangements can be worked out. The first step will be to find a suitable director and recruit the staff.

It is not anticipated that actual training will begin until some time in 1965, but I thought it desirable to make this statement at this time as some steps must be taken almost immediately at Point Edward, and I knew the anxiety there was in all parts of the house to make use of these facilities that are no longer required by the navy.

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is very grateful to the minister for making his statement at this time because some of us may be a little busy tonight at the time of the C.B.C. newscast. I am very glad to hear the minister make this announcement covering something which is part of a general plan that was established by the previous government.

I think all hon. members know that great services are rendered to our country by the coastguard. Its fleet is an excellent one and very often operates under very strenuous circumstances off the shores of Canada. It is playing a major role so far as Canada's trade is concerned, and in the past has played a major role in very dangerous rescue operations. While I was minister of transport I had the pleasure of presiding over the modernization of the fleet and over a few changes made in it. Its vessels are now painted differently. All the ships are very easily distinguishable, and uniforms have been issued to the various members of the fleet.

I am sure this college will meet a need and will give opportunities to young Canadians to find good careers in the Canadian coastguard service. The choice of Sydney is excellent, specially when one thinks of the great naval tradition of this great Canadian seaport.

There is one point the minister has not mentioned. I hope this school will be bilingual, because the great majority of the officers and men serving on these ships come from the shores of the St. Lawrence, and this would be a good opportunity for young Canadians to learn our two national languages.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is taken for granted.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party welcome the minister's announcement that a coastguard college is to be established at Point Edward naval base in Sydney, on Cape Breton island. The need for such an institution has been well known for a long time, and I think this will help fill that need. With the curtailment of some of the naval installations across Canada many of the Royal Canadian Navy personnel might be suitable persons for officers in the coastguard, and this should be a very fertile field for recruitment of people to serve in the Canadian coastguard.

We are particularly pleased that the government has selected Point Edward naval base at Sydney, Nova Scotia, for this purpose. All of us who are familiar with conditions in Cape Breton know of the serious unemployment situation that was likely to take place as a result of the closing of Point Edward naval base. If this helps to meet that unemployment situation I am sure it will be welcomed by members in all parts of the house, and that it will be particularly gratifying news to people in the Sydney area.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I think we must welcome the minister's announcement that a coast guard college is to be established in Sydney, Nova Scotia. That college will certainly promote the development of Canadian talents.

We do hope that the government will also formulate a policy for the building up of a merchant service in Canada; that would permit not only to give training but also provide many jobs to Canadians interested in the navy.

Canadian Coastguard

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we join the other groups in welcoming this announcement for the setting up of a training college for coast guards.

Of course, Canada is a very large country, a lucky country because of its geographical advantages; indeed, a large part of our territorial limits are joining the two largest oceans in the world. That means that our country has a part to play in the field of coast guarding.

Like previous speakers, I should like to take the opportunity to express the hope that this will be a first step toward the development of a Canadian merchant navy that will be able to fly on all the seas of the world the Canadian flag—which we hope to have soon.

[Text]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Perhaps first I would be permitted to express my appreciation for the announcement made by the Minister of Transport, and no doubt the Minister of Labour had a hand in that. I should like to express my appreciation further of the fact the government has finally realized the merits of the Point Edward naval base.

My question to the minister is, what effect will this announcement today have on the notices of termination of work at the Point Edward naval base which have been received by many employees during the past few days?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Well, the administration of the naval base is a matter for the Department of National Defence. I have no knowledge what effect, if any, may ensue from this announcement.

Mr. MacInnis: I am somewhat concerned that the Minister of Labour informs the house that he has no knowledge of employment matters in Cape Breton. I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence what effect today's announcement may have on the many notices of termination of employment received by employees at the Point Edward naval base.

Mr. Speaker: This is a broad, general question, and I do not believe it is in order.

UNITED NATIONS

TABLING OF REPORT OF SECRETARY GENERAL ON CYPRUS OPERATION

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table copies in English and in French of a report by the secretary general of the United Nations to the security council dated May 2 on the organization and operation of the United Nations peace keeping force in Cyprus.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt) moved that the first report of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, presented to the house on Friday, May 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

CANADIAN ATTITUDE AT GENEVA CONFERENCE RESPECTING AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, who in addition to occupying that post is also the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, and ask him whether he would advise the house what attitude is being taken by the Canadian delegation at the conference in Geneva relative to the agricultural areas composing the European common market; and what in particular is Canada's contribution in this regard to the debate?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to the right hon. gentleman I can assure him that the Department of Agriculture is well represented at the conference by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that before my colleague left to attend the conference we discussed the problems of Canadian agriculture for many hours. I have every confidence that Canada's interests will be looked after as far as agriculture is concerned.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the minister, though, to direct his mind to the question. What is to be the stand of the Canadian delegation in this connection?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wonder whether the minister, who seems to have given away a portion of his portfolio to the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The right hon. gentleman surely remembers that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement in this house about the general principles which underlie Canadian policy at this conference. He also knows that the conference is going on now, and that a good many of the meetings are held in secret. He knows it would be most inappropriate at this stage to disclose the details of the Canadian position.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Agriculture now has another departmental helper. I ask the Prime Minister, then, to tell the house, if he knows, what is the attitude on the subject of agricultural protection. There was no statement made which gave any particulars on that point. I am not asking the right hon. gentleman to go into detail, but we should like to know what attitude is being taken on a question as important as this, instead of keeping us in the dark.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the right hon. gentleman to read the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this matter. Surely the right hon. gentleman does not expect the government to announce in detail at the beginning of an international conference what will be the policy of the Canadian government. That may have been the principle adopted by my right hon. friend, but it is certainly not the principle which is going to be adopted by this government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, does the right hon. gentleman contend that policy in this regard is going to be subject to the multiple changes which we have seen under this government in every measure which it has undertaken?

Mr. Pearson: I will say this, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure the policy of this government at these international conferences will achieve far greater success in this field than the right hon. gentleman was able to achieve during his six years.

SUGAR

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF REMOVAL OF TARIFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the government be prepared to give consideration to removing the discriminatory tariff on sugar, behind which the sugar companies in this country have been fleecing the consumers over the past 12 months?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this and many other matters will come up during the course of this conference. I am sure my hon. friend would not expect me to disclose the details of our policies in respect to important international negotiations at this time. This would be a fine way to conduct international economic diplomacy.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. I was not asking the Prime Minister this question in relation to the international negotiations which are now going on. I was asking the Prime Minister whether the government would be prepared in the near future to give consideration to removing the discriminatory tariff on sugar, which has allowed the sugar companies of this country to fleece the public so that the Canadian housewife is paying more for sugar than is her United States counterpart or the sugar consumers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Pearson: We would, of course, be glad to give consideration to this as one of many matters which will be considered at the conference, and which will be one of many matters related, for instance, to commonwealth preferences and other measures which will come up for discussion at Geneva, all of which we hope will lead to a great increase in international trade generally from which Canada will be able to benefit.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): May I ask a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. Can the Prime Minister assure the house that in any negotiations concerning sugar tariffs the interests of the Canadian sugar beet producers will be fully protected in order to encourage greater domestic production and to protect Canadian job opportunities?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I can give that assurance, both in respect of the producer and also in respect of the consumer.

IMMIGRATION

QUEBEC—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Since the minister of natural resources of the province of Quebec stated the day before yesterday that the province should take care of its immigration itself, would the minister tell us whether he is having discussions with the provincial minister of national resources in respect to this important question of immigration?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

PUBLICATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to bring down legislation shortly concerning periodicals which would extend protection provisions to all Canadian publications and against all foreign publications, including Time and Reader's Digest?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman does not know there is a resolution on the order paper in this regard.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, my question dealt principally with whether the government intends to extend these provisions to Time and Reader's Digest.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON UNIVERSAL APPLICATION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would he tell us how it is possible to conciliate his statement to the effect that there would be only one national pension plan, which would be the same for all Canada, with the statement by Mr. Lesage that there will be only one provincial pension plan in Quebec, and that this scheme will be strictly provincial?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered this question twice. I am sorry it has not been to the satisfaction of my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Mr. Balcer: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister tell us if the provinces, by accepting the proposal of the federal government, thereby lose the priority rights conferred on them by section 94A of the British North America Act?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker; neither the provincial government nor the federal government loses any right it possesses in this field.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, arising from the statement made yesterday in Vancouver by the Minister of Finance. Would the Prime Minister tell the house if the government intends to postpone again its legislation concerning the pension plan?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there is no such intention, and the Minister of Finance to my knowledge has made no such statement.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made in securing the consent of the provinces to an amendment to provide survivor benefits under the prospective pension legislation. At the same time would he clarify the statement allegedly made yesterday by the Minister of Finance that the pension legislation will not be proceeded with now but that it will be approximately a year before it will be ready to be proceeded with?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I should be asked to comment on a statement allegedly made by the Minister of Finance. I will inquire of the Minister of Finance as soon as he returns later today exactly what he did say, and make whatever comment is required tomorrow.

As far as the first part of the question is concerned, we are in touch with the provinces in regard to a constitutional amendment and other matters connected with the proposed pension legislation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Without commenting on what the Minister of Finance allegedly said, will the Prime Minister tell the house and give the assurance to the Canadian people that the pension legislation will be proceeded with at this session, and immediately?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in proceeding with this legislation without delay, but I am also interested in including in the legislation survivor benefits, and we wish to get the constitutional amendment required for that purpose as quickly as possible. We know now that all provinces are agreeable to this kind of amendment. We have been in touch with them as to the exact form of the amendment before we submit it to the place where it has to be passed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the progress that has been made and the fact that the provinces are in agreement, would it not be possible to proceed simultaneously with the pension legislation and get it into committee while at the same time proceeding with the amendment to the constitution, which will be accepted by the house and certainly will not be turned down by Westminster?

Mr. Pearson: Surely the right hon. gentleman does not ask us to include in a bill prepared for this house a provision which would be ultra vires of this house until the constitutional amendment is passed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this the excuse for delay in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: It is the excuse for observing the constitution. Mr. Speaker, I want to give my right hon. friend complete information. It is also the reason alleged by my right hon. friend's government for doing nothing for five years.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, we at least endeavoured to secure consent and did not. The Prime Minister says he has consent, and he will not go ahead. It looks as if there is a scheme to delay this legislation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question for purposes of clarification. If he gave the answer a few minutes ago, perhaps he could repeat it. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the pension legislation at this session?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, we hope we will have the constitutional amendment in time so that we can proceed in this session, indeed in this part of the session if possible.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): May I ask a supplementary question. In answer to a question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam the Prime Minister said he hoped this legislation would go through in this part of the session. What did he mean by that?

Mr. Pearson: I hope that at least we will have a long week end some time this summer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—CONTRIBUTIONS OF TROOPS BY ADDITIONAL COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs informed the house that Australia and New Zealand were sending troops to the United Nations force in Cyprus. This morning there was a report over the air indicating that Denmark was likewise sending troops to Cyprus. Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether it is a fact that Denmark is sending troops to the United Nations force in Cyprus. Could he also tell us the number of troops being sent by New Zealand and Australia, what is the total number of troops in the U.N. force in Cyprus, and finally—

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: —are any of these troops being used to replace troops from the United Kingdom?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that Australia was sending troops. I said that Australia had agreed to supply a police group numbering about 28. I said that New Zealand was sending a police group of about the same number, and that Denmark had agreed to send a contingent. The total number now in the United Nations peace keeping force is 6,369, and the present force level of the United Kingdom is 2,719. There are 6,341 United Nations troops now in the United Nations peace keeping force.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are any of these troops which are coming from Denmark or any of the members of police forces which are being sent by Australia and New Zealand intended to replace United Kingdom troops presently in the force?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Some of them, Mr. Speaker, will replace some of the permissible level of 3,500 United Kingdom troops.

FINANCE

REPORTED INCREASE IN DEBT TO LENDING INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Finance. It arises from a dominion bureau of statistics release yesterday which indicates that in the past year Canadians have gone $500 million further into debt to finance companies and lending institutions, representing a 12 per cent increase. My question is, now that we have nearly reached the credit limits, where is the Canadian taxpayer going to get the money with which to pay the increased taxes forecast last night by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question is far too broad in scope to entertain a quick answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTED SALE OF CANADIAN INSURANCE COMPANY TO U.S. INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance being absent, I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. Could he tell the house whether the government has intervened or intends to intervene in order to prevent l'Industrielle, Compagnie d'Assurance-vie, a Quebec French Canadian firm, from being sold to United States interests?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure this question requires a careful answer, and I suggest that it should be put on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In his absence, I should like to ask his parliamentary secretary to assure the house that he will give his immediate attention to the sale of the life insurance company "L'Industrielle."

[Text]

Mr. E. J. Benson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I believe this is the type of question that should be put on the order paper.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LANCASTER HOSPITAL, NEW BRUNSWICK— NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs further to questions that have been asked about the Colonel Belcher and other military hospitals. May I ask the minister whether any discussions whatsoever have taken place with regard to Lancaster hospital in New Brunswick, particularly the Ridgewood annex; and if so, what have been the results of such discussions?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have had a communication from the compensation board of the province requesting the purchase of a part of the property at Ridgewood. They have had it surveyed. We have replied that we are prepared to talk to them with regard to part of that property. This is where the matter rests at this moment.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Bell: Will veterans organizations be consulted in the way that was outlined with respect to the changeover?

Mr. Teillet: In this instance, Mr. Speaker, this matter concerns property that is not now in use.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN MEMBERS' ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a very urgent and important question to the Minister of Public Works, notice of which has been given. In view of the approach of summer, so beautifully illustrated by the tulips in front of this building; the fact that our summer recess may be of short duration, and the lack of proper ventilation in many offices in this building, would the minister consider making temporary improvements until the rooms have been air conditioned?

An hon. Member: Move back to the west block.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Undoubtedly this is a very pressing and heated question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Nevertheless it requires a very detailed answer, and may I suggest that the hon. member put it on the order paper.

CANADA YEAR BOOK

DELAY IN PREPARATION OF FRENCH EDITION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State?

Could the minister tell the house why the French version of the Canada Year Book is to be published in July only, whereas the English edition has already been published?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire and report to the hon. member.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Is the minister not of the opinion that instead of setting up an inquiry on biculturalism, which will cost half a million, the government should rather be less hypocritical and do something?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend is undoubtedly aware, the government's translation services were seriously neglected under the former administration and we must now develop them so that both editions can be published simultaneously.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am going to raise a point of order myself for a change. Under the instructions given me, answers to questions should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised, and should not provoke debate. The same thing goes for questions asked.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a very short supplementary question?

Can the minister tell the house why, in 1961, when the Conservative party was in power, the Canada Year Book was published at the same time in English and French?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SECRETARIAT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice?

Did the minister make a statement yesterday in Montreal, to the effect that the federal government has established, in the privy council office, a secretariat to deal with federal-provincial relations?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of interpreting my own speeches, but for more security, I shall be pleased to send the hon. member a copy of my speech.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, after such an answer I believe I am justified in raising the matter, this evening, after ten o'clock.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think I quite understood the hon. member. It seemed to me that his question was answered. Does the hon. member wish to put it again at ten o'clock? Is he not satisfied with the answer given?

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not consider that my question was answered and I should like to have it brought forward for debate after ten o'clock.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GREAT LAKES—RECOMMENDATION BY COUNSEL RESPECTING PROSECUTION OF MCLAUGHLIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice, and perhaps I might preface my question by congratulating the officials of the department, through the minister, for the conviction of Banks. My question arises out of a remark made by Mr. Justice Wagner and also a question I put to the Minister of Justice some time ago. Are the minister and his department considering laying a charge against McLaughlin, as was recommended by this party and carried out against Banks, and bringing McLaughlin before the courts of justice?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the matter is presently before the courts. I think it would be out of order, therefore, for me to comment on it. However, the hon. member may be assured that in my department every consideration is being given to all the relevant factors in the circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not understand what the Minister of Justice means by his reference to the matter being before the courts, because it has now been decided as far as Banks is concerned; he has been brought before the court of justice and sentenced to five years imprisonment. My question arises out of a remark made by Mr. Justice Wagner with reference to Mr. Banks, and it also refers to Mr. McLaughlin. My question the other day referred to the report made by counsel to this government. That committee was appointed by this government, and I should like to know whether the report recommended that a charge be laid against McLaughlin. We put the same question to the former minister of justice and did not receive a reply at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question requires a legal opinion from the Minister of Justice, a legal opinion from the Minister of Justice, this time.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the statement contained in the judgment handed down in the last few days with respect to Mr. Banks, to the effect that Mr. McLaughlin was involved almost as deeply as Mr. Banks, does the minister intend to go ahead with placing Mr. McLaughlin in the position of president of the S.I.U.?

Mr. Speaker: The same remarks apply, I believe, to this question.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

ATTENDANCE AT ROYAL COMMISSION HEARINGS BY MEMBERS OF PUBLIC SERVICE AND ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Did the minister hear the report on the C.B.C. news today that the brigadier in command at Kingston has issued orders that no personnel under his command may attend the hearings of the bicultural commission to be held in Kingston? If so, has he any comment to make on it?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the report but it has been drawn to my attention and we are looking into the matter.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to direct to the Secretary of State.

[Translation]

Would the minister explain to us why orders have been given to civil servants not to attend or take part in the sitting of the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism which will take place in Kingston tonight and, by the same token, can the minister tell us whether similar orders will apply to all the sittings of the commission?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any instruction to that effect.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question—

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Secretary of State inquire about this situation, since this report was broadcast over the C.B.C. all day long?

Mr. Lamontagne: I shall be pleased to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. About two weeks ago I asked him whether federal civil servants have been instructed not to appear before the Laurendeau-Dunton commission. At that time the Prime Minister replied that he would inquire of the civil service commission. Is he now in a position to answer this question?

Moreover, I wish to remind him that we had also referred to members of the armed forces.

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why civil servants should not appear before the commission, and no orders to the contrary have been given. The question of members of the armed forces is under consideration.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the meeting is tonight, I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence could notify the military officials in Kingston. Cannot the same position be taken with regard to the armed forces that has been taken with regard to civil servants, and let these people participate?

Mr. Hellyer: We have been looking into this matter. Unfortunately the Associate Minister of National Defence, who has been handling it, is in Petawawa today. An effort is being made to reach him this afternoon to see how far along with the negotiations we have proceeded, and if we can get the matter straightened out this afternoon it will be done.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Negotiations with whom?

Mr. Hellyer: As the hon. gentleman probably knows, appearing before a royal commission in a matter of this kind would be prohibited by Queen's regulations, and the question to be determined is by what means we might be able to make it possible for members of the armed forces to be heard.

Mr. Fairweather: Change the Queen's regulations.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question. Is the minister telling us that members of the armed forces must not attend to listen to the proceedings of this commission?

Mr. Hellyer: No, Mr. Speaker, certainly not. I have already said I have not seen the order, and I have promised to look into it; so you might be patient until I have had a chance to do so.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. We are not asking the minister anything about patience. He has been asked a simple question by the hon. member for Royal. Is he prepared to communicate with the brigadier in that military area and tell him to make it absolutely clear to all military personnel that they may attend as spectators the meeting of the royal commission without this in any way contravening the regulations?

Mr. Hellyer: That much at least will be done. The question to be determined is whether they will be able to make representations personally to the commissioners.

Mr. Pigeon: You are the minister. Give an order.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would he recommend that the Dunton-Laurendeau royal commission be authorized to inquire into every department and crown corporation coming under federal jurisdiction?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: The commission has its terms of reference, which have already been made public.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

WINNIPEG—POSSIBLE USE OF MAILS TO DEFRAUD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General look into the front page report in a recent issue of the Winnipeg Tribune concerning the alleged use of the mails by a finance company in a way which resulted in a catastrophic loss to a victim, to determine whether such use of the mails was fraudulent?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): I will be very glad to, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STEPS TO DEAL WITH SO-CALLED "HATE" LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the government has not amended the Criminal Code with respect to the distribution of hate literature, can the minister advise the house why charges have not been laid against those distributing this literature?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the second part of the question, as to why charges have not been laid, is that it is not under the control of the Department of Justice to lay charges, because the application of the Criminal Code is under the immediate authority of the various attorneys general. As far as the first part of the question is concerned, I might answer again that the matter of a possible amendment to the Criminal Code is being looked into very actively. As recently as last week I had conversations with my officials, and the matter is being pursued.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was this matter not discussed at the federal-provincial conference and an understanding reached?

Mr. Favreau: I did not have the honour to be Minister of Justice then and I would have to be advised by my officials as to this last question. I will be pleased to inform myself and answer.

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION FOLLOWING PERJURY TRIAL IN TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A few days ago I directed the attention of the Minister of Justice to the evidence of Mr. Justice Landreville in the Farris trial. Has he yet read that evidence, and if so is any action contemplated by the government?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have given the necessary instructions but the evidence is not yet in my possession, and to make myself fully conversant with all the facts I must be in possession of the evidence.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, after the trip by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the west coast may I ask him whether the victims of the tidal wave in the Albernis can now look for early relief?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to that question is yes, of course, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chatterton: A supplementary question. Can the minister say whether the province of British Columbia has yet requested assistance?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, we have received a wire from the premier of British Columbia today which I do not wish to make available to the house at this time because it requires some study. It does not ask for help. It does not say that the damage is beyond the capacity of the municipalities and the province to pay. We will be making some assessment of the wire, and probably I will make a statement tomorrow.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if it stipulates any amount of money which the provincial government is asking the federal government to put up in order to assist the flood victims in that area?

Mr. Laing: No, no sum is mentioned.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTRODUCTION OF TWO PRICE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture in his dual capacity, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government at this session to introduce legislation to establish a two price system for wheat in Canada and a guaranteed price of $2 per bushel basis Fort William?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will take that matter under consideration and discuss it with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture.

SHIPPING

CONSIDERATION OF BRIEF RESPECTING MERCHANT MARINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Since the Minister of Transport is in an optimistic and nautical mood today with his statement concerning the training of coast-guard officers, may I ask the minister if he has noted the statement made by the S.I.U. urging the establishment of a merchant fleet, with resultant jobs for merchant seamen; and when can we expect a reply to the brief in this regard that was put before the cabinet recently?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I can tell the hon. gentleman that the most urgent consideration is being given to that brief and to certain briefs from other organizations in addition to the S.I.U. As soon as there is anything that might be described as policy to be indicated to the house, it will be communicated in the appropriate way.

Mr. Bell: Can we be assured that a full statement will be made in the house on the matter, and that the minister does not plan to use the C.B.C.?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should not like to feel I was precluded from satisfying the curiosity of hon. gentlemen in response to questions.

HARBOURS

QUEBEC—REPORTED COMPLAINTS OF MANAGEMENT PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a very important and urgent question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister intend to make an inquiry following grievances drawn to his attention concerning the injustice that seems to prevail in Quebec harbour, among the officials, in order to do justice to those who are thus injured?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question, although very important, should be on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss this question at ten o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. McIlraith for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Dinsdale, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Grégoire.

FAILURE TO DEVELOP CANADIAN WATER RESOURCES

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, last evening when the gong sounded I had described the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris as a partisan attempt to hold the present government accountable for the consequences of a water policy which has been pursued since confederation. I had analysed parts of that amendment dealing with low water levels, increasing pollution and the necessity for conserving water. In the time that remains to me this afternoon I should like to deal with that part of the amendment criticizing the government for failing to establish what is called a co-ordinated national water policy.

I should like to point out to the house that there are grave constitutional limitations attached to that amendment, and that no federal government could be held wholly accountable since it would not have the constitutional power to prosecute a co-ordinated national water policy. Within those terms, I am sure the hon. member for Brandon-Souris must have been aware that the amendment could not withstand constitutional scrutiny. The amendment condemns the government for failing, as I said, to establish a co-ordinated national water policy, and this clearly assumes that the federal government has the constitutional power to establish such a co-ordinated policy.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it would be ridiculous to criticize the federal government for failing to do something it did not have the legal power to do. Surely it would be rather frivolous to criticize the federal government for failing to do something it does not have the legal power to do, and failing to fulfil the proposals in the amendment. I say, therefore, the mover of the amendment completely ignores the constitutional position. The fact is that apart from specific federal powers in relation to navigation, and other limited areas, the water resources belong to the provinces and come under provincial jurisdiction. In that event the amendment has no constitutional footing feet.

The question was very thoroughly dealt with by the resources for tomorrow conference which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris mentioned in his opening address. Professor Bora Laskin, professor of law at the University of Toronto, had this to say about the water supply of the country at the resources for tomorrow conference, as recorded at page 215 of volume I of the conference papers:

> It is a safe generalization that the regulation and distribution of water resources in a province for domestic consumption or industrial purposes are within exclusive provincial competence. While some qualification has to be made, as for example, in respect of public rights of navigation or in respect of interference with federal property or competent federal law, it yet remains true that appropriation of water for private use is subject to definition by provincial law.

The constitutional position, of course, does not mean that the federal government has no responsibility and can do nothing. Clearly it must be part of its general responsibility for the welfare of Canadians to take an interest in policy and measures with respect to water, and to assist in its conservation and wise use. Much has been done over the years by the federal government, and by the federal government and provincial governments in co-operation, and I trust I dealt with this aspect in some degree last night.

But what the federal government cannot do is precisely what this amendment implies it should do; that is, exercise federal jurisdiction over a co-ordinated national water policy. In my submission, Mr. Speaker, that is beyond the jurisdiction of any federal government. But a federal government can try, as the present administration is doing to encourage provincial co-operation and concert action by and with the provinces.

Last evening I described the measures this government has taken—

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Turner: I have not much time. I am limited to ten minutes this afternoon, but if I have time at the end I will be glad to see to the hon. member's question.

What the present administration has done is to encourage a co-ordinated national water policy, but in co-operation with the provinces under the Canadian council of resource ministers. Recently the Prime Minister announced the establishment of a provincial relations secretariat to improve co-operation with the provinces, and in our federal system the manner of approach must be by co-operation with the provinces which have the constitutional jurisdiction over water.

That being so I think we can say the present administration recognizes, as the author of the Royal Bank of Canada monthly letter of December 1963, in an article entitled "Saving Our Watersheds" says:

> Water is so important in life that its conservation and distribution must override the geographical boundaries of private property, counties and provinces; the political boundaries of federal and provincial jurisdictions, and the economic domains of agriculture, forestry and industry. If jurisdictional disputes prevent effective action, our heritage will be lost by default, because above all boundaries is the supreme natural law whose edicts are indisputable.

That is so, but we have a constitutional limitation which the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has failed to recognize. In answer to that I would make reference to the arguments that I attempted to bring before the house last evening, that over the last 12 months this administration has used the only consultative constitutional avenue it could. It has brought water control, use, distribution and sewerage before the Canadian council of resource ministers where, in conjunction with the provinces and the regional authorities, this government intends to fulfil its responsibilities within the limitation of the jurisdiction given to it by the British North America Act.

Mr. Nielsen: Since the hon. member has a minute left, would he permit a question? Does he think it is unconstitutional to set up a national advisory committee comprised of representatives from all the provinces and federal representatives, in the same way as federal-provincial conferences are established?

Mr. Turner: Any national advisory committee that is set up in conjunction with the provinces is constitutional, but what this amendment is attempting to do is condemn this government for neglecting to establish a co-ordinated national water policy, thus implying that it is solely responsible for that policy.

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer congratulations to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris for bringing the very important question of water conservation to the attention of the house; also to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka for pointing out the great problem we have, and also to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, who dealt with the problem and gave the previous government credit for building the Saskatchewan dam, for the resources for tomorrow conference and for ARDA. One of the things he omitted to mention was the help it gave for the building of sewage disposal plants across Canada.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George raised the constitutional issue as an excuse for not doing anything. This put me in mind of what Nero did many years ago, when he fiddled while Rome burned. We in Canada have been slow in recognizing that water is one of our great natural resources, that men cannot live without it and that industry and the economy of the country cannot advance without it. In the great lakes area we have many tourist operators who will suffer severe financial losses as a result of the low water levels in the great lakes. Motel and hotel operators all around this area will lose millions of dollars in business because of the low levels, and many of them will be forced completely out of business.

For months hon. members of the house have been drawing this to the attention of the government but there has been little or no realization on its part that it interprets the facts as they exist; or, if there was a realization, it did not know how to meet the problem. We pride ourselves on having half of the available fresh water in the world right here in Canada. We feel it is inexhaustible, but when shortages occur all we do is pray for rain or else wait for the cyclical periods that bring it back up.

I remember it was said that the six or seven year cycle would correct the present situation. Well, the seven year cycle has ended and the situation has not been corrected. In fact none of the cycles will completely correct this problem of low water levels in my riding. The quantity of water in the world remains the same, and we must not forget that fact. It is when the quantity is out of balance that we have problems, and today we have those problems on the great lakes.

Average annual rainfall in the lake Huron-Georgian bay area ranges between 30 inches and 35 inches, but if you take the figures that were given in the house yesterday and add them up, you find that the average rainfall in that area over the last 12 years was 31 inches, and in the same period of time the high water mark has fallen six feet from the average.

This would indicate that precipitation has only a minor effect. It has been said "Leave it alone. It will right itself. It is a gradual process". Well, this gradual process is going to spell financial ruin for many of the operators in our tourist industry, and a lot of them have every penny they own invested in this business, a business which in the long run brings many millions of dollars to this country. It is, I believe, the third biggest industry we have.

We have been told "Just wait for seven years and it will be all right". Those years have come and gone. I want to read a comment made by Mr. James Lamb, the publisher of a paper in my area. He is well acquainted with the great lakes. This article was reprinted in the Toronto daily Star of May 1, 1964. Mr. Lamb had this to say:

> While the great lakes run steadily down the drain, with long established ports now high and dry and Georgian bay down four feet from normal, there is not a man, or a group of men, in Canada or the United States, who has any real idea of cause or cure.
> For the shocking truth is that each of the regional developments which has affected the levels of the system has been considered separately, with lake and river problems being attacked piecemeal, rather than in one over-all program.

This, from the same article, is also striking:

> One of Canada's best qualified experts on waterway development admitted to a private gathering last year that neither he nor any other engineer or official had any conception of the ultimate effect on lake levels of such revolutionary undertakings as the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway, with its enormous alterations in the flow and depth of the river; of the huge additional diversions at Niagara and Chicago; of the deepening of the channel at Sarnia.

The writer goes on to say:

> If this is so, then surely it is time the two federal governments concerned—

The United States government and the Canadian government.

> —instituted an over-all lake control system, and took steps to conserve what water is left before lake Huron is reduced to a fraction of its former size, and the lower lakes bereft of half their ports.

For years now official reaction to public complaints about the alarming drop in lake levels has been to place the blame on dwindling rainfall. I have shown that the amount of precipitation is a minor factor having regard to the situation as we know it. Let us face a few facts. More water is being used by householders. A man said to me the other day, in our house "A few years back we used four to six pails of water a day; now, to get breakfast over and everybody up and washed, we use more than that". Today the average person in many of the cities of Ontario uses 100 gallons a day, a striking figure. Industry uses tons of water today whereas a few years back it was using gallons by comparison.

The second point I wish to make is this. We are not conserving the run-off from our lakes and rivers. The obvious conclusion is that dams must be built, because the experts say there is enough overflow from the St. Lawrence run-off to look after all the water needs of householders of the rest of Canada for a whole year. If that is true, it follows that the run-off into the lakes and rivers flowing into the great lakes basin is very important and that we must consider what can be done in this respect, in conjunction, of course, with the provinces. However, the great lakes are run by the Department of Transport. They are responsible, and this government is responsible. When this matter was brought to the attention of the government last fall they should have moved quickly to call a conference and clear the way for action of some kind.

The question of water conservation is being approached from other directions. The province of Ontario has recognized the existence of this problem and will allow to farmers 50 per cent of all expenses incurred in the construction of ponds. The previous government recognized the problem when we established a reforestation program under ARDA. This program will give us big sponges of reforestation and ponds to hold the water in many of these areas. Then of course there is the Chicago diversion, which takes about 2 per cent of the water out of the great lakes.

The fifth point I wish to make is that we already have a control on lake Superior; we have a dam. On the other hand, we have no control on lake Huron and Georgian bay. In addition, the area around Sarnia had to be dredged in connection with the building of the St. Lawrence seaway.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George put some figures on the record in this debate regarding slower flow. I want to say this. The river St. Clair is flowing faster than ever. When this channel was lowered by six feet the official pronouncement was that the effect would be negligible. Just how this can be reconciled with the actual increase in outflow from 160,000 cubic feet per second to 185,000 cubic feet per second has not been explained. That completely repudiates the arguments put forward by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

I wish to dwell for a minute on this increased output of the river St. Clair, taken in conjunction with the fall of six feet in the level of the great lakes in the Georgian bay area. If we are to control lake Superior we must have some control on lake Huron. I think this is definitely indicated when the outflow is 25,000 cubic feet per second more than it was prior to the dredging and deepening of the St. Clair river. It follows that this government must get busy at once, in conjunction with the government of the United States and the international joint commission, to find a solution to this problem and a means of lessening the immediate difficulties. This should be done, too, in co-operation with those people in Michigan and elsewhere who are vitally concerned.

The government already has the machinery to use if it wishes to get to work on damming the lakes and rivers which flow into this area. I am most concerned about this matter. I am wondering what responsibility the government must accept for the position in which these marine operators, hotel operators and others on the great lakes find themselves. These people have invested thousands and thousands of dollars from their savings. Many of them have mortgages and they are likely to lose their property in this great catastrophe.

I am wondering whether the government has not some responsibility to those people for the losses which will be incurred. I am not saying that the government should subsidize or should look after all of those people, but I am saying that many of these young operators, on the strength of making Canada one of the great tourist centres of the world, have invested their all, but they find their docks are today six to seven feet out of water. Although they were erected to be of proper height at high water level they are today standing stark naked six to seven feet above water level. You would find, Mr. Speaker, that some of the channels in that area cannot be traversed by boat and tourist places are completely isolated. It does not seem fair to me that we should expect those people to accept the responsibility for this disaster in its entirety, and I hope the government will give serious consideration to providing some form of assistance to these people who, as I say, may lose their all.

Some of the papers in the area, including the Midland Free Press and the Angus Times, have pointed to the distress which is going to be caused in this connection. I know that the government is going to dredge all the harbours and is going to dredge the harbour at Midland and Port McNicoll and Collingwood. But in the meantime, although ships are carrying lighter loads they are getting bogged down. These boats have to be pulled off mudbanks and so on, and this is costing the economy a great deal of money. Therefore I would appeal to the government to stop this laissez faire attitude which is prevalent today, and get busy and do something for these people, because over their property today rests the pall of loss. We in the house may regard such matters as affecting only one part of Canada, but I suggest that this goes deeper and affects the prairies and the whole economy of Canada. Instead of talking about cycles and other matters it is high time the government did some sound thinking, set up some machinery, put it to work, and considered the problems and financial losses of the people who live in those areas.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, when my predecessor moved his amendment yesterday I think he took a great many people by surprise. Indeed, I am of the opinion that he took a great many members of his own party by surprise, judging by the participation of hon. members on the other side of the house in this debate. I was certainly taken by surprise. I wanted at once to thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) for his generous statement that he "cannot hold it against this new government and the new minister in his first year". I wanted to thank him for that statement, but I hope to be able to prove in the few minutes I am going to take today that we do not need his generosity. Because I think I will be able to point out that we have undertaken a larger number of measures in regard to the full use of Canadian resources in this past year than were ever undertaken for quite a few years prior hereto; and some of the measures we have taken have been relatively successful.

The very splendid speech made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner) was, I think, quite encompassing in that he pointed out the limitations, the very real limitations, which exist in this particular field. I am sure my hon. friend from Burnaby-Coquitlam, among others, is aware of them because at one time he was the head of a provincial government. In the field of resources our provinces are extremely jealous, and of course understandably so, because they derive their revenues from the resources which have been developed within their boundaries. We are now in a position where, to the great advantage of the nation, and I would think, in the end, to the great advantage of each individual province, we are trying to establish a mutuality of interest which does not know provincial boundary lines.

In that respect I think that one of the better jobs which we did last year was as a result of a metting which was held in Regina, which I attended together with a number of members from both sides of this house. We received, I think, a good education apart from having an interesting time. We had been invited there by the premier of Saskatchewan to meet resource representatives not only from Saskatchewan but Alberta and Manitoba as well. Out of that meeting an advisory committee was set up which has since held no less than five meetings. The political end delegated its responsibility to the technical men in the various departments. This is all leading to a request which will be made of this government for a very considerable study of the possibility of bending some of these northern rivers into the Saskatchewan system and of diverting some of the waters which today seem to flow uselessly into the Arctic across the prairies where they will be of more value.

Canada is a fortunate country with respect to water in that 7 per cent of its total land mass is covered by water. Of the tremendous amount of water which is annually drawn up by the sun from the ocean and dumped on Canada no less than 8,000 billion tons of it is dumped on the land in the form of rain or snow. Therefore we in Canada are exceedingly fortunate, as I say, in our water resources; our job now is to redirect these resources before they return to the ocean. This involves a tremendous job for the future but we are making a move in that direction.

Certain hon. members on the other side of the house, particularly those down in the corner, have for years been asking about water pollution. We have written a letter to the resource ministers suggesting that the question of the pollution of our waters should be one of the first subjects to be dealt with at the plenary conference of resource ministers when they meet in Charlottetown. This suggestion has been agreed to. We have received affirmative replies from five or six provinces, only the province of Nova Scotia being of the opinion that this is a matter of provincial rather than federal-provincial jurisdiction.

We are also moving in the direction of a very complicated, extended and what will be a very expensive study of the resources of the Nelson river in the province of Manitoba. This study is designed primarily to assist the ultimate development of power, in which more than the province of Manitoba is interested, quite apart from the interest of the government of Canada. This study will be extremely extended and, as I say, very expensive. This is evidence of co-operation with the provinces to develop to the best advantage their resources, to the benefit not alone of the individual province concerned but of the nation as a whole. For example, where rivers cross provincial boundaries it is quite possible for one of the provinces concerned to take action within its provincial borders which would prove extremely harmful, if not disastrous, to its neighbour. There is an increasing appreciation of that situation at the present time and we find the provinces are discussing this matter more and more with one another.

I indicated to the ministers concerned, as recently as January 8 last, the need for the expenditure by us of a great deal more money in studying the water resources of Canada. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to quote one paragraph from that letter, which was sent to all the resource ministers of the provinces:

> Recognizing the accelerating needs for water data to enable the responsible agencies to plan for efficient use of our water resources, the government of Canada has agreed to an intensified five year program of expansion and improvement of surface water and sediment survey data collection and analysis facilities by the water resources branch of this department. It is my hope that under this program and through the existing co-operative arrangements with the provinces, we can at least double the existing coverage in the next five years, as well as improve present installations.

We have received replies from the ministers concerned, I think in every instance offering their greatest co-operation.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he will table a copy of that letter?

Mr. Laing: With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to table a copy of the whole letter.

Mr. Winkler: Would it be possible to have the replies as well? I would like to see the letter tabled, and are the replies available also?

Mr. Laing: I have not the replies here, Mr. Speaker. I think they might best be secured by placing a question on the order paper.

Mr. Douglas: That would have to be done with the consent of the ministers involved.

Mr. Laing: We are faced today with an amendment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it agreed that the hon. minister has leave to table the letter in question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, we are faced today with a motion which condemns us for our inactivity. I wish to tell the house that we are not inactive, but this particular branch has been extremely active in the last year. In addition it is suggested we are negligent because we have failed to establish a national advisory committee. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Turner) pointed out some of the difficulties in this regard. We will have it as time goes on, and I would say that we will have it through the means we are attempting to effect at the present time; that is, by working with the provinces and encouraging their support and co-operation. But the condemnation is that we had not established a national advisory committee.

Reference was made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) to the proposal made by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on October 23, 1961, in which he declared that such a committee should be established. I merely want to point out that the government of that day remained in power for some 18 months thereafter and did not establish such an advisory committee. The difficulties are apparent. However, with the establishment of the secretariat to the resource ministers conference now operating out of Montreal we will be able to achieve the same type of co-operation with the various provinces and, in the end, the same objectives that might be achieved by suddenly setting up a national advisory committee in respect of these matters.

I want to say something in particular about the great lakes system, to which so much time was devoted by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard). I am fully aware of the deep concern in this respect and of the consequences of a cycle of weather which again is becoming apparent to this region. I say it is a cycle of weather because I had gone back to February 28, 1956, when these remarks were made in the house by Mr. Murphy, the then member for Lambton West:

> I was not concerned about the effects of the St. Lawrence seaway project on the great lakes levels...My concern was about the damage to property from high water levels even at the present moment.

That was in the days when members of parliament were rising in the house and saying that the government had to do something, had to make some release of water somewhere and get the water down the St. Lawrence river because of the damage being caused in the lakes by high water. This is a situation that has been evident to those who have been keeping records over a great number of years. We do have times of heavier precipitation, with resultant damage from floods. I want to tell the house, Mr. Speaker, that the situation in respect of the great lakes system is a very, very complex one; indeed, it has been declared to be the most complex system in the world.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. minister permit a question? I do not know the answer with regard to this cycle business he is talking about, but would the building of dams and controls control the cycle?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question but I have to tell him that in a circumstance such as we are suffering from it is necessary to impose as little loss as possible on each person. The tendency is to reduce water here, to effect a little damage to shipping, shall we say, in one instance and yet do as little damage as possible. In other words, it is spread all around. This is a situation with which we in British Columbia are familiar. In 1958 I watched the water rise to within six inches of the dike tops at Creston. Creston had been flooded once before. That particular year we saved the Creston dikes, but the Americans lost out down below. There was another occasion on which we and the Americans down below were co-operating to try and save both. We saved theirs but we lost the dikes in Creston. It seems to me this is a case of making the maximum use of water for all purposes and bringing to bear as little damage on individuals as possible.

I have been accused of being flippant because on one occasion I said that prayer might help. I still think it might help. I want to say that at the present time we have a most abnormal situation in British Columbia. I do not want to be an alarmist, but those of us who are members from the province of British Columbia will admit right now that in the next few weeks we are going to go through very trying times in that province. This will not be for want of moisture, some of which I would have hoped we could make available elsewhere, but because the other day, not in northern British Columbia but on the coast in central British Columbia, I flew over an area that is carrying 75 feet of snow; and in parts of the Columbia watershed today—I visited the area some six weeks ago—there are places in which the snowfall has been recorded as being 40 per cent above that of last year. We are hopeful that we can get by, and I think possibly we will; but we have had cool nights lately. This is a situation over which we have as yet, as is the case with most governments of the world, no control. There may be scientific weather controls in later years, but we do not have them yet.

The great lakes is a particular case in point, because the area of drainage into the great lakes is only 201,000 square miles, whereas the great lakes themselves cover 95,000 square miles. Here again the difficulty that occurs is that there is a different ratio of drainage area in the case of each of the lakes. In the case of lake Superior it has a drainage area of only 48,000 square miles for 31,000 square miles of lake. In the case of lake Michigan it has 95,000 square miles of drainage area against 45,000 or about two to one. In lake Erie it is 30 to 10 and in lake Ontario there are 27,000 square miles of drainage area for only 7,500 square miles of lake. So that in this complex pattern with these enormous variations even the arranged feeding of water would be most difficult, costly and time consuming in that you might have to start the water 18 months ahead of the time it would flow out the other end of the lakes. These are complicating factors of the great lakes system.

[Mr. Laing.]

We are fully aware of the consequences of the present situation. We have been keeping in communication with the Americans on all these points and any of those man-made things to improve the situation which are possible at this time will be done by us from time to time in full co-operation with the Americans.

Again I want to say that in these circumstances the total accomplishments of man, compared with nature's count for very little at all. Those members of the house who are familiar with the situation will agree with me, I think, on the figures I am about to quote in respect of wheat production in the province of Saskatchewan. Last year, under ideal circumstances both in respect of volume and quality, the province of Saskatchewan produced 493 million bushels of wheat. I think it is also absolutely accurate that in the year 1938 the province of Saskatchewan produced 29 million bushels of wheat. It was not because the soil was poorer then than it is now. New methods of soil culture are being used and I rather think that members from Saskatchewan will confirm the fact that there was more fertility in the soil then than there is now. But what was lacking, of course, was water.

We are subject to these circumstances and must do the best we can with them. We have made very good progress in a great number of fields in dealing with the provinces. We are budgeting for over $2 million more for the water resources branch alone this year than the year before, but I must be fair and point out that about $1,300,000 of that amount represents additional sums of money paid in respect of the Winnipeg floodway over those spent the year before. But we are spending more money. We are taking on more staff, and we have been very successful in working more closely with the provinces on the matter of resources that lie within their own boundaries.

Mr. Martineau: I should like to ask the minister a question. Would he be prepared to recommend to the government that feasibility surveys be carried out immediately in regard to the diversion of the Hudson bay watershed or parts of it into the great lakes system?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, in that regard the waters concerned which flow westerly into James bay from Quebec are the property, of course, of the province of Quebec. We are aware only in the roughest detail of the proposal to which the hon. member has referred, known as the grand canal scheme, and I do not know that any economic studies have been worked out in that regard yet. But we will hear more and more of these things.

But I think one of the better things I could do would be to endeavour to refer the whole matter we are concerned with at the present time to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, not so much from the point of view of bringing out more information, although undoubtedly a number of briefs would be presented that would be extremely valuable, but rather to provide the public with an understanding and appreciation of the problems that we have in various parts of Canada and, probably more important, the tremendous asset we have in the great over-all supply of water that we in this nation possess.

Mr. Thomas: Can the minister advise the house whether or not the entrance to the St. Clair river has been deepened in recent years?

Mr. Laing: No, Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of that. I could obtain the information for the hon. gentleman, of course.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of discussing particularly the subamendment, and then I will make some references to the speech of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) which in my opinion represented a completely negative and defeatist attitude on the part of the government. Because of the fact that there is a subamendment I wish to read the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

> This house condemns the neglect of the government in failing to establish a co-ordinated national water policy and in ignoring the imminent national crisis in water resources management, which is evidenced by the critical low water levels of the great lakes and other national waters, the increasing pollution of national waters, and the urgent necessity of conserving water resources...
> And urges the government, in the interests of national development, to take immediate action...:
> (1) establishing a national advisory committee on water resources...
>
> (2) accelerating the application of ARDA policies to the problems of national resource development, and,
> (3) vigorously continuing and expanding the water and other resource development programs conceived and established by the previous Conservative government.

The subamendment moved by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) simply removes from the amendment moved for the official opposition most of the effective terms thereof. It entirely ignores the national crisis in water resources management. It entirely obliterates the necessity for the establishment of a national advisory committee on resources. Indeed, it emasculates the amendment and substitutes therefor one matter:

> That in the best interests of national development, the house urges the government to take concrete steps immediately to accelerate the application of ARDA.

We can concur entirely with the particular item in the subamendment and its objective, but if we were to vote for it we would be removing the major portions of our amendment and, indeed, would defeat the purpose for which our amendment was moved. As far as ARDA is concerned, which was established under a Conservative government, it is one of the most forward, one of the most effective programs ever enunciated in legislative form in the history of our country. It was entirely in keeping with the general attitude of the Conservative party, whose basic principle is to conserve these things that are good.

The Bennett government brought into effect the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which, in my province of Saskatchewan and the adjoining prairie provinces, brought about advances that were not even thought possible. The minister referred to wheat productivity in Saskatchewan in 1938. I recall the days of the dust bowl, the frightfulness of which cannot be translated into terms understandable today. Out of the experience of that drought era from 1929 or 1930 to the latter part of the thirties, there was born the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, and through P.F.R.A., changes and improvements have been made.

There is no doubt at all that if we were to accept the subamendment we would defeat the purpose for which the amendment was moved. Since the subamendment does remove the major portion of the material part of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), we cannot support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire). We think that in the best interest of national development the government should take concrete steps immediately to accelerate the application of ARDA. We believe that this government has dragged its feet on the ARDA program. Indeed, as one reads the evidence that was taken before the committee of the Senate on land use in Canada, one cannot but conclude that there has been a total lack of initiative and effort on the part of this government in carrying out the basic principles of ARDA.

This plan was a great step forward for soil and water conservation, and it has been left practically unimplemented, except in a comparatively minor degree. I am not going into the particulars in this regard, but they are set forth in the No. 2 report of the committee to which I referred a moment ago. Incidentally when so much is said by way of criticism of the other place, the work done by the committee under the chairmanship of Hon. Arthur Pearson and the deputy chairmanship of Hon.

Austin Taylor, has been worthy and commendable indeed. The information assembled by the committee, if used by the present government, could extend beyond one's imagination the benefits of ARDA, were that the desire of the government. When I look at what has happened on the western prairies I think of the words of Jeremiah when he said:

> And I brought you into a plentiful country, to eat the fruit and the goodness thereof; but when ye entered ye defiled my land, and made mine heritage an abomination.

This applies to what we have done. We have been wasteful and destructive of the great resources we have in our country. In the years ahead, 30 or 40 years from now, water will be more valuable to Canada if we maintain its purity than many of our other resources. I believe it was a great United States political philosopher who said that within 50 years water will be a more valuable resource than oil itself.

The minister always speaks delightfully and in the best debating traditions of parliament. I enjoy listening to him. However, at the conclusion of his remarks today I could not but conclude he realized he did not have any case, and therefore he had to speak in that kindly way that always characterizes him when he realizes he has a difficult, if not impossible, task.

Mr. Laing: Others shout loud.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, and the minister never shouts because he has nothing to shout about. I am glad he interrupted because he speaks with power and authority when he really has something to say. Today, he spoke with that deftness that comes about when he finds it necessary to adopt a conciliatory attitude to the house.

This problem has not come about recently. There was a warning issued by the Family Herald on July 4, 1963, and I should like to quote:

> Canada faces a serious water shortage. It's threatening the health and pocketbooks of a large part of our population right now and before long it's likely to affect us all in many ways. Within the life time of many readers not only the drier sections of the west but most of Canada will feel the pinch. A big, well-directed conservation and development program, launched right now, could keep a lot of people from being hurt. But any delay will increase the needs and lessen the effectiveness of control measures. Immediate action is urgently required.

This warning came from a responsible magazine, one that has served Canada well for many years. Then, it says:

> Although it can be argued that we faced unusually bad weather conditions this year, the fact remains that we are still grappling with a problem which has been created by our expanding population, the rapid advance of industry and agriculture, and modernization of life in the cities and towns and on the farm.

This is a serious and a difficult problem. Mention was made in a most able speech the other day by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris of the action taken by the government of which I had the honour to be the head. We founded the resources for tomorrow conference. It was founded on full co-operation between the dominion and provincial governments. We did not do our consultation in reverse. We did not wait until we found we had entered a field of provincial jurisdiction and then, in a spirit of frustration, have to back up and commence consultations. We brought about a degree of co-operation with all the provinces of Canada that promised well for the future of these resources, which come primarily under provincial jurisdiction although actually have a tremendous effect on the national economy.

One of the most striking statements made by any of the visitors to our country was made to me by the then prime minister of Israel, David Ben Gurion some years ago. His general statement might be summarized in this way: You have a great resource, a resource of particular value in your water, but how you waste it. We have done that. We have polluted our streams, and polluted streams are just as detrimental to Canada's economic future as would be a total absence of water. During the period we were in office we faced the problem of pollution by taking the first, the initial step towards giving assistance to municipalities to provide the necessary measures to meet the pollution problem.

These were steps forward. I do not say that a government can do everything in this regard or a group of governments operating together. But what has this government done? It simply sat, looked at the problem and failed to take any measure whatever of an effective nature. The spirit of resignation could not be better described than it was by the minister in early April—and I have not the quotation before me—when he said the answer to the lakes situation might be to pray for rain. There are many people across Canada today who are beginning to believe that prayer for a change of government might bring a changed attitude towards this problem.

The problem is a tremendous one. It is being faced in all parts of the world. Here in Canada, with the limitless resources we had and which we believed would last for all time, we now find that within a period of three or four decades our country will be a potential dust bowl unless governments act now.

I had hoped that the minister would give us a picture of what the government had in mind, but there was nothing of the kind.

There was simply uncertainty, simply a spirit that the problem is there—"but what can we do about it"? He said the provinces must be consulted, and so they must. In part it is an international problem, but the minister did not give one word concerning the government's plans to meet it. There was just the expression of a pious hope that possibly something will be brought about.

The minister said nothing to indicate that this matter was faced up to at the recent discussions between Canadian ministers and their counterparts in the United States, which were held here in Ottawa. He said nothing to indicate that even small projects are contemplated.

The province of Ontario has made a serious endeavour to meet the problem so far as it can, but it cannot meet a problem which has international and intranational difficulties that must be solved. There was not one word of hope in what the minister had to say.

Some countries are trying to meet this problem by desalinization of sea water. Must we in Canada follow that course? I hope not, but certainly there was nothing but hopelessness in what the minister said today. I saw something of this problem last fall when I was in the Middle East, where they are endeavouring to bring about a solution by breaking down sea water; but the costs are tremendous.

It is estimated that a $840 million nuclear plant could meet the water needs of 3 million to 6 million people. It is also estimated in our own country that within the next 20 years we will have to spend about $5 billions if we are to meet the problem of pollution and the wider problem of the preservation of our water resources. It is a challenge, one that is tremendous in scope. It needs a concept. But what is the concept of the government? After the minister had spoken for a while he finally concluded that to meet this problem, which was so frighteningly described by the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard), the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and the other hon. members who have spoken, the whole matter ought to be submitted to a committee of parliament so that briefs might be given thereon.

If the minister had presented some emergent program, something to meet the immediate problems, the larger and more extensive one that will take years to solve could possibly be postponed. But what is going to be done now? What is the situation in Chicago? Is the diversion that is taking place there extending beyond that which is permitted by international agreement? That is a matter upon which we have no information. What a spirit on the part of a government new in office and tired already, overwhelmed, and fearful. Its members say there is nothing they can do about it and that there are all kinds of constitutional difficulties. Surely there is somebody over there who will say there is some hope that something can be done. Unless there is emergent action taken now, the tremendous tourist traffic Canada enjoys, by reason of the action taken by the Conservative government in the devaluation of the dollar, will be lost and, once lost, not regained.

What of the people engaged in the tourist business? They are actually elevated into space, with their marinas up in the air—occupying a similar position to the government in this regard.

The minister went far afield. He went out to British Columbia. It is a wonderful place to go, a wonderful province; and he went out to the prairies. I say, let us get back to the problem that exists in Ontario and to a lesser degree in Quebec, the problem that is covered by this amendment.

There has never been a government shown so barren of ideas as this one in the address by the minister, assisted during the past two days by two others on the periphery of the cabinet. I ask the government, why are you opposed to the establishment of a national advisory committee to assist in co-ordinating national resource development? Why have you allowed ARDA to become almost a dead letter? A comparison was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), but the figures he gives are meaningless in face of the great opportunities that ARDA provides. If ever a government stood convicted by its defender, that government sits opposite today, for the whole defence consisted of coming before parliament and saying, "Things are bad; they could be worse. They may be worse, but we have not a suggestion of an idea as to what should be done, either by way of emergent action now or for the future." That is not enough.

I am not dealing with the major problem of the future, though it is one that will have to be tackled. These rivers that flow into Hudson bay will have to be reversed and their waters brought into those portions of our country which need them, both because of their industries and their populations. These will be tremendous projects; but what is the hope today for the tourist operator on lake Huron? What hope is there for him in a government that simply points out this is a grave problem, but it has not a suggestion of an idea to deal with it, and that it has to get in touch with the provinces with regard to what could be done? What about co-operative action between the provinces and the dominion? We have not heard one word of what has been done to ensure that the great lakes shall not continue to get lower and lower.

All we have from the minister is the answer that some years ago the water levels were higher than usual, therefore the fact that they are lower today than they have ever been, and that the trend is downward, is something they have not had time to look into while looking into the other problems they have faced with equal determination and effectiveness. Surely there is someone sitting over there who will rise up and say: These are a few plans we have in mind. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) and others who spoke, placed the problem before the house and asked for action to be taken on behalf of their constituents.

Some people ask: Why do you move a vote of non-confidence on a matter such as this? Well, such votes as this are moved simply in pursuance of the rights of parliament. These votes of non-confidence have been moved throughout the years. Sometimes I read of ministers sitting opposite, together with some of those who are in the outer realms, looking generally to the opportunity to serve in the future in the higher ranks of cabinet posts and saying: Why these votes of non-confidence? I shall not go into that matter now, except to say this, that during the period when we were in office, with the opposition a comparative minority of the house, with one exception in five and a half years every one of the motions to go into supply had an amendment which constituted a vote of non-confidence. How are we to get this matter before the house if we do not follow this course? There is no opportunity to raise it on any other occasion and get the view of the government. We cannot obtain it through questions. Look at the order paper and see the number of questions which remain unanswered, many of them because they represent embarrassment to the government. We cannot bring this up in any other way. Bring it up as a private member's bill, and what happens? It comes, and it goes. Bring it in as a resolution and it is talked out after an hour and goes to the bottom of the list. There is only one way in which the opposition can declare its policies or call upon the government to act in an important matter facing the nation, and that is through the instrumentality of motions to go into supply.

Today, one of the reasons parliament is criticized is because it is said there are so many of these motions. Well, there are no more motions this year, or last year, than there were in every year when we were in office. The only difference is that we spread them out and people forgot about them, whereas this government brings them along week after week.

Mr. Laing: Could we get back to water?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad of that interruption. The hon. gentleman was not thinking very much about that subject when he was talking about it. He did not at any time address himself to the amendment or attempt to deal with the problem. He simply threw up his hands in a spirit of resignation and indicated to the people of Ontario, of Quebec and of the rest of Canada: This is a tremendous problem and we have not an idea in the world as to what should be done; we have, to all intents and purposes, rendered ARDA nugatory, so what should we do but pray for rain? Laudable as is the recognition on the part of the minister of the power of prayer, we are dealing at the moment with a problem which the government of Canada cannot place on some supernatural level. We want it at this level.

What does the government intend to do? What lies ahead? I listened to the minister and the two other hon. gentlemen who spoke from that side. These were able young men; I like to hear young men going into parliament and making an effective contribution. Those two young men did the best they could, but what a brief they had—nothing to stand on, nothing to answer the amendment, excepting an unusual collection of bureaucratic generalizations brought together with a desire to befog the issue.

All I can say is that here is a problem which is emergent at the moment, a problem which will become national in the years ahead. What action does the government intend to take to meet this emergency? Not one scintilla of evidence has been advanced with respect to a single idea which the government may have on this subject, except to exercise an appeal for guidance from above. The people today are asking this government to give them guidance here and action now instead of this pusillanimous pursuit of uncertainty and evasion.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): When I was listening to the minister delivering his oration and, later, when listening to the observations of the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) I could not help thinking of the story of the old countryman who, when he was asked by a friend if he could read, said: "Well, to tell the truth, I can and I can't". His friend asked: "What do you mean?". "Well," he says, "I tell you. When I sees a sign on the road going somewhere I can read how far, but I can't tell where to". I thought of that when I was listening to the observations of those hon. gentlemen.

I was impressed by one thing about the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition; I can go away convinced, and tell everyone, that he has a full knowledge of the value of pure water. As far as the minister is concerned—and I listened carefully to what he said—I think he laid greater emphasis on the necessity for prayer than on the need for government policy in this respect, and I support the criticism made by the Leader of the Opposition in this regard. I would judge, from the hon. gentleman's speech this afternoon and from other speeches he has made—and I know he is a person with the best of intentions—that he depends on meetings and press relations without conclusions. He depends on the studies by his officials and by his staff in the water resources branch, without sufficient funds to undertake adequate research. That is a general criticism of his branch. I do not blame the individuals concerned. They can use slide rules and make calculations as well as anyone else. But the water resources branch lacks the funds, lacks the staff, and lacks the support of government policy, plus an over-all plan in co-operation with the provinces, to enable it to do really effective work. I think this is basically the reason we have made so little progress in introducing these programs in Canada as compared with what has been done in the United States.

This is a question which, I think should be treated from a non-partisan point of view and I intend to take my usual position in that regard.

Now I wish to deal with the amendment, Mr. Speaker, which starts out to condemn the government and then concludes as follows:

(3) vigorously continuing and expanding the water and other resources development programs conceived and established by the previous Conservative government.

I do not like that partisan approach to this particular problem. We condemn the government for their activity rather than their inactivity in some respects, but I will come to that later.

Then I come to the subamendment, which is based on the belief of the party supporting it that the question of the development of water resources is a provincial responsibility and is a matter only of provincial concern. We cannot agree with that contention. While we give every support to the ARDA policy and give the former government credit for its introduction, let me truthfully say—I do not want to appear self-righteous because that is not a habit of the members of this party—that we are the only ones who have had a consistent policy regarding the development and conservation throughout the years of our natural resources, our outlook being based on the over-all philosophy of life with regard to human beings, not on political expediency or the ebb and flow of political tides.

I am rather pleased to see that we have had some influence on the members of the official opposition in view of the fact that the major content of their amendment follows along the lines we have been developing for many years. On behalf of this party, for a period of over ten years I have moved this following motion:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of the creation of a water pollution control division, composed of representatives of the ten provinces, within the framework of the proposed national resources council, with powers and funds required to institute research programs, collect, collate, and analyse water control data, and to co-ordinate the water pollution control objectives for the provinces; in addition, to further the study of water pollution control problems of a national character.

In moving this motion, we in this party recognized the need for an over-all approach to the problem, as well as the need for co-operation between federal and provincial governments. This includes the necessity for a policy which is based on research information and co-operation. For years this motion has been embraced with great affection by members on the government side of the house, without regard to which party they belonged, but the motion was always finally talked out. However, I will give the minister's parliamentary secretary credit in that the last time this motion was debated he agreed that the motion would be referred to the ministers council which was formed after the conference on resources for tomorrow, and I hope those ministers will give some consideration to this aspect of our water resources problem in Canada.

I think it is correct to say that all through the history of Canada, to date, governments on the whole have shown a shocking neglect of the establishment of policies to meet this growing problem effectively. This opinion has been placed on the record repeatedly and I am not going to labour it at this point. However, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) who made some quite appropriate remarks yesterday on this topic. He dealt with the seriousness of the question, and then as reported at page 2906 of Hansard went on to say this:

Getting back to the question of water, Mr. Speaker, and the preservation and conservation of our water resources, I think it is well for us to consider the position of Canada today in relation to the water resources that we have, and also to rely on some of the experiences other nations have had, so that we can in fact look into the future and develop programs which will help Canada to avoid these other problems.

I could go on and refer to the figures he quoted regarding the value placed on water in the United States, but I hope that when the hon. member comes to consider other important water problems facing Canada at the present time, including treaties and legislation, he will remember these words and think of the experiences of other nations whose interests were not protected at the time certain arrangements were entered into.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, the basic importance of water for human existence. Quite recently Sir H. Broadley of the United Nations said at a London University lecture:

There is the problem of water supplies; just imagine what quantities of water would be required if all the world adopted our domestic habit of bathing, and at the same time developed factories, atomic energy plants and all other increasing ways for which water is used in great quantities.

In that respect I think the members of this house would be well advised to use their imaginations.

This subject is not a colourful one. It is an important subject but it does not get recognized by the press as one which is, shall I say, colourful enough to justify making a long report about it. There are a small number of the members of our press gallery who are interested in this problem and report faithfully in a few of our newspapers the debates on this important question. I am glad to say that one of these is a young and delightful member of the press gallery, and I hope she makes a very good report of my speech this afternoon.

We have been talking of water in terms of power; but when we think of human existence and human happiness we think of water first of all from the point of view of its domestic use and its consumption by human beings. Second, we think of its recreational values for the enjoyment of human beings; we think of those pleasures that can refresh a man to a far greater extent than attendance at a beer parlour on most occasions, or at a movie show. Then there is the development of fish life and that sort of thing. Next comes industrial uses upon which are based industries from which people earn their livings. Then there is navigation, which is followed by irrigation, the flowing of water on to the soil to produce larger crops which are required to feed the increasing population of the world. Finally there is power production. Over the years we have been able to develop power by various means; but we have never yet discovered a way of producing fresh water in large quantities at economical cost.

[Mr. Herridge.]

The pollution of our streams, the lowering of water levels in the lakes and the lowering of our water tables generally throughout the land, as well as floods in many places and, I am sorry to say—I hope I am forgiven for mentioning this fact—the existence of treaties like the Columbia river treaty, all indicate the great need for a national policy with regard to the conservation and development of our water resources. To indicate the concern in my own district perhaps I might mention a matter which has been of interest to numerous groups throughout the years. I remember when I first came to the house in 1946 receiving letters from Legions in Medicine Hat, Alberta, from the Medicine Hat trades and labour council, from the municipal district of Bow Island and from the water conservation committee of Medicine Hat and Lethbridge, the content of which dealt with the necessity for a water policy and with the great need for canals and the conservation of water to service the thirsty land of Alberta.

This was in 1946. How far have we got along this course? Then we come again to 1949. I remember that the agricultural institute of Canada, of which I have the honour to be a chartered and a life member, presented resolutions to the minister of agriculture of that day urging a similar policy; the need for a national policy for the conservation of our land and water resources. There was a great deal said at that time, but we have not any national policy for the conservation of our water resources today; we have a bits and bobs policy. I am not going to take the time to read the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Then in 1952 we had the Canadian forestry association dealing with the same problem and mentioning the necessity for a national policy on water conservation. They gave evidence of the depleted water resources found all across our country in dried up streams, lowering water tables, and ever more frequent floods. That was in 1952. It is now 1964 and we still have no national policy with respect to water conservation. Then we come to a conference that was called planning Canada's resources for the future, the first conference of its kind, called by the Canadian forestry association, at the Chateau Laurier hotel, Ottawa, on April 22 and 23, 1954. I attended that conference. There again, Mr. Speaker, there was a discussion of this very important problem. One of the resolutions passed asked for a national policy for the control and development of the nation's water resources. As I said, this was in 1954, and this conference was called as the result of provincial conferences and the activities of other groups. I give credit to the community groups throughout the nation that have been interested in this problem throughout the years; but if we are going to be effective there has to be leadership at the federal and provincial levels to give effect to a program that will preserve these water resources for the Canadian people.

I want to bring to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, a rather unusual situation that occurred recently in Kootenay West. The people in the Kootenays are concerned with the question of water pollution particularly, and also with the question of the use of the waters of the Columbia basin in Canada for Canadians of this and future generations. I have said that before. They are concerned about pollution. Municipal councils have met and regional groups have met to study this question. On the whole our waters are free of pollution, except in the lower portion of the Columbia river, say from Castlegar to the international boundary. But people are very concerned with the problem of an increase of this pollution and they called in the deputy minister of health for the province. I want to read this editorial to show the approach to this problem on the part of our provincial government. This is an editorial which appeared in the Trail Daily Times, a newspaper that takes a great deal of delight in hammering hell out of me. In this case I agree with what they have to say; I always give credit to my opposition when they say things of which I approve. Just listen to this, Mr. Speaker. This is the approach to this water problem:

> We Can't Drink "Averages".
> "How do you drink an average?"
>
> It sounded like a joke when it was asked at the annual meeting of the West Kootenay union board of health this week, but there was really nothing very funny about it at all.
>
> The question arose out of a completely inadequate answer given by Dr. James Taylor, the deputy minister of health, to some other questions about the state of the Columbia river.
> Dr. Taylor implied that pollution control board secretary Keenan hadn't really meant it when he wrote to the Kinnaird council warning that we were rapidly approaching the point where chlorination would become ineffective as a method of treating Columbia river water.

They are particularly concerned about this because of the tremendous pollution that will occur if the High Arrow dam is built. This editorial continues:

> He said that Mr. Keenan's water sample statistics should be regarded from the standpoint of average. Conditions in the river, Dr. Taylor said, "fluctuate".
>
> In other words, chlorinated river water may be "safe" one day and "unsafe" the next; but on an average over a period, statistically the river is "safe".
> Unfortunately, the people of the Columbia riverside communities don't drink statistical averages. They drink water—

—like the right hon. leader of the official opposition—

> —and it is a bit thick for some hidebound civil servants from Victoria to come in here and try to kid us to believe otherwise.
>
> It is patent nonsense to propose that because the Columbia bacteriological count is well down some of the time and dangerously high at other times, that you can go on to strike a mathematical average and call the water "safe".
> The pollution control board and the department of health have got to do better than that.

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, to indicate how they are trying to deal with a question like this which is of such great importance to the people directly concerned. This is another indication of the necessity for federal leadership and some co-ordination of policies. They are getting absolutely nowhere with the provincial pollution control board. They simply come in and hold meetings; they do not take any effective action. This editorial was sent to me and brought to my attention, as a matter of fact, by quite a prominent supporter of the government—and I have some of those as well.

I just want to deal with another aspect of this question and quote from some speeches, copies of which have been sent to me. These speeches were delivered in Portland, Oregon, on November 5, 1963. The first one from which I wish to quote was an address given by Major General W. W. Lapsley before the inland empire waterways association. The title of his talk was "Thirty Years of Water Resource Development", and he said:

> As an indicator of future development—we have $1.8 million in the FY 1964 budget for some 35 general investigations, including—

Listen to this. We were told that precedents were not set by the treaty:

> —the unprecedented Rampart project on the Yukon river in Alaska.

You see where they are starting. They have already voted money for these investigations. I hope the minister has noticed this, because this money has been voted by the United States senate:

> By FY 1966 we will need about $3 million for general investigations. Funds for comprehensive studies of the Willamette and Puget Sound basins are included in the FY 1964 budget and a comprehensive study of the Columbia is authorized.

Here is the interesting quotation from the speech of this well informed American. He is dealing with the Columbia all through the speech, and he said:

> The future looks bright. You might even say it looks as if we "have made it"—but don't be too sure.

He was dealing with the procrastination on the part of the Canadian parliament in ratifying the treaty. I want to quote from the remarks of Mr. H. T. Nelson, regional director, bureau of reclamation, at the 30th anniversary of the inland empire waterways association, Portland, Oregon, on November 4, 1963:

Now let's compare what this economic growth, as illustrated by our experiences on the Columbia river basin project, could mean in future years along the Columbia. Looking at the part of the Columbia river basin along the main stem of the river itself, and up the tributaries to the limits of commercial navigation, we find that there are presently about one and a half million acres irrigated. In future years supplemental waters could be supplied to somewhat over 800,000 acres, and over two million acres of new lands could be brought under irrigation. Just looking at it from a conservation standpoint, in the future we can foresee the irrigation development of from five to six times the area which was actually irrigated on the Columbia basin project in 1962. This would mean, then, that if a similar growth pattern occurred, as was experienced on the Columbia basin project, that there would be a tremendous upsurge in the basic economy of this area.

This is to indicate what they are thinking all the time. You must remember that in this case these gentlemen are talking of the basin to the south of us, the Columbia basin, the states of Washington, Idaho, Montana and California to the south. I am going to requote a paragraph from the Phoenix Gazette of Tuesday, April 7, 1964 which was brought to the attention of the house by my leader last night. The newspaper contains an article dealing with the question of the need for water in Arizona. What does it say?

So this leaves outside sources, and while officially no one would say just where these sources might be, privately some agreed that the huge Columbia river probably would hold best promise of a future supply. Water experts have said the state might possibly get up to 12 million acre feet annually from such a source. The Columbia river is in the Pacific northwest.

You can see how these people are short of water, and I do not blame them for being concerned.

Mr. Laing: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Herridge: Willingly.

Mr. Laing: Would he be surprised to know that the projects which we are either pursuing in active co-operation with the provinces now or are negotiating with the provinces will embrace an expenditure of several times the amount of money that General Lapsley referred to in respect of Rampart.

Mr. Herridge: First of all, I am both pleased and surprised, but the minister is quoting national figures. The figures given here are for a very small area of the United States. I want to give a quotation from "Men and Water", a speech made by Senator Henry M. Jackson, chairman, interior and insular affairs committee, at the 30th annual convention of the inland empire waterways association, Portland, Oregon, November 4, 1963. This is interesting. After talking about what the development of the Columbia will mean to them he says that these are the benefits:

First, and not necessarily in order of importance, by 1980 our present population of about 5½ million is expected to increase to about 8 million. While this poses the problem of finding a million new jobs, the very increase in population itself will tend to stimulate economic growth by increasing consumer demand.

This is the Columbia river basin in the United States about which he is talking.

Second, our basic lumber products industry appears to have weathered the worst and is shifting to more sophisticated forest products.

He goes on to refer to refinements in manufacturing and the building of more paper mills. We sell our timber to pulp mills and so far as paper is concerned, allow the processing to be done largely in the United States.

The greater degree of finished processing of northwest forest products offers opportunity for new jobs and, at the minimum, stability in a field that historically has provided our region with two out of every five jobs.

Third, our large and abundant supply of cool, clean water which industry increasingly requires.

Fourth, the ingenuity, resourcefulness and aggressiveness of our northwest citizens in developing new economic opportunity.

Finally, and perhaps most important of all, there is our great supply of low cost hydroelectric power, with more yet to be developed, which provides the lowest cost energy base in the nation for industry.

I have quoted these extracts from this speech made by this gentleman at this most important conference to show that the people there realize what this treaty means to them, what this additional water from Canada means to them in terms of power, in terms of flood control, in terms of irrigation, in terms of jobs, industry and so on.

I think that the conditions we find in Canada in many cases with respect to pollution of our streams, the lowering of our great lakes water levels, the circumstances we find ourselves in with regard to the Columbia treaty and the multitude of investigations that must be done before we can develop our water resources across this country logically and efficiently, indicate more than ever the pressing need for a national water resources policy developed as the result of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, based on research, based on adequate information, based on an educational program and based on the necessary publicity to inform the Canadian people of what is being done and of the purposes and objectives of such a policy.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, in proposing their amendment and subamendment, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) and the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) both condemned the attitude of the government toward the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, also known as ARDA. Some members of the opposition, including the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) also referred to ARDA and the government's approach to it.

In the few minutes at my disposal, I should like, in a purely non-partisan frame of mind, to sketch the history of that legislation and describe what happened. It was in June 1961, you will recall, that the house passed the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act. A few months later, the government of the day appointed a director in charge of administration of this legislation, and agreements between the federal and provincial governments were signed in 1962.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we must give credit to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), now sitting in opposition, because he was mainly responsible for the implementation of this legislation which, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, is perhaps the most interesting legislation passed by both houses under the previous government.

The Prime Minister of Canada has recognized the importance of this legislation and that of rural development. That is why, in February last, he entrusted me with the responsibility of administrating this legislation, and I am proud that, to the responsibilities of the Department of Forestry, the Prime Minister has added those of rural development and, more particularly, the administration of ARDA.

I have been responsible for the administration of that act for two months, and I wish to tell the house how happy I am about this, not only because this piece of legislation offers tremendous possibilities, but also because it is imbued with a spirit that is quite special. It is an act that does not fall within the ordinary framework and which allows the government to accomplish many things with the provinces for the development of rural resources.

It will be remembered also that, at the outset, this act was of an agricultural nature. But it was easily realized that rural problems could not be solved if rural resources as a whole were not dealt with at the same time, that is, forestry, tourists, fishing, the establishment of small industries and the elaboration of policies likely to promote the development of certain rural areas.

What is known as ARDA constitutes a joint program, which means that it calls for the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments. It is up to the people living in rural areas to take the initiative of suggesting to their respective provincial government programs for the development of their district. Then, provincial governments having approved such programs submit them to the federal government. Therefore, the initiative is not ours. We discuss programs and projects which are submitted to us by provincial governments.

When I assumed the responsibility for the administration of this act, I undertook to visit each and every province in Canada. I think that discussion with provincial ministers responsible for the administration of the act and with provincial officials responsible for its application is the best way to know what they think about the act which, after all, was passed only about three years ago. I also think this is one way of livening up co-operative federalism about which we now hear so much.

Hon. members are aware that the agreements signed with the provinces will expire on March 31, 1965. I hope that, within a few weeks, I will have called on all provincial officials responsible for the administration of that act and that a few weeks later, in June or July, I can hold a meeting with the most interested parties from the provincial and the federal government to review the very basis of that legislation, problems resulting from its administration and improvements that will have to be submitted to the approval of the house next fall.

A few hon. members said that the government had failed to deal with that legislation since coming into power. You will understand that I do not want to indulge in party politics but figures indicate that quite the opposite is true. I do not blame in any way our predecessors, who did not have time to apply that legislation, since it started to operate in the fall of 1962 only, and, as we know, in April 1963 there was a change of government.

