In view of that, these people have contracted obligations. The man in the commercial world works from day to day, from week to week, from month to month or has a contract for one year. A man who has a contract for one year may lease an apartment and buy a certain amount of furniture, but he knows that he does so at his own peril, that at the end of that year the contract may be terminated. When the civil servant accepts a position at a certain salary that is to be paid if he conducts himself properly, with a statutory increase of $60 a year in certain grades and $120 a year in others until he reaches a certain maximum, he cuts his coat according to his cloth. He enters into contractual obligations; he buys a house and puts a mortgage on it; he knows the amount of interest he has to pay; he buys some furniture and makes out his budget so as to enable himself to carry on. Recently the civil servants, of their own good will, contributed to the unemployment relief fund, and the minister paid them a tribute they well deserved. Had they known that, right out of the blue, with no notice whatever, and to take effect immediately, their salaries were to be reduced it might have been a different story. Now they have contracted an obligation which they may find it hard to keep. I cite that just as an example. I have had people come to me and say "This means starvation; I just renewed my lease on the first of February." The house opened on February 4, and they had no premonition that this was to happen. They have renewed old obligations and contracted new ones on this promise to pay; the promise now is shattered, and the contractual relation broken.

If this matter had been approached in a different way it would have been a great deal easier. If the minister had said, "Very well, you as the debtor will be unable to meet your commitments to the extent of ten per cent, so something must be done whereby the creditor will not collect to the extent of ten per cent," matters might have been adjusted, but under present conditions I say this arbitrary action will impose a heavy burden upon those least able to bear it.

I might as well be frank about it; I am absolutely opposed to any cut under these circumstances. I think it is the most unfair thing that could be done. It was done in a most arbitrary way, and will not produce the results anticipated. We may talk of patriotism; it is a very good thing to talk about, but the government and the outside world have no monopoly on patriotism. The civil service is patriotic also. But if the farmers and those in other spheres of life feel the effect of this economic situation to-day, there is no reason why someone who is now enjoying a steady income should have that income reduced, when no direct benefit will result to anyone else. If the civil service is cut to this extent it will not bring one cent of relief to the farmers or to mechanics or to the professional classes. It will be just the other way around; it will reduce by that much the purchasing power of the civil servant. Why should one take the attitude that because a man in business has been mulcted to a certain extent, his business suffering, his income reduced, and himself in financial difficulties, he should on that account begrudge somebody else who is in a more fortunate position? If the government decided to cut these salaries by ten per cent but at the same time to force all employers of labour who reduced by ten per cent the wages and salaries of their employees to contribute that money to the treasury, putting it alongside the $8,000,000 which it is expected to raise from the reduction in civil service salaries, then I am quite satisfied that the civil service would never have been heard from. But I do think that it is a most unfair and inequitable thing to force the civil servants of Canada to contribute $8,000,000 to the national exchequer when the people outside will not contribute one cent. If the employer of labour turned into the coffers of the state whatever reductions in salaries he might make so far as his own employees are concerned, then there would be an excuse for it; but instead of going into the national exchequer side by side with the moneys which will be taken from the civil servants it will simply be used for the purposes of those who cut salaries outside. Those reductions will be used for the benefit of their own businesses and they will not help one bit the reduction of the national debt. For these reasons I cannot support this resolution at all. I make this distinction so far as indemnities are concerned: When I vote against the reduction I am not voting against the reduction in the indemnities of members of parliament.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to make clear the position which I have taken in this matter. Generally speaking, I may say that, as I voted, I am in favour of the general principle of a reasonable cut. I have felt for some time, and so I believe have many other people in the country, that there is one class of people who have been exempt and entirely protected from the effects of the depression, and the depression can always be borne more easily the wider the foundation on which it rests. For that reason I supported the resolution. But there are certain objections which I have to the details of the cut, first in respect to the lower salaries. I shall not dwell on that because it has been discussed at great length, but I do think that the system of gradation should have been carried to a greater extent than it has been. My objection to some of the details applies, however, more particularly to the anticipated exemptions.

It has been suggested that we are somewhat premature, if not out of order, in discussing exemptions at the present time, in that they are not specifically mentioned in the terms of the resolution. I cannot agree with that, because in voting on the general principle we must, if we are to vote intelligently, have some conception of the character of the cut—how wide-embracing it may be, how complete, what the exemptions will be, to what extent they will go, and so on. All that must be embodied in the principle itself, and I think those questions might fairly be discussed in discussing the principle. Coming to the exemptions—and there are several exemptions—I shall take first the Department of National Defence and kindred branches. It has been pointed out by the Minister of Justice, I believe, that the enlisted men occupy, by reason of their obligations and the obligations of the government to them, a position different from that of the ordinary civil servant; the terms of their enlistment are more strict and they have not the same freedom of action. That, I think, is a fair argument. But does it apply to the administrative officials of the department, that is, to the deputy minister and his staff and other officials not enlisted men?

