IRENE'S AUCTION.

"And must all go? Can nothing be saved?" querulously questioned Mrs. Arthur, her hands listlessly folded across her lap, her air betokening utter helpless_ces, as she looked pitifully toward the beantiful girl whom she addres

"Nothing, mamma," answered the latter, drawing nearer as she spoke, and kneeling by the other's side, while she laid her finger caressingly upon her mother's pale check—" only each other; but papa's death has taught us how much that is. Don't worry, dearest. I hope the sale will enable us to buy fure more suitable to the few which for a time must be our future home, until I can secure some pupils fort they cost the speaker.

Six months before, Irene Arthur had reigned a belle in her father's magnifi-cent home, when, like a thunderbolt from a clear summer sky, came that father's failure and death in quick succession, with the lessons experience only teaches, of friends deserting in the hour of need—little by little learning the necessity of standing alone and see-ing hope drifting further and further in the distance until the present with in the distance, until the present, with its absolute emergencies, roused her to action. The small head, set so regally upon the slight, sloping shoulders, held itself more regally still; the red, full-curved lips were presed more proudly together as Irene buckled on her armor for the fray.

side alone, very calmly, very truly, yet with a certain humbleness, he told her that he loved her, and asked her to become his wife.

"I cannot bear to see you struggle, he said. "Once, as you well know, I could not have asked you to become my wife; and though I have not forgotten, dear, that I am a man who has only honor and ambition, I yet can take you from this life of toll, can shield you with my breast, can toll for you and yours, if you will give me the precious assurance I seek."

Was the man mad? The pride she had forgotten in these quiet months now surged upward, as she turned toward him with pale and sparkling eyes. "Sir, you insult me !"

"No man insults a woman with his honest love, Miss Arthur," he answer-ed, the pride in hers bearing its reflex on ed, the pride in hers bearing its reflex on his face. "I loved you—nay, I love you! The Endurance of a Horse.

The Haynesville Examiner states that a gentleman of North Lowndes that a gentleman of North Lowndes came to this city some weeks ago. While here he bought a buggy and horse. On his way homeward, at Gun-ter's hill, he got out of the buggy for some purpose, and the horse ran off with it. Darkness had set in, and the gen-tleman looked in vain for his missing property. He went home and gave notice of the escape, and was much troubled at the failure to recover the beast and vahile. At last they were SDOW.

notice of the escape, and was much troubled at the failure to recover the beast and vehicle. At last they were found in the woods of Pintlaia swamp, near the place of escape. The buggy had become fixed among the trees in such a manner that the horse could not draw it, and there the unfortunate beast had stood, without food or water, for ten days. Though emaciated and feeble, the horse was driven home without be-ing taken from the buggy. We view this fact, which is wouched for on the best authority, as a contribution to the scientific knowledge and speculation of the day, and hardly know of a parallel. —Montgomery (Ala.) W. W. Scarborough, of Cincinnati, re-ontly wrote the following letter to M. B. Bateham, secretary of the Ohio Horsultural society, in regard to a new method he claims to have discovered for maturing grapes and preventing them from rot. Mr. Scarborough says:

Hearing, in 1875, that my neighbor, Mr. Gottlieb Myers, had in that year tried successfully this experiment, early in the summer of 1877, just after the blossoming had been accomplished and the young grapes fully set, I inclosed in paper bags 2,500 bunches, principally of Concords and Catawbas, with some lew bunches of Delaware, Iona and Isabella, and gathered in the fall 2,450 es threfrom of perfect and magnificent fruit. Of the fruit that yes not bagged there was probably one-half destroyed by rot, with a further loss by mildew, birds and insects.

This year I had 7,500 bunches inclosed in bags, with subtantially the same result to the kind or varieties of grapes before mentioned. Some 300 bunches of the Hartford prolific variety did not do as well as the other varieties. There was less rot this year in our open vineyards than for many years past, but yet there was disease, although diminished, and the same loss by birds and 'to the unprotected bunches, which have heretofore existed.

The bag used is the common paper asted bag used by the grocers, made of yellow Manila paper, and six inches wide by nine inches long or deep, and fastened to the bunch by two or three pins. These bags (or most of them), if made of good quality paper, will last for two years' use, as will the pins also be good for the second year's use, if of good quality.

The quality of the fruit is improved by its isolation in the bag; it is richer in saccharine matter, and of higher flavor. The cost of bags, pins and labor is about one-third of a cent per bag, on the small scale of my experiments. Mr. Meyer, who I have mentioned efore, tried this year the muslin, with what result I have not heard.

The result of the experiments detailed above has confirmed the theory which I have always held-that the rot is caused by the puncture of the grape by some minute insect just at the time when it omes of full size, and when covered by the night dew or the moisture of a foggy night or morning. I have thought that I could, with the naked eye, dis-of the various lighter branches of inover this puncture upon the surface of every grape diseased by rot. I know this is contrary to the usually-accepted otion, but I have held to it, notwithstanding : believing, rather, the supposed vidence of my own eyes to the opinion of others; and these bag experiments so far bear me out, I think, fully in this udgment.

In some old German legend or history it is written that the old German emperrs had their tables loaded with magnificent bunches of grapes grown in glass bottles. We have arrived at the same esuit as to quality with the simple paper bag-great, big-shouldered bunches of erfect fruit, a delight to the eve and a east to the palate. - Michigan Farmer.

The French have done more than any other nation to provide women with employment, says the New York Telegram. There are in France several hundred organized institutions for the instruction form "returns" when the lighter kind of young women in various branches of industry, according to their ascertained from the darker sort, and "bird's eye' capacities and taste. Chief among these industries are painting on porcelain and cut up with the leaves. Women in Paris and throughout the provinces, whose husbands or direct retail trading establishments, take as a general thing an active part in the management of the business, or keep the books, for which they are admirably fitted by special training. Efforts have of late been made in this from holes. city to enlarge the sphere of employment for women. Establishments have been opened for the sale of needle and fancy work. Associations have been formed where women industriously inof the various lighter branches of industrial work which can be performed as well by women as by men. In Paris the great retail bazsars find it to their advantage to employ saleswomen. The example has, of late years, been largely followed here. Important economies have thus been effected in the matter of salaries in all the great Sixth avenue and Fourteenth street dry goods establishments. These mammoth bazaars employ females to a much larger extent than do the smaller stores, and at lower wages than are paid to male hands. There is no reason why women's work should not become as prominent and useful a factor in the industrial forces of America as it is to-day in those of France and other European countries. The exquisite finish which characterizes a large class of French manufactures and secures for them an unapproachable place in the world's markets, can, to a certain extent, be attributed to the delicate taste natural to women. Thousands of women find profitab

The Weed in Various Forms.

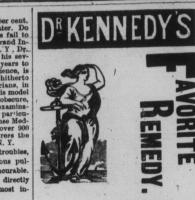

When tobacco is intended for smoking in pipes the leaves, previously watered, are transferred, after the moisture has permeated the mass, to a cuttingmachine, which has an action much resembling that of an ordinary chaff-cutter; by this means they are converted into thin shreds. The leaves thus treated has been employed; " shag " is produced when portions of the stems have been Cigars are made by rolling a portion