The fact remains that since the change in government a great many projects have been approved by the federal government following submissions by the various provincial governments; projects are under way in every province of Canada, and every province is interested in ARDA. To date, 450 projects requiring commitments of $14 million from the federal government have been approved by that government. It would be difficult for me to say exactly how many projects have been approved since the new government took over, but I am under the impression that at least 50 per cent of those projects—

Mr. Pigeon: What is the province's share?

Mr. Caouette: May I ask the minister a question? While he is dealing with the subject could he give us the figures by provinces?

Mr. Sauvé: I shall be pleased to give you the figures for each province, if that may be of interest to you.

In Newfoundland, 32 projects were approved, the federal government being committed for more than $488,000. Prince Edward Island, 18 projects were approved, the share of the federal government being $130,000. In Nova Scotia, 34 projects were approved, the federal government being committed for $425,000. In New Brunswick, 25 projects were approved, the federal government's share being $438,000. In the province of Quebec, 103 projects were approved, the federal government being committed for $2,842,000. In Ontario, 29 projects were approved, the federal government being committed for $2,185,000. In Manitoba, 49 projects were approved, the federal government being committed for $1,745,000. For Saskatchewan, 77 projects have been approved, with a commitment by the federal government of $4,127,000. For Alberta, 22 projects have been approved, with a commitment by the federal government of $1,253,000. For British Columbia, 16 projects have been approved, involving a commitment by the federal government of $508,000. This, therefore, makes up a grand total of 405 projects, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, involving federal government commitments for the sum of $14,143,000.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I only wish to ask a question.

Can the minister tell the house what main areas of the province of Quebec will be affected by ARDA, without giving any details?

Mr. Sauvé: I do not want to give a detailed answer, but I can tell the hon. members that, in a few days, we shall have the pleasure of sending them a paper that I have here, before me, showing the ARDA projects as a whole, as of March 23, 1964. You will find here plenty of details; moreover, we shall send you documents which may enable you to evaluate for yourselves the scope of ARDA.

Mr. Pigeon: I thank the hon. minister.

Mr. Sauvé: These sums of money have been spent where there were commitments. Many problems still have to be reconsidered, and probably a new direction of ARDA will be proposed to the house. I am not sure yet, because until I have visited all the provinces to discuss with their representatives the application of this act and its consequences on the betterment of standards of living in the rural class, it will be impossible for me to say exactly what the final direction of this legislation will be.

However, it is clear, since this legislation was discussed during election campaigns, that great hopes have been instilled in rural areas. Quite a few citizens thought that once ARDA was approved, every problem facing the rural classes would be settled. I do not want to criticize anybody. It often happens that, during an election, people become enthusiastic and you feel that, for reasons known to everybody, you have to stress certain hopes which, a few months later, prove impractical.

In most provinces, and more particularly in eastern Canada, farmers and other rural people, who are perhaps not farmers and do not earn their living through farming, would like to see immediate results. People complain that it takes too long to consider and reconsider problems; and I think that, on the whole, they are right to ask for immediate results and the concrete solution of certain problems. To my mind those problems could be immediately solved by the programs devised to improve the various areas.

The people in the rural areas are concerned about what will happen when the studies are completed. As you know, intensive studies are being made in several areas of Canada, but the people wonder if the government will consider its task as completed when the studies are over. I think that we will have the responsibility to show those people that the government is serious when it talks of the development of resources in rural areas.

I also found during my visit that the people were concerned because the authorities had not always succeeded in interesting them in the improvement of their living conditions. In several provinces, they have started to set up organizations of social leaders, that is organizations made up of persons having the responsibility of explaining to the people what ARDA is, what projects are under way, why research is being conducted, why such solution is proposed. The idea is to associate the people living in rural areas with the solution of their problems.

Mr. Speaker, during the first two or three years ARDA has been in existence, it has been found that this legislation really had wide applications. In the interest of the persons concerned themselves, that is people in rural areas who have a low standard of living, it will probably be necessary to restrict the scope of ARDA, in order to actually work for the improvement of living conditions in rural areas.

I do not want to conclude those few remarks without mentioning an exceptional experiment which is now going on in nine ridings of eastern Quebec—under the supervision of the eastern Quebec development bureau—which is described as a pilot area of ARDA.

There, for almost a year, some 60 persons have been thoroughly studying all the resources in the area and looking for solutions that would improve living conditions of these rural dwellers, who have often been neglected, as we were inclined to solve part of their problems through social security measures rather than through a rational organization of local resources.

The rural development office for eastern Quebec is something unique in this country; it is headed by young economists, sociologists and scientists who, under the direction of the lower St. Lawrence guidance council and the Gaspé peninsula economic guidance council, have endeavoured to find a solution to the local problems.

In a few weeks from now, we will invite members of parliament and newspapermen to come and see for themselves the extraordinary work which is being done in Gaspé in co-operation with the Quebec government and with the approval of both the federal and the provincial governments.

With those few words, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the house to ARDA, a truly remarkable piece of legislation which deserves the support of all hon. members, regardless of party affiliation. In my opinion, it offers the means to solve the problem of low income in rural areas.

Obviously, it will be impossible to do so overnight, but within a certain period of time, and with the support of all hon. members, I hope we will be able to improve the condition of rural residents.

Then, people will say that for once we, on the government side, and hon. members of the opposition have unanimously agreed on the need to work together to improve the standard of living of our fellow citizens.

[Text]

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, on quite a number of occasions during the past few weeks I have indicated my concern to the house with respect to the great lakes water levels. Some people have failed to understand the importance of this problem and I would direct their attention to the headline in today's Globe and Mail which says, "Government under fire on issue of lake levels." Anything with which the official opposition can hit the front page of the Globe and Mail must have real significance. A further indication of the widespread interest in this problem is a reference to it in the Mount Forest Confederate, a newspaper in a town which is many miles away from the great lakes area, and many miles from my radio station, but nevertheless it picked up my radio address on water levels in the great lakes and gave it front page headlines. Therefore the problem does have some significance.

The water levels in Georgian bay have become progressively worse over the past three or four years. Early this year indications were coming from reliable sources that the water would reach an all time low in the great lakes, especially in lake Huron and Georgian bay. To build my case, Mr. Speaker, I must present the following evidence so that I can point out something specific.

On March 24 last, as recorded at page 1405 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) the following question:

> If low water levels create a hazardous situation in any harbour on the great lakes, will the minister give the house his assurance that he will give the problem his immediate remedial attention?

The reply was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not follow very well the point the hon. member has in mind, but I am going to look into this matter.

Then on April 6 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the following question:

> What measures does the government plan to take to cope with the serious low water situation in Georgian bay and lake Huron?

Mr. Speaker suggested that this question go on the order paper. I appealed to the Speaker and said, "This is a serious situation in my riding," but Mr. Speaker insisted that similar questions had been asked. I then put this supplementary question to the Prime Minister:

> —owing to the fact that this is a matter of international consequence, has he been contacted by the United States government in respect of this problem?

The Prime Minister replied:

> Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I know it is a serious matter, and if the hon. gentleman would put his question on the order paper, that would give us a chance to make a thorough examination of the matter.

Within a few minutes a note was brought to me from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) which said that in reply to a question a few days previously he had promised to make a statement on the matter but, owing to the report of his department being incomplete he had asked for further information. When I was in conversation with him later, he promised to bring in a report the following Wednesday or Thursday.

Late during the question period on the following Thursday, when it had become apparent he would not make a voluntary statement, I asked him the following question:

Is the minister prepared to make a statement with respect to his findings concerning water levels on the great lakes?

The minister replied:

Our branch officials concerned are finding this a very complex matter. A complete statement is being prepared, and it will be of such length that I think I shall be asking the house to agree that it be printed without being read. However, it is not completed yet.

On April 10, at the conclusion of the four day, semi-annual meeting of the international joint commission, a press release underlined the seriousness of the situation. In the hope that information was available other than the press release, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) if he would table the report received by our government from the commission. A day or two later the Prime Minister tabled the report, which was so vague I could hardly believe it to be the commission's release. I have it here, and with the exception of two paragraphs it is chiefly statistics. I would like to put these two paragraphs on the record. The first reads:

As the prospects for this year are not encouraging and supplies in the upper lakes are below normal, the international joint commission and its board of control will direct their efforts to alleviate the effects of low water conditions to the maximum extent possible.

The final paragraph reads:

It feels, however, that all affected interests should be forewarned that notwithstanding the fact that all regulatory works will continue to be operated in accordance with the order of approval, a continuation of the existing drought could result in water supply conditions worse than experienced last year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here a clipping of an article from the Montreal Gazette of April 13, which gives more detail and offers more constructive suggestions. It states that the——American co-chairman of the two nation supervisory body, revealed that the levels are the lowest in some 100 years and that a bold, long term approach must be made to divert rivers and streams to feed the lakes and prevent damage that could reach into millions of dollars.

"We need men of vision to consider radical new plans if we are to overcome this adverse cycle of nature" he claimed.

Arnold Heeney, Mr. Roncalio's Canadian counterpart, agreed that the situation is "very bad". Mr. Heeney disclosed that the commission's appraisal of the situation would be forwarded immediately to the two central governments.

This marked the first indication that the situation has reached the stage where the two federal governments might become involved at the top level.

Neither side was willing to disclose details of their report but it was understood the commission informed the governments that no water level improvement is likely this year or next and that the commission will do what it can to minimize any hardships that may occur.

[Mr. Noble.]

The situation now has alarmed American interests to the point where a committee of 10 senators from states in the great lakes area conferred with their chairman in a special private conference to explore what could be done to alleviate the crisis.

Their chairman informed them the only long-term solution appeared to be one of diverting streams and rivers that feed into Hudson bay or other adjacent areas into the great lakes.

He said there is a limit as to how much diversion would be feasible but some major new plan had to be considered or the lakes basin would face more trouble in the future.

"There is no quick solution in sight," he explained. "We've got to have men of vision and guts to explore sweeping new programs or we will face more hardship and more financial damage in later years."

Then, on April 17, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, put in his report—a report which was rather in the nature of a review of the situation than a recommendation for relief measures.

The narrow catchment area south of the great lakes has become one of the most heavily populated and highly industrialized parts of the entire world. This applies also to the Canadian side in southern Ontario. The huge inland reservoirs constituted by the great lakes have been treated as though they were inexhaustible, but the toll is becoming more and more evident as the problems of the dwindling flow from the watersheds are multiplied through the drain of increasing consumptive use and the relentless pressure of withdrawals to the water-deficient parts of the Mississippi basin only a short distance to the south.

The situation is forcibly brought home to us in reports such as the following—this one appeared in the March edition of "Ship-Shore", and I should like to quote from it:

It has been estimated that each one inch that the level of lake Huron goes down represents a power loss of $1,000,000 a year, with shipping losses in freight unable to be carried, at a quarter of a million.

Then I have another from the Telegram of April 4, 1964. I should like to put this on record, also.

Big cargo vessels can't get into ports early in the season without cutting tonnage.

Captain Bert Bazeley, fleet manager for Upper Lakes Shipping Ltd., Toronto, says each of the company's 10 large carriers is shipping 1,000 tons light every trip.

It's the same story with other fleets.

Tourist operators, commercial fishermen and cottagers on Georgian bay have literally been left high and dry.

Heavier boats will have to be dragged to water which once lapped at boat houses and docks.

I do not think the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) will have an opportunity to speak. This matter affects his riding and I will, if I may, read the following quotation also from the same paper:

The water is so low at Collingwood that the town's main industry, Collingwood Shipbuilding Ltd., may have to shut down, throwing 1,000 persons out of work.

I have a short quotation here, too, from the Toronto daily Star which I should like to place on record:

Ontario hydro's coal bill is going up. When water levels are low, it has to burn coal to produce electricity at steam generating plants to make up for lost production at hydraulic plants.

Last year it lost 3.5 billion kilowatt hours of production on the St. Lawrence and Niagara rivers, had to buy $13 million worth of coal. In the first three months this year, lost production was 60 per cent higher even than in the same period last year.

My concern, now, is the need for immediate attention to the problem which has arisen in the Owen Sound harbour, affecting in particular the Russel Brothers boatworks in the outer harbour. Russel Brothers have operated successfully in Owen Sound for many years. The original owners are now deceased and the firm was taken over by three employees. These three men found it a large and difficult undertaking to carry on with limited means. Nevertheless, they have managed to keep their staff of 180 men at work. Now they are confronted with the problem of getting new vessels launched. A harbour firefighting tug for Toronto was completed for April for delivery on May 1. Knowing of this delivery date and the condition of the approaches to the plant, I alerted the government with questions on the subject as early as March 24 when I directed a question to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets). A few days later I directed a further question to the Prime Minister and, in addition, I spoke privately to two other members of the cabinet. I also got in touch with the district engineer who was familiar with the situation, and in a letter to myself dated April 16, he said:

Thank you very much for your letter of April 13, 1964. The problem of Russel Brothers Limited, Owen Sound, due to low water is indeed distressing. Each mail now brings to my attention a request for assistance in a similar situation. The Georgian bay level is the lowest on record and it is forecast to go even lower. The cost of remedial measures could be monstrous.

I am making a full report to the department on the problem you have outlined and I hope something can be done to relieve it. I share your concern and am giving this matter my personal attention.

I have a further letter from the district engineer dated April 30. Hon. members will note there is an interval of two weeks between the time I received the letter I have just read and the time I got this one.

I have deferred replying to your letter concerning dredging at Russel Bros. at Owen Sound, awaiting word from the department. No word has come yet, nor have funds been authorized for the work. The dredge at Wiarton belongs to Simcoe Dock and Dredge Co.

I had found out that there was a dredge at Wiarton, only a few miles from where this relief work needed to be done, and Mr. Henderson advised me that this dredge belonged to the Simcoe Dock and Dredge Company. The letter continued:

It would be necessary to have the project approved and funds authorized before I could hire a dredge to do the work.

Every day brings correspondence from someone suffering from low water on lake Huron. The water level is at an all-time low and we have a heavy volume of requests for dredging, extension of marine structures, floats, lowering of decks, of docks, etc.

I will not quote any further—

Mr. Knowles: Six o'clock.

Mr. Noble: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock are as follows: the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon); the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) on a matter having to do with lay-offs at Enamel and Heating Products, Limited, Amherst, and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) on a question dealing with immigration.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. McIlraith for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Dinsdale, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Grégoire.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, I will continue my remarks at the point I left off before the dinner hour. I called the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Deschatelets) twice to this matter but was informed he was not available. However, a member of his staff said he would have the matter looked up and would call me back. The following day I was informed that the Department of Public Works could not assist. As a last resort I wrote a letter to the Minister of Industry and sent copies to the following ministers: the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith). I want to read this letter into the record, Mr. Speaker. It is addressed to Hon. Charles M. Drury and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Minister:

Re: Russel Brothers Limited
(Ship builders—Owen Sound)

The low water in the great lakes is having a very bad effect on this industry. Dredging will help, but the officials of the Department of Public Works have informed me that they will not do any dredging because it will benefit only this shipyard. However, unless something is done, the jobs of 180 men in Owen Sound are in serious jeopardy.

The company is required to deliver a fire tug to the city of Toronto by May 1, and they can only move it by building sponsons. I am also advised that they have had to refuse two large repair contracts because of the condition of the approaches to the shipyard.

The amount of dredging required from the shipyard property to the main channel will cost only about $15,000 and the company has offered to pay half of this amount, as a small portion of the dredging will be on its property. The dredging could be done quickly because a dredge is already at Wiarton doing less urgent work.

Having regard to your department's duty to maintain and encourage Canadian industry—particularly in areas such as Owen Sound where alternative employment is not readily obtainable—I would ask you to use your influence to have the Department of Public Works reconsider its decision and allow this industry to continue to provide much needed employment.

To date I have had a reply from only one of these ministers. I should also like to put that reply on the record; it is from the Minister of Transport. I received it yesterday and the letter I sent out was on April 23.

Dear Mr. Noble:

Thank you for passing to me a copy of your letter of April 23 addressed to my colleague the Hon. Mr. Drury, asking him, in the interests of maintaining an important Owen Sound industry, to attempt to persuade the Department of Public Works to carry out some dredging in the Owen Sound slip.

Mr. Aiken: What is the rest of it?

Mr. Noble: That is all there is. We have heard a lot about designated areas and how the government propose to assist. My area might be a borderline example, as it is an area to which it is difficult to attract industry; but surely when the government are presented with an opportunity just to help us hold what we have they will not continue to turn their backs on us. The people of Canada will surely lose confidence in an administration which says one thing and then does another.

To illustrate my point, and especially after the experience I have just related, I should like to quote two excerpts from a speech made by the Minister of Public Works on May 1, as reported at page 2834 of Hansard. The first quotation is as follows:

I think we should take resolute action to the effect of contributing, through major improvements in strategic sites, to the establishment of important industries, which would have repercussions, not only inside our boundaries, but also with regard to foreign trade.

Then he continued:

A private company told us: If the government agrees to build a wharf, a breakwater or agrees to do some dredging according to the plans submitted, we will build there a plant that will give work to hundreds of people.

I know the house will be interested to know what happened to the Toronto fire tug to which I referred earlier in my speech. When it was evident that the government did not intend to dredge the channel, huge pontoons or sponsons were constructed on which the tug was mounted and floated through the shallow water to deeper water in the bay. These sponsons were then pumped full of water to sink them away from the hull. This operation cost the Russel Brothers boat works quite a large sum of money which they could ill afford to have taken from the limited margin of profit on such a contract. I compliment the management of this plant and their employees for their efforts to keep the plant operating in spite of government neglect.

Owen Sound harbour proper is in need of immediate attention. The grain carrier Agawa arrived at our elevator about two weeks ago and when proceeding to turn around after having unloaded her cargo became grounded. I might say that this elevator has a four million bushel capacity, and on speaking to the manager of the elevator last week end he told me they handled between seven and eight million bushels in one season. Then last week the Canadian oil tanker W. Harold Rea came into Owen Sound with a cargo of oil. She also had difficulty and her draught is only 19½ feet when loaded. Under these circumstances how long can we expect shipping to be directed to our harbour?

The Minister of Public Works stated during his estimates that he did not think that dredging could solve the problem. Dredging is a dire necessity in Owen Sound and Collingwood. This low water level is affecting every aspect of our economy right across this nation. Movement of all commodities by this cheapest of all transportation into our many ports either for use there or for transshipment is so very essential. The tourist industry no doubt will suffer. Our own citizens will undergo many inconveniences. The government has intimated that providence has dealt us a cruel blow and from this they have taken consolation—and an excuse for inactivity. Such a phenomenon has happened in other parts of the world and history has proven that men and governments must face up to their responsibilities and implement corrective action.

Many corrective suggestions have been made by previous speakers. The United States government has indicated its alarm, and its willingness to initiate some immediate action on proposals which have been presented to them by their engineers and by a private Canadian engineer. Why does this government not show a little leadership and intestinal fortitude, make their stand known and join with the United States in a joint program and get on with the job that must ultimately be done? The water table throughout much of western Ontario is such that farmers are required to deepen their wells or to drill new ones. The Ontario government has come to realize the great urgency for water conservation and is paying a 50 per cent subsidy toward farm ponds. I have in front of me an excerpt from the London Free Press which I should like to put on the record at this point:

> The provincial government is sending an engineer into western Ontario to assist farmers making plans to alleviate the water shortage.

Further down this article it says:

> An expert in water problems, Vernon I. D. Spencer, will assist farmers in the construction of water-catching ponds and reservoirs.

We cannot continue to denude vast areas of our country of forests by timbering and by fires if water levels are to be maintained. In my time I have seen many springs, which were the feeders to our streams and rivers, dry up and cease to exist. Streams that once carried water to the lakes 12 months of the year now dry up after the spring freshet.

I would like to add one more suggestion, Mr. Speaker, to the list already proposed by other speakers. In my opinion reforestation and water conservation in all areas of the great lakes watershed could be enlarged upon. The governments of both the United States and Canada could add much momentum to such a program, where an army of people would be willing to co-operate if given encouragement and direction. This development will have to come eventually, so why not start at the earliest possible time? The population of 40 million in the great lakes area is increasing at a rapid rate and water requirements will have to be met, so it is essential that any plan to conserve water should be carefully considered and, if found to be sound and practicable, should be put into effect. Water must be maintained at satisfactory levels, otherwise circumstances could become disastrous.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there are many things we can get along without, but water is not one of them. Water has a multitude of uses; indeed, it is essential to life itself.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: It being 8.15 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (d) of standing order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Grégoire) which was negatived on the following division:

INCOME TAX—DEDUCTIONS FOR CHARITABLE AND OTHER DONATIONS

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the grievance I want to voice tonight in the house concerns the administration of the Department of National Revenue in respect of income tax, and more particularly the receipts for charitable donations which the taxpayers submit to their respective taxation offices throughout the country, and more particularly in our province of Quebec.

Mr. Valade: In that case, why do you vote with the Liberals?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, if we all speak at the same time, I think it will be rather difficult to understand each other and to make ourselves heard.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Some time ago I asked the Minister of National Revenue a question. And I shall quote it as well as the answers which were given to me. The question, which was listed under No. 946, can be found on page 2874 of Hansard. I quote:

1. Does the Income Tax Act provide for a maximum deduction of 10 per cent of net income for charitable donations and, if so, is this provision applied uniformly across Canada?

And the minister's answer was:

1. (a) Yes. (b) Yes.

That is to say that Canada has a uniform policy which is uniformly applied throughout Canada.

Part No. 2 is as follows:

2. What procedures do departmental officials follow when processing income tax returns claiming deductions not exceeding 10 per cent—

I would ask you to note that under the act, the Canadian taxpayers are entitled to a maximum deduction of 10 per cent of their net revenue for charitable donations.

—and accompanied by receipts for charitable donations?

The answer was as follows:

2. The amounts claimed as deduction are granted, except if there are good reasons to believe that the submitted receipts are not genuine or that the amounts for which they were made out are mere estimates and not based on any bookkeeping with regard to the sums actually received from each donor by the charitable organization.

Part 3 of the question read as follows:

Are receipts for charitable donations ever questioned and, if so, are deductions ever arbitrarily reduced by departmental officials?

Answer to part 3 of my question was as follows:

3. (a) Yes. (b) No. Not if it means "without reason". If a charitable organization does not keep books showing the amounts received from each donor, and if the total deduction claimed by all donors is higher than the total amount actually received by the organization, the deduction claimed by each donor may be reduced accordingly.

Part 4 of my question read as follows:

4. In the reduction of allowances for charitable donations are officials acting within the authority of the Income Tax Act or by some special authority granted to the Minister of National Revenue and exercised with his knowledge?

Answer to said part 4 of my question was as follows:

4. Within the authority of the Income Tax Act.

Here was part 5 of my question:

5. What appeal is open to taxpayers who feel that they have been dealt with in an arbitrary manner?

Answer to last part of my question number 946 was as follows:

5. The taxpayer should first of all communicate with the district taxation office and supply detailed information concerning the contributions he actually made to the organization concerned as well as every available evidence or proof thereof. If he is unable to convince the officers of the taxation office that the amounts involved are higher than the deductions granted at the time of assessment he may produce a notice of opposition on form T400A. Two duly filled-in copies of that form should be sent by registered mail, within 90 days of the mailing date of the notice of assessment, to the deputy minister of national revenue (taxation), in Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, all those answers are given to further confuse the situation and the Canadian taxpayer.

Deductions for Charitable Donations

I have here a bulky record of complaints concerning the treatment received by Canadian taxpayers in my area, in this case, people who had properly filed their tax return, presenting it to the taxation director in Rouyn and claiming exemptions for charitable donations.

For instance, I have here the case of Mr. Roger Déry, of Bourlamaque, P.Q., who wrote me on April 29:

I am forwarding my notice of assessment asking me to pay $12. I earned this year the amount of $3,221.61.

A big salary—

And with my charitable receipts, I had $4 coming back to me. I had charitable receipts in the amount of $200—

That means a little under 7 per cent, around 6 per cent of his net income in charitable receipts.

I had $200 and they cut off $100. So, I would owe them $12. That is not fair with the starvation wages I am getting.

I wrote to the taxation director in Rouyn on May 1, concerning Mr. Roy.

The taxation director, Mr. Merleau, M-e-r-l-e-a-u, a fine bird, replied as follows:

Sir:

He does not even address me as a member of parliament, and he, a government civil servant.

Receipt is acknowledged of your letter dated April 27, 1964 concerning the charitable donations of Mr. Roy.

I regret to inform you that the charitable receipts presented could not be accepted by the Minister of National Revenue—

By the minister, not by himself; the minister cannot accept receipts for $200.

—because the issuer does not keep adequate records.

They went to rectories to see if there was an accounting system, because the government does not have any. I should tell the house right away that all the parish priests in the province of Quebec who are bothered or visited by income tax inspectors should simply throw them out. They should not tolerate them.

—the Minister of National Revenue cannot accept them because the issuer does not keep adequate records.

Would you kindly remember the instructions issued by the deputy minister (taxation) in 1962—

Although the minister cannot accept those receipts, the deputy minister issued instructions in 1962, following the election no doubt——which clarify the act on that point for the benefit of charitable organizations which issue receipts for income tax purposes to those making donations. The last paragraph reads as follows:

[Mr. Caouette.]

Charitable organizations which issue receipts for income tax purposes must keep records enabling inspectors to check the authenticity of receipts and the nature of donations.

I shall be glad to have the appropriate corrections made on presentation of any further evidence that the taxpayer might hold to justify his charitable donations.

Mr. Speaker, that letter is probably the most stupid and idiotic I have ever received from a high official of the income tax district office. It requires the taxpayer to supply further evidence, when he sends a receipt in proper form for charitable donations.

The director of the Rouyn income tax district office, the director of the Quebec district and those of the other districts throughout the country, the minister himself, in brief everybody knows that I do not mean charitable donations that we give only on Sunday collections at church. There are many charitable organizations which request our help, week after week and day after day. Those are the boy scouts, the ladies of Ste. Anne, the children of Mary; it is a tag-day here, a tag-day there, the Richelieu club, the foreign missions, all kinds of organizations which ask for our help the year round. We give 50 cents, a dollar, two dollars, but we do not keep a record of all those sums.

I have here the example of a workman, under 21 years of age, who earns $3,221 a year, a married man with children. He files his income tax return, sends a $200 receipt for charitable donations, and the director of the Rouyn income tax office decides, in an arbitrary way, to cut this receipt by $100 and claim from him an amount of $4 instead of refunding to him the $12 to which he was entitled.

Mr. Speaker, this is a great shame for us, federal members of parliament, to face our electors concerning the arbitrary enforcement of the Income Tax Act. That is why we ask the minister and the officials of the department whether, in the Income Tax Act, it is stipulated that every citizen is entitled to a maximum deduction of 10 per cent of the net income for charitable donations. If the answer is in the affirmative it should be applied and all Canadian taxpayers should be granted a maximum of 10 per cent for charitable donations, and charitable organizations, parish priests, ministers, the Salvation Army or any other welfare organizations should be left alone. A taxpayer should not be asked if he can explain a certain amount or whether he has some special system of accounting to please the income tax deputy minister or the director of the Rouyn district income tax office or any other district office in Canada.

I have another letter from Bourlamaque which reads as follows:

Sir, I am sending you my notice of my assessment. According to my income tax return, I was entitled to a refund of $102.15. The $200 deduction which I claimed for charitable donations has been reduced to $100.

Another $100 cut.

So, I got only $80.15. There is still $22 coming to me.

Mr. Speaker, why be mean with people who earn their living by the sweat of their brow and who are not entitled, like business owners, to deduct from their income tax the cost of their equipment and of their working material?

Doctors, dentists, lawyers, garage operators are entitled to deduct from their income tax the cost of the material they purchase, and of the machinery or equipment they need. We have the right to deduct such costs from our taxable income, whereas the poor miners, the labourers and the mechanics who buy equipment for hundreds of dollars are not entitled to deduct from their taxable income the cost of the tools they use to earn their living by the sweat of their brow.

Not only are they deprived of the right to do so, but even the amount of income tax that they must pay each year is increased, especially since last year.

Mr. Speaker, we strongly object to that arbitrary attitude taken against the Canadian taxpayer, the man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow—

Mr. Langlois: The Liberal gestapo.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Megantic is certainly right in calling it the Liberal gestapo, but in the past we had the Conservative gestapo which used to act the same way, in the same arbitrary fashion.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) to the fact that the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) has been trying to get a word in for the last few minutes. In view of the fact that he does not often get the opportunity to speak, I feel that he should be allowed to say what is on his mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve has the floor.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have not heard the hon. member for Lévis. Since, when he speaks, his remarks are barely audible, I feel that they are not very interesting. However, he is a gentleman, I have a lot of admiration for him and I will undoubtedly give him a hand in his riding.

Mr. Guay: Do come back, as it helped me the last time; I won.

Mr. Caouette: I will go and help you put the Lauzon shipyards into operation.

An hon. Member: Look after your own garage.

Mr. Caouette: If my hon. friend wants to have a look at my garage, he will find out that it is much better administered than this country under the present government.

An hon. Member: What about your system?

Mr. Caouette: It is not our system, it is yours and I am against it. But at least, I have enough pluck to fight against it.

Mr. Speaker, if there are that many blockheads we will have to shut them up.

In any case, the district income tax director of Rouyn wrote another letter similar to the one I referred to earlier, that is in exactly the same terms. This time, he did not have his letter photocopied; it is the original. There again, he writes:

Charitable organizations giving income tax receipts must have a bookkeeping system which permits tax inspectors to verify the authenticity of the receipts and the nature of the donation.

I shall be pleased to cause appropriate corrections to be made on submission of supplementary evidence which the taxpayer may have in order to justify his charitable donations.

I hold in my hand a letter from a taxpayer of Sullivan in which he says:

I am sending my income tax papers for 1964. I have no receipts I can send you to prove anything, because the government has all my receipts for charitable donations which amount to $250.

And there again, a notice of assessment was sent to him from which I quote a paragraph:

Your deduction for charitable donations has been reduced to the amount deductible according to the admissible receipts produced.

There was only one receipt involved in the amount of $250, but according to the admissible receipt produced, which was refused, these charitable donations amounted to $250. They were reduced from $250 to $100. And while the taxpayer had claimed a refund of some thirty odd dollars, he is now asked to pay the sum of $12.80.

That is a taxpayer who, in 1963, earned $3,540. When he is asking for an exemption on $250 in charitable contributions, what does that mean? About 6½ or 7 per cent of his taxable income.

Here we have a family whose income for a 12 month period amounted to $3,540, and the head of the income tax district office decides, just like that, to take $20 away from it.

And the same thing happens over and over again in all fields of activity.

Deductions for Charitable Donations

I have here a letter from Mr. Gilles Lejeune, of Bourlamaque, who claimed an amount of $250 in charitable donations.

He was allowed a deduction of only $100, and the income tax officials took a similar arbitrary attitude.

I have a letter from another elector from Val d'Or. Everyone knows that you do not need to produce receipts if you claim only a $100 deduction. Why bother about that then?

In fact, is there anyone in Canada who does not give to charity, one way or the other, at least $200 a year? As I said a while ago, we are constantly besieged with request for assistance to the poor and the needy. Requests for help to needy children, to the destitute, etc. come right and left from organizations like the Fédération des femmes canadiennes-françaises.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a letter from Mr. André Cartier, of Val d'Or, who writes to me as follows:

Dear Mr. Caouette,

I am writing to you about my income tax return. I was supposed to get a reimbursement of $55.40 but I have received only $19.40. I submitted a receipt of $350 for charitable donations but it was cut down to $100.

The situation is the same for all Canadian taxpayers, but I wonder to what extent that discrimination is restricted to certain counties of the province. Could it be that the counties which elected a government member are less affected by that cut in charitable donations than those which elected an opposition member? I wonder.

I know that our friends opposite are also confronted with such problems and that they were faced with several such claims, but is this arbitrary action carried to the extreme in their county as it is in ours, that is the counties represented by opposition members?

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to quote another letter from Bourlamaque:

As you have suggested this afternoon in Val d'Or, I am forwarding the notice of assessment I received from the income tax division—

—Income $4,652.03—

Personal exemptions, $2,900.

Medical expenses—

His charitable donations were reduced from $250 to $100, that is less than 5 per cent of his net income.

This inspector—I mean the director, Mr. Merleau, that is the dictator—replies again:

Your statement for charitable donations—

It is always the same letter. Why? All he can say is that the minister cannot accept the receipt, that in 1962 the deputy minister has given instructions to the inspectors to check the accounting of parish priests and of charitable and welfare organizations in Canada.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Therefore, Mr. Alphonse Marcotte's charitable donations were also cut down to $100; he lives in Bourlamaque.

Another taxpayer, Mr. Octave Mercier, who earns $3,894 per annum and who submitted a statement for charitable donations amounting to $207.50—which does not even represent 6 per cent of his annual income—also had his charitable donations chopped down to $100.

All members of the house could say the same thing, for we all get similar complaints from our voters, the Canadian taxpayers.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, in the grievance I am making tonight, I would like to submit to the minister that income tax inspectors—be they Mr. Merleau, of Rouyn, Mr. Gingras, of Quebec, Mr. Audet, of Quebec, or whoever they may be—should not be authorized to go and investigate in our parochial presbyteries.

The minister should see that the legislation now in effect is applied, that the provisions of the said legislation are enforced and that their application is generalized throughout the country. It would be less expensive for the department to make refunds to Canadian taxpayers than to pay those inspectors who call at rectories and make the Canadian taxpayer ridiculous by compelling him to comply with provisions which he cannot understand. For instance, they say that the taxpayer should provide further evidence, when the income tax inspector knows very well that there is no other evidence for those charitable donations than the receipts filed with the local or district income tax office.

Mr. Speaker, the government should show more concern for the Canadian taxpayers. Some people who hardly earn $3,000, $3,500 or $4,000 per year are pestered by income tax inspectors when they are already hard put to manage their budget or are unable to make ends meet.

Why allow those people to be tormented any longer by income tax bureaucrats who refuse to pay them amounts as ridiculously low as $4, $12, $25, or $30? They would spend that money on groceries and it would increase their purchasing power.

But no. The government swallows everything at the expense of the small taxpayer and the low wage earner. We shall never protect those people enough, because, as I said earlier, they deserve the attention of the Minister of National Revenue. There is discrimination against the little people who have trouble keeping alive under the present system.

When the minister orders his officials to grant the 10 per cent deduction for charitable donations, he will make things much easier for present as well as future administrators.

It is in the name of those workers, miners, labourers, small wage earners, white or blue collar workers that we protest tonight against that arbitrary way—and I will never say it often enough—in which income tax inspectors and directors treat the Canadian taxpayers.

Let us try to take a stand, once and for all, and solve those problems in order to stop complaints from our own electors about such discriminatory measures taken against them by an administration which I would call fundamentally dishonest.

When we have won on that point, Mr. Speaker, we will not endeavour to get credit for it. The Minister of National Revenue can take credit for it; let us stop, as I said, torturing workers in our area and in the province.

I have also before me a letter from Mr. Germain Houde, of Bourlamaque, whose receipts were cut down to $100. I have another one from Mr. Albert Santerre, 1 Main street, Sullivan, in Abitibi, whose receipts for charitable donations were cut down to $100, whereas it is stipulated in the guide accompanying the T4 form that everyone is entitled to $100 deduction. We do not need a Mr. Mercier or a Mr. Merleau, of Rouyn, to tell us how to fill our forms. We know how.

I have also a letter from Mr. Rosaire Tousignant of Val d'Or, who claimed $300 for charitable donations which were cut down to $100. Why? Because an income tax inspector was not satisfied with the accounting system and because the minister refused to accept the receipt, according to what Mr. Merleau wrote to me on May 1.

The charitable donations of Messrs. Stanislas Tremblay, Sullivan and Conrad Godin, of Val d'Or, were also cut down to $100. It is always the same thing. At least, they could save on all this paper which is paid for by the workers.

Why not merely say, whenever the opportunity arises for the minister to make a speech, that from now on, nobody can claim more than a $100 exemption for charitable donations, since we do not believe any more in the parish priests, the ministers or the welfare associations in this country? Why should we question the sincerity and honesty of people such as parish priests and ministers? Moreover, why should we question the Canadian taxpayer's honesty?

Could it be, by any chance, that the income tax inspectors and directors that we have today in Canada are nothing but thoroughly clever people whose only wish is to preserve Canada's economy by swindling and robbing further the Canadian worker?

Mr. Speaker, there are limits to injustice. The minister will have to answer for his many injustices to Canadian workers if he is not willing to answer at this time. Those people should be treated with a little more respect by income tax district offices, and when they submit a proper receipt, signed by a parish priest or a charitable organization, it must be remembered that in addition to the donations vouched for by the receipts, there are often other large amounts which are given occasionally, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, when parties are held by parish, local and other organizations in order to help the very poor.

Mr. Speaker, I ask the minister to make a statement as soon as possible, not in favour of income tax directors and inspectors, income tax deceivers and blood suckers, as I call them quite often, but in favour of the Canadian workman, the day labourer who is tired of being fleeced the way he is at present.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Revenue—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I suppose that the hon. member wishes to speak about the same matter?

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Department of National Revenue often rejects, without reason, the receipts for charitable donations filed by Canadian taxpayers.

I therefore ask the minister to use his influence and I also appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) who is supposed to have gained some influence lately, to convince the government to amend the legislation in order to make it more flexible and thus avoid many criticisms coming from all parts of the country.

The hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) blamed the civil servants. He blamed them for doing their duty. He should not blame civil servants but rather the fact that the legislation is not amended so as to be more equitable towards Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Villeneuve said—

Mr. Caouette: Would the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm allow me a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I do not want him to ask me any question, he talked enough when it was his turn—

Mr. Caouette: Just one question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not allow it.

The officials of the Department of National Revenue apply the provisions of the legislation. It is essential that the legislation be amended by the government to make it more flexible and meet the needs of the Canadian taxpayer since the great majority of Canadian workers are now complaining about the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

The hon. member for Villeneuve suggested that 10 per cent should be deducted automatically without any consideration. I would prefer that the government amend the act and automatically deduct an amount of 10 per cent up to a $500 maximum, because otherwise, it is the people from the more prosperous provinces, enjoying the higher incomes in Canada and living mostly in the provinces of British Columbia and Ontario who would benefit from it and, by the same token, if the government were to carry out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, it would discriminate against the people from Quebec and the maritimes who have a lower average income than those from British Columbia and Ontario. This would be necessary in order to avoid any criticisms.

Often, that is, most of the time, the Department of National Revenue rejects receipts for charitable donations without any explanation.

As far as I am concerned, whenever a constituent submitted his case to me and I made representations on his behalf to the Department of National Revenue, most of the time I got satisfactory replies. But in order to prevent electors from coming to their member's office, which is not normal in such cases, I feel it would be advisable to amend the act and make it more flexible.

I trust that the Minister of Justice will put pressure upon his colleague so that this act will be amended and brought more in line with the best interests of the Canadian people.

It is not normal that hundreds of complaints should be made across the country against the Income Tax Act, especially by people in the low income brackets. I feel some discrimination really exists and that this legislation should be made more flexible in order to comply with the wishes of the population.

There is one thing I cannot tolerate, and I refer to those raids carried out by employees of the income tax division, acting on the instructions of their superiors, upon members of the Canadian clergy. That, I submit, results in weakening the authority of our clergy. It is not normal that income tax employees should be allowed to question the value of our clergy across Canada by submitting them each year to numerous raids and visits on all sorts of pretences.

I think the act or rather some of its provisions should be changed, adapted and made to conform to the requirements of the Canadian people.

Consequently, in view of the numerous complaints made throughout the country, I believe it is the duty of the government to take the necessary steps to correct the flaws existing in that field.

I heard some members on the government side make certain remarks. I would be very pleased if at least one of them would take the floor, after me, and say, according to his conscience, whether he approves of the visits made to presbyteries across the country and is happy to see the disappointment of the working class in regard to the manner in which income tax returns submitted by the Canadian workers are treated. I would be particularly pleased to hear the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis), or the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) or the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). If they are really aware of their responsibilities, they will take the floor, after me, to say what they think of the act and make appropriate suggestions to the government so that the latter may implement the promises it made to the Canadian people during the last election campaign.

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it may happen sometimes that I disagree with the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) but with regard to the grievance he raised tonight about receipts for charitable donations, I fully agree with him.

In my opinion, that legislation is revolting when you consider how it is applied at the present time. Few acts are more revolting for the people.

All hon. members, at least most of them, are swamped by the protests they receive from their constituents. They spend a lot of time interceding for their electors who are robbed, so to speak, who are done out of money by the Income Tax Act.

What happens is that by applying that act, they want to use their power to distribute the income of those who have more money to those who have less. In fact, it is mostly the poor people who are deprived of their income through that act. When you consider how they proceed, going to rectories, it shows clearly that they suspect the members of the clergy and do not trust those who file their income tax returns. I think that is one of the most preposterous things you can imagine.

In my opinion, it is an unfair method which resembles those used in bolshevist Russia where the police, called the tcheka, broke into homes, or by Hitler's gestapo.

The same thing happens in the way that legislation is applied in this case; there is no difference between the two—a little more tactfulness, in a certain way, may be used—but, in fact, it boils down to the same thing.

It seems that civil servants in charge of administering the Income Tax Act, when it comes to that matter of receipts for charitable donations, go over the minister's head. If I were a minister, I would certainly never allow civil servants to go over my head. I think they would have to go, rather than go over my head.

In my opinion, such an attitude taken by civil servants is the most odious thing one can visualize in a democracy. For me, it is the most astonishing form of abuse of authority in a country such as Canada. It is quite unacceptable and we cannot tolerate such a behaviour in our country.

Besides I have the clear impression that the accounting which is done in an effort to recover some money is more expensive than the amount recovered by cutting the amount shown on receipts for charitable donations. After all, what is the use of so much zeal? What is the purpose of applying coercive methods which, as it were, disgust the people?

I have hundreds of cases in my county to prove that attitude. I went personally to check some cases in rectories where the tax auditor refused to accept the figures shown to him. When one sees such things, one begins to wonder about the country we live in. Sometimes, it seems as if one were being carried away to countries where war was raging not so long ago.

Before concluding, I should like to say that one of the bitterest criticisms the Hon. Mr. Garland, who died recently, had to bear concerns the act we are now dealing with. In fact, I would not be surprised that the Hon. Mr. Garland was so affected by the way that act was applied, that he could not bear the worries it caused him. I am inclined to think that it is one of the main causes of his untimely death. That is why we must take steps to exempt our fellow citizens from a tax equal at least to that claimed in receipts for charitable donations, that is increase exemptions by at least 10 per cent in order to eliminate that coercion overburdening the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I will take only a few minutes of the time of the house to outline my opinion on the point raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

I must say at the outset that while agreeing in part with the concern expressed by the hon. member for Villeneuve, I want to make myself clear and say that I do not approve of the demagogy he showed in outlining a problem which should the house consider it, not to make political capital but to rectify a situation which I feel, is absurd and glaringly unfair for a great number of Canadian taxpayers, especially in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member for Villeneuve would have shown more sincerity and practical sense if, a few minutes before explaining his grievance against the government and the Minister of National Revenue, he had voted against and contributed to overthrow the government. He would thus have stressed the importance of his grievance.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In my opinion the remarks of the hon. member for St. Mary have no bearing on the grievance under consideration which deals with income tax and not with the attitude of the hon. member for Villeneuve. Consequently, if he is sincere and truly wishes to have the act changed, I would ask him to limit himself to the topic under discussion.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I feel the hon. member for Lapointe should be the last one to speak of sincerity. Besides, he is not in a position to teach me what to say.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the hon. member for St. Mary has made unparliamentary remarks and I rise on a question of privilege. If he challenges my sincerity, I will not hesitate to compare my sincerity with his. I have never been in a situation such as his and his sincerity—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think we will make much progress on the grievance if hon. members allow themselves to be led astray by comparisons between their respective sincerity; that is highly irregular. I would therefore ask the hon. member for St. Mary to keep to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have ruled that there is no question of privilege and I would suggest that the hon. member limit his remarks to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Valade: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for pointing out the sincerity of the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that when a grievance is raised against a minister of the crown or a government, it is not necessary to act in a demagogic way, but to the contrary one must be consistent and logical in the attitude that one adopts in the interest of those one represents in the house.

When a member raises a grievance against the government he must take into consideration the fact that through this grievance he is the interpreter of the constituents who sent him here to represent them. Now, if the member is serious and eager to take every means available to him—for instance a vote to topple the government—in short, if he is honest with himself, he will take the necessary steps.

I should like to point out to the house that I think great harm is being done the province of Quebec in that some accounting or contributing systems prevent certain citizens from that province from deducting from their income tax a percentage equal to the one claimed by industrialists and business men in the other provinces.

Now, I agree with the hon. member for Villeneuve in this respect. However I do not wish to limit myself merely to political considerations but I should like to make suggestions to the Minister of National Revenue so that he may take them into consideration in the preparation of his estimates. I am making these suggestions to him, not in a partisan spirit, but to serve the people I represent. Now—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the member for St. Mary has no right to impute ulterior motives. All he has to do is to deliver his speech in an intelligent manner if he has any intelligence; let him stop bothering people and let him make suggestions to the minister and by so doing, he will prove that he is a better man than he has led us to believe from the impression he has made upon the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not believe there is any point of order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, after listening to the member for Villeneuve, it is rather difficult to discuss anything intelligently.

Now, to return to the suggestions I have to make to the Minister of National Revenue, I would like to ask him if he could not redress the injustice that is being made against the working class who must pay morning and night for travelling from home to the plant and return.

Now, if a worker must pay approximately $150 a year for bus tickets or other means of transportation to go to work—

An hon. Member: Or for lotteries tickets.

Mr. Valade: —I maintain that the government should consider my suggestion and that the workers should be allowed to deduct, in his income tax return, his transportation expenses or a certain amount of expenses, as provided for travelling salesmen or businessmen. The worker should be allowed to deduct from his income tax an amount of approximately $150, which would represent his transportation expenses to and from work.

The minister should also consider that the strictness of the act goes beyond the moral limit. We should abolish the provision which threatens the taxpayer with imprisonment if he makes a false statement in his income tax return. I think that this is immoral—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, if some hon. members of the Ralliement Créditistes want to remain in the provincial field, I ask them to listen to me.

I think that, by threatening a taxpayer with imprisonment when he is late in filing his return or who makes a false statement therein, a serious prejudice is caused to thousands of human beings.

We should take the example of the courts, where somebody who has incurred some liability, may file a suit, according to civil law. I cannot conceive that the Minister of National Revenue should resort to threats of criminal proceedings against a taxpayer who, for quite understandable reasons has been late in filing his return or failed to give some information required by the Income Tax Act.

I also think that we should come back to a formula highly appreciated in the business field. I am thinking of the method of allowing businessmen to file an interim tax return. We should give those taxpayers a chance to file their final return within 30 days after the interim return has been filed.

Also, in relation to that suggestion, I should like to point out to the house that in the business world when our income tax returns are filed at the end of April, there follows an upsurge of the economic activity, of construction. Contractors and material suppliers face a period of feverish activity. Now, it is practically inconceivable that they should be required to file their income tax return at the end of April, under the threat of imprisonment or legal action, at a time when their business is extremely active.

I think it would be wise to do away with that system and ask the taxpayers to file a final report within the 30 days following their interim return.

Mr. Speaker, I think the government is unfair towards certain Canadian taxpayers. In fact, when certain taxpayers have made overpayments, the federal administration sometimes takes four, five, six and even seven months to pay back that amount and, of course, it is without any interest. But if taxpayers have not paid the total amount of their income tax on time, they must pay a 6 per cent interest on the balance.

Therefore, I think that if, on account of an inefficient administrative machinery the taxpayers are wronged, since they do not receive, within a very short time, the reimbursement of the income tax overpaid, the government should also pay them interest for that same period. In fact, they should be paid the same interest as is charged taxpayers who have not paid their tax.

Mr. Speaker, I also believe the Income Tax Act contains inconsistencies, and that some of its provisions rather offend Canadian taxpayers.

[Text]

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, it seems to me that the hon. member has departed from the grievance which was raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette). That grievance had to do with deductions in respect to charitable contributions. The other hon. members who spoke immediately after him also discussed that grievance. The hon. member is now raising a new grievance on related matters. I wonder if he could not stick to the one subject in order that a reply could be made more conveniently.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point raised by the minister is well taken. I had hoped that the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade) would eventually relate his remarks to the specific grievance now before the house, and I now ask him to do so.

Mr. Valade: On the point of order made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), may I say I agree that the hon. member for Villeneuve did raise a point dealing with one aspect of the administration of the Income Tax Act. But I believe his grievance was concerned with the operational methods used by the department. I do not think it was directed specifically to this one aspect.

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Valade: The hon. member for Villeneuve even read letters from some of his constituents to supplement what he said, and I do not think the point of order is well founded because my own remarks relate specifically to the administration of tax collection. I do not know if the minister is right—

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think I should amend the decision I made a moment ago to the effect that a specific grievance was referred to the house, and the hon. member should strictly confine himself to the question of charitable donations in connection with income tax returns. Consequently, I would suggest that the hon. member limit his remarks to this subject.

Mr. Valade: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and, with all due respect for your authority, I am pleased to revert to the grievance raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve and pursued by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

This also allows us to note that when we speak about administration the Liberals are quite ill at ease.

As concerns the charitable donation receipts, I believe the Quebec population suffers a flagrant inequity, for in the province of Quebec, Canadian taxpayers perhaps do not understand business administration as in some other provinces.

For instance, merchants, manufacturers and contractors in other Canadian provinces include in their yearly budget a certain amount intended for charitable organizations. Now, these sums of money paid to charitable funds are automatically deducted from income. But the small contractor, the small restaurant operator, every ordinary citizen in his or her daily field, does not keep a record of his charitable donations to the church, leisure organizations or other spheres of public charity.

Now, I am of the opinion that this practice of the present government requiring its officials to refuse or investigate charity receipts given by our parish priests is an injustice, an insult to the Roman Catholic and Protestant clergy, because in my opinion they represent very well two honest denominations.

Mr. Speaker, since I have only four minutes left, I should like the Acting Minister of National Revenue to answer the objections which were made during this debate.

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I see I have been left with four minutes in which to reply to a grievance which hon. members opposite took something over an hour to discuss. In any event, I shall try to deal with it to the extent possible in this extremely limited time.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) made it clear he accepted the proposition that the law as it exists was being administered properly, and that the difficulty lies with the law itself. If that is so, a strong doubt is raised in my mind as to the propriety of raising this subject as a grievance. I say this because the grievance period was intended to allow hon. members to raise grievances against the administration, rather than to provide opportunities for discussing legislation on the statute books or on the order paper. In the second place if I may give another answer to the hon. member, it is interesting that he should be critical of the present government for not having changed the law, although he did not, as far as I know, raise the matter previously during the period when the government he supported was in office.

Be that as it may, the hon. member for Villeneuve did relate his remarks to the administration of the Income Tax Act as far as it concerns charitable donations. While he used excessive language—quite improper language, in describing employees of the administration; I merely mention this so that I may be on record as rejecting his improper language in this respect—I wish to indicate to the hon. member that, in so far as he raised examples of grievances having to do with the administration, I will go through his remarks tomorrow and direct that the appropriate files be examined in order to see whether or not there is substance in those grievances and, if there is, to have them corrected. The hon. member gave several names by way of example—

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, I have no objection to the minister speaking or, as he said, replying to these grievances which have been raised, but I think there is an important point of order here and one which should be watched very closely. It is this: We may set a precedent and have ministers of the crown using up the time allowed for a grievance period by answering the grievances which have been raised. I think it was only a few days ago that a similar situation arose. A minister of the crown elected to use some of the time allotted to the grievance period, thus taking time away from members of the opposition, and my concern is that this should not become a precedent for the future.

Mr. McIlraith: I will forgo my right to discuss the point of order. We undoubtedly have the right to reply.

The point I wish to make in the few moments I have left is that in so far as the hon. member's remarks did pertain to this aspect of the act, I will carefully examine them myself and have the points he raised considered in relation to the cases he mentioned.

In the course of some further remarks, the hon. member advocated changes in the legislation. I think that either he misunderstood the law itself, or he was imprecise and inaccurate in stating what the law is. It provides that only the actual charitable contributions are allowable by way of reduction, and then only up to 10 per cent. The principle is not that 10 per cent is allowed.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. McIlraith: I see my time has expired and I must desist.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the house ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Churchill: On division.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration.

INDUSTRY

1. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $4,677,100.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

1. Postal services including Canada's share of the upkeep of the international bureaux at Berne and Montevideo, $208,861,000.

TRANSPORT

1. Departmental administration (including the former vote for the operation and maintenance of official railway cars), $3,773,800.

Proceedings reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader whether he would record on Hansard the business for Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, beginning tomorrow we will take the Estate Tax Act resolution. The second order of business will be second reading of the Customs Tariff bill. Then in the field of legislation we will take the resolution to appoint the special committee on defence, after which we will proceed with the second reading of the bill to amend the National Defence Act. Then we will take the resolution introducing a bill to authorize certain crown corporations to pay certain provincial fees and taxes, after which we will be dealing with the resolution introducing the bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act. We intend to take these legislative measures one after the other until each has been finally proceeded with, the only interruption being on Thursday when we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE OF ROUTE

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. According to provisory standing order 39A, a motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore, the question is that the house adjourn. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I have put this question many times to the Minister of Public Works to give him an opportunity to answer it. I know the minister is dedicated to the public interest, that he is a hard working and conscientious man who, unfortunately, belongs to the wrong party, but I know he is working in the interest, not only of eastern Montreal constituents, but also of the Canadian people as a whole.

I for one was satisfied with the speech he delivered on the administration of the Department of Public Works. If I refer to La Presse for April 20, 1964, I read an article entitled:

Deschatelets will resign from the cabinet and the federal government if his desires are not met.

Mr. Habel: Do you take the responsibility for it?

Mr. Pigeon: Which?

Mr. Habel: Of what you read.

Mr. Pigeon: I read the article written by a distinguished journalist, Mr. Luc Beauregard of La Presse and I will leave to the minister the opportunity of telling whether I am wrong in reading such an article.

Surrounded by sobbing women and men cursing politics, the Minister of Public Works of Canada, Mr. Jean Paul Deschatelets stated last evening that he would put his career at stake to satisfy the claims of the constituents of Hochelaga and Maisonneuve: "If nothing is done after a first request addressed to the government of which I am a member, I will resign", said the minister.

It was at the end of a meeting, that was lively, and even dramatic at times, that Mr. Deschatelets emphasized that he was ready to assist the people of eastern Montreal at all costs, even at the expense of his own career—

The same article further reads as follows:

Trans-Canada highway—The minister has emphatically promised he would refuse to sign any plan for a future trans-Canada highway which would not pass exactly where the C.N.R. tracks stand at present. He intends to set up a committee with his colleague, as soon as possible,—

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he has made or intends to make appropriate representations to the Quebec department of highways so that the trans-Canada highway route be changed to bring satisfaction and grant a fair treatment to the people of eastern Montreal.

The minister is aware of the inconveniences resulting from the Canadian National railway track: some disastrous accidents have occurred and the people of this important Montreal area whom the minister is representing are complaining because the trans-Canada highway is once again dividing that part of eastern Montreal. This is not only a disadvantage for workers who will have to cross the trans-Canada highway, but also a serious danger for children going to school, etc.

I know that the minister was in a position to appreciate the concern of the people of eastern Montreal when he attended the meeting. I wish to tell him that I admire him very much for the firmness which he showed when he made his formal promise. He was ready, Mr. Speaker, to give up his political and public career if he did not succeed in convincing the C.N.R. president to remove that track and if he was not successful in convincing the provincial minister of highways to change the lay-out of the trans-Canada highway in the eastern part of Montreal so as to give satisfaction to the people living in that important section.

I know that the minister has important duties to carry out. It is not up to the federal government to decide on the lay-out of the trans-Canada highway, because it is rather a provincial responsibility, but I should like to know whether the minister succeeded in convincing the provincial minister of highways of the necessity to change this lay-out in order to do justice to the population of the eastern section of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to allow the minister, in addition to the three minutes to which he is entitled, the time I did not use.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I must say first of all that the preliminary remarks of my hon. friend from Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm reminded me of the old saying: "I fear the Greeks even when they bring gifts". I must say, following this statement, that the trans-Canada highway going through the city of Montreal is one of the greatest projects of this government, a project which should have been planned and carried through in the last six years. It was not done, but we are very pleased to associate ourselves with this great venture.

Therefore, there will be an expressway by-passing the city of Montreal which will have nothing then to envy any other city on the North American continent.

Plans for that expressway which will start from a certain point on the Metropolitan boulevard, at Decarie boulevard, will go south then towards the east end of Montreal, parallel with the Montreal harbour up to Papineau street, those plans, as I said earlier, have been drawn up, approved and registered.

This means that, from Papineau street to the east end of Montreal, plans have not yet been drawn up by the provincial government. But I must say to my hon. friend that it is quite in order for the Quebec government, in this case, to prepare plans. However, they must be submitted for our approval, because the federal government is committed to pay 90 per cent of construction costs of two lanes, after approval of the plans of course.

That does not apply only to the province of Quebec. It has been done in all the other provinces in the last 10 years.

Now, my hon. friend mentions a newspaper article. In that respect, I must tell him that unlike what happened with regard to several of my former colleagues, I have nothing to delete from that article which gives a good picture of what took place.

With regard to a commitment I would have made, I want him to feel at ease and I tell him that when a man of honour makes a commitment, there is no need to remind him about it.

I got in touch with the provincial minister of highways, Hon. Mr. Pinard, about two weeks ago concerning the plans for that expressway in the east end of Montreal. No final decision has yet been made concerning these plans. I must tell my hon. friend that the original plans provided that this expressway would follow the lay-out of the old railroad in eastern Montreal, which goes as far as Moreau station. It is that old railroad that I would like to see removed.

I said to the provincial minister of highways that I hoped it would be possible to provide in eastern Montreal for an expressway in eastern Montreal that would not only run parallel but follow the lay-out of that railroad coming from Montreal east to Moreau station, and which would allow the removal of tracks which have become a public nuisance in eastern Montreal. It would also allow the city of Montreal to undertake urban redevelopment in an old part of the city where it is needed.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister but his time is over.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—AMHERST, N.S.—ACTION TO OFFSET PENDING LAY-OFFS

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland on the question of lay-offs at Enamel and Heating Products Limited, Amherst, Nova Scotia.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I pose this question to the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) in an effort to secure information regarding the lay-offs that have been effected at Enamel and Heating Products Limited plant at Amherst, Nova Scotia, in relation to aircraft component overhaul and repair work. My reason for posing the question is the concern felt both in the town of Amherst and in the constituency of Cumberland regarding the future of this plant and its operations.

The plant in question has been carrying out aircraft work for many years and has, among other things, secured a great deal of work from United States firms on a production sharing basis. The work in question, I understand, totals approximately 75 per cent or more of the total work load in the aircraft plant. The problem facing the plant is that there is not a sufficient amount of overhaul and repair work on aircraft components to keep the plant in operation at a production cost which would allow them to fulfil the obligations they have undertaken with United States firms.

The problem here relates to production costs. When the officials of Enamel and Heating Products Limited accepted the contracts from United States firms they accepted them on the basis of a certain production cost that was available to them as a result of the employment in their plant. As a consequence of the depletion of overhaul and repair work their work force has declined and their production costs have increased. If no new work is made available to the plant through the Department of Defence Production, then there is every cause for concern about the future operations of the plant. It could well mean that they could not meet the commitments they have made to these United States firms because of spiraling production costs. This could mean the closure of the plant and a very serious economic blow to the economy of both the town of Amherst and the county of Cumberland, in view of the fact that the employment does not come from the town of Amherst alone but is spread throughout the county of Cumberland.

I appreciate the fact that the Minister of Industry has a problem here. He is operating on a much smaller budget than was the case when this company accepted the contracts from United States firms and anticipated a future workload from overhaul and repair work. At the same time, I think the minister will recognize that this company has done a tremendous job, a really remarkable job of going into the United States on their own and securing a substantial amount of work from United States companies. The company has had a history of efficient operation, a history of efficient work indicating to the United States firms that they could do the work in an efficient manner and provide them with the type of aircraft components that the company promised it would produce when the contracts were accepted. In view of this, it is my hope the minister will be able to indicate, both to the employees who have been laid off and the residents of the county of Cumberland, that action will be taken through his department that will eliminate the concern that is now very evident in my constituency.

I want to say that the Minister of Industry has been sympathetic to the problem of this firm. However, it is my hope we will be able to secure something more than sympathy because I would not want to think there was nothing else available to my constituents in the days ahead. I feel that if the minister can indicate he is taking the type of action that will put these men back to work, we will eliminate the concern in the minds of my constituents generally that I want to see eliminated, if that is at all possible.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the facts as outlined by the hon. member are substantially correct. The Department of Industry and the Department of Defence Production have been concerned over the past few months about the problem which has been outlined by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates). There have been continuing, and there are still continuing, discussions with the firm with a view to alleviating to the greatest extent possible their problems. The fact of the matter is, however, as the hon. member for Cumberland has pointed out, the number of aircraft both by types and in total numbers required to be repaired and overhauled by the Royal Canadian Air Force has declined very substantially.

Over the past few years, as a consequence, there has been a need for considerably less in the way of repair and overhaul facilities in the aircraft industry generally than had been the case in the past. There has had to be, as a consequence, a shrinkage of Department of Defence Production orders. Seeing this coming, the Department of Defence Production has encouraged aircraft overhaul organizations to seek production sharing work and has been prepared, and has in fact, provided considerable assistance, to firms in securing contracts on a competitive basis with United States firms.

As the hon. member for Cumberland has pointed out, Enamel and Heating Products Limited have been more than usually successful in this particular regard. In this field they are one of the more enterprising and more successful companies. The Department of Defence Production has been concerned to see that the base from which they make their competitive bids in the United States will continue in operation, this base being provided by contracts from the Department of Defence Production for overhaul and repair of R.C.A.F. aircraft.

I am glad to be able to tell the hon. member that agreement has been reached with the company on what I think is a workable arrangement, a workable and practicable level of work which will enable them successfully to carry out the contracts in the United States.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, last Monday's newspapers carried an account of the conference held on Sunday in Montreal, before a Jewish organization which provides assistance to immigrants, by the economist within the cabinet. Allow me to quote one of those reports:

> Mr. René Tremblay stated that far from taking jobs away from Canadians, qualified immigrants create employment for less specialized labour.

I am sure that the minister must have gone over what he said over the week end and even though we have nothing against selective immigration, that is precisely what led me to put the following question to the minister yesterday:

> During the week end, the minister said that Canada and the province of Quebec would need several thousand immigrants to ensure Canada's economic development. Now, could the minister, whose competence as an economist is well-known in certain quarters—not everywhere, but in certain quarters only—tell us what measures he intends to take so that our 500,000 unemployed may find suitable employment that will permit Canada's economic development?

I know that the minister is going to tell me as he did in Montreal, that we need highly educated people and recognized technicians, that we can no longer look to Europe for those people, since Europe needs all its technicians, and that we must look to other parts of the world, such as Asia, India, China or Japan.

During the week end, I was in Thetford Mines, where about 600 or 650 Canadians will be dismissed from work within 60 days. Yet, they are people with 20 to 25 years' experience in mines and they do not know where to turn if they lose their job in Thetford Mines.

The same thing happened a few years ago in Elliot Lake where hundreds of Canadians lost their jobs. Remember that a man with 20 or 25 years' experience in mines must certainly be a technician in his field, he must certainly know the work he is performing and must certainly be capable of doing something in that field. He is a technician or a mechanical worker or some other thing.

Now, why did the minister tell the Jewish association for aid to immigrants that there is an unquestionable need for immigrants in Canada, whereas, in the province of Quebec alone we have 240,000 jobless people and from 500,000 to 550,000 in the whole of Canada. And those are the officially unemployed, without counting the unofficial ones. Now, we are told that we should have more educated people. There probably will be educated instead of uneducated people without jobs.

I would like to draw the hon. minister's attention to a very important point.

At a time when he, an economist from Quebec in the federal cabinet, talks to us about that immigration that would spur the country's economic expansion, we read in yesterday's Montreal Star:

Automation effects studied.

That appeared yesterday in the Montreal Star. It can be said knowingly that automation will have the same effects here in Canada as in the United states, where it is claimed that 40,000 jobs disappear every week, whereas a tremendous number of young people come on the labour market. That is when Mr. Snyder, Jr., president of United Industries Incorporated, a large U.S. corporation, tells us that the government will have to take drastic and radical steps to meet the situation.

Now, the minister who is also an economist in the federal cabinet, tells us that immigration will not prevent the creation of jobs, when automation is throwing more and more people out onto the streets.

The minister might say that I am making a statement, but I am asking this question: How does he expect to solve the unemployment problem in Canada, by encouraging an immigration policy as he suggested in Montreal during the week end?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first, I must correct the statement of the hon. member for Villeneuve, who said that there are now more than 500,000 unemployed in Canada. He even quoted the figure of 550,000 jobless.

May I remind him that the last figures published by the Minister of Labour are 400,000 and not 500,000 or 550,000.

Mr. Grégoire: Those are the unemployed who receive benefits.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Tremblay: Then if we take the standard advocated by the hon. member for Lapointe, a real expert in the field of statistics, any figure can be used.

Mr. Grégoire: In our statistics, we do not forget anybody.

Mr. Tremblay: Besides, it would take more than three minutes to answer such a question. Nevertheless, I should like to point out that unemployment is a very serious problem in Canada and one which will never be solved by doing away with immigration. On the contrary, positive and progressive steps such as the ones taken by the present government will succeed in dealing with unemployment.

An hon. Member: Which steps?

Mr. Tremblay: Those designed to boost the economy in certain under developed regions, to increase the building of homes, to promote the growth of new industries. All those steps will gradually increase employment and reduce unemployment.

Last month there were 93,000 fewer unemployed than the corresponding month last year—

An hon. Member: Those are not the same statistics.

Mr. Tremblay: —consequently, there has been an upsurge in the economy. It is by positive action, not by closing our doors to immigration, that we will solve the problem of unemployment.

I should like to point out to the hon. member for Villeneuve that there is no question of bringing in all kinds of immigrants. What we are considering is selective immigration, which means the entry of contractors, technicians and other workers who can easily be absorbed into our economy. It must be remembered that while there are thousands of unemployed in Canada, there is a shortage of labour in some areas of the country.

Mr. Grégoire: Name them.

Mr. Tremblay: It is precisely by means of a selective immigration instead of restrictions being imposed to the economic activity that we shall be able to increase our prosperity.

Mr. Grégoire: We entirely disagree with that.

Mr. Tremblay: Therefore, I believe that an aggressive and dynamic immigration policy, provided it is sensible and selective, will be likely in the long run to bring about an increase in the economic activity and a more rational development of our natural resources.

That is what happened in the United States and in every country which enjoyed prosperity resulting from a large increase in population. Whether this increase is due to normal growth or to the excess of immigrants over emigrants, or to any other basic factor, it is admitted everywhere in the world that an increase in population means an increase in national revenue and prosperity of a country, and it is because we want our country to be more prosperous that we want to attract those immigrants over here.

We want to develop our resources systematically where they exist and if immigrants can help us to do it, they and their children will benefit by the prosperity which we will all have created together.

Mr. Grégoire: Pure sophism.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.34 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, May 6, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

LOANS TO STUDENTS

Question No. 135—Mr. Pascoe:

1. With reference to the plan to provide interest free loans to university students, when will a graduate student be expected to begin repayment of such loan?
2. Will recipients of such loans be required to make interest payments after graduation and, if so, when will such payments begin?

Mr. Benson: 1 and 2. This is a matter of government policy which will be announced when the legislation is introduced in the house in the near future.

TARIFF BOARD RULING ON EDIBLE OILS

Question No. 150—Mr. Danforth:

Has the tariff board made a ruling on the representations of the Ontario soya bean board and other interested parties in respect to the increase in Canadian tariff on edible oils entering this country and, if so, what was that ruling?

Mr. Benson: The tariff board has heard representations on the Canadian customs tariff on edible oils; its report has not yet been received by the Minister of Finance.

* BANK OF CANADA—FOREIGN CURRENCY CONVERTED INTO GOLD

Question No. 184—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. What is the aggregate amount of foreign currency convertible into gold upon demand, held or accepted by the Bank of Canada as a result of exports, which has actually been converted into gold during the last five years?
2. From what countries did the currency come?

Mr. Benson: 1. Canada's reserves of gold and foreign exchange are not held by the Bank of Canada for its own account. They are held by the Bank of Canada for the Minister of Finance in the exchange fund account. Generally speaking all official purchases and sales of gold and foreign exchange are made through this account.

Over the five years to December 31, 1963, the exchange fund account purchased U.S. $40.7 million worth of gold for which payment was made in foreign convertible currency.

2. Apart from small working balances held in a variety of currencies, Canada's receipts of foreign exchange from whatever source are converted into gold or U.S. dollars. For this reason, although the gold purchase mentioned in 1 was paid for in U.S. dollars, it is impossible to attribute the currency used in that payment to a particular transaction with a particular country.

C.N.R. CAR SHOPS, MONTREAL

Question No. 188—Mr. Millar:

1. How many shifts presently are being worked in the Montreal car shops of the C.N.R.?
2. How many shifts were employed there (a) in 1954 (b) in 1958 (c) in 1960?
3. What was the wage bill for overtime, if any, paid in each of these years and in 1964 to date?
4. What was the reason for the increased work load if any, in each of these years and in 1964 to date?
5. How many employees were engaged on each shift during each of these stated years and during 1964 to date?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Three per day.
2. (a) (b) and (c) three per day.
3. For 1954, 1958 and 1960 negligible (approximately 0.6 per cent). For 1964 thus far nil.
4. No increase.
5.

Year	Total employees
1954	1,476
1958	1,334
1960	1,300
1964 to date	1,200

Number of employees per shift varies, but has remained at approximately 83 per cent first shift, 12 per cent second shift and 5 per cent third shift each year.

C.N.R. CAR SHOPS, LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 189—Mr. Millar:

1. What is the C.N.R.'s estimated investment in car shop machinery and buildings in London?
2. What is the C.N.R.'s estimated over-all investment in plant and machinery at London?
3. What has been the C.N.R.'s capital outlay (a) for new buildings (b) for new machinery, at Montreal car shops since 1954?
4. What was involved in such expenditure for each of the years since 1954 to date?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. $1,390,000 depreciated to scrap value.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. (a) $832,000; (b) $117,800.

Questions

4. The expenditures covered the construction of a grit blast plant, a dry kiln, lubricator reclamation building, welding equipment, tanks, journal bearing machines and various small units of machinery for the shops.

C.N.R. CAR SHOPS, LONDON—DATE OF CLOSING

Question No. 190—Mr. Millar:

1. What is the latest target date of the C.N.R. management for closing down the car shops at London?
2. What new employment opportunities does the C.N.R. envisage for London car shop employees facing unemployment?
3. What additional job prospects are there for displaced London employees (a) at Montreal (b) at the new Toronto hump yard and when are such prospects likely to materialize?
4. What assistance, if any, does C.N.R. management extend to displaced employees in effecting the transfer of families or household furnishings to such jobs elsewhere?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. By July 1966.

2. Where applicable, employees may exercise their seniority rights and the railway will make every effort to find alternate employment for men who may be affected.

3. Job prospects at Montreal will be available with transfer of work. The prospects at the new Toronto hump yard will be available in the spring of 1965.

4. The company has offered the employees who will go with the transfer of work their pay while moving and out of pocket expenses covering meals, berths, and a free freight order on the movement of their household goods.

C.N.R. CAR SHOP PAYROLL, LONDON, ONT.

Question No. 205—Mr. Irvine:

1. What was the estimated payroll of car shop, employees of the Canadian National Railways, London, Ontario, before the decision to shift London work and personnel to Montreal?
2. What have been the successive reductions in the London car shop payroll as work and personnel were transferred to Montreal?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. $180,000 per month.
2. One reduction, $63,000 per month.

C.N.R. CAR SHOPS, LONDON, ONT.—REASONS FOR TRANSFER

Question No. 206—Mr. Irvine:

1. Was the decision of the Canadian National Railways management to transfer car shop operations from London to Montreal based upon actual dollar estimate of economies to be effected and, if not, what dictated the decision?
2. If there were such an estimate, what was the actual figure so computed?
3. What was the per unit cost of the work being done in London, Ontario, before the transfer decision was made?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

4. What was the per unit cost of the work being done in Montreal (a) in 1958 (b) in 1960 and (c) in 1964?
5. What yardstick does the Canadian National Railways use in compiling per unit cost and what are the cost components?
6. In computing present per unit costs at London, Ontario, has allowance been made for the fact that overhead costs remain virtually constant although work-force and work load have been reduced?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. Yes.

2. $900,000 per year. Excess repair capacity exists on C.N.R. system. Savings based on elimination of administrative and overhead expenses.

3. Not applicable.

4. (a), (b) and (c), not applicable. Unit costs vary with class and type of work, and not directly comparable between shops.

5. Standard cost accounting methods. Direct labour and material.

6. See answer to 5.

C.N.R. CAR SHOPS, LONDON, ONT.—TRANSFER OF WORK AND EMPLOYEES

Question No. 207—Mr. Irvine:

1. When did the Canadian National Railways management first decide to remove car shop repair work from London, Ontario, to Montreal?
2. Was this a decision to phase out and ultimately cease such work at London and, if so (a) what was the timetable (b) how many such stages have been completed, and (c) to what extent was the work at London reduced at each stage?
3. How many C.N.R. car shop personnel were employed at London before any shift to Montreal began and how has this work force been reduced by successive work transfer to Montreal?
4. What is the present strength of Canadian National Railways car shop personnel at London?
5. How many employees actually have been transferred (a) to Montreal (b) to other railway centres?
6. How many refused to leave London and of these how many have been given other employment within the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. Pickersgill: The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows:

1. 1958.

2. Yes. (a) Passenger repairs in 1960; freight repairs in 1966. (b) One. (c) $63,000 per month.

3. 497.

4. 271.

5. (a) 38, (b) 31.

6. 48 and 25.

* COMMITTEE ON SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Question No. 353—Mr. Orlikow:

Is the government giving consideration to the establishment of a parliamentary committee on scientific research (like the committee on defence) which could hear representations from government departments involved in research, the national research council, the universities, and organizations such as the Canadian Association of Physicists, the Chemical Institute of Canada, the Engineering

Institute of Canada, the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian mathematical congress, the Canadian Federation of Biological Societies, and the Royal Society of Canada, as to what program of scientific research is required in Canada in order to develop a program adequate to meet Canada's needs in this technological age?

Mr. Davis: The government has considered the advisability of establishing a parliamentary committee on scientific research. However, it is now of the view that such a committee could more usefully be set up when the scientific secretariat, now being organized in the privy council office, has had an opportunity to assemble and analyse the necessary information regarding government and other research activities in this country.

*SALES TAX ON STEEL RULE CUTTING AND CREASING DIES

Question No. 645—Mr. Irvine:

1. Did the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance receive pre-budget representations from the Canadian paper box manufacturing association asking for removal of the sales tax on steel rule cutting and creasing dies?
2. What consideration was given to these representations in light of the fact that these dies are short-lived and quickly scrapped?
3. What are the reasons for retaining the sales tax on these dies in such a highly competitive industry?

Mr. MacNaught: 1. Yes.

2. This representation and many others were carefully considered during the preparation of the budget.

3. The decision was reached, as announced in the budget speech, not to recommend any changes in the Excise Tax Act this year.

INTEREST ON NATIONAL DEBT

Question No. 772—Mr. Watson (Assiniboia):

What was the total amount of interest paid on Canada's national debt in the year 1963 and, of this amount, how much was paid to what banks and companies?

Mr. Benson: Total amount of interest paid on Canada's national debt in the calendar year 1963 was $623,707,577.16. No information is available as to what corporations and individuals own coupon bonds. It is not in the public interest to reveal to whom interest is paid on fully registered bonds.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 775—Mr. Crouse:

1. Is the consumer price index, which at the beginning of March was 134.6, the highest in this nation's history?
2. Does the government consider present economic conditions in Canada to be of an inflationary nature and, if so, are any measures to be adopted to control such inflation?

Mr. Benson: 1. Yes.

2. (a) No. (b) Answered by 2(a).

*ADDITIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR ESKIMOS AND INDIANS IN LABRADOR

Question No. 783—Mr. Granger:

1. Between June 21, 1957, and April 22, 1963, did the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration receive any communication requesting additional federal assistance for the Indians and/or Eskimos in Labrador and, if so, on what dates?
2. What reply was given to any such request for assistance?