Mr. RALSTON: Those are all cut.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: No, they are not cut.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, the deputy minister and the others.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Then I withdraw the objection so far as that goes. I come then to my chief objection and that is the exemption of judges. It is largely a matter of principle, but may I ask this: In what different position does the judge find himself from, say, the railway commissioners, the pension commissioners or members of other commissions of that sort, all of whom suffer the cut? They also are definitely appointed under statute; their salaries are just as definitely fixed by statute as those of the judiciary. It has been said year after year, and I think correctly, that these commissioners to whom I refer occupy judicial positions, that their work is of a judicial character, that their responsibilities are judicial, and that in every respect they are comparable to judges on the bench or the ordinary judges in different parts of the country. Now I ask, why should one class of judges be exempt while the other class receive these cuts? It is something that does not appeal to my sense of justice.

I supported the resolution because I believe in the general principle that all citizens should bear their fair share of the weight of depression. Nor do I take seriously for a moment the argument that we are reducing purchasing power by the cut in these salaries. That would be true if it applied to reduction of wages in ordinary life, but not where these wages are derived from taxation. It is a question of distribution rather than a reduction of purchasing power. It will reduce purchasing power in Ottawa, but it does not reduce purchasing power in the country generally. Every dollar that comes into the city of Ottawa by way of salary must be taken from the purchasing power of those in other parts of the country, so that I do not take that objection seriously. But I do take most seriously the suggested exemption of judges. How can that be justified in view of the fact that the members of these commissions I have mentioned, paid under statute, performing judicial services under statute, are subject to the reduction?

Mr. RHODES: Unless I repeat myself many times over, there is nothing I can add to what I have already said. The question of exemptions is one that ought not properly to be discussed at this stage of the resolution, and I am not resting solely on technical grounds when I say that. I said it might be a fair subject for discussion whether there ought to be as many exemptions in the proposed bill as suggested, but we cannot get anywhere by discussing that phase of the subject on this resolution; the remedy can be applied only in the bill itself. Therefore I hope my hon. friend will not think me discourteous if I take the same attitude with him as I have with others who have raised the same question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Will hon. members please confine themselves to the subject matter of the resolution?

Mr. SANDERSON: Following the hon. member for Red Deer, the few observations I propose to make will have more to do with the exemptions than with anything else connected with the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Inasmuch as the exemptions are not mentioned in the resolution—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Let me read the first part of the resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize reductions of ten per cent from the amounts of certain salaries.

[Mr. Speakman.]

That does not affect all salaries paid by the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada. Therefore this committee is entitled to discuss exemptions.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): Exemptions are not named.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: What my hon. friend says being the case, I think I have a right, in discussing the principle of the resolution, to ask what salaries are to be affected and what are not.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want first to deal with the exemption of the judges. I am glad the Minister of Justice is in his seat, because the other night, while I was making a few remarks on the resolution, he was not present and there were one or two question I wanted to ask him that I thought he would be better able to answer than any other member of the government.

I want to draw the attention of the committee to the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31. First of all I note that the estimates for the Department of Justice, are increased rather than decreased. It is true the increase is not very large, but still it is an increase. I wish to refer to some of the salaries paid to the judges. I shall not have time to go over every province, but I shall take first of all the Supreme Court of Canada:

Salary of Chief Justice of Canada.	$15,000
Salary of six judges at $12,000.. ..	72,000

Then I come to Ontario. The salaries paid to judges in that province are fair examples of those paid in the other provinces, although in Ontario and Quebec they may be a little higher.

Supreme Court of Ontario—
Salary of Chief Justice of Ontario.	$10,000
Salary of Chief Justice of Second Divisional Court..	10,000
Salary of Chief Justice of High Court Division..	10,000
Salary of eight justices of appeal at $9,000..	72,000
Salary of eight judges of high court division at $9,000..	72,000
County courts—
Salary of sixty-six judges and junior judges of county and district courts at $5,000..	330,000

In addition to that—I do not know that this can fairly come into the discussion, but I shall mention it anyway:

Travelling allowances..	$34,000

That is for the province of Ontario. According to the estimates laid on the table of the house some days ago, the total amount paid to the judges of this country is $2,197,550.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that exclude what is paid by the provinces? They receive something from the provinces.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have no figures for the provinces: Let me say in passing, lest I forget, that in regard to county court judges—while their salary as received from the federal exchequer is $5,000 a year, they are entitled, I believe, to some fees from the surrogate court, so that the average salary of a county court judge in Ontario would be about $6,000

Another aspect of the question is that judges receive pension or superannuation. I do not think I am wrong in stating—if I am, the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Finance will correct me—they do not pay a single dollar into the superannuation fund. Am I correct? Therefore they are receiving, I will not say an extravagant but at any rate a comfortable salary during the years they are on the bench, and always with the prospect that when they retire or are superannuated they will be well taken care of for the rest of their lives.

It has been stated during the debate that many judges, when they are elevated to the bench, make great financial sacrifices. That may be so in some cases, but I am inclined to think the large percentage of the lawyers who are elevated to the bench do not make much of a financial sacrifice.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If they do, they can always resign.

Mr. SANDERSON: That is quite true, but my observation in regard to vacancies in either the supreme court or the county court is that where there is one vacancy there are perhaps fifty applicants, all anxious to be elevated to the bench and quite willing to make the sacrifice.