Mr. Badanai: 1. Yes. Departmental files contain copies of letters dated March 26, 1959, April 14, 1959, October 6, 1959, October 23, 1959, December 29, 1960, March 16, 1961, June 1, 1961, October 3, 1961, March 23, 1962, and May 17, 1962.

2. The replies indicated that this matter was under consideration.

EASTERN D.E.W. LINE SUPPLY CONTRACT

Question No. 798—Mr. Nugent:

Is the contract for D.E.W. line supply for the eastern Arctic sector negotiated or tendered?

Mr. Pickersgill: Originally, public tenders were called on a several year basis. On the completion of some of these contracts extensions were negotiated particularly for ice strengthened vessels. The balance of shipping required is done on an annual tender call basis.

SECOND FERRY DOCK, BORDEN, P.E.I.

Question No. 823—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When is the expected completion date for the second dock at the ferry terminal at Borden, Prince Edward Island?
2. What was the original target date for completion and, when was the project commenced?
3. What factors caused the delay in construction?
4. What is the estimated cost of the project?
5. What amount has so far been expended?
6. How many regular crossings per day will be made by the M.V. Confederation during the summer season of 1964?
7. When is the M.V. Abegweit expected to return to service?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. About June 20, 1964.

2. Specified completion date, June 5, 1964. (work commenced May 2, 1963)

3. A considerable quantity of the steel sheet piling delivered for use in this work was damaged during shipment to site and reorder of this material was necessary. Poor construction weather also delayed the work.

4. Estimated cost $1,221,510.

5. Expenditure to date $547,199.01.

6. The MV Confederation will make seven daily trips each way during the summer season of 1964.

7. The end of May 1964.

*APARTHEID—STATEMENT BY MR. WESTON

Question No. 837—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been called to remarks in defence of South Africa's policy of apartheid reportedly made by Mr. W. Garfield Weston of George Weston Limited of Toronto?

2. Is the government examining the question of government purchases from this company?

Mr. Davis: 1. Yes.

2. No.

DREDGE 116 AND TUG "HERCULES"

Question No. 846—Mr. McBain:

1. On what date was dredge 116 and the tug Hercules as well as other equipment in this connection turned over by the Department of Public Works to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for disposal purposes?

2. Were tenders called by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation on (a) the tug Hercules (b) dredge 116?

3. What were the names and addresses of the persons or firms tendering on the above, who were the successful tenderers, and on what prices were their tenders accepted?

4. Was dredge 116 sold to be scrapped, or will it be used in dredging operations by its new owner?

5. Will dredge 116 be replaced by new equipment owned by public works?

Mr. Drury: 1. January 10, 1964.

2. (a) Yes; (b) yes.

3. Tug Hercules:

The successful firm tendering was: Verreault Navigation Inc., Les. Mechins, Cte. Matane, Que., $3,350.

The following also submitted tenders: Lee Marine Ltd., Leeland Gardens, Port Lambton, Ontario; Courageous Sailing Club, per E. J. Harten, 584 Cayley Drive, London, Ontario; Marine Salvage Ltd., 170 Welland Street, Port Colborne, Ont.; F. McMillan, R.R. No. 2, Port Lambton, Ont.

Dredge 116:

The successful firm tendering was: Verreault Navigation Inc., Les. Mechins, Cte. Matane, Que., $6,550.

The following also submitted tenders: Lee Marine Ltd., Leeland Gardens, Port Lambton, Ont.; The J. P. Porter Co. Ltd., 806 Dominion Sq. Bldg., Montreal; Marine Salvage Ltd., 170 Welland St., Port Colborne, Ont.

4. The sale was made without condition and the use to be made by its new owner is not known.

5. The answer of the Minister of Public Works in so far as this part of the question is concerned is no.

STRENGTH OF ARMED FORCES

Question No. 847—Mr. MacRae:

1. What was the total strength of the navy, army, and R.C.A.F. at March 31, 1964?

2. What is the target date for complete integration of the armed forces?

3. What is the estimated strength of the armed forces when integration is complete?

Mr. Hellyer: 1. 120,781.

2. Three to four years.

[Mr. Knowles.]

3. It is not possible at this time to anticipate the total personnel strength of the armed forces when integration is completed. For interim planning purposes a reduction of 10,000 has been set.

DEFENCE DEPARTMENT SCHOOLS OVERSEAS

Question No. 849—Mr. Enns:

1. How are appointments made to D.N.D. schools overseas?

2. What province's curriculum is followed in these schools?

3. Are teachers from that province given preference in the D.N.D. schools overseas?

4. How many D.N.D. schools are there (a) in Europe (b) in other countries?

5. How many principals have been appointed in the last ten years, and in which province were they employed prior to their overseas appointment?

Mr. Cardin: 1. Principals, teachers, inspectors and superintendents are obtained for D.N.D. schools overseas through the co-operation of many school boards across Canada.

2. From kindergarten to grade 6 a composite curriculum derived from all provincial courses is used in order to minimize the difficulties involved in the movement of personnel from various provinces of Canada to overseas schools and on return to Canada. From grade 7 to 13 the province of Ontario curriculum is followed so that pupils can qualify for the certificates and diplomas granted by the Ontario department of education to those who successfully complete the examinations while overseas.

3. Other factors being equal preference is given to Ontario teachers assigned to academic teaching at the grade 11, 12 and 13 level. Previous experience in preparing pupils to write the annual examinations set by the Ontario department of education for these grade levels has proved to be an important factor in maintaining a consistently high percentage of successful papers written by students in the D.N.D. schools overseas. For all other grade levels and vocational assignments at any level there is no provincial preference governing selection of the teaching staff.

4. (a) 21 in Europe; (b) 93 in Canada.

PROPOSED REDUCTION IN STRENGTH, ARMED FORCES

Question No. 852—Mr. MacRae:

1. What is the estimated reduction of personnel in the R.C.A.F. as a result of the proposed integration of the armed forces?
2. What is the estimated reduction of personnel in the navy as a result of the proposed integration of the armed forces?
3. What is the estimated reduction of personnel in the army as a result of the proposed integration of the armed forces?

Mr. Hellyer: 1, 2 and 3. It is not possible at this time to anticipate the total personnel strength of the armed forces when integration is completed. An interim planning figure of a reduction of 10,000 has been set but this has not been broken down by navy, army and air force.

CHARTERED BANK PROFITS

Question No. 853—Mr. Dionne:

What were the gross and net profits of Canadian chartered banks in each of the years 1960, 1961, 1962, and 1963?

[Translation]

Answer: This information for the undernoted fiscal years of the banks was laid before parliament on the following dates: 1960, February 10, 1961; 1961, February 9, 1962; 1962, January 21, 1963; 1963, February 18, 1964.

It also appears at page 83 of the February 1964 issue of the Bank of Canada statistical summary.

REDUCTION OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL, DEFENCE DEPARTMENT

Question No. 855—Mr. MacRae:

What is the estimated reduction of civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence as a result of integration of the armed forces?

Mr. Hellyer: It is not possible at this time to anticipate the total estimated strength of civilian personnel in the Department of National Defence when integration of the armed forces is completed.

COST OF LAND FOR HOUSING PROJECT, MALVERN, ONT.

Question No. 858—Mr. Brewin:

1. What was the cost to the government of Canada and to the province of Ontario of the acquisition in 1953 of farm lands in the township of Scarborough in the neighbourhood of Malvern under a joint housing development program?
2. What was the total sum of money paid out to farmers who owned the lands expropriated for the purpose?
3. What housing developments, if any, have taken place under the project?
4. What is the present use of the land?
5. What has been the cost in interest and otherwise of the lands and what receipts have the government of Canada or the province of Ontario secured from the expropriated lands?
6. Have any of the lands expropriated under the program been sold and at what prices?
7. If no serious development has taken place or is contemplated in the near future, what do the government of Canada and the government of Ontario propose to do with the lands in question?

Mr. Nicholson: 1. $2,396,223, including legal, survey and sundry charges.

2. $2,001,420, excluding voluntary purchases.

3. The lands have not yet been developed.

4. Approximately 1,600 acres are rented for farming purposes. The remainder is not being used at the present time.

5. Accrued interest to March 31, 1964, $765,070. Legal survey and sundry charges, $77,411. This amount is included in the answer to 1. above. Net recovery from rental of land and buildings, $93,401.

6. The following parcels of land of the total acreage acquired have been sold: board of education, township of Scarborough, 6.028 acres, $15,070; the metro Toronto and regional conservation authority, 5.752 acres, $1.

In addition, lease-purchase agreements have been signed as follows: Canadian Pacific Railway, 1.443 acres, $3,607, Consumers Gas Company, .286 acres, $1,000.

7. It is intended to make this land available for urban development as soon as the necessary municipal trunk services reach the area. Plans for a comprehensive neighbourhood will be prepared at the appropriate time. Land will be set aside for community facilities and for public housing projects to accommodate families of low income.

ST. SIMÉON, QUE.—MAIL CONTRACT

Question No. 876—Mr. Bélanger:

1. Who has the contract for carrying mail from the landing stage on the wharf at St. Siméon to the St. Siméon post office?
2. What compensation is paid in respect of this contract?

[Translation]

Mr. Nicholson: 1. Mrs. Léopold Lapointe.

2. $1 per trip (about $81 per year).

SUBSIDIES TO CLARKE STEAMSHIPS LTD.

Question No. 878—Mr. Bélanger:

1. Does Clarke Steamships Ltd. receive government subsidies for its operations?
2. If so, what is the total amount of the subsidies, and what is the amount of each category?

[Translation]

Answer: The Canadian maritime commission advises as follows:—

1. Clarke Steamship Co. Ltd. receives subsidies for the operation of two steamship services.

2. The amount of subsidies paid in 1963-64 was $430,000 for the operation of the service

Quebec, Natashquan and Harrington operating between Montreal and Blanc Sablon, and $35,000 for the winter service entitled Murray Bay or Rimouski and north shore of St. Lawrence river ports operating between Quebec and Havre St. Pierre during the winter months.

DISCHARGE OF SEWAGE INTO WATERWAYS

Question No. 881—Mr. Stenson:

1. Has the Department of Transport legislation which provides for the control of the discharge of sewage from boats on our waterways and, if so, who in the department has authority to enforce these regulations?

2. Has the department received a letter from the Otonabee region conservation authority on this matter and, if so, what action does the department intend to take?

Mr. Pickersgill: 1 and 2. No.

VETERANS HOSPITALS, QUEBEC

Question No. 896—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What is the number of veterans hospitals in the province of Quebec?

2. By whom and in what manner are those hospitals administered?

Mr. Teillet: 1. Three.

2. By Department of Veterans Affairs.

GRANTS TO MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS SOCIETY

Question No. 903—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare made any grants to the multiple sclerosis society of Canada for research purposes and, if so, what were the amounts paid in each of the last three years?

2. If no such grants were made, are there reasons to prevent the department from making such contributions?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. Under the national health grants, no grant has been made during the last three years to the multiple sclerosis society of Canada for research purposes but grants were made available at provincial request for research into this disease at the following universities:

(1) Queen's University, Kingston: 1961-62, $15,455; 1962-63, $12,325; 1963-64, nil.

(2) University of Manitoba, Winnipeg: 1961-62, $6,517; 1962-63, $5,703; 1963-64, nil.

2. If research projects are submitted under the national health grants by the multiple sclerosis society of Canada, through the provincial departments of health, they will receive immediate study under the terms of the annual order in council, the latest of which is P.C. 1964-19/559.

*DEPORTATION ORDERS, MENTALLY ILL IMMIGRANTS

Question No. 907—Mr. Cameron (High Park):

1. When misfortune befalls a landed immigrant requiring temporary admittance to a mental hospital, does the Department of Citizenship and Immigration issue an order for deportation to the immigrant's country of origin?

2. When the immigrant regains his health and he is at no time a charge to the state and is allowed to remain in Canada, and he applies for citizenship, does the order of deportation prevent him from qualifying?

3. How long has he got to wait before the order of deportation is removed?

4. Is there any discretionary power vested in the minister, deputy minister, or in any other official of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration to remove a deportation order?

Mr. Badanai: 1. Section 19 (1) (e) (iii) of the Immigration Act requires that a report be submitted to the director of immigration on any person, other than a Canadian citizen or a person with Canadian domicile, who among other things becomes an inmate of an asylum or hospital for mental diseases. The director may, if he considers such action warranted, order that an immigration special inquiry be held to determine whether the individual is subject to deportation. If an inquiry is not ordered, the individual retains his status and may acquire citizenship in due course. Should an inquiry take place and deportation be ordered, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration may suspend deportation and allow the person concerned to stay in Canada under special authority. Rarely is anyone deported because of mental illness unless it is clearly in his interest to be returned to his own country.

2. With the issuance of a deportation order, the process of acquiring Canadian domicile automatically ceases and, without domicile, an individual is not eligible to qualify for Canadian citizenship. The passage of time does not affect the validity of a deportation order and so long as the order remains in force, the individual cannot qualify for citizenship.

3 and 4. Neither the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the deputy minister nor any other official of the department has any discretion to cancel or quash a deportation order properly based on provisions of the act, although the minister may direct at any time that an inquiry be reopened for the purposes of receiving any additional evidence which could affect the special inquiry officer's original decision. Unfortunately, as the Immigration Act now stands, it is not possible to reinstate the landed immigrant status of a person ordered deported on mental grounds even though he may have recovered. This is one of the problems which is to be dealt with in the revision of the Immigration Act.

ABANDONMENT OF N.Y.C. CANADIAN SUBDIVISION

Question No. 913—Mr. Danforth:

Has an application been received by the Department of Transport from the New York Central Railroad Company in regard to partial or complete abandonment of the Canadian subdivision either now or in the future?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada advises as follows:

1. No. However, the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, pursuant to a request made by the Minister of Transport under section 36 of the Railway Act, is inquiring into a brief submitted to the Minister of Transport by Mr. G. A. McNabb, Q.C. with respect to complaints concerning the possible partial or complete abandonment of the Canada southern division of the New York Central Railroad, and the board has arranged for public hearings in the matter in St. Thomas, Windsor, and Welland, Ontario, commencing June 16, 22 and 24, 1964 respectively.

SHIPPING FROM PORT OF CHURCHILL

Question No. 915—Mr. Korchinski:

1. On what date in 1963 did shipping commence at the port of Churchill?
2. On what date in 1963 did shipping close at the port of Churchill?
3. How many ships loaded grain at the port of Churchill in 1963 and under what country was each ship registered?
4. What amount of grain was loaded each day at the port of Churchill in 1963?

Questions

SERUM FOR LEUKEMIA

Question No. 916—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What food and drug regulations would have to be met by biochemist Gaston Naessens before he can undertake clinical tests and the distribution of his anablast serum?
2. What tests are required to establish the value and safety of this drug?
3. Are any federal government employees investigating this case and, if so, what is the name, title and qualifications of each?
4. Do food and drug officials hold consultations with Canadian specialists, or do they follow the recommendations of the medical boards throughout Canada?
5. Who is responsible for taking the final decision in such a case?
6. Can an appeal be made against the department's decision in such a case and, if so, what procedure should be followed?
7. If no appeal can be made what regulations prohibit such appeal?
8. Will the government give consideration to the referral of the matter to the special committee on food and drugs?

Miss LaMarsh: 1. Control of the sale or distribution of new drugs is provided by sections C.08.001 to C.08.009, inclusive, of the food and drug regulations. The general distribution of a new drug may not be undertaken until the requirements of section C.08.002 are met. Limited distribution to qualified investigators for the sole purpose of clinical testing may be undertaken only when the manufacturer has filed with the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare a preclinical submission in satisfactory form and content containing the information prescribed by section C.08.005.

2. Tests to establish the value and safety of a drug are required both before and during clinical investigation. Before clinical investigation may be undertaken, a manufacturer is required by section C.08.005 of the regulations to provide, amongst other data, information concerning the results of investigations made to support the clinical use for the new drug, contraindications and precautions known in respect thereof and the suggested treatment of overdosage, concerning methods, equipment, plant and controls used in the manufacture, processing and packaging of the drug, detail of tests applied to control the potency, purity and safety of the drug, as well as the name and qualifications of investigators to whom the drug is to be distributed and the names of all institutions in which it is proposed further investigations be carried out.

3. Since no formal preclinical submission has been filed to date with the food and drug directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare on a preparation designated as anablast serum, no formal investigation of the case has been made by the department.

4. The officials of the food and drug directorate frequently hold ad hoc meetings with Canadian specialists. In addition the Canadian drug advisory committee is consulted on matters concerning drugs.

5. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is responsible for the final decision as to whether the manufacturer of a new drug has complied with the regulations.

6 and 7. The sections of the food and drug regulations dealing with new drugs, as part of the over-all food and drug legislation, is legislation in the field of criminal law and the prohibitions contained therein are statutory prohibitions, the violation of which may lead to prosecution. Decisions of the minister in respect thereof are therefore subject to test through the normal process of law.

8. Until more information is available on anablast serum no decision can be reached as to whether it would be an appropriate subject for referral to the special committee on food and drugs.

REPORT ON GENEVA TRADE CONFERENCE

Question No. 939—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce received an interim report from the international conference on trade in Geneva and on the position of the Canadian representatives regarding the problems being studied at this conference?
2. If so, what are the main features of the report?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. The United Nations conference on trade and development has been going on for a little more than a month and is supposed to end on June 15. During the first days, the ministers made general statements outlining the position of their respective countries on the main proposals placed before the conference. Five committees have been set up and are now considering those proposals after which they will make recommendations to the conference sitting in plenary meeting. It is expected that the conference will end with another meeting of the ministers.

2. Consideration is now being given to the numerous and varied proposals which were made to improve the trading position and the economic growth of underdeveloped countries. Up until now, the discussions indicate that, on the whole, participating countries are in favour of those objectives. However, there is disagreement on the approach to take concerning certain proposals and it will be difficult to reconcile the various points of view during the next few weeks.

3. Canada has been elected as one of the vice chairmen of the conference and our delegation plays an active and, I feel, a constructive role in the proceedings of the various committees. Canada's position was set out in a statement I made during the ministerial meeting at the opening of the conference. The text of that statement is as follows:

Following is the text of a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Paul Martin, to the United Nations conference on trade and development in Geneva on Tuesday, March 24, 1964.

I wish to begin by congratulating you upon your election as president of this conference. I am confident that you will guide our deliberations over the next few weeks toward constructive solutions on the many difficult and complex questions before us.

We are faced today with one of the great opportunities of the twentieth century. Throughout the world, governments and peoples expect this meeting to make definite progress toward a goal which each nation shares—the greater welfare of its people. We must never lose sight, in the long and complex debate, of the urgency of our responsibilities.

All of us recognize that this is an historic Conference. It is unprecedented in the breadth of participation and the nature of its objectives. The ability of our United Nations to respond to the needs of member countries is once again being tested. In recent weeks the United Nations and its member governments have been preoccupied with the organization's peace keeping role—and specifically with the critical situation in Cyprus. During this crisis, Canadians have, as our Prime Minister has said, been proud to play their full part once again. Mr. President, Canada can also be counted on to respond in those areas which are the objectives of this conference. We recognize that prosperity and stability are indivisibly linked.

Since its foundation, the United Nations has played an important and constructive role in the vital sector of economic and trade co-operation among nations. Member countries have joined together to dismantle the barriers to world trade with the aim of ensuring the best use of the world's resources and raising the living standards of the world's peoples. In the interests of expanding world trade, rules have been fashioned as safeguards against the restrictive and discriminatory practices of the past. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the international monetary fund, the international bank and other United Nations institutions were set up to buttress the new framework of world trading relationships. This new and more liberal trade system has brought benefits to all the countries of the world. No country is more indebted to these accomplishments than my own, which is so vitally dependent on foreign trade. Canada supports the preservation and development of the basic trade rules and institutions which have been fashioned over the past two decades.

A great co-operative endeavour over the past two decades has been the economic development of new countries and countries seeking to reach new economic and social goals. The United Nations and its agencies have not only aroused world support for these efforts, but have also given us many of the tools to work with. Massive resources have been transferred by way of aid directly and through international agencies to reinforce even greater efforts of the developing countries themselves. That the efforts of these countries are bound to be paramount was emphasized yesterday in your own speech, Mr. President, when you pointed out that in this "endeavour for rapid economic growth to offset the increase in population and to keep up with the development trends in advanced countries, the developing countries bear the main responsibility for their economic and social progress". The same point was made by the present Prime Minister of Canada some years ago when he was speaking of the role of external aid. He went on, however, to develop this point in the following way: "The fact that external aid may often be marginal does not, however, make it unimportant. Many a garment might unravel if it were not for the hem. In much the same way, the fabric of economic and social life in many of these countries is strengthened by the function which outside assistance performs and by the evidence which it brings of widespread interest, sympathy and support."

Since the war Canada has made substantial contributions to international development efforts. From the start Canada actively encouraged the formation of United Nations programs and we backed up our support with substantial contributions. We were among the founding members of the Colombo plan in 1950 and since then we have annually transferred Canadian resources to countries in South and Southeast Asia, and more recently to Africa and countries in the Caribbean area. Through Canadian and United Nations programs we have provided substantial development resources, by far the greater part of which has been on a grant basis requiring no repayment.

The Canadian aid effort is part of a broad co-operative endeavour to hasten economic and social progress throughout the world. My government recognizes both the new sense of urgency behind this endeavour and the growing determination to achieve development goals. We have therefore decided to increase Canada's economic aid by more than one half. Our expanded effort includes a new program of long term loans on liberal terms. We expect our aid expenditures during the next months to reach $180 to $190 million.

Until recently the main emphasis in international arrangements has been to promote economic development through financial and technical assistance. We must now add another dimension to the great effort to support economic development. We must examine how trade can make a fuller contribution. The developing countries are rightly seeking through trade expansion to accelerate their economic development and to raise their living standards. World trade is still too much fettered by restrictions, high tariffs, trade discrimination and other barriers. The terms of trade have deteriorated for exporters of raw materials and foodstuffs. These basic products, moreover, are subject to sudden and unforeseen price fluctuations which can result in serious setbacks for development plans and for the efforts of producing countries. The developing countries are rightly seeking to diversify their economies, to create soundly based processing and manufacturing industries and to sell the products of these industries in the markets of the world. Their efforts deserve and require the encouragement of advanced countries. All of these countries represented here today stand to gain by increases in the productive capacity and prosperity of the less-developed world. As I see it, the task before this conference should be the establishment of a framework of world trade in which developing countries can achieve a satisfactory rate of economic growth and improved standards of living.

To achieve all these objectives will not be easy and will require adjustments and fresh efforts by all of us. Our task will be eased if we work together and share in the inevitable adjustments. By acting together within the United Nations, we can create in all our countries conditions and the political will necessary for progress. Indeed, the only way to move forward effectively is by joint action.

Mr. President, the issues before this conference have been ably analysed in the report presented by the secretary-general, Dr. Raul Prebisch. His report presents us with many challenging proposals. I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the distinguished services which he has already rendered to this conference.

My government—and I am sure each of the governments represented here—has given most serious thought to the issues facing this conference. Each of us will be making a contribution to the consideration of these problems in the days ahead. It may be helpful if I were to outline at this preliminary stage in a more specific way the Canadian approach on how these objectives can best be attained.

Canada will work with other developed countries in eliminating, wherever practicable, tariffs and other restrictions which obstruct trade in tropical foodstuffs and industrial raw materials traditionally exported by developing countries. The new round of tariff negotiations coming up in the GATT, known as the "Kennedy round", will complement this conference. These negotiations should reduce or eliminate barriers to many important exports from developing countries. To free world trade in food and raw materials would be a major accomplishment from which all countries in the world will benefit. At present Canada has no quantitative restrictions on imports of products of interest to developing countries and our tariffs on tropical products and raw materials are generally low or have been removed altogether; we have no internal taxes inhibiting the consumption of these products.

Canada has been a party to all major commodity agreements concluded since the end of the last war. We have always been prepared to explore with other countries the possibility of other agreements on a commodity by commodity basis. However, it would not be in the interest of the developing countries to encourage unduly high prices for primary commodities. High prices are likely to generate unsaleable surpluses by stimulating production and reducing consumption through the use of natural or synthetic substitutes.

Canada will work with the developing countries and others in trying to improve the conditions of world trade for temperate agricultural products. Agricultural protectionism in certain developed countries has been growing; it is tending to increase uneconomic production in these countries. It has curtailed the markets of efficient suppliers in developed and developing countries alike.

Canada had advocated that, in the forthcoming Kennedy round of tariff and trade negotiations, developed countries should ensure that products of interest to developing countries, including manufactured goods and semi-processed materials, are included in the scope of negotiations. As has been recognized in the GATT, this should be done without expecting full reciprocity from developing countries for benefits they may derive from these negotiations. We are hopeful also that successful negotiations of reduction of tariffs on semi-processed materials will go a long way to reducing differentials between tariffs on raw and processed commodities which have created problems for developing countries.

Canada strongly supports a general removal of quantitative restrictions now impeding imports into developed countries of manufactured goods from developing countries. It has been noted that exports of manufactures by developing countries are of limited variety and are exported in volume to only a few markets. Developing countries need the greatest possible freedom of access to the widest number of markets if they are to establish a diversified and expanding industrial structure. The likelihood of market disruption would be lessened if these exports were less unevenly distributed among developed countries through the establishment of more uniformly favourable conditions of access.

While Canada is approaching the question of preferences with caution, we would be prepared to consider proposals for the exchange of regional tariff preferences among developing countries for a limited period of time and under conditions which took reasonable account of the interests of outside countries.

Canada would be prepared during the course of the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations to examine carefully any tariff preferences now enjoyed by Canada in the markets of the developing countries which may be regarded as prejudicial to the trade of other developing countries.

Canada recognizes that development plans and efforts may be prejudiced by adverse changes in the terms of trade or by other occurrences beyond the control of developing countries. Accordingly, we supported the recent decision of the international monetary fund to increase its help to countries suffering from temporary declines in export receipts. As regards longer term declines, we are prepared to join with others at this conference in studying ways of improving bilateral aid programs and relating them more closely to the changing economic and trading circumstances of the individual developing countries.

As regards the basic question of future institutional arrangements, it is our belief that we can only see clearly what will be required when we approach the end of our deliberations. We shall then have a better idea of what is likely to emerge as a result of the conference. In general, we are not in favour of setting up a new organization of a more or less independent character. Rather we would be more inclined to adapt the existing machinery to make it more responsive to the problems of the developing countries. Indeed encouraging progress is already being made in that direction.

This, Mr. President, is the position of the Canadian delegation at the outset of this conference. It will be clear from my presentation that we believe that much more can be done and must be done to free the channels of trade. We think that, if this were done, the developing countries would have a better opportunity of competing on terms which would bring into play their natural advantages as efficient producers of certain commodities and manufactures. The freeing of trade channels would also help to overcome the effects of undue protectionism in the developed countries and to lead of itself to some of that international division of labour to which reference has already been made in this conference. But I do not want to suggest that the freeing of the channels of trade is all that requires to be done. The range of problems which we have come to consider is vast and no single nor simple solution for them is likely to be possible. We are prepared, Mr. President, to join others at this conference in exploring patiently all avenues along which solutions may lie. We have come to listen to the views and preoccupations of others as much as to share with them our experiences as a young and expanding country.

The object of the conference, as we see it, will be to contribute to the solution of problems which are crucial to the well-being of a very large proportion of the human race. They are urgent problems and their solution is urgent. Many new nations have come into being over the past decade or so. Their governments are concerned—as they must be concerned—to ensure that the political independence they have achieved should find fruition in rising standards of living, in better health and improved opportunities for education, and in the greater happiness of all their people. The urgency of this task is such that they cannot accomplish it by themselves. The more developed countries must come to their aid—as indeed they have already come to their aid—recognizing that in a world which is becoming daily more interdependent, the conditions under which mankind lives will have to be brought into a more equitable relationship. It has been said of the people of the developing countries that they were embarked on a "revolution of rising expectations". It is to take a step forward in the direction of meeting these expectations, Mr. President, that this conference has been called and I am glad to be able to pledge the active co-operation of the Canadian delegation in the work in which we are about to engage.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CROWN ASSETS

VANCOUVER—DISPOSAL OF SITE OF R.C.A.F. STATION KITSILANO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the city of Vancouver delegation, concerned with the future use of the Kitsilano air base property, is in Ottawa, can he give the assurance I asked for last Monday, that the government will not make any final decision on the disposition of these lands until the delegation's proposals have been carefully studied?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, certain of my colleagues concerned with this matter and I had the privilege of meeting the delegation from Vancouver and we expect, as a result of this meeting, that arrangements will be made which will be satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): As a supplementary question, can the Prime Minister give the house the assurance that the statement made at a press conference in Vancouver last Friday by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was both premature and incorrect?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MEASURES TO BE CONSIDERED BEFORE SUMMER RECESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding the business of the house, and ask the right hon. gentleman if he would be prepared at an early date to give the house a list of the measures which the government is convinced must be passed before there is any summer recess. I recognize that the government cannot set a date for a summer recess because part of the responsibility for this lies with all members of the house, but if the Prime Minister would outline the legislation which it is considered imperative should be dealt with prior to a recess, hon. members would have some idea of what work has to be completed before that time.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate, and a good idea, if I could give the house at an early date a list of what might be called government priority proposals as to legislation. It is difficult, as my hon. friend has indicated, to say the government hopes these will be passed, or that it even insists that these be passed before a recess.

For one thing, the pension legislation is priority legislation, but the question of a decision on that matter by the house will depend, as I said yesterday, on the speed with which we can get an amendment to the constitution which will make it possible to include survivor benefits. Also, ratification of the Columbia treaty is a very important priority matter, but it is still before a committee. Subject to these qualifications I shall be very glad indeed to make that kind of statement, perhaps next week.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As a supplementary question, in that regard is the Prime Minister considering the effect of the United Kingdom general election this fall and the consequent likely early dissolution of the United Kingdom parliament in his time table to secure a constitutional amendment necessary for the Canada pension plan?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, of course I have that consideration in mind, but I hope the United Kingdom parliament will not be dissolved until it has had an opportunity to amend the Canadian constitution; and I hope before long we will not have to go to the United Kingdom parliament for such amendments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INVITATION TO UN SECRETARY GENERAL TO ADDRESS HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the secretary general of the United Nations is to visit Ottawa later this month, would the minister inquire from the secretary general whether he would accept an invitation to speak to the standing committee on external affairs, if he were extended such an invitation by that committee? I make this request, Mr. Speaker, because of the very special interest of the members of this house and of the people of Canada in the peace keeping operations of the United Nations.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all very grateful and honoured that the secretary general is going to visit Canada at the end of the month. I would hope there would be an opportunity for him to speak not only to the members of the external affairs committee but to all members of the house. The suggestion for exploring this opportunity was made in an aside to me a few moments ago by the Prime Minister, and I am sure he will take steps toward that end.

CANADIAN FLAG

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO BE TAKEN THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question.

He stated in his riding, more precisely at Espanola, a few days ago, that the adoption of a distinctive national flag would help cement national unity.

Here is my question. Does he intend to submit to the house during this session that "cement" he talked about to his electors of Algoma East?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I did not use the words attributed to me by the hon. gentleman, but I do not object to his interpretation of what I said. The policy of the government in regard to this matter is well known. Within a year, now, this matter will be submitted to parliament for parliament's decision.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): In view of the growing disunity in the country arising from the promise of a new flag design—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would rephrase his question.

Mr. Coates: I do not know how else I can make the statement. Disunity is evident. Every newspaper one picks up indicates great concern about this proposed change. Would the Prime Minister give consideration to withdrawing his promise to introduce a new design, and carry on with the red ensign?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Coates: Will the Prime Minister go along with the proposal put forward by the Royal Canadian Legion and carry out a national referendum to decide what should be our national flag?

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister?

In view of the fact that Canada has been an adult and independent country since the statute of Westminster, could the Prime Minister assure the house that his government will give us but one distinctive national flag, without union jack or red ensign, so that Canada may not be mistaken for some foreign country as happened at the time of the Suez crisis?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest to the hon. member that he put this question on the order paper.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I want to discuss this matter after ten o'clock.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

ATTENDANCE AT ROYAL COMMISSION HEARINGS BY MEMBERS OF PUBLIC SERVICE AND ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. I am wondering whether the chief of the general staff has now authorized officers and men to participate in the deliberations of the royal commission on biculturalism and bilingualism in accordance with Queen's orders and army regulations.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): I am now in a position to answer the hon. member's question and to inform the house that there is no prohibition, first, against civil servants appearing before the royal commission on biculturalism and bilingualism and giving evidence if they wish to do so. No instructions have been issued by the Department of National Defence which would question this right.

Concerning members of the armed forces, the Queen's regulations preclude a member of the forces giving public evidence on a military subject or publishing in writing, or delivering any lecture, address or broadcast in any way dealing with a subject of a controversial nature pertaining to public policy without permission of headquarters. Army headquarters sent a message on May 4 to its commands as a reminder of these provisions.

Due to the special nature of this inquiry, however, it is recognized to be in the public interest that the widest range of views and opinions should be obtained, including those of the members of the forces. It is nevertheless important, having regard to the problems associated with military discipline, that arrangements be available which will give individual members of the forces the opportunity to present views freely if they so wish without compromising that discipline. The commission has agreed in these circumstances to receive evidence of any members of the forces who so desire, in camera. The Department of National Defence will cooperate in encouraging the attendance of members of the forces who wish to appear before the commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Can the minister assure the house that the same consideration will be given to other Canadian citizens appearing before the commission who may also wish to give their evidence in camera?

Mr. Cardin: I am, of course, speaking of the military personnel of the department, and I do not think I should be asked to go further.

Mr. Nielsen: Then can the Prime Minister give that assurance?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I do not think the hon. member and other Canadians are subject to the same rules of discipline.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question in this regard, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether there is any difficulty about discipline, and so forth, regarding members of the armed forces appearing at sessions of the commission during the evening hours, as these have been held in the past. Is there any difficulty in this regard?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in members of the forces attending the sessions. What we are now speaking of is the submission of briefs to the commission.

Mr. Lambert: This is implicit in my question, Mr. Speaker, because this is what we are discussing. They can attend to give evidence during the evening hours without any difficulty, in the main, in regard to their ordinary course of duty.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the royal commission is dealing with biculturalism and bilingualism and not with military matters, will the minister tell the house why military personnel should be required to give their evidence in camera and why the people of Canada should be denied the opportunity of hearing that evidence.

Mr. Cardin: The regulations as they are do not deal only with matters of military significance, but also with matters that are controversial and of a public nature. It is on those grounds that we have arranged with the commission to receive the presentations of members of the services in camera.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the anomalous situation which the associate minister has described, would it not be much easier to amend Q.O.&A.R. rather than go through this flim-flam procedure?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I disagree that the situation is anomalous, and I think this is perhaps the best way of giving members of the forces an opportunity to speak freely to the commission so that the members of the commission can appreciate the problems that exist in the services in this regard.

Mr. Douglas: They are being treated as second class citizens; that is what is happening.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I now put to the Associate Minister of National Defence the fact that the Queen's orders and army regulations contain exactly the formula under which this permission can be granted—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fairweather: —and I wonder whether this matter should not be reviewed. Article 19, subsection 37, says that the chief of the general staff can give this permission if it is in the public interest.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member that the staff of the Department of National Defence have looked at that particular regulation. We have now made up our minds, and I think this is perhaps the best thing that could be done under the circumstances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge).

Mr. Nielsen: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Yukon has asked one or two questions. We only have a half hour period and I must obviously distribute the favours, so to speak.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. It is impossible to determine whether it is of national significance until we hear the minister's reply.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: My question is based on an advertisement in the Ottawa Journal of May 1 which reads as follows:

> Men wanted as candidates for next federal election. Must believe in God and understand finance and banking.

Could the minister inform the house whether he has any knowledge of this advertisement and whether it was placed in the Journal by the government or by the Liberal party?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I see no conflict in the requirements which my hon. friend read out, but I have no knowledge of the advertisement.

WATER RESOURCES

PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY INTO GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has he received from the Ontario chamber of commerce a resolution recommending to study the possibility of diverting the James bay waters into the great lakes through the Harricana river, and does he intend to recommend that study?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper.

TRADE

GATT—PROPOSED 50 PER CENT TARIFF REDUCTION AS BASIS FOR NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of the decision taken in Geneva last night by the United States, the European economic community and Great Britain to make a 50 per cent, across the board tariff reduction the basis for future negotiations. I am wondering whether Canada has agreed to this basis.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, that has for some time now been the basis for negotiations in the discussion which have begun at Geneva. It has also been understood for some time that there are certain countries to which this particular principle does not apply in that form, and that the negotiations would have to be conducted on a different basis. That is all I can say about the matter pending the receipt of the particular report to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. Olson: A supplementary question. Has Canada agreed that this is a proper basis for future tariff negotiations respecting trade between Canada and the United States?

Mr. Pearson: No. We have made that quite clear. While we agree that we must give equivalent compensation for any concessions which are received, the application of this particular mathematical formula, in the case of Canada and the United States, would not be fair to Canada.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

SUGGESTED DELAY IN ANNOUNCEMENT OF TRAINING SCHOOL FOR OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. To further clarify the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Transport in regard to the establishment of a Canadian coastguard college at the Point Edward naval base, may I now ask the Minister of National Defence whether this information was relayed to the delegation from the Sydney board of trade when he met with them on March 17.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we discussed this as one of the possibilities for using some of the facilities at Point Edward, and it was just one of many suggestions which were made to demonstrate the initiative which this government is taking to try to find employment for the people who would be without jobs as a result of the closing of the naval base, and in order to make maximum use of the facilities there.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question. In view of the minister's reply may I ask him why this information was not given in the house on March 19, when the hon. member for Cape Breton South and myself asked this question?

Mr. Hellyer: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Transport will have to answer that question. As far as I am aware the decision had not yet been taken at that time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I may say that the decision was announced in this house at the first available moment after the final decision was made by the government.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister aware that the premier of British Columbia has issued a statement confirming that he regards the telegram sent to the government yesterday with respect to the Alberni flood disaster as an official request for assistance, and further describing the reply given yesterday as stupid?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not at any time raised a protest against or argued with the terminology used to describe me by other people in political life, and I am not going to do so now. I have not even inquired from time to time whether that language is the result of choice or of limitation. However, I want to assure the hon. member that the statement I made yesterday with respect to the wire was factual in every respect. The wire is still with us and we intend to communicate with the premier of British Columbia, and one of the first things we will ask him is that he give us permission to make public the wire which he sent us on May 4.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as the premier has indicated that prime ministers should communicate with prime ministers, is this the level at which these negotiations are now taking place?

Mr. Laing: I think the premier of British Columbia has been in touch with the Prime Minister on this matter. As a matter of fact, the wire to which I have referred was addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Rhéaume: Have you established diplomatic relations yet?

AGRICULTURE

DIELDRIN—USE AS GRASSHOPPER AND INSECT SPRAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It is one which I asked last fall concerning the use of dieldrin as a crop spray. Has anything been done to abandon the use of this dangerous poison on our cereal crops and pastures?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my estimates will be up for consideration tomorrow at which time I would be pleased to go into all the ramifications of the use of pesticides, insecticides and that sort of thing.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO REVISION OF BANK ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance will tell the house if he has now decided to delay the applications made by the three groups for constitution under the Bank Act until the amendments to the Bank Act have been brought in and, if so, when will these amendments be brought in?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): In reply to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the applications are now before the Senate or the Senate banking and commerce committee, who I am sure will proceed to deal with them in their usual fashion. As to when the amendments to the Bank Act will be brought in, it is my hope, as I have said on other occasions, that we will have an opportunity to make progress with this very difficult legislation within the Department of Finance this summer, with a view to being ready to present the bill to the house in the late fall.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Minister of Finance tell us, at this time, whether the Porter commission report will be referred to the parliamentary committee on banking and commerce for study and to determine the decisions to be taken or suggested to the government?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, since my hon. friend asked this question last week I have had an opportunity to examine the precedents in this matter. In accordance with the practice which was followed on the only other similar occasion in Canada, the first thing which has been done is to table the report so that all hon. members of the house as well as the public can have access to it. The government will have a chance to consider the report and reach conclusions as to which of the various suggestions and recommendations should be incorporated in the legislation which will be presented to the house. That legislation will then be referred to the banking and commerce committee, where witnesses will be called and an opportunity given to the public to comment on the bill which is up for consideration, as well as making any other comments or proposals they wish to make with regard to the contents of the report. I think nothing could be served by referring the report to the banking and commerce committee until the government has reached conclusions on the legislation to be presented.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): A supplementary question. Could the Minister of Finance tell the house for what length of time he proposes to ask parliament to extend bank charters pending this legislation?

Mr. Gordon: This proposal is contained in the bill. It is for one year, commencing June 30, 1964.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO CONSIDERATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister has had an opportunity to check with the Minister of Finance regarding the statement he is reported to have made out west a couple of days ago, and whether he can now confirm that it is the united view of the government that the Canada pension plan legislation will be proceeded with at this session?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have read the text of the minister's speech, and there is nothing in that text that justifies certain conclusions which were drawn from it and expressed in the house yesterday about delay in this matter.

FISHERIES

U.S. LEGISLATION RESPECTING FOREIGN VESSELS IN TERRITORIAL WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware that on Monday the House of Representatives at Washington passed a bill that would prohibit foreign fishing vessels in the territorial waters of the United States and provide for a fine of $10,000 or a year's imprisonment or both for violators? Could he also tell the house whether this bill was passed as a result of our stated intention to establish unilaterally a 12 mile fishing limit off Canada's coast?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into the matter at once, but pending examination I think I can give my hon. friend the assurance that any such bill of this kind dealt with at this time in Washington would, I am sure, have no relation to the bill which we are proposing to introduce.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the importance at the present time of the fishery off the United States coast to our Canadian operators, who are now in those waters long-lining for swordfish, while the Prime Minister is investigating the pertinent points would he also find out and tell the house whether this legislation applies to Canadian fishermen?

Mr. Pearson: I will be glad to do that.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a related question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister give the house an indication when he expects the negotiations between Canada, the United States and other interested countries with regard to the proposal for the extension of Canadian fishing waters will be terminated?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the first phase of the negotiations with most if not all of the countries interested in fishing off the Canadian coast has been completed, and we are now ready to carry on with these negotiations in more detail. At this time I cannot give an exact date when they will be completed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF CLUB CHARTERS HELD BY ONTARIO GAMBLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice of which I have sent him notice. In view of statements made by the attorney general of Ontario and in view of the very urgent need for clarification by the minister before the Ontario legislature recesses tomorrow, has the government received requests from the government of Ontario to cancel the charters held by the two notorious gamblers, Feeley and McDermott, for fear they will be used for illegal gambling activities? If so, what response has the government made to these representations and what action, if any, has been taken to cancel these charters?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for sending me notice of his question. I must answer for the moment, though, that my department has received no such request. Before the house opened today I intended to speak to the Secretary of State about the matter, because his department is concerned, and I undertake to send him notice.

Mr. Scott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I see the Secretary of State is here, so perhaps we could have an answer from him at this time.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I would ask the hon. member to repeat his question, please.

Mr. Scott: I want to know whether the government has received requests from the government of Ontario to cancel the charters held by the two notorious gamblers, Feeley and McDermott. Fears have been expressed by the police that these charters will be used for illegal gambling activities in Ontario. I should like to know whether representations have been received and what action has been taken.

Mr. Lamontagne: Not to my knowledge, but I shall inquire, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

GREAT LAKES—RECOMMENDATION BY COUNSEL RESPECTING PROSECUTION OF MCLAUGHLIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. A few days ago I asked him whether the report of special counsel appointed by the government had recommended that Mr. McLaughlin be charged with the same offence of which Mr. Banks was found guilty by a court in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thought I had already answered that question, but in case I have not I must say there has been no report from special counsel recommending the laying of an information against Mr. McLaughlin of the same nature as that laid against Mr. Banks, and for which offence he has been convicted. I did answer, however, that special counsel had recommended that Mr. McLaughlin be charged with conspiracy to induce certain people to leave their ships contrary to the Canada Shipping Act. However, I have also answered that the question of the references with respect to Mr. McLaughlin made in the proceedings concerning Banks would be the object of a report which I have sought. I have not yet received the exact text of the utterances, but I will continue to look into the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Batten in the chair.

ESTATE TAX ACT

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:

1. That in respect of property passing on the death of a person whose death occurs at any time after March, 1964, the deduction from the tax otherwise payable in respect of any such property that

(a) was situated in a province that levied a succession duty and that was not entitled under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act or any other act of the parliament of Canada to receive a payment in consequence of its refraining from increasing its succession duty in respect of such property or in respect of property described in subparagraph (b), or

(b) was personal property situated outside of Canada that was, on the death of any such person who at the time of his death was domiciled in a province described in subparagraph (a), transmitted to a person who at the time of such death was domiciled in or resident in that province, shall be 75 per cent.

2. That the limit of $1,500 on the amount of certain kinds of property passing on the death of a deceased person that may be transferred, delivered or paid over to any person resident in Canada without the consent of the minister, in the case of any one transferor, deliverer or payer, be increased to $2,500, and that such kinds of property be extended to include an amount payable under a policy of insurance in respect of sickness or accident in which the deceased had, immediately before his death, a beneficial or other interest.

3. That the property comprised in a settlement to be included in computing the aggregate net value of the property passing on the death of a person be deemed to include property comprised in a settlement where any income from such property is reserved to that person for life or any other period determinable by reference to death.

4. That a disposition made by a person out of any community of property existing between that person and his spouse at the time of the making of such disposition be deemed to have been made by each of them according to the respective share of each in that community.

5. That where, on condition of the purchase of an annuity, a policy of insurance was effected after March 16, 1964 on the life of a person there be included in computing the aggregate net value of the property passing on the death of such person the lesser of,

(a) the amount paid for the annuity less the aggregate of annuity payments made prior to the death, or

(b) the amount payable under the policy of insurance.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I thought it might be helpful if I gave a general outline of the proposals contained in the estate tax resolution before the committee begins to consider them in detail.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is a little difficult for the Chair to hear what is being said by the hon. member.

Mr. Benson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The resolution is divided into five paragraphs that outline the most important of the changes proposed for the Estate Tax Act. In addition the bill to amend the act will contain several other useful amendments.

Paragraph 1 implements part of the proposal made to the provinces last November to leave to them a larger share of the death duties field. It provides for a 75 per cent abatement, instead of the existing 50 per cent abatement, of the federal estate tax otherwise payable in respect of property in a province that levies a succession duty. The 75 per cent abatement will apply only to British Columbia at present because the other two provinces that levy a succession duty, Ontario and Quebec, have chosen not to raise their rates at present but to qualify instead for an equivalent tax abstention payment of 25 per cent. The existing 50 per cent abatement will continue to apply in respect of property situated in Ontario and Quebec. The existence of two levels of abatement will require a consequential amendment to the rules determining the situs of property.

Paragraph 2 proposes that the amount of certain kinds of property, such as money on deposit, that may be transferred from the deceased's estate to a beneficiary without the consent of the Minister of National Revenue be increased to $2,500 from $1,500 for each transferor. It also proposes that an amount of $2,500 payable under an insurance policy for sickness or accident may also be transferred without the minister's consent. These proposals are intended to make a greater amount of cash readily available to beneficiaries while the estate is being settled.

The next three paragraphs are concerned with amendments to correct anomalies or deficiencies in the law. Paragraph 3 deals with a special kind of settlement and is intended to ensure that such settlements will be taxed on the same basis as other settlements. Paragraph 4 also deals with a special kind of transfer—a disposition out of community property—and is intended to provide more uniform and equitable tax treatment. The proposal in paragraph 5 is intended to prevent the use of tax avoidance devices.

These proposals, and several others, will be found in the amending bill, and are those that it seemed necessary or appropriate to recommend to parliament at this time. I should like to reiterate, however, a statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, as reported at page 980 of Hansard for March 16, 1964:

> In reviewing the Estate Tax Act in the light of the representations that had been made about it, I was impressed with the case made by women's organizations saying that more recognition should be given to the special contribution that a wife makes to the accumulation of property by her husband. Any action to give effect to suggestions of this nature, however, would now affect provincial revenues more than our own budget position. Death duties are under review by provincial commissions of inquiry as well as by our royal commission on taxation. We have therefore deferred any action on this matter, and hope that there will be consultations with the provinces on it, as well as on other aspects of death duties, following the reports of the various commissions.

Mr. Lambert: I have a few points I should like to make at this time, particularly with regard to the statement made by the parliamentary secretary in respect of the words of the Minister of Finance appearing at page 980 of Hansard for March 16. I am just wondering what the minister meant by saying that he was much impressed with the case made by women's organizations that more recognition should be given to the special contribution a wife makes to the accumulation of property by her husband. We know many organizations have sought an increase in the basic exemption of an estate from $60,000 or $70,000 to $80,000. I will say that I agree there is a rather difficult position now that the federal government has more and more handed over the revenue from the estate tax to the provinces. It would be rather difficult for the federal government to suggest now that it would increase the exemption ceiling without the consent of the provinces. In other words, the federal government would actually be giving away provincial money. This is a very difficult position in which to find one's self.

However, I find it difficult to reconcile this statement with some other statements that have been attributed to the Minister of Finance to the effect that Canadians will undoubtedly face an increase in taxation as a result of these concessions or allocations of sources of revenue to the provinces. I do not believe the minister can have it both ways. I am a little dubious about the sincerity of his statement. While it sounds nice, I think the minister's freedom of action is very limited, and the best interpretation I can put on the budget statement is that it was a pious hope.

I should like to know what further information has been received by the government of Canada as a result of any studies that have been made by provincial bodies or by the royal commisison on taxation. I am referring now to the last sentence in the minister's statement which appears at the top of the second column of page 980 of Hansard.

Turning now to the resolution as it appears before us, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can give us a little more detail as to the effect of the British Columbia legislation to which the minister referred at the time of the budget, and which has now had the effect of setting up two scales of valuation or abatement. I leave that point with a request for information.

In so far as paragraph 2 of the resolution is concerned, which increases the ceiling on permissible transfers by a representative of a deceased person, I should like to refer to joint bank accounts and also to land held under joint tenancy. I have always been bothered by the application of the estate tax or the succession duty on the legal position resulting from the death of a joint tenant. For purposes of taxation it has always been deemed that half the value of the property shall have been assessed to the deceased. This is a new legal definition given to joint tenancy for reasons of the estate tax. I know that this is contained in the number of judgments of various taxation bodies. I have always found these to go rather hard against the legal interpretation of joint tenancy.

I must find that in the provinces where there is a land registry system which recognizes joint tenancies. This is a fact in connection with the majority of new homes being bought in these provinces where the mortgage companies insist on joint title to have both husband and wife on the mortgage for additional protection. All that is required is the filing of a death certificate to vest the title in the survivor. I am wondering how, in the field of property rights, the crown of Canada through the Estate Tax Act purports to interrupt or impede such a vesting of title without the consent of the minister. I trust the parliamentary secretary may have an answer to this question. How can the minister require that a provincial act shall be affected when there is a legal consequence flowing from the decease of a joint tenant? He may have an answer, and I would be most interested in it.

It is true that the amendment in paragraph 2 of this resolution will increase the ceiling on the property that may be permitted to pass without the consent of the minister. The additional portion, I think, is quite reasonable in that it provides for a certain amount payable under an insurance policy in respect of sickness or accident, in which a deceased had a beneficial or other interest immediately prior to his death. I can see that this will facilitate the payment of hospital bills immediately, by the representative or widow of a deceased, or by whoever may take on that responsibility. This is a move in the right direction.

However, with regard to those provinces where there is registration of the minister's certificate prior to an actual transfer of property, I would like to ask, have there been consultations with the provinces in regard to the increase of the ceiling from $1,500 to $2,500? I remember that this was a matter which was discussed some four or five years ago.

With respect to paragraph 4 of the resolution I wonder whether the inclusion of the words "out of any community of property" is limited to the province of Quebec, which is the only province in which the term "community of property" really applies, or whether this is dealing with joint tenancies, which I would submit is a form of community ownership of property. Is it only with respect to the province of Quebec?

Mr. Benson: That is right.

[Mr. Lambert.]

Mr. Lambert: Very well, that clears up that point. Now, with respect to paragraph 5 I know that this matter of these very complex schemes has exercised the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue for some time, particularly where they seem to defeat the purpose of the act. Under these circumstances perhaps the parliamentary secretary could give us some indication of the type of thing aimed at, without necessarily going into all the details.

I would ask him to give us as much information as he can at this time because this is a relatively new act and we have not had long experience of it. We are not getting, shall we say, too many progress reports, which may be expected in the long run. Since the act has only been in force for five years the committee and the country would appreciate receiving an estimation of how it is working out.

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I should deal with some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West before further questions are raised by other members. The first matter which he mentioned was the question raised by the minister of giving further recognition to the contribution of women towards the building up of an estate. In this regard representations have been made for a number of years by women's organizations. The matter was considered very seriously by the minister at the time of his budget preparation, but it was decided that it would be unfair, as was pointed by the hon. member for Edmonton West, for the federal government to legislate in a manner which would materially affect the amount of revenue derived from the estate tax, in that 75 per cent of this revenue goes to the provinces.

This also affects other matters under the Estate Tax Act, and I believe in the future that amendments to the act which materially affect the amount of revenue which it raises will have to be made after due consultation with the provinces because, after all, they get 75 per cent of the amount of money which is raised by it.

In the case of the differences which arose and are covered in paragraph 1, in British Columbia the provincial government decided to take up the 25 per cent room which the federal government agreed to vacate last year, and it amended its legislation and raised the rates of the succession duty levied in that province accordingly. I can assure the hon. member that it is not within the jurisdiction of the department to decide whether they have exactly taken it up, or taken it up more or less. I would not like to give an opinion on this, but they have legislated to take up the differential and no special treatment was required.

In the case of Ontario and Quebec they have not as yet amended their legislation and have chosen instead to take a 25 per cent abatement of the tax collected by the federal government, pending the time when they will pass legislation to move into the field to the extent that the federal government has moved out of it.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member on paragraph 2, this does not affect joint tenancy in real property in that the section which is being amended, section 47(3) of the act, does not cover real property. Therefore joint tenancy in real property does not enter into this particular matter. While the hon. member was speaking I think I mentioned that the amendment with respect to community property was designed primarily for the situation in Quebec, and I understand it is the same treatment as that which is given under the Succession Duty Act in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member asked how the act is working and I am informed by officials of the Department of National Revenue that since its enactment the Estate Tax Act has been working very well.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: I make apologies to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) but it will not take me long.

Looking at the estimates concerning the Estate Tax Act, we realize once again that the civil servants' jargon is very hard to understand; thus, when poor people die, leaving their family in want, one has to resort to experts in order to understand what it is all about and be informed of the heirs' obligations towards the government.

Reading the amendments to the act introduced today—of course, I am not an expert and I am not bright either—I find it is very difficult to know exactly what is the meaning of some clauses and what is involved in those clauses we are going to vote in a moment and agree to practically unanimously.

I think this is a failure on the part of our democratic and private enterprise systems. We have reached a point where we do not know where we stand or where we are going. We are dependant on a group of people whose activity is outside their field of interests, and it is difficult to understand their directives.

I think it is a little paradoxical that where a system like ours which pretends to defend democracy and free enterprise as compared to socialist dictatorship, would take steps to ensure that we reached, at the same time, a point where we defend private enterprise on the one hand, and on the other, we promote the intrusion of socialistic measures which bring with them a multitude of incomprehensible rules, such as those we have before us at this time.

Naturally, if one tries to understand those amendments, it appears that the government has decided to give back to the provinces a small share of the taxation powers on estates. Neither the federal nor the provincial governments seem to be able to do completely without the estates taxes which, in many cases, have reduced to poverty families which were fairly well off beforehand. In other words, those taxes have led numerous small and average businesses to bankruptcy because the government, seeing that it could not get the funds it needed while the owners were alive, succeeds in laying its hands on that money once they have passed away.

I must repeat what I said a moment ago: To my mind, it is a failure on the part of democracy.

If our businessmen and our governments do not try to find a means to simplify the legislation—really, Mr. Chairman, if you have the time to read this, you will probably ask what is it all about when you are through reading it. I would not blame you. A large proportion of the 265 members of the house are also surely in the dark.

Mr. Choquette: Not so large.

Mr. Marcoux: It may not be so large, but there are many members of the house who surely do not know what it is all about. And yet we are obliged to vote and pass this legislation for otherwise, we are told, the government will be prevented from taking any action.

Mr. Chairman, I am not well versed in these matters, but without going into details, I think the legislation should be simplified as soon as possible instead of trying to find formulas in a style which is hardly understandable. The French language, just like the English language, is usually understandable. But when you read the English or the French version of this legislation, you cannot understand much.

However, we would like that in practice, at least in the field of succession duties, 100 per cent of the revenue be handed over to the provinces.

I was amazed, a moment ago, to hear the parliamentary secretary say that Ontario and Quebec had refused to accept this 25 per cent of the estate tax at a time when, in the province of Quebec, the premier goes around saying that he wants 100 per cent of those succession duties, when in fact he has refused the 25 per cent to take it back in the form of a general tax abatement.

Of course, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) shakes his head in disagreement but as far as I am concerned, that is the way I interpreted the statement made a while ago by the parliamentary secretary.

So, I repeat that the wording of this legislation is very hard to make out and I hope that before long we will have a government that will know how to draft legislation in more simple terms.

[Text]

Mr. Benson: Perhaps I might answer one or two of the points raised by the hon. member. He has indicated that this legislation is difficult for the layman to understand, and I think that is generally the case with respect to taxation legislation. But I should like to point out that the present Estate Tax Act which was enacted a few years ago was regarded as a simplification of the act which it replaced, and is generally recognized as being a much simpler measure to deal with than was the former legislation on this subject.

With regard to the 75 per cent shared with the provinces, estate tax also enters the equalization payments; so that in effect we are giving to the provinces more than 75 per cent of the money collected from estate taxes.

Mr. Grafftey: I am in entire accord with the previous speaker. This is a complicated subject and I believe we are being a little optimistic when we ask for too much simplification, or, should I say oversimplification, in a field which is, after all, highly technical. As the parliamentary secretary has stated, we are already dealing with a simplification of the previous act.

I think it is only fitting that in recognizing the needs of the provinces the succession duty tax per se should be the first one vacated to the provinces under present conditions. I do not wish to enter too deeply into technical matters myself or to become involved with constitutional questions, but it certainly seems to me that succession duty is a tax on property, and very often a tax on real property which in so many ways falls under provincial jurisdiction. I think most hon. members interested in this field recognize that this is so, and while we are of necessity vacating certain tax fields at a time when the provinces are facing an increased burden on their resources, it seems we must agree in great measure with paragraph one and with the government's intention primarily to vacate this particular field.

[Mr. Marcoux.]

I should like at this time to call attention to a more specific question, one which was touched upon by the hon. member who has just spoken. I do not intend to speak for very long but I feel obliged to bring this matter up in the house this afternoon. I know that the department has for many years been aware of this general problem. They are certainly seized of it and I am sure they will be aware of it for years to come. I draw attention to it now because the party which I support is a party which believes in a property-owning democracy; we think government should do all it can to encourage the ownership of property. As hon. members know, many families who own small businesses are obliged to let their holdings pass into other hands because of the necessity of raising succession duty quickly. I realize it is not always desirable that a company or an enterprise should be held by a family from one generation to another. But I am thinking particularly, now, not of large companies with many shares on the public market, but of small businesses which have been built up over the years. I am thinking, for example, of a small store owner who has very little in his patrimony except his business. But he has dependants, and they wish to carry on the business, but they are obliged to get rid of it because of the necessity of raising succession duty.

This is not a new problem and I believe some progress has been made in this regard in the past, but I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to what extent provision can be made to alleviate the situation. Very often, companies are taken over by outside interests simply because succession duties cannot be raised within the time required. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the question I am raising is not a new one and certainly has not any political overtones; but I am raising it because my party supports the principle of a property owning democracy. I think we in this house should do all we can to encourage people to own their own businesses, small or otherwise, and should not unnecessarily hang this cloud over their heads if anything can be done to avoid it.

While there is no one paragraph in the resolution before us today which deals specifically with this matter—it perhaps deals too generally with the subject—I would like to have a statement from the parliamentary secretary regarding this problem in general. I know the fact that we vacate these taxes to the provinces means that it is certainly not the federal government alone that can act to alleviate the situation; but surely the federal government, in so far as it is still in the succession duty field, has a role, with the provinces, to play in bringing about what

I think—I am not going to detail my remarks with any specific data at the present time—could be a solution to this problem. General information to which I have access leads me to believe that the problem is still a very real one at the present time and is deserving of further study in order that amendments or changes may be brought about to encourage family ownership and other types of ownership of small and even larger businesses; to encourage, in other words, the ownership of property.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few remarks following upon those made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, because we in this group believe in legitimate, responsible, private enterprise where there is no degree of exploitation of the community or the nation. I raise this point at the request of a number of constituents who have been faced with unexpected problems in recent years. Many persons are expressing concern because they were not affected a few years ago but are affected now. I refer particularly to heirs of farmers, the owners of small family industries and small businesses, and persons of that type.

I think this situation has largely come about as the result of the general increase in land and property values, which very often have little effect on the actual operation of the farm. There has been little increase in real wealth as far as the farm is concerned, but property values established as the result of developments in the district, or because of an increase in general property assessments in the area in which the small industry or business is located, have created this problem. Because of this situation, which has developed quite rapidly in the last ten years, a number of persons, the heirs of farmers, the heirs of persons operating small industries or small businesses, have been suddenly faced with an unexpected demand for estate taxes. I am not blaming the federal or provincial governments in this respect. However, it does come as a shock, and I have known a few cases where because of this valuation of properties people have been forced to sell a farm which had been in the family for generations and which they would have liked to carry on, or they have been forced to sell a small business.

I am thinking now of one case in my district of quite a successful farmer whose farm is worth say $175,000. If he were to die suddenly, his heirs would be faced with an unexpected demand for cash for estate tax, which I am quite certain they would not be able to meet and it would mean the sale of this family estate or farm. I am not speaking of a large property, but it is a valuable one because they produce fruit and the farm is located in the Arrow lakes district, which is so valuable for this purpose. A number of people have been to lawyers in the district to get a thorough explanation of the relationship between the federal estate tax and the succession duty tax in British Columbia. I have been told that even lawyers are baffled by the complicated nature of these relationships, and are sometimes unable to give a clear definition of just how the law would apply under certain circumstances. I understand that in order to overcome this difficulty gentlemen of the legal profession are advising their clients to incorporate, but in some cases they do not wish to do this and it does not meet the situation.

Following the remarks made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, Mr. Chairman, we would like to hear the parliamentary secretary—who I know is most capable in matters of mathematics, economics, and that sort of thing, because these matters are within his particular field, and we recognize this—make a general statement on the policy with regard to estate tax and the policy of administration when it comes to the collection of estate tax from heirs of the type I have mentioned. Then I would like the parliamentary secretary to give, for the information of hon. members of the committee, a general résumé of the provincial legislation in effect in each province in Canada and its relationship to the federal Estate Tax Act. I believe that is not asking too much on this very important question.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I think the entire discussion of the two hon. members who have just spoken is out of order, in view of the resolution which is before the committee at the moment. However, I would refer them to Hansard of December 9 because—

Mr. Grafftey: Why?

Mr. Benson: I think it is out of order because it does not deal with any of the particular items which are before the committee for amendment. However I would like to refer them to my statement in Hansard—

Mr. Grafftey: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and just for clarification, I do not believe this discussion on the estate tax resolution is out of order. If I had found the necessary amendments in the resolution to alleviate the problem which I mentioned, perhaps I would not have had to raise the subject. Are we out of order, Mr. Chairman, when in general debate at the resolution stage we raise matters definitely relating to the Estate Tax Act, just because they are not included in the detailed clauses of the bill? I believe an hon. member is not out of order in the debate on the Estate Tax Act resolution when he raises problems which perhaps need to be dealt with under this heading. I think we should have a clarification on this point at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: If the hon. member wants a clarification I will have to tell him that a debate on an amending act does not open up discussion on the whole act, so that when we have before us certain specific and particular sections of a statute which are being considered in committee, we cannot discuss other sections of the statute which are not before the committee. I think this is generally recognized practice.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to bring this point to the attention of the committee. I would in this regard refer hon. members to my statement as reported in Hansard of December 9 in which I dealt with this particular problem in some detail. I tried to deal with it fairly at that time. As a matter of fact, something of what I said was misinterpreted. I stated at that time that any decision that would allow people to pay their succession duties or estate taxes by instalments would of necessity require consultation with the provinces, which was interpreted as my being against such consultation, and of course I am not against it.

I think it is completely unfair for the hon. member for Kootenay West to want me to explain the implications of all the succession duty acts in Canada when dealing with this particular resolution.

There is a problem in connection with family businesses which exists in this field and, as hon. members know, the officials of the Department of National Revenue have been looking at this problem for some time. One of the great difficulties with which they have had to deal is the fact that nobody comes forward and gives us a specific example of a business which has had to be sold because of having to pay the estate tax. People talk of this generally but do not come forward and say that a particular business must be sold because of this.

Incidentally, with regard to the little farm in the Kootenays the hon. member was talking about—and I am sure farms are very valuable out there—which would be worth $175,000. On a quick calculation it seems to me that the person involved would have to pay approximately $22,000 in estate tax and succession duties. It would not seem to me impossible for such a person to be able to raise $22,000 with $175,000 as security. I am not in any way minimizing the arguments which have been put forward to the effect that there should be some way of paying estate tax and succession duties on an instalment basis, and I am sure that when consultations take place with the provinces—and I believe consultations have to take place before major changes can be made—this matter will undoubtedly be discussed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, just one last question on this point. I admit that it is rather difficult to get all this information immediately, but the minister is backed by an excellent and efficient staff. Could he provide hon. members with an outline of all the provincial legislation and its relationship to our Estate Tax Act? I think this is necessary because numbers of people are finding this matter very difficult; and this includes even the gentlemen of the legal profession who are supposed to know these matters.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised may I just make a reference to the fact that the preamble to this resolution reads in this way:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Estate Tax Act and to provide among other things:

—and so on. I do not think that there is a limitation here. I think that this is the sign of a government which I hope is prepared to listen to the excellent suggestions which flow from this side of the house; and it may be that when the bill following this resolution is introduced the suggestions which have been advanced from the opposition benches might receive consideration. We might find these suggestions reflected in the bill itself. Once the bill is before the house, then I do not think there is any question that we are limited to what is there; but with respect I would suggest that there is some leeway here, bearing in mind that the resolution does not purport to restrict the proposed amendments within the four corners of the five subparagraphs of the resolution.

The Chairman: Without trying to make a general ruling the only thing I can do is to refer hon. members again to standing order 59 (2), which says that in committee discussion must be strictly relevant to the item before us. I would think that every specific contribution to the debate should be judged in the light of that standing order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, if I understand correctly the proposed amendment to the Estate Tax Act, it changes very few things or a great many, depending on how you look at it.

Thus the amendment proposed in paragraph B of clause 1 would mean that the 75 per cent abatement is the result of the federal-provincial agreements entered into at the federal-provincial conference held recently in Quebec or the conferences that followed one another in the past several years.

As pointed out so accurately by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux), we are faced with a torrent of words that make up a puzzle, that perhaps 25 hon. members can understand but that 235 do not understand at all and never will. In fact, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) admits himself that it is difficult to read, especially to understand. It reads well but it is hard to understand, he says. And he adds that the previous act was still more confused, in short more ambiguous.

Instead of introducing amendments of all kinds, they should go straight to the point and say: the federal government withdraws from one taxation field, so that a province can take it over. They should not come up as they do with a torrent of words such as those, in an effort to confuse further the Canadian people. Even lawyers would not make anything out of the terms used in the clause or amendment submitted to us.

For instance, clause 2 reads as follows:

That the limit of $1,500 on the amount of certain kinds of property passing on the death of a deceased person—be increased to $2,500—

There is no need for seven lines or so many meaningless words. For example, it is mentioned:

That the limit of $1,500 on the amount of certain kinds of property passing on the death of a deceased person—

This means the spouse. Everybody understands that.

—that may be transferred, delivered or paid over to any person resident in Canada without the consent of the minister, in the case of any one transferor, deliverer or payer, be increased to $2,500—

Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure the parliamentary secretary must have felt like laughing when he read that subsection or, rather, that sentence.

—and that such kinds of property be extended to include an amount payable under a policy of insurance in respect of sickness or accident in which the deceased had, immediately before his death, a beneficial or other interest.

Mr. Chairman, at this stage of the discussion, I should like the parliamentary secretary of the Minister of Finance to tell us flatly that the idea is to have the provinces take over that field of taxation from the federal authorities. There is nothing else. Let us not try to fool the public by saying that the tax rate or the succession duties rates which the federal government collected previously are being reduced.

It is agreed between the central government and certain provinces, in this case Quebec, that the central government withdraws from that field of taxation so that the province of Quebec may collect the money which was previously collected by the federal government. There is absolutely no reduction of the tax. As a matter of fact, the people of Quebec will have to pay exactly what they were paying previously, if not more.

That is why I say that this measure is the result of the federal-provincial conference which was held in Quebec recently, and that is what I would like the parliamentary secretary to admit frankly, without any back door method and without mental reservation.

[Text]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, I do not think, in the circumstances, that I have to admit anything. I would remind the hon. member for Villeneuve that my statement on introducing these particular amendments was, I believe, quite clear. I said that the first paragraph of the resolution as presented is to implement the agreement which was arrived at with the provinces here in Ottawa. I stated that quite clearly. With regard to the number of words used in the particular amendment, I am not an expert on the use of a torrent of words but I am informed that it was necessary in the case of clause 2, the clause referred to by the hon. member, to use this number of words in order to tie it in correctly as an amendment to section 47 (3) of the Estate Tax Act.

Mr. Rynard: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks I should like to make. First of all, I think the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency expressed the thoughts of many of us on this Estate Tax Act. It is far too complicated for the ordinary person to understand. I think it is the right of the ordinary person who earns the money and pays the shot to have laws written so that he can interpret them.

An hon. Member: Oh boy.

Mr. Rynard: Someone says "Oh boy!", but I say this act is difficult to understand. The same criticism is made in our profession—that it is sometimes difficult to understand what we are saying. A language should be a communicable language so that the ordinary person can understand it, whether it be in the legal profession, the medical profession or any other profession.

Mr. Baldwin: Or the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Rynard: I should like to make the suggestion, although I may be wandering a little afield, that there should be a uniform estate tax throughout Canada. We hear talk about tax sharing agreements. I should like to know why in the world the various finance ministers across Canada cannot get together and work out something that will not be so complicated. Today we have the parliamentary secretary telling us that he cannot do anything because of provincial legislation. I say to him that it would add something to the unity of Canada if a national estate tax policy were adopted, and the government should start to work on it so that people across Canada will know where they stand, no matter in what province they live. Today people move from one province to another much more often than a few years ago.

I am wondering about the amount of $2,500 that may be transferred without the consent of the minister on the death of a person. I know this amount represents an increase and I want to compliment the government for increasing it. But surely $2,500 today is a pretty small amount when you consider that somebody who has been sick and has died will have incurred hospital bills over and above the amount provided for by hospital insurance. In addition there would be nurses' accounts to look after. The beneficiary has to live, eat and pay rent and other expenses. The result is that in a month or two all the money on hand is gone.

I know the parliamentary secretary will say that all such people have to do is to apply to the estate tax people and they will give them some money. However, this is at the whim of the officials. I do not say they are necessarily not going to rule reasonably, but they are quite far removed from the actual events and do not understand the whole problem, although they do the best they can. We know that the dollar is eroded every year by 2 or 3 per cent and therefore I suggest that to be realistic this amount should be $5,000 instead of $2,500.

I also want to say a few words on the matter of annuities. Not being a lawyer, I am not quite clear why this provision is not written so that I can understand it. However, let us say that a father buys an annuity for one of his sons and he pays for it in one lump premium. The annuity for his son or possibly his grandson comes due in 20 years. It may be an educational policy. What happens if the father or grandfather dies after 10 years? What is the difference in treatment with regard to an annuity if he is making yearly payments and has to pay 20 premiums?

I want to conclude my remarks by saying that I certainly feel badly that nothing can be done for women who have worked to build up estates. The husband passes on and the widow is not allowed any credit for what she has done in building up the husband's estate.

[Mr. Rynard.]

I think this is very bad. Some women can go out to work for 20 years and build up an estate, but the woman who stays at home on the farm or the woman who stays at home to raise her children until they get through high school is treated as if she has not done anything to build up her husband's estate. I do not think that is right or fair and I am hoping that the government will do something about the matter. I hope something can be devised that will apply across Canada whereby women will be treated more fairly.

Mr. Benson: I should like to deal with a couple of the matters raised by the hon. member for Simcoe East. With regard to the point about the complexity of the Estate Tax Act, I stated earlier that the present act is really a simplification of the former succession duty act, and I can assure the hon. member that it is much simpler than the succession duty act was.

Mr. Rynard: Perhaps we will get there yet.

Mr. Benson: With regard to aiding laymen in preparing succession duty returns, first of all I must remind the committee that someone leaving a widow has to have an estate amounting to $60,000 before any estate tax is payable. Usually these returns are handled by lawyers in the course of dealing with the estate as such. There is a four page guide for filing returns, which is available to anyone. It is almost a layman's guide to assist people in filing estate tax returns.

With regard to the matter of the $2,500, which is being raised from $1,500, it is $2,500 from each bank in which the deceased may have had an account, so it might amount to more than $2,500. If he had accounts in several banks, $2,500 could be paid out of each one of them. In addition, if he had a sickness or accident policy there would be another $2,500 available there. This amount is exactly the amount which was requested by the Canadian federation of business and professional women in their brief to the government on this particular matter.

I agree with the hon. member that it would be nice to have one estate tax act across the whole of Canada. Certainly I should like to see similar legislation all across Canada in regard to other statutes such as the Companies Act. I think something may be accomplished in this regard in that the recent federal-provincial conference agreed to set up a taxation committee to consider matters of taxation, and I certainly think that the question of a uniform estate tax act across the country could and perhaps should be considered by this group.

I dealt earlier with the problem of the recognition of the woman's part in contributing to the estate, and the Minister of Finance also dealt with this matter in his budget speech. I expressed the view that while the government felt something should be done to recognize, beyond the $60,000 exemption, the contributions of women to building up estates of deceased persons, it was felt that this could not be done until there had been consultation with the provinces, in that 75 per cent of the revenue arising out of the estate tax goes to the provincial governments.

Mr. Addison: Mr. Chairman, everyone in the house seems to hold the same feeling of great concern about succession duties or estate tax goes to the provincial governments. taxation between the provinces and the federal government, the hon. member for Simcoe East referred to a national estate tax policy and the parliamentary secretary answered that he would encourage such a move and hoped that there might be such a policy.

I see a great danger as more succession duty taxing power is placed in the hands of the provinces. We have had examples of tax havens in order to encourage people to move to such areas where there are no succession duties. The Bahamas are one area and Monaco is another.

I can appreciate the difficulties of the provinces in attempting to attract capital within their own boundaries. They might, in order to do this, reduce the amount of the succession duty and get into competition with one another in attempting to attract capital for their own provincial areas.

I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that, in so far as taxation is concerned, people do not have to live within boundaries of Canada. Today it is not necessary for someone to remain in Canada. Persons who build estates have the privilege of moving to an area in which there is no succession duty. I would agree with one of the earlier speakers, that there is today in Canada a process of liquidating family owned businesses in order to provide ready cash for succession duty purposes. This money could very well be used for the expansion of that business.

The parliamentary secretary referred to the possibility of establishing an instalment plan for the payment of these duties. This might very well be considered, or we might consider freezing the estate at a certain value. This might not be the time or the place to discuss this suggestion. However, I feel the parliamentary secretary should consider the suggestions that have been put forward today, one of which was the establishment of a national estate tax so there would be no difference in rate as between the provinces. If this trend continues, and one province is asking for 100 per cent of succession duties, I believe there should be a move to establish uniformity of succession duties as between the provinces.

Mr. Lambert: I have a few remarks to make, plus one more question to ask. First of all, with regard to what the hon. member for York North had to say, I believe it was the motive of the previous administration in passing this Estate Tax Act to introduce some uniformity in estate tax matters across the country. I am speaking subject to correction, but I believe there are only three provinces at the present time who seem to pursue an independent succession duty policy. They are British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec. The other provinces work under this act and take a portion of the revenue derived therefrom. I think that it is a good model.

The hon. member for Simcoe East and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency, both of whom are practising physicians, criticized the lawyers for the drafting of this act. I find this rather paradoxical in view of the mysterious language of a medical certificate because, in my view, that is the absolute mystery of mysteries. Then, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency mentioned the plight of the poor person in dealing with this act. Since the death duties start when an estate is valued at $60,000 and the widow is given $10,000 for every dependant, I cannot feel that those concerned are entirely poor people. The hon. member may have been referring to some of the provincial acts about which I have no comments. When we are talking about the equality of women and the emancipation of women I may say, as an aside, that some people have suggested we should make an amendment to bring about an equality for men, because a male survivor is entitled to less consideration than is a widow, even though the income earning capacity has been on the side of the female partner to the marriage.

I am again concerned with paragraph 3. I should like the parliamentary secretary to advise me why it is, when there is included in the estate of a deceased the value of a life tenancy, that the life tenancy should be valued on the basis of the capital of the estate. Perhaps he could clear up this point. The way I interpret it, a life tenancy is valued on the basis of the estate from which it is paid, and I would have thought the life tenancy would be based on some sort of actuarial table and, in the case of a person who has died, this life tenancy should come to an end. I may have completely misunderstood the nature of the amendment, and I should like to have some clarification.

The last point I should like to make is one which arises from one of the complexities of the various succession duties acts, and that is the right of certain provinces to declare the situs of personal property. We may have a person who has lived all his life in Alberta and who has accumulated an estate including shares in a corporation whose head office is in the province of Ontario or Quebec. These two taxing authorities will, of course, exact their portion of the death duties in the case of the death of a person in Alberta, because the transfer agent of the company will require a clearance from the succession duty authority of the province of either, say Ontario or Quebec. I must confess this causes some problems in cases where there are multiple transfer agents. For the life of me, I cannot see how the provinces of Ontario or Quebec can say they have the right to levy succession duties on the estate of a person who has lived solely in the province of Alberta. The only connection with the province of Quebec, say, would be that the estate owns some shares in a company that happens to have its head office in Quebec and therefore succession duties have to be paid on that basis.

It is true that we may not be able to do much about this, but I think it is completely wrong. The valuation of the shares may be based on the operations of the company outside the province of Quebec, especially if it happens to be an interprovincial company. I am only using Quebec as an example, and I do not say that this province alone acts in this fashion.

Mr. Benson: First of all, I should like to deal with the two questions raised by the hon. member. Paragraph 3 deals with the taxation of the capital of a trust fund where the deceased has kept the income or reserved a benefit in the fund.

The problem of situs raised by the hon. member is a difficult problem. The position of the provinces in this regard is that the law which governs them arises out of the common law and they are not able to vary the common law. It arises out of decisions over the years, whereas the rules used by the federal government in the Estate Tax Act are statutory, although generally based on the common law.

Mr. Lambert: I think it is the reverse. With the greatest respect I think so, in that the situs principle adopted by the provinces is that which applied to land, whereas the common law concerning personal property is that personal property follows the domicile of the owner. But in these cases they have taken the real property principle, that is, that ownership of shares and taxability of shares should be governed by the situs of the head office.

Mr. Benson: I am informed by the officials that what I stated a few minutes ago was correct, and that provincial situs of shares, which was the particular question raised, arises out of the common law, so that the situs is the point at which they are transferred rather than the point at which they are resting.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): My question concerns paragraph 3. To my knowledge there are a good many estates that are left to a beneficiary for the lifetime of the beneficiary, and in most cases on the death of a beneficiary they go to children. Is it contemplated under this paragraph that the interest which, say, a widow has had in an estate for the period of her lifetime shall be included in property declared by her at her death?

Mr. Benson: The answer is no.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Because she would be taxed twice if that were the case.

Mr. Benson: The answer is no.

ESTATE TAX ACT

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-94, to amend the Estate Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-92, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon—Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Schedule A amended.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the implementation, without change, of the proposals which were set out in detail in the budget resolutions, and which the committee of ways and means already has examined on an item by item basis.

There is not much I can say about the substance of this bill without repeating what has been said already when the resolutions were considered in committee. For this reason my remarks will be brief and confined to the structure of the measure.

Hon. members will note that clause 1 of the bill provides that certain existing tariff items be struck out and that there be substituted therefor the revised items which are set out in detail in Schedule A. This schedule is divided into two parts which implement resolutions 1 and 3 respectively.

No doubt many hon. members will recall that resolution 1 dealt with a negotiated package of tariff items arising from two tariff board reports, and that resolution 3 proposed a mixed bag of miscellaneous amendments. All of these were relieving or clarifying provisions. We have already been through the list once. Accordingly I shall say no more about it, except to repeat that this miscellaneous group of proposals does not include a single tariff increase. This is not, of course, the case with the negotiated package set out in Part I of Schedule A. It is a self-balancing package including both increases and reductions.

Clause 2 of the bill provides for the new drawback item that was proposed in resolution 2. It is as recommended by the tariff board in its report on reference 129, tableware and glassware for decorating.

Clause 3 of the bill is the coming into force provision and flows from resolution 4.

As I said earlier, this bill implements what was proposed in the tariff resolutions without any change of substance whatsoever. Indeed, even the changes of form are the minimum necessary in order to convert the resolutions into statutory form.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, there are a few points I would like to raise in regard to the detail under clause 1, and since I shall be dealing with the schedule, I might be permitted certain leniency in this respect so that we can clear up our discussion that much sooner. I am particularly concerned as to the implementation of the recommendations of the tariff board with regard to oil country goods, that is goods that may be manufactured in Canada under licence and which go into oil production.

These resolutions, as included by the Minister of Finance in his budget proposals, arose out of a reference to the tariff board of some years standing, and which covered not only goods entering into the production of oil and gas but also goods in connection with the mining industry. I was very pleased to see the present administration followed what I felt had been the philosophy of the previous administration in this regard. I say this because I think these provisions should, in the long run, provide our industry, not only in central Canada but in Alberta with a strong shot in the arm. Canadian industry involved in the production of goods and machinery for the oil industry has been subject to a disproportionate tariff balance as compared with United States industry.

As we know, when the oil industry started in this country back about 1947 Canadian facilities for the manufacture of any of this equipment were practically non-existent. But with the passage of time various business concerns have branched out into this field of activity and other firms have been founded to engage in the manufacture of these goods, a number of them by specialists in this industry who had come from the United States or from the United Kingdom. We know that in several cities of western Canada, particularly in Calgary and Edmonton we now have an extensive secondary industry in this regard.

One of the first steps to be taken was the provision of tariff protection for the manufacture of sucker rods, and an extensive business was established in Edmonton as a result. As a matter of fact, one concern which had gone bankrupt was able to get back on its feet and is now a very successful enterprise. I should like to know whether the parliamentary secretary can advise as to what extent the government considers it possible to forecast an increase in the manufacture of oil country goods in Canada as a result of these steps. I am looking for some technical information which was, I believe, at the disposal of the previous minister of finance, in order to encourage the government to enter upon this type of change. If it is only done as a matter of course in answer to representations, one wonders why it is being done at all. I think it is obvious the government has felt that these steps will lead to an increase in the manufacture of oil country goods in this country, and maybe some yardstick could be given us.

With reference to the term "oil country goods" and item 491 as it appears in the first schedule, I should like to know whether this will include specialized equipment having to do with the development of tar sands. As we understand it, the production from tar sand will not come from wells—

Mr. Benson: If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt, this is dealt with specifically in item 492c of schedule A.

Mr. Lambert: Oh yes. Then perhaps the hon. gentleman could tell us what margin of protection is now being given. There has, naturally, been an exchange of some concessions in bargaining to lead to these tariff changes, particularly in the most favoured nation category. Previously, if the goods were of a class or kind not made in Canada, in the most favoured nations tariff category the rates could go from 22½ per cent to free. Now there is a standard 10 per cent.

To turn to another matter, under item 492(d) we know that there will be permitted free entry into Canada of materials for use in the manufacture of goods set out in tariff items 491 and 492. I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell us why. If it is intended that there should be a moderate degree of protection to Canadian industry manufacturing the finished goods, then the person or firm providing the materials which enter into the manufacture of those goods should enjoy a similar degree of protection. Let us take bolted steel tanks. I do not know what level of tariff would be imposed on the sheet steel which goes into the manufacture of the tanks. But if my interpretation of 492(d) is right, a foreign manufacturer of sheet steel used for the manufacture of steel tanks would enjoy free entry into this country if he could bring in the material under the terms of this item 492(d). The Canadian manufacturer has a choice; he can obtain his steel either from a Canadian manufacturer or from abroad. Would the parliamentary secretary advise me whether my thinking on this has been correct—that the manufacturer or furnisher of materials entering into the manufacture of oil country goods does not derive the protection which is given to the manufacturer of goods as envisaged in these particular tariff changes?

I have one last question and it has to do with the purpose of item 848. The amendment reads:

> Drilling bits, n.o.p., and parts thereof, for use in exploratory or discovery work in connection with, and development, depletion and production of, petroleum or natural gas wells.

These items are to be admitted free. I am wondering why drilling bits, which can be manufactured in Canada and which, I would feel are brought in under some other item which is covered by some form of duty, should now be admitted without liability for duty. These are the questions I have to raise in reference to the oil country items and if the parliamentary secretary would reply to them I think I am just about clear as to the others.

Mr. Benson: First, as I mentioned in my introductory statement, the purpose of the first two resolutions is to implement the recommendations of the tariff board with regard to oil country goods. I might tell the committee again that there were increases in some items and decreases in other items but, generally, there was an overbalance toward an increase as compared with a decrease. We had to make concessions with regard to bread, wax and barytes in order to negotiate the package with our trading partners.

Of course, with a slightly increased tariff one would hope there would be an increase in manufacturing or, at least, a maintenance of the scale upon which these particular goods are manufactured in Canada. However, I think it is impossible to forecast exactly what will happen because so much depends on what will happen in the oil industry itself. If it goes well, then, of course, we believe that manufactures associated with it will continue to expand. Indeed, that probably would be the case without the tariff changes. I should like once again to stress that the oil industry and the manufacturing industry seem to be satisfied with the changes and there have been no complaints to us about them.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, under item 492c machinery and apparatus used in extracting oil from shales and sand will be dutiable at the same rates as similar machinery and apparatus used in connection with oil wells; that is, at rates of 5 per cent British preference and 10 per cent most favoured nation, when of a class or kind made in Canada, and free when not made in Canada. This will provide an incentive for Canadian manufacturers to produce some of this equipment as the demand for it expands, while at the same time affording duty free access to imported equipment of a kind which cannot be obtained in Canada.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, would the parliamentary secretary please advise me how the sales tax applies here. Is this one of those items which, if it is imported free of duty, will not attract sales tax, or is it free of sales tax in any event?

Mr. Benson: I cannot answer that question off the cuff, Mr. Chairman. I shall be pleased to look into the matter for the hon. member. It requires looking into the Excise Tax Act, which is not being considered at the moment. I will look into the matter and advise the hon. member of the position.

Machinery and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada for producing unrefined oil from shales was duty free under item 410c(i). If made in Canada, it was dutiable under item 427(1) or 446a at 10 per cent B.P. and 22½ per cent M.F.N. Machinery and apparatus for extracting oil from oil sands was duty free under item 410c(ii).

With regard to item 492d, the reason materials entering into these items were made duty free was that in some instances there would have been serious anomalies where items were themselves subject to only a 10 per cent duty when coming into Canada—there was a 10 per cent protection for them in Canada—but the goods used to manufacture them would have been coming into this country at varying rates up to 22½ per cent. This was really put in to tidy up the tariffs with respect to the items used in the manufacture of these goods.

Mr. Lambert: This was a negotiated item, was it?

Mr. Benson: Yes, it was a negotiated item within the whole package. The other item mentioned was No. 848, and I should point out in respect of this item that in volume 2 the board recommends free entry for bits not manufactured in Canada, and previously, there were rates of 5 per cent B.P. and 15 per cent M.F.N. on those made.

Clauses 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

Schedule A agreed to.

On schedule B.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, with regard to item 237a, would the parliamentary secretary give me an explanation as to the date July 1, 1966 with regard to deuterium oxide and heavy water. Has this any relationship to the possible production of deuterium oxide in Canada after that date?

Mr. Benson: This extension for a two year period allows one to look at the position at that time and reconsider it in view of developments within the country.

TOBACCO—REQUEST FOR INCREASED EXPENDITURES ON RESEARCH

Mr. Jack Roxburgh (Norfolk) moved:

That, in order to ensure the continuance of the vital part being played by the tobacco industry in the economy of this nation, this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of providing a much larger grant of money to be used toward research and experimental work in the production and processing of tobacco.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out as briefly as possible the value of tobacco farming to the people of Canada and to those of Ontario in particular. However, before doing so may I say I have neither direct involvement nor financial interest in the farming, the manufacturing or the distributing of tobacco. However there is one thing that I do have, and that is a direct concern for all the people involved in all these activities. Whether we call it health or whether we call it economic life, just let us remember that we are dealing with people, and people are my immediate responsibility and the responsibility of all members in this house. Until about 40 years ago the sandy wasteland along the northern shores of lake Erie was of little value from an agricultural viewpoint. The provincial governments of that time spent millions of dollars in reforestation programs and reclamation projects. Then in the 1920's tobacco culture started to transform this unproductive land into one of Canada's most prosperous farm areas. Within the last 36 years flue cured tobacco produced in Ontario, and on this land in particular, has increased from some 5 million pounds to close to 200 million pounds. In dollars and cents, it has increased from a $2 million industry to a $100 million industry today.

Just how well this former wasteland is utilized becomes apparent when one considers that flue cured tobacco produces by far the highest farm value per acre. In 1962 it was $788 per acre, which was only exceeded by an all time high of $881 per acre in 1960, compared with $46.50 which is the average for all remaining field crops in Ontario. This works out, by the way, to a ratio of 17 to 1. In all, tobacco accounts for about one fifth of Ontario's gross value of field crops and 10 per cent of the province's total farm cash income from the sale of all farm products.

Canadian tobacco farmers now supply over nine tenths of the basic raw material used by the tobacco products industry, which employs about 10,000 people. I should like to draw attention to the fact that the annual selling value of factory shipments totals approximately $600 million, including excise duties and taxes, the bigger percentage of which, incidentally, flows into the federal tax coffers.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the tobacco industry is the most highly taxed of all industries in the Dominion of Canada. I will not go into detail on this aspect of the industry, but I should like to point out that the federal tobacco taxes provide 7 per cent of the federal budgetary tax. This certainly contrasts very sharply with the picture in the United States, where tobacco taxes provide 2 per cent of the federal budgetary tax revenue. Yet the government of the United States believes that the tobacco industry is so important to the economy of that nation that a multi-million dollar crash program on research to remove health hazards from smoking has won full approval. In comparison, our Department of National Health and Welfare set aside some $200,000 over a five year period, which means about $40,000 a year, which I should think is hardly enough to buy postage stamps to carry on an effective campaign in research.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member meant to say $600,000, not $200,000.

Mr. Roxburgh: No, it is $200,000. The other $400,000 has nothing to do with research but is connected with educating the children in schools. I am talking of the research program itself, which is exploring the reasons why people are smoking. The other $400,000 has nothing to do with research in the way I am sure most of us would think of research. However, I will come back to this question a little later on.

In the meantime I should like to bring to the attention of the house some important facts relating to the tobacco industry and to present Your Honour with a few illustrations. I am sure that everyone in this house as well as the people of Canada will agree that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway was a tremendous and courageous task, not only with regard to its construction but also in the raising of the money. Hon. members may ask, what has this to do with the tobacco industry? I would say simply this, that one year's federal excise tax on tobacco would provide 80 per cent of the original cost of the seaway. Or, in dollars and cents, that means something like $400 million a year, or better than $1 million a day.

In these days of demand, both by the government and by the people of Canada, for industry in Canada to be Canadian controlled, it is gratifying to know that here is one industry that is as close to being 100 per cent Canadian operated as can be hoped for. In 1926 Canadian tobacco represented only about one quarter of the cigarette tobacco consumed in this country. Today it is 99 per cent.

Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that tobacco farmers hire some 50,000 seasonal workers and pay them some $35 million a year as wages; and that the use of insecticides and fertilizers by these tobacco farmers runs into millions of dollars annually? Do you realize that there are something like 90,000 retailers selling tobacco throughout the country and doing $130 million worth of business? Do you also realize that 500,000 pounds of string similar to that used by stores to tie up parcels is used by tobacco farmers to tie up their tobacco in the fields? Do you realize, for example, that the provision of cigarette paper alone is a $2 million a year business; that cellophane is a $3 million a year business; that filters are $6 million a year business; that foil is a $5 million a year business; and that cartons for shipping purposes are a $10 million a year business? I just offer those few thoughts to show the part the tobacco industry is playing in the economy of this country.

Coming back to the farmer himself who grows tobacco, what he and his land means to the community and to the surrounding areas in terms of dollars and cents is astounding. For example, let me take property taxes. I could give a number of examples, but in order to save time I will give only one, that of a general farm situated on light soil. This farm has been owned by the same family for over 100 years. The property tax on that farm is $416. A nearby tobacco farm on similar soil, with only 102 acres—48 acres less—has a property tax of $1,223. In other words, in the case of two farms on similar soil, one a tobacco farm and the other a general farm, the tobacco farm is returning to the community three to four times the amount of tax of the other farm. May I add —and this is ironic—that the man who owns the tobacco farm, which used to be practically waste land, has to go out and work extra hours in order to make a living. His job is that of a carpenter and he has to build tobacco kilns in order to help balance things out a little.

In the tobacco counties of Norfolk and Elgin as well as Essex, Oxford, Brant and Durham, the municipal services which have been provided have been based on the revenue from flue cured tobacco. Without this revenue the counties' whole economic structure would collapse. For example, the debenture issue outstanding would be an impossible burden on the taxpayer. In Norfolk county alone the additional tax on tobacco land, assessments on kilns and greenhouses, and so forth, amount to something like $17.5 million annually. So I am sure you can readily understand, Mr. Speaker, that the impact of tobacco is tremendous both on this and on other communities where tobacco is grown. Tobacco affects every business from the barber to the banker. Said a banker in the town of Tillsonburg: "Around 68 per cent of the business of this town is contingent on tobacco".

May I now deal directly with the motion, which asks that more money be set aside not only for experiment and research in relation to smoking and cancer, but also, and this is very important, at the ground roots level in the production and processing of tobacco under the supervision of the federal experimental farms at Delhi and Harrow, Ontario.

Talking of research, I feel sure that there is a field of research in the tobacco industry that has been given little or no thought, and that is for tobacco to be put to other uses. I should like to see very extensive research done along this line to be sure that this plant cannot be used for other purposes. To a degree it is now. We all know that there are a great many products emanating from industries which have no connection whatever with the original products of these industries. The best example I can think of is the dairy industry; and the best example of that industry is milk. No one would have thought a few years ago that milk, which is babies' food, would be used in the production of plastics. There is a future in everything and we have to give this full consideration.

There is little doubt that in the past few years the tobacco industry's experimental work in Canada has come almost to a standstill. I am talking about the experimental farms at Delhi and Harrow. Other countries were helped to get going in the production of tobacco by the tobacco industry in Canada and by the experimental stations at Delhi and Harrow in particular. Now these countries are moving far ahead of Canada.

One of the best examples I can cite is Rhodesia. The Rhodesian government and growers realize that if the industry is to go ahead they must have the latest information in research along all lines from plant pathology to selling. Because of this belief the experimental station in Rhodesia employs somewhere around 60 people, from top scientists to ordinary help, which is about four times as many as in Canada. These men are working in many different departments such as agronomy, entomology, plant pathology, engineering, which has to do with producing tobacco machinery, soil chemistry and so forth. They are also putting great effort into research at the Rhodesian station in order to sell tobacco. The result is that 90 per cent of the tobacco grown in Rhodesia is sold outside of that country. Even Japan, India and Australia are going ahead by leaps and bounds in the tobacco industry. Australia, with only a quarter of the tobacco acreage that we have in Canada, has as many, if not more, scientists working on tobacco research as are employed at our own experimental farms in Canada.

As the member of parliament for a tobacco county, may I point out that the county of Norfolk produces almost half the tobacco grown in the Dominion of Canada. I feel it is my duty to bring these facts to the attention of the house. However, I should like to add that the Department of Agriculture, under the very able leadership of Hon. Harry Hays, is giving this situation a thorough check and I have no doubt will be doing something to solve the problem of research in the not too distant future.

All that is required, of course, is money. Where is it going to come from? I do not know, but over the last 10 years the federal governments of Canada received over $3 billion in excise duties and taxes from tobacco. Back in 1952 the amount was $250 million while at the present time it is well over $400 million annually.

These moneys have been used for many purposes by the governments of Canada in the form of subsidies and so forth for many industries ranging from gold mining to agriculture, but they have never been used to any account at all to help the industry from which the moneys were derived. The former government did give backing to the banks so that the growers' organization could have money to process their tobacco, and the present government sent a mission overseas to see what they could do to sell tobacco. It was fairly, but not fully successful. To my knowledge this is all that has been done for the tobacco industry by the various governments over the years.

To those who say that Canada can import tobacco and still receive such taxes I will only say at this time that this is not as practical as it may seem and it will not return the same over-all amount of money. I should like to impress on all members of the house and the government in particular that the fact still remains that the Canadian tobacco industry is the highest taxed industry in Canada. Let us not forget that it is an industry which, if it remains as it is or increases in size, will continue to return to the government of Canada millions of dollars annually not only in the form of taxes but through the over-all economy of the nation itself.

It is certainly to the advantage of the government of Canada to keep such an industry well and flourishing. Therefore, is it not just common sense to take earnings from the business itself and put them to use to better that business? I know that moneys for government projects are taken from the general fund and I realize that this is the only practical way. However, why not base a grant for tobacco research programs on say 5 per cent of the income received by the government from the tobacco industry, which would amount to roughly $200,000 a year, not $200,000 in five years?

In summing up I should like to say that this government or any government cannot afford to let a business such as the tobacco industry go backward without making a real effort to sustain it. There is one way to help it and that is through an effective research program. Money will be required. The business itself is giving that money to the government. Why not make use of a percentage of it to assist the business? Now, as never before, research is needed in the tobacco industry. Therefore I appeal to the government to see that moneys will be advanced for research and experimental purposes relating to the tobacco industry.

Mr. J. A. McBain (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, this motion of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) suggests that the government give more consideration to providing a larger grant of money for research into the production and processing of tobacco. I would suggest that the hon. member should have added a few additional words and included after the word "processing" the words "marketing at home and abroad".

Let us review briefly the Canadian tobacco industry from the production standpoint. The production of tobacco first started in the province of Ontario in the counties of Essex, Kent, Elgin and Norfolk and later was introduced in the counties of Oxford, Brant and Middlesex and many others in the province. The first crops grown were cured by air. The air method of curing is by cutting the whole plant, splitting the stock and hanging it over a lath in a barn with partially open sides to allow the air to circulate around the plant and eventually to cure it. This method is still used in the production of burley tobacco.

By scientific research it was found that tobacco of the flue cured variety could be successfully grown on the more sandy soils in the counties I have mentioned. By this method of production and curing with the use of heat it has been possible to produce in Ontario cigarette tobacco of the finest quality of any country in the world.

Let us look at these areas that now produce this crop, tobacco, as they were previous to 1920 and to the first growing of tobacco crops. I happen to be old enough to remember my visits to the county represented by the hon. member for Norfolk, when a trip by car from my home in St. Thomas to the famous sandhills, a distance of less than 50 miles, was an experience to remember. In those days, on a trip through what is now some of the best tobacco land in the world the roads were only ruts in the sand, and once the wheels of the vehicle entered the ruts it was like being on the rails of a railroad. When you met an oncoming vehicle you had to look for a side track and endeavour to get your vehicle into that siding in order to let the other one pass. Many farms were abandoned, and those who were endeavouring to eke out a living were only able to do so by sacrificing repairs to buildings, fences, barns and so forth.

This county was very familiar to me as a young lad because it was the birthplace of my mother and from her I had learned of the hardships and privations of pioneering in this land that was later to be known as the producer of green gold. The hon. member has referred to land values. In those days land values in the tobacco areas ranged from $10 to $30 per acre, depending on the buildings and the amount of cleared land.

With the coming into production of flue cured tobacco, we find that in the space of less than 40 years a tremendous change has taken place in the complexion of this tobacco growing area. It is quite common today for a tobacco farm fully equipped with kilns, greenhouses, packbarn and other equipment, to sell for $1,000 per acre. As a result of this increase in land values and assessment, municipal councils have been able to show tremendous improvements by providing better roads, new schools, more drainage and so on. We have today some of the finest farms in Canada in the tobacco growing areas of Ontario, and they are a distinct asset to any community.

Tobacco growing has spread to many other areas in eastern Canada. In the province of Quebec the area represented by my colleague, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), is the chief producer of flue cured tobacco. We now learn that several Ontario growers have purchased some 1,000 acres of land near Shawville, about 50 miles northwest of Ottawa, and will be opening up a new area for production next year. Tobacco growing in the maritime provinces is a relatively new industry and is meeting with considerable success, as well as a few failures. Last year Nova Scotia produced 228,000 pounds from 218 acres grown by some eight growers. In New Brunswick seven growers produced tobacco on 120 acres with some increase in production over the previous year. Prince Edward Island has been the largest producer in the maritime provinces and had in production about 450 acres in 1963. It can be seen, therefore, that this is not a regional product but it is grown now and has been grown in six out of the ten provinces. In years past British Columbia has produced small amounts of tobacco. To date, there are over 4,600 farms with rights to produce tobacco in the province of Ontario, or less than 4 per cent of the province's commercial farms. Gross revenues from these farms will exceed $90 million. In other words, 9.5 per cent of Ontario farm cash income was derived from tobacco.

Flue cured acreage has been only about 1.5 per cent of all field crop acreage in Ontario, and the farm value of the tobacco produced was 20 per cent of the value of all field crops. Farm values per acre produced were more than double that of any other major field crop. Tobacco has been produced in Ontario under strict acreage control methods in order to keep production within the needs of domestic and export requirements. Despite the reduced acreage for each of the last three years, growers have produced over 100 million pounds of tobacco each year. This has occurred as a result of favourable growing conditions, better production methods and better varieties less subject to blight, as well as irrigation and many other factors.

Despite the rosy picture of the past history of tobacco, growers today, on the eve of a new crop year, find themselves faced with a very uncertain future. At the present time some 15 million to 20 million pounds of the 1963 crop has yet to be sold through the auction exchanges. The growers themselves have agreed to cut their acreage by 55 per cent for 1964. The average daily price of around 50 cents per pound has dropped to an average of less than 32 cents. The government has refused to help the tobacco farmers as a result of their request for assisting in processing the unsold tobacco. A support price was put on tobacco, but it is only a moral support since it does not assist the producer by giving him more money for his tobacco. It appears that the support price was placed low enough that the government would not have to spend a penny in supporting this crop. The average price on the crop sold to date is less than 49 cents and unless the average drops to below the 47 cents support price, no money will be paid to the growers.

Now, let us look at the other side of the coin and see the revenue that is derived from the tobacco industry by the government. No other agricultural product is taxed like tobacco at the present time. From each cigarette smoked, the government receives nearly one cent in tax revenue. It is estimated that all forms of tax revenue derived from tobacco net the government around $400 million yearly. I have no hesitation, therefore, in supporting this resolution and further recommending that at least one per cent of the $400 million be set aside as a fund for research and to further export sales of tobacco. This money might also be used, when necessary, to subsidize the export of tobacco.

In 1962 when the Ontario flue cured tobacco growers were having difficulty marketing their crop, the Conservative government helped them to remove unsold tobacco from the market, to have it processed and stored. This surplus tobacco was paid for by government guaranteed bank loans of up to 80 per cent of the grade prices, and assistance was also given with the processing and storing. The growers themselves agreed to deduct one cent per pound from their 1961 crop income to assist in taking this surplus tobacco off the market. Recently the Ontario flue cured tobacco growers' marketing board have allocated $60,000 to promote the export of Ontario tobacco. About $25,000 of this money will be used to hire a tobacco export promoter and to pay his expenses while travelling abroad. I wish to commend the board at this time for initiating sales of tobacco to European and Asian countries, and opening up new markets for Canada not previously enjoyed.

However, the whole tobacco industry is now experiencing difficult times. It was only a few weeks ago that the Imperial Tobacco Company of Canada, the largest and oldest of the tobacco companies in Canada requested the consent of their shareholders to embark upon a non-tobacco business. An official of the company reported to the annual meeting that they have recently laid off 100 employees as a result of the drop in cigarette sales following the publication of the lung cancer report by the surgeon general of the United States. At the same time Imperial reported a 10 per cent drop in profits for 1963, Rothman's Limited, one of the newer cigarette companies, broke its selling record last year in Canada, sold cigarettes to the value of over $61 million and made a net profit of 70 cents a share which was a record for that company.

I know there are other speakers who wish to present their views on this important phase of our agricultural economy. In closing, may I say I hope the government will take this resolution into consideration and immediately introduce legislation to provide the necessary funds to assist this industry to maintain the place it once held, and should still hold, in the economy of Canada.

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brantford): I do not hesitate for a moment in rising to support the motion of the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) which is now before the house. The hon. member referred to the vital part being played by the tobacco industry in the economy of this nation, and it is indeed a vital part.

In speaking of this industry I want to refer particularly to the tobacco growers. In my constituency of Brantford a decidedly important part is played in its economy by the tobacco growers. In the township of Burford the total assessment is $6,982,043 for the year 1964, and of this amount a large percentage represents the assessment levied on the tobacco farms in the township. In the township of Oakland the revenue from the assessment on tobacco farms is similarly high, and in the township of Brantford, surrounding the historic city of Brantford, the tobacco growers contribute a very high percentage to the municipal treasury.

I am told that the highest grade of tobacco grown in Canada is grown in my constituency. I hesitate to estimate what would happen to the economy of my constituency were these growers suddenly deprived of their source of revenue, either by questionable propaganda against tobacco or unfair trade practices. The loss of purchasing power and the loss in investment that might be expected by these growers could be so great as to dislocate the entire economic structure of my constituency.

I have heard it said that we do not need to waste any sympathy on the people engaged in this agricultural enterprise, that they have entered into the agricultural picture only in recent years, that they have made lots of money, and that they grow a product which only injures health. Of these last two allegations, one is false and the other is not yet proven. Tobacco growers have not made lots of money. I will not deny that money may have been made by speculators in the purchase and sale of farms, but not by the growers as such.

The growers have made a livelihood, but when one considers the enormous investments made by individuals, first in the purchase of farm lands, buildings and equipment, and then when one considers the high mortgage indebtedness, the interest on loans from banks and individuals, the hard work, long hours, of whole families, men, women and children, the profit made is surprisingly low. I have said these growers have worked hard, but I must add that their stake in my community is high.

I heartily approve of the government considering any proposal to grant more money to be used for research into the growing of tobacco, toward rendering it as harmless as possible to health, and generally toward assisting in any way this agricultural vocation, the vocation of tobacco growing, as a worthwhile enterprise and pursuit. I strongly support the hon. member's motion. I urge the house to vote for it and to assist this agricultural enterprise from unfair attack and false accusations due to a misunderstanding of recent press releases and statements made by responsible persons in the scientific and medical world.

There is no more highly respected group of individuals in my province than the tobacco growers. They do not want to come crawling to Ottawa asking for financial help. All they want is fair play, and it might be wise for the government at this time not to engage in a campaign against smoking so much as to assist in more careful research than has hitherto been available.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the speakers who have preceded me in offering congratulations to the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) for moving the motion now before us.

I believe that all the previous speakers come from Ontario, the province which has been recognized and is still recognized as a great producer of tobacco.

I commend, therefore, the hon. member for Norfolk for introducing this motion whose purpose is to request the federal government to make available a larger amount of money for the tobacco industry, in order to allow for research that will help tobacco growers across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when one speaks of tobacco in this country, one refers especially to the province of Ontario, which is recognized as the largest producer. But I should like to remind the house that we have also, in the province of Quebec, a few regions which are quite well-known for their tobacco crops and where fine quality tobacco is grown. I refer in particular to my own region and that of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

In my riding, we find a tobacco co-operative which, being 80 years old, is the oldest in the province of Quebec. Those last few years, unfortunately, we have discovered that tobacco growing is paying less and less and that a good number of farmers seem to be abandoning it more and more.

For instance, Imperial Tobacco, located in Shefford right in the middle of my riding, gives work to approximately 800 people and manufactures all kinds of tobacco products. And, as stated by the hon. member for Norfolk a few minutes ago, the tobacco industry is the most heavily taxed in Canada.

As a matter of fact, 7 per cent of the federal budget is derived from taxes on tobacco, whereas in the United States the federal budget gets only 2 per cent of its revenue from that source. Here, every day, the federal government takes in between $20,000 and $25,000 in excise tax on the various tobacco products manufactured.

All this to say that the hon. member for Norfolk was certainly justified when he stated, supported by figures, that the tobacco industry was the most heavily taxed in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, out of the $400 million paid in the treasury by way of taxes of all sorts on tobacco, only 1 per cent is applied to research, and I entirely support the view of the hon. member for Norfolk who suggested that the federal government should give higher grants for research in order to help the tobacco industry.

Mr. Speaker, it is recognized that tobacco growers of certain areas of Ontario and Quebec have to solve different problems.

It is a fact that tobacco is grown in Ontario as in Quebec but, on the other hand, neither the soil nor the climate is always the same. Yet, it is possible to grow about the same kind of tobacco. That is why I think that if some areas received more money, it would certainly help solve the problem of the various tobacco growers. It would also help the marketing of all kinds of tobacco products.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is possible to help the tobacco growers, and what has affected the industry the most recently—though it has not yet been proved, I am told—is the statement that smoking tobacco and cigarettes may be a cause of cancer. That is precisely why I believe that the research council which has been mentioned in this discussion should receive larger grants, in order to put a safe tobacco on the market. Nowadays, cigarette smokers and tobacco consumers are not yet convinced that cigarettes are innocuous in this respect. They still have some doubts on the matter and that affects the tobacco industry.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is urgent, in view of the well-known publicity and the suspicion prevailing among the public that smoking is the cause of a certain disease, that the government take action in this regard to prevent any more wrong from being done to our tobacco growers who are concerned because they are not sure whether they shall be able to grow tobacco in a few years from now and whether they should improve their methods of tobacco growing. Farmers who specialize in tobacco growing do not know in the least what to do at the present time.

As for me, I agree with the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) who was shrewd and wise enough to introduce such a motion. I hope that the federal government will carry out his suggestions in order to relieve the farmers and to dispel the present confusion in the field of tobacco growing.

[Text]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): May I say at the outset that I agree with everything said by the previous speakers, including the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) who presented this motion. I do not wish to repeat what other hon. members have said, but I should like to add one or two additional thoughts. I believe that, despite the present criticism of tobacco products, cigarettes in particular, this industry can be expanded in Canada. Since the amount of land available in the appropriate climatic area of the country is limited, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Norfolk is an excellent one.

I believe his suggestion would be greatly assisted if the resolution could be referred to a committee of this house, perhaps the standing committee on agriculture, where scientists and agricultural experts could be called as witnesses and outline methods by which the production and processing of tobacco could be improved in this country. I hope consideration will be given to this suggestion.

In addition, I think sales of tobacco products throughout the world could be increased. The Ontario flue cured tobacco marketing board has done a great deal in this regard recently, with assistance from the province of Ontario. Countries behind the iron curtain and in the Middle East have been visited, and I understand there is a possibility of sales of tobacco to those countries. A year or so ago arrangements were made with the government of Japan—and I may say I had something to do with them—for the purchase of Canadian tobacco. Tobacco, in Japan, is a government monopoly. Japan sent representatives to this country and a token purchase of half a million pounds was made. We hope efforts will be continued by the Department of Trade and Commerce to encourage sales to Japan.

There is a good deal more I could say on this subject, but maybe others wish to speak and I shall confine my remarks to the following aspect. There has been great talk about the danger of smoking cigarettes—I have in mind the report of the surgeon general of the United States, and other medical reports, from which it would appear that allegations concerning the dangers of the heavy smoking of cigarettes seem to be correct. As far as lung cancer is concerned, it does seem to produce a hazard to health. As has been pointed out by the previous speaker, the tobacco industry is far too valuable to be allowed to be wiped out by this threat to its existence. In view of the fact that billions of dollars have gone into the federal treasury over the years as a result of taxes on tobacco sales it would seem to me that money should be provided by the government in large sums annually so as to find the alleged cancer-producing substance in tobacco, and discover ways of removing it so that people who like to smoke may continue to do so without this health hazard which does appear to exist.

It is all very well for the government to allocate $400,000 so that the Minister of National Health and Welfare can put out propaganda against cigarette smoking. It would appear much more sensible to me if that money had been given to research institutions to try to find out ways of removing this cancer-producing substance from cigarettes, in view of the enormous value of this industry to Canada. It is imperative the government should do this. It is difficult for us to know how much should be spent each year on research into this matter and I think the best thing to do would be not only to have this resolution referred to the standing committee on agriculture, but also to the special committee of this house on food and drugs, where witnesses could tell us how research money could best be spent so as to achieve the object I have just mentioned. This work might best be done at the universities or by scientific groups. Perhaps it could best be carried out by commercial groups. In any case, I think it should be done. For this reason I believe the resolution should be referred to both the committees I have named, so that we can find out the best means of undertaking this very necessary research. I fully support the resolution.

Hon. J. Watson MacNaught (Solicitor General): I think this notice of motion is a very important one and one which should receive further study by a committee where witnesses could be called, and so on. If I might have the unanimous consent of the house I will propose an amendment which I believe would have the effect of sending the subject matter of this notice of motion to a standing committee. Perhaps, by unanimous consent, I can move, seconded by my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Benidickson):

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "nation", and substituting therefor the following:

"The standing committee on agriculture and colonization be empowered to review the research and experimental facilities now provided to the production and processing of tobacco in this country and to recommend such measures as may be expedient to promote and assist in the production of Canadian tobacco."

Mr. Nesbitt: I am wondering whether the acting leader of the house would not consider making a slight amendment to his amendment so as to refer the subject matter also to the special committee on food and drugs. I agree it should go to the committee on agriculture.

Mr. MacNaught: I believe that at a later date we might have another motion which would bring about that effect, if such course were thought at that time to be desirable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. A motion to refer a question to a committee is not normally considered as an amendment. I would therefore have to consider the hon. member's motion as a substantive motion, and under standing order 44, page 29, unanimous consent would be required. I inquire of the house now whether they give unanimous consent to the hon. member introducing his motion. Is unanimous consent given?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Mr. MacNaught, seconded by Mr. Benidickson, moves:

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "nation", and substituting therefor the following:

"the standing committee on agriculture and colonization be empowered to review the research and experimental facilities now provided to the production and processing of tobacco in this country and to recommend such measures as may be expedient to promote and assist in the production of Canadian tobacco".

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I will be just a few minutes in making these remarks. I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Roxburgh) for introducing this notice of motion and give him credit for having the great amount of courage that it must have taken to introduce into this house a resolution such as this asking his government to give grants to foster and promote the tobacco industry, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) of that government has taken $600,000 of the taxpayers' money in order to try and stop people from smoking. So we have quite a paradox here this afternoon, and I would not want this occasion to pass without bringing to the attention of the hon. member that this paradox exists within his party. I therefore commend him for having the courage to bring this motion before the house.

I speak as one coming from an area that has one of the finest tobacco processing plants on the whole North American continent. I refer to the Imperial Tobacco plant situated in Guelph. The hon. member for Shefford has another plant of Imperial Tobacco in his area. If it were not for the producers of tobacco, this great industry in my riding would not be able to flourish and exist. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member for Norfolk for having the courage to overcome this paradox that has existed in his party, and I hope that when this matter comes before the committee we will be able to have further discussion on it.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, I enter the debate at this late stage only because of the importance of this industry to my part of Ontario. In my area there are four factories that process tobacco. Our county is one of the oldest tobacco growing areas in Canada and this industry is still an important part of our economy. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Hales) has referred to one paradox. I should like to refer to another. I well remember that in 1958 when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in Brantford, I think, he said they would do something about these unrealistic taxes on tobacco—and they certainly did; the minister of finance raised the taxes on tobacco shortly after that in order to provide more revenue for the government. I have the utmost faith in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) and his proposal that we do more with regard to research. I feel sure, knowing him as well as I do, that we can count on this being done.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, May 7, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PROCEDURE

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have the honour once again, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Your Honour's committee on procedure and organization to move concurrence in a report presented by this committee. I am grateful once more to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for offering to second my motion. There are three parts to the brief remarks that I should like to make on this occasion.

First of all, sir, I should like to say a few words about the structure of Your Honour's committee and the work that committee is doing. As hon. members will recall from the first report of the committee which Your Honour tabled on March 25, the main committee has been divided into three subcommittees. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is chairman of one of those subcommittees; the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett) is chairman of another, and I have the honour of chairing the subcommittee on procedure. All three of these committees, as well as the main committee, have been working very hard on the matters assigned to them and it is my understanding that very shortly each of the other subcommittees will have reports to be presented to the house. On those occasions the other subcommittee chairmen will be moving concurrence in the reports. I should like to express my own personal pleasure at working on both the subcommittee and the main committee. We are tackling a big job with earnestness and seriousness, and I dare to hope that as the weeks go by we will be able to make considerable progress, as I believe we have done already.

The second thing I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, is to draw particular attention to the provisional standing order that we are asking the house to adopt by the motion to concur in the third report of the committee which was tabled two days ago. This new provisional standing order, which would carry the number 15(2-a), will make provision regarding the making of statements on motions. Many members may not even realize that thus far we have no standing orders and no provision whatever for the making of statements on motions. This is a practice that has grown up, and tradition seems to rule the day. Therefore, by not having any standing orders governing this matter, Your Honour has to be guided by precedents, by incidents in the past, and by judging the situation as it arises from day to day.

It is the feeling of the subcommittee, shared by the entire committee—in fact our decision in this matter is unanimous—that we should have a standing order governing the making of statements on motions so that Your Honour will have something to go by. We feel that provision should be made for statements to be made on motions by ministers of the crown, but we feel that something should be said to impose certain limitations. Therefore in our proposed standing order we say such statements should deal only with announcements or statements of policy and that they should present only such facts as it is deemed necessary to make known to the house; and we add the proviso that the making of statements on motions should not be designed in such a way as to provoke debate at that stage.

In the standing order we add the provision that one spokesman for each opposition party should be permitted to comment briefly, subject to the same limitations. I think all members will agree that in practice we have expanded on this procedure, which was not provided for at all, and on too many occasions we have had a five man debate in which nobody else can take part, which leaves us all with the feeling that we have taken too much time and that we have not actually dealt with any item of the business before the house.

I could, but I am not going to, cite examples of faults on both sides of the house. I have gone out of my way to speak to some of the front benchers on both sides of the house, and I find there is general agreement that we could improve this item of our business to the advantage of the house as a whole. I hope the house will accept the motion for the concurrence in this report; that it will accept this proposed standing order; that with the cooperation of the members we can get away from having irregular debates on statements made on motions and that we can have instead, when they are necessary, statements of fact from the government side and brief comment from spokesmen on the opposition side of the house.

The third thing I would like to say is that I hope hon. members will look at this proposal in the context of what this committee has endeavoured to present to the house thus far. As time goes on we shall have other proposals to bring in, but thus far we have been dealing with what I think is a justifiable criticism, that the house has been taking too long with its preliminaries, that it has been taking too long to get down to the business of the day.

We agree that questions are an important part of the house business. So are statements on motions and motions for the production of papers, but to the extent that we have taken an hour and even two hours on these preliminaries we have created the impression of being too slow in getting down to the business of the house. We feel that by a combination of our proposals thus far, what we have done about questions and what we now propose to do about motions, we can reach the point where we will get down to the day's business sooner, we can offset the criticism about spending too long on preliminaries, we can improve the image of the house and we can, in fact, get down to our work that much quicker.

We propose that this provisional standing order should be in effect from the date on which this motion is concurred in until the end of the session, unless otherwise ordered by the house itself, and our committee hopes that the house will adopt this rule unanimously.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, briefly I want to say that I approve as far as I can personally the recommendation contained in this report and the trial for a limited period of what is proposed, but may I briefly recite the philosophy which we have with regard to these particular changes, because there has been considerable comment in the house and outside in the press and elsewhere.

I think it is safe to say that those who suggest that hon. members come to this house purely to pass government measures or pass government estimates are wrong. We are here to give lengthy and critical examination to all matters which are on the order paper for debate. Only in this way does the public get the opportunity to examine in detail the subject matters which the house debates from time to time. It is only through the cut and thrust and the give and take of debate that this happens. Anyone who thinks there is not going to be a continuous series of wars, battles and skirmishes in this house is very wide of the mark.

On the other hand, those who suggest that there should be a continuous donnybrook without rules, rhyme or reason are also wrong. I think we have to stop occasionally to drag out the bodies and put fresh sawdust in the ring, take time to find out what the new issues will be and when and where we wish to join them. It is in this sense, trying to reconcile those two opposing views, that the committee and the subcommittee have approached this problem of dealing with our rules.

There must be continuous review of and changes in the rules. With regard to this suggested amendment, what we are doing is legalizing a custom which has existed for some time. Frequently we have found that putting a custom into written words is a dangerous practice. It is often better to allow those customs to be moulded and refined by what happens. But I think, unfortunately, over the last period of time we have found that statements and comments on motions have been taking up a considerable part of the time of this house, so we are recommending this for a period of trial in the hope that there may be some measure of improvement.

I think it is a question of practicing self restraint. As a backbencher this direction has often been given to me. I think it would be helpful to bring it to the notice of those who sit on the front benches opposite particularly, from where these motions originate. I propose to them that they bear in mind the motto hung up in railway stations during the war: "Is your journey really necessary?" They might ask themselves, before making statements: "Are these statements really necessary?" After they are made, it frequently happens that no reply may be necessary at all from the opposition side. Frequently one reply only might be sufficient; and those who have in the past directed to us the admonition that we should save the time of the house might give this some consideration.

Finally, we are departing to some extent from the English practice. There is no reason why we should slavishly follow English practice but in England, in the mother of parliaments, these statements on motions are followed not only by comments, but questions are allowed. In this way the issue is sharpened and clarified so that it becomes quite apparent what is involved in the statement. Because of the situation in this house, the number of parties and the type of statements which have been made, it is not possible to follow that practice, but I hope that after giving careful consideration to what happens when this rule comes into effect the word "comment" which appears in the second last line in the phrase "parties in opposition to the government may comment briefly" might be extended to include the right of questioning. This is something that will have to be considered in due course. This procedure might then serve a very useful purpose in preparing these particular subject matters for consideration and future debate.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, very briefly I wish to say on behalf of this party that we concur in the remarks that have been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Peace River. I should like to commend concurrence in this report to all hon. members of the house, first of all because, as is clearly stated, it is going to be adopted on a trial basis, and second because I think it will provide some written formality, if you like, and will strengthen Your Honour's position when on occasion statements on motions and subsequent debate get out of hand. We agree that a tradition has grown up in regard to the provision for motions contained in section 15 of standing orders, and this procedure has been used to make statements of policy. On occasion we believe there has been far too much preamble to the actual statement of fact or policy being presented, and on other occasions there has been too much debate from all parties in opposition.

We believe that in the majority of cases the acceptance of this motion will not require any action on the part of the Speaker, but we think it is necessary to have this provision in standing orders so that Your Honour's position will be strengthened in dealing with a situation that gets out of hand when statements are made on motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, convincing arguments have been put forward by hon. members who spoke before me. However, as a member of the subcommittee on procedure, I should like to take this opportunity to give well deserved praise to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who did some exceptionally fine work as chairman of the subcommittee.

The subcommittee has already submitted two reports to the house and others will be forthcoming. I can assure hon. members that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did most of the work. I am pleased to pay him tribute today, because it will be thanks to him if the proceedings of the house are accelerated in future.

[Text]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I am speaking for myself at the present time, but I think we have hidden a certain process and procedure under the desk, and it is time it was brought on top of the desk. I am one of those members of parliament who believe this parliamentary system functions best with a two party system. We have talked a great deal about wasting time in this House of Commons when statements are made from the front benches and two, three, four, five or six comments are made by various parties. I would like to pose one question in this regard. The future holds a lot for us, because look at what happened to France. We may in this House of Commons, in my time—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Woolliams: —or sometime, see as many as ten different parties making ten different statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we on the government side heartily support this recommendation and hope it will have the good results which are anticipated for it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I did not think I had yet been ruled out of order, and surely I have the right to make a personal comment as far as this procedure is concerned.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is quite correct; no one has been ruled out of order yet, and I sincerely hope no one will be. We are discussing this motion, and I suggest to the hon. member that he stick to the motion under discussion.

Mr. Woolliams: I think I am sticking right to the motion, Mr. Speaker. We are dealing with the subject of statements made by ministers. It is necessary for ministers to make statements from time to time in the house. What I am suggesting, and surely this is sticking to the subject matter, is that where you have six different parties each making comments, the time will surely come in this country when any one of us can form a group or five or six members and we will be having 20 or 30 different parties in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: I know the rules, and hon. members cannot shout me down. They do not want the Canadian people to know the truth. The main cause of delay in this house since I have been here is the splinter parties.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since you have permitted the last speaker to wander far afield from the motion may I just say this. The hon. member for Bow River is objecting to the number of parties in this house and says he is in favour of having two parties. I would merely point out that there were two million Canadian voters voted at the last election who did not agree with him. As long as we have a democracy in this country I think the hon. member for Bow River will have to abide by the decision of the electorate.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN

WHEAT—CHANGE IN ADMINISTRATION OF DELIVERY QUOTAS

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to try to make a statement subject to the new rule. I wish to inform the house of a change in the administration of the delivery quotas of grain in western Canada which has been announced today by the Canadian wheat board. The wheat board's announcement is as follows.

The Canadian wheat board wishes to announce a basic change in its administration of delivery quotas. Effective on Monday May 11 all delivery points in western Canada currently on an 8 bushel per specified acreage quota will be given a supplementary 5 bushel per seeded acre quota for wheat deliveries, other than Durum. As delivery points in western Canada are raised to an 8 bushel per specified acre level they will automatically be placed on a 5 bushel per seeded acre quota for wheat. The supplementary quota for wheat, other than Durum, will be raised above this level if and when the export and domestic movement of wheat warrants an increase.

With respect to Durum wheat, oats and barley, no further deliveries of these grains will be allowed beyond the 8 bushel per specified acre level unless market demand for these grains warrants quota increases. In this event it will be the board's intention to grant supplementary quotas for the grain required.

The basic reason for this change in policy is that the board must have the type of grain in the marketing pipe line that is required to meet market requirements. Extremely heavy commitments for wheat other than Durum have been entered into for delivery prior to the end of the crop year. To facilitate the movement of this wheat and to avoid congesting marketing facilities with grain that is not immediately required for the market, the board deems this change in quota policy to be essential.

With respect to oats, barley and Durum wheat, the board wishes to call attention to the fact that producers can deliver these grains up to the 8 bushel per specified acre level. This level is comparable to the quota level normally existing in the past few years at the end of the crop year.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I think the statement made today by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the new policy on quotas indicates the wisdom of certain statements made last year to the effect that there was a market for grains, and that if all the grain was sold there would be no question of having these quotas at all.

This is not exactly the free quota which we had two years ago, but it is a big step toward it. I think we all feel a little sad that the producers of oats, barley and Durum wheat are not in the position where they can deliver above the 8 bushel quota. It is no great satisfaction to them to be told that this quota is similar to what it used to be. Farmers now know that there is a market for their products in the world and they want to see that everything is done to make sure their products get to the markets.

I would hope that in the future no more statements would be made that might lead farmers to reduce production on the ground of the lack of markets, and that no more statements will be made saying that markets have had to be turned down, as happened this year, because there were not shipping facilities out of the country.

In summary, we are very glad to see the quotas moving up to a fairly nice figure, and we hope that something will happen to bring a little better news to the oats, barley and Durum wheat producers.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of his statement on wheat delivery quotas. He stated that the supplementary delivery quotas would apply to points already on an 8 bushel delivery quota. Will the heavy deliveries arising from these extra quotas, at points now on 8 bushel quotas, adversely affect the chances of points not yet on the 8 bushel quota receiving such a quota soon?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to direct this question to the wheat board.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CUBA—U.S. REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN ECONOMIC BLOCKADE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, President Johnson is reported as having communicated with the various allies of the United States calling upon them to assist in the economic blockade of Cuba. I would ask the Prime Minister whether any such representations were made to Canada, and whether he would give the assurance to the house and the country that the policy introduced when we were in office, namely that trade in non-strategic materials with communist nations would not be interfered with, will be continued by the Canadian government.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no such representations have been received by the government. Our policy in this matter is well known to the United States government. As recently as last week we had occasion to discuss it with them again. The policy that has already been outlined regarding trade in non-strategic materials with communist countries will not be affected by the kind of consideration which apparently is in the particular report to which my right hon. friend refers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister say whether any representations, other than the discussions that took place between the ministers of the two governments, have been made by the United States government to Canada in this connection?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. No representations were made at the meeting last week. The matter was discussed, but no representations were made or initiated by the United States delegation.

CYPRUS—INQUIRIES RESPECTING PEACE KEEPING FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask him if he can give the house any information regarding the reports that Canadian troops were sent back into Turkish-Cypriot villages which they had abandoned, because of the refusal of the Turkish Cypriots to remove a new gun emplacement which they had built within 100 yards of the Canadian camp; and has he received any explanation from the secretary general of the United Nations as to why Canadian troops were not supported in their demand that the Turkish Cypriots remove this gun emplacement?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have no reason to doubt the story, but our request for information has not yet been answered. These incidents which are reported from time to time, have not always proven to be in accordance with the facts. Therefore I am not making any comment on this question.

Mr. Douglas: Would the minister be prepared to look into the matter and report to the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister prepared to say whether it is correct that Major Patrick Tremblay, commander of the Royal 22nd regiment's "C" company, has asked permission to return fire with heavy machine guns if there was any further firing into his company's camp?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is the same matter to which my hon. friend from Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) directed my attention. Just as quickly as we have a full report I shall give it to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has the minister any report to make on this, or do we have to wait for press reports as usual?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my right hon. friend not to be irresponsible and to bear in mind what I did say.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STEPS TO MEET REPORTED INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the cost of living index has risen 2.7 percentage points in the past 12 months I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government is planning any steps to cope with this serious problem.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a serious question and one very difficult to deal with on the orders of the day, except to say that the matter is under continuous consideration. It is true that the cost of living index has risen by 2.7 percentage points. It is also true that that record compares very favourably with the rise in the cost of living in comparable countries. But it is a serious matter, and it is being carefully watched.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The provincial treasurer of the province of Quebec, Mr. Kierans, has stated that the federal government appears to be contemplating instituting a system of tight money. Is that one of the steps under consideration at the present time?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I saw no such statement by the provincial treasurer of the province of Quebec, but in any event it is not the case.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance in connection with the statement made by the minister of revenue of the province of Quebec.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he intends to give any consideration to Mr. Kierans' suggestion to expand credit through the Bank of Canada for public bodies in Canada?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I did not see any such statement in the account I read of the speech by the provincial treasurer of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he has had an opportunity of reading Mr. Kierans' speech?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister read this morning's Gazette with reference to this matter?

Mr. Gordon: I read the account in the Gazette this morning with considerable interest, and I can assure my hon. friend that the government intends to abide by its responsibilities as set out in the constitution.

TRADE

GATT—PREPARATION BY CANADA OF PACKAGE DEAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister. Canada is reported to be preparing a package deal for the Geneva conference in respect of the negotiations for tariff reductions. I am wondering when members of the house will be informed of the items that are contained in this package.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it my hon. friend is referring to the GATT discussions at Geneva. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will be in the house on Monday, I believe, and he will be making an interim report on the first week of the conference.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question in that connection, Mr. Speaker. According to a press report today Canada's views on the 50 per cent cut across the board will not be made public until the ministerial conference of GATT in September. Only then, says the report, will Canadian manufacturers learn how they have fared in domestic and export markets. I would ask the Prime Minister whether that statement bears a true relationship to the attitude being taken by the government in this very important matter.

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. That statement would be an oversimplification of the position. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has been in touch with the Canadian manufacturers who will be concerned with what is going on in Geneva. He has already made it clear, as I stated in the house yesterday, that the application of the 50 per cent linear reduction is not acceptable to Canada, and we expect to make our compensation in other ways. I hope my right hon. friend will await the return of the minister, when he will make a fuller statement on the matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—STEPS TO SETTLE LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister tell the house what steps his department is taking in an attempt to arrange a satisfactory settlement of the longshoremen's strike which is now paralysing the port of St. John's?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the industrial relations officer of the department located in St. John's is in daily contact with the parties and has made known to them his availability to assist. Further efforts to mediate will be undertaken by the department at an opportune time.

STEPS TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED URANIUM MINERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has he received from the citizens of Bancroft, Ontario, a letter stating that, on account of the closing down of the uranium mine, at least 300 people will be laid off?

Can he also tell us what the government intends to do for the employees in Bancroft as well as those in Elliot Lake, in his own riding of Algoma East?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is an important and beautiful question for the order paper.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—INCREASED HANDLING CHARGES BECAUSE OF LOW WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the low level of water on the great lakes resulting in boats being unable to load to capacity, will this mean an increase in handling charges which in turn will mean a lower return to grain producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper? I have doubts that the question is sufficiently restricted, and in order to resolve the matter would he put it on the order paper?

GREAT LAKES—CABINET CONSIDERATION OF LOW WATER LEVELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the government now set up a committee of cabinet to consider problems relating to low water levels on the great lakes?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has been considered by the cabinet. There is not any special committee, though there is a committee which does cover these matters. We have been considering this in the full cabinet.

Mr. Aiken: As a supplementary question, to whom should questions relating to this general problem be addressed?

Mr. Pearson: I would think, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, as the minister responsible.

[Later:]

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister given any direction toward having dredging done in any of the prevailing emergencies?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. To say the least the extent of the question is very wide.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, this is an urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: I do not wish to stop the hon. member from asking a really urgent question. Would he please state its urgency?

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, yes or no would be the answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order paper, please.

FISHERIES

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED LOSS OF LOBSTER TRAPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries of which I have given him notice. Has the Minister of Fisheries been made aware of the substantial losses of lobster traps through ice conditions in Northumberland strait, and what action does his department intend to take in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put this question on the order paper for a detailed answer.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED STATEMENTS BY C.P.R. PRESIDENT RESPECTING DEBT AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have sent him notice. In view of President N. R. Crump's statement at the C.P.R. annual meeting yesterday opposing debt aid to the C.N.R., will the minister say when we will be given an opportunity to examine these serious charges against the government, either in the railway committee or when the MacPherson report legislation is brought down?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I am responsible for the statements of Mr. Crump, but I hope the legislation will soon come before the house and that we will soon have a chance to deal with it.

Mr. Bell: Can we have some idea when? Will it be in two or three weeks? These are serious charges against the government, and I should think the minister responsible would like to take the opportunity to refute them; but perhaps they are true.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest that the hon. member consult the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre about when it might come up in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The government has given up completely.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST FRENCH CANADIAN ARMY OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct an important question to the Associate Minister of National Defence?

Is it the minister's intention to prescribe an inquiry, following the statement made by Mr. Arsène Lauzière, professor at the military college in Kingston to the effect that there is at the present time a certain discrimination against the French Canadians, as far as their promotion within the Canadian army is concerned?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is certainly a question for the order paper. I do not believe the minister can be expected to answer in a fully factual manner at this time without notice.

Mr. Pigeon: I want to discuss it further at ten o'clock tonight.

INQUIRY AS TO RECOVERY OF STOLEN ARMS AND AMMUNITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether the arms that were recovered recently from the A.L.Q. were in fact the arms stolen from the Fusiliers armoury in Montreal in January.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. Could he tell the house whether the police have recovered all weapons and equipment stolen in armouries?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as far as we could check, we believe that nearly all, if not all, weapons stolen at the Mont Royal Fusiliers' arsenal and at the Shawinigan arsenal were recovered at the time of recent arrests, more particularly the last one.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Since the Minister of Justice stated that the arms have been partly recovered, could he tell us whether all those arms will be recovered, according to the information he might have obtained up to now?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, to be more accurate, I wanted to avoid asserting something which might be subject to correction. I said that, as far as we know, we think most of the arms, if not all, have been recovered.

According to our information, we do not believe that there remains to be recovered any arms that had been stolen at the two armouries.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REDUCTION IN NORTHERN ALLOWANCES AND ISOLATION PAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the drastic reductions which have been announced in respect of northern allowances and isolation pay for civil servants, will the Secretary of State consider undertaking a thorough review and reconsideration of this matter, which is causing so much concern to federal civil servants in northern areas as a result of the rising cost of living and the reduction in take-home pay?

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put this question on the order paper, important though it is?

Mr. Simpson: I should like to bring up this matter at the adjournment hour.

TOBACCO

POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF COMPTROLLER OF ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I should like to direct a question to her parliamentary secretary. Has there been any indication from the tobacco companies as to the appointment of a comptroller of advertising, similar to that proposed in the United States?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): On behalf of the minister, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving ample notice of this question. The department has received no indication from the Canadian tobacco industry that a course of action is planned similar to that proposed in the United States.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): In pursuance of my policy of promoting good relations between the government of Canada and the government of British Columbia, Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister any comment to make on Premier Bennett's statement in reply to the minister's statement that British Columbia had not asked for any aid in connection with the recent disaster?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think a question was asked on this matter yesterday, and I thought I had replied to it in full. I do want to inform the house that this morning I was talking to Hon. Wesley Black, minister of welfare for the province of British Columbia, and I asked him if he could secure permission for me to read to the house the wire he had originally sent and the wire the premier of British Columbia sent. I have received consent to read those wires, and if I may I should like to first read the wire received here on April 3 from Mr. Black, addressed to myself. It reads as follows:

> For your information. Following wire being sent to Right Honourable L. B. Pearson Prime Minister today quote emergency relief re west coast flooding being satisfactorily handled by local and provincial authorities. Province has instructed E. C. Earle of Canadian independent adjusters conference acting on behalf of seventeen adjusting companies to make detailed official appraisal of damage. Detailed report will be forwarded when complete. Offer of federal assistance appreciated and preliminary reports indicate that it will be required.

There has also been received by the Prime Minister a wire from the premier of British Columbia, sent from Victoria on May 4. I quote:

> Re Alberni's tidal wave destruction additional to emergency aid program supported by public and provincial government imminent receipt of expert survey of damage suggests desirability of disaster policy jointly and equally to be underwritten by federal and provincial governments and made available for capital restoration of affected area. Suggest desirability early joint press release announcing this policy. Suggest also early appointment joint committee of permanent officials to implement statement of policy.

I asked Mr. Black this morning whether he had received the report of the adjusters. I think it is in his hands and he quoted a figure, but I said we would not report to the house until it arrived in writing. I think hon. members will appreciate my reason for not wishing to do that. I am particularly pleased that the sum he indicated is much less than was at first anticipated by way of loss.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister if the federal government has replied affirmatively to the suggestion by the premier of British Columbia that there be a joint disaster program underwritten equally by the two governments?

Mr. Laing: Well, Mr. Speaker, obviously we could not reply until we had confirmed the extent of the damage and studied the basis upon which the application is being made by the province.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles J. M. Willoughby (Kamloops): Can the Prime Minister advise the house when we can expect the tabling of the report of the royal commission on health services?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I received a communication this morning from the chairman of the commission in which he regretted that he did not now believe he would be able to meet the deadline mentioned in the earlier communication, which I think was the middle of May. He says this is due entirely to delay in the translation. They expect to have the French translation completed shortly and get the report before us, but it will be a couple of weeks beyond the date originally set and that, I believe, makes it around the end of May.

LEUKEMIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REPORTED CURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Due to the possibility of false hopes having been raised by those suffering from leukemia, will the parliamentary secretary make a statement giving the department's views concerning the validity or otherwise of any possible cure for this dread disease which appears to have been claimed by Mr. Naessens, now visiting Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Unless the parliamentary secretary has a prepared statement because of the general interest in this matter, I suggest that the question be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF CLUB CHARTERS HELD BY ONTARIO GAMBLERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Is the Secretary of State in a position to reply to my question of yesterday referring to social club charters being used for gambling purposes in Ontario, and whether or not he received requests for their cancellation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, requests were received in May, 1963, October and November 1963 to cancel the charters of these two corporations. These requests were from the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto and the office of the deputy provincial secretary. In each instance it was explained that under the Companies Act the Secretary of State could not cancel charters by simple fiat.

Although officers of the Ontario government were invited to submit sufficient evidence to warrant the issue of a writ of scire facias, no further information has since been received by the department. I should further advise the hon. member that the government is at this time reviewing certain provisions of the Companies Act in this respect and a further announcement will be made on this in due course.

Mr. Scott: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the minister indicate the nature of the evidence the department requires in order to act in a matter of this kind? As the minister knows, the present owners of the charters are convicted gamblers, although the charters themselves have not actually been used at this point. I wonder if the minister could tell us what kind of evidence the department would like to have.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not believe that is a proper question. The hon. member is indirectly asking for a legal opinion at this time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF BROADCASTING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State?

Some time ago the minister promised to make a statement about the broadcasting committee. Is the minister in a position to make it today?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker. However, I hope to be in a position to make it next week.

FOREST FIRES

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the serious forest fires that we are experiencing at the present time in Nova Scotia and the resultant destruction of valuable property in that province, would the Prime Minister indicate whether any request has been received from the government of Nova Scotia for assistance? If so, would he indicate the units of the armed forces or other government units that may be made available to assist in fighting these fires?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no request for assistance has been received by me nor, so far as I know, by any member of the government, but I shall look into that at once. I know how serious this is, and anything the federal government can do through the Department of National Defence, it will do.

THE MINISTRY

NATIONAL REVENUE—APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance of the office, when might we expect an announcement regarding the filling of the post of minister of national revenue?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the post is being filled by a very competent minister indeed. If there is to be any change in that position it will be announced in the house when it is made.

Mr. Scott: In order to get a more definitive period, could we expect that announcement before June 22?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to.

FINANCE

PROVISION AGAINST FOREIGN CONTROL OF BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, following a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in the amendments to the Bank Act which will be introduced this fall, he proposes to make it impossible for a bank such as the proposed new western bank to fall into foreign control?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I would not like to prejudge what may be in the legislation next fall, Mr. Speaker, but I think I can reassure my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. MacEwan: As a supplementary question, has the minister received any suggestions to this effect from the former governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Gordon: I do not think I have anything useful that I can add to my previous answer.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF GILL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. When does he propose to introduce legislation dealing with the recommendations of the Gill report?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the comments made by the Prime Minister on this matter shortly after the session opened.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been drawn to the statement by the Leader of the Opposition last night, that the performance of the present parliament is as good as any in the past. If so, would he care to withdraw his complaint of a few days ago that we are not getting on with the business of the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that statement was not drawn to my attention, but of course I read it because I read everything that is written about the right hon. gentleman. But I noticed in the report I read that he made some qualification to that bald assertion that my hon. friend has made.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Does the Prime Minister agree with the qualification?

Mr. Pearson: I prefer the statement to the qualification.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Departmental administration including the national co-ordinating committee on agricultural services, contributions to commonwealth agricultural bureaux and a contribution to the agricultural economics research council in an amount equal to the contributions of the provinces but not exceeding $50,000, $3,368,900.

The Chairman: Vote No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture is to be found in the main estimates at page 8 of the blue book, details on page 11. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps by way of explanation to the hon. member on the other side of the house who has just risen to his feet I might say that on April 24 I was speaking on this item, and still had some time left in which to discuss these estimates.

I will just spend a minute or two longer on the matter I was discussing on April 24. No doubt by now the minister has had full opportunity to inquire into the matter I partially raised on that date. Unfortunately time did not permit me to place all the facts on record for the minister's guidance. I will say to him now, though, that my information is that when Mr. Trach was requested to cut his contract, that is his contract to supply milk and ice cream to stations Namao and Griesbach, he was told there were certain elements and certain people who stated that if Trach did not agree to the contract being reduced from six months to three months "the Department of Agriculture could make it very difficult for us". That was Mr. McKay; and Mr. McKay, it should be said, is not an employee of the Minister of Agriculture; he is an employee of the Minister of Defence Production who I see, is sitting beside the Minister of Agriculture now, perhaps the better to make the explanations which are required.

Mr. McKay, at this particular interview of which I spoke, the employee of the Minister of Defence Production, then referred to the federal Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and particularly to the minister, that is the Minister of Agriculture; and Mr. McKay stated that he had instructions that the minister, that is the Minister of Agriculture, wanted the contract cut.

It is admirable that there should be co-operation between one department and another, but if my information is correct this is the wrong kind of co-operation when we have the Minister of Agriculture instructing an employee of the Minister of Defence Production in this fashion. Mr. Trach, I am informed, told Mr. McKay that in his opinion the Department of Agriculture could not break the contract nor could the Department of Defence Production, since it was in writing and properly executed. But Mr. Trach was then informed by Mr. McKay, according to my best information, that there was a group of lawyers in Ottawa looking into the validity of the contract.

That is a strange statement for a public employee to be making to Mr. Trach, if it is true. It was just after that that Mr. McKay said the minister and the Department of Agriculture were "going to take the contract from us", that is from Mr. Trach, or at least reduce it from six months to three months.

What kind of pressure is this which is being brought to bear? It is strange that a contract for six months should be cut at all, or that these threats, if they were made, should be levelled. But the worst is yet to come. My information is that Mr. McKay then said to Mr. Trach that "we can, in accordance with instructions from Ottawa, find something wrong with your product". He was referring to the milk in question. In other words somebody was going to stick a manure fork into the cream can. I think this is the kind of threat which should be completely eliminated, particularly when there are executed contracts in existence. Here we have the old political patronage game coming back in full force as it used to be before 1957. Then Mr. McKay said during this interview, according to my best information, "I do not like to bring this up in reference to having your products declared unfit, but it is my superiors and the Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa that I take my instructions from."

These are very serious allegations indeed, and I would be happy if the minister were in a position to rise and refute them, though I have grave doubts whether he is in such a position. But I think he owes this committee an explanation; because if it is correct that patronage is again running rife, it is time a stop was put to it.

Mr. Drury: Would the hon. member permit a question? He has made reference to very serious charges. I should like to ask him whether he vouches in any way at all for what he is saying, or whether he suspects that it is all mere gossip.

Mr. Nielsen: The information I have is of such a character and of such substance that I would not be disclosing these circumstances to the minister unless I thought that (a) it was serious, and (b) it did have some substance. I cannot vouch emphatically and without reservation for the information I have, but I have every reason to believe—and the minister can take my assurance for this—that the allegations which have been made have a good deal of substance. They are deserving of explanation. They are allegations made by the person who holds this particular contract.

Mr. Drury: I am asking whether they were made directly by that person to the hon. member.

Mr. Nielsen: I have an obligation at this moment to treat this information with the same confidence as it was given to me. But I have been quite frank in disclosing the names to the minister in question and I have been quite frank in disclosing the allegations, for they are complete—

Mr. Drury: I am asking the hon. member this. Did he get this information at first hand from Mr. Trach?

Mr. Nielsen: I am not obliged to disclose this information to the minister, as he well knows. I do wish at this particular moment to protect the source of information that I have. If the two ministers concerned have an explanation which is acceptable to the committee, after the investigations that the Minister of Agriculture has obviously made since April 24—because he has had the time, and my information is that he has made those investigations—there will be no need to disclose my source of information.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am just seeking to ascertain whether this is first hand information obtained from the man who is making these charges, or whether it is second hand information. I can say right now that the allegations concerning threats allegedly made by the Department of Defence Production employee in Edmonton are wholly false. If the hon. member heard this directly from Mr. Trach, he has been misled. Perhaps he would agree that in the light of these circumstances Mr. Trach is not the kind of person with whom the government should be dealing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drury: —and perhaps we should have cancelled the contracts.

An hon. Member: Who is threatening whom now?

Mr. Drury: If on the other hand the hon. member got his information second hand, then perhaps Mr. Trach is not guilty of directly misleading a member of parliament. That is why I want to know.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I really think the shoe is on the other foot. I have assured the minister and his colleague the Minister of Agriculture that these have not been manufactured allegations. I would not have brought them before the committee unless I considered them to be of a most serious nature and of substance. I can tell the minister, though, that Mr. Trach is prepared to swear under oath with regard to the information I have disclosed to the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: It is all very well for the Minister of Defence Production to make these answers, which I am sure are very much welcomed by the committee because they want information as to the details and circumstances of this situation; but we should hear from the Minister of Agriculture, who is directly involved, because if the information I have disclosed is true it indicates that the Minister of Agriculture directly interfered with Mr. McKay, an employee of the Department of Defence Production, and made threats, as I put it in the vernacular of the west, to put the manure fork into the cream can.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I do not quite understand these agricultural allusions, but this is an employee of my department in whom I have absolute confidence. He tells me that the statements the hon. member is now making are false and without foundation.

Mr. Woolliams: How did you get in touch with him so fast?

Mr. Drury: Some day perhaps the hon. member for Bow River will learn that we work faster than he does.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. My point of order briefly is that the minister is denying a statement that was made this afternoon and says he has discussed it with his department. How could he communicate with the department, when he has been sitting in his seat in the House of Commons listening to the statement?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drury: Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bow River was not in the chamber when all this stuff was rehearsed a few weeks ago. Further, the hon. member for Bow River does not read his Hansard or he would have discovered the whole story.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on another point of order, Mr. Chairman. I was in the chamber the last time this statement was made, and I do read Hansard. The minister is not my private secretary, and I do not think he can read the crystal ball that well.

The Chairman: In the opinion of the Chair that does not sound like a point of order.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, an employee in whom I have the utmost confidence denies categorically that he made any kind of threat to Mr. Trach or to the Purity Milk Company. Further, he has had no kind of pressure or indeed even suggestion from the Minister of Agriculture as to what should be done about this. The Minister of Agriculture first became aware of this matter when the hon. member for Yukon raised it in the house some two weeks ago. This was the first the Minister of Agriculture heard about it.

Mr. Starr: Where is Harry's tongue?

Mr. Drury: As the hon. member for Yukon has just pointed out, there is co-operation between the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Defence Production. I would again ask the hon. member for Yukon whether he is vouching for these baseless charges, in which case they require some investigation, or whether he is merely retailing gossip. If he has it from Mr. Trach that he is prepared to swear an affidavit as to the truth of these things, let us get it and let us look into this matter. But I would ask the hon. member not to retail misinformation which has the effect of blackening the character of reputable, honest, hard working public servants.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, would the minister answer a question? Would he get an affidavit from his informant, as he is asking the hon. member for Yukon to do? Will he get such an affidavit, in the same manner?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I would be quite prepared to get an affidavit from the Department of Defence Production employee.

Mr. Nugent: Would he be prepared to give it?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, it is all very well for the Minister of Defence Production to get up and reply, as he has, for his employee; but the Minister of Agriculture is of age and surely we can hear from him as to his reaction to these statements. I do not see how the Minister of Defence Production can stand up in this committee and inform us that an employee of his department, Mr. McKay, denies flatly having made these statements, when the statements that were made this afternoon were not in Hansard of April 24. Some of them overlap, but I put three additional statements on the record this afternoon that the minister had never even seen before, and very serious ones they were.

One of those statements was this. He—that is McKay—told Trach that there were certain elements and certain people who stated "That if we did not go for a three month contract"—that is, to reduce the six months contract to three—"the Department of Agriculture could make it very tough for us". He, MacKay, then referred to the federal Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and in particular minister Hays. He stated he had instructions that the minister wanted the contract cut.

I cannot see how the minister, and above all Mr. McKay, can deny that this statement was ever made when this afternoon is the first time it has been put on the record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, I would very much like to make a statement and I would like to stick to my notes, because this is the statement I prepared so I could answer this matter today when my estimates came up again. I would like this on the record, so I shall keep strictly to the notes.

In the debate on my estimates on April 24 the hon. member for Yukon raised a question concerning a contract held by a certain dairy to supply dairy products to two air force stations in the vicinity of Edmonton. He implied that there had been an improper attempt to cancel the contract which, I quote his own words, "cause some doubt as to the integrity of the department itself, its officials and the minister".

He mentioned a Mr. McKay as the local official who had been involved in the matter. During his remarks I interjected to categorically deny the insinuations he had made, which I was able to do so far as the department was concerned because it has nothing to do with defence contracts, and so far as I was concerned because I knew nothing about the matter. However, he had raised the subject just before the committee rose at five o'clock, which did not give me an opportunity to secure information to reply to him in detail at that time.

At the next sitting of the house, on April 27, on a question of privilege I stated that no official of the Department of Agriculture approached any member of the firm mentioned by the hon. member, and that no Mr. McKay worked for the Department of Agriculture in Edmonton. At the end of his remarks on April 24 the hon. member stated that he hoped my investigation would completely exonerate my officials and myself. If that was his hope I can only say that if he had made a very simple inquiry he would have learned that the Department of Agriculture has nothing to do with awarding contracts to military establishments. In fact I am surprised that a member of parliament of his calibre and intelligence did not know this.

I now wish to inform him that neither I nor my officials were in any way involved in contracts with the Purity Dairy for the supply of dairy products to the R.C.A.F. station Namao or the army station at Griesbach, and that at no time did I or my officials have discussions with Jacob Trach or any other member of the Purity Dairy firm with respect to those contracts. I have never seen Jacob Trach and I have never seen McKay. I have not been in Edmonton for a long time. Furthermore, the Department of Agriculture has absolutely no jurisdiction over health requirements so far as the quality of cream or milk is concerned in the province of Alberta. This is strictly a provincial matter. I think it would now be appropriate for the hon. member to withdraw the insinuations which he made on April 24.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, Mr. Chairman, I find that there is nothing to withdraw. I do not think the minister should have such a thin skin in this matter, because if he will carefully examine my remarks of April 24, as he himself has just recalled I said in concluding them that I hoped his investigations would exonerate him and the officials of his department.

Mr. Hays: Do you agree, then?

Mr. Nielsen: I think there are some further questions which must be answered here. For instance, the minister has not assured the committee that he never had, either himself or through his officials, any communications with Mr. McKay. He did not say that this afternoon, and I think we are entitled to that answer.

Mr. Hays: I said that categorically.

Mr. Nielsen: Then we must, of course, accept it immediately.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members opposite are saying "withdraw". I think I have been very fair about bringing these circumstances before the minister. They are circumstances which have substance, and which if they are true amount to very serious charges indeed which require investigation. Let me put this to the minister; that while he can say he had nothing to do with D.D.P. contracts, it is quite another thing to say that there has or has not been any direct contact between himself or members of his department and an employee of his present seatmate the Minister of Defence Production. I would point out to the minister that he obviously had a prepared statement this afternoon, which of course is quite acceptable—

Mr. Hays: May I ask the hon. member a question. Does he think I did make some contacts in connection with this matter?

Mr. Nielsen: This committee is the judge of that, not I, Mr. Chairman. It is for the committee to judge whether or not the minister's conduct is above reproach in the circumstances. I have already said that I must accept the word of the minister in this house, because that is a courtesy that is extended to all hon. members. However, he obviously had a prepared statement this afternoon to which he adhered quite closely, as explained by him. But prior to reading it and subsequent to April 24, when I put on the record the initial circumstances surrounding this matter, the remainder of the circumstances had not been disclosed. Therefore I suggest he examine the record in today's Hansard, when it is printed in order to assess the additional information which has been put on the record since April 24, because there are additional factors which he must now consider. The statements I have put on the record today cannot have been denied with any force by the minister in his prepared statement this afternoon since this is the first occasion upon which he has heard them. The statement he read this afternoon is all right as far as it goes, but it only goes as far as covering the information which I put on the record last April 24. I will leave that matter with him and he can explain it at a later date.

Mr. Hays: Would the hon. member be prepared to make the statements he has made today outside the house?

Mr. Nielsen: In the same way I have made them in the house I would certainly be prepared to make the same statements outside the house. I think I have been fair in bringing these circumstances to the minister's attention. I have not done so in a way which has besmirched his reputation or smeared him. He put it that I was attempting to smear him, but—

Mr. Hays: Your mother must be very proud of you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: When my mother was alive she was very proud of me. I think I have been fair in bringing the matter to the minister's attention. Again I would refer him to the closing remarks of the discussion on his estimates on April 24, when I said that I hoped the minister's investigations would show that there had been nothing wrong and that those investigations would exonerate him and the officials of his department. However, I suggest to him that he still has a few inquiries to make respecting the information I have given him this afternoon, because I did not have time to put it on the record on April 24.

Mr. Hays: I have no more inquiries to make.

Mr. Nielsen: Then I think if he says that it is a dereliction of the minister's responsibility, because there have been other serious statements made today which require investigation. The statement he made today covers only the information placed on the record on April 24, and that is all it could cover. That is also the case regarding the denials of the Minister of Defence Production with respect to his employee; his statements go only so far as the information which was available to him in the record of April 24. I suggest that he too look at the additional information which I have placed on the record this afternoon.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member must have heard the Minister of Agriculture say that at no time did he or his officials instruct Mr. McKay. This is information which the hon. member for Yukon received in some fashion, he will not disclose how. However, he is prepared to retail what I suggest is pure unadulterated gossip, and I regret very much indeed that an hon. member of this house should lend himself to the practice of blackening the reputations of honest members of the public service with second hand gossip.

Mr. Nielsen: I defy the Minister of Defence Production or anybody else who has listened carefully to the remarks I made today or to my remarks of April 24 to make the charge that I have attempted, either deliberately or unintentionally, to blacken anyone's character or reputation. I made it quite clear on a number of occasions that these are matters which have to be investigated; that if the results of the investigations showed that there should be an exoneration of the minister and his officials or the Minister of Defence Production's officials then that was fine, and that is the way it should be. We would all be very happy to see that result. But I think it is the responsibility of an hon. member, indeed his duty, when information of this sort comes to him, to put it before the responsible minister in a committee which is considering his estimates in order that it can be looked into. That is the whole purpose, to my mind, of looking at estimates in this way.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if I am being lectured on the responsibilities of a member of this house I would suggest that it is the responsibility of an hon. member, before he makes charges in this house which outside the house would be libelous or slanderous, to satisfy himself as to the truthfulness of such statements. The hon. member for Yukon, by his own admission, did not even take the trouble to ascertain that Mr. McKay was not an employee of the Department of Agriculture. He did not even take the trouble to ascertain that the Department of Agriculture has nothing to do with the letting of milk contracts for the armed forces. I would suggest that the hon. member for Yukon has been unfair, that he is continuing to be unfair and further, that he has shown a complete lack of understanding of the responsibilities of a responsible private member of this house.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I would seriously suggest to you that the Minister of Defence Production should come off it. He has implied that I have made statements in the house under my immunity as a member of the house that would be libelous or slanderous if made outside the house. I have just told him that, having regard to the manner in which the statements were made in the house, I would have no hesitation whatsoever in making them outside the house. The Minister of Defence Production, in making such an observation, purports to set himself up as judge of what constitutes libel and slander. There was no intention to libel or slander anyone.

Another point the minister makes is that I did not satisfy myself as to the truth of what was said. The Minister of Defence Production asked me if I was prepared to accept the information I had as being my own. He did not ask me whether I believed it to be true. If he had I would have said yes, because the information in my possession is such that I must believe these statements to be true on the basis of what I have. Prima facie I must believe them to be true. I simply cannot tell the minister at this stage the manner in which that information came to my notice, but I satisfied myself as a responsible member of the house that the information was of that substance, character and gravity as to require an explanation from the minister.

Mr. Drury: That it required investigation by the member, not merely an act of credulous belief.

The Chairman: Order. I certainly have no intention of interrupting the discussion that is going on at the moment but I wonder whether the Chairman might be allowed to express an opinion. From the course of the debate that has been going on this afternoon it would appear to me to have been established to my satisfaction at least that the complaint raised by the hon. member for Yukon does not actually relate to the Department of Agriculture.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

[Mr. Drury.]

The Chairman: That is my opinion. I might say that when it was first raised at the time we were discussing this item a while ago I expressed some doubt whether it really came under item No. 1 of the Department of Agriculture, but in view of the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member for Yukon I took no exception to his continuing to discuss it. But I certainly have serious doubts and I am sure hon. members will agree with me that there is serious doubt, in view of the statement that has been made by the Minister of Agriculture, whether this matter actually comes at all within the purview of item No. 1 of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I think you will have noticed that I was prepared to leave the matter about 20 minutes ago and had it not been for the groundless and rather childish accusations of the Minister of Defence Production it would have been left there. I bow to your ruling on the matter, of course, although I differ with it as I did on April 24.

I leave the matter with the ministers as responsible ministers of the crown. There is additional information of a serious nature that requires an investigation and an explanation brought back to the committee. I will leave the matter right there.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, just before we leave it may I say I think I speak for all in saying that we would be quite prepared to have a judicial inquiry if the hon. member will give us the source of his information.

An hon. Member: They do not like the one that is going on now.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might want to return to this matter later in the debate. There are quite a few members who have expressed their desire to speak in the course of this debate. I have a long list of members who have come to me and have said they want to speak. Perhaps it would be fair to give them a chance at this time, although if the hon. member has a parting word I will recognize him.

Mr. Nielsen: I will not say another word on this subject. I have two more that I can deal with in a very short time. They are of a similar nature to the last one, so the minister had better be prepared to keep his investigators busy because, whether or not he knows it, there seem to be goings on among members on the benches opposite as well as in his own office of which I am sure he would not approve. I am going to bring two matters to his attention.

The Chairman: Order. Is the hon. member now going to discuss another point? His time expired quite a while ago. I realize there have been interruptions but the hon. member spoke for 14 minutes on April 24 and he has certainly been speaking for more than 16 minutes this afternoon.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I am not for a moment suggesting that you are running interference for the ministers. I am not for a moment suggesting that, but—

The Chairman: Order. The point is very simple. According to the rules the hon. member has 30 minutes and he has spoken for more than 30 minutes.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, every time there is an interruption his time starts again.

The Chairman: Not necessarily. If another member rises to ask a question or if another member—

Mr. Nugent: The ministers have made several statements this afternoon, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order. To my mind it is just a question of being fair to all members of the committee. I enjoy listening to the hon. member for Yukon and I am sure the point we have been discussing this afternoon is of interest to the whole committee. But the hon. member had the floor when we debated this item on April 24 and he called it five o'clock. At that point he had been speaking for 14 minutes. He continued this afternoon and, although there have been interruptions back and forth, the committee has been sitting for some 40 or 50 minutes and, while I have not kept the time, I am certain that the hon. member has spoken for more than 16 minutes. I would be inclined to see another hon. member in order to give someone else a chance to contribute to the debate. Perhaps the hon. member for Yukon might speak again later, because he can speak as often as he wants to.

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order that has been raised by you, sir,—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I appeal to your sound judgment.

It is true that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) took up quite a lot of our time today. However, he was interrupted quite often by the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Drury) and by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays).

The points raised by the hon. member for Yukon are very important, so much so that the two ministers sometimes have to get up at the same time to try to refute what the hon. member for Yukon is saying.

I understand that in agriculture—

The Chairman: Order. As far as I can see from the remarks just made by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette), there is no point of order. He may be very eloquent as the spokesman for or the defender of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), but the reason I intervene is that the hon. member for Yukon has just finished making a particular point. Since the discussion on that point is over, the committee might feel that another member should have the floor.

However, if the hon. member for Yukon feels like concluding his remarks, I certainly do not want to stand in his way and I recognize him immediately.

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order that has been raised by you, sir, I believe that under the rules I am entitled to continue now. I could have dealt with the two remaining points I want to bring to the minister's attention in the time that has been taken on the point of order, if it had not arisen.

I believe that under the rules I have a right to go ahead, and if I may be allowed to continue I shall be finished in a few minutes.

I wish to draw attention to the fact that the hon. member for Rosedale, the parliamentary secretary to the minister, has been making certain representations to his department with regard to the appointment of solicitors to the Farm Credit Corporation. Now, the hon. member for Lincoln had requested the member for Rosedale to appoint Mr. John Hicks; Mr. Frank Flynn; Mr. Harry P. Cavers; Mr. Keith Pedwell and Mr. Hugh Mahoney, all of St. Catharines, to share equally in the corporation work. The member for Rosedale, I am informed, said to the member for Lincoln that five solicitors were too many to be working for the Farm Credit Corporation. The hon. member for Lincoln then came back with a compromise saying, well, perhaps you had better just appoint Mr. Hicks and Mr. Mahoney to share equally in this work. The hon. member for Rosedale said it was government policy, or policy in any event, that only one solicitor is normally appointed to do the Farm Credit Corporation work. The hon. member for Lincoln then said that the work of the Farm Credit Corporation was in arrears because of the very poor schedule of fees being paid to solicitors doing this work.

The hon. member for Rosedale also made reference to the fact that it was embarrassing to appoint solicitors to the Farm Credit Corporation and then turn around and fire others. He evolved another procedure for going about this. The hon. member for Rosedale's suggestion was, we will not fire these old solicitors at all. What we will do is, we will not send them any work at all and eventually, in the fullness of time, they will realize that since they are not getting the work somebody else is replacing them. It will be much easier for the Farm Credit Corporation and the solicitor in question.

Mr. Hahn: May I ask the hon. member a question? For how long were the solicitors to whom the hon. member is referring employed by the department? Was it since 1957?

Mr. Nielsen: I cannot say from my own knowledge, but I understand these solicitors have been working for the corporation since its inception.

However, we have a sudden recommendation from the hon. member for Lincoln to the hon. member for Rosedale, who is the parliamentary secretary to the minister, to appoint five solicitors. The member for Rosedale says this is not good policy and they should appoint one. Then, when he gets one appointed he says: We are not going to tell the old one he is fired; he is not going to get any more work. We will not tell him a thing, we will just let him wait until he realizes another solicitor has been appointed, and in the fullness of time he will realize this when he is not getting any work. This is a real plan, I must say.

Mr. Greene: Will the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if he could give the source of all this keyhole gossip with which he is favouring the committee this afternoon?

Mr. Nielsen: I mentioned the hon. member for Rosedale. I have mentioned the hon. member for Lincoln. I think that if the information I have given the committee is the least bit faulty, then they should get up and tell the committee that this is so.

There is another one. These representations came from the hon. member from Renfrew, a very distinguished member of this house. He made representations to the hon. member for Rosedale who, I invite the committee not to forget, is the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture—no, justice.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of privilege. If the other information the hon. member has is no better than his knowledge of the parliamentary secretaries, then obviously all of his information is incorrect. I should like to enlighten the hon. member by informing him that the hon. member for Rosedale is not the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member should inform himself of other things as well as these very fundamental matters.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I must appeal to the good sense of the committee to confine itself to the first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Renfrew South obviously was not listening because before he rose I did correct my reference and said the hon. member for Rosedale was the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice. In any event, here we have the hon. member for Renfrew appealing to the hon. member for Rosedale to appoint Mr. Terence V. McCann of Pembroke in place of Mr. H. J. Bradley to do the Farm Credit Corporation work in that area. This one is a little more serious, I think and perhaps is going to require a little more explanation, because there is a hidden inference in this one. My information is that the hon. member for Rosedale had been informed that the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation was reluctant to make any change and therefore requested the hon. member for Rosedale to see what he could do. In turn, the hon. member for Rosedale then communicated with the minister's office and passed on the request. Since the chairman was reluctant to make any change, would you go up and see Mr. Bradley and put Mr. McCann in? It appears we are right back to this old system of the pork barrel.

Mr. Greene: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. Inasmuch as my constituency has been mentioned, I should like to inform the hon. member that his keyhole source of information is incorrect. Either he should check back—I do not know whether he gets this information in a public house, through a keyhole, from the messengers, or the char staff, or from the Dorothy Kilgallen of the house. I suggest that possibly he will become a gossip columnist like the hon. member for Port Arthur, and one in this house is surely sufficient.

I deny the information that he has. In so far as my riding is concerned, no such recommendation was made. Had it been made, I think it would have been an excellent appointment because all of these gentlemen are highly qualified solicitors, far more competent than some of the gentlemen who were doing the work between 1957 and 1962. However, on the point of privilege, I deny this information and I challenge the hon. gentleman to give the source of his information, if it is anything more than idle corridor gossip.

Mr. Nielsen: I should say the hon. gentleman has made a comparison between the admirable gentlemen who are proposed for this work and the gentlemen who have done this work, as he says, between 1957 and 1962. Now, I am a greenhorn when it comes to agriculture. I have not even got my straw hat, but at least I know that the corporation was not set up until 1961. I must say that all of us have to accept the hon. member's statement because that is the courtesy we extend to all members in all corners of the house. However, I suggest to him he should not be so brash as to make such a sweeping denial of this information until at least he has consulted with his colleague, the hon. member for Rosedale. It just might be that the hon. member for Rosedale may have been in touch with the minister's office, unbeknownst to the hon. member for Renfrew South. I suggest that he exercise a little caution.

Mr. Greene: I very much appreciate the learned, experienced and knowledgeable hon. member lecturing me on the proper procedures. He has already instructed the Minister of Industry, whom he called the Minister of Defence Production, one of the many errors the hon. member has made today. I very much appreciate the lecture, but I have a little more to do in this chamber than to investigate all the corridor and key hole gossip I hear in this place.

Mr. Nielsen: I have no doubt whatever the minister will get up and participate with respect to these two particular matters, and tell the committee whether or not we are correct in the names we have cited, and the names of the members who made representations to the minister's office. All I have to say about the circumstances I have drawn to the committee's attention is that we are right back into the old pre-1957 pork barrel, the old Ottawa valley game, as I think it used to be called in the past.

Mr. Hays: I think I should probably explain something about the Farm Credit Corporation. It was set up long before 1961. We have tried, and I know the former government did also, to cut down the time it takes to service a loan so far as the farmers are concerned. After all, they are of No. 1 importance. My instructions to Mr. Owen, the manager of the corporation, have always been that we want to cut down this time. Last year we were able to cut it down substantially. This year the members of the corporation are charged with the responsibility of cutting it down further—ten days—regardless of what lawyers are handling the loans.

If the lawyers do not service them immediately and they have not got a real good excuse, then they are to be replaced. Everyone who has been appointed as a lawyer handling Farm Credit Corporation loans has been instructed to do the work quickly. These are my instructions, and it must be done on merit, regardless of politics. My instructions are that no matter what a lawyer's politics are, if he cannot cut the mustard and service these loans for the farmers, then he is to be replaced. This will continue to be our policy.

The Farm Credit Corporation is a big business. It has now handled up to nearly $400 million. The act is a good one and I give the previous government full credit for it, but it is an act which replaced another one that also did a great deal of good. Our main concern is that the farmers be taken care of first, and that all appointments be made on merit. I can assure the committee that these are my instructions, as Minister of Agriculture, to the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation.

Mr. Nielsen: I just want to conclude my remarks—

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) and the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) exchanged a few remarks for a while always to criticize the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) for statements made by the latter this afternoon.

Now, in the field of Canadian agriculture, political patronage is found not only in the Yukon but everywhere in the country. Such patronage is not being practised in only one district, but in all parts of Canada. The Minister of Agriculture knows about it. Let us put an end to this patronage and let the $400 million—

[Text]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must say to the committee that I think the procedure we are following is very, very irregular. I understand the committee gave permission to the hon. member for Yukon to continue his remarks beyond the normal 30 minutes.

Mr. Nielsen: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I may be wrong there, but this is what I understood. The hon. member for Yukon has the floor, and until the hon. member has completed his remarks I would hope the rule will be observed that a member can make a speech without being interrupted.

Mr. Caouette: A question of privilege is submitted to Your Honour. Can we deal with it or not?

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member is rising on a point of privilege I should be pleased to hear him.

Mr. Caouette: No, the minister rose on a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I could be through in about three minutes if the committee will permit me. I would not have risen again if it had not been for the hon. member for Renfrew South referring to my information as being corridor gossip.

Mr. Greene: Keyhole gossip.

Mr. Nielsen: Or keyhole gossip. I have in my hand a letter which concerns him. I am going to read that letter, and if the committee wants me to table it I would be happy to do so.

I have here a letter marked private and confidential, dated May 1, 1964, and signed by Donald S. Macdonald, M.P., parliamentary secretary, addressed to D. F. McIntosh, Esq., executive assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. It reads:

Dear Don:

James Forgie, M.P. for Renfrew North has requested that Mr. Terence V. McCann of 73 Pembroke street west, Pembroke be retained for all Farm Credit Corporation work in this area in place of Mr. H. J. Bradley who, I believe, is now receiving this work.

In view of the reluctance of the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation to make these changes, I would appreciate it if you could assist me in carrying out Mr. Forgie's request.

Mr. Woolliams: What a thing.

Mr. Pigeon: The same old gang.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member table that letter?

Mr. Nielsen: If it were within the rules.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is not permitted to table private correspondence.

Mr. Greene: On a point of privilege, I believe that the rules provide that if he is reading the letter he is vouching for its authenticity, for the authenticity of its contents and its signature.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member may be quite true in saying that the hon. member for Yukon is vouching for the truth of the document, but the document is not a public document and therefore cannot be tabled.

Mr. Nielsen: Unfortunately I am prevented from tabling it by the rules but I have no hesitation, believing in the integrity of the hon. member for Rosedale, that he wrote this letter and signed it on May 1.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Greene: Could the hon. member tell us how he came by the letter?

Mr. Nielsen: Wouldn't the hon. member like to know.

Mr. Greene: I take it the hon. member declines to answer my question.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member, the minister, the hon. member for Lincoln or the hon. member for Rosedale would like to know the source of the information with respect to the solicitor's name cited in respect to this situation, I would refer them to the letter of Mr. Donald S. Macdonald, M.P., member for Rosedale, under private and confidential cover, to the same executive assistant dated May 1. It is a letter too long to read, but I would be happy to do so if the committee wishes.

Mr. Hays: I would like to make a few corrections for the record as it seems quite easy for the hon. member for Yukon to make these mistakes. He said the Farm Credit Corporation started in 1961. The Farm Credit Corporation replaced the old farm loan board on October 5, 1959.

Mr. Nugent: Would the minister correct that? It was set up then, but it did not start operations until 1961.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Champlain.

Mr. Greene: I wonder might I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Greene: He has yielded the floor. I wonder could he tell us if that was the original or a copy?

The Deputy Chairman: Order; the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Champlain.

[Translation]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to be more concise than the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

A country has never been prosperous without a flourishing agriculture, and especially in a country where agriculture is prominent in the economic life, as is precisely the case for Canada, a country where agriculture is extremely diversified, where farm yields are enormous and could even be bigger, if all agricultural fields were developed adequately all across the country.

Canada has a Minister of Agriculture whose responsibility includes a farm production infinitely diversified on a territory as broad as a continent. The great importance given to agriculture in western Canada, on account of its enormous production of wheat and grains, has often led people to believe that the Canadian agriculture boiled down to that.

Except in a few cases, the Minister of Agriculture has always been a member from western Canada, well informed in matters related to wheat and inclined, of course, to think that all other matters are of secondary importance, although food consumption on the island of Montreal, for instance, is greater than in the three western provinces put together.

We recognized that this situation had to stop and that, although it was good for the prosperity of two or three provinces, it played against the whole country's economy and prosperity. The prosperity of western Canada cannot guarantee the prosperity of the whole country, and the rest of the country cannot remain at the mercy of conditions which result in an excellent crop one year and a poor one or none at all the next. The present Liberal government recognized and claimed that the agricultural situation in Canada, because of the size of our country and the diversity of its production, could not be directed efficiently by a single department.

We had stated that an important aspect of our policy would be to give eastern Canada its own minister, who would be entirely responsible for part of the farming development in the east and who would look after raising the standard of living of our farmers, by promoting full efficiency in agricultural and rural activities, which is an essential factor of prosperity, development and progress of our economy.

For the eastern farmer the dairy industry is just as important as the wheat crop for the western farmer. He cannot prosper without the development of his herds. It matters little whether he has the best cattle, the largest and best pasturage if he cannot market his products adequately, if he does not know how to transfer his dairy industry so as to make it more profitable.

The western provinces do not use up all of their wheat, they sell it to the whole world. The grain from western Canada helps to feed hundreds of millions of people, and we can but rejoice to see Canada, and specially the Liberal government, selling so much wheat and other grains to all parts of the world.

This however should not make us lose sight of the fact that in the other half of Canada, where we live, there are immense areas with tremendous possibilities for the dairy industry, and the raising of cattle. Wide markets exist in other continents for our products; and, yet, the yield of that form of agricultural activity is not what it could be; a part of the population in the areas where these activities could be carried on and expanded, does not earn enough to provide for its essential needs. This is the new task that has been assigned to the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), so that he will take care of this serious situation.

The problem is not that this part of the country cannot put agriculture and farms on a profitable basis. The simple fact is that agriculture in eastern Canada has never been given its rightful place, even if the opposition seems to find today solutions to all the problems which it could not settle when it was in power.

The possibilities of a country are not only measured by the amount of wheat or grain it can produce. We cannot take into account only one form of farm products and exclude all others. We must think of the whole and of all its component parts.

The fact is that eastern Canada has all it needs to put agriculture to the forefront. Vast areas are available for the kind of agriculture which would bring them greater prosperity. Some residents of eastern Canada have been living there for a long time; they offer guarantees of stability which perhaps have no equal anywhere in the country.

The people of eastern Canada do not have to become farmers. They are farmers by tradition and heredity, and a large number of them ask for nothing better than to remain farmers, providing they can make a living out of the soil and other related industries. Let us see the situation under its true light, however. If so many farms are abandoned, it is not because the soil is exhausted but because the families who had settled there could no longer make a living on those farms.

What is the use of having the best dairy herds in the world, the finest livestock in the country, if you cannot earn a decent living? You will have to live from hand to mouth, you will be compelled to stop fertilizing your fields and your pastures. Your property will start to run down; your family will be unable to live on the farm; one by one, your children will leave for the city, quite often without adequate training to earn a living. You will be left without the necessary help. With your children gone, you will not have the means to hire outside help and everything will go to pot.

All around you everybody is suspicious and pessimistic. Everybody says: what is the use of staying on the farm if nobody cares for us, if nobody does anything to help us.

I very often visit my riding which is partly rural. I see fine farms, fine herds, and a population which is sound, strong and skilled in all farming activities. But what concern, what pessimism among many of those farmers. They are wondering why they should remain on the farm and stick to farming.

Under the strong leadership of a minister whose purpose is to remedy so much misery, we wish to restore the confidence of our people. We must see, judge and act. Everything cannot be done overnight, especially in view of the slowness of this house.

In order to cope with the situation, we needed a minister who will deal especially with that poverty, a minister who will be completely aware of the rural situation, of its problems and possibilities, who will know the rural population, their requirements and what they can offer in terms of character, initiative, sustained work; a minister whose everyday concern would be to work so as to develop and revive that agriculture and promote its expansion, in order to obtain a proper efficiency, and who would move heaven and earth to ensure its maintenance.

Every week, commercial and economic missions come to Canada. Every week, similar missions are leaving Canada. The day when such missions will concern themselves with the lot of eastern farming, we can start thinking there is a will to do something with a view to the prosperity and welfare of a part of the people of eastern Canada.

Most recent surveys indicate that the number and the percentage of unemployed people are larger in the east than they are in the west. Would it not be because we have failed to see the situation under its true light, especially for the last five years?

There is only one way to make agriculture, which is quite different in eastern Canada, a prosperous, living and lasting industry. On the one hand, it must be organized so that the farmer will make a living by finding permanent markets and exporting his products. On the other hand, we also need a government aware and convinced of its responsibilities, a minister whose constant concern and essential task will be to organize accordingly his activity and that of the agencies under his responsibility, namely rural development, especially ARDA, by making it immediately more flexible and effective. Once agriculture is put back again on a sound economic basis and assured, by its own nature, of its future development, it is the organization of economic markets which will enable it to go ahead.

To secure our foreign markets is to guarantee full employment at home. Our recent wheat sales to the Soviet union, Bulgaria, communist China, Czechoslovakia represent a fantastic transaction, if we think of eastern Canada, and we are very happy about it.

The agricultural policy has been very successful for the west of the country. We are able to do as well for eastern Canada, where farming also has a bright future, provided a special and essential part of the operations is in the hands of a minister who knows those possibilities and endeavours to take advantage of them as much as possible.

Agriculture has a double purpose, that is to feed a nation and, the economic purpose, to create markets in the world to balance its credit and its prosperity.

In that case, we should grant subsidies and credit to the farmers who would convert their dairy production to something else, like beef cattle for instance. We should impose high standards for milk quality, the farm as well beef cattle, and control milk sales through a national marketing board.

There is another thing we want to correct. Farmers in general, and more particularly in the east of this country would certainly benefit therefrom, because they are not informed of prospective markets for their products. There are, for instance, many farmers who know, as I said earlier, that the European market has unbelieveable prospects for our farming industry? We need a quick and dynamic information service. We need a research council on marketing, on the transformation and production of vegetables and animal products.

I think some beneficial solutions could be found for our farmers by establishing a "control council" for production and stabilization of feed grain prices by eliminating speculation.

If we want to help our farming industry, we should give it our special attention. The farmer is often affected by excessive production, by instability of prices, and his products are too often the prey of speculators who benefit more from government grants than the farmer himself.

We must plan, guide and control the demand and production by means of statistics, so that the production does not exceed twice the demand, thus lowering prices, which forces the farmer to sell his products at less than cost.

The issuance of breeding licenses would rationalize production and probably eliminate an unjustified competition against the farmer, which often leads him into a financial mess.

Breeding should be the responsibility of the farmers and not of the white collar workers, so that systematic speculation might be avoided. It would also be appropriate to define exactly the farmer's duties and to outline his aims, as is the case among the professional classes and tradesmen.

Farming was formerly the world's finest profession; unfortunately, it has become an industry. Let us revalorize the farmer's role; let us give him a real professional code;

I believe that such a course of action would dignify the farming profession; as all other professions and trades, it will support a man and his family properly, without recourse to all kinds of grants, which are often but mere poultices, devoid of healing power.

We have started dealing with these matters. The farmers would not expect less from us. Economy in eastern Canada is the foundation of their concerted efforts. We would not really succeed in rehabilitating economy in eastern Canada without first grappling with this problem. The farmer must be able to make a living for himself and his family on his farm alone, without going to the city, for whole seasons, if not for the whole year round, to earn part of his income; there are many people having to earn money, who cannot work and earn their living in cities, whereas the farmer, on the other hand, should be placed in a situation allowing him to ensure amply his subsistence through the sole income to be drawn from his farm. Such a policy of economic balance is essential if Canada is to have the economic and social security it needs in order to be a happy country in which each social class enjoys the well-being it is entitled to.

There is another very important point I wish to emphasize in order to show you that the French Canadian farmer does not feel at home in Ottawa but rather like a stranger.

French Canadian farmers, who make up 30 per cent of the farmers of Canada, cannot make themselves understood in the Department of Agriculture, because the very great majority of the civil servants in Ottawa, if not all, do not speak French but only English. There has been only a little improvement up to now. We cannot insist that English Canadian farmers speak French or that French Canadian farmers speak English, but we could insist that both be understood by civil servants, who are their employees.

If we really want to have unity, recognition of equal rights for both nations, parliament must develop bilingualism more intensely so as to include our farmers.

Our farmers believe in our Liberal government because we do not want speeches only but action that will satisfy all the aspirations of our Canadian farmers.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, I see there are just a few minutes at my disposal before we call it five o'clock. Perhaps that is indeed fortunate, because in my 30 pages of notes here I have a paragraph of commendation and 29 pages of condemnation. Perhaps I can get the commendation on the record before five o'clock. When the Minister of Agriculture gave his opening address on these estimates it was expected from all parts of the house that he would deal with some policy in regard to agriculture as put forth by this government. The picture he painted in his remarks was, of course, of a somewhat rosy nature. He did state that the gross national income from farming rose in the last 12 months, for the year 1963. He did state and illustrate the importance of the research being carried on by the Department of Agriculture.

He commended the minister's department and we on this side of the house certainly want to endorse his commendation. Research in the field of agriculture in Canada is known throughout the world. These men are leaders in the field and certainly deserve commendation at every hand.

The minister dealt with an attempt by him and his department to bring the matter of research closer, in implementation and understanding, to the farmer himself, and I think this is a fine step to take. Too often have we had a tremendous amount of work done by the research department which would have been of extreme benefit to the farmers had it been initiated, but perhaps through some lack of communication, either on the part of the department or the farmers themselves, it was impossible to communicate this vital knowledge to the farmers. Therefore any effort made by the minister and his department to assimilate this information and distribute it among the farmers will be appreciated by all in agriculture clear across this dominion.

The minister also spoke of his activities in the development of livestock at the fairs. I think this is a step which is long overdue. I think the minister and the government appreciate the fact that the return of the fall fair to its former dignity, where we had greater emphasis on agriculture and less emphasis on the carnival aspect, would be of tremendous interest and benefit to all citizens of Canada. It should be a showcase for agriculture. We will have to wait, of course, and see what the new regulations the minister has introduced for the fairs bring forth. I imagine there is no reason to doubt that the minister and his associates will work very closely with the leaders in the livestock industry to set up these particular classifications.

I noted that the minister dealt first with the Hereford breed. I think he did this because the Hereford is a universal breed from coast to coast in Canada. The farmers in Ontario will be particularly pleased that he spoke about the fair in London and stated that perhaps this would be a good place to introduce such a policy, as far as dairy cattle are concerned. I should like to thank the minister for his praise of the cattle breeders in the London area. We in southwestern Ontario think we have cattle breeders second to none.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I should now like to deal for a few moments with what is happening in the agriculture field today. Is the picture the minister painted as rosy as he says? Does this government know exactly what is going on in agriculture today? Are the farmers as happy and as satisfied from coast to coast as he would lead us to believe? I think the only way we can approach this problem is to analyse the situation. I never like putting a lot of figures on the record but I should like to illustrate what is being done.

The minister stated that the net income has increased in the last 12 months, and this is absolutely true. We all realize that the tremendous sales of wheat as well as other grains to communist countries have in the main been responsible for this. But when we analyse the figures which have been put on the record we find that the net income to the farmers clear across this nation, even with the tremendous sales of grain, has only gone up from 1962 to 1963 to the extent of $37 million. This leads us to wonder if all is well across the farm front of this nation. After delving into the matter a little further what do we find? Let us compare the incomes in 1962 with the incomes in 1963. During the year 1961-62 there was an increase in farm income in every province across the dominion. But what happened in 1963? In the province of Alberta there was an increase in income from 1962 to 1963 of $15 million. In the province of Saskatchewan, that great wheat bowl, what do we find? The increase in income was $97 million.

Now let us look at the rest of the picture in this rosy country of ours, this utopia for agriculture. What happened between 1962 and 1963 in Prince Edward Island? The income went up between 1961 and 1962, but last year it went down $130,000. What happened in Nova Scotia? Last year the income for the farmers was down $1.5 million. In New Brunswick it was down $900,000. And what about Quebec? This is the government which was going to bring utopia to the farmers of Quebec. Their needs were going to be looked after as never before. According to the minister, he said that the income from the dairies was the greatest since any time since confederation. Let us just see what the record is for the province of Quebec. The income to the farmers of that province went down $12 million.

What was the position in Ontario? We in Ontario were a little more fortunate: The income only went down $2,250,000. What happened in Manitoba? It went down $15 million. What happened in British Columbia, that province on the west coast in which is grown all the wonderful fruits and vegetables and which has a great lumber industry? The income to the farmers in the province was down $4 million. Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock.

The Chairman: Order. In order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private members' business, it is my duty to leave the chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions, public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

MAPS SHOWING ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

The house resumed from Thursday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martineau:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all maps, drawn up or deposited with the chief electoral officer or the representation commissioner, pertaining to the proposed redistribution of electoral boundaries in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, when I was giving my impressions, not quotations, a week ago, concerning this notice of motion——for copy of all maps drawn up or deposited with the chief electoral officer and the representation commissioner, pertaining to the proposed redistribution of electoral boundaries in Canada.

—the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who is not in the house now, said that the tabling of those documents would create confusion for the people, the hon. members and even for the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Speaker, that confusion was in fact organized by the orders or suggestions the chief electoral officer received from some ministers, either the Minister of Transport or another one, to the effect that he should prepare electoral maps which would be sent to provincial commissioners so that the provinces or the provincial commissions could take those maps submitted by the chief electoral officer, as a basis for their studies to reform or proceed to the redistribution of electoral boundaries in our provinces.

On that score, what I am interested in is certainly the redistribution of electoral boundaries in the province of Quebec, since I come from that province. Some others will have representations to make concerning the province of Ontario and other Canadian provinces, which will object to the fact that those electoral maps prepared by the chief electoral officer should be submitted to the attention of provincial commissions.

That is why I said a week ago that the Minister of Transport, as well as the chief electoral officer, should never have suggested that we go to the main office here in Ottawa to see the plans or drawings prepared by the chief electoral officer to give us an idea how the ridings should be organized or reorganized within the provinces.

When I called personally at the office of the chief electoral officer, I saw the plans, drawings and maps. They certainly do not suit me, nor do they suit the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) or the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise).

The chief electoral officer was telling us—and me, in particular—that for no consideration at all would be alter the plans he was then spreading out before me, and that the whole question would be submitted to the provincial commission which would decide whether or not changes were to be made.

Now, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue requests that these documents be submitted to the house. If they are to serve as a basis for the Canadian provinces to proceed with the establishment of new electoral boundaries, as far as the province of Quebec is concerned, at least, I maintain that these maps must be submitted to parliament as well as to the attention of all Canadian hon. members assembled here in the federal house of parliament.

However, if those maps are not to be used for the establishment of new electoral boundaries in the provinces, the government should order the chief electoral officer to stop preparing maps and making plans for redistribution, since he himself admits that he knows nothing about Quebec.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Would the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) allow me a question?

Mr. Caouette: With pleasure.

Mr. Martineau: Could he tell us what would be the purpose of those maps, in his opinion, if they were not used for the establishment of new electoral boundaries. If they were not to serve that purpose, does he feel they should still be drawn up?

Mr. Caouette: In reply to my good friend from Pontiac-Témiscamingue I will say that existing maps should be destroyed.

If those documents are not to be submitted to the House of Commons, they should be done away with. It is not up to the chief electoral officer to decide the basis on which the commission for the province of Quebec should work, or, for that matter, the commission for the province of Ontario or that for Manitoba, the province of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

The provinces themselves look after their electoral readjustment.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that when I called on the chief electoral officer, Mr. Castonguay, he showed me electoral maps. Taking into account—

Mr. Choquette: Were you invited?

Mr. Caouette: I went at his own invitation, for the information of my hon. friend from Lotbinière. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Transport was also invited, as were members of each political party, to go and see, on the spot, the sketches prepared by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Speaker, when I got there, I was told there was one map based on a 10 per cent tolerance, another based on a 20 per cent tolerance and, finally, a third one based on a 25 per cent tolerance.

While looking at the most important part of the country, that which, naturally, includes Rouyn-Noranda and the constituency of Villeneuve, I discovered that—

Mr. Choquette: Our part of the country is also important.

Mr. Caouette: —I discovered that we have in that area—a beautiful area—a region which is right smack in the middle—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: You mean the most important part of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: I believe my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was there on one occasion, and he realized that it was the most beautiful area of the province of Quebec.

The cities of Rouyn and Noranda are twin cities. Now, according to the work done by the chief electoral officer—fortunately he is not the chief officer for Canada, but merely the chief electoral officer—Rouyn and Noranda are to be separated. Noranda is to be added to the Val d'Or and Amos area, and Rouyn, which is thoroughly "creditiste"— with all due respect for my friend from Lotbinière—is to be added to the Pontiac-Témiscamingue constituency.

While I was pointing out—

Mr. Choquette: That is why the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue is afraid.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I hear my hon. friend from Lotbinière say that is the reason why the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue is afraid. He is not afraid, but from the geographical point of view, that redistribution would be meaningless and totally irrational.

At present, we have a constituency including the whole mining area in the northwest of Quebec. We have a riding that is fundamentally agricultural: Pontiac-Témiscamingue. We have, to the north, the constituency of Chapleau which is also an agricultural, forest and mining constituency.

Now, when I met the chief electoral officer, I was introduced to the young man who had prepared the exercises, and both of them told me that those exercises would not be used to determine new standards or the new boundaries of the ridings in the provinces. However, they admitted to me that those exercises would be used as a basis by the provincial commission and that they will be used as criteria to determine in the future, in the province of Quebec, federal constituencies included, comprised and recognized in the province of Quebec.

When the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) said the other day that to produce those exercises or electoral maps to the house would create confusion, he was quite right. On the other hand, why did the minister extend to us a public invitation to go and meet the chief electoral officer to find out on the spot what progress had been made?

The chief electoral officer told me candidly, honestly and humbly that he knows neither the province of Quebec nor Ontario nor any other province in Canada. If we are going to set up ten commissions in Canada, if we are going to have one in the province of Quebec —I contend that it is the responsibility of this commission in the province of Quebec to decide what will the new ridings be in the future and to decide the boundaries of those ridings, and when this commission will hear the people who have objections in respect to such and such a map, or such and such a percentage of population—if we take for granted that the act provides that the average or quota, as we say usually, will be between 70,000 and 71,000 people per constituency—well, I contend that it will rest with us then to go before the provincial commission, and I am of the opinion that no member of parliament, no organization, no party has the right or the obligation to go to the chief electoral officer to see the basic work he has done.

We have been told that this work should not influence the provincial commissions, but we know that it will influence them very much and that these maps will be taken into account.

In my opinion, there is only one solution, which I mentioned a while ago, and it is this: If the chief electoral officer, with his maps, should not influence the provincial commissions, then he should burn them, and get rid of them, and we should hear no more about them. Above all, we should no longer be invited to see those maps, because it is an insult to all federal members of parliament. If on the other hand, those maps are to be used as a basis for future electoral readjustments, or the readjustment of future federal ridings, throughout Canada, then, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) was justified when he asked that these documents be produced in the house in order that each member may examine them.

I am convinced that every member will agree with me that the chief electoral officer does not have to take part in the redistribution of electoral districts. If it is refused to have these documents destroyed, then let them be produced in the house so that every member may know what is going on in his riding. I shall appreciate then the impression that the government strives so much to give us, namely that it shows a democratic spirit, that it allows freedom to every individual and also to every member of parliament, an undeniable freedom to every province of Canada and, under the circumstances, as far as we are concerned, that the commission has complete and unrestricted authority to decide what electoral districts must be represented in the house. At that time—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. Knowles: Does the hon. member still agree or does he not still agree to the proposition that Mr. Castonguay is to be a member of each of the provincial commissions and, therefore, is he not simply carrying out the duties already assigned to him by statute to be doing some preliminary work on this matter? In other words, does the hon. member feel this rather strong criticism he is making of Mr. Castonguay is justified?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I admit that my criticism is rather sharp but it is not directed to Mr. Castonguay and his organization, nor to those who asked Mr. Castonguay to prepare the plans.

Mr. Castonguay told me, in his office, that he does not know the province of Quebec and that that sketch or sketches have been prepared in an arbitrary fashion—I was told even more than that—I was told that, in the province of Quebec, there were four classes of ridings: urban ridings, rural-urban ridings, rural ridings plus two northern ridings, those of Saguenay and Chapleau. Mr. Castonguay himself told me that. In addition, Mr. Castonguay told me: "All our calculation is based on the science of mathematics, we stick to mathematics; the same quota from 70,000 to 71,000 people per riding will be applied."

But, with regard to urban and rural ridings—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before the hon. member for Lotbinière can raise a point of order, I must advise the hon. member for Villeneuve that his time has expired and also that I took into account the fact that he was interrupted. I gave him two minutes more to make up for that interruption.

Mr. Caouette: May I reply to my good friend, the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member get the unanimous consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am truly grateful to my hon. friend from Lotbinière. I know that, eventually, he will feel like joining us.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, he did not get the unanimous consent of the house; therefore, his time has expired.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, in reply—

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the house to continue after his time has expired?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I thank once again my hon. friend from Lotbinière, but to answer the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I will say that when the chief electoral officer explained to me the way he intended to proceed and suggested that there would be four categories of counties in the province of Quebec, I was told on the same occasion that this whole question was resting upon mathematical and scientific factors, and that the population would amount to 66,000 for each county. At a given moment, when it came to the northern counties, those of Saguenay and Chapleau, the mathematical element disappeared completely and was replaced by purely geographical factors.

The situation had changed completely. That is why I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that even if the representation commissioner sits on all provincial commissions throughout Canada, I do not think it is wise to entrust him with the establishment of the new electoral boundaries.

I would be in favour of leaving that matter to the provincial commission in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Quebec and in all the other provinces even if the commissions then had to rely on the advice of Mr. Castonguay and his staff of experts in mathematics and geography. However, I feel that far from submitting to the provincial commissions the maps he now has, Mr. Castonguay should throw them away. In other words, if he does present his maps, then I agree with the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue and I support his motion calling for the tabling of the documents in the house.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the motion of my colleague from Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) and I would like also to say that in the main we support the ideas expressed by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette).

[Text]

Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to examine the remarks made on Thursday April 30 by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) and I can only call his argument somewhat specious in that when he says, as recorded at page 2775 of Hansard for that day—

> —what the motion is asking for is something which has no relationship whatsoever, except as an exercise in map drawing, to what will eventually emerge, if there is any disposition on the part of this parliament to deal with this problem and to deal with it in any reasonable time—

—he indicates that these are merely an exercise in map drawing. If that is so, then I would suggest that the representation commissioner is derelict in his duties because, by statute, he is directed to produce maps. These are not an exercise in map drawing. He is directed by statute to do this, and therefore there must be a purpose. No direction of this kind by statute can be deemed to be a nullity or a frivolity, and therefore these maps do have a definite purpose.

Since we are asked under another bill to consider what extent of tolerance shall be included in the statute, surely it is pertinent to the deliberations of the members of this house to see what will be the results of the application of a number of tolerances? There is no one better qualified or equipped to take the electoral map of Canada and divide it up into the various ridings on the bases of certain tolerances. Therefore these should become the knowledge of members of the house who, on the basis of an examination of these various maps, will determine what shall be the better tolerance to include in our new representation act. Otherwise I would submit to hon. members that we are being asked to vote on something that will be entirely theoretical.

On whose word shall we rely—on the estimation of the Minister of Transport, or as a matter of fact on that of any member of the house—that a tolerance of 20 per cent will have such and such a result? Unless the minister has seen the maps that have been drawn on the basis of a 20 per cent tolerance, then frankly he is talking off the top of his head and his opinion does not warrant a great deal of attention.

What I find rather difficult to understand on the part of the government in resisting this motion is that we, or a number of us, have been invited personally to go and see the maps. I quite admit that the government is not trying to hide anything here. After all, members from all parties have seen some or all of the maps.

Mr. Douglas: I have not seen any.

Mr. Lambert: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) says he has not seen any. Neither have I, but it is not because there has not been the opportunity, or at least the invitation.

On the basis that we are trying an experiment or a departure in the manner of drawing up the electoral map of the country, surely to goodness there would be no harm done in publishing the maps on the bases of 10 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent or 30 per cent tolerances, or whatever they may be. After all, the electorate is interested. I simply cannot accept the argument of the Minister of Transport, as recorded at page 2776 of Hansard that constituents could not care less what riding they happen to be in or who is their representative. At least this is the interpretation I place on his words, and I do not know where the minister gets that attitude. It is quite untenable, and I would say frankly, almost insufferable.

Certainly the people in my part of the country are interested in the proposed redistribution. They are vitally interested in what may be the redistribution of these seats.

If we look at what will be the ultimate act —and here, Mr. Speaker, I must crave your indulgence so that I will not stray too much from the interpretation of this type of motion that I have placed upon it myself—under the representation act there will be little or no opportunity afforded to the public, unless it is widely amended, to see what the representation is going to be. Once the representation commissioners have gone to work they will compile a complete report, and once that report has been compiled it will be most difficult for anyone to persuade the commissioners that they have been in error and that they must make a change. Frankly, if the commissioners are not to use these maps —and we know that by virtue of the other act they are entitled to hire staff and technicians to assist them—then the direction to the representation commissioner is a nullity. Why would he prepare maps if the commissioners are not to use them in the end? It would just be an exercise in duplication. I would suggest on all counts, now that the representation commissioner has prepared these maps on the basis of these respective tolerances, that hon. members of this house who, after all, are not second class citizens, are entitled to see how the electoral map would be affected by these various tolerances, if only to assist them in their conclusions as to what should be included in the Representation Act. It would certainly be of great interest to the citizens of this country to see how the new act would affect the electoral map of Canada, and surely they have the right to know as soon as possible what the possibilities are.

I do not want to anticipate argument on the act itself but I can indicate, now, that the opportunities for revision provided by that act are extremely limited; in fact, they are almost nil. It is not good enough that this information should be limited, as it is now, to members of the house who can walk down the street and have a good look. If these maps were tabled it would be common knowledge how the electoral map would be affected and I think it is essential that this be done. Regardless of the basis used by the representation commissioner used in drawing up these maps—and I do not know what staff he has—I would certainly be much more careful in my re-examination of the drawing up of the electoral map if I came to the conclusion that his staff worked on some purely mechanical formula and disregarded the other factors which we on all sides know must apply in the determination of new electoral boundaries.

On this basis I would urge the government to withdraw its opposition to this motion. After all, the Minister of Transport has indicated that this is not a motion of confidence. We believe we can convince hon. members opposite of the strength of our case. They know there is no whip lashing them on, and if a vote were to come they could support this motion.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): As I see it, this motion would never have been placed on the order paper and a request made for the production of the maps if the situation with regard to the work of the representation commissioner had been handled somewhat differently.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), who told us on another occasion that he had been working on this job for a whole year, perhaps misled the representation commissioner into performing certain exercises which may now turn out to have been completely unnecessary. As was said by the hon. member who preceded me, the Minister of Transport cannot expect the house to believe what he said on April 30, namely that these were just exercises which the commissioner was going through. I think the whole approach to this matter has been entirely wrong. The government has disclosed to us that maps have been drawn—I prefer to call them maps rather than exercises or tracings. Incidentally, I have not seen the version for the province of Manitoba so I do not know how the constituency I happen to represent will be affected. But I think the approach has been wrong. I think the commissioner should have started from the present constituency boundaries and, in preparation for dealing with the various commissions, considered in what respect those boundaries need to be changed instead of beginning the other way round with a mathematical exercise dealing with population and spreading out new boundaries all over the provinces. The rumours we have heard are that 75 or 80 per cent of the constituency boundaries are likely to be changed. I think it should be the other way round, and that constituency boundaries should remain as they are, unless there is some serious misrepresentation of the people taking place.

Then, I cannot help but wonder why the original exercise in drawing up these maps was based on a 10 per cent tolerance. Where did that figure come from? The bill before the house has a 20 per cent tolerance written into it; I know that the matter has not yet been settled by the house. But who gave authority to start from the basis of a 10 per cent tolerance or a 5 per cent tolerance? If the representation commissioner thought fit to do these exercises, why did he not begin with a 20 per cent tolerance? Why did he not try his hand with the suggestion which came from Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition of 33⅓ per cent tolerance? Why did he not use, as was suggested by the hon. member for Northumberland (Miss Jewett), a 25 per cent tolerance? Instead, the figure of 10 per cent was selected as a starting point. This figure was mentioned in the house during an interruption when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking, and, advocating as he was strict representation by population, he said: Ten per cent tolerance is what we favour.

Why did the commissioner select this 10 per cent tolerance as the figure on which he would work first? This is the type of thing which creates suspicion in the minds of members of this house and this is why the present motion is now before us. Who has been tinkering with this matter of redistribution? Why should we not have available for everybody to see these exercises in the use of the tolerance, so that we can make a sensible decision as to what should be written into the act and as to the instructions which this house should give for the guidance of the commissioners? I think it is of the greatest importance that the commissioners should find out from parliament what they are to do in this matter of redistribution. Unless the house expresses itself in directions and through the comments which are made here and which, I hope, the various commissions will look at; unless attention is paid to the act and these comments, the commissions might very easily be led astray and end up with redistribution maps which are contrary to the general will of parliament.

Why should we be kept in the dark with regard to this particular matter? How much better it would have been if the representation commissioner, taking the bill as it stands at the moment before the house with a 20 per cent tolerance, had drawn a certain number of adjustments based on that tolerance for the guidance of parliament. I think that would have satisfied the members of this house. Then we would be able to examine the bill before us to determine what is the fair and proper thing to do. Then we would be able to talk, not theoretically but on a practical basis with regard to the effect of redistribution. Then we would be able to see some of these great areas that are going to be affected in the northern parts of all the provinces, and the populations that are in those areas, and make a decision as to whether the tolerance should be larger or smaller, or whether we should take into consideration the point which I raised in the earlier debate on the bill with regard to some allowance for area representation.

Without the actual maps it is difficult for the house to determine what to do. I have not the faintest notion as to how the maps will affect the province of Manitoba; I have not seen the maps. I do not know whether it will be a fair and reasonable redistribution of the population factor there. I do know this, that people in their provincial elections are accustomed to variations between the large areas in the rural sections and the more closely congested, city areas. I have heard little complaint over the years with regard to that. There was considerable complaint a few years ago in Manitoba over the lack of representation for people living in the city of Winnipeg, but an adjustment has been made along that line and I have not heard much about it since. The consideration of fair play is in the minds of most Canadians in this country, and people who live in the congested areas within a city understand that they are not too seriously affected if the total population of their constituency is larger than that in these great, extensive northern areas.

But let us have the maps in front of us so we can see what is the effect, because if the maps are going to be based on a 10 per cent tolerance I think almost every constituency in Canada is going to be altered. I would much prefer to work the other way around and show cause why any constituency should have its boundaries altered.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the opportunity of speaking on this resolution introduced by the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau). I represent a constituency in a province that is supposed to lose four seats, and it is very important that not only hon. members who represent constituencies in Saskatchewan but also the people of Saskatchewan should know what is involved in this new redistribution. Unless we have the maps and unless we know what is involved in them, hon. members and the people of Saskatchewan will be kept in the dark. For instance, we know from the statistics that the four maritime provinces have a population of approximately 1,897,425 people and they are represented by 33 members; in other words, each member represents about 57,497 persons. The two prairie provinces which are supposed to lose members are Saskatchewan and Manitoba. These two provinces together are supposed to lose five members; but we have a population of 1,846,867, represented by 31 members, which is approximately 59,576 persons per member. As I have said, we are supposed to lose five members in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, while at the same time the maritimes are only supposed to lose one. I am not saying that the maritimes should lose more than one member, because this is a different story altogether; they have the senatorial floor and other guarantees. For example, Newfoundland has the guarantee that it cannot go below a representation of seven members.

If we in Manitoba and Saskatchewan lose another five members, the representation by one member will amount to over 71,000 people. This, in an area such as Manitoba and Saskatchewan, will mean it will be almost impossible for one member to properly represent this number of people. We are an agricultural area and are considered to be agricultural provinces. I say, Mr. Speaker, that if an exception was made for the maritime provinces with regard to the senatorial floor, and if there was an exception made for Newfoundland guaranteeing them not less than seven members, why in this case could there not be an exception made in the case of these two prairie provinces which will lose five members out of a representation of 31?

I think we should have these maps so we may see what has been done, particularly when the maps have already been drawn. Unless we are able to study them, these two prairie provinces will not know exactly what is involved. I should like to see the adoption of the resolution of the hon. member which asks that the maps be presented to the house for scrutiny. If these maps had not been drawn by the representation commissioner, that would be a different story; perhaps we would not have asked for them. But since they have been drawn and since some hon. members have seen them—I have not seen them and as far as I am concerned perhaps I do not even want to see them—we should have the opportunity of studying them so we know what is involved. I simply cannot understand why there is opposition to having these maps laid on the table for every member to see. I know that at the last redistribution in 1952 there was a provision in respect of Saskatchewan that this province would not lose more than 15 per cent of its seated members. If I am not mistaken, at that time we lost two seats. If we are to lose over 25 per cent this time, in my opinion this is unjust and unfair. I believe these maps should be available to hon. members for study.

As I said before, I do not think that this is fair. These provinces should receive equal treatment. I think we should work to see that this is done, because it would be unfair if the people in Manitoba and Saskatchewan were to lose over 25 per cent of their representation through this redistribution.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, there seems to me to be some misunderstanding regarding what has been drawn on these maps. Some hon. members have contended that very large maps have been drawn. I do not mind admitting that I am one of the members who have seen some of the mathematical exercises which have been drawn, including census districts, which would in fact meet the tolerances set out in the bill before us. But they are not maps; they are not recommendations; they are not even suggestions that these are the boundaries which should be set up. They are simply, as I said, an exercise, some of them at different tolerance levels.

Unless we were to request that all of these exercises be produced there would be a complete misconception of where these constituency boundaries may eventually lie. If some kind of map is published with a 10 per cent tolerance and another map published with a 20 per cent tolerance—and even the tolerance has not yet been settled—this will lead to a great deal of misunderstanding. Therefore I do not see any value in having these mathematical exercises tabled in this house or in having them made public.

Furthermore, any member of this house can, as far as I am aware, go down to the representation commissioner's office and see where the lines are drawn on these mathematical exercises. There is no problem in seeing them. I know that some of them appear to be acceptable to me, whereas others do not appear to be acceptable to me; but if we are going to retain the idea that the electoral boundaries are going to be drawn by an independent commission, I think we must understand that none of these so-called maps are either recommendations or suggestions. I think there would be a lot of confusion in certain areas if they were produced. We would lose the whole concept of the placing of redistribution into the hands of an independent body and would instead give every locality in Canada the impression that perhaps this is the way a given map was going to be drawn, with the result that some people would object.

There will certainly be problems in moving boundaries. We went through this sort of thing in Alberta a few years ago when we tried to make the hospital districts, the municipal districts and the school districts have coterminus boundaries. Where I live there were a few sections of land situated in three different local districts. These sections were in Brooks hospital district, the Medicine Hat school division, and in a municipal district known as a special area which had its office in Hanna, to the north. We discovered that the people who wanted to retain their traditional community of interest put more emphasis on hospitalization. Others were more interested in school affairs and wanted to retain their communication with Medicine Hat. Then others were more interested in municipal administration and wanted to retain their interest in Hanna.

The argument which was put up by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp) to the effect that bringing these maps before the house would not make any difference to the number of seats which would be lost by any one province I do not think is valid, because the tolerance has yet to be settled under clause 13 of the bill. Furthermore, if we are to retain the number of seats we now have in the house and merely divide them by the total population, then Saskatchewan, Manitoba, or any other province will have assigned to them a certain number of seats. Where the boundaries are drawn after that certain number of seats for each province has been decided will not be either helped or hindered by the publication of these mathematical exercises. Therefore, as I say, there will be a great deal of confusion if one of these exercises was published but not the others.

I think we should also stick to the principle enunciated and endorsed by the house in the first instance, namely that we are going to take the matter of redistribution out of parliament and put it in the hands of an independent commission. If we get embroiled in the question whether boundaries are going to be moved a little one way or another, I think the discussion will deteriorate into an interest in local affairs and we will lose the over-all concept which I believe is a good one. May I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows:

[Translation]

The hon. member for Chapleau concerning the possibility of diverting the James bay waters into the great lakes;

[Text]

The hon. member for Mackenzie concerning the increase in handling charges for grain due to low water levels of the great lakes;

[Translation]

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm concerning the canalization of the Richelieu river.

[Text]

The house will now resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administration—

1. Departmental administration including the national co-ordinating committee on agricultural services, contributions to commonwealth agricultural bureaux and a contribution to the agricultural economics research council in an amount equal to the contributions of the provinces but not exceeding $50,000, $3,368,900.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at five o'clock the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) was discussing item 1.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at five o'clock I was pointing out that, although the minister had indicated that the net income of farmers was greater in 1963 than in 1962 by some $37 million, most of which can be directly attributed to the extensive sales of grain, only two of Canada's provinces did in fact have an increase in net income over the past 12 months. I was dealing with the western provinces and we find that even in Manitoba the net income of farmers dropped $54 million in the last 12 months.

The figures I have placed on the record are only rounded and not detailed figures, but this is the government whose members went out on the hustings and said that their primary aim with regard to agriculture was to make the economic situation of the eastern farmers the same as that of the western farmers. Everyone believed that meant an increase in income. Today we take a dim view of the fact that western farmers, with the exception of two provinces, are in the same situation as the eastern farmers, with income on a downward trend.

I am one of the many thousands of farmers in Canada who feel that the opportunities for agriculture in the next 20 years will perhaps be greater than ever before in the history of this country. That is why I share the deep concern and uneasiness of farmers from coast to coast over conditions in farming as they actually exist today.

What are some of these conditions, Mr. Chairman? Let us deal with some of them in some detail. What about cattle? Cattle are important from coast to coast. If we look at the record we find that the average price for cattle over the past 12 months has been considerably lower. When the minister was questioned about this in the house he pointed out, and rightly so—we must give him credit—that prices were comparable with those in the United States, and in fact somewhat greater. He also pointed out that the people of Canada today are eating more beef than ever before, and this is also true. But when the United States was considering placing quotas on imports of cattle he was asked what Canada was going to do, and he said they were taking a long look at the situation. They did take a long look at it and while they were taking a long look at conditions in the United States Canada imported from Australia and New Zealand 41,000 cattle. Surely to goodness we must have some definite policy with regard to some of these difficulties in respect of various commodities.

What about hogs? Hogs are also important in the livestock industry. The average price of hogs was lower in the last 12 months. If the hon. member for Essex South has something to say, will he please get on his feet?

Mr. Whelan: I would be more constructive than you.

Mr. Danforth: I will deal with the hon. member for Essex South in a few minutes. I have a few choice ones for him. Not only did the hog producers of Canada not fill the domestic market but there were $12 million worth of pork products imported into Canada last year.

What about dairy products? The minister stated that for the first time the consumption of butter almost equalled the production of butter. This is great news to the dairy industry because it takes off the pressure that has been building up over the years. But the government placed the emphasis on the production of cheese and we now find ourselves with 40 million pounds of cheese in storage, an increase of 10 million pounds over last year. I am not going to deal with dairy policy in any detail because some of my colleagues who are experts in the field propose to do so. I should like to pass on to tobacco.

What is the policy of the government with regard to the great $100 million tobacco industry which finds itself in dire trouble? We have a marketing scheme for tobacco and that marketing scheme is in difficulty. The tobacco industry is in difficulty. As a matter of fact, the farmers are talking of voluntarily cutting to 55 per cent of production at a time when they should be increasing production. We find that conditions are forcing a decrease in production.

What about fruit and vegetables, one of the greatest industries in Canada? The men in the fruit and vegetable industry are looking with grave concern at the deliberations that are going on in GATT. I was interested to hear the Minister of Agriculture state that he spent a whole day with our negotiators on this very important subject. This is a most important subject because the Prime Minister himself said, in dealing with the negotiations at Geneva, that if we receive some concessions with regard to various products that Canada wishes to export we will have to give some concessions. The farmers of southwestern Ontario remember the last time this government wanted to play Santa Claus in that regard, because the concessions they gave directly affected the fruit and vegetable industry, which is most important to that area. As a matter of fact, their concessions in this regard set back the greenhouse growers and fruit and vegetable industry 20 years, and this was deliberately done by concessions in duty. It is most important that this industry be maintained, and it cannot be maintained if concessions do away with all the protection against imports from other countries.

What about soybeans? Surely the hon. member for Essex South knows what soybeans are, and surely he should be pressing the government to establish a policy with regard to the floor price on soybeans. What about the floor price on soybeans? In the last election members of the government stated it was absolutely necessary that the growers of soybeans and sugar beets should know exactly what the policy of the government was going to be by March, so they could plan their crops. The soybeans and sugar beets are going into the ground in my area, and yet the farmers do not even know what the policy of this government is in respect of them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the agriculture policy of this country should be the most important policy ever conceived. Today we do not even know if there is a policy. We have never heard of a policy. As a matter of fact, when we speak about the development of the agriculture industry, we find the minister mentioning research. He spoke about the co-operation of the farmers. However, he did not tell this house that last year Canada imported about $635 million worth of food products, half of which could have been produced on the farms of this country. This importation occurred in spite of the 8.5 per cent protection our dollar affords us against these imports.

No wonder the farmers of this country are becoming worried. They begin to wonder what will happen if they lose this 8.5 per cent protection. What will happen to the imports of New Zealand and Australian lamb, beef, butter and so on? What will happen when we lose this protection? What will happen if we lose further tariff protection as the result of these negotiations that are under way? No wonder the farmers are uneasy. They have not had any word about policy from this government.

In a speech made in the west recently the Minister of Agriculture stated the government had not been able to put any agricultural matters on the order paper. In his statement yesterday he corrected that assertion and said he did not mean it. He meant that because of the slowness in getting business through the house he was unable to bring forward any legislation in connection with agricultural policy. I should like now, Mr. Chairman, to refer to an article that appeared in the Country Guide dealing with the convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at Charlottetown. The article states that in addressing the convention the federal minister, Hon. Harry Hays, said it was time to take the next big step in the field of farm policy. He recognized this fact, but he indicated that the government planned over the next two years to introduce new provisions in the field of farm credit, crop insurance and a new plan to alleviate the capital cost of machinery. The minister refers to two years, Mr. Chairman, but the time is now. We must have a policy now. How can we plan for the future of Canadian agriculture if we do not know what the policy is going to be.

We are now going into the second year of this government's term of office, and yet not a single piece of legislation, with one exception, has been placed on the order paper. This one piece of legislation dealt with having two ministers of agriculture, one for eastern Canada and one for western Canada. This seems to have been a trial balloon, because the government has not even ascertained what the house thought about it. They have withdrawn it from the order paper. Since then we have not had one single piece of legislation introduced. The government promised the farmers of Quebec an eastern minister of agriculture who would be from Quebec. The government gave them one, but they brought him in by the back door. They had to divide the Department of Agriculture. They talk about the eastern farmer, who is the most trained technician, who has to farm under the most complicated conditions and with the greatest amount of investment. What did they do? They put his problem under the Minister of Forestry.

The farmers of this country have asked for direction and they got two ministers of agriculture. They asked for action in agriculture, and what did they get? They got a split-up in the Department of Agriculture. In referring to the split in agriculture, I should like to say we have one of the greatest departments of agriculture in the world. However, as a result of the actions of this government the senior officials of the Department of Agriculture did not even know what minister they were under for 30 days, and I call this the ultimate in confusion. Knowing all the complicated problems of the eastern farmer, they put those problems under the Minister of Forestry. The farmers asked for legislation, but as yet they have not seen a single piece of legislation brought forward.

After almost 14 months in office you would think that this government, which promised the farmers of this country so much, would be able to bring forward one piece of legislation of a constructive nature. We have been very proud of the fact that this government has carried out the policies laid down by the former government. This has been their policy in agriculture. There has been some moderation, but every time our policy was moderated it was done for one specific purpose only, and that was to reduce the expenditure of the Department of Agriculture regardless of what it did to disrupt the Canadian farmers' ability to earn a livelihood. I never thought I would be in a position to criticize the farm policy of my own party, but I do it to this extent; the farm policy laid down by the previous Conservative government was not the end, it was only the beginning. If the opposition does nothing else during this debate but arouse this government to some action on behalf of the farmers, the debate will have served its purpose and served it well. The activities of this government in regard to agriculture have made Napoleon's retreat from Moscow look like a Sunday school picnic.

Mr. Temple: I should like to speak for a few minutes this evening on the matter of agricultural chemicals, pesticides and insecticides and what seems to be happening in various parts of the world. As a result of the perhaps indiscriminate use of certain of these pesticides and insecticides in the United States, Sweden and Great Britain millions of wildlife in all forms have been destroyed. There are instances where all the young fish, the fry, have not come along and the fish population has been declining.

An intensive survey was made from Maine to Maryland in the United States concerning ducks, blacks and mallards, and the significantly lower mating rate for these birds feeding on lands that have been treated with certain of these insecticides and pesticides was noted. In Great Britain pesticides are reported to be responsible for the failure of the golden eagle to produce its young. In California pheasant eggs taken from pesticide treated land have produced considerably fewer chicks than eggs taken from land not treated. In the state of Maine the landlocked salmon from Sebago lake have contained d.d.t., and this has increased appreciably their mortality rates.

In New York state, the secretary of the interior of the United States, Stuart Udall, has stated that studies have "demonstrated conclusively" that failure of lake trout in lake George to reproduce has been caused by the presence of d.d.t. In New Hampshire again d.d.t. is linked to the high mortality of lake trout fry.

In Illinois the pesticide known as aldrin was used to treat 80,000 acres in an attempt to wipe out Japanese beetles. It wiped them out, but it also wiped out meadowlarks, robins, brown thrushes, starlings, grackles, and ringed necked pheasants, and substantially reduced the number of moles, shrews, cats and muskrats.

In Alabama the pesticide known as dieldrin was used to dust an area, with the result that 15 coveys of quail disappeared and 187 animals of 51 species were found dead in the area. Again, in another area in Illinois, dieldrin was used to wipe out Japanese beetles, and the same thing happened. Many species of wild life have virtually disappeared, and in some cases they have completely disappeared.

In Michigan and certain areas of Wisconsin d.d.t. was used against the Dutch elm tree disease, with the same result. The robin population in one Wisconsin town was reduced by 86 per cent.

This problem is considered so widespread and urgent in Sweden that scientists there have asked for substantial funds to devise a simple method of diagnosis and removal. We are perhaps rather fortunate that this has not happened in Canada to such a large extent, but I would like some assurance from the minister that funds will be made available for research on the question of these pesticides and insecticides.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I am more than pleased to follow the hon. member for Hastings-South because it gives me an opportunity to remind him that some 30 years ago I was in his riding, where I learned something about farming, and also something about English. I spent three years in his riding, and following him tonight brings back memories of names such as Dempsey, Johnny Babcock, Pecks and many others which I am sure he knows. Having said that I may now turn to my mother language and make a few remarks with regard to agriculture.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to miss this occasion of dealing with the farming industry and to tell the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) what our farmers at home think of him, of his program and of this government.

Mr. Chairman, it would be no news to you if I said that our eastern farmers, and more particularly those of the riding of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, are most disappointed and confused, because the federal government seems to have completely forgotten them.

What a difference there is between the speeches of those hon. gentlemen when they were sitting in the opposition and their present actions. When they were in the opposition, and more particularly during the elections of 1962 and 1963, hon. members who are now sitting on the treasury benches stated that they had an answer for every problem and promised that, if their government came into power, it would be paradise on earth, and our farming industry would know an unparalleled prosperity.

Speaking of farming, Mr. Chairman, I want to put officially on record some statements which were made during the 1962 session.

For instance, on October 4, 1962, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin), who was for a time a candidate for the position of minister of agriculture for the east, but who was left in the lurch and remained an ordinary member in spite of his ambitions, was always making sweeping statements. For instance, according to page 195 of Hansard of that date, he said:

> I shall point out the unconcern of the present government as regards any farming policy, and then I shall mention the solutions, or at least some of the solutions advocated by the Liberal party to meet those problems.

And a little further on, he stated:

> Our farmers are at the mercy of a trust shamefully constituted to exploit them to the fullest.

He was more particularly thinking of the dairy producers, and added:

> As a matter of fact, the farmers from the economic area of Montreal cannot reach the consumers' market of the metropolis without going through some big dairies, which subject our dairy producers to a sort of unilateral contract called "quota".

And still further on, the hon. member repeated:

> It is time our eastern farmers had someone to represent them and look after their interests in the cabinet.

Further on, he said:

> We, Liberals, also propose to change the Crop Insurance Act so as to make it really available to the farmers.
>
> It is not only in the west that crops are subject to weather conditions.

And further on again, he said:

> We will also succeed in securing new markets for our dairy products by financing, after an agreement with the school boards and through the provincial governments, free distribution of milk in all the Canadian schools.

That is what a member of this government had to say when he was on the opposition side. And the member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), in turn, stated, as is recorded on page 2687 of Hansard of the House of Commons:

> During the debate on that bill, it was suggested that grain elevators be built along the St. Lawrence river to enable western farmers to sell their feed grain directly to eastern farmers. I hope the Minister of Agriculture will not overlook these suggestions.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Béchard) did his bit, saying:

> Let us encourage and let us try, by every advertising means at our disposal, to promote consumption of our dairy products in their various forms.
>
> How many children, for instance, even the most fortunate, do not drink enough milk, when attending school?

And urged the government to distribute milk in schools.

Apparently, Mr. Chairman, the influence which the members of the province of Quebec have in the Liberal government amounts to very little, for we have seen nothing in the present government policy to make us hope that, shortly, the present Minister of Agriculture will implement the suggestion made to him by his colleagues in the province of Quebec.

But you will recall, Mr. Chairman, that it was fashionable at the time to make promises to obtain votes. Then came the election campaign during which these same people invaded more particularly the province of Quebec, but also the province of Ontario, promising the moon.

Mr. Chairman, I have here several copies of various election programs of the Liberal party in which it was said, for instance, that a Liberal government would appoint a separate Minister of Agriculture for eastern Canada. It is well known that such promise was made in order to win votes, especially in the province of Quebec. At the time it was known there was no unity of thinking in the Liberal party, but the promise was made just the same, because it was felt that the votes of the eastern farmers would be obtained if they were promised one of their own would represent them. As soon as the elections were over, a member residing in Outremont having very little knowledge, I believe, in agriculture, was chosen to be appointed Minister of Forestry; more particularly he will be responsible for administering the ARDA program, which, as is well known, Mr. Chairman, is a joint program which was initiated by the Tories and is specifically administered by the provincial government.

It is merely a wee bit of satisfaction which they sought to provide for a member from the province of Quebec in an attempt to keep the other ones quiet; it was with this mite of satisfaction that the Liberal cabinet hope to answer the purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that the farmers of the province of Quebec are keenly disappointed, for they are surely the first ones to feel the adverse effects of a lying and hypocritical campaign which was waged for the sole purpose of garnering votes.

Besides, let me point out that I have had the honour of defeating someone who was being hailed as the coming minister of agriculture for eastern Canada, in Mr. Pearson's cabinet.

It was Mr. Jean-Baptiste Lemoyne who had campaigned for a number of years among members of the Catholic farmers' union, before coming out in the open in the constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, where farmers settled his case by defeating him with a 3,600 vote majority in the very first year of the appearance of the Social Credit phenomenon.

The other day, on hearing the great statement of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, a very genial man, I recalled the days of my childhood; and I think you must have had the same impression. Back home we used to have two auctioneers. Auctioneers are very genial and persuasive people. I remember, in particular, Pit Leclerc, who was an auctioneer at St. Guillaume, and also old Charles Arpin. Just like the hon. Minister of Agriculture, those two auctioneers could sell a piano to a man who had wanted to buy a boat.

It seems to me that in the way he deals with the farm problem the Minister of Agriculture would like to use the same system as auctioneers to lead the farmers to believe he is giving them something, when in fact he does absolutely nothing for the farming class.

A few days ago, Mr. Chairman, in introducing his estimates the Minister of Agriculture depicted a most enthusiastic and alluring picture of agriculture and especially of eastern Canada farming. According to him, everything was fine, dairy farmers were making more money than ever before.

But if you take a good look at the facts, you will realize, for instance, that in the province of Quebec the farmers' income, for the year 1963 alone, was $12 million less than during the years the Conservative government was in office.

If we take a closer look at the prospects concerning the farmers, we see, according to a pamphlet entitled "Farm prospects in Canada—Spring 1964", a picture which is quite different from the one painted by the minister. I will not go as far as saying that he knowingly misrepresented the facts or misled the house, but I sincerely think that he is letting himself be carried away by his enthusiasm. Undoubtedly, because of his lack of knowledge of the situation, he gave information completely contrary to the facts.

According to the pamphlet I have in hand, you read, for instance, under the heading of "eggs and chicken":

> A larger production at lower prices is expected this spring and this summer, in comparison with last spring and last summer.

Those are the actual facts. Yet, the minister said that eggs commanded a higher price than before. But the facts put on record by farming experts say absolutely the contrary.

Further on it is said:

> In February the average price paid to producers in Toronto for class A large was 35.6 cents per dozen, as compared to 41 cents in February 1963.

In February 1963, a Conservative government was in office. I feel that the minister, before making his statements, should consider the facts and reflect on what he is going to say.

As far as chickens are concerned, again according to this pamphlet—

> An increase in the number of barbecue chickens and a decrease in prices can be expected in spring or at the beginning of summer as compared to 1963.

Instead of improving, the situation is worsening. Here again, I feel it is my duty, since the farmers in my riding entrusted me with this responsibility, to tell the Minister of Agriculture to check the facts carefully before making statements which tend to mislead the people.

As far as heavy turkeys are concerned, it is said that:

> In February, the average price paid to producers in London was 18.5 cents a pound, that is 1 cent less than last year.

Everything is fine. Prices are going down all the time, but we believe the Minister of Agriculture who says that everything is fine. Look at the facts: prices are going down, but the minister says that everything is all right.

As for the price of pork, here is what the pamphlet I have here says:

> Pork prices have been $2 or $3 lower per 100 pounds as compared to last year—Prices will go up during the summer but they will not be as high as last year.

Here again, we have evidence that prices are going down. And the pamphlet goes on to say:

The national average price for class A pork was $25.48 at the beginning of March as compared to $26.77 in January and February.

Prices are going down, but everything is all right; the Minister of Agriculture tells us that everything is fine.

Now, here is what I read for sheep and lamb:

Following the small seasonal arrivals of lamb this spring, prices should increase until July, but will reach a level $2 less per 100 pounds as compared to those of last year.

Last year prices reflected the policy of a Conservative government.

About cattle:

Feeder steer exports have gone down to about 35 per cent of those of last year, but they should increase slightly next spring and summer.

In eastern Canada, veal calf sales have increased by 6 per cent and the very large seasonal arrivals should keep up until the end of May. Arrivals decreased a bit in the west and little change is expected. Prices will go down until June, but probably not more than $2 per cwt. lower than the price of $31.60 received on March 14.

There is good news for you. The farmers will merely lose $2 per hundredweight on their cattle.

Now, if you wish, Mr. Chairman, let us have a very quick look at the Conservative program at the time we were in office.

The minister would probably be interested to know that, in my constituency of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot alone, because they elected a Conservative government in 1957 and brought it back in office in 1958, the farmers received, through the 25 cent subsidy per 100 pounds of milk, the sum of $1,516,221. With respect to the 12 cent consumer subsidy paid to dairy factories in my constituency, the Conservative government paid an amount of $867,246. In addition, it paid $306,536 and some odd cents in subsidies to sugar beet growers. Those amounts total about $2,690,000.

Therefore, looking at those figures, one finds that farmers in my constituency lost more than $2.5 million by electing a Liberal government in 1963.

I do not exaggerate, Mr. Chairman, when I say that the farmers of my riding deeply regret that the Conservative party was defeated in 1963.

Under the Conservative government, what was the net income per farm in the province of Quebec compared with what it was in 1954?

For 1954, the income was $1,671 and, in 1961, it reached $1,946 under a Conservative government.

When the gentlemen opposite claim that we did nothing for farmers I ask them to consider the facts and also to imitate us. If they adopt the policy which we followed when we were in power the farmers' lot will improve.

Now, what was the value of the sales of farm properties in the province of Quebec for 1954, 1955 and 1961? It increased from $11,166 million to $18,606 million under a Conservative government.

I would have many other facts to point out to the house, Mr. Chairman, but as other members wish to speak this evening, I will restrict myself and touch on only a few matters which I wanted to discuss.

After having heard the Minister of Agriculture on several occasions say and repeat that farmers had obtained more money than previously for their milk since he became Minister of Agriculture, I take the liberty of putting on the record figures given by the dominion bureau of statistics.

As for the price of milk, in the province of Quebec, for the years 1953 to 1963: in August 1953, the price of milk varied from $2.34 to $2.56. When we came to power in 1957, the price of milk used to make milk powder, ranged from $2.42 to $2.62 and under the Conservative government in 1962 it went up from $2.75 to $3 per hundredweight.

As for the price of milk for cheese production, it went from $2.45 to $2.76 for 100 lbs. in 1956, to $2.85 to $3.05 in 1962.

These official figures tell eloquently what the Conservative party did while it had the responsibilities of government. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to take those facts into account.

Now, just a few words, Mr. Chairman, to tell the house that the present policy followed by the Minister of Agriculture, as far as dairy products are concerned, has certainly been detrimental to the farm people who, as usual, are going to pay the costs.

It will be remembered that last year when he announced his new policy a few days prior to May 1, the minister said this new policy would result in a saving of $6 million per year. This year, when he announced his new policy, he said that it would result in a further saving of $3.5 million per year. This makes a total amount of close to $10 million, more exactly a saving of $9.5 million at the expense of farmers.

I would ask the minister to explain how he can save $9.5 million at the expense of the farming class, while claiming at the same time to protect their best interests.

I should like to deal in more detail with this policy which I consider disastrous for the farmers. It must be noted that the price of a pound of butter fat has dropped from 14½ cents to 13.3 cents, which will surely result in a loss for farmers.

The 30 cents premium for milk used in the manufacture of cheddar is also removed, being replaced by a payment of 3.6 cents a pound for Canadian cheddar of first quality. This can only cause serious disadvantages to the farming classes.

What will happen, for instance, to farmers who make every effort to produce a prime quality product but are unable to produce cheese of premium quality owing to dirty milk cans or unsatisfactory handling?

You realize that the farmer while offering a quality product will be penalized for an error of which he is innocent.

It is especially unfair for the dairy producers in my riding, because all of them really try to produce a better quality product.

I am of the opinion that the minister should revise his policy so as not to subject the farmers to an unjust treatment which might befall them on account of this new policy.

I ask the minister what would happen if a cheese maker ventured not to hand down to his producers the equivalent of 3.6 cents a pound the government pays.

Would the government take some disciplinary measures so that the farmers may not be deprived of their due or would the whole question be at the discretion of the manufacturer? I feel that this policy—like all the others which the government has put forward since it has been in power—was badly conceived and does not show any desire to act in the best interests of farmers. It should be revised and thought out again to render justice to our farmers.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Laverdière: Mr. Chairman, I must commend the previous speaker, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard), for the interest he has just shown for the farmers of eastern Canada.

I commend him for this interest, because we now need every person of goodwill in order to provide the farmers of eastern Canada, and more particularly those of the province of Quebec, with the income to which they are entitled.

At this stage of the debate on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, I would like to make a few remarks concerning the economic situation of farmers in this country, and particularly concerning the deplorable situation which faces the farmers of eastern Canada.

As a matter of fact, the farm people in eastern Canada are clearly the most neglected members of the working class. For a very large number of eastern farmers, if not most of them, the situation is worse than for the unemployed who get unemployment insurance benefits, because those farmers who work at least 15 hours a day, get an income which is sometimes lower than the benefits paid to people out of work.

In the light of that situation, in view of the almost exasperating slowness to introduce legislation to help those farmers, and in particular those in the riding of Bellechasse, who are among the most neglected, as I will prove later on, it is my duty to draw the attention of the house to the need for closer co-operation by all hon. members to alleviate such obvious human misery.

I should like first of all, Mr. Chairman, to give a brief outline of the agricultural situation in my riding on the basis of the 1961 census. It will be noted that the situation has worsened instead of improving since then.

There are in the riding of Bellechasse 2,002 farms, 1,373 of which are considered as commercial farms, that is farms with a gross agricultural income of at least $1,200, which means that 629 farms have a gross income of less than $1,200. In this latter group, however, 156 farms should at least provide a sufficient income to the farmer since, for the 1,373 commercial farms, the gross income amounts as follows: Three of these yield a gross income of more than $25,000; 16 only show an income of $15,000 to $25,000; there are 58 with an income between $10,000 and $15,000; 268 yield an income of $5,000 to $10,000; 186 have an income of $3,750 to $5,000; 289 show an income of $2,500 to $3,570. But most of them, that is 553, have a yearly income of $1,200 to $2,500.

Mr. Chairman, we must come to the conclusion that 42 per cent of the farmers in my riding have a yearly income of less than $2,500. These are farms considered as marginal since obviously such an income is far from being sufficient to cover the cost of administering the farm, paying school and municipal taxes, purchasing seeds, maintaining buildings and farm machinery, purchasing equipment, etc. and providing for the essential needs of the family, including the education of the children, a point which concerns me more particularly.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud that there should be, in the riding of Bellechasse as in the rest of the province, an elite of farmers, people who are fairly well off because many of them settled on the better farms and had the technical and agricultural know-how which enabled them to adapt themselves faster to the development of that industry.

When one speaks of marginal farms in Canada, one immediately thinks of farmland in the maritime provinces. I should like to point out that approximately 38 per cent of the farmers in those provinces have a gross income of less than $2,500 while, as I said, 42 per cent of the farmers in my riding are in a similar situation as compared with 37 per cent for the whole of Quebec.

And there again, I do not even take into account the 629 farms whose gross operating income is less than $1,200 a year.

Mr. Chairman, looking at this situation it is easy to understand why the farmers in my riding are complaining. You must admit that they have every reason to. That is why I am as impatient as all the farmers in Bellechasse to see beneficial and logical farm legislation introduced in the house. I must stress also how urgent it is to recognize without delay the riding of Bellechasse as a designated area under ARDA and also as an economically weak area.

Other details must also be given to give a clear picture of the situation. I do not want to take too much time, but I would like to underline a point which I feel has some importance.

In our province, an average of six people derive their living from each farm, and the figures are the same for my constituency. The average is 4.6 in New Brunswick, four in Ontario and three only in Saskatchewan, that is just half the average for Quebec.

The 1961 census statistics reveal many other handicaps, especially as far as farm machinery is concerned.

All provinces considered as poor as far as agriculture is concerned suffer from a lack of mechanization. In those provinces—Quebec, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia—the number of tractors, for instance, is lower than the number of farms, while in the other provinces, it is greater than the number of farms. A parallel similar to this one would be easy to establish for other farm machinery necessary these days, such as threshers, combines, hay binders and harvesters, etc.

Furthermore, a number of farmers have difficulty in meeting their payments on machinery bought on terms from regional agents. Unfortunately, several farmers pay on this essential machinery an interest reaching 15 per cent and more.

I believe this situation is due mainly to too strict an enforcement of the law when the farmers are trying to get loans from the Farm Credit Corporation. On account of the endless red tape and the constant uncertainty connected with getting reasonable loans, too many unfortunately, conclude arrangements with companies whose craving for profits knows no bounds.

It is, therefore, easy to understand that the dissatisfaction of a large number of farmers from the Bellechasse riding, as well as from others, is based on real facts. I do not want, therefore, to go counter in any way to their legitimate claims.

One could produce many other facts that would obviously show the unfortunate position of the majority of eastern farmers; hence my interest in everything that concerns agriculture in Canada.

I deem it my duty to give an account of the agricultural problem as regards my province as well as my constituency. I suggest that such a way of dealing with the problem pertains to sound democracy, providing that I take care not to lean to narrow-minded regionalism. A democratic society must listen to those for whom the elected government has to legislate in the interests of the population as a whole without prejudice as well as without favouritism towards any social class whatsoever and without settled prejudice as regards one area or another.

That is the reason why I wished to tell my colleagues and the government about some of our farmers' problems in the light of official statistics, although they go back to 1961.

All of the Quebec farmers are not poor or backwards in farm techniques. My province has its elite farmers; they are progressive and well-off. Unfortunately, eastern farmers established on naturally rich land are an exception.

Furthermore, farm techniques have been developed so quickly over the past few years that many farmers could not keep up with progress, either because of lack of knowledge, capital, equipment, guidance or other causes.

I would like here to express my greatest admiration to the eastern farmers who have succeeded in making both ends meet, for not all of them are well located or organized as far as various advantages are concerned: their success is primarily due to very hard work, to their unflinching ambition and to their love for the soil they till. The love of those farmers for their work is a constant inspiration to all Canadians who have a sense of responsibilities and who do not shy away from hard work.

It is imperative that this government, throughout logical and sound farm legislation, help all eastern farmers as soon as possible, especially in creating markets and stable prices for agricultural products; that would be in the interest of the general economy of the country. It must be borne in mind that a higher standard of living for the eastern farmer means a higher standard of living for the whole of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, about ten years ago, a Liberal government set up a Senate committee to inquire into the whole problem of agriculture and into the means of making better use of farm land.

If my information is correct, that inquiry led to the passing of one of the most interesting piece of legislation by the previous government: the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, known as ARDA.

This government intends to give as much scope as possible to ARDA. That is why this important service comes under the Department of Forestry, which has less to do and is less diversified than the Department of Agriculture.

The responsibilities regarding the needs for eastern feed grains will also be transferred to that department.

Eastern farmers are badly in need of ARDA. It is also very urgent for them that the western grain policy be revised and greatly improved.

As a matter of fact, it is absolutely essential that drastic steps be taken to eliminate completely and as soon as possible all speculation on that grain which eastern farmers cannot do without.

Mr. Chairman, I could not help but be deeply touched by the sympathy expressed by the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton), during the brilliant statement he made when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were brought before us. I also remember very well the statement he made last fall, on December 12, on the quite painful situation in which eastern farmers found themselves. He had every reason to maintain that it was a real shame for the Canadian population that the standard of living of one fourth of the farm people of eastern Canada should be so low.

Mr. Chairman, you can be sure that I am convinced of the deep sincerity of the hon. member; there is no reason why I should suspect him on that point. However, I must say that his belated sincerity bewilders me since, to my knowledge, during the years he headed the very important department of agriculture, not a single major piece of legislation was adopted to help marginal farms which are so numerous in Quebec, for instance. Perhaps he meant well but what good are intentions without deeds?

On April 24 last the hon. member for Qu'Appelle said amongst other things:

> Last December during my remarks on the estimates I asked the minister whether he had knowledge of the farm survey we conducted in 22 districts of eastern Canada in January, 1963.

I presume that the hon. member has drawn from this inquiry a great deal of material to build up his argument showing the sad situation of the eastern farmers for the speech he delivered last autumn. I have not read the report of this inquiry. However, I looked into it and found, on page 46, a really surprising excerpt, I would say "shocking" to repeat the term used by my hon. colleague; this excerpt is as follows:

[Text]

> Comparing the same two provinces, Saskatchewan and Quebec, in the last year of record, 1961, the average net income of farmers in the province of Saskatchewan exceeded that of the Quebec farmers by 315 per cent. On the average of the past three years, which included a disastrous drought year in Saskatchewan, the net income of Saskatchewan farmers exceeded that of their compatriots in Quebec by almost 200 per cent.

[Translation]

And yet, faced with such a situation, the then minister of agriculture had the government pass direct assistance subsidies, I repeat, direct assistance subsidies, for prairie farmers.

Here are the details: In the main estimates for 1958-59, $41.3 million, in the main estimates for 1960-61, $40.5 million, in the main estimates for 1961-62, $40.5 million. However, I find no reference on the same page to the effect that such subsidies that were surely much needed, were paid to eastern farmers whose income was 315 per cent less than that of prairie farmers.

Moreover, in the same document, on page 64 of the main estimates for 1962, I find the following items under the Department of Agriculture out of $289.3 million in agricultural estimates: "Assistance to grain storage in western Canada": $49 million; "board of grain commissioners": $6.5 million; "Prairie Farm Emergency Fund": (deficit) $49.5 million; "Payments to western grain producers" (direct assistance): $40.5 million; "Redevelopment and rehabilitation projects": $26.6 million; that is a total of $172.1 million.

Therefore, out of a total of $289.3 million, $172.1 million were paid exclusively to western farmers, leaving only $117.2 million for the administration of a department of vital importance and for assistance provided to the whole country and moreover, here again, western Canada got its share like other areas of the country. It must be recognized that for eastern farmers, the milk was rather thin and not very nourishing.

Mr. Cyr: It was buttermilk.

Mr. Laverdière: It seems to me that it would have been appropriate to show a little sympathy at that time; we might have today a policy of assistance to the eastern provinces which would be in full force and we would be now in a better position to carry on the work which would have been prepared.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Laverdière: Mr. Chairman, it would take me just a couple of minutes more to conclude my remarks, and with the unanimous consent of the house I would be able to do so.

[Text]

The Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Laverdière: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I also thank all the hon. members because they have allowed me to continue. I feel that I must thank them.

Under the circumstances, I shall add only a few words to my remarks. I want especially to mention this: I do not want people to think by the remarks I just made that there is any opposition from those I represent, namely the eastern farmers in general, to the assistance given to and received by the western farmers, because otherwise, it would only widen the gap which has often existed between the east and the west. However, we have to recognize the facts as they are.

For the good of the country, of confederation and of agriculture also, there must be an understanding between eastern and western Canada. One region can help the other and each can complete the other, especially in the production of feed grain which is so urgently needed for our eastern cattle.

I insist, however, that justice be rendered to those poor eastern farmers who have a right to all the advantages that the Department of Agriculture can offer.

I urge all my colleagues in opposition to get the government to be generous in all the policies that might help the economic recovery of our marginal farms, much too numerous in eastern Canada. The owners of those farms have shown extraordinary courage until now, otherwise the situation would be even worse than it is today.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that I heard a while ago about the appointment to an important post in the Department of Agriculture of a bilingual employee, Mr. Robert Thomas. French speaking farmers are not spoiled when it comes to getting services from employees who can understand their language in that department. I think it is the first time that a bilingual employee has been appointed to an important post within the last few years.

As a French Canadian, I hope that is only a beginning. Today's farmers, thanks to easier means of transportation and more active farm organizations, come here to discuss their problems with the officials of the departments which have the duty to guide them and offer them the necessary leadership.

They come to Ottawa more often than before. On the other hand, I would like to see that farmers who come to Ottawa as a delegation in the next few years to meet with officials of the Department of Agriculture get more—as one farmer put it a few months ago —than an English lesson.

[Text]

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity of making a few comments on this first item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. I would like to direct my thoughts specifically to the problem of rail line abandonment. We from western Canada are particularly concerned about it, and when I say that I am also thinking of the ciitzens in eastern Canada. But because the problem has become more pronounced and apparent in western Canada I would like to concentrate on that area because I am more familiar with the problem there.

When the government came into office with the fanfare of 60 days of decision we looked forward to its carrying on some of our good agricultural policies, and to its putting something into effect so far as rail line abandonment was concerned. Instead of having 60 days of decision we had 60 days of indecision and indiscretion. In fact, it has stretched out now to 385 days of indecision. Responsibility, originally invested in the former minister of transport, now President of the Privy Council, was transferred to the present Minister of Transport and is now placed in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture. We are wondering what this will-o'-the-wisp policy really means.

I should like to put some background information on record and in order to do this I cannot do better, I feel, than quote part of a message directed to the Saskatchewan farmers' union on December 6 of last year by the former minister of agriculture, my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle. I should like to read some of this information into the record because I think it is pertinent and that it may help the present minister when he does decide to take some action regarding this problem:

> We sometimes tend to forget that up until a few years ago westerners were deeply and constantly concerned over the steady spiralling of freight rate charges. Since the war the cumulative effect of freight rate increases in percentage form was staggering. This was one of the major problems faced by the new government elected in 1957.
> To gain time to find a fundamental solution to our difficulties we put a stop to freight increases by paying a national subsidy to the railways. Meanwhile the royal commission under the direction of M. A. MacPherson of Regina set about the task of getting at the fundamental problems facing the railway industry. You will recall that Mr.

M. A. MacPherson for many years had been the acknowledged spokesman for western Canada, I think it is correct to say that he had the confidence of prairie governments regardless of political affiliation.

The chief western complaint was that freight rate increases were loaded on the captive market of the prairie provinces, the maritimes, and our northern areas. Competition kept the rates down in the heavily populated areas of Quebec and Ontario.

The royal commission saw this problem very clearly. On page 34 of volume 1 of their report these words can be found:

"The commission is convinced that consideration can only effectively be given to these and many other special problems in the light of the wider context dealt with in this volume of its report. First, there are basic and broad correctives to be applied through changes in public policy which are necessary to help the railways find their proper place in the increasingly competitive transportation environment.

The recommendations we will make in this volume will be designed to remove from rail shippers, particularly from those whose opportunity of using alternative forms of transport is limited or non-existent, the heavy burden of obligations left on the railways as a legacy from another day. By the same token these recommendations should allow the railways as business corporations to take their rightful place in the Canadian transportation scene."

To make the position of the railways viable and keep them operating, the report, in general, recommended the elimination of passenger service in those areas where the people were not using these services. Second, that the railways should be allowed to abandon certain light density lines or that the government pay a subsidy on those individual lines where it was in the national interest to maintain operation. There was no recommendation that the Crowsnest pass agreement be abolished, but a recommendation was made where the railways could prove loss that a variable subsidy should be paid to make up the difference. As I understand it, this recommendation means that in years when there is heavy grain movement on a certain line and no losses resulted the government would not have to pay any subsidy, but in years when there was light traffic the railways could claim for subsidy up to the amount of loss.

Now I should like to put on record at this point something which I believe is very interesting in view of the fact that the railways have made so many applications for branch line abandonment in western Canada. I will quote from the Globe and Mail of March 10, 1964. The heading reads: "Rail Revenue 4-Year High, C.P.R. Says".

The highest railway revenue since 1959 was reported yesterday by the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., in its 1963 annual report. Railway revenue was $477,197,937, compared with $453,169,224 the previous year and $477,806,000 in 1959.

This reflects the result, in a large measure, of the heavy volume of grain shipments from western Canada. The Winnipeg Tribune, dealing with the same news report in an editorial published on April 3, had this to say under the heading "Odd Increase":

The Canadian Pacific Railway seems to have had a pretty good year in 1963 judging from the annual report made public this week. Railway revenues—that is, the part of C.P.R. income coming directly from railway operations—amounted to more than $477 million, an increase of more than $24 million over 1962.

Freight revenue accounted for $419 million of the total take. This represented an increase of $25.8 million over the preceding year or 7 per cent. Freight traffic volume increased by 12 per cent and, according to the report, grain shipments resulting from the Chinese, Russian and other wheat sales contributed heavily to the increase. But it was not only revenues that increased, profits increased as well. The net earnings actually rose by more than $6.2 million over 1962.

It's rather odd that C.P.R. freight profits increased at a time when grain shipments increased.

Now, this is the pertinent part:

The railways have long and vigorously contended that they were losing money on the Crowsnest pass rates charges for hauling grain. If this contention is valid, the railways should have shown a marked decline in revenues when they hauled record shipments of grain to seaboard.

Maybe the railway accountants should take another look. Or better still, maybe some outside accountants should sharpen their pencils in a definitive examination of the Crowsnest rates.

I think this is a very important and practical thought in relation to the applications which are now before the board of transport commissioners for permission to abandon large mileages of railway track.

I should like to continue by giving a little more background and then to deal specifically with the situation in Saskatchewan. First, I wish to discuss some of the factors which affect our thinking, and the courses of action now to be taken—I am quoting, now, from the address by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle which I previously mentioned.

In the first place the previous government worked long and hard on a bill to put our views of the royal commission recommendations into legislative form. That bill was finally ready for introduction in the parliament that met first in September 1962. Being of such vital importance to the economy of Canada as a whole and to the grain areas of the prairies in particular, considerable effort was put into consultation with various groups that had heavy financial interest in our projected proposals. If took some months to arrange, but we finally were successful in bringing the railway companies and the grain handling companies of western Canada together in a meeting. There were extremely frank views expressed at this meeting, but the most important fact was the recognition of their mutual interests.

In layman's language everybody recognized the fundamental place of railways in our economy. The railways recognized the tremendous financial investments by the great grain co-operatives and private companies and thereby the need for a high level of co-ordination between the railways and grain companies in any plans for abandonment. Therefore this conference achieved the understanding that was necessary before any solutions could be expected. I believe I am reasonably fair in saying that there has been relative peace between these two groups even though by sheer economic interest there tends to be some continuing suspicion.

In addition to the pure economic interests there is the far greater problem of the public interest both social and economic. For this reason, in January 1963 the government called into conference the three premiers of the prairie provinces. It outlined in general the principle of the federal government's legislation and the several methods in the act that protected the public interest. Then the discussion went on into the field that was not covered by the proposed bill and which could only be met by the utmost co-operation between the provincial governments and the federal government representing the public interest. This was the impact on communities, if railway abandonment took place. Certain types of compromises based on the circumstances in any particular locality were discussed. The pledge was given by the federal government that after the bill was introduced and its terms were known future joint discussion should take place that would lead to a co-operative solution of any difficulties that might arise. Once again I believe I am fair in saying there was general agreement on the method of working together to resolve difficulties.

I believe I am also correct in saying that from a consensus of opinion that before any abandonment took place there should be a study of western Canada, region by region, to see that any dislocations were kept to a minimum. For example in a purely hypothetical case, suppose that three or four lines in one area were operating at a loss the railways would put in requests that each of these lines might be abandoned. However, a study of the region might indicate that if one of these lines were abandoned the other two or three might become economic; therefore it follows that any decision to abandon should be made with the economic future in mind.

The above description of happenings in the fall of 1962 up to January, 1963 puts the events of the last 11 months into clearer perspective. The government changed in April, 1963. Naturally the new government would want time to decide on its course of action.

I think I have put enough on the record, Mr. Chairman, as far as the policy of the former government is concerned, to put this problem into perspective and to indicate that the groundwork was thoroughly laid by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and his capable minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. As a result of this, we felt, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, that action would have been taken by the present government, but so far it has been a matter of great concern to western people in particular, and I think to all Canadians, that this very vital problem has not been attacked.

To put this matter into more particular perspective as far as Saskatchewan is concerned, I have in my hand a table which gives figures up to November 6, 1963. It deals with approximately 1,392 miles of railroad. That is a considerable amount of railway line, and it does not include a lot of the applications that we thought might have come in, because when I was a member last fall of the sessional committee on railways, shipping and air lines I asked the president of the C.N.R. how his figures compared with those of the C.P.R., and he intimated to the committee that the C.P.R. had been reluctant to date to bring in applications for rail line abandonment. I think this is rather unfair, for the simple reason that it does create a little difficulty in getting the whole picture into perspective. I inquired of the witness why he thought this was the case, and he suggested that, possibly because the C.P.R. was a free enterprise company, they did not want to divulge personal information to their competitors. Nevertheless this table points up just how serious is this matter to the people of Saskatchewan.

The table deals with 31 subdivisions. I am just going to run over them briefly: Avonlea, Amiens, Aborfield, Bengough, Blewett, Bodo, Bolney, Beechy, Corning, Cudworth, Colony, Cutknife, Carlton, Chelan, Central Butte, Dodsland, Gravelbourg, Goodwater, Kisby, Mantario, Main Centre, Porter, Rhein, Riverhurst, Stewart Valley, White Bear, Weyburn and Avonlea, Tonkin (Yorkton-Parkview), Tonkin (Yorkton-MacNutt), and St. Brieux. Going back, Mr. Chairman, and being a little more definitive, in the subdivision of Avonlea, which takes in Radville-Avonlea, there are five towns or villages, with six elevators affected. There are 217 permit holders in this particular subdivision. The six elevators have a capacity of 282,500 bushels, with an average turnover of 796,907 bushels; and 165 residents are affected. That just gives an example.

Coming to my constituency of Moose Mountain, we have the Blewett-Luxton subdivision, where there are three villages or hamlets, with three elevators, the total capacity of which is 77,000 bushels. There are 76 permit holders and approximately the same number of families. Going down to Corning on this list, which is the Peebles-Handsworth subdivision, there are three villages or towns, seven elevators are affected, with a total capacity of 289,000 bushels. The annual turnover is 975,304 bushels. The total population affected is 345 people.

Then dealing with the Goodwater-Radville subdivision, there are two villages, with five elevators affected and 164 permit holders. There are 193 residents involved. The total capacity of the elevators is 289,200 bushels. Going to Kisby, the Weyburn-Stoughton subdivision, there are four villages or towns, seven elevators and 198 permit holders. To put these figures of permit holders into perspective, Mr. Chairman, we have, under the quota system in western Canada, roughly 225,000 or 226,000 permit holders. Approximately half of these permit holders are in the province of Saskatchewan. Therefore when I say there are 198 permit holders in one area, you can see how adversely affected is agriculture in this particular subdivision when there are so many permit holders.

To crystallize this a little better I will give the total figures of the Saskatchewan applications to date under the C.P.R. and C.N.R. The total number of towns and villages affected in the 1,392 miles of proposed rail line abandonment are 187. Just picture that, Mr. Chairman. There are a total of 426 elevators and 14,850 permit holders. These are people adjoining the proposed railway line abandonments. The total elevator capacity of these 426 elevators is 26,987,700 bushels, and the average turnover per year over the last 10 years was 49,556,124. This figure refers to the 426 elevators. The total population affected—this is the number of people who live adjoining these lines—is 22,588. So it becomes apparent that the social and economic life of a great many people will be seriously affected by whatever policy is adopted with respect to rail line abandonment. This is why it becomes so serious in the minds of the people of western Canada.

It is true that I, the hon. member for Mackenzie, the hon. member for Lisgar and the hon. member for Rosthern—and I could name a dozen other hon. members in the house—have been putting questions to the Minister of Transport over the past year as to when action was going to be taken. He always fielded these questions by saying, "We have adopted the policy of the previous government. We have declared a moratorium on rail line abandonment". The government figured this answered the question. But it did not answer the question, because this haze of uncertainty has been hanging over the heads of these people.

One might say: "Leave that well alone; why worry?" But let us take the elevator companies. They have invested a large amount of money in these 426 elevators. From time to time it is customary to repair them, and occasionally they have to be moved or even torn down. There is a pall of uncertainty hanging over their heads. They do not know whether to repair them or to move them. In some of these small towns and villages people have carried on a family business for years. Their forefathers opened a small business in the town which has been handed down from father to son for several generations. Their life savings are tied up in it. They may also have the post office as a sideline and other businesses tied in too. If it is a large town they may have several businesses in that town.

These people will be adversely affected if the rail line is wrapped up and their trading centre disappears, and they would like to know whether to take advantage of the small loans legislation introduced by the former government and modernize their plant, or whether they should try and open up a business some other place and re-establish themselves. Some of the oil companies which are developing in certain areas of Saskatchewan are using the railroads to a large extent for the transportation of oil. If the rail lines serving these people are going to be wrapped up, then should they develop trucking systems or a gathering system through the use of pipe lines? These are matters which will have to be planned for by the oil companies.

Another major problem concerns the municipalities themselves who might be affected by rail line abandonment. They have a co-operative or reciprocal agreement with their provincial government to develop transportation facilities, and this planning has been in force for a matter of ten years or more. If rail lines are to be abandoned and roads provided as an alternative to enable farmers to be able to market their grain, it will take several years of budgeting at large expense to the taxpayers in order to provide these facilities so that these people will not be too adversely affected by sudden change. These are some of the problems arising in connection with the procrastination and apparent indifference of the present government in dealing with this matter.

I do not want to labour this point, but I should like to say that No. 31 on the list of public bills is a bill standing in my name, Bill No. C-57, dealing with another aspect of rail line abandonment. I would urge the minister to bring in legislation to solve this problem and to give very serious consideration to the principles outlined in my proposed Bill No. C-57. I think that here is a concept or a principle which, if it is incorporated into government legislation, will help ease the blow when rail line abandonment becomes effective. I would ask the minister and his department to give special attention to this matter. I refer to my bill tonight because I do not think I will have the opportunity to do so later, due to the fact that my bill is so far down the list. Therefore, I again urge the government to take immediate, effective and active steps to develop this legislation. As I pointed out earlier in my remarks, the groundwork has been developed. The government do not have to do a lot of missionary work which the former government had to do. It is only a question of taking the bill which the former government prepared and perhaps with a few adjustments or amendments bring it before the house and pass it through. When this is done this heavy cloud of apprehension which is hanging over the people in western Canada will disperse.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, since we are dealing with the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, I feel duty bound to express my views on this subject which concerns the greater part of the people of the riding of Lotbinière. It is a fact that my constituency is essentially agricultural and does constitute one of the most typical of rural regions, where it is of the utmost importance to apply a well-defined agricultural policy.

Mr. Chairman, I have hardly been here a year, but I have found to my great disappointment that, when our Conservative friends criticize the agricultural policy of the present government—

Mr. Pigeon: You have none.

Mr. Choquette: —the automatic reply from the lips of government members is this one: What prevented you from doing that during the five years you were in office?

Mr. Chairman, this is becoming childish and we sometimes hear people belonging to new parties say: We are under the impression that Conservatives and Liberals are anything but different. That is exactly the impression we should avoid.

As for farm policy, drastic reforms are imperative. Of course, a great deal of improvement has been made and I will have the opportunity, later on, to refute the authenticity of the figures quoted by the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) when he criticized the policy recently announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays).

Mr. Chairman, I feel that a drastic reform of agriculture is imperative and more particularly as far as eastern agriculture is concerned.

A few minutes ago I heard the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Laverdière) quoting some figures—

The Chairman: Order. Shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the acting house leader what is the business for Friday, and Monday and Tuesday if he can give that to us.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will take up the second reading of Bill No. C-91, to amend the Income Tax Act. When this is concluded we will consider the resolution to set up the special committee to continue the consideration of matters relating to defence.

Then we will take up second reading of Bill C-90, an act to amend the National Defence Act. Then we will consider the resolution preceding a bill to authorize certain crown corporations to pay certain provincial fees and taxes. If that is concluded we will consider the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act.

Mr. Churchill: Is that for Friday, Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. MacNaught: Friday, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, until they are finished and in that order.

Mr. Churchill: That is quite a change from what we had in mind. I understood that the committee on defence and the bill to amend the National Defence Act were to come up tomorrow.

Mr. MacNaught: I announced those too. They were the second and third items.

Mr. Churchill: You said the first item is the Income Tax Act.

Mr. MacNaught: An act to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Churchill: Which is a very lengthy act.

[Later:]

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a slight change in the order of business which I announced at ten o'clock. After consultation with my colleagues and the house leaders opposite, it has been decided not to proceed with the second reading of the Income Tax Act amendments. With that change, the order of business will be as I outlined it at ten o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

(Subject matter of questions debated under adjournment motion).

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

TRANSPORT—RICHELIEU WATERWAY—STUDY BY INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In accordance with provisional standing order 39A, a motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been made and seconded at this time. Therefore the question is that this house do now adjourn. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, I put the following question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin): Could the minister tell the house what progress has been made by the boundary waters commission concerning the deepening of the Richelieu river? As I did not receive any answer, I asked the Speaker to transfer this question for debate.

I am most astonished to see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is absent and he must surely have a major reason for not being here tonight. But I cannot see why his parliamentary secretary is not here either.

I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, if I do not obtain a satisfactory answer, because I know the kind of answer often given by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), to wit what progress has been made in the surveys of this international commission on the deepening of the Richelieu river, we will have to revert to the former system of questions, because we have not obtained full co-operation from the government.

I asked that question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because on January 22, 1960, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) had delivered a long speech in the house urging the government to undertake the study of the project. And as reported on page 248 of Hansard, he stated among other things:

> The deepening of the Richelieu river is the logical step consequent on the St. Lawrence seaway achievement which has already proved itself so beneficial both to Canada and to the United States. The people of these two countries are almost unanimously in favour of the deepening of the river in the near future.

The hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville even said that it would help to solve the unemployment problem.

Mr. Speaker, we want to know on this side of the house where that international commission stands with its studies. It seems to me the government refuses to take a stand and to carry out the positive promise made among others during the last election campaign by the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville and some of his colleagues.

I want an accurate answer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs or from his representative. I want to know exactly where the study of this commission stands to bring in a concrete project which is terribly important for the economy of the province of Quebec and by the same token, for the economy of Canada as a whole. I hope to have a rather precise answer; otherwise, we will be justified in saying that we lack government co-operation since there is no representative here tonight from the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I hope that a government representative will give me a satisfactory answer.

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) had a very pressing engagement which made it impossible for him to be here this evening.

Mr. Pigeon: What about the parliamentary secretary?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), who is parliamentary secretary, was not able to be in the house today, but I was here when the question was asked and I have a certain familiarity with this matter. If it should be decided by the two governments after the studies are completed that this project, which could only be an international project or it would, of course, have no value whatever, should be proceeded with I presume it would be the responsibility of my department and whoever happens to be the minister at that time. I hope that I might be the minister because I expect to be here for quite a long time, particularly as long as certain hon. gentlemen continue to encourage the electors to draw the kind of contrast that they cannot help but draw.

I can tell the hon. gentleman that there has been a very active study indeed, which was of course undertaken by the government which he supported in the first instance, in collaboration with the government of the United States through the medium of the international joint commission. I know from reports that have been given to me by members of the commission, that the commission has not been content merely to study papers but has actually visited the whole waterway. This is a matter to which both governments, through the medium of the international joint commission, are giving close attention. It would be impossible, of course, for either government, on its own, meaningfully to undertake any works until there was an agreement between the two governments, because there would be no use building part of the waterway if the whole of the waterway were not going to be built. This is, of course, the second most historic waterway situated in eastern North America. It is full of history and one hopes it may also, in time, be full of commerce.

WATER RESOURCES—PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY INTO GREAT LAKES

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, May 6, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister if he had received from the Ontario chamber of commerce a resolution recommending to study the possibility of diverting the James bay waters into the great lakes, through the Harricanaw river, and if he intended to recommend that study. I know that several other Canadian organizations are also interested in this matter. I want to ask him, tonight, and in his absence, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing), if, in the light of new developments and techniques, and especially in view of the need that is getting more pressing for soft water supply for the use of residents living near the great lakes, and in order, also, to correct several navigation problems on the St. Lawrence river and the Ottawa river, in the light of these facts, I would like to know whether the government expects to have technical and economic surveys made in that connection and whether it considers consulting the governments concerned, especially those of Quebec and Ontario, as well as the government of the United States, and of six or seven American states, concerning the project known as Grand Canal.

It is reported that the water level in the great lakes is going down continually; this is causing problems and the prospects are quite alarming. Besides, navigation on the St. Lawrence is seriously hindered, and this takes a heavy toll on the Canadian economy. This spring the press reported that the first ocean liner to leave the Montreal harbour had to reduce considerably its cargo before leaving port, because the water level was too low.

In the same line of thought, we are told that the reason why the water level is so dangerously low is the dry weather of last fall and the low precipitation during the winter. It still remains that last summer the water level in the harbour of Montreal and in the great lakes was lower than normal before the dry season.

Mr. Speaker, the government is certainly aware of the fact that an engineer from Sudbury, Ontario, has been making extended studies for several years to find an acceptable solution. He suggests the diversion of the Harricanaw river which has its source in lakes Senneville, Montigny, Malartic and Lamothe, in Abitibi, and flows into James bay after passing through Amos in my riding.

According to his project those waters would be forced back and diverted into lake Timiskaming through a series of canals, dams and pumps. From there, the dredging of a canal cutting the line of watershed at North Bay would allow for the diversion of those waters into lake Nipissing, and from there into Georgian bay and the great lakes.

Mr. Speaker, you will understand that I am interested in that project since it directly affects my riding, and if it were carried out, it would be a significant improvement for the economy of that area which has been too much neglected by the authorities in the past.

That is why I insist on knowing whether the government are taking into serious consideration the problem of elevating the water levels of the great lakes, and if they are taking into consideration the various suggestions made, more particularly the suggestion from the Ontario chamber of commerce.

[Text]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. gentleman for his inquiry and to tell him this is a matter that is being taken exceedingly seriously by the government at the present time.

The more obvious losses on the great lakes to those who are operating resorts or carrying out shipping on them, are known to most of the people of Canada, but probably the most serious losses of all are not known to the people of Canada. We are reliably informed that the additional amount of coal which Ontario hydro had to buy last year because of the low levels in the lakes, and hence a reduction in power from hydro, was not less than $12 million. This was coal brought in to burn in thermal plants as a result of the low levels on the lakes. In addition to that, one of the most serious damages occurred not on the water but on the land in southern Ontario, and a reliable estimate states that last year over $75 million was lost in canning crops alone, as a result of the drought.

It is the contention of our branch and our water department that the principal reason for this is that we are in a very dry spell. There is a cycle of drought in the area of Ontario that normally feeds the lakes. In 1962 the rainfall was two inches less than it had been in the previous year, and that was almost two inches less than the average. In 1963 it was another three inches less, so that in two years there were five inches less rainfall in the area that feeds the lakes than there had been two years previously.

In addition to that we have had some very high temperatures during the last two years. The loss of water comes from two sources, namely lack of rainfall, and evaporation from the water that does fall, and for the past two years evaporation has been exceedingly high.

We are fully aware of the situation and have made a study. We are fully aware of the proposal in respect to the grand canal which envisions the use of power on the Nottaway river lying in the province of Quebec, which can produce a great deal of power, probably 900,000 kilowatts or 1 million kilowatts, to lifting water into the Harricanaw river behind dams, and changing the direction of the Harricanaw from flowing north and having it flow south.

The concept would require water to be raised over a height of substantially 925 feet—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

SHIPPING—GREAT LAKES—INCREASED HANDLING CHARGES BECAUSE OF LOW WATER LEVELS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): My question hinges upon something the minister of northern affairs has already touched upon, although it has an entirely different twang to it; it has a western flavour. I have raised this question because nobody heretofore has raised the question that, with the water levels low, it has affected the western economy.

My point of contention is that because of the low levels of the great lakes boats coming in for loading have had to fill to less than 100 per cent capacity. They have had to take on partial loads. This, in effect, has had the result that more boats have had to come in, and as a result of more boats having to come in this means that we, as western producers—and I speak as a western producer, a western farmer, myself—will have to pay the cost of more boats coming in. I think whether the government realizes this or not the western farmer is conscious of what is happening in central Canada. Whether central Canada is interested in western Canada or not, western Canada is interested in the economy of the central part of that area which is supposed to be immune to all our suggestions and so on.

What I am suggesting at the moment is that neither the minister nor the government has taken into consideration the problem that we have, namely that we are being charged for delivery of grain to foreign countries. It seems that we have a very good product, one that is saleable, and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is presently out of the country is interested in selling our product. But he has not taken cognizance of the problem that we have in Canada. We have tried to promote sales abroad, yet we do not do anything about our problem right here in Canada.

How do we keep the cost of selling our product at such a level as to be competitive? By keeping our product competitive, I mean can we sell it to another country by utilizing the maximum of our shipping capacity? These are ways that will prove to the western producers that the government is interested in their welfare; these are ways that will prove to all, not necessarily to the western producer but to all Canadians, that the government is interested in doing something to remove the balance of trade problem which has faced not only this government but the previous government; and I think this government should take a close look at the problem.

We are very much concerned over the fact that the port of Churchill, for example, has not been utilized to its maximum and I notice that out of 67 days, when we had a shipping season, 15 days were not used. It seems to me that this is the root of the problem. Are we making maximum use of efficiency? Are we placing our product on the world market in such a way that it is competitive? If we had used up the days at Churchill we could have saved 12 cents a bushel on every bushel that was exported out of Canada by using the maximum facilities we had. Even out of the terminals at the great lakes, we should have saved. But what do we do? We bring in two boats instead of one—intead of bringing in one boat and filling it to capacity. It is very easy: You bring in a boat, load it to half capacity. Oh, temporarily you give somebody work for the time being, but what do you do in the meantime? Do you protect the saleability of the product? Not only is wheat in question; the point is that every product we have in Canada is affected. Perhaps I could read this quotation from the Sun-Times of April 6:

> Captain Bert Bazeley, fleet manager for Upper Lakes Shipping Ltd., Toronto, says each of the company's ten large carriers is shipping 1,000 tons light every trip.

That is because they have trouble getting into ports. It seems to me this is not only a question of shipping grain out of lake Superior or any of our other ports, but this problem applies to every product that we manufacture or produce. I think the question I have raised is important enough to be given serious consideration when we are trying to get into the world market. If we have a product to sell—and we have a great many good products to sell—I think the government should recognize the fact that they are not doing anything to promote the sale of these products or enable those who produce the products to sell them, because of the situation that exists.

I think the government should recognize this problem and do something to solve it, whether dredging is needed or whatever it is. I certainly do not agree with the theory that we should pray for rain, and I think now is the time for the government to come up with some sort of policy.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be suggesting that, first, the government is not aware of this problem. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) made it very clear—

Mr. Korchinski: You haven't done anything.

Mr. Drury: —that he is very much concerned.

Mr. Korchinski: Yes; pray for rain.

Mr. Drury: The hon. member also suggested that inadequate use has been made of the port of Churchill. I recollect some weeks ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) pointing out, respecting the port of Churchill, that in the most recent crop year shipments through Churchill have been larger than at any other time in Churchill's history.

Mr. Korchinski: Nonsense; for 15 days there was nothing shipped out of Churchill.

Mr. Drury: There have been very substantial shipments out of Churchill.

Mr. Korchinski: Look at the question I put on the order paper.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would limit himself to seven minutes and allow me my three minutes.

Mr. Korchinski: Then just give the facts.

Mr. Drury: Shipments out of Churchill will be even greater this year. Further, with respect to the condition of the great lakes, the fact of the matter is that water is low this year, arising out of conditions which perhaps might have been foreseen and acted on three years ago; but it is too late to do anything about it now and cure it this year. The time for action was three or four years ago. However, Mr. Speaker, what can be done this year is being done, and I think some indication has been given to the house of the substantial dredging operations which are being carried out and are to be carried out in the great lakes with a view to allowing access to these piers for the movement of wheat. The government is acutely conscious of the importance of moving substantial quantities of wheat, and the recent change in administrative policy is further evidence of this fact, to assist as much as possible. Extensive dredging operations are being undertaken.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, May 8, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HERRIDGE—USE IN COMMITTEE OF DOCUMENT NOT TABLED IN HOUSE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege is that certain documents were improperly made available to the hon. member for Kootenay East by a senior official of the Department of External Affairs before those documents had been tabled in the house. This action was taken during a meeting of the external affairs committee held yesterday afternoon, and in my opinion it constituted an offence against the rules of the house and a grave discourtesy to its members.

On Wednesday, May 6 I moved the following motion:

> That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all petitions sponsored by the Nelson chamber of commerce signed by residents of Kootenay East and West urging immediate ratification of the Columbia river treaty, received by the government since January 1, 1964.

This motion was unanimously agreed to. During the meeting of the external affairs committee yesterday afternoon a senior official of the Department of External Affairs, at two minutes after 5 p.m., handed the hon. member for Kootenay East the original petition referred to in my motion. I wish to bring Your Honour's attention to the fact that the hon. member for Kootenay East is not at present a member of the government. Shortly afterward the hon. member for Kootenay East commenced to use this document as evidence before the committee.

At that point I immediately rose on a question of privilege to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the document was improperly before the committee. The hon. member for Leeds, the esteemed chairman of the committee, then suggested I be permitted to see the petition. However, out of respect for the rules of this house and the rights of members of parliament I refused to look at the document until it came into my hands legally in accordance with the rules of the house.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully suggest that the members of this house are entitled to an explanation of the reasons for this unusual breach of the rules of this house, and are entitled to an apology from the member for Kootenay East and the senior official of the Department of External Affairs involved in this breach of the rules and grave discourtesy to the members of this house.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I might have risen and suggested that raising this particular question of privilege seems to me out of order at this time. The question has to do with a matter which is before a committee that is sitting, and the place to raise such a question of privilege is, I believe, in that committee. However, I am not rising to make a technical objection, except to remind my esteemed and sensitive friend of what I believe to be the correct procedure.

I am sure we would all regret it, if the hon. gentleman has been unfairly dealt with. The fact is that his question concerns a petition containing some 4,000 or 5,000 names of people from the hon. gentleman's constituency who are urging the government to get on with the Columbia river treaty. I referred to this petition when I was speaking in the house on the question of the Columbia river treaty.

Yesterday, or the day before yesterday, the hon. gentleman had on the order paper a motion which was accepted by the house asking for the production of this document. It takes time to provide several copies of it, and the hon. member for Kootenay East asked one of the officials of the Department of External Affairs if he might see the petition. The official, who is one of the responsible officials of the department, as the hon. gentleman knows, thought there was no reason why this should not be permitted. If the hon. member for Kootenay West had asked for it he would have obtained it. However, with these facts in mind I am looking into the matter further to try to deal with the situation in a manner which, I know, will end in the full satisfaction of the sensitive nature of my esteemed and dear friend the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member for Kootenay West, having raised this matter and heard a partial explanation, and having heard also that the minister is looking into the matter further, will be satisfied.

MR. WOOLLIAMS—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE BY MEMBER FOR BURNABY-COQUITLAM

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege which not only affects me personally but I think affects many hon. members of the house. I realize and appreciate that the rules say I should raise a question of privilege as soon as possible. My question of privilege arises out of a comment made yesterday in reference to the report brought in by the rules committee. The comment was made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). I was unable to hear it at the time because of the noise from that particular party following the remarks I made. The words I refer to are these:

> As long as we have a democracy in this country I think the hon. member for Bow River will have to abide by the decision of the electorate.

Either the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam deliberately misinterpreted what I said or he unintentionally misinterpreted it, because I was not speaking against splinter parties as such or against the situation with regard to those constituencies which may elect members of splinter parties; I was saying there has grown up in this house a procedure, now endorsed by the rules committee, of giving a spokesman for each of those parties an opportunity to make comments in reply to statements on government policies made from the treasury benches from time to time. Here we are in the process of amending our rules because we wish to save time in the house, and we now have five parties in the opposition. I only said that in the future we may have 10 or 20.

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, four parties in the opposition; you are absolutely correct. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam deliberately misinterpreted my statement because he was frightened that the Canadian people would find out the truth and import of my remarks.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege may I just point out to the hon. member for Bow River that his complaint is incorrectly lodged when he lodges it against the committee on procedure. It was the house itself, by unanimous decision, that adopted yesterday provisional standing order 15(2-a).

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I reply to those remarks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. First of all, the hon. member has had the opportunity of restating his argument to a shorter and lesser degree. Second, I do not see any basic question of privilege. If it is anything it is a grievance, and it is hardly that. It is really a statement of personal opinion. In view of the discussion of yesterday and today may I suggest that we now get on with the business before the house.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is briefly this. The hon. member says it was unanimously approved by the house. If he had listened very carefully to my remarks he would know that I did not agree to it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SENIORITY RIGHTS OF TRANSFERRED EMPLOYEES OF CANADIAN COMMERCIAL CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State I would direct my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the promise given to 117 employees of the Canadian Commercial Corporation that their seniority and other rights would not be impaired in the termination of their services with the corporation and their absorption into the Department of Industry. Would the Prime Minister have this question looked into so the obvious injustice that would result from denying these civil servants their guaranteed rights, or indeed any possibility thereof, will be avoided?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I saw this report and I am looking into it. I am quite sure that if there is an injustice it must be corrected.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BENEFITS PLAN FOR PERSONNEL TO BE RETIRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Associate Minister of National Defence; I have given him prior notice of this urgent subject. When will the government be in a position to release the special benefits arrangements for the armed forces personnel who are being prematurely retired?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to inform the hon. member and the house that the government has approved a special benefits plan for service personnel who will be retired in advance of their normal retirement age as a result of the integration of the armed forces. The forces will be notified today of the contents of this plan, and details will be made available to all hon. members who are interested.

FINANCE

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—ADJUSTMENT IN ACCORDANCE WITH COST OF LIVING

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to introduce during this session a measure for readjusting family allowances according to the cost-of-living index?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS AND EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It arises from an article written by Roger Appleton which appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Citizen. It is headed "Major Contractor Fails, Thousands May Lose Jobs". One of the reasons given for this bankruptcy and other bankruptcies is the tax on construction materials and building equipment. In view of this situation is the government giving any consideration to rescinding the tax in question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. First of all I have grave doubts that the question is in order. It is a very interesting one, but it is more a statement than a question. I realize its importance and the general interest, but it is too much to expect the minister to answer a question like this on the spur of the moment. It seems to me that the hon. member would be well advised to put the question on the order paper.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, this is an emergency problem. This is a national problem. Contractors are going broke all over the country because of this tax. Surely the minister is prepared to answer a question so important to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is trying to argue the question. The fact that one contractor in the city of Ottawa goes into bankruptcy does not necessarily mean that all contractors across the country are going into bankruptcy.

PROCEDURE RESPECTING REFUNDS OF SALES TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of National Revenue. On April 27 I asked the acting minister if his department was considering simplifying the procedures for obtaining refunds of the 8 per cent building tax on allowable projects such as educational institutions. The acting minister replied that simplified procedures had been announced or would be announced in a very short time. My question is, have these new procedures been announced, and where can I obtain this information?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, new regulations have not yet been announced but I expect they will be announced almost any day now.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

APPLICATION OF AVAILABILITY TEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent to his office this morning. In view of many complaints regarding the onerous application of the availability test for unemployment insurance benefit, has the minister had discussions about this matter with the unemployment insurance commission? Is any relaxation of the application of this test in prospect?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member was good enough to send me a copy of this question. I have done my best to see the pressing urgency in the matter, but may I suggest that he put it on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I will not quarrel with your ruling, but I give notice that I will ask the question in the next overtime period.

FOREST FIRES

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I addressed a question to the Prime Minister relative to providing assistance to Nova Scotia in fighting the serious forest fires which have broken out in that province. In view of press reports last evening that the provincial minister of lands and forests had called upon Ottawa for naval and air force planes to be used as water bombers, is the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence in a position to state whether any assistance as requested will be provided?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I repeat what I said yesterday, that if a request is made we will do what we can to help. But I am informed that no request has yet been received from the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question. Is the Prime Minister aware that the Minister of Forestry, as reported in the Halifax press of last evening, stated that this assistance will be made available if found technically possible by the services involved?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that report but I will look into it at once.

[Later:]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to supplement and correct, if I may, the answer I gave the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. I am informed that a request for assistance has been received from the government of Nova Scotia, and that service personnel are now in fact assisting in fire-fighting in Nova Scotia.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SASKATOON, SASK.—SUGGESTED NAME FOR NEW VETERANS HOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister relating to the question I posed previously in reference to naming the veterans home in Saskatoon after the late member of parliament for Saskatoon, Henry Frank Jones. At that time the Prime Minister will recall he stated that no official representation had been made by the city council of Saskatoon but that if this were done consideration might be given.

I have now been informed by the city council of Saskatoon that at their meeting on March 30, 1964, a resolution was passed to that effect, and that on April 3 a letter went out to the Minister of Veterans Affairs submitting the council's suggestion for the naming of this home. Would the Prime Minister now give consideration to this matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think I said that no information of that kind had been received by me. That is correct, but my hon. friend now tells me that a resolution has been passed and sent to one of my colleagues. I will look into the matter at once and give consideration to that request.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

MARITIMES—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN REVISION OF MAINTENANCE OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I have not sent him notice because I feel quite sure he is familiar with the subject matter.

In view of the fact that the C.N.R. plans to revise its maintenance of way methods in the maritime area on June 1, which I am informed will cause great disruption and hardship among the working force and ultimate unemployment for a large number of railway workers, would the minister now advise the house what has been the result of his discussions with the C.N.R. in order to prevent this from taking place? He may recall that it was brought to his attention in the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the railway that the new methods they are proposing to use will not result in any decrease in employment until such time as there are retirements of existing employees who may not be replaced.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister check with the C.N.R. and ascertain if it is not correct that many of these employees are going to be uprooted from their homes and may have to move hundreds of miles away, which will cause great disruption to themselves and their families?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I can only draw that statement to the attention of the management of the railway.

WATER RESOURCES

PROPOSED DIVERSION FROM HUDSON BAY INTO GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of his statement made in the house last night that the Grand canal project is being taken exceedingly seriously by the government at this time, can he say whether the government will consider accepting the resolution standing in my name, which is to come up for debate on Monday next, asking for studies to be carried out in this connection and for talks between the provinces and the United States government?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not misrepresent me. I said that the whole problem of the water levels of the lakes was being taken exceedingly seriously by the government. I said we were fully aware of the proposals in respect of the Grand canal and were studying them. Unfortunately I was unable to complete my statement last night, but we are making a study of the Grand canal proposal and other proposals from the point of view of trying to do the best we can in respect of the water levels throughout the great lakes system so that a minimum of damage will be done in all places and to the various people concerned.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister would mind answering the specific question I asked him, whether the government is disposed to accept the motion standing in my name on that question.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the minister. Would the minister say now whether the government, either the federal government by itself or in co-operation with the province of Ontario, is considering emergency action in order to ameliorate the effects of the falling water levels in the great lakes on the tourist industry and particularly on those operating marinas and the like who will suffer very greatly this summer unless some action is taken?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not a question for the order paper. The emergency is here, and I suggest if the minister has any plans he should answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not mind; the government never has any plans.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING 12 MILE FISHING LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the secrecy with which the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries approached the Senate banking and commerce committee yesterday, and in view of their refusal to give information to that committee about the territorial waters and the fishing zone in Bill No. S-17, I wonder if the Prime Minister would consider making a more revealing explanatory statement so the people of Canada would know just what is in the mind of the government with regard to our fisheries limits.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I thought the statement which was read by my colleague to the committee yesterday was admirable and full. There was no refusal of any appropriate information.

NATO—ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT COUNCIL MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask him if he expects to attend the ministerial council meeting of the NATO at The Hague next week. If so, would he tell the house what is the attitude of the government of Canada toward the project for a mixed-manned nuclear force, which I understand is to be discussed at this council meeting?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The answer to the second part of the question has already been given in this house by the Prime Minister, who has stated the present policy of the government with regard to the proposed multilateral force. The multilateral force proposal is not a NATO proposal. It is a proposal by the government of the United States to which some seven countries have given, in varying forms, a measure of consideration. Canada, however, is not one of the participants.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

SASKATOON—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING SECOND ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I should like to know whether the Minister of Public Works has had any representations from the city of Saskatoon in connection with the construction of a second trans-Canada highway, and in particular would he inform the house whether there have been any representations in connection with the construction of the highway as it affects the 25th street bridge?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member place that question on the order paper?

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER OIL—ANNOUNCEMENT OF ADDITIONAL SALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of several reports that there have been some significant recent sales of butter or butter oil out of government surplus stock. I wonder if he could inform the house and the dairy farmers as to the extent of these sales.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it will be a matter of interest to all members of the house to know that progress has been made in the sale of the agricultural stabilization board surplus holdings of butter oil. The board, in its oil program, converted some 105 million pounds of butter into approximately 85 million pounds of butter oil. This was offered for export sale at 27 cents a pound to approved markets on November 1, 1963. From that date to the present some 20 million pounds had been sold on export markets.

I am pleased to announce that the board has now completed sales agreements with 11 Canadian firms for the disposal of an additional 50 million pounds on export markets. The bulk of these shipments are expected to be made during the next three or four months. While it is not considered to be in the best interests of the firms involved to disclose the terms and conditions of these contracts, all contracts involve a forfeitable performance deposit. Thus, in essence, the government's entire stock of butter oil, other than that which is considered necessary to service the domestic market, is at present committed for sale. This leaves the board with total butter and butter oil stocks of approximately 90 million pounds.

Obviously our butter situation is considerably improved from what it has been in the last few years. However, it would be premature to suggest that we have yet arrived at any permanent solution to the problems of the dairy industry. I think the experience of the dairy industry over the last few years indicates that some further adjustments will eventually have to be made in dairy programs if we are to arrive at a solution to the industry's problems. I do not want to suggest in any way that I think our producers are getting more help from the government than they deserve, but we do not want any of our programs to encourage conditions that just do not make economic sense.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should point out that under the rules I have been given, questions should be asked only in connection with matters of sufficient urgency that an immediate answer is required. In that sense I considered the question was of important general interest and permitted it, but after having heard the interesting but rather lengthy answer I feel I should have applied the rule at the beginning.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Is the minister in a position to say that the dairy policy he announced in April 1963 has produced the expected result, that is a saving of $6 million?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that while our policies are not doing all that we would like them to do, they are a great improvement over previous policies. The price of milk last year for cheese producers was higher than it has been since 1954.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure Your Honour would not deny me the right to ask a question arising out of the rather slippery explanation that has been given by the hon. gentleman. Will he inform the house as to the price these Canadian companies will be paying for the 50 million pounds of butter oil?

Mr. Hays: I think I mentioned it in the statement. It is in excess of 27 cents a pound.

UNITED NATIONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF STAND-BY UNITS FOR PEACE FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he inform the house what steps the government has taken along the lines of the lecture he delivered last night at Carleton University looking toward the establishment of stand-by units for a United Nations peace force?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The government is in the process of calling a meeting of representatives of the interested governments of the other countries. We have been in communication with certain governments, but I do not think I can go into detail now. We hope to have a meeting before long, and that is the first step in the process.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question. Where is it intended to hold that meeting?

Mr. Pearson: In Ottawa.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister?

On the request of Mr. Marchand, president of "les Syndicats nationaux", does the government intend to convene as soon as possible a federal-provincial conference to examine steps to be taken to settle the terrifying problem of unemployment which is now threatening the Canadian economy?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member please put that question on the order paper.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR REVISED WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in her unavoidable absence I shall direct it to her parliamentary secretary. On April 22 the minister intimated that a revised white paper on the Canada pension plan would be made available to the house. My question is, can the house be advised now when this revised white paper is likely to be made available?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I shall take this question as notice and endeavour to have a reply for the hon. member next week.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF JUVENILE DELINQUENCY COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the promise made last year by his predecessor that the long awaited report on juvenile delinquency would be brought forward for sure by April 1964, will the minister say whether this report will be brought down, and whether it will be available to all members in the very near future?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there have been some difficulties in the way of obtaining completion of the report of juvenile delinquency. I might tell the hon. gentleman that I am presently taking the necessary steps to have all the material already collected dealt with, and I expect the report will be issued and tabled before the end of this year.

Mr. Bell: Might I ask if it has been decided that the report will be tabled and made available to hon. members?

Mr. Favreau: Well, Mr. Speaker, maybe I used the wrong word when I forecast the time, but I expect a report to be remitted to the minister before the end of this year.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I would like to ask him whether there has been any further indication since yesterday from the temperamental and trigger happy premier of B.C. as to his plans and intentions with respect to providing recompense for the tidal wave disaster victims on the west coast.

Defence Committee

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to accept those adjectives. We have had a telegram indicating the amount of the loss and a request that we carry half of it in the sum of about $750,000. In other words the total loss will be about $1,563,000, or something of that nature. This will be discussed and some reply given, I think in the matter of the next few days.

THE MINISTRY

NATIONAL REVENUE—APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the question I have to ask is somewhat supplementary to the previous one and, if I may, I would like to direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the interest in the country at the present time in the collection of taxes, does the Prime Minister intend to appoint a minister in charge of tax collection before June 22?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I answered that question yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and I have nothing to add to what I said then.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM THROUGH PRESSURE OF ADVERTISER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Acting Secretary of State. Will the minister look into the serious charge levelled in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that a proposed, unsponsored C.B.C. television program, "The Good Life," has been scrapped as a result of pressure brought to bear on the C.B.C. by a certain advertiser?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Acting Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to direct this to the attention of the C.B.C. and I am sure they will communicate with the Secretary of State.

DEFENCE

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to continue the consideration of matters relating to defence begun by the special committee at the past session and to report from time to time its observations and opinions thereon;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses;

That it be empowered to adjourn from place to place;

That the minutes of the proceedings and evidence taken by the special committee at the past session be referred to the said committee and made a part of the records thereof; and

That the committee consist of 24 members to be designated by the house at a later date, and that standing order 67 (1) be suspended in relation thereto.

[Mr. Barnett.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, as set out on the order paper, the purpose of this resolution is to appoint a special committee on defence to continue the work started by a similar committee in the past session.

The house will recall that the resolution appointing the original committee was proposed by the Prime Minister on May 30, and the motion was agreed to by the house on June 7. The committee began its hearings on June 18, and by the time the interim report was tabled in the house a total of 45 meetings were held including 29 in Canada, two in the United States and 14 in Europe. In addition to travelling abroad the committee set a number of precedents, including hearing from senior service officers and individuals outside the government. The committee also received expert military and political advice here in Canada, in the United States and in Europe.

Personally I feel that the committee performed a very useful function. The members from all parties pursued their assignment in a very responsible manner in devoting themselves to the very complex problems of defence. Not only were the members of the committee made aware of the problems facing defence, but also members of the press and through them the public.

I might say that the government found the recommendations of the committee of great assistance and I think it was very rewarding, in a parliament of minorities, to have the members of the committee on defence adopt a non-partisan approach to their work. Certainly one result of this was that the calibre of the debate when the estimates of the Department of National Defence came before parliament in 1963 was of a much higher order than in previous years, due to the contribution made to the debate by individual members of the committee representing all political parties in the house.

The government has every confidence that the reconstitution of the committee called for in this resolution will serve a very useful purpose, and I am hopeful that upon adoption of this motion the committee can begin its sittings very shortly.

I have already said that it is the intention of the government to refer the amendment to the National Defence Act, which we are to discuss later today, to the committee after completion of second reading. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that there is agreement to approve this motion, that we will have a general debate on defence on second reading of the bill to amend the National Defence Act, and that the debate on that bill will not be restricted to its immediate terms but will be allowed to cover the whole field of defence.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is agreed so long as the house is perfectly clear with regard to the nature of the debate on second reading of the bill to amend the National Defence Act, namely that that debate may range over the whole field of defence including, if required and if deemed necessary, a discussion of the work of the defence committee last year, what it may do this year, the general policy of the government as outlined in the white paper, the situation with regard to defence at present, and things of that nature. If that is thoroughly understood then we are prepared to approve the setting up of the committee without any lengthy statement, unless the hon. member for Edmonton West, who served as vice chairman of that committee, might want to speak for a minute and a half.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, what has been said by the Minister of National Defence and by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre accords with our understanding of the arrangement made among the parties. If I may just confirm that arrangement in a sentence, providing it is understood that debate on second reading of Bill C-90 will be broad enough to include everything that might have been said in the debate on the setting up of this committee, we are prepared to approve this motion to set up the committee without debate.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, on the clear understanding of the views set out and recognized by the house, that there will be no curtailment of debate on the following bill, we are quite prepared to fit in with the general plan.

Mr. Hellyer: This arrangement is satisfactory to the government.

Motion agreed to.

National Defence Act

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPLACEMENT OF CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of Bill C-90, to amend the National Defence Act.

He said: The purpose of this bill is to implement one of the major recommendations included in the white paper on defence. Specifically, the bill provides for the replacement of the present positions of chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, chief of the naval staff, chief of the general staff and chief of the air staff by a single new position designated as chief of the defence staff. This change is the first and perhaps the most important move in the integration of the armed forces under a single defence staff.

At this point I should like to express my appreciation of the support given to this proposal by the Prime Minister and the government of Canada. The enthusiastic response has been most gratifying and is deeply appreciated. I should like in particular to thank my colleague the associate minister for his untiring assistance. In carrying, as he does, the main burden of the administrative load in the department he has contributed immeasurably to the work we have jointly undertaken. Without this support any major reorganization on the scale contemplated would not be possible.

The establishment of a single chief of defence staff will permit the reorganization of our armed forces on a functional basis. This will not only simplify procedures and permit the development of a more efficient fighting force, but it will also greatly facilitate the implementation of a long range, co-ordinated defence policy as set out in the white paper. In the absence of a unified defence staff the implementation of such a policy would be extremely difficult and, in my opinion, virtually impossible.

In considering the organization of the armed forces a number of options were studied. These included the status quo, the Glassco commission recommendations and the decision which was finally adopted, that is to say the complete integration of the forces commencing at the top with the integration of the command structure.

First in respect to the status quo, may I say there are at the present time six routes of information coming to the minister. Direct access is afforded to the chairman of the chiefs of staff on behalf of the chiefs of staff committee; to the chief of the naval staff, to the chief of the general staff, to the chief of the air staff, to the chief of the defence research board and to the deputy minister. The minister is inadequately staffed to co-ordinate at his level and in his office the information coming from these several sources. Projects are not always co-ordinated into a single plan. It is in effect, in its present application, a system which is virtually unmanageable, and the minister is unable to exercise his constitutional authority adequately.

In considering alternatives which would permit the minister to exercise his responsibility effectively, the recommendation of the Glassco commission was considered. In essence the suggestion was that a number of support functions be transferred from the individual services to the chairman of the chiefs of staff for administration. This suggestion was given careful consideration because it is in line with procedures in other countries, and has long been put forward as a course which might be adopted in this country.

However, we came to the conclusion that this proposal would not likely result in a real reduction of manpower. On the contrary, it seemed to us it would probably result in a continuation and perhaps even an amplification of the committee system. If the chairman were given power to impose decisions made in these various areas on the individual services, then the real power of the individual chiefs of staff would be substantially diminished. If, on the other hand, he was not given power to impose decisions in those areas and the acceptance of his proposals depended on persuasion and the accommodation of views, then the committee system with all its inevitable delays and frustrations would remain. Based on experience both in Canada up to the present time and in other countries we came to the conclusion that this would not meet the two real needs as we see them; first of all a more effective organization and, second, a considerable reduction in duplication in headquarters.

The third alternative, which was the one finally adopted, was the integration of the armed forces into a single unit. This was decided on because it was considered to be the only solution likely to achieve those two important objectives (a) a more streamlined and effective system, and (b) reduced manpower due to reduction in duplications and increased efficiency in headquarters, command, training, logistics and support organizations.

At this point I should like to emphasize that I have no criticism of the men who have served their country in senior military positions. On the contrary, they have served Canada and the military organizations of which they were and are a part with courage, devotion and distinction. Man for man there are no better armed forces than ours, and we are proud of the men and women who serve us so well. The organization of our available forces can, however, be improved so as to provide greater effectiveness, and in this area responsibility for taking the initiative lies with the minister and the government. The constitutional authority and responsibility is clear, and if changes in organization are required it is the responsibility of the government to recommend them and to see that they are implemented. We have placed our recommendations before parliament and now seek the statutory amendments necessary to get on with the job. We have the backing of the great majority of the Canadian people, and the enthusiastic support of the men and women of the armed forces.

As I indicated, we believe that the proposed new organization will result not only in a more efficient and responsive service but that it will also permit substantial reductions in manpower in headquarters, training and other units. It is, of course, impossible to predict the exact extent of the savings because there is no experience on which to base our estimates. For the purposes of planning, however, we have guessed that it will be possible to reduce service requirements by approximately 10,000 without affecting our operational elements.

Mr. Lambert: Over all?

Mr. Hellyer: Over all. This estimate predicts a 20 per cent average saving in the 50,000 personnel employed in headquarters, regional headquarters, training and other support units. Of these we believe the largest saving can be effected at national defence headquarters. If we reach our goal we expect that the saving in dollars will amount to approximately $100 million annually, or $1 billion over a ten year period.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister a question? I wonder if he is not incorrect in talking about a saving. The impression has got abroad that he is going to save $100 million from total expenditure, but all he is doing is transferring a certain reduction in one area to expenditure in another area.

Mr. Hellyer: I should be glad to clear up that point. First, we have saved $100 million and the defence estimates have been reduced by that amount as compared with previous years. So there is a saving to the taxpayers of approximately that amount. There is, in addition to that, a $100 million a year saving which we are now talking about, which is a diversion from overhead costs to military equipment.

Mr. Churchill: Then let us not call it a saving.

Mr. Hellyer: This is a saving in the overhead establishment which should be available to be diverted for the acquisition of new equipment.

Mr. Lambert: Let us say "reduction".

Mr. Hellyer: If there is some word which would please my hon. friends more, I would be happy to use it.

Mr. Churchill: By saying "saving" you are confusing the public.

Mr. Hellyer: This reduction, or saving, will assist us in the difficult task of getting our defence expenditures back in balance. We must increase the proportion of funds available for new equipment if we are to have a viable and effective force in the years to come. The present proportion of about 14 per cent for equipment is unacceptably low and must be increased to something of the order of 25 per cent in the years ahead. Even this proportion is not high compared to other forces. The additional moneys available for equipment will not only permit us to keep our forces in better fighting shape; it will also have a beneficial effect on our Canadian defence industries. The advantage of a long range plan will permit them to plan more effectively and to assist us in meeting our equipment needs. Peaks and valleys of production will be evened out to the maximum extent possible, and the commercial and export aspects of defence requirements will be kept in mind in our planning.

I would like to say a word about the effects of the proposed reorganization on service personnel. First of all, as announced by the Associate Minister of National Defence this morning, we plan special benefits for those who will be retired in advance of their normal retirement age. This will be done as integration proceeds and as reductions occur in many branches of the armed forces, particularly in the support units. This will result in the necessity to retire some personnel. There is no question as to the loyalty, efficiency and faithful service of those who will be affected, but officers and men selected for premature retirement will be those for whom appropriate employment cannot be found within the reorganized defence force. Established positions will be eliminated when the functions now carried out by two or more individuals are amalgamated into one.

The government appreciates that the termination of service of an officer or man, through no fault of his own, may place him in a position of undue hardship. In recognition of this a special cash benefit will be provided to assist him to rehabilitate himself in civilian employment. The special gratuity is partial compensation for the loss of anticipated future earnings and reduced pension benefits. This special cash payment, which is subject to income tax, will be in addition to any normal leave or pension entitlement. The benefit will not apply to those who are released for reasons of misconduct or inefficiency, or who request their release.

The amount of the special cash benefit, to be paid in one lump sum, will increase with length of service up to a maximum of the equivalent of 10 months pay for those with 15½ or more years of service. It will be reduced progressively as normal retirement age is approached. Officers serving on short service commissions are in a special category. The period of time by which their service is shortened will be the basis for calculating their benefits.

In addition to this special cash gratuity, the government will propose to parliament that the present provision in the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act which provides a 5 per cent reduction in annuities for servicemen who have less than 20 years service but more than 10 years service be waived. This will be accomplished by the inclusion of an item in the next supplementary estimates of the Department of National Defence to obtain statutory authority for treasury board to direct payment of a full, immediate annuity to contributors under the act.

In so far as those who will continue to be required, Mr. Speaker—and this includes most of those now serving—there will be excellent career opportunities. I am confident that the reorganization of the Canadian armed forces will lead to greater opportunities for many of those who are now serving and for those entering the service now and in the future.

The main purpose of our program is to achieve a better balance between the combat forces and the supporting elements, and to streamline and modernize the management system. In the process there will be a reduction in over-all numbers. There will not, however, be any reduction of effectiveness and efficiency, or any elimination of positions that contribute to the capability of the forces to perform their assigned roles.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, it will be necessary for us to continue to recruit new men. I think this is most important. The services have a continuing need for young men. Our armed forces are very much living organizations and require a constant infusion of new blood to keep them in prime condition. For those with ability and determination, the armed forces offer expanded career prospects and opportunities in the service of Canada and the cause of world peace. Therefore I urge hon. members to encourage young men to volunteer to serve their country in the armed forces.

While the amendments to the legislation before the house are not concerned with the civil aspects of the department, I wish to say something about the important subject of civilian control. As we stated in the white paper on defence, the responsibility of the minister to maintain an effective civilian control raises, in the words of the royal commission on government organization, "a need for a strong staff group which is essentially civilian in character, outside the framework of the armed forces". This civilian staff group is supplied through the deputy minister and his permanent staff. There is no need to change the legislation relating to the deputy minister. The National Defence Act now provides, under section 7, for the appointment of a deputy minister. As in the case of deputy ministers of other departments, this position is defined under the Civil Service Act as the "deputy head" of the department. Under section 31 of the Interpretation Act, he is the lawful deputy of the minister and can do any act or thing which the minister is empowered to do under any act or regulations.

With the reorganization of the defence staff, the problems of civil control will be very much simplified. The minister and the deputy minister and his staff will be dealing with one defence staff under a single commander. It will no longer be necessary to deal with three defence staffs, which has necessarily resulted in a good deal of the resources and energies of the civil staffs being applied to the problems of co-ordination. Civil control, as exercised by the civil staffs under the deputy minister either directly or through advice to the minister, cannot be exercised in a vacuum. It is essential that the matters over which the civil staff are to exercise control or provide advice do, in fact, come before them. With three organizations, each of which has direct access to the minister, it is much more difficult to ensure that this does happen than it will be with a single defence staff. The changes proposed in the military organization in themselves will therefore facilitate the strengthening of civilian control.

In general the staff group under the deputy minister has a responsibility to the minister to see that the work of the department in all areas is carried out efficiently and economically. In other words it is their responsibility to see that the resources, manpower, materiel and money available for military purposes are used to the best advantage. To achieve this it is essential that there be a strong civil staff in the defence department outside the military chain of command for analysing and reviewing military requirements and the use of resources made available for defence. This requires a civil organization capable of reviewing and advising on defence estimates and programs.

Some changes will be made in the organization of civil staffs. As announced in the defence white paper, a program review system will be established which will provide for systematic review of all programs on a comprehensive basis covering a period of at least five years into the future. The object of this system will be to ensure that the programs being presented for the consideration of the minister, and subsequent changes to them, have been thoroughly analysed in terms of resources required to accomplish them, optional means of meeting the objectives, and the relationship to the total defence effort. This system is now in the process of being installed in the department but it will be perhaps a year before it is fully in operation. It will be necessary to some degree to reorganize civil staffs to handle adequately these new management arrangements.

In seeking to build a strong civil staff group to assist the minister in the control and management of the armed forces, I have clearly in mind the need at the same time for exercising care that the civil staffs do not assume functions which are necessary to the military staffs in order that they can efficiently control their military forces and carry out their military responsibilities. Both civil and military staffs have important roles to play and responsibilities to assume, and it is essential to efficient and effective operation that they work closely together and in harmony and understanding. I am glad to say that this is the case in the defence department today. I am certain that it will continue in the future and will, I expect, be enhanced as a result of the reorganization.

On the subject of civilian control I should mention the role of defence council. Defence council is chaired by myself or the associate minister. Its membership has included the deputy minister, the associate deputy minister, the chairman, chiefs of staff, the three chiefs of staff, and the chairman, defence research board. This council has been largely concerned with administrative policies in the department, and in the last several years has tended to meet infrequently and to exercise its influence in a limited area of defence activity.

As part of the reorganization it is our intention that defence council will become the departmental policy board at which all important policy matters relating to defence are considered, with a full interchange of views before decisions are taken. The exact membership of this council following reorganization has not yet been finally determined, but it will include senior civil and military advisers to the minister. In order to permit it to do its work effectively the secretariat of the defence council will be provided by the deputy minister's staff. I am confident that this system will permit an effective exercise of civilian control and, equally important, civilian direction in the carrying out of defence policy as laid down by the government.

Mr. Churchill: Would the minister permit a question at this point. Would he go into a little more detail as to how that differs from the present arrangement?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I really think it would be more appropriate to go into considerable detail once the bill has been referred to the committee, but the policy direction is that submissions and programs from the armed forces of Canada, after they have been analysed by civil staffs, will then be fully discussed by the senior military and civilian advisers to the minister in defence council before they are approved. This has not been done in recent months, certainly not during the last year, and I understand not in the years immediately preceding also.

Finally may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I think Canada has a unique opportunity, and consequently responsibility. The proposals put forward in the bill have been the subject of general discussions for many years and have been supported by many of the greatest military leaders of our generation. Their implementation would not be possible in some other countries at this time. In Canada, however, it is possible to proceed. We have often pioneered with new ideas in war and peace, and having proved their effectiveness set a pattern for future development. In the integration of our armed forces once again we are giving leadership in a very important area. As Canadians we have an inescapable responsibility to proceed with the plan and demonstrate its effectiveness.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I must say at the outset of my remarks that I find the minister has for once stuck pretty well to the rules of relevance, because he has limited his remarks precisely to the reorganization of the command structure of the forces. I think this was hardly in keeping with the spirit and the requirements of the house to discuss as a whole defence matters at this time. It is true that this could have been done on the resolution which the house approved a few moments ago, but I felt that the minister would have welcomed the opportunity to give us a general statement on defence rather than wait until his estimates appear, whenever that may be—some time in October or November, perhaps; we do not know.

I would also have appreciated an indication at this time of some of the observations he would have made regarding the interim report of the committee on defence. After all, the house has received no indication from the government as to its reaction to the white paper, other than in very general terms. The very general terms are, shall we say, the least courtesy which the minister could have offered. I may say that as a member of the defence committee I share his view about the report, that the work of the committee provided the members of this house with the opportunity to become much more familiar with defence matters and to approach the work of this committee in a real, non-partisan manner and from a co-operative point of view.

If I may say so, as a member of the steering committee and as vice chairman of that committee I felt that we had developed a very fine spirit. My chagrin, however, has been that the government did not follow its good example of last year in setting up this committee as early in the session as possible. Seeing that the session commenced on February 18 I think it would have been quite conceivable to have set this committee up by March 15 and to have sent it along its way. I know that a goodly number of the members of the committee and also other members of this house wondered why this was not done. At least two months of valuable time has been lost. It may have been, of course, a question of timing, with the minister wanting to put forward his white paper first before the committee sat again; but I think a tactical error was made in this regard.

I agree with the minister's words that his white paper is but a charter or a guide, not a detailed and final blueprint. In commenting on the white paper today I am sure the house would not expect me to provide a counter-blueprint. It is not of the type with which I seem to remember the minister in days past coming to the house, and which got a rather premature exposure much to his embarrassment. I am not going to go into that particular plan of 1959 or 1960, but from what I can recall certain things are now appearing which have some reference to that blueprint. So far as unification of the forces is concerned, at that time the proposal by the minister when he was in opposition was the appointment of a commander in chief.

In dealing with the matter of the appointment of a commander in chief I would refer the minister to the recommendations of the special committee of the house. The committee indicated that it wished to look into this matter further, and in this regard I think the minister might have been wiser if the committee had been permitted to sit earlier to look into this matter. I am most interested myself in this particular aspect. There are many people who have given this matter careful study whom I would have liked to have appear before the committee to give us the benefit of their years of study and their observations in this regard. In particular I might mention one man whom I have mentioned before, Mr. Richard S. Malone, who has written some very fine articles. I may not necessarily be in full agreement with him, but he has made a very careful study of the whole picture of the command structure of our armed forces.

I think it is here we have to start, and in my opinion it is unfortunate that there has come into the picture now the idea of the integration of the forces. We have started with unification of command, and the white paper speaks of this as the first step in integration. Here again I believe the minister has been premature, because the matter of integration of the forces is an entirely different thing from the unification of command. I would have been much more satisfied as to the wisdom of the government's decision if we had had the time and opportunity to look at the ramifications of integration in detail. There is a great deal more involved in integration of the forces than there is in the unification of command under one commander in chief.

I am wondering just where the minister has received his advice in this regard. True enough his service chiefs will have assisted him, but I should like to know where he got his underlying motivation, inspiration and justification for integration of the forces; because it is quite clearly stated in the white paper that this is the aim. I would have liked to see a great deal more evidence on the pros and cons of integration. It is not sufficient for him to say "We think in our wisdom that we should integrate". We want to know the reasons why there should be integration. We want to be able to discuss them.

True enough, an opportunity will come when the committee sits, because undoubtedly it will look into the white paper in great detail. But already the government is committed to this course of action, and surely we are not going to have the Minister of National Defence following the practice that has taken place in other sectors of the government in the last year of taking a major step forward and then having to back away from it. Surely we have a right to expect something else better than that.

The minister has taken a major step, but he has not disclosed to members of the house any really valid reasons. It is easy for him to say that it is in order to achieve efficiency and to streamline the operations, but that is not sufficient. We will have to have something much more than that. Again, I would have liked a little more detail as to the progress that has been made in this regard. The move was announced some time ago. Undoubtedly there has been a good deal of planning and there may have been some steps taken to this end. Can the minister give us a general timetable for the next few months as to how this will take place?

I have heard that the date of July 1, 1967 has been set as a sort of D-day for the completion of this program, or is it going to be U-day? Some people are saying that by this date everybody will be wearing a common uniform. We will leave that minor detail aside, but we would like to have more detail as to the programming in so far as unification is concerned.

The minister has indicated that he feels it will mean an over-all reduction of 10,000 service personnel. Will it also mean—I trust we can place this interpretation on his remarks—a reduction in the number of civilian personnel who are an integral part of national defence? We know there is and has been a very large civil staff, but if this move will merely mean that 10,000 people will put on their bowler hats in order to carry out the same jobs in mufti then there is little to be gained by this transfer. It is true that the minister has indicated the move will mean a 20 per cent reduction in personnel on the administrative side at national defence headquarters, in certain of the supply units and so on, but this $100 million per annum reduction in what I would call the housekeeping or overhead costs will naturally have to be transferred for use in the purchase and maintenance of equipment.

The minister has not made a great discovery in this regard. I remember one of his predecessors, General Pearkes, expressing his concern at the time we were having special committees on defence expenditures. The service people who advised the former minister were quite correct. The actual forecasts and behaviour with respect to the proportion of defence expenditures have worked out as they forecast back in 1959 and 1960. There is nothing new there, and there has been no major discovery. The same problem is also present in the British, the Danish, the German and the French forces. Certainly this is always one problem. How much is it going to cost to house, pay, feed and generally cover the overhead of this outfit? I like to call these the general housekeeping expenses. Then we have to ascertain how much is left over to buy equipment.

There is a tendency for housekeeping to become more costly. I suppose it is like any domestic operation. As husbands we find that our domestic operations seem to cost more year by year, and there may be a tendency in this regard as well in national defence. The minister did mention certain things about retirement. I am going to leave this matter of unification with the criticisms I have made. I believe the plan has been disclosed prematurely without study by the committee on defence. I believe we could have had the advice of people outside of the minister's present advisers in this regard. I think we could have derived a good deal of benefit as a result of hearing all these views.

I fully agree with the fact that there should be unification. I understand that as a logical step. There is, however, one side of the matter that has left me somewhat puzzled; that, is the extent of the civilian control from the minister's own side of the department. Where is the independent yardstick to be applied by the Minister of National Defence? This has been a problem in the past, and unless I have misunderstood the minister's remarks I think this problem will exist in the future. It is true that there is to be the defence council. However, is it to be an independent body under the direct control of the minister which can apply that yardstick without having a responsibility for administration within the department? There is the minister, the associate minister and the deputy minister, but I am not too sure about the composition of the remainder of the defence council.

In order to really assess the situation I should like to see an organization that could give the minister independent advice. Witnesses before the defence committee indicated they thought that the commander in chief should be an adviser to the minister and not responsible for the administration of the armed services. It is true this does raise one question; how can you advise if you have not got responsibility? I will admit that this raises a problem, but where is the independent advice for the minister? After all the minister must then go to cabinet, and where is that independent advice for cabinet? This has always puzzled me; where is this independent advice? If anything is to be checked out, if anything is to be rejected or modified, is it done by intuition? Is it done for political considerations? Any time there has been a modification it has been given the mantle of a political modification, and I think that is wrong.

I know the minister is feeling his way in this regard. However, I suggest to him very strongly that there should be this independent, shall we say, control. The minister says it is part of the function of the civilian staff to provide some of the control, and the white paper mentions defence programming. To whom are these people responsible? Are they responsible directly to the minister without any intermediate responsibility through the deputy minister?

I am asking these questions because these are the things we should be asking in the defence committee before parliament is committed to this program. Unless the minister is able to give us these answers, I think he has taken a step without looking at a lot of these potential problems. Certainly they exist. These questions pop up in the minds of the members of the defence committee. I believe the minister had better be prepared to give us a full explanation as to how this is going to work; otherwise I believe all we will have had is a great shuffling, "plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose".

I think the minister is aware of the problem I have put to him in this regard. How are you going to test the advice that is given to you? After all, the minister is not a professional military man. Usually the ministers are not. I think perhaps it is far better that he should not be; otherwise he is like the physician who is prescribing for himself, and that is not good at all. Let us find out how the minister is going to be be able to test and weigh the advice that he gets from within the service. I have discussed this with senior officers and they agree that there must be some form of examination, otherwise you may be so blinded by the justice of your own cause that you fail to see some of the difficulties. I hope that within this framework the minister is able to provide us with answers to these criticisms I have mentioned.

As a consequence of this reorganization the minister mentioned retirements. I suppose this is partly the answer the associate minister indicated would be given to the services today. What happens to those people who are being prematurely retired? They will be given a certain cash gratuity which is subject to tax. This is to compensate them in some way for the interruption of their military career and, presumably, the reduction in pension benefits they will enjoy under the pension act by reason of their shortened service. There seems to be one major restriction, that the cash benefit will not be paid to any service personnel who request premature retirement at this time.

I am wondering why that is so. I would have thought there were a number of senior officers and perhaps senior N.C.O.'s who may be two or three years away from normal retirement who could help the minister in his desire to reduce the forces by requesting that they go out now rather than wait out their time. After all, if they do so it must mean that they have an opportunity to resettle themselves in civilian life without too much dislocation.

I think in appropriate cases this should be permitted. After all, we have seen it in many another type of service in this country and other countries, in order to loosen out the top. I think the minister is faced with the problem of having a great number of senior officers, people of a certain age who have seen service in world war II. I believe there should be a loosening out in this, shall we say, rank structure. Why not give them the inducement to get out now if they have only a matter of a couple of years or three years to go to pension age, and let there be a waiver of the disabilities under service superannuation.

I now turn to other matters which the minister did not touch upon, but on which he has taken a lot of action since defence was last considered in this house. The first is the militia, and I shall not go into that question in detail. Some of my colleagues will speak on it, but my particular interest concerns why the statement was made in respect to the reduction and reorganization of the militia when the defence committee had already set it aside as a special problem for examination. The committee's work in this regard would have assisted the minister.

The committee did plenty of work to assist the minister in what was probably the most urgent area, Europe. It was on that particular point that the committee concentrated its efforts, got the greatest amount of advice and offered the most numerous recommendations. I am glad to see the minister acceded in part to those recommendations, and I believe that strengthens my argument that it would have been better to withhold an announcement so far as the militia were concerned until the committee had dealt with that problem.

I can assure the minister there is a great deal of unrest in the ranks of the militia, unrest caused by uncertainty. If the minister wanted to carry out a reorganization of the militia, and I think one was due, it would have been preferable for him to set up the committee under Brigadier Suttie to examine the problem before making an announcement regarding what was to be done.

The minister made a grand announcement about the militia and the naval and air force reserves. Orders were issued that premises had to be vacated by certain dates, and no provision was made for the training of cadets. Because of that the orders were deferred, a review was made of the premises, and they are to be kept in operation until the end of June, when it is expected that we will get the report from the minister's committee or commission in regard to the militia. But why was there this sort of grandiloquent announcement and then withdrawals from it? The militia are most unhappy. This has left them up in the air.

What does the minister think about the survival operations training in the militia? Where does this fit in? The white paper has indicated that survival training and operations must be subject to the location of an anti-I.C.B.M. deployment, when and if that comes, and that no decision can be reached in the interim on survival operations. This is a rather unhappy state of affairs, and again it would have been far better to wait to see what the committee would bring forth, had it sat early enough this year to have gone into the question of the militia, survival training and survival operations.

I do not know how far the minister has gone in contacting the militia to get their reactions to this, but I can tell him that they are very unhappy. What about all our national survival and radiation control projects? Certain construction projects have gone forward and some have been interrupted. Officers have been posted as radiation control officers, but once they get that posting they have nothing to do. The whole thing is in a process of uncertainty. For the life of me I cannot understand why some of these decisions were announced in the manner they were and then the whole thing left hanging. Whether it was because of a certain desire to impress somebody that something was being done, I do not know. I do not even know that it has yet shown it is going to save money, because the cut-back of so many thousands in the militia is only a cut-back on paper, as the men are not there, and that means there is no saving of money. It is only when you cut back the effective strength that you are going to save money.

One of the things I hope the minister will be able to discuss with us was raised by the defence committee, with regard to the complexities introduced into his department by the existence of two ministers. I know this is a delicate matter and perhaps the minister does not want to step on the toes of the associate minister, but I ask is it absolutely necessary to have two ministers within the framework of the Department of National Defence? The administration of the department is great, but I would think it is still possible to organize that department on the basis of one minister and on one minister alone. I am not suggesting that the associate minister wishes to fire the Minister of National Defence or vice versa, but this is something fundamental, particularly when we are going to get a reorganization on a functional basis within the whole department.

Before terminating my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the minister in paying a tribute to the men and women in the armed services.

They have served well. A lot of them will no longer be needed. But I can assure this committee that many senior officers with whom I have discussed this question over the past year felt there was a need for change, a change in approach. Obviously there are likely to be serious dislocations, but I believe anyone who approached this question in a spirit of calmness and objectivity would realize that some changes were necessary in the Department of National Defence. Certainly changes were due with regard to some roles, and I will limit myself today to this particular point. I could cover a wide spectrum as far as Europe is concerned. I could deal with the militia in greater detail. I should certainly like to examine the role of our troops in Europe. But I will leave these matters to some of my colleagues who served on the defence committee and took part in the examination of those subjects.

I hope the minister in his closing statement will furnish us with much more information. I have tried to remain strictly relevant to the subject today although a wide open debate is permitted. It is for this reason that I am not touching on certain of the subjects I have mentioned. The contents of this bill are to be referred to the committee on defence, but here again there is a difficulty. The minister naturally wishes to go forward. He is asking us to go ahead right now. The committee on defence could say "We will leave this bill to the end." However, I do not think the minister would want that to happen. I would caution him, however, that I do not think the bill need come out of the committee very quickly. I say this because the measure has so many ramifications which will need to be examined. As long as the minister is reasonably patient with us, this examination can be carried out. As long as he does not want the bill back, say, in two weeks from now, the committee will be able to carry out its task.

I should like to know what deadline he has in mind as far as this proposal is concerned. I think we must be very careful about this, because the legislation now before us is the foundation of the whole structure and if we go wrong at this point we are likely to go wrong at many others. I for one would have preferred, at the present time, to have examined something else in the committee, but now the minister has forced our hands and I am a little unhappy about it.

There are others who wish to speak on this subject as well as on other aspects of defence. I had hoped the minister would give us a much fuller statement on defence matters generally than he did, because it is several months since he gave a report on these matters to the house and to the country.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): We in this party welcome the reappointment of the special committee on defence. The committee, as its own report shows, was well aware that it only scratched the surface in its investigation of the matters committed to it. In fact the report lists a whole series of subjects which in the opinion of the committee require further study.

The very first recommendation of the committee was that it be reappointed early in the session. I must say I hope it was just an oversight or accident, rather than a reflection of the seriousness with which the government takes this committee, that in fact the committee is not being reconstituted until well into the month of May. I think members of the committee all feel that the committee could do a more useful job if it were sitting more or less continuously while parliament itself is in session.

In this party we shall support Bill C-90 on its second reading. In our view it provides a useful first step or piece of machinery looking to the integration of the armed forces; I think the hon. member for Edmonton West used some other expression, "concentration of command". Whatever it is, we think it is a useful first step. Indeed, in the light of the role which we see for our armed forces, a role I intend to discuss later, we believe that integration of staff, or integration of command, is not only advisable but absolutely essential. However, I should like to devote most of my remarks to expressing as clearly and vigorously as I can our disagreement—my disagreement—with the defence policy outlined in the government's white paper.

May I call it one o'clock? I am beginning a new subject.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: One o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, when I ceased speaking at one o'clock I had just explained that I intended to use the opportunity presented by this debate to say as clearly and vigorously as I could that we in this party disagree with a great deal of the defence policy outlined in the government's white paper. When the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) made his famous speech in Scarborough in January, 1963, he said that his party felt bound to honour the commitments made by the previous government to acquire tactical nuclear warheads for our army brigade in Europe and for the strike reconnaissance squadrons stationed in Europe, as well as for the Voodoos and Bomarc missiles attached to NORAD. At the same time, however, he promised a thorough examination of the whole basis of Canadian defence policy. I would like to quote his words on that occasion. This is the Scarborough speech of January 12, 1963, in which he said:

> The government should re-examine at once the whole basis of Canadian defence policy. In particular it should discuss with the United States and with NATO a role for Canada in continental and collective defence which would be more realistic and effective for Canada than the present one.
>
> This examination would be concerned, among other things, with the necessity of building up NATO's conventional forces and the part Canada could play in this.

A little later he said:

> In the full re-examination of defence policy, and in which all parties could participate through a defence committee of the House of Commons, a Liberal government would be guided by the following considerations:

I will not read all the considerations, but one of them was this:

> Our financial resources are limited. Therefore we should be careful to see that our defence dollars are spent sensibly and economically, avoiding commitments which require expensive equipment that is, or soon will be obsolete; and activities that are, or soon will be, meaningless.

Later, if I am not mistaken, I heard the Prime Minister say in this house that the tactical nuclear commitment that he said had been made by the previous government was, in his opinion, a mistake. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) himself when in opposition wrote an article which was published on January 25, 1963 in which he explained the defence policy of the Liberal government. This article was in a paper called The Varsity Weekend Review, and in it, as one might expect, the minister supported the stand taken by the Prime Minister at Scarborough. He added these words, however:

> One of the questions which bothers many sincere people is this: Will not the fulfilment of our commitments now make it impossible for us to pursue anything but a nuclear role in the future? The answer in my opinion is a resounding no.
> In the future we will be able to adopt the policy which we think is most in keeping with our national objectives. Once the policy has been agreed on, however, we will be expected to fulfil it without equivocation.

Then he said:

> The other question people are asking is why we bother to fulfil our commitments when we intend to negotiate new ones in due course.

He goes on to explain that:

> Only in this way can we earn again the right to speak forcefully in the alliance. Second, renegotiation implies consent of our allies, and when agreement has been reached the implementation of a new policy cannot be achieved at once—it is physically impossible. It will require, at best, several months for a new government to adopt a sound, long range policy and present it to our allies for concurrence. It will take several years to implement the new agreed policy within the limitations of orderliness and a reasonable level of defence expenditures. In other words, by the time a new policy could be implemented in full our present commitments would be honoured in full, and the equipment we now have would have served its useful life.

Consistently with those two pronouncements by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, we in the defence committee, the members of the house, and indeed the Canadian public have heard from time to time about this proposed re-examination of Canada's defence role. We were led to expect that out of the white paper would emerge, I think it was called a bold, new policy for Canada that would set a new course for Canada's defence posture for a decade. It is our view, Mr. Speaker, that the mountains have laboured and produced a mouse. The white paper contains some sensible and useful observations and a few good suggestions as to the machinery, but when it comes to the re-examination of Canada's role, the white paper evades the issue. It calls for nothing more than a continuance of policies based on a strategy which in our opinion is obsolete, provocative and dangerous.

The white paper has had a very good press. I suspect the reason for this is that many of our editorial writers and commentators seem to know little and care less about the problem of defence. I do not expect to gain any particular popularity in those circles by saying this, but the facts speak for themselves. The general public has been led to believe that the integration of the services which is proposed by the white paper and which is partially implemented, or perhaps a better word would be foreshadowed, by the bill before the house will result in substantial reductions of the defence budget. Indeed, in my own home town we saw screaming headlines in the newspapers the day the white paper was announced declaring a $100 million cut in defence expenses. In all fairness the white paper does not pretend to say any such thing. Page 19 is very much more modest. It says this:

Thus, integration will result in a substantial reduction of manpower strength in headquarters, training and related establishments, along with other operating and maintenance costs. The total savings to be effected as a result of such reductions will make available funds for capital equipment purchases, and eventually make possible more equitable distribution of the defence dollar between equipment and housekeeping costs. Sufficient savings should accrue from unification to permit a goal of 25 per cent of the budget to be devoted to capital equipment being realized in the years ahead.

The goal is, therefore, that 25 per cent of the expenditures should be devoted to capital equipment. But the special committee on defence—and I assume the information they had was accurate—makes this statement in paragraph 39 of its report:

Evidence presented to the committee shows that approximately 77 per cent of Canada's total defence budget, 1963-1964, is allocated to the payment of salaries and to expenditures concerning maintenance and operations, while only 23 per cent of the budget is for new equipment.

I do not know whether the phrase "new equipment" as used there is the same matter which is referred to as "capital equipment" in the white paper, but if it is you will notice, Mr. Speaker, that the aim of the white paper is to achieve a shift from 23 per cent to 25 per cent. While that is a laudable, worth-while objective, the size of the change is not very remarkable.

A close examination of the white paper indicates that if—and I emphasize the word if—its recommendations are carried out it will involve a substantial addition to present defence expenditures. The white paper proposes a series of what it calls major expenditures and these are new expenditures to be made largely in the next few years. Page 24 of the white paper says:

On the basis of this assessment, major expenditures in the next few years will be designed to:

(a) re-equip the army as a mobile force;
(b) provide an adequate air and sea lift for its immediate deployment in an emergency;
(c) acquire tactical aircraft;
(d) maintain a relatively constant improvement of maritime anti-submarine capability.

Those are praiseworthy objectives and I am not opposing them in any way, but I do say that if we continue our former commitments and then add these new expenditures which are proposed in the white paper we shall be adding to the burden of taxation of the Canadian people in regard to defence rather than reducing it. And this will be at a time when the responsible leaders of most of the other major countries of the world are in fact reducing their expenditure on defence.

I know the minister confined himself to the bill, but he did not touch on what is the major problem facing Canada in the matter of defence, and that is that we are in my view faced with a choice of roles in the field of defence. I think it is the tragedy of the white paper, and the weakness of the policy of this government, that no choice is made between the options but that the government seeks to do both things at the same time. One option, as I see it, is to go on doing just what we have done before, that is maintaining an army brigade and air squadrons in Europe armed with tactical nuclear weapons. The other option is to concentrate on a highly mobile conventional force which would be available quickly for intervention roles in any part of the world, and on the periphery of NATO, if you like, where according to what we were told in the defence committee the danger is greatest, or for use as United Nations forces to help put out brush fire wars and to stop them expanding into major conflicts, and perhaps into nuclear disasters.

The white paper accepts neither of these options. It attempts to sit on both stools at the same time. As I said in the budget debate, it makes overtures to the new love and at the same time retains its commitments to the old. This party, Mr. Speaker, believes that the time has come for Canada to choose clearly and unequivocally a particular role, and we believe that that role could be the conventional non-nuclear, highly mobile intervention role to provide such forces as United Nations peace keeping activities may require and also as the alliance may require to deal with minor conflicts which might break out in Europe.

The role which I have suggested is not my idea or the idea of this party. It was suggested as being the suitable role for Canada in the special committee on defence, the suggestion being made by two very distinguished Canadian soldiers, both former chiefs of staff, General Charles Foulkes and Lieutenant-General Guy Simonds. I should like to read what Lieutenant-General Simonds said first of all, as reported at page 439 of the committee report:

> I believe that a role which is suited to a country of our size, and having regard to the financial burdens possible to be borne over a lengthy term, would be a tri-service force whose main objective was peace keeping. I believe its organization should be very much like that of the United States marine corps which is a mobile force complete with all its ancillaries and able to meet what are commonly called brush fire situations.

Then General Foulkes, in the course of his evidence before the special committee on defence said this, as reported at page 507:

> This suggested rearrangement would eventually concentrate the Canadian defence effort into two major activities:
>
> (a) The operation of a mobile ready reserve available immediately for NATO or to meet a UN task anywhere in the world or maintain our sovereignty in the Arctic.
> (b) Antisubmarine operations in the Atlantic-Pacific and perhaps in the Arctic.

I should like to make it clear, having read only two brief passages from the advice given the committee by these gentlemen, that they in turn make it perfectly clear that they were not thinking of this role which they described in the words I have read as an addition to what we are doing at the present time. They were suggesting—and I suggest it is the only rational suggestion—that it be an alternative to what we are doing at this moment.

[Mr. Brewin.]

If we plan, as the white paper clearly does, to keep up the contribution of a brigade in the forward defence of Europe, if we plan to maintain our air force squadrons in a strike reconnaissance role in Europe—I believe some squadrons are merely used for reconnaissance, but by and large the main role is strike reconnaissance—and if we also intend to maintain a small intervention force and an antisubmarine role for our navy, then the integration talked about will be virtually meaningless. If, on the other hand, we concentrate on an intervention role, integration would be not only sensible, it would be inevitable.

The New Democratic party firmly rejects the present government's policy of continuing the old obsolete policy of taking part in a strategy that relies upon tactical nuclear weapons, or a tactical nuclear response to any act of aggression or disturbance in Europe. The white paper does refer to the importance of peace keeping activities, and I must say that it takes a slight step in the right direction. It proposes that the two brigades in Canada at the present time, assigned to a reserve role for NATO, should, in the words of the white paper, "be re-equipped as a mobile force . . . to permit effective deployment in circumstances ranging from service in the European theatre to the United States peace keeping operations".

At present, Mr. Speaker, as I imagine most of the members of the house know, these brigades lack transport and could not reach the scene of any likely hostilities until long after the hostilities were over, so this proposal is definitely a step in the right direction. But unfortunately it is accompanied in the white paper by a firm decision to stick to the present role played by our air force and army in Europe. I suggest quite seriously to the government that they will find it impossible to do both or to do both adequately. I am afraid too that they will choose the line of least resistance, stick to the old and obsolete role, or carry on the new intervention role in a halfhearted inadequate manner.

I have referred to our present contribution to NATO as being part of a strategy that is obsolete, provocative and dangerous, one that could, indeed, be disastrous. There is very little discussion of this matter in the white paper although I detect, perhaps wrongly, a certain coolness toward the role we are playing. We are going to phase out of it eventually. I think one can read that between the lines. At page 12 of the white paper there is a reference to some of the basic considerations which should affect our policy at the present time. The white paper has this to say:

> The period 1945-1963 has been characterized by rapid changes in strategic concepts owing mainly to revolutionary developments in military technology and in political circumstances. This has led to the obsolescence of strategic concepts and of military equipment. Difficult adjustments have been called for on the part of all nations. It is not in Canada alone that there are differences of opinion in regard to strategy. In the alliance as a whole there is a wide range of views.

Those statements are perfectly correct but unfortunately they are not followed up in the white paper. If the house will bear with me I will try to explain briefly why I say that our present strategic role in NATO is not only wrong but dangerous. The house will be aware that in 1954 the American secretary of state, Mr. John Foster Dulles, articulated what was known as the doctrine of massive retaliation, that is to say, the use of the threat to exploit the American nuclear monopoly in order to deter even the most minor acts of aggression that might take place in Europe. This doctrine became obsolete almost before it was announced as its basis, which was the American monopoly of strategic nuclear power, ceased to exist.

When it became evident that any nuclear exchange meant mutual suicide, the threat of the nuclear deterrent to meet a relatively minor crisis became quite incredible except perhaps in the remote circumstances of an all-out attack on Europe. This doctrine was replaced by the doctrine of limited war. This doctrine envisaged that NATO troops in Europe should respond to any aggressive act in Europe with tactical nuclear weapons. This doctrine was the basis for the arrangements made by the NATO council in 1958 for the arming of NATO forces in Europe with tactical nuclear weapons. It was the basis for the commitment made at that time which the present government felt obliged to carry out, and has in fact recently carried out, with the result that our brigades in Europe are armed with Honest John rockets with nuclear warheads, and our air force squadron in Europe is equipped with nuclear weapons to carry out their strike reconnaissance role 300 or 400 miles behind the front lines.

As a result of this doctrine the forces of NATO and the NATO allies in Europe have been fully supplied with tactical nuclear weapons integrated into the smaller units and, indeed, Mr. McNamara, in his famous speech in New York in October or November of last year, said that the United States and its allies have established a marked superiority in tactical nuclear weapons over those possessed by Soviet forces. He said also that the explosive power of the tactical nuclear weapons in Europe was equivalent to 10,000 times the explosive power delivered on Hiroshima and Nagasaki to end the last world war.

Not only are the forces in Europe equipped with tactical nuclear weapons but they are trained to use them and our own brigade in Europe, as we saw, in taking part in tactical exercises, assumed as a matter of course that they would open up with tactical nuclear weapons in the relatively early stage of hostilities. But, Mr. Speaker, this is the point. In the meantime the doctrine of limited nuclear war and reliance on tactical nuclear weapons has come under severe criticism from a wide range of military analysts and critics. These second thoughts have been due to the fact that once again NATO does not have a monopoly of these weapons, and it has been due to a recognition of the immensely destructive effects of their use even on so-called tactical or military targets.

I am not sure whether this is accurate—the minister may know more about it—but I believe there was an operation known as Sagebrush in the southern United States where, after a week's warfare—mock warfare, fortunately—in which tactical nuclear weapons were used, the umpires were asked to assess the result, and their assessment of the result was that all of the troops and all of the civilians in three states of the union had lost their lives. It is not very remarkable that in these circumstances many of the people in Europe, for example, wonder whether being defended in a nuclear war in which they would all lose their lives is a particularly helpful form of defence.

In addition, the main criticism of the use of tactical nuclear weapons has been the threat of what is called escalation. Once you cross the threshold from conventional into nuclear arms, even on a small scale, then in all the excitement and circumstances of war you cannot keep the war limited. You have a process of escalation which will then end in the suicide of a mutual strategic nuclear holocaust.

Another thing that has changed the views of those concerned with strategy is recognition of the fact that the myth of a vast Soviet superiority in conventional forces was just that, a myth. Mr. McNamara made that abundantly clear in his speech in November to which I have already made reference.

I suggest that our strike reconnaissance force is particularly dangerous because it is vulnerable. The incentive in a moment of rising tension for one side or the other to strike first is so great, they cannot wait to be sure whether or not war is coming. There is an ambiguous act that may mean war, and the advantage of destroying the other person on the ground before they have destroyed you is so great that the situation may well get out of control and an unintended nuclear holocaust would follow. Indeed, in my opinion that is the main danger of war at the present time. There is very little danger of anybody being so crazy as to attempt the suicidal course of a planned nuclear attack on Europe or North America. This is highly improbable unless we assume a degree of insanity that does not exist. What is less improbable is that, with this confrontation of massive power set up in Europe some incident will arise and tension will grow and the temptation to release a striking force first will be so powerful that the thing will not end until there is the destruction of our civilization.

We were told in Europe—when I say "we", I mean the defence committee—by the wisest observers, that the strike reconnaissance role should not be carried out by aircraft based on the ground because they are too vulnerable. It should be carried out by Polaris submarines which can afford to wait. There is no incentive to use them immediately for the purpose of averting a threat by striking first. If only submarines were used in this particular instance one could afford to wait to make sure the threat is unambiguous, and war is real. Even the ability to wait a few hours could make the difference between destruction of the world and non-destruction. Why do I say this? I say this because even a few hours many enable political wisdom and common sense to intervene and the disaster of all-out war would be prevented.

What does the white paper say about this strike reconnaissance role? It says nothing but that we should carry out what we have been doing. What does it say about our contribution to the front line? It says we should maintain our present role in Europe, but it points out no military reason for doing so at all. It alleges political necessity for doing so. It is suggested that if we pull out of the front line and cease carrying on this particular role, somehow or other we will undermine the whole idea of NATO and the morale of the European countries.

I want to make it very clear I am not advocating the total withdrawal of our forces from Europe. As I have said already, our intervention forces such as I have recommended, could play in my view a much more useful military role than the role we are playing at the present time. I agree it would be a mistake to do anything that might imply disunity or weakness in the western alliance. However, I suggest it would be a sign of good sense as well as strength if Canada and her NATO allies were to move towards easing the political tensions in Europe by ceasing to rely upon tactical nuclear weapons as an immediate response to any threat in Europe. I am not suggesting they should be thrown into the sea. I am suggesting they be withdrawn well behind the line, where they would not be used early in any conflict which arises. Canada's contribution to European defence is probably one two hundredth of the whole. I suggest it is a little ridiculous to suggest that, because we move out of a role that I suggest is dangerous and no longer necessary, somehow or other that would undermine the defence of Europe. After all, Europe is not what it was when we first sent our troops to NATO. Europe has grown stronger and grown more prosperous. She is perfectly well able to look after her own commitments although, as I say, the contribution of an intervention force to deal with problems which, according to the information we received were at the top end of the spectrum, the things most likely to happen, such as probes in Norway, in Denmark, in Turkey or Thrace—

Mr. Hellyer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Brewin: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Would he explain to me the difference between his proposed intervention force and the force we have planned?

Mr. Brewin: I am saying you should have concentrated on this intervention force—

Mr. Hellyer: But what is the difference between your proposed force and ours?

Mr. Brewin: You have proposed in your white paper two brigades and you propose to equip them more effectively to play this intervention role. I think that is a good idea, and I have said so. However, I do not believe you can do that and carry on this other role which at one time the minister himself thought should be re-examined, and of which I believe he was just as sceptical not very long ago as I am myself.

I must say that the white paper reminds me of the old case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, the person with the split personality. I do not know whether the minister claims authorship for the entire white paper, but I read somewhere in a newspaper that he was the main author. Certainly, he accepts responsibility. I find interspersed between sensible and perceptive observations, some good suggestions with weak and evasive conclusions. There is, however, one good thing about the white paper, and that is it makes a virtue out of flexibility. I hope the policy is sufficiently flexible to enable the government to move quickly towards the adoption of the sort of defence policy that we in this party recommend. We recommend a policy and role which is realistic and distinctively Canadian, a policy which we think is commensurate with our means and our aptitudes, a policy which is needed in the world, indeed in the alliance. We believe that this policy would be consistent with an international policy based upon the strengthening of the United Nations and its peace forces, a policy based upon the urgent need for making progress in disarmament, particularly in the difficult but dangerous confrontation in central Europe.

Lastly, we believe that this is a contribution that Canada is particularly fitted to make because it cannot be made in the same way by the major powers or the former colonial powers. We think that we can make it and we should concentrate on making a contribution to these peace keeping forces through strengthening the United Nations and eventually building in that way a world order. The government has moved in that direction and I commend them for it, but they have not had the courage to break off from the old things they were doing before. I venture to suggest that if you try to do both of these things together, you will find yourselves on the horns of a dilemma and one or the other will have to go. I am afraid that as long as you stick to these old commitments and do not boldly say they are obsolete or outdated, and we have to get out of them, then I do not think you are likely to make a really effective contribution to the peace keeping forces about which the Prime Minister himself has spoken so eloquently in his speeches and about which he has written in Maclean's.

I think that this white paper is a disappointment in that it promises us a bold new policy, but it advances haltingly and inadequately towards that policy. It fails to grasp the facts that it should have grasped. I hope the flexibility it promises means that the government is still open to give real reconsideration to the role that Canada should play in defence.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): We welcome this opportunity today to participate in the debate on this very important subject of national defence. It does not seem as though these opportunities present themselves too often. We do hope that in the course of this particular debate we shall be able to discuss a great many related subjects and we will not be confined to the particular measure that is actually before the house. My understanding is that a fairly wide range is permitted in this debate at the moment and I shall proceed, therefore, on that basis.

Many references have been made and are being made today to the apparent relaxation in international tension. We certainly hope that there is some basis for these particular statements. On the other hand, in view of all the considerations we dare not be lulled into any feeling of false security, so I believe the maintenance of a relatively small but efficient defence force is essential at the present time to remind any potential aggressor that we will not tolerate any violation of our national borders nor any infringement of our sovereignty. In addition to that responsibility of defending our own borders, we have the broader participation in the North American defence operations, and the still wider responsibility of making our contribution to the defence of the free world.

As has been pointed out, during the course of the last session the special committee on defence was established. I believe that generally people look upon the establishment of that committee as a very worth-while project. Many people who have given some attention to the matter would agree very satisfactory work was done by that committee during its sittings last year.

Just prior to Christmas the committee tabled a report, which had been prepared somewhat in haste and without having the time to complete a thorough study of all the relevant problems. Nevertheless, that report does make some definite recommendations. I do not want to take up the time of the house today by reading the list of the various items to which the committee felt attention must be given.

It is rather extensive, and there was no desire on the part of the committee to intimate in any sense that it had completed its assignment.

The general feeling among committee members was really that we had just commenced our studies, and the iterim report that was submitted contained just a few of the recommendations that were more or less obvious ones. With regard to a great many other important matters, the committee felt a lot of them were of such magnitude that it was not in a position to make any definite recommendations with regard to them. Therefore it submitted a list of these other matters which it decided should be considered when the committee was reconstituted.

As I say, the committee made certain specific recommendations, but having listened to the minister's statement today I wonder if he thinks they were very important. In fact the general attitude of the minister has been rather discouraging, so far as the work of the committee is concerned. He has given us his blessing. He has stated that every co-operation would be given the committee, but yet in a great many instances we have found that he has proceeded to forge ahead in certain fields that the committee felt should be thoroughly studied before any action was taken in them.

In other cases the minister has indicated somewhat of an impatience with the work of the committee, and that he had to move ahead himself because, in the final analysis, it is his responsibility to make important decisions. For that reason I wonder whether the minister places any great reliance upon the recommendations of the committee, or whether he has any practical appreciation of the work that the committee has been endeavouring to do.

The main item which is before us today is Bill C-90, which has to do with the unification of command. In paragraph 27 of its report the committee made mention of this particular matter as follows:

> In order to follow up the second chapter, further time is required to study the following matters:
> (a) Integration and co-ordination of the armed services.
> (b) Role of the militia and other reserves.
> (c) Compulsory military service.
> (d) Manpower management.
> (e) Service colleges.
> (f) Civil defence.

This shows the committee felt sufficient study had not been given to this particular matter of unification and integration, and it suggested that when the committee was reconstituted it would be able to give its time and attention to a more thorough study and analysis of this particular problem. But now we find the minister moving forward, introducing the amendment having to do with this matter, thus showing neglect and a repudiation of the position of the committee relative to such a study.

The minister made a statement and referred to the necessity for a long range, co-ordinated defence policy. He stated that the moves that were anticipated through the introduction of this amendment were just part of this long range, co-ordinated defence policy. We certainly hope the time has arrived when we will have a co-ordinated, long range defence policy, because so far as the people of Canada are concerned they have been very dissatisfied. They have wondered just what the policy was, just what direction we were heading in, and what it was all about, because there did not seem to be any clear enunciation of defence policy in a manner that would enable them to understand what the minister and his department were trying to do in this particular matter.

Reference was made this morning to savings, and I would like to find a more adequate word because it was pointed out that this was more in the nature of a transfer of certain funds from one part of the budget to another. It was pointed out by one of the previous speakers that the percentage of the defence budget for overhead expenses was so far above the amount of money allowed for the procurement of new equipment that it was very badly out of balance. Reference was made to the matter of a 25 per cent, 75 per cent, and so on ratio. I can understand why the minister wants to make some correction in this particular matter, because it was pointed out by a number of the witnesses who appeared before the committee that there was a serious imbalance in this matter, and that more of the defence dollar should be spent on the procurement of new equipment with a consequent lowering of the percentage allowed for overhead and maintenance.

The minister also made reference to the provision for those who would be retiring prematurely because of the reorganization of the defence department. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised the question as to why there should be some discrimination regarding those who may want to retire and who express the desire to retire prematurely. If we are going to dispense with the services of a certain number of personnel then I do not know why people who may wish to retire prematurely should be penalized. It could be done on a voluntary basis and then the balance of the forced retirements would make up the total figure envisaged. I do not think people should be penalized and deprived of this consideration just because they would prefer to retire earlier.

This whole matter will have some effect upon the employment situation, upon the ability of individuals to secure gainful employment. Every precaution should be taken and every consideration given to see to it that those who are going to be displaced in this particular manner will not suffer unduly because of the change of policy. I wish to say right now that I agree with the proposal which is before us. I think it has been under study for a considerable length of time. I believe there are many aspects of it which should be analysed before we move forward with the whole program, but I believe it is a move in the right direction. Further, after discussing this matter with a great many people across this country, in the services and outside them, I have come to the conclusion that there is general support for a move of this kind intended to make the operation of our defence establishment more efficient.

Without question a radical change in defence thinking and planning is taking place. This has been made imperative as a result of the changes which have been taking place in weaponry and political alliances. Therefore, it is necessary that there should be a degree of flexibility, as far as defence planning is concerned, so as to keep in step with these various changes. Speaking personally, I think we should commend the minister for the initiative he has shown in taking hold of a difficult situation. In spite of the fact that his actions might not have been acceptable in some circles, he had the courage and the initiative to go ahead and propose changes which I believe have been due for a long time.

As we consider the problem of defence generally, as far as Canada is concerned, I think we find ourselves in a special position, or a difficult position, because Canada with a huge land mass and a relatively small population must find it hard to meet every situation which could possibly arise relative to her defence. I do not think it is easy to plan in these circumstances. I do not think it is easy to envisage the situations which may arise in the future and exactly how we ought to prepare to meet them. For this reason, as I say, I believe a certain degree of flexibility is necessary, and the fact that the minister has indicated his agreement with this view is to be commended.

I shall not attempt to elaborate this afternoon the policy which we in this group have advanced from time to time, except to say that it seems as though the ideas we have suggested and which we have in mind are gradually being recognized and that at least some of the proposals we put forward are being adopted. I do not say we can take any credit for that, but at least we had the vision to put forward some of these ideas which are now being taken up and implemented. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who spoke before me, said the government was taking a halting step in this direction. Well, I believe halting steps are better than no steps at all. The direction in which we are moving at this time and the proposals which are being made indicate that the government is moving on a course which is, I believe, acceptable to a great many people across the nation.

I should like to read a brief paragraph from a statement made by our leader, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) stating defence policy. He said Canada's objectives should be the creation of a strong, modern, completely mobile and efficient force. I think that sums it up succinctly. We still believe this should be our objective. Canadian forces must be adequate to maintain surveillance of our skies and coasts and also to meet any emergency which may arise. However, we have a wider responsibility. I believe it is essential that we should continue to co-operate with the United States in measures for the defence of the North American continent. This was pointed out, I believe, in the committee's report. On page 758, the recommendation is that Canada remain a member of NORAD since the defence of North America is a joint responsibility. I believe this is essential because, as I have indicated, Canada, with its vast land area and small population cannot hope to meet the challenge which would be imposed by any massive aggression. We must, therefore, depend to a large extent on our neighbours and, in turn, we must be willing to make our contribution to the extent that it is possible in the defence of North America.

Moving further afield, there is a necessity for continued co-operation with our NATO allies in the field of collective defence. This subject would possibly lead us into a discussion of nuclear arms and nuclear commitments. I do not intend to go deeply into that now, because the views of our group have already been set forth in this respect.

Here again, if we interpret correctly the tenor of the evidence given by witnesses before the defence committee and, somehow, project the nature of the move being made on the part of the government, it would appear we are leaving the nuclear field, now, in favour of a more conventional type of operation. We think this is to be commended. Indeed, we have advocated it through the past years.

The United Nations remains, of course, the universal organization to which is committed the maintenance of peace. In this connection we have supported and continue to support the contributions which Canada is making because these, after all, are part of national defence. In contributing in any way to the maintenance of peace in the world, no matter where the peace may be threatened, we are contributing to our own national defence. The world today is getting smaller. We can no longer think of it as segments separated by so many miles or days. The world is shrinking and becoming exceedingly small. Therefore we believe that in continuing our support of the United Nations and its peace keeping operations we are making a contribution to the defence of our own nation as well as to the peace of the world.

I just wanted to make these few remarks about the bill which is before us and about the whole subject of national defence. Others of our group will be speaking on this subject. We do think it is necessary to maintain, as I have said, a strong, well equipped, modern mobile force because we believe that in this way we can best defend this nation and make our contribution to the defence of the North American continent as well.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, in respect to Bill No. C-90 with which we are dealing, we understand from the different expressions we have heard and from looking over the bill that it is concerned with an integration of the armed forces and concentration of command. These expressions apply very well to the subject we are discussing, but the bill itself is mainly concerned with the concentration of command. We also have the information given us by the minister in the white paper on defence, which I imagine is a summary of his ideas on the establishment of a military program, and so forth. Coupled with that we have another summary of the white paper. This makes three summaries. I will probably try to summarize them, so on the whole these summaries may be very lengthy. I shall try to give a summary of the summary of the summary in order to arrive at what should be done in this matter of defence. If the minister will refer to Hansard he will see that on Friday, December 9, 1963 I spoke on this matter to a certain extent, and I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion. However, I will reiterate a few of the points I raised at that time, especially concerning the integration of the armed forces.

Before dealing with that matter I would like to say to the minister that in my opinion this bill should be a little more extensive. I know it is a starting point, but the starting point is not quite correct, as I understand the position, because today we are talking about the naming of the chief of the main headquarters and, if my information is correct, he has been named already and is leaving tomorrow with the delegation for Colorado Springs. I will let the minister answer that one and say whether I am correct. Also, I gather that the headquarters will still be in Colorado Springs. I have always understood Colorado Springs to be in the United States and I do not imagine its location will be changed in any way after we have named the chief of the main headquarters. I have a suspicion that not only the minister controls that office, but also some of our good and willing neighbours sometimes give us a helping hand, which I would say is not always to our own benefit. If we are to have a command which is completely Canadian, I do not see why we have to establish it in the United States. This is one point about which the minister should be concerned and should endeavour to bring this command back to Canada. We and the United States have to work together as an international power. That is okay; but working together means we must also be able to make some of our own decisions.

We have been discussing the integration of our forces, and quite a few question marks pop up as we consider this problem. In fact, some objections were made in this regard last summer when we were on a NATO tour of different military bases in Europe. These objections were raised by some of the high ranking officers and were on this basis. When we spoke with somebody in the navy, he had his views on it. Then we went over and saw somebody in the army. He had his views on it, and his views were different. Then we went and saw somebody in the air force, and he had different views on it. We found that these views are not always the same. The navy would be willing to be integrated completely so long as they were allowed to keep their traditions and customs. This also applies to the army and the air force. This is one thing the minister has not discussed in the white paper. Perhaps he has an idea of what he is going to do in regard to the necessary co-ordination. In fact, Mr. Speaker, on page 19 of the white paper on defence we find the following passage:

> Two objections are given as reasons why integration should not be undertaken. First, that morale or "esprit de corps" is weakened, and second, that competition is diminished. Neither of these objections will stand against careful scrutiny.

The last one, namely that competition is diminished, can probably be overcome because I do not see how two Canadian armed forces such as the army and the navy can be competitive when they are trying to defend their own skins. There might be some people like that, because there is always pride in one's force, but I think this could be overcome. With regard to esprit de corps—and this is the most important of the two considerations—I think we can imagine the esprit de corps of the Canadian army as a whole, but there are different points which are going to be very ticklish to deal with. Whether you integrate or not, you will still have an air force, a navy and an army, and the guy who is undergoing army training is not riding on the boats or ships. The man in the navy is going to be boasting about the ships, and the man in the army is going to say how good it feels to be on solid ground. I think these are two different fields of activity which could be commanded by one general headquarters, but the soldiers or the bottom men will still have their own feelings and in my opinion will always keep them. This was one of the main objections raised by the military people themselves. They were wondering whether they were going to be given the same uniform. This is one thing the minister has not mentioned, although I may not have correctly understood what he said. You cannot have complete unity if you start producing a distinguishing effect with the uniform. Is the navy, the army, or the air force going to have a distinctive uniform, or will they all have the same uniform? Also, you have the civilian men in the army. They also have rank and qualifications. How are they going to be considered in this whole set-up? The minister has probably considered this matter, but this is one fact that we bring to his attention.

The minister this morning spoke mainly about saving $100 million. It is always good to save money, but if we are going to save money, or amend or change something, we must do it for the benefit and good of all. I agree with the minister about concentrating the integration of the armed forces under one command, but the way to go about it is what I would like to know about in more detail.

There is another thing upon which I commend the minister. In fact, I spoke about it on December 9. This is a subject dealt with by the hon. member who preceded me, and this was in the Social Credit platform. I refer to making the armed forces very effective, very mobile and versatile for our own uses. It is useless to consider joining the nuclear arms race that exists across the world. First of all, we cannot afford it, and second, by the time we have a nuclear war engine ready for operational use the thing will be obsolete and somebody else will have produced something new. It is no good our trying to keep up in such an arms race because we will always be three or four years behind the rest. So in regard to nuclear warfare we are about as useless as can be on a competitive basis.

I am glad the minister has understood this and is turning his attention toward another way of protecting the Canadian nation and also fulfilling our commitments throughout the world. We can do this by having very effective conventional weapons and also by training people to use them most effectively, not only in wartime but also in peacetime. This is also the goal of the armed forces. Quite a time elapsed between the two world wars, and the armed forces have been maintained since at great expense, just in case there was war. Some people say, if we want peace prepare for war. I think Caesar said that, but I still do not believe in that principle. I think if you want peace you also have to prepare for peace, and in peacetime the army has a role to play just as much as in wartime. It can be used in peacetime as a deterrent force. In wartime it is used as a defensive force as well as offensive; but it is mostly used defensively to protect this nation.

But in peacetime when we are not defending ourselves what are we doing with our armed forces? What are its members doing besides keeping their boots and buttons shined? We can give them something to do to build the country economically speaking instead of their being just an expense. We can use the army as an internal force to help the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We can use it in time of fire or floods. It is already used to a certain extent in this way but we can use it even more. These forces should be trained to be ready for action at any time of emergency, either in Canada or wherever help is required. It was ready when Cyprus needed it, as I could have told this house before.

In fact I spoke about that on December 9. I spoke about Turkey, having just returned from a tour of that country. Turkey is one country in the world which has one of the longest histories of warfare, dating back thousands of years. If Turkey had spent just 10 per cent of what it has spent on warfare and devoted it to other matters it would be one of the most beautiful countries to visit, as well as one of the most prosperous. But at the moment the economy of Turkey is very weak, a fact which the Turks express openly. Greece is not so much stronger, and they have the same sentiment towards war. When these two countries do not have a common enemy they fight between themselves. I do not know whether they are just trying to keep in practice, but soldiers should not be used only for fighting. We can also use them for something else, and the minister should tell us something more of his plans in this regard. Has he any definite ideas about using these armed forces later on, not only as a means of defence but also to help the country either in production, in protection, or in any way the minister wishes to consider?

I was talking a moment ago about trying to save a few dollars and perhaps I can assist the minister on this. I want to mention a matter which concerns Uplands airport and it relates to a practice which is common to a large extent right across the country in different fields, wherever government administration is concerned. At Uplands airport there is someone controlling the purchasing of transistors for transistor radios. Uplands airport purchase these transistors in lot purchases, although I do not know how. I also do not know why they need to use two men in a three ton truck to collect a transistor from a certain store in Ottawa. That is one matter the government should look into, because if it is done here it is probably done somewhere else as well. I do not know who authorizes these purchases, or who authorized two men and a three ton truck to go to a store and get a radio transistor.

There are also at Uplands electronic tubes which are used in television sets. I do not know how many televisions there are at Uplands airport, but practically anyone on the base can just about go into the storehouse and get a radio or television tube without saying where it is for use or for what instrument. A lot of these technicians come into town and do repair work as a sideline, and I would be interested to know where they get their television tubes. I would like the minister to check into this. I am not trying to state facts; I am just raising question marks. In fact, the minister has given us a lot of question marks so I am giving him a few back.

There is another matter which I should like to relate in French so that I do not get mixed up with technical terms. If the minister would listen and answer when he speaks I should be very much obliged.

[Translation]

Could the minister check up on this: Apparently, there is some buying of electric and electronic wire from an American firm to repair electrical and electronic equipment in Canadian planes. It would seem that the company purchased the wire after it had been discarded by the U.S. air force.

[Text]

If we are going to turn around and "buy American" this is beginning to be expensive. Therefore I should like the minister to check on that matter too.

These are all details which I am relating to the $100 million savings the minister was building up to. It is right to save, but we have to save all round. I should like the minister to check into these matters and to see whether there is any leak, because if he can prevent some sort of scandal it would be a lot cheaper to remedy the matter immediately.

The minister says the armed forces in Canada are to be transformed. We have to have concentration of command and integration of forces. But we also have to consider the preparation of our armed forces at the level of the militia cadets. I do not know how the minister is going to establish these cadet bases, but he might also take them into his consideration.

Militia courses are being given in my region, for example. The cadets are to be transported some 70 miles in the morning and some 70 miles back again at night, a round trip of approximately 140 miles. They will be trained during the day and brought back at night in this course which commences in June. According to the local authorities, with many more than 20 cadets it would be much cheaper if the training were done right on the spot, with the instructors there.

I do not know what risk the government will have to assume under the present plan or how much it would cost the government if one of these cadets was injured in a car accident. Has that point been considered? I know that some of the parents have complained about the plan. They would rather have the training done at Thetford Mines than for these cadets to be transported 140 miles every day.

I imagine the minister will solve these small problems when he gets around to them, but this one problem in my region may very well pop up somewhere else throughout the country. If we want to interest our young men in becoming cadets, let us not start out by discouraging them the first time they undertake military training.

I should like to refer to page 20 of the white paper, where reference is made to a recommendation of the royal commission on government organization in these words:

> The government accepts and will implement the recommendation of the commission "that the deputy minister be given greater responsibility for keeping under review the organization and administrative methods of the Canadian defence establishment, and assisting the minister in the discharge of his responsibility for the control and management of the armed forces."

I should like to discuss this matter briefly. This is one thing that is not in the bill. If there are going to be changes in the functions or powers of the deputy minister we should like to know exactly where we stand. We have in Canada a nation that is looking foward to a peacetime defence organization that will also provide adequate protection and efficiency in wartime. But I know one thing is true. The Canadian people will support the government in its work in this regard as long as it does not interfere with the economy too greatly by being too expensive for the country. If that should happen you can be sure that the government will not have the support of the Canadian people.

I think that is one reason why the Canadian people were so much against nuclear weapons. We could not afford them and they knew it. But we can afford to pay and will pay for a very efficient, versatile, mobile armed force, whether or not it is integrated under one command. It is the minister's problem to see that the forces co-operate and work together for the protection and maintenance of peace in this country.

Mr. Robert Temple (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is inescapable that a deplorably small percentage of our military defence budget is being used for the procurement of new equipment. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) mentioned that he thought the figure was in the neighbourhood of 23 per cent and therefore increasing it to 25 per cent was not very much. I suggest to him that the figure of 23 per cent includes the construction of new buildings and does not apply only to new equipment.

What has happened in the past ten years is that, from a high in 1954 of 42.9 per cent of our defence budget devoted to the purchase of new equipment, we have this year come to the point where only 13.3 per cent is being devoted to the procurement of new equipment. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, if this trend continues for another couple of years we will have well paid, well dressed and well fed forces but with the poorest equipment in the world. For this reason I am sure we all agree that this imbalance has to be corrected.

Another thing I like very much in the white paper on defence is the emphasis on mobile forces. I do not think this is shown any better than in Cyprus. Within a very short time from the time parliament gave its approval for Canadian troops to be sent to Cyprus they were landing on that island. But the reason that our troops were able to get to Cyprus so quickly is that Cyprus has an airport with hardened concrete runways that can take the Yukon transport planes that we have in Canada. The Yukon aircraft requires long hardened runways and fortunately Cyprus has them. Therefore I am very happy to see that, while we have acquired some already, the white paper calls for the acquisition of more C-130E Hercules aircraft.

The reason I am so happy is that this aircraft, with its different aerodynamic characteristics, can take off and land on relatively short and unimproved air strips. We have mobile forces that we can use to fulfil our NATO commitments and to assist the United Nations in dealing with brush fire wars, but I am afraid it will happen quite often that we will be wanting to send them to places that do not have excellent airports like Cyprus. There will be other places in the world to which we will want to send our forces for use by the United Nations in putting down brush fire wars, places that will not have airports of this type. Therefore I believe it is a very sound step to procure the Hercules C-130E short take-off and landing aircraft.

There has been some talk about not preparing for war and that this does not help to keep the peace. In that regard I should like to read a few words from the conclusion of the white paper. It states as follows:

> Force alone, as all history shows, is not able to establish an enduring and creative peace. Nevertheless, and regrettably, it is essential to maintain force on our side as a deterrent against attack from potential foes who are themselves heavily armed; as a means of removing the greatest temptation to an aggressor, the assurance of easy victory.

The maintenance of adequate force for the above purpose gives us the time in which men of wisdom, persistence and good will can work together to build a world where peace will be secured by stronger means than force. If we fail to take advantage of the opportunity that time gives us, then peace, and with it civilization, may be lost. If we spare no effort in seeking for peaceful solutions to the problems that divide and embitter men, then true peace may be established and all mankind gain the victory.

I feel that all members of the house agree with the work done by the defence committee last year and with its establishment this year. I say: Let us have second reading of the bill as soon as we can, send it to the committee and let the committee continue the work it did last year.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I want to say I am disappointed in the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) because of the way in which he introduced the debate today. This is what comes of attempting to make an arrangement to forgo the debate on the setting up of the defence committee in exchange for a general debate on the bill introduced by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer). We expected him to make a complete statement with regard to the defence situation in this country. Having made that arrangement, the Minister of National Defence simply talked on the narrow issue of the bill itself. I think he has performed a disservice to parliament and to the country in this regard.

We have not had a full debate on the problems of defence for five months. This is one of the most important areas of consideration, and a full statement should have been made by the minister today. This is the thing for which we were waiting, and this is what we did not get. It was on that basis we agreed to forgo the debate on the setting up of the committee. We could have had two debates and stretched them out for several days. However, we did not want to do that. We want to get on with the business of the country. However, before passing the bill or setting up the committee, we wanted to have a full disclosure of what has been going on in the field of national defence. The minister had his opportunity and did not take it. Once again he has failed to perform his duty, as I see it, because a heavy responsibility rests on the Minister of National Defence and on the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) of this country.

[Mr. Temple.]

I noticed that the minister told us the Prime Minister was in accord with his proposals in the white paper and in this bill. We were so encouraged to hear that the Prime Minister approved of what the Minister of National Defence was doing. What if he had disapproved? The Prime Minister does not approve of things that are being done by some of the other cabinet ministers, but we are now informed he approves of what the Minister of National Defence is doing. Obviously, he is the white haired boy of the cabinet. Then, the minister did as he did in December, he praised his associate minister. The associate minister will get up and praise the Minister of National Defence. This is what was done last December. They pat each other on the back and say, "My, how hard my colleague is working." They are the gold dust twins working together, struggling with these great problems. They are burning the midnight oil and producing a white paper.

What else have they produced in the course of the year that they have been in office? This is what we wanted to know today. We asked questions all last session with regard to national defence, but we could not get very satisfactory answers. One year has elapsed. What about the Prime Minister's promise that after closing the nuclear gap, to use his words, he would then negotiate Canada out of the nuclear field? What has happened to that in the course of a year? We have been very patient. We have been waiting for this diplomatic action. What has happened? The Minister of National Defence failed to tell us. Is this another broken promise by a promising Prime Minister? I wish the Prime Minister were here to give us an answer to this question. Why does he make these promises to the Canadian people and then fail to fulfil them? This is a question that is being asked right across this country. Promise after promise, tailored to suit an election campaign, has been made and then there has been the failure to fulfil these promises. What did the Prime Minister mean when he said he was going to undertake immediately to negotiate Canada out of the nuclear arms area? Obviously, he meant nothing.

Why does the Minister of National Defence not tell us something about the Bomarc, how much they are costing and things of that nature?

If we believed for one moment that the Bomarc provided any real protection with or without nuclear warheads we would concur in their use, but we do not believe so—

> In our minds it is not a question of using a missile with an atomic warhead such as the Bomarc. It is our conclusion after serious consideration that in the time period in which these missiles will be in operation they will provide no effective defence whatsoever and might just as well not be there. If anyone else thinks differently let him support the policy and let him pay the piper. We do not believe so.

These were the words used by the Minister of National Defence speaking in the House of Commons in August of 1960 when he was a member of the opposition. What has been done with the Bomarcs since he has undertaken responsibility for them? He had no use for them then; he was not going to pay the piper. Who is paying the piper now? Who is in control? He said:

> We particularly do not believe so when the atomic warheads would be under the control of the United States government.

Are they under the control of the United States government now? We have not heard one word from the minister with regard to the Bomarcs for which he had no use, according to words attributed to him on page 7572 of Hansard for August 4, 1960.

What about the Voodoos? Would he tell us the number of squadrons he has, and are they armed with nuclear missiles? Where are they stationed? What protection are we getting from the Voodoos in Canada? We have not heard one word from the Minister of National Defence. What about the Starfighters?

> It is true that we do have two air bases in Germany and presumably F-104's could operate from them. In the day of missiles, however, it would seem sheer folly to station eight squadrons of atomic equipped planes on two bases where they are vulnerable to sneak attack. We urge and demand that the government communicate to the house exactly what plans it has for the effective use of these machines.

These are the words used by the Minister of National Defence on August 4, 1960, when he was a member of the opposition, and they appear at page 7565 of Hansard. We have not had one word from the minister with regard to Starfighters. In December I asked him questions about the Bomarc, Voodoos and Starfighters. I said, let us know if any one of these Starfighters in Europe is equipped to fight. I got an answer on the order paper here not so long ago to the effect that they were not equipped. This air division in Europe could not fire a shot, so far as we know today or tomorrow if called upon to do so.

Now, I said the Minister of National Defence has heavy responsibilities and so has the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has to take responsibility for the defence of this country and, through his cabinet, he is responsible to the house and to the people. What is the state of readiness of our forces? One year has gone by since the election campaign at which time the present Prime Minister was saying we did not have any Starfighters in Europe equipped. He said there was a whole air division flying around in Europe not equipped to fight. There was not an air division then; there were only 18 planes. Of course, they were not equipped and we acknowledged that. A year has gone by, and is that air division fully equipped now?

What about the bases for the nuclear weapons for these F-104's? How many of them are there on ready alert, ready to take off at a moment's notice? How many are still stationed in France on bases where nuclear weapons, apparently, cannot be used? What teeth have the air force, except those in the police dogs that are guarding the missile dumps that have not yet been constructed. Is that all our air division in Europe is doing? Just a few years ago it was the elite air force in NATO, but the present Minister of National Defence wiped out the Sabre jets which were fully equipped to fight and were ready for action, at any time over a period of ten years. What is the air division in Europe doing now? Why did the minister not tell us this afternoon? Surely this is important. What purpose is served by having armed forces unless they are ready for instant action? That is the type of Minister of National Defence we are saddled with.

I hope the minister will give a reply to that in due course, or that the associate minister will do so when he gets up to compliment the minister and after he has finished patting him on the back.

With regard to the defence committee, everything I said about it in June last when we were setting it up has turned out to be true. I said I feared that matters of policy would be decided by the government without reference to the committee on defence. That happened. I said that I feared the committee on defence would be discussing various matters, hoping to evolve some advice for the government, and the rug would be pulled out from under it when it was involved in those discussions.

I can give two examples. The frigate program was cancelled by the government after the defence committee had been struggling with the problem for several days, getting evidence, examining figures and talking to the admirals, but all the time the Minister of National Defence and the associate minister had their hands on the rug. Suddenly they gave it a yank and that work done by the defence committee was just useless. The frigate program had been cancelled, but there was not one word to the committee while this was going on.

Subsequently the minister decided that there would be a serious curtailment of the militia forces of this country and, without referring this subject to the committee on defence, he appointed a committee, gave it instructions to bring in a report, and removed this from the subjects for discussion by the defence committee. What purpose can be served by a committee when it is treated that way?

During the course of one of our discussions here I asked the minister if he wanted advice on policy matters from the committee, and he said no. That was a very interesting day in committee when he said he did not want advice on policy. We were just to inform ourselves so that we would be able to participate in discussions on defence matters on the high level of the minister and the associate minister. Like groundlings, we were to emerge from the pit and get up on the stage if we had the information.

Now we are again setting up the defence committee. Is the minister going to refer problems to us? Will he let us discuss the question of the militia before the decision is made, or will he pull the rug out from under us while we are discussing that problem? Is there any use in our discussing it? If he has got all the answers and the decisions, what is the defence committee to do? That is the difficulty that we face. In my opinion the future of the defence committee is problematical and I wonder whether it really can be effective under those circumstances.

If I heard him right, the minister said that the bill presently before the house, if second reading is approved by the house, will go for consideration to the committee on defence. In other words, he is determining the subject matter that will be placed before that committee, because obviously a bill of this nature would have to be looked at and discussed soon. We would not want to delay it indefinitely.

I was interested in the reports we received month after month about the study the minister was undertaking, and the production of the white paper. We had more advance information with regard to that white paper than we had with regard to the production of the motion picture "Cleopatra." Week after week we were told, "A white paper is coming out; all your problems will be solved."

[Mr. Churchill.]

Then there were leaks of information as to what was to be contained in the white paper. Then there were inevitable delays because the minister was still studying the subject. It took him a whole year, or certainly ten months, to produce the white paper. Then it came out with a great glare of publicity. The highlights were presented for people to look at. It was described as a ten year plan, the "first such long term defence plan." The late Hon. Brooke Claxton, if he were now living, would not agree with that because he had long range defence plans, and so had his successors in office.

Then we had a list of the highlights in the white paper, as though there were something absolutely new and different in it. Some of the commentators indicated to the public that now at last Canada has an understanding of the goals of her defence policy. I know, Mr. Speaker, you know this, but strangely there are others who might not, namely that there have been other white papers. This will come as a surprise to a great number of people, but we have had white papers in existence, to my knowledge, from 1954-55 up to 1961, and there were some before that.

I have read all of these white papers and in many respects they are superior to the one for which we had to wait almost one year. In 1954-55 the Hon. Brooke Claxton published a white paper setting out Canada's defence objectives. He said:

> The objectives of our defence policy remain the same as heretofore:
>
> (i) The immediate defence of Canada and North America from direct attack;
>
> (ii) implementation of any undertakings made by Canada under the charter of the United Nations, or under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or other agreement for collective security;
> (iii) the organization to build up strength in a total war.

Defence policy was known to the minister of national defence, to parliament and to Canada as far back as 1954-55. A white paper was prepared each year after that, but I pick out the one prepared in 1959 by Hon. G. R. Pearkes, V.C., on the subject matter of defence policy. Fancy, talking about defence policy as far back as 1959. One would imagine that it was only in 1963-64, under this minister, that the subject of defence policy has been studied, perceived and disclosed, but back in 1959 we read this in parliament:

> Canadian defence policy derives directly from our foreign policy—

You will find a sentence like that in the present white paper.

> —and is designed to ensure national security and the preservation of world peace. These objectives are reached through collective arrangements within NATO and the United Nations.

Then, skipping a few sentences, I read this in paragraph 2:

In order to meet the objectives of the alliance and in support of the United Nations, it is the defence policy of Canada to provide forces for:

—The defence against an attack on the North American continent;

—The collective defence and deterrent forces of NATO in Europe and the North Atlantic;

—The United Nations to assist that organization in attaining its peaceful aims.

Well, there we are. Defence policy has been spoken about in this house and written about in numerous white papers. It has been expressed and re-expressed. And now, in March, 1964, we have a white paper on defence which is supposed to be the final word—the new look. This is a discovery which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) has made—a discovery of defence policy. He suggests to us in a foreword:

The objectives of Canadian defence policy, which cannot be dissociated from foreign policy—

These words are familiar in the light of what I have been reading.

—are to preserve the peace by supporting collective defence measures to deter military aggression; to support Canadian foreign policy including that arising out of our participation in international organizations, and to provide for the protection and surveillance of our territory, our air space and our coastal waters.

Then, on page 6, these objectives are listed again under letters (a), (b), (c) and (d). Here they are:

(a) Collective measures for maintenance of peace and security as embodied in the charter of the United Nations, including the search for balanced and controlled disarmament;

(b) Collective defence as embodied in the North Atlantic treaty;

(c) Partnership with the United States in the defence of North America;

(d) National measures to discharge responsibility for the security and protection of Canada.

I would be interested if someone would disclose what is new in this white paper. It is rather a good literary document. I think it was drawn up by officials in the Department of External Affairs or in the historical section of the Department of National Defence. Now and again, the minister has got in a word of his own; he has a few words which I recognize here and there. It is a carefully drawn document. There is an introduction and the objectives are stated. Then there is a historical summary of our policy since 1945, followed by considerations affecting our future and a section on the organization of the defence forces. Then the minister looks ahead for ten years to the shape of Canadian forces between 1964 and 1974, and follows up with a section dealing with defence research and industry. Finally, just in case people might be too critical, he provides an escape hatch through which one could drive 12 Centurion tanks line abreast, because by means of this escape hatch he could get out of anything he had said in the pages earlier.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the part attributed to the minister?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. These are the exact words, I think. I recognize the minister's style in the conclusion, assisted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin).

Well, that is the white paper. I suggest it is a most incomplete document. I was tremendously disappointed in it. In a white paper, in addition to a literary exercise setting out objectives and things of that nature, we require—and all previous ministers recognized this requirement—tables and charts showing the size of the forces, the expenditure of money over the years, how the defence dollar has been distributed, and so on, so that all who are interested may be able to form a picture of what has been going on. There is nothing of that kind in the present white paper on defence. It is simply a literary exercise. It contains only one thing that is new, and I intend to deal with that in a few moments. Why were we not favoured with summaries of expenditure and charts to show where the money has gone? This has been mentioned before but it does not hurt to mention it again—in 1954-55, 21.3 per cent of the defence dollar was spent on military personnel and 42.3 per cent on procurement and equipment. By the time we had reached 1959-60, military personnel costs had risen to 33.1 per cent and money spent on the procurement of equipment had gone down to 21.3 per cent. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot increase the personnel in the armed forces and raise their pay and allowances, as we did when we were in office, without effecting savings somewhere along the line, unless the entire amount available for defence is increased.

Why did the minister not put things like that in the white paper? Why did he not give us, as was done in 1961 in a booklet published under the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), a summary of expenditures for the past ten or 15 years, so that we could make comparisons? This would have been very helpful.

In 1952-53 total expenditure on national defence amounted to $1,882 millions in round figures. In subsequent years it was $1,805 millions, $1,665 millions, $1,750 millions, $1,759 millions and then $1,686 millions. The minister talked about a saving. He says he has effected a saving. I would point out that we effected a saving of almost $262 million in defence expenditures as shown by the record for the year 1958-59 when defence expenditures totalled $1,424 million. This is not the first time there has been a substantial saving in defence expenditures. The figures carry on. Expenditure in 1959-60 amounted to $1,514 million. For the next five years I have no figures for final expenditures, but I have estimates. These are the estimated expenditures for the following five years: 1960-61, $1,520 millions; 1961-62, $1,614 millions; 1962-63, $1,590 millions; 1963-64, $1,634 millions. The minister is now proposing for 1964-65 an expenditure of $1,525 millions.

These figures give the house a proper basis for comparison. Now a serious decision has to be made with regard to the amount of money to be devoted to Canadian defence, and parliament has to look at this question very closely. Are we to set a figure of $1,500 millions and stay there? If we do, what are the choices. One course which might be followed is to reduce the percentage of the defence dollar spent on personnel. The other is to reduce the amount spent on the procurement of equipment, operations and so on. This is the problem which is facing the minister. He talks about financial savings. He told us—and I objected to his use of the word "savings" in that connection—that he had brought about a saving of $100 million in the estimates as is shown by the figure I have just read. But what the hon. gentleman is really doing is transferring a saving realized by reducing the cost of military personnel, headquarters establishments and so on, to the purchase of equipment. To say otherwise is to mislead the public. I noted, by quickly going through the estimates that out of the $100 million he mentioned the hon. gentleman has made a saving of $80 million on equipment, the very item we were going to spend more money on because, he said, we were falling behind. In other words he has cut out the purchase of equipment by the navy, army and air force to the tune of $80 million. Then, in order to get that back for the purchase of equipment he has to cut down on personnel.

That is about what he is doing. He is chopping down personnel in order to find money to spend on equipment, because he has reduced the over-all budget by approximately $100 million. Well, he has to maintain the efficiency of the armed forces while doing that. No one will object to the saving of money through the reduction of unnecessary overheads. I suggest, though, that more information will have to be given to us as to how this is to be done. The minister has talked loosely about the integration of our forces; articles have been written about it, but nobody completely understands what is in the mind of the minister with regard to that and he did not explain it this afternoon. What does he mean by "integration" of our forces? He should have given us a discourse on this. It is not clearly set out in the white paper. How far is this integration to go? It is a desirable objective. It was started by General Pearkes in 1959. He started on this program of integration by reducing the staffs in the medical, chaplain and recruiting services. That is where the start was made, and we have to carry on from that point. How far is integration to go?

The minister is starting with the report of the Glassco commission which recommended a change in the chiefs of staff committee. He mentions this in the white paper; but the white paper failed to quote all that the Glassco commission said with regard to that proposed change. Let me read from page 73 of the Glassco commission report:

> In relation to the key function of the chiefs of staff committee of advising the minister and the government on military aspects of defence policy, the C.C.O.S. has no formal pre-eminence and there may be merit in making this function the collective responsibility of the committee.

I draw attention to this sentence:

> Excessive concentration of the advisory task in the hands of one man has obvious dangers.

The Glassco commission did not elaborate on that sentence. The minister does not mention it in his white paper and made no comment on it today. I think parliament has to look very, very closely at that to see whether or not it is advisable. I do not think there will be opposition to integration, but it is the question of how it is to be done. That is the function of this house, to examine the method by which that integration is to be accomplished and how far it will go. If it means placing too much control in the hands of one man, which the Glassco commission has already warned is dangerous, then we must watch exactly what we are doing with the bill which is before us.

I would refer the minister to some comments on the government white paper by Brigadier Malone. This article was published in the Winnipeg Free Press. I seldom have occasion to quote the Winnipeg Free Press and they seldom have occasion to mention me, but I am not unfriendly to Brigadier Malone in his capacity as a former military officer, and I know he had practical experience in warfare, has made a great study of the theory of warfare and was very much interested in the militia. Brigadier Malone has drawn attention to the fact that there may be a serious danger in the command structure as envisaged by the proposal of the minister. I have not time to read the various things he has put in front of us in articles in the Winnipeg Free Press, but I draw attention to his suggestion that a study should be made of the findings of the royal commission on defence under Lord Esher in England in 1904. I have made that study. He says that the proposal now put before parliament by the minister is reverting to a system which was found to be unacceptable by Great Britain in 1904. They had had plenty of experience and found that it did not work. Instead of that, they set up a defence council, different from the one the minister mentioned this afternoon, and in this connection Brigadier Malone says:

> What is required today is a defence council at the top policy-making and administrative level of which the chief operational officer of all three services is but one of the members.

He is not the supreme commander-in-chief; he is just one member of that council. Then he says:

> The other members (of equal authority) should not be divided according to separate service but as to the other main functions or divisions of defence. The council should include, as well as the senior operational officer—

That is the supreme commander:

> —the senior officer responsible for all supply, transport, accommodation and equipment, etc. (for all three services), the senior administrative officer responsible for such services as recruiting discipline, legal, welfare and so on. These officers should speak with equal authority to the operational chief of the three services and they should take their orders not from a supreme commander-in-chief but from the defence council itself.

There is not time for me to extend these remarks with respect to this particular feature of it, but I do suggest that before we launch too far into this sea that the minister is sailing we should observe the experience of the past and the marked reefs. The army organization in England in the 19th century, in the Crimean war and the Boer war, foundered on the mistake of having a supreme commander-in-chief, as Brigadier Malone points out, and they corrected that mistake by setting up an army council—the same applied with regard to the navy, and so on—in which the supreme commander-in-chief was only on an equal footing with other people who had the administrative services under their wing, and there was the proper civilian control, which was not available in the days when the supreme commander-in-chief looked after everything.

So I sound this cautionary note at this time for a consideration of the matters drawn to our attention by Brigadier Malone, for a study of the Lord Esher report, for a study of the system operated at the present time in the United Kingdom, so that we do not, in the haste for reform, make what might become a very serious mistake.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the bill now before us.

First, I wish to refer to the re-setting up of the special defence committee. I think we are unanimous, in this house, in supporting that measure and in saying that this committee has already played a useful role and is called upon to play an even more useful one this year and in future. I should like to point out that the members of the committee constitute together a most valuable storehouse of technical military knowledge. Therefore, it would be in the interest and to the advantage of the house to use the special knowledge acquired last year by the hon. members who took part in the work of the committee. We should, as much as possible, keep the same members.

I believe that is the policy followed with respect to defence committees in most countries of the alliance that we visited last year as members of the committee. I am thinking in particular of the French committee on defence which is composed of members of the national assembly and which has been under the chairmanship of representative Moinet for many years. In view of the continuity of its membership, the committee has been most helpful to the French government in the establishment of a military policy.

Consequently, I take this opportunity to impress upon hon. members the advisability of reconvening the committee on the same basis as much as possible.

I should now like to deal with remarks made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) when he introduced his resolution. He referred in particular to the savings which would result from the new plan to integrate the armed forces. I do not intend to dwell on the subject, since my colleagues, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in particular, dealt with it and pointed out that in spite of the reference to savings made by the minister, no savings will be effected actually, because the government has no intention whatsoever to reduce the appropriations for military purposes any more than it has already done. No attempt should be made to delude the public with a plan designed to look as a means to effect savings in that field, when no savings are actually being considered.

Mr. Speaker, the minister spoke of the immense advantages that would result from integration; for instance, it would reduce the number of people or channels of information reporting to him, which would give him a better interpretation and a better co-ordination of military information—that may be true—and would give him a better opportunity to set up on a functional basis the Canadian armed forces.

But why did the minister, when he spoke about integration—of course he is well known for his modesty—speak of it as if he had discovered something extraordinary, a new planet for instance? If you analyse his speech thoroughly, you might be led to believe that before him no one in Canada or in any other country had thought about the need to integrate the military forces.

Mr. Speaker, it is well known that this project has been under consideration for many years by military authorities, by the former minister of national defence, and that everybody agrees today, because of modern military technology, that integration is necessary.

Integration is the first essential step toward the streamlining of our armed forces. How could it be otherwise when today the role of the various services being integrated, has become undistinguishable.

This is the age of space ships. Because of this, we can no longer separate the army, navy and air force and assign each service a special and air-tight role.

Therefore, what the minister suggests is only the first unavoidable step in that direction. What he puts forward is not a fait accompli and there again I do not understand the minister who, in a very pleasant tone of voice and without passion, reveals to the house things he would like us to believe are extraordinary but which are the most normal in the world. That outline he gives us remains more than just an outline. Even if the integration of the armed forces should become a reality, what the minister is suggesting at this time is not the massive integration of our military forces but just integration at the top, replacing three chiefs of staff by a single one. That is far from the complete integration of the armed forces which would be desirable.

Moreover, the minister shows us integration as being desirable from an administrative point of view and also for purposes of economy. It might very well be, but if integration has become necessary it is certainly not because, from the administrative point of view it might be more flexible, or because it would be cheaper from the economic and financial point of view; but it should be at least for the purpose of making Canada's military role more efficient and more flexible to apply.

The minister also referred to the necessity of maintaining civilian control over the military forces. Who, in this house or outside, questions that necessity? But the minister has a special art for presenting his ideas and projects as if they were the result of the fullest deliberation and that his projects become absolutely necessary due to exceptional circumstances which he does not fully reveal to us.

Really, listening to him this morning, I thought for a moment that we were on the point of witnessing in this country a coup d'état plotted by a military junta. This comes from the way the minister outlined quite normal things, in order, I believe, to set off the splendid role he laid out for himself.

Mr. Speaker, we are of course in favour of a control of military forces. I do not think there is any reason to believe that the minister will lose this control. If there is such a danger, I think it would be his duty to resign and surrender his functions to another who would apply this control; otherwise, we would be like those republics where democracy is but window dressing.

This is not the situation in Canada, except that I was somewhat upset, Mr. Speaker, by this week's developments. I am thinking especially of the melodramatics of which Kingston was the scene when the royal commission of inquiry on bilingualism and biculturalism met in that city.

The situation was judged so unusual—and I insist on that word—that the commanding officer of the area felt it necessary to issue special orders to forbid members of the Canadian armed forces in the district to attend the sittings of the commission or, at least, to participate in the discussions.

My colleague from Royal (Mr. Fairweather) looked up the military regulations in that respect and he found no substantiation for those orders. The Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cardin), who is paying close attention to me, changed the regulation by saying that such questions were controversial and that the military personnel should in no way be involved in controversial discussions.

Mr. Speaker, surely the fact of being a soldier in peace time Canada, does not mean that you have to abstain from publicly discussing topical matters of general interest which, if they are subject to controversy, certainly do not jeopardize the security of Canada or other military objectives.

I am not at all satisfied, Mr. Speaker, with the muzzling of our Canadian military forces on this occasion. In fact, I am very dissatisfied with it and, when reading the minister's explanations, people might think themselves right in the middle of a who dunit starring Maigret. Anyway, that was the impression I had, and which seems to me normal under the circumstances.

Therefore, I understand the better, or rather still less, the motives of that military commander, when I think of some briefs submitted at that commission sitting, for instance, the brief of Dr. Arsène Lauzière, professor of French literature at the Kingston military college, on which the Minister of National Defence and the Associate Minister of National Defence did not make the slightest comment.

I believe that, because of the seriousness of the charges made by a person in authority, the Associate Minister of National Defence, who is more particularly in charge of personnel, might have given some explanation to the house. Some very serious charges have been made. It has been said that in the army, the current language, in which everything was done, was English; that promotions were slow and difficult for a French-speaking officer, and finally, that, if you wanted advancement in the army, you had to learn and speak English. Moreover, though the French language was allowed for communication in the Royal 22nd, even that regiment had to use English when communicating with other units.

Mr. Speaker, there must be a very good reason for this state of affairs, but the house is entitled to an explanation, especially now that tremendous efforts are being made to convince French Canadians that they constitute an integral part of this nation and that they are on an equal footing under the confederation pact.

I think that, in this matter, the minister can, if he wishes, and not only if he wishes, but it is his duty to do so, take very useful action. I do not think that what was reported by the professor is false, because I, myself was a member of the national defence committee and I was in a position to know that in Europe, particularly at the Canadian brigade base in Germany, children of French Canadian servicemen were receiving their education exclusively in English. No effort was being made either to follow the curriculum adopted by the province of Quebec, because the course given was different, or to have French classes for children of French Canadian servicemen.

Now, I am saying this with great objectivity, for I think that such a situation is abnormal. I merely mention it in the hope that the minister will very shortly take necessary steps to correct this anomaly.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me back to the national defence policy of Canada. While we are considering this defence bill, we are entitled to ask what is the general defence policy of Canada and what is the trend of that policy in regard to objectives set in the field of Canadian foreign policy?

Those well-known objectives aim at maintaining the sovereignty of Canadian territory and curbing communist expansion, as far as we can and finally, at maintaining order among nations.

Those are broad objectives, and to attain them, Canada participates in some essential alliances, the principle of which must never be questioned—and today more than ever before—of joint defence for western nations. That is why we are and will remain within the Atlantic alliance, as well as the North American alliance. We are also a member of the United Nations, and for those purposes, we contribute to the maximum of our means; this has to be in order to promote disarmament and raise the standard of living throughout the country, notwithstanding our foreign aid program.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock? [Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

Broadcasting Act

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING PARTISAN POLITICAL BROADCASTS

Mr. H. C. Harley (Halton) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-25, to amend the Broadcasting Act (political programs).

He said: The purpose of this bill is twofold. First, it reduces to two days the restriction now governing political broadcasts prior to a federal election. As every member in the house knows, at the present time political broadcasts may not be made on election day nor on the two days preceding election day, that is from Friday midnight until the night of the election. This regulation, of course, governs broadcasting, but the newspapers may carry political advertising even on election day.

This amendment I propose will give the broadcasting media, that is radio and television, a more equitable arrangement as compared with the newspapers, but it still does not equalize them. The present Broadcasting Act says that no licensee shall broadcast a program, advertisement or announcement of a partisan political character on any day that an election is held for the election of a member of the House of Commons, the legislature of a province or a council or municipal corporation or on the two days immediately preceding any such day. As I have said, this refers to a federal election, a provincial election or even a municipal election.

I know many hon. members have had the experience of having broadcasts from parliament hill cancelled because there was an election in some other area. I know that during the last election in Newfoundland I had a broadcast cancelled which I did not really believe was of a political nature.

The second purpose of the bill is to ensure that the prohibition mentioned above would only apply to a broadcasting station within the broadcasting or receiving range of the electoral district involved. This provision would not apply, therefore, to federal elections because all of Canada would be involved. However, it could apply to by-elections, provincial elections or municipal elections. This sounds a little complicated, Mr. Speaker, but it can be done since I am told that each broadcasting station has a licensed pattern or range.

Apropos of what I have just said, I should like to quote from Hansard for August 26, 1958, where the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), at that time the minister responsible for the C.B.C., was discussing Bill No. C-55 regarding the establishment of a board of broadcast governors. I should like to quote from pages 4115 and 4116:

> I do not know how many hon. members know this, but under C.B.C. regulations as they apply today if there happens to be a town council by-election in Wolfville or Port Alberni, then the C.B.C. is not supposed to broadcast political programs for three days prior to that by-election although there may be a provincial general election in Ontario. That is the existing regulation which has application to federal, provincial or municipal elections. The thing is just silly.

A little farther down on the same page, I find this:

> After a great deal of discussion we felt it might be allowed to stand this way; the elections committee of the House of Commons would be set up in the relatively near future and that would be a much better forum in which to discuss this question and arrive at some solution with respect to political broadcasts and so on, rather than attempting to deal with it by way of amendments or by a board outside the control of parliament.

Speaking in the same debate later, as recorded on page 4129, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said:

> It was the understanding when we inserted it here rather reluctantly that this was not the place to include it but as this certainly was not the time to engage, as I said before, in a prolonged political discussion about advertising and programs it was put here, shall we say, as a temporary resting place until the elections committee could meet.

This referral mentioned by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings at that time has never taken place. I went through the reports on privileges and elections and ascertained that in 1959, a year later, this topic was mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). However, the committee never proceeded with it. In 1960 the committee did discuss a 48-hour prohibition on political broadcasting. After a great deal of discussion they felt they should leave the regulation as it was. After reading the evidence and trying to deduce the reasoning of the committee at that time I found they felt television had a greater impact on the general public than newspapers and therefore it was reasonable to leave the newspapers with the advertising advantage over radio and television. During the meetings in 1960, the committee discussed amendments to the act concerning political broadcasts from outside of Canada, that is broadcasts originating across the border. At this time amendments were proposed, which were accepted later and became part of the Canada Elections Act.

The committee on privileges and elections met in 1962 and 1963, but this topic was not discussed. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the consideration of this matter by the committee which was promised in 1958 has never been undertaken, for one reason or another. I am introducing this bill at this time in order to bring to the attention of the house the fact that this matter should be considered and I hope that members of the house will refer it to the committee on privileges and elections, as should have happened in 1958.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): I shall not detain the house very long, Mr. Speaker, but there are a few comments I should like to make on this bill. I should first like to deal with the clause concerning dramatization. In my opinion this has been a sore spot so far as a number of people in Canada are concerned. I feel that dramatization, especially those in which the candidate takes part in the discourse, are a means of getting a point across. It seems to me this is merely a matter of education so far as the individual who is viewing the program is concerned. After all, this is the point of a political broadcast. Surely, the cost of a broadcast on television is high enough, so that the best use of that time should be made in order to get a point across to the viewer.

I should like to refer now to the free time for political broadcasts. I believe the voter is entitled to hear from each party on an equal basis in order that he can ascertain for which party he should vote. I am very strongly opposed to the situation where, because of the number of members in the House of Commons or the number of people who voted in the last election, one party gets the lion's share of the free time provided on television. I am strongly opposed to the situation where a party, because of its numbers in the House of Commons or because of the number of people who voted for it in the previous election, gets the lion's share of the time given by the taxpayers themselves to view the various parties' positions and the things they have to present to the public. To my mind that is absolutely the reverse of what it ought to be.

We should look at this whole matter from the point of view of the viewer, and the ability of that individual to get a much clearer picture in his mind as to where he should put his "x" when the vote is being taken.

I would like to refer just briefly to broadcasts outside Canada. We may say that we can regulate this from Canada, but I say that any person who wants to get somebody else in the United States to give a very strong viewpoint, over a United States station, in connection with a Canadian election can probably do more to emphasize a position than if the people of Canada themselves could go across the line and put on a program. The reason I say this is because it would be an isolated incident that would stand out from the rest of the broadcasts at which the viewer would be looking.

We have to be big enough and bold enough so that we can stand in the face of all competition, and put our wares before the Canadian public as much as we can so that they may be able to decide for themselves what they are going to do when election day rolls around. In closing I wish to say I would very much like to see the subject matter of this bill referred to the privileges and elections committee where it could be gone into very thoroughly and perhaps, out of that, could come some badly needed corrections.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to indicate briefly the support I have for the bill which has been introduced by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley). The remarks just made by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe), which of course deal with a section of the act that it is not proposed to amend by this bill, serve to emphasize the desirability of having the general subject matter of the bill sent for review and study before a committee, where the views advanced by the mover of the bill and the hon. member for Cariboo could be gone into.

I am not quite sure how the name of Port Alberni happened to come into this discussion. I was not in the house when the minister made the statement which was quoted by the hon. member for Halton, but I mention it merely to emphasize the fact that this is a subject which, at various times and under various circumstances, has come up for discussion in Port Alberni in connection with elections to the various levels of government.

While the basic idea of having some restraint or limitation on partisan broadcasting in the period immediately preceding an election is a good one, it is ridiculous that the act is so worded that it prohibits broadcasts, where there is overlapping, for elections to the various levels of government. It is ridiculous that a report from parliament hill may have to be cancelled because of a purely local election in that region of the country represented by the hon. member who contributes to the report. I am sure most hon. members who have participated in these broadcast reports have had that experience.

The hon. member is to be complimented on presenting this bill. I certainly hope the subject matter will receive early consideration in the appropriate committee of the house, so that out of that will come a recommendation that the anomalies which exist with respect to broadcasting in other jurisdictions will be removed from the act.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the bill of the member for Halton (Mr. Harley) now submitted to the house, because it points out an absurd situation which can result from the application of section 17 of the Broadcasting Act in its present form. In fact, it is entirely illogical to note that a candidate in a federal election or even an elected member called to express the point of view of his party on radio or T.V. may be prevented from doing so, because a simple municipal election is going on elsewhere in another part of the country, sometimes quite far away.

Therefore, I congratulate the member for Halton for having set forth the principle of the bill under consideration.

I also believe that he is entirely justified in submitting this bill to the committee on privileges and elections, because I feel it is not only section 17, but the whole Broadcasting Act that should be completely reviewed.

Mr. Speaker, it is not simply a matter, as proposed in this bill, of reducing the period of time to three days, when no program of a political character could be broadcast prior to a federal election. There is more to it, and that is why I suggest that the whole Broadcasting Act should be reviewed.

A rather difficult problem arises at election time. It happens that all radio and television networks are congested with political and partisan speeches, and this becomes boring for the listener or the viewer. This is likely to cause serious prejudice to politics itself and to depreciate, in the eyes of the people, the idea of greatness and nobility of political competition that every responsible citizen should have.

Therefore, the principle now before the house enables us to consider other amendments, like the one I just talked about, to the effect that the board of broadcast governors could exercise the rights it holds under section 1 of the said act which authorizes the board of broadcast governors to exercise a more effective control on political programs during election campaigns in order not to supersaturate televiewers who cannot but listen to often boring political speeches broadcast on radio and television. In my opinion, there is a problem there that should be considered.

Mr. Speaker, another problem comes up, particularly in the province of Quebec and in Quebec city.

Through CFCF-TV station in Quebec, political programs of a separatist nature are broadcast every week by one Léo Tremblay, a true paranoiac who constantly attacks confederation and federal institutions. There is also the leader of the RIN that my hon. friends opposite have the opportunity like me to hear and who preaches secession from confederation.

I am in favour of the absolute respect of democratic procedures, in favour of the fullest freedom of speech, but I have the right to denounce an obvious violation of section 10 of the Broadcasting Act. Section 10 reads as follows—

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Choquette: —and it is related to section 17 which we are considering now—before my hon. friend raises unnecessarily a point of order—

Mr. Bélanger: I just wanted to ask the hon. member whether he would allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. Choquette: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is the hon. gentleman rising on a question of privilege?

An hon. Member: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Bélanger: I am merely asking the permission to put a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Choquette: By all means.

Mr. Bélanger: Does the hon. member think it is worse to criticize confederation than to criticize the Queen?

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we are engaging on a fairly controversial subject, and I know of no hon. member sitting in the House of Commons presently who has ever criticized in any way a reigning monarch. I do not know a single case when that happened. Perhaps the hon. member is referring to certain statements of principle I made and I do not regret. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have always advocated that Canada must be truly Canadian and have truly distinctive symbols. I would ask, for instance, the hon. member if he agrees with me when I set forth principles that are not an attack against the reigning sovereign and a lawfully constituted authority.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to section 10 of the act—

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I shall have to ask the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to discuss the principle of the bill before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I readily submit to your ruling in discussing the bill under consideration. Its purpose is to amend a clause concerning programs of a political nature. We agree, Mr. Speaker, with the amendment as stated; that amendment is so clear and so interesting that we are naturally inclined to relate this principle to another one which is just as important.

So that clause 17 is well understood, I should like to read section 10 of the Broadcasting Act, which is as follows:

> The board shall, for the purpose of ensuring the continued existence and efficient operation of a national broadcasting system and the provision of a varied and comprehensive broadcasting service of a high standard that is basically Canadian in content and character, regulate the establishment and operation of networks of broadcasting stations, the activities of public and private broadcasting stations in Canada and the relationship between them and provide for the final determination of all matters and questions in relation thereto.

Mr. Speaker, that section cannot be clearer and when television stations allow political speeches aimed at destroying the federal system as such, when political programs of a partisan nature endeavour to disrupt the federal system as it is, I say that those programs are basically illegal and that section 15 as well as section 18 of the Broadcasting Act should apply in order to prohibit such programs.

That is why I commend the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) who made a point of clarifing the situation concerning political broadcasts.

I hope that, when his bill is referred to the committee on privileges and elections, the Broadcasting Act will be fully reviewed, so as to allow the board of broadcast governors to exercise its prerogatives, powers and duties, as set out therein.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Halton and I just had those few remarks to make.

[Text]

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I agree there is a desperate need for some amendment to the regulations respecting political broadcasting during political campaigns, and particularly before election dates, which is the main matter dealt with in this bill. I am not sure what the interpretation of one of the clauses should be—whether or not there are to be two consecutive days preceding the election or whether there will be one day ahead of the election date. It is not completely clear and perhaps it can be clarified.

This matter of public relations and the persuasion of the public by political parties is very difficult to control. It is also, in my opinion, a most difficult task to write a set of regulations which would have the effect of providing equal opportunity for the various political parties so as not to give one of them an advantage over the others. This is true, I think, notwithstanding the size of the various parties, if we consider that size on the basis of representation in the House of Commons is the criterion. We know, for example, that we cannot even buy national network time from the C.B.C. for political broadcasting. Some time is made available, but it is granted as free time. I do not intend to argue now whether this is an advantage or not, but I certainly do have a grievance about the way in which this time is apportioned. For example, at federal level the corporation imposes a number of conditions which a political party must meet before it gets any time at all. Yet we know that they violate more than 50 per cent of those conditions in the apportionment of the free time. Even worse, they do not use the same formula when it comes to granting free time in connection with provincial elections. I know that in Alberta during the years 1959 to 1963 there were 61 Social Credit members of the legislature and one Conservative. During all that time the Conservatives got equal time; the Conservative party had just as much time as the Social Credit party, in spite of the fact that the proportion of representation in the house was 61 to 1. There were times when the New Democratic party, for example, were granted equal time, and they did not have any members. I am not exactly sure what the case is now, but I think the Conservatives are still getting free time on provincial affairs broadcasts, and they do not have any members in either the Alberta house or the British Columbia house.

This may be a proper way to do it. I think the practice in the province of Alberta and the province of British Columbia, where they give this free time on provincial affairs broadcasts to all the four political parties who have run nearly a full slate of candidates, and so on, is the right one; but I say the same formula should be applied to the federal arena. During the years 1958 to 1962, when we did not have any representation in this House of Commons, they did not give us any time at all. So some major overhauling needs to be done with regard to the regulations governing the apportionment of time.

I really cannot see much point in having regulations at all if you are not going to follow them. Some of the regulations we have now demand, for example, that you run candidates in at least three provinces before getting time on national broadcasts. They say that you must contest more than 50 per cent of the seats in Canada—in other words, 133—and there are a number of other conditions. We know that the way in which this time is apportioned today is such that they do not even follow the formula set down, and therefore it is time there was a major overhaul of the whole situation regarding broadcasting time.

Getting back to one of the other points raised by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley) when he introduced this bill, I would refer to the matter of trying to equalize to some degree the opportunity for advertising between the press and the other media of public communication and information. I know that to suggest to the press that they should not accept any advertisements from political parties on the day before the election, or even on election day, would cause them immediately to scream about the freedom of the press. As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, the press includes television and radio, in the present context of their function in our social order. So if we are going to insist that the radio stations and the television stations are prevented from carrying partisan political broadcasts during a specified period before election day, this should apply to the printed press as well. I am one of those who believes that the influence television and radio have on the general public, or the electorate, today is equal to or perhaps even greater than that of the printed page; therefore I see no logic at all in separating one from the other. Perhaps a case can be made out for allowing television and radio stations to continue partisan political broadcasting right up to the day before election day, but I am not arguing that at the moment; I am arguing that as far as I am concerned these three mediums cannot and should not be divided.

[Mr. Olson.]

As far as some of the other provisions of the bill are concerned, the matter of prohibiting political broadcasts in one part of the country that is far removed from where the election is taking place is, to my mind, a silly rule. I wholeheartedly agree with the provision here to the effect that it would only need to be prohibited in the actual area where the election was taking place. That certainly seems to me a sensible thing to do. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that there are a great many other difficulties and anomalies in the present regulations as they apply to partisan political broadcasting, and I think this whole matter should be reviewed by a committee of the House of Commons. We should either come up with something that is reasonable and equitable to all parties and to the mediums involved, or withdraw all the regulations and allow the television stations and the radio stations to do exactly what the newspapers are doing.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that most hon. members who have spoken thus far have been in complete accord with the terms of the bill as presented to us. As a matter of fact, if I thought for one moment that Your Honour would allow a discourse this afternoon that was irrelevant, such as was the case with a previous speaker, there are a few things I would like to say with regard to other debates this week; but of course I know Your Honour would not allow this. With regard to the bill before us, I think it has some good aspects and there are good and sufficient reasons for us to consider it closely to see whether there is not also a bad feature in regard to the practice thus far. I agree with the limitation contained in the amending clause 17(1)(b)(ii). I think this is a proper limitation to place on the provisions of the present act. On the other hand, in the explanatory notes for clause 1 it is stated:

The revised clause continues this prohibition—

I do not think this is quite right and I would like to say that so far as the bad features of the amendments in the bill are concerned, it is my belief—and I know this is just a part of the thinking in the amendment—that when we are concerned with a general election, by the time the public have absorbed all they have listened to or watched or read, they have had enough by the Friday night prior to an election. I am one of those who believe that the extension of the extra day is indeed not necessary.

Let us look at what might happen. I do not suggest for one minute that any citizen of Canada who offers himself as a candidate for election would follow a course which would not be acceptable in the public eye, but if we were to accept such an amendment and continue broadcasting, particularly by television, on through the Saturday evening prior to an election, you would reach a situation where a candidate might well make some statement against his opponent which could not in any other way be refuted or dealt with, so far as the public was concerned, either by the press or by public meeting, because immediately we would run into the restriction in respect to the following Sunday and Monday. Then you would have a situation where a candidate could possibly take advantage of his opponent or opponents, and as I said before without any recourse being given the other candidate or candidates in the field.

There is some merit in all the other things which have been said, but in regard to the amendments which are before us I say again that I believe it has been the practice in these particular fields of communication to deal with the situation judiciously so that an embarrassing or hypothetical situation such as has been mentioned here several times does not occur. If it does occur and the two areas are far enough apart, then the broadcasting corporation itself would take care of the matter in the best way possible for the two areas concerned without causing a breach of the rules, and yet seeing that justice is done so far as the candidates are concerned. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, regrettably I would be one of those who suggests that another thought be given to the amendments before any action is taken with regard to sending this matter to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly interested in the comments of the previous speakers, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Harley), the sponsor of the bill, as well as the member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe), without forgetting, of course the humorous but very pertinent remarks of my good friend, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) in connection with Bill No. C-25 under study this afternoon.

The purposes of the bill have been clearly explained by the sponsor himself and are set forth in the explanatory notes of the bill. It is more especially a question of amending a single subsection, that is subsection 1 of section 17 of the Broadcasting Act.

Under paragraph (b) of subsection (1), no radio or television station is allowed to broadcast a political program on any of the two consecutive days before a federal, provincial or municipal election.

As it was pointed out a while ago, that provision gives rise to some rather unusual situations. Indeed, it means that if there was a municipal election in Vancouver, for instance, it would be illegal to broadcast political programs in other parts of the country during the three days preceding voting day. In the case of a provincial election in New Brunswick or of a municipal election in the west, the radio and television stations of the province concerned would not be allowed to broadcast political programs.

Of course, that is but an example, since there is no question of a provincial election in New Brunswick, for everybody knows we have there at present an excellent government.

Coming back to section 17 of Bill No. C-25, I hold that this legislation, as drafted, is ridiculous and should be amended, but I should first of all point out that the amendment itself, as proposed by the hon. member for Halton, could be somewhat amended were it referred to a committee, for we see, for instance, that the amendment, as proposed, is as follows and I quote section 17 (1)(b)(ii):

> (ii) intended to be received by the public within the electoral district either directly or through the medium of relay stations.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that the term "electoral district", even if those two words give a very good definition of a federal or provincial riding, could not be a proper definition of a municipal division, at the municipal level, where we have wards or subdivisions rather than electoral districts.

Now, the explanatory notes of the bill refer us to page 4117 of Hansard, volume 4, 1958, where we see that the then minister of national revenue proposed to refer that matter to a committee of the house. I fully agree with the then minister and with the hon. member for Halton.

Of course, when we speak of a committee with that in mind, it would be, in this case, the committee on privileges and elections. This committee, recently formed for the duration of the session, will, no doubt, consider fairly soon the Canada Elections Act. Members of the committee will, therefore, have the opportunity of considering the problem and finding a solution in conformity with the Canada Elections Act and the Broadcasting Act, and in accordance with the facts.

Subsection 1 of section 99 of the Canada Elections Act reads as follows:

> No person shall be allowed to broadcast a speech or any entertainment or advertising program over the radio, on the ordinary polling day and on the two days immediately preceding it, in favour or on behalf of any political party or any candidate at an election.

Mr. Speaker, I must point out that paragraph 1 of section 99 of the Canada Elections Act does not stipulate any penalty. On the other hand, paragraph 2 of the same section deals with broadcasts coming from outside the country.

For instance, if candidates in federal elections in Canada go to the state of Maine and use the local television stations to broadcast political programs to Canada during an election campaign, they commit an illegal act, although there was a time when, during an election campaign, a candidate was allowed to cross over to the United States and use the services of American radio and television stations to explain, from outside Canada his political principles to a Canadian audience.

Mr. Speaker, subsection 2 of section 99 of the Canada Elections Act, as opposed to subsection 1, provides a penalty, whereas section 18 of the Broadcasting Act stipulates that:

> Every person who violates any of the provisions of this part or the regulations is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction as provided in the Criminal Code.

This means that we have two acts which completely contradict one another, since the penalty clause in the Broadcasting Act refers to the Criminal Code, while the penalty clause in the Canada Elections Act provides its own penalty.

Therefore, this is a second or third discrepancy which should be studied and rectified by suggesting to the committee on privileges and elections that the appropriate and necessary amendments be made.

Mr. Speaker, if I may make a few remarks, I should like to point out that this is not the only section of the Broadcasting Act which should be revised. Many others should be looked into, as mentioned by hon. members who spoke before me.

On the other hand, how is it that radio and television stations can boost the price of their programs during an election campaign?

How is it that we read in the press and hear on the radio that politicians, regardless of political affiliations, spend too much money on election campaigns? But we seldom read an article in the newspapers or hear commentaries over the radio or television blaming those who are actually making electoral campaigns more and more costly. I believe that we should adopt legislation or promulgate regulations establishing maximum costs so as to prevent radio or television station owners from taking advantage of elections which have come up frequently these last few years, by raising their prices and thus increasing their profits at the expense of those who wish to carve out a career for themselves in politics or become members of the federal or provincial parliament in order to serve the public.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, I wish to point out that a way of settling this last problem would be to allow free periods of time for radio or television broadcasts during election campaigns. Of course, these free periods should be limited, but equally apportioned between all legitimate candidates running in an election, in order that every one of them might have the same opportunity to express their views and make themselves heard, without having to be millionaires for that.

Hon. J. Watson MacNaught (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I move:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections for further study.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I am only going to take about two minutes so there will be plenty of opportunity to vote on this motion. I want to make three points, and because of the lack of time they will necessarily be disjointed. First may I suggest that the time within which election broadcasting is carried on should be limited because of the fact that most of the people of the country now feel that election campaigns are far too long. We first confuse and stun people, and then we allow them to vote. My suggestion would be that a total period of 30 days terminating just before the election should be established as the time within which broadcasting may take place.

Second, I suggest that the question of dramatized form is innocuous. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette), who spoke in this debate, when in full exercise of his oratorical powers could very well be accused of making a dramatized election speech. I say this in the most kindly way, of course, but this indicates the inadvisability of including this particular provision. Are we to allow people to vote, and then say to them that the insidious propaganda of a dramatized political program is going to deprive them of the ability to exercise their right to vote in a free and independent way? I think this is nonsense.

Finally I make the suggestion that surely we should not presume to legislate on behalf of the provinces. We should make provision that the part of the section prohibiting these broadcasts in respect of provincial legislatures or municipal corporations will apply only when the provincial legislature has seen fit to adopt and ratify it. There may be provinces who feel that their citizens are made of hardier stuff than those in other parts of Canada and who might be prepared to allow their people to be subjected to propaganda on the radio and television media. With these changes I suggest that the hon. member has done a service in bringing this matter to our attention, but we should have regard to more than what is included in the bill.

Motion (Mr. MacNaught) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. Is the house willing to call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Then the hour for consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader to put on Hansard the business for next week.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, beginning on Monday, and proceeding in succession until each item has been exhausted, we will complete second reading of the bill to amend the National Defence Act. Then we will take the resolution preceding a bill to provide for the payment of certain provincial fees and taxes by crown corporations, after which we will discuss the resolution preceding the bill to amend the Exchequer Court Act. We will then take second reading of the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, after which we will proceed with second reading of the bill to amend the Estate Tax Act.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, May 11, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. GRÉGOIRE—ACCURACY OF STATISTICS RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is a matter which, in my opinion, reflects on the rights of every member and those of the Canadian people. My question of privilege is directed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen), and I regret that he is not in the house at the present time.

The statistics provided by the Department of Labour, and consequently by the Minister of Labour, concerning unemployment in Canada do not show the real situation.

In fact, we learned recently that in the province of Quebec there are as many unemployed people not registered on unemployment lists as there are registered. Therefore, it means that the number of unemployed would be twice the number given by official statistics. Now, the use of false statistics is likely to mislead hon. members.

I might have raised a grievance on that matter, but since the ministers and government members, in turn, refer to those statistics to praise the government and try to blot out the true situation, I thought it was appropriate to make it a question of privilege.

Therefore, I ask the Minister of Labour to see to it that his staff and officials give us the exact figures concerning the number of unemployed in the province of Quebec and all across Canada so that we will not be misled by the figures now provided to us and by the statistics as they are compiled.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Edmund Asselin (Notre Dame de Grâce) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

GATT—REPORT ON OPENING MINISTERIAL SESSION

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from the opening ministerial session of the Kennedy round of trade and tariff negotiations in Geneva. I ask the permission of the house to table the official text, in French and English, of the report adopted at the meeting.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house grant permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, let me deal briefly with the main decisions of the GATT meeting, particularly as they relate to Canada. First, the trade negotiating committee explicitly recognized that Canada is a country with a trade and economic structure such that the simple across the board formula for tariff negotiations would not yield reciprocity of benefit. The procedures for our participation have been agreed. Canada will begin the negotiations by offering concessions equivalent in value to the trade and economic benefits we may expect to receive.

Second, for the main industrialized countries, including the United States, the European common market, Britain and Japan, the working hypothesis will be an across the board cut of 50 per cent in their tariffs.

Third, it has been agreed that the exchange of offers will be made on September 10. Countries participating on the basis of across the board cuts will on that date notify the other negotiating countries of their list of exceptions to the general 50 per cent rule. Canada, on the other hand, will be starting from a positive list of offers of concessions. I confirmed that we are prepared to table our offer on the same date, September 10. Consultations with industry have been under way for some weeks during which hundreds of submissions have been received. I am confident that we shall be able to analyse these submissions and be in a position to table the Canadian offer on the agreed date.

Fourth, it was decided that for the countries participating on the basis of across the board cuts, exceptions are to be limited to a bare minimum required by overriding national importance.

As far as tariffs on industrial goods are concerned, these were the main decisions. The difficult question of disparities between tariff levels and how to deal with them is not yet resolved. Nor has satisfactory progress yet been achieved with respect to procedures for the negotiation of agricultural products. As hon. members will see when they read the report I have just tabled, the ministers confirmed that the negotiations shall provide for acceptable conditions of access to world markets for agricultural products. While detailed negotiations have already been initiated with respect to wheat and other grains, the general rules and procedures for agricultural negotiations have yet to be worked out. Canada and other agricultural exporting countries expressed in strong terms their concern with this lack of agreement as to the treatment to be applied to agricultural products, and it was agreed that the necessary rules and procedures shall be established at an early date.

On the whole I believe this was a useful meeting. It committed the members of GATT to a timetable and to a number of procedures that should facilitate the forthcoming negotiations. Needless to say we did not resolve all our difficulties. Much remains to be accomplished even before September 10, and the subsequent negotiations themselves will probably last for many, many months beyond that date. Nor is this surprising, for never before has the world attempted such a far reaching attack on international barriers to trade.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister is to be congratulated on making his statement in the house, but not on the luminous nature of the statement. Indeed, I doubt whether I have ever heard a statement made in respect of a matter of such transcendent importance as trade as the one just made by the minister. Everything is postponed. Negotiations are to continue. Hope of ultimate success in some fields is held out. This is a far cry on this sixtieth day of this session from the enthusiastic and optimistic statements made when hon. members opposite were in opposition about how simple the problem was going to be and how they were going to bring about an expansion and an extension of world trade.

In so far as agricultural products are concerned, I recall so well that when we were in power we were endeavouring to ensure the protection of Canada's position in the European common market. Those who now sit opposite were most critical of our stand in that regard. As agricultural exporters the reduction of tariffs on agricultural products is of prime importance to our country. Barriers against wheat imports are most important.

The minister has stated that no longer is the Liberal party—and this has been so for some months now—in favour of what it so strongly advocated when in opposition, namely a 50 per cent cut across the board in tariffs. It now has taken up the position which we had assumed; yet when we took the stand that a 50 per cent cut would be detrimental to Canada, more serious to Canada than possibly to any other country, the answer was that it could be done. In office hon. gentlemen opposite have found that what they advocated in opposition has been ineffective and has had to be retreated from.

Altogether, Mr. Speaker, I must say that the report is one of the most disappointing that the house has yet heard from the minister. In place of the optimism of the past there is today not even qualified optimism. There is uncertainty, if not a degree of hopelessness, which does not spell well for the future negotiations which will take place. All of us had hoped that out of this Kennedy round would come new expansion and development of trade; but certainly up to the present time, with the exception of platitudes and highest expectations, little or nothing has been done.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to comment on this matter, but in view of what the Leader of the Opposition has said perhaps I should say something. The minister is undertaking very delicate and difficult negotiations and it seems to me that it is a time for as little carping criticism as possible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Scott: —in view of the very important nature of these negotiations and the vital effect which they will have on the future economy of our country.

I think the minister has given us a note of cautious optimism this afternoon. There are circumstances in connection with these talks which were not in evidence at Brussels, but at the same time we still do not know what the French are up to and we do not know what the Germans are up to.

An hon. Member: We do not know what you are up to.

Mr. Scott: But I know what you are up to, and I think by this time all of Canada knows what you are up to.

We do hope that as the talks proceed the minister will be able to resolve one of the most vital problems which, of course, is the problem of agriculture. Although at the moment there seems to be no clear indication where the talks are going on the whole, as I have said, we are glad to have this report and we hope that as negotiations proceed some of the more difficult aspects can be resolved so that future reports will contain something a little more concrete which we can discuss.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I think we can all agree that the announcement the Minister of Trade and Commerce has just made in respect of new negotiations on world trade and commerce concerns probably the most ambitious undertaking the world has ever known to reduce tariffs in all fields. We are disappointed, of course, that there has not been more progress that could be announced at this date. We are particularly disappointed at the indication in the minister's speech that there was almost no progress in resolving these problems relating to trade in agricultural products.

I want to say to the minister, however, that we hope this problem does not get blown up to such magnitude it prevents progress in other fields. We know from the past few months that there have been some very serious ramifications in other relationships between countries because this matter of agricultural trade is one in which emotion runs very high. We hope there will be, as I said, more progress, and we would not like to see these discussions bog down so that progress is prevented in other fields.

We are also a bit apprehensive about the package or packages the minister intends to offer on September 10. We hope he has communicated sufficiently with all the industries involved and has, in fact, received some approval and co-operation or promise of co-operation from them so that we do not have a situation in which one segment of our industry is going to be sacrificed or partially sacrificed to the advantage of some other segment.

There is one other point I should mention, and that is this matter of some new and more workable means of international settlements. We believe this is a most important new departure in world trade that needs to be developed, and while the minister did not say anything about it in his statement today we hope Canadians are leading the discussions in attempting to arrive at some new and more workable means of making these international settlements.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) has returned safe and sound from the Geneva conference. We listened very closely and have noted that he stated that various countries in the world are trying to improve their respective economic standards of living.

We find that every country is looking for foreign markets, in other words they are trying to increase their exports as much as possible and, to help them, it is announced that certain tariff barriers between those various countries are being removed.

Shortly, at another meeting, another decicision will be taken on September 10, but to date I think few changes were made in regard to imports or exports or in regard to trade with other countries.

Every country has to cope with an overabundance of goods and products, and they all are seeking exterior outlets, while neglecting the domestic market.

When he was in Geneva the minister certainly realized that all countries have to face the same problems. We all have products to export. There are certain financial obstacles which threaten smoother relations between countries, as there are financial obstacles inside this and other countries which impair the disposal of existing goods, and preventing satisfaction of our domestic needs.

I ask the minister when he returns to Geneva, to suggest in turn to all those countries that they control or settle their own domestic problems. Then we shall see that the international question will be much more easily settled. Yet this way we shall not only assist our farmers, but our businessmen and industrialists as well and improve our economic system, because we shall help our own people first, which is what we want to do.

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FURTHER SALE TO RED CHINA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence to make another announcement and I do hope this one will not disappoint the Leader of the Opposition as much as my previous announcement apparently did.

The Canadian wheat board is announcing in Winnipeg today that under the provisions of the second long term wheat agreement with China a further sales contract has been signed to provide for the export of 1,075,000 long tons, 5 per cent more or less, of wheat of which one million tons will be shipped from Pacific coast ports during July to December and the balance of 75,000 tons from St. Lawrence river ports during the period May through December, 1964. Assuming the full tolerance is taken, this amounts to slightly over 42 million bushels.

Including the sales contract covered by this announcement, total sales under the second long term agreement amount to 2.1 million tons or approximately 77.4 million bushels. As in the previous sales contracts, payment terms for sales under the long term agreement are 25 per cent cash when each vessel is loaded and the balance of 75 per cent in 18 months with interest. The deferred payment provision is made possible by a guarantee to the Canadian wheat board by the government of Canada.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the statement he made today, and ask him whether there is any flour involved in the recent wheat sale to China, and if he would give the same priority to the sale of wheat flour as he indicated to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam he would give to sales of wheat so that our flour mills may continue to operate at their present capacity beyond July 1.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In the announcement I made earlier today, only wheat was involved. I can assure the hon. member that wherever possible we try to sell flour, but the choice is the buyer's choice and if we cannot sell flour we sell wheat.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Would the minister advise the house whether a decision has already been made, in connection with the delivery of this grain to China, that none of it will be shipped through the port of Churchill? Was any consideration given to this aspect of the subject?

Mr. Sharp: The question of the ports of shipment was discussed between the Chinese authorities and the Canadian wheat board and they made the choice in accordance with the announcement I made today, namely that most of the grain should go from the Pacific coast ports and the balance from the St. Lawrence ports.

HARBOURS

LEGISLATIVE PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-10 (from the Senate), to provide for the establishment of harbour commissions.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, this bill was presented in the other place at the last session and the bill now brought forward is the same, with the exception that amendments have been made in some of the minor clauses arising out of the proceedings in committee in the other place. There is also a change in the schedule to the bill by deleting the reference to Toronto and Hamilton. Otherwise the bill is the same.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXPORTS CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING LIABILITY OF CORPORATION AND EXPORTERS, ETC.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the house do go into the committee of the whole at its next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:—

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act to increase from four hundred million dollars to six hundred million dollars the limit of the liability of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21 of the act; to enable the aggregate liability of importers under all instruments guaranteed by or payable to the said corporation to be increased from three hundred million dollars to four hundred million dollars; to permit the said corporation to enter into reciprocal arrangements with export credit insurers in other countries for the reinsurance of liabilities under contracts of insurance with exporters; and to provide further for certain consequential changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

FARM CREDIT ACT

AMENDMENTS INCREASING AUTHORIZED CAPITAL, MAXIMUM LOAN LIMITS, ETC.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That the house do go into committee of the whole at its next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:—

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Farm Credit Act to increase the authorized capital of the farm credit corporation from sixteen million dollars to twenty four million dollars and thereby to increase the maximum borrowing capacity of the said corporation from four hundred million dollars to six hundred million dollars; to increase the maximum loan limits under part II of the said act from twenty thousand dollars to forty thousand dollars; to increase the maximum loan limits under part III of the said act from twenty seven thousand five hundred dollars to fifty five thousand dollars; and to provide further for certain other changes in connection with the administration and operation of the said act.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TRANSPORT OF EQUIPMENT OF CANADIAN BOBSLED TEAM

Question No. 264—Mr. Horner (Acadia):

1. Did the United States of America provide free transportation for the toboggan and other equipment for the world championship team when it returned to Canada from Innsbruck, Austria?

2. Was there not available any space in one or other of the many Canadian government aircraft which go back and forth between the European continent and Canada?

Mr. Lamontagne: 1. The government has no direct knowledge of personnel or baggage, Canadian or otherwise, carried on U.S. aircraft, but it is understood that the items mentioned were transported aboard a U.S. aircraft from Innsbruck, Austria, to Lake Placid, N.Y., where the team was to compete.

2. Answered by 1 above.

* CLOSING OF R.C.A.F. STATION EDGAR

Question No. 401—Mr. Rynard:

1. What is the likely closing date of R.C.A.F. station Edgar?
2. What provision will be made to provide other employment in the immediate area for the civilians presently employed at R.C.A.F. station Edgar and resident in that area?
3. Is any consideration being given to the establishment of a federal project in this area?

Mr. MacNaught: 1. The operational function of station Edgar will terminate on April 1, 1964, but the total time taken to close the station will depend upon the disposition of the unit's equipment and personnel and the relocation of certain operational facilities necessary to ensure continued operational coverage. However, it is expected that this station will be reduced to caretaker status by August 31, 1964.

2. All civilian employees will be interviewed by personnel officers of the department to determine their availability for transfer beyond the immediate locality in the event they cannot be placed locally. All employees will be interviewed and registered by the national employment service. The civil service commission and government departments in the area will be provided with particulars affecting all employees scheduled for lay-off. Every effort will be made to find other employment for these persons who are scheduled for lay-off, and these efforts will continue after the station closes down. The employees for whom other employment cannot be found will be placed on an official lay-off list and will be given preference in appointment to future vacancies with the government service.

3. No.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—RELOCATION COST, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 735—Mr. MacRae:

1. What is the cost of the new alternative trans-Canada highway which will of necessity be constructed in York county, New Brunswick, as a result of the building of the Mactaquac dam?
2. What percentage will be paid by the federal government?
3. What percentage will be paid and charged to the Mactaquac project?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. $9.7 million (estimated).

2. 90 per cent.

3. It does not appear that any part of the construction costs of the highway will be chargeable to the Mactaquac project. Right of way costs are a provincial responsibility along with costs incurred in the settlement of damage or other claims resulting from the construction of the Mactaquac project.

*EXCHANGE OF EDUCATORS

Question No. 748—Mr. Mather:

Has the government consulted with the provinces with the objective of working out arrangements for the exchange of educators between the province of Quebec and other provinces, and vice-versa, in order to better the understanding among all sections of Canada?

Mr. Davis: This is clearly a matter pertaining to education and hence is subject to provincial jurisdiction. The federal government has not received any representation which would indicate that the provinces consider this matter an appropriate subject for federal-provincial consultation at this time.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL HIGHWAY POLICY

Question No. 754—Mr. Stefanson:

1. When does the government plan on convening a federal-provincial conference to formulate a national highway policy?
2. For what reasons did this conference not take place last fall as indicated in the statement made by the Minister of Public Works to the House of Commons on July 17, 1963?
3. Have federal government officials held discussions with any provincial government officials and, if so, from what provinces and when and where did such discussions take place?
4. Have written invitations been extended to the provincial governments to participate in such a conference?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. Please refer to my statement to the house on 28 April, 1964.

2. See answer to part 1.

3. Yes. NATIONAL CAPITAL DISTRICT

Question No. 817—Mr. Martineau:

1. What are the names of the municipalities within the national capital area?
2. Has there been any correspondence, communications or negotiations with the governments of the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, on the one hand, and the Canadian government, on the other hand, regarding the possible formation of a national capital district?

3. Have the views of the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario been made known to the Canadian government in this regard?

4. Have any of the municipalities within the national capital area been consulted in regard to the possible setting up of a national capital district and, if so, what were, in each case, the views expressed?

5. Is the government considering presenting legislation proposing the setting up of a national capital district?

Mr. Deschatelets: 1. The administrative structures located within the national capital region are: seven counties, three cities, five towns, 35 townships, nine villages, and 12 police villages.

Within Ontario these are: (a) counties, Carleton, Prescott and Russell, Lanark; (b) cities, Ottawa*, Eastview*; (c) towns, Almonte; (d) townships, Gloucester*, Nepean*, Osgoode, North Gower, Goulbern, March, Huntley, Torbolton, Fitzroy, Cumberland, Russell, Pakenham, Ramsay, Beckwith; (e) villages, Rockcliffe Park*, Stittsville, Richmond; (f) police villages, City View*, Cumberland, Embrun, Kenmore, Manotick*, Metcalfe, Navan, North Gower, Orleans*, Osgoode, Russell, Vars.

Within Quebec these are: (a) counties, Gatineau, Hull, Papineau, Pontiac; (b) cities, Hull*; (c) towns, Buckingham, Gatineau*, Pointe-Gatineau*, Aylmer*; (d) townships, Buckingham, Buckingham West, Buckingham South East, L'Ange-Gardien, Portland, Portland West, Aldfield, Onslow, Onslow South, Perkins*, Templeton West*, Templeton East*, East Part of Templeton East*, Eardley, Hull East, Hull South*, Hull West, Masham North, Ste Cécile de Masham, Wakefield, Wakefield East; (e) villages, Anger, Deschenes*, Masson, Templeton*, Quyon, Wakefield.

*Municipalities which form the Ottawa metropolitan area as defined by the dominion bureau of statistics.

*NEWFOUNDLAND BROADCASTING CO.

Question No. 828—Mr. Fisher:

1. What do the records of the board of broadcast governors indicate as to the ownership of the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company?

2. Is one of the owners a resident in the United States?

3. If so, is this same owner and any other co-owner of Newfoundland Broadcasting Company listed as being owner in whole or in part of radio station CKGM, radio station CJON, T.V. station CJON, T.V. station CJOX, and for the two licences recently awarded by the board of broadcast governors for AM stations at Ottawa and Windsor, issued to Messrs. Bill Stewart and Royce Frith?

4. With regard to the board of broadcast governors recommendations that the Newfoundland Broadcasting Company have the authority to establish a new 1000 watt AM broadcasting station at Grand Falls and another at Grand Bank, Newfoundland, what were the arguments which convinced the board of broadcast governors that the market areas could support another broadcasting station or that there was inadequate radio service choice at the present time?

Mr. MacNaught: I am informed that the board of broadcast governors' records indicate:

1. That the ownership of Newfoundland Broadcasting Company is held by Mr. Geoffrey Stirling, Mr. Donald Jamieson and Mrs. Florence Curnan.

2. That Mrs. Florence Curnan is listed as living in the United States.

3. That Newfoundland Broadcasting Company is the licensee of stations CJON-TV, CJON and CJOX and that neither Mrs. Curnan nor Messrs. Stirling or Jamieson are whole or part owners of the new stations in Ottawa or Windsor. Mr. Stirling is shown as the owner of station CKGM Montreal.

4. That there are three radio systems in the province of Newfoundland, operated by the C.B.C., Colonial Broadcasting System Limited, and Newfoundland Broadcasting Company. It is the view of the board that these systems should be extended to cover the province of Newfoundland to provide variety of choice of radio service as economic conditions warrant. In the particular case referred to, the board was satisfied that the competing systems could meet the competition.

*MRS. JEANNE SAUVÉ—PAYMENTS FROM C.B.C.

Question No. 890—Mr. Pigeon:

What total amount did Mrs. Jeanne Sauvé draw from the C.B.C. since her employment on certain programs of the C.B.C.?

[Translation]

Mr. MacNaught: The C.B.C. has advised me that it is not customary to have the corporation reveal the fees paid to participants of programs, because it could prejudice the corporation's interests which must meet competition.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT TENDER 8B-6029

Question No. 908—Mr. MacEwan:

Did the Department of Transport, under the terms of tender 8B-6029, call for 16 separate items and, if so (a) was the contract awarded to the two lowest over-all tenderers and (b) for what reasons was the contract so awarded?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Department of Transport under the terms of tender 8B-6029 called for 16 items, that is 10 different sizes of buoys, some of which were for delivery to two or three locations.

(a) The contract was awarded to the lowest over-all tenderers and (b) the reasons for so awarding the contract are: (i) lowest over-all tenders meeting departmental specifications and (ii) acceptance of equipment which entailed lowest cost to the department.

TENDERS FOR POST OFFICE BOXES, AMOS, QUE.

GREATER CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN WEST INDIES

Question No. 942—Mr. Latulippe:

1. Does the Canadian government have an official delegate to the commonwealth parliamentary association's conference on parliamentary procedure which is taking, or has taken, place in London?

2. Is Canada considering the possibilities of assuming protectoral responsibility for the Windward and Leeward islands, and for the British section of the Virgin islands?

3. Is Canada considering the possibility of more intensive participation in the political life of the West Indies wth respect to finance, trade and defence?

4. What is the status of Canada's present diplomatic relations with the Virgin islands, Trinidad and Tobago, Jamaica, and the Windward and Leeward islands?

5. Over the past three years, what were the main Canadian imports and exports to and from these countries, and the values and quantities involved?

6. Does Canada, at the present time, have special agreements in the matters of finance, trade, external affairs and defence, with these countries?

7. Have the abovementioned countries made representations of any kind to Canada with a view to fuller Canadian participation in their political, economic and social life?

[Translation]

Answer: 1. No. However, a representative of the Canadian section of the commonwealth parliamentary association follows the course offered by the conference on parliamentary procedure.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Canada maintains diplomatic relations with Trinidad and Tobago through a high commissioner's office which was established in Port of Spain soon after Trinidad became independent in 1962. Canada also maintains diplomatic relations with Jamaica through a high commissioner's office which was established in Kingston soon after this country became independent in 1962. Canada has no diplomatic relations with the Windward and Leeward islands, or with the British section of the Virgin islands.

5. (See attached appendix)

6. Two agreements are presently in force: (a) Canada, on July 6, 1925, signed in Ottawa an agreement which, among other things, deals with trade with Trinidad and Tobago, Jamaica, and the Windward and Leeward islands; (b) Canada and the former West Indies Federation signed notes which were exchanged on October 18, 1958, implementing mutual statements of principles issued by the two countries to promote the cooperative economic development of the West Indies.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROTESTS RESPECTING BENEFITS PLAN FOR RETIRING PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, because of the fact that the matter comes under two departments I will direct my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the government is giving consideration to the complaints being received from members of the armed forces who are being compulsorily and mandatorily retired, particularly in connection with the question of income tax being imposed on the bulk sum in the year in which the payment is made.

Has the government given consideration to extending the payment over a period of years, or at least to permitting income tax to be paid on that basis rather than having the imposition made immediately the payment is made to a discharged member of the armed forces?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware I have not received complaints myself, but perhaps some of my colleagues have. I shall look into the matter, and if complaints have been received we will give consideration to the suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman.

TRADE

PROPOSED VISIT BY MINISTER TO EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him if the press reports are correct that he will be heading a trade delegation to the Soviet union later this year. May I further ask him if the matter of continued sales of wheat to that country will be on the agenda for discussion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): May I say to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I was as surprised as perhaps he was to read this report in the paper this morning. I do intend to make a trip to the Soviet union, and I hope to other countries in eastern Europe, but I have not laid any plans for this purpose and the story that appears in the paper is purely speculative. I can assure the hon. gentleman, however, that if I have the opportunity of going I shall be discussing wheat before anything else.

[Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson).]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—NUMBER OF TROOPS UNDER U.N. COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence perhaps I may direct it to the parliamentary secretary. What is the total number of troops now under United Nations command in Cyprus, and have any United Kingdom troops been withdrawn as yet from the United Nations force and replaced by troops from other participating countries?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): I shall take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

NATO—RENEGOTIATION OF CANADIAN COMMITMENTS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

In view of NATO's rather uncertain future, following discussions now being held in Europe, will the minister take this opportunity to renegotiate the scope of his military contribution to that organization, as he advocated when he sat in opposition?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those people who firmly believe that NATO will remain strong and unified as it has been in the past, and thus contribute to the maintenance of stability both in Europe and the rest of the world. As far as our commitments are concerned, at the present time they run to the end of 1966, and we have already forecast in the white paper, if my hon. friend is familiar with it, that there will be renegotiation of commitments which will be in effect from that time.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC—DEPORTATION OF HOLDER OF CANADIAN PASSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is the minister aware that a person holding a Canadian passport has been deported from the Dominican Republic and, if so, what does his department intend to do in that respect?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

FINANCE

PROPOSED ALTERATIONS IN WORLD MONETARY SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of newspaper reports that the world's ten leading industrial nations have been wrestling in secret talks with various proposed alterations of the world's monetary system, would the minister inform the house whether a representative of the Department of Finance or the Bank of Canada has been participating in these talks? If so, has he any information he can give the house in connection with the government's attitude toward the proposals designed to increase monetary liquidity in the future through international co-operation?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. Talks have been going on for some time on this very important and complex question, and Canada has been participating in those talks. When we have something specific to report to the house I will be very glad to make a report, but I do not have anything further to add at this time.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us who the representatives are who have been taking part in these discussions on Canada's behalf?

Mr. Gordon: The official who has been participating is Mr. Plumptre, the assistant deputy minister of finance. I hope to participate myself at a meeting of this group in June.

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN DOMESTIC MONETARY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance. I am sorry that I did not give him notice of it, because he would have had the opportunity to meditate a little.

In view of the alarming situation of our economy, does the minister consider making a few changes in his monetary policy so as to relieve poverty amidst plenty in Canada?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I cannot accept the premise upon which the hon. member has based a question of this importance. I think it is fair to say that the economy of the country has not been stronger than it is now for many, many years.

Some hon. Members: The devalued dollar.

Mr. Gordon: All the indices are going up. If the hon. member wishes to see it I will be glad to send him a copy of a speech I made a week ago on this subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister give us the exact number of unemployed in Canada at the present time, which would prove, by the same token, whether or not prosperity is prevailing in the country?

PUBLIC SERVICE

FORMATION OF NEW ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH CANADIAN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Following the announcement that certain federal civil servants, more particularly the French Canadian group, have decided to form their own association which will be independent of the national organization, could the Prime Minister assure the house that the group will not be discriminated against by other associations of federal employees?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper in order to get a detailed answer?

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MONTREAL—TERMS OF BAIL GRANTED TO MR. BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. According to newspaper reports an order was made by the chief justice of Quebec granting bail to Mr. Banks. I wonder whether the terms of that recognizance include a condition which would prevent Mr. Banks from leaving Canada.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I have not been made aware of the minute details of the terms of the bond. I think this matter has been settled at the instance of counsel representing the attorney general of the province of Quebec. However, I shall be pleased to inquire into the matter.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING DISSEMINATION OF "HATE" LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Is the Minister of Justice in a position to advise the house whether the Department of Justice is now engaged in drafting the necessary legislation which will be presented to parliament to deal with the campaign of hate literature? If so, what is the nature of this legislation and when may it be expected to be introduced in the house?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): With due deference, I doubt whether this is an urgent question within the meaning of your rulings, Mr. Speaker. However, I am pleased to answer the hon. gentleman to the effect that this matter is presently under active pursuance by officials of my department and myself, but I am not yet in a position to report to the government or to make a final submission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the hon. gentleman and ask him whether this report is justified: "The hon. member for York Centre reported that the Department of Justice is preparing effective legal measures to stop the dissemination of bigotry and racial hatred." Also:

> The wheels of justice are moving again against these maniacs. Our bill will be presented to parliament after consultation with the proper authorities.

Are those statements in accordance with the facts?

Mr. Speaker: This is the first time I have had an opportunity, if it is the right opportunity, of applying one of my instructions. It seems to fit the case. Questions should not inquire whether statements made in newspapers are correct.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then, with due deference to that ruling, I ask the minister whether legislation is being prepared to meet the situation, and whether it will be presented soon.

Mr. Favreau: Well, I just gave an answer to the first part of that question. As to the second part, I must answer that this will be government policy, to be announced in due course.

QUEBEC—FRAUDULENT BANKRUPTCIES IN HOUSING CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. At the request of home builders of the province of Quebec in particular, does the government intend to amend the Bankruptcy Act in order to stem the present wave of fraudulent bankruptcies in the field of housing?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Unless the minister has a ready answer it seems to me this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Pigeon: Yes, the minister has his answer ready, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I was just going to make that suggestion.

Mr. Pigeon: I will discuss this matter at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT BY PROVINCIAL MINISTER RESPECTING STATUS OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the house whether he approves the statement made by Mr. René Lévesque at St. Mary's College during the week end where he rejected co-operative federalism and advocated the status of associate state for Quebec?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pigeon: This is a very important question, Mr. Speaker. It is the same old bunch.

Mr. Speaker: Without ruling on the importance of the question, I would certainly say it is a very interesting matter. Nevertheless it is out of order.

Mr. Pigeon: Can I raise this matter after ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the hon. member's question was not in order. He was simply asking for the opinion of one minister as to a statement made by a minister in another province on another matter.

Mr. Pigeon: It is of great importance.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): I wish to ask a question pertaining to the same matter. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would like to tell us whether the status of associate state for Quebec comes within the compass of co-operative federalism.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The status of Quebec and Canada should be well known to the hon. gentleman.

AGRICULTURE

CHEESE—INQUIRY AS TO EXPORT ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister now in a position to inform the house what export assistance will be made available to the cheese producers of Canada? I would remind him that he forecast such assistance in his statement on dairy policy on April 29.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I hope the stabilization board will be able to make an announcement tomorrow. It may be of interest to hon. members to know that we have about 46 million pounds of cheese in storage, and that there is a very brisk market for it.

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): I wish to ask a supplementary question. With regard to his change in policy whereby the Minister of Agriculture has withdrawn the 30 cent subsidy paid by the government to the producers of cheese milk, will it now become compulsory and statutory that the cheese factories pay the cheese milk producers the 30 cents per hundredweight, since the government now proposes to pay the cheese factories a subsidy of 3.6 cents per pound for first grade cheddar cheese?

Mr. Hays: The policy of the government has always been, through the stabilization board, to pay the 30 cents subsidy to the cheese factories. The payment is now no different except that we are paying 3.6 cents on solids. You get about nine pounds of cheese out of 100 pounds of milk, so this even represents a slight increase for first quality cheese.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I did not get an answer to my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is entering into a debate with the minister.

SOCIAL INSURANCE

NO COMPULSION ON CIVIL SERVANTS TO COMPLETE APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Is the government making it compulsory for all civil servants, whether they are covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act or not, to complete applications for social insurance numbers?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure the house that there will be no discrimination against those civil servants who do not wish to fill out applications?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

CITIZENSHIP ACT

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. My question is based on his reference in Toronto over the week end to the government's proposed amendment to the Citizenship Act, which of course was referred to in the speech from the throne. Can the Prime Minister tell us when this legislation will be introduced and what it will include to make all citizens in Canada equal?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot tell my hon. friend when it will be introduced. The government would like to get it before the house as quickly as possible, and when it is introduced I will then be able to report on the details of the legislation.

SHIPPING

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE ON WATER LEVELS OF GREAT LAKES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Because of the announcement by Premier Robarts of Ontario that an international conference will be called to discuss water levels on the great lakes, will the minister inform the house whether this government intends sending observers to these meetings?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I noted in the press the announcement that Mr. Robarts had suggested that an international conference on lake levels be held. I also noticed with considerable interest that he suggested it would have to originate at the federal government level. We are at all times in discussion with our U.S. counterparts in the technical field on these matters. I believe that at the meeting of ministers with the United States secretaries which took place a week or ten days ago the matter was raised but was not discussed in any depth. I am quite certain that the United States government would be happy to discuss this with the Canadian government, and I am quite certain also that an exchange of facts in relation to their position and ours would be beneficial and no doubt will be undertaken.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Have there been any direct talks between the Ontario government and the Canadian government on the subject?

Mr. Laing: Not with me, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Would the minister say whether discussions did take place between the Canadian ministers and the United States ministers when that meeting took place? If so, what was the nature of the discussions; was any course determined on, or was the position such that Canada advanced no particular plan whatever, which apparently was the position when the minister reported to parliament when his estimates were before the house?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I might tell the right hon. gentleman that the matter was raised by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. However, very little discussion in depth took place at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the nature of the suggestion on the part of the Canadian government, if anything? The hon. gentleman was not so sure the other day. Was he present when these discussions took place between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the United States ministers?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could answer that question. I took part in the discussion with Mr. Udall and other United States ministers, and having agreed that the problem was of course serious we decided what would be the best course to follow in order to bring about the kind of examination which has to be brought about by both countries.

The matter has been referred to technical officials on both sides so that suitable terms of reference can be agreed on for submission to the international joint commission, which as my right hon. friend knows is an international body and is the most appropriate body to make recommendations to the government on this matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In view of the fact that the federal government did not see fit to call a conference, would it consider sending representatives to the conference which the premier of Ontario has stated will be called? I think the Prime Minister would agree, would he not, that the action on the part of Mr. Robarts was, to use his expression, bold and imaginative?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will leave the adjectives to my right hon. friend; but while Mr. Robarts was making his statement the officials were already working on terms of reference for the international joint commission, and on the international joint commission both governments are already represented.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, did the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources have this information when his estimates were before the house, or did the Prime Minister keep it secret from him?

Mr. Pearson: As I was the minister who took part in the discussion, I thought it appropriate that I should reply, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, was he aware that some preliminary meetings had taken place? So that I do not have to rise again I will ask a second question. In order that his words are not improperly received I will quote what the premier of Ontario said:

> Ultimate responsibility would probably fall to the...federal government—

Would the minister, then, consider instituting such a conference?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I would think, answering the second question, that there will be an official appeal from the premier of Ontario to the government of Canada to initiate such negotiations with the United States. As to the first question, I would not say that meetings have taken place. I said that the matter had been raised by our Secretary of State for External Affairs in the discussions with the United States secretaries, but that not a great deal of discussion had taken place other than the reference to the I.J.C. and the technical studies that are under way.

Mr. Martineau: I have a supplementary question that arises from an answer given by the Prime Minister, who stated that officials were busy preparing terms of reference concerning this matter. My question is, will these terms of reference contain a demand for a study of the Grand canal project?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if that has a bearing on the lake levels it will of course be considered; if it does not, then it probably would not be appropriate for this particular reference. But this matter is already under consideration by officials on both sides, and the provincial governments, and undoubtedly the state governments, will be kept informed of the discussions as they go on.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has he received a communication from the Quebec premier or from the minister of natural resources asking the federal government's co-operation concerning a study of the problem of the water level in Montreal harbour, the St. Lawrence river and Lac des Deux-Montagnes?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received such a communication, but I will be glad to look into the matter as soon as I get to my office.

EARTHQUAKE DAMAGE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister received a telegram from the association of Vancouver island municipalities urging the federal government to contribute as generously and rapidly as possible to the Alberni valley and west coast disaster fund; and if so, can he indicate to the house the nature of his reply to this telegram?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I received that telegram just before lunch. I have not yet had a chance to look into it. I will do so immediately.

URANIUM

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF STOCKPILING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles Lamb (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker I should like to direct my question to the minister of mines. Is he still considering the stockpiling of uranium? I gave the minister written notice of this question and I intend to receive an answer.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, this was fully discussed last week on orders of the day.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR REVISED WHITE PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in her absence I would direct it to the parliamentary secretary. Is it now possible to inform the house when the revised paper on the Canada pension plan will be available?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member for Middlesex West that a white paper will be made available at the appropriate time. The government is working on it right now and will make it available as early as possible. The most important new feature is as to survivors and disability benefits, and it would be improper to deal with this matter in a white paper until a constitutional amendment, which enables these benefits to be included in the plan, has been prepared.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Can he indicate when the proposal for an amendment to the constitution in connection with this matter will be presented to the house?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the exact date. We have agreed on a formula of words and as soon as that formula is acceptable to all provinces we will be able to bring it before the house.

GRAIN

WHEAT—EFFECT OF INCREASED DELIVERIES ON LOW QUOTA POINTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on May 7 the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre asked a question of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the supplementary delivery quotas which had been established by the wheat board. The hon. member asked:

> Will the heavy deliveries arising from these extra quotas, at points now on 8 bushel quotas, adversely affect the chances of points not yet on the 8 bushel quota receiving such a quota soon?

I can now answer the hon. gentleman's question. My answer is no; I am advised by the Canadian wheat board that preference for box cars will continue to be given the lower quota points.

National Defence Act

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR MINIMUM WAGES FOR CAFETERIA AND OTHER EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance or his assistant, although it may have to be referred to another authority. Would the minister advise the house whether arrangements are being made to bring the wage rates of cafeteria and other employees on parliament hill up to at least the minimum wage requirements of the province of Ontario?

Mr. E. J. Benson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPLACEMENT OF CHIEFS OF STAFF COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Friday, May 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hellyer for the second reading of Bill No. C-90, to amend the National Defence Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the time I have left to deal mainly with two suggestions resulting from the statement made last Friday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer) on the plan now being studied.

First, I think it should be pointed out that the people most directly affected do not seem too happy about the proposals set forth by the minister to compensate the members of the armed forces who will be discharged following the re-organization of the general staff and the armed forces.

Indeed, last week and Saturday in particular, newspapers reported some rather bitter comments made by members of the armed forces or their representatives.

When he replied to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) did not seem aware of the representations and of the fully justified objections made against those decisions.

I feel that those decisions are open to criticism on two counts.

With regard to the government's intention to fully assess the amount of the compensation paid to discharged personnel, I find somewhat strange the intention to tax those allowances paid to the personnel, because a tax is being levied as if it were an income. In this case, it is not an income, but a sum of money, an allowance paid for a specific purpose. That aim is to ensure or facilitate the rehabilitation of military personnel.

It is easy to understand that those soldiers, seamen or airmen, who have served for a number of years in the armed forces, need special provisions to enable them to adjust to civilian life, when they could normally expect, under the terms of their enrolment, to serve the rest of their active life in the armed forces.

That makes me wonder why such a sharp distinction is made between the various ranks of military personnel. Thus, a general with 15 to 20 years' service in the armed forces can expect to get a compensation or gratuity that can amount to several thousands of dollars, whereas an ordinary soldier with the same length of service will receive only a small fraction of that amount.

Yet, would it not be reasonable to think that it would be much more difficult for a private, who perhaps has no trade and surely no savings and few business connections, to rehabilitate himself than it would be for a general who received a very high pay while serving in the armed forces?

Therefore, it seems to me that if the minister intends to pay certain gratuities to discharged personnel for rehabilitation purposes, no distinction should be made on the basis of rank. Both the private and the general gave their time and perhaps sacrificed another career to serve their country and, surely, if for some reason or a policy change they are forced to leave the armed forces and look for a civilian job, no distinction should be made because, after all, such distinctions are only factitious.

Consequently, I move on the one hand, that the compensation paid to officers and servicemen who are forced to retire be income tax free, and, on the other, that the amount of the compensation be allowed to vary according to the number of years of service but not according to the grade of the individual concerned. In addition, I suggest that the compensation be graduated according to the person who retires.

Finally, I believe that the government should take special steps, perhaps along the lines followed after the last world war, to enable retired members of the armed forces to take special courses or learn a trade to facilitate their rehabilitation.

Oftentimes, servicemen, in the army, the air force or the navy, learn a trade which is useless to them once they return to civilian life and, if we want to be really fair to them —and however stirring the minister's call— we must make all these benefits available to these men who are the innocent victims of a policy change, a change that may be necessary but which is nevertheless a government policy change which vitally affects them as well as their families.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to close my remarks with these few words on the defensive role that Canada should play today. First of all, it should be a role proportionate to the means of our country.

Following the minister's statement it was reported in the press that as a result of these changes a saving of $10 billion was expected during the next ten years. I think that the minister should correct the wrong impression given by his remarks, because after considering them closely one realizes that it will not really be a saving but simply a transfer of certain sums from military personnel or the administration to development of military equipment.

I feel that our country should refrain from trying to play the part of a great power, and especially all parts at the same time. I submit that the efforts of our country should be restricted to the development of an efficient military technology which would give our country the opportunity to equip itself with modern weapons, and this could make all the difference between an obsolete and an adequate defence.

Mr. Speaker, today, the part played by the great powers cannot be determined by the population of a country or even by its resources. There are countries with a very large population which, however, are not great powers. There are some nations with huge natural wealth, which are not among the great powers. For instance, there are India and Brazil, with vast resources and a huge population, but undeveloped yet which do not count among the really great powers in today's accepted meaning of the words.

At the same time, there are some countries with a comparatively small population which, thanks to their very advanced technological achievements, rank among the great powers, like the United Kingdom, which is not among the most populated. There are also France and Germany, instances of highly industrialized nations, with a highly developed industrial potential and a very progressive military technology, which are able to play a key part in international relations.

After all, we just have to think that a country has only to discover a new means of destruction, perhaps a biological or chemical means of warfare, or some death ray, to become a great power. It is a good illustration of the need for Canada to penetrate further into the field of technological and military research.

The minister will admit that, at this time, our country does not make a very marked effort in that direction, and that nothing in the minister's statement implies that the situation will soon be remedied. Because of its refusal to face the need of stressing military research this country will only be a second class nation as long as no decision is taken to the contrary.

I think the minister should show some courage, go ahead and correct that alarming situation.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem that Canada should further direct its efforts towards the setting up of a mobile peace force which would immediately be trained jointly with other nations and put at the disposal of the United Nations organization.

There is, I think, a field where Canada can play a most efficient part, best suited to its way of thinking and its history.

I know that the Prime Minister raised the question. He spoke of negotiations which had started, or were about to start with certain countries to work out this peace force. Well, we would like to have more specific information in this respect. Would the minister tell us how the project could take shape from a military point of view and be integrated in the defence effort of this country.

Speaking about that peace force, I cannot help but think of the situation now prevailing on Cyprus. I believe that if there is now a need to establish a peace force, it is in order to prevent a situation such as the one that occurred and is developing now on the island.

We would have a great many questions to ask the Minister of National Defence regarding the situation of our troops on the island of Cyprus. For instance, we should like to know whether the Canadian contingent is there under the auspices of the United Nations? That question comes to mind, because we do not know to whom the commander in chief of the Canadian force is really responsible.

Moreover, we do not know whether the countries which promised to send a contingent to set up that force will soon keep their promise, because of all the countries which promised to send forces, only Canada has fully carried out its commitment. Up to now, the other countries which had committed themselves to increase the strength of the force have only sent token forces, so that only Canadian and British soldiers make up this peace keeping force.

The conclusion must be reached that instead of being a United Nations force, this force is jointly administered by Canada and the United Kingdom, whereas the government, and more particularly the Prime Minister, had informed the house of quite definite and specific commitments in this regard. In fact, the Prime Minister stated that this contingent would not be sent to Cyprus, unless it really and effectively constituted a force under the control of the United Nations.

We are led to ask that question by the fact that the United Nations are not responsible for the expenses of the contingent, since Canada itself will assume that burden.

In addition, I think that the minister should give us the assurance that every arrangement has been taken for the security of the Canadian troops now in Cyprus. And still again I blame the government, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) for refusing to disclose the security arrangements essential for our Canadian troops as well as instructions which have been given to them.

I believe that the Canadian people are concerned about the security of our troops in Cyprus, and they wonder also as to the part they are playing there now and will be playing in future.

I am of the opinion that Canada was willing to send a peace force to Cyprus provided its real mission would be to restore peace under the auspices of the United Nations. Up to now, we have not received any assurance from the Minister of National Defence or other ministers in that respect. That is why I say that the minister should take this opportunity, when the whole matter of our defence can be considered, to explain to us the role played by our troops in Cyprus, and especially the security measures taken to ensure their survival and welfare.

In my opinion, if the minister wants to tackle resolutely the problems which we, on this side of the house, have pointed out to him, and if he really wants to give us adequate answers, he will show that he is a great Minister of National Defence, a role he would like to assume and I wish him well. But, up to now he has not proven he could play such a role. So we will be waiting very impatiently for his answers before the end of this debate.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the opportunity offered by the debate on setting up a special defence committee to make a few observations.