Let me make this further comment, which is only in connection with county court judges—and I say this not in any critical way, for I have every respect for the judiciary; I think the judiciary of the Dominion of Canada stands as high as that of any other country in the world. But my observation has been that the county court judges who receive $5,000 plus $1,000, or a total of $6,000, with a pension of $5,000 or $6,000 awaiting them when they retire, are in ninety cases out of a hundred making perhaps 35 or 40 per cent more than they were in the practice of law.

Why judges should be exempt from this ten per cent cut, I do not understand. Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee on what grounds they are exempt? There may be some reason; there may be a good reason; but I am of the opinion if there is any class of public servants—because after all judges are public servants—who should lead the way and set an example of sacrifice during such a condition as we have in the country at present, it should be the judges who before they were elevated to the bench were leaders of the bar. Will the Minister of Justice be good enough to give me some reason for exempting judges from this ten per cent cut? If he can, perhaps he will convert me.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Notwithstanding the discussion of this resolution in the house when we thought we had succeeded in converting my hon. friend, when the vote came we found we were wrong and we missed his vote. He was not in the chamber when the vote was taken.

I do not know how serious he is in the questions he has asked; at all events I can regard them as having been seriously put and will state my views in a serious manner in regard to the matters he has mentioned. Of all branches of the administration of government in this or any other country I believe the most important is that of the administration of justice. You may pass in this parliament what laws you see fit, but unless those laws are fairly and honestly administered by a competent judiciary the results will not be satisfactory. The men, regarding whom the greatest caution should be exercised and the greatest consideration had, are those who from time to time are appointed to the bench in the various courts throughout the dominion. We approach a man who we think is qualified from his standing in the community, his general reputation, and especially his legal knowledge and ability, and invite him to accept a seat upon the bench. If he does so he is to a very large extent removed from the ordinary affairs, conditions and circumstances of life, to such an extent indeed that in many cases he has to forego former friendships and former associations. He has to give up the practice of his profession and he must not engage in any kind of business whatsoever. He may be a man who has enjoyed a highly lucrative legal practice. He goes upon the bench with a distinct understanding as to what he is to receive by way of salary and as to the tenure of his term of office. He knows that he cannot be removed through the device or whim of any person or through any political consideration. He is absolutely independent in his judicial position and we desire to keep him so. A judge's salary is fixed by statute and provision is made for his ultimate retirement. In the case of county judges to whom reference has been made by my hon. friend, after thirty years' service on the bench, which is a long term of service, a county court judge may retire on full pay. It has been said that they may retire at any time. That is true, and the pension payable to them upon retirement is fixed according to the number of years they have served, provided they have served a minimum of five or ten years. But if they should retire, what can they do? They are out of practice, their clients and their business have disappeared. They have added five or ten years to their lives, and their chances of making a livelihood under those circumstances are very slim indeed. I submit that if we are going to maintain the high character of the judiciary of this country, as it has been maintained in the past, we must pay our judges substantial salaries and assure them in regard to the permanency of their positions; and we must also make provision for their ultimate retirement. Otherwise we will not secure the eminent class of men that we desire to see upon the bench in this country. Speaking generally, we have enjoyed in Canada since confederation, a very able, upright and distinguished body of men in the various courts in Canada, but there have been, I am sorry to say some exceptions. We strive to get the ablest and best qualified men we can for the modest salaries which we are able to pay as authorized by this parliament.

With regard to county judges, I may say that $5,000 is the salary of a county or a district judge. We have county or district judges in all provinces of Canada save in the province of Quebec, where they maintain a different judicial system from the other provinces of the dominion. This government does not establish the various courts of the provinces or the number of judges in the provinces. When my hon. friend says that there is a slight increase in the estimates of the Department of Justice this year, it is true there is an increase of between $4,000 and $5,000, but this increase has arisen because the provinces, by legislation, have requested us to appoint four additional county court judges. Otherwise there would have been from $16,000 to $17,000 of a reduction. But in compliance with the request of the provinces four additional county judges were appointed at $5,000 apiece. That is the reason for the apparent increase. Otherwise there would have been a reasonable decrease in the estimates of the Department of Justice.

I know that in Great Britain the salaries of judges were decreased last autumn, and that was done I understand with the consent of the judges themselves, or of a number of them. Judges' salaries in Great Britain and in Australia and South Africa are much higher than in the Dominion of Canada. Whether they are able in this way to secure better or abler judges in Australia and South Africa than we do in Canada I cannot say, but this I can say, that the salaries we now pay as authorized by this parliament do not attract many of the men whom we would like to elevate to the bench of this country. Man after man has replied to our invitation to consider a seat upon the bench that he cannot afford to do so having regard to the salary he would receive as a judge and the amount of the emolument which he annually receives from his practice. With only $15,000 as the salary of the chief justice of the Dominion of Canada, which is the highest judicial post in this country, we cannot hope to attract the greatest and most distinguished lawyers in this dominion. We have to do the best we can under the circumstances. If you have only nine or ten thousand dollars to offer for a position on the bench, all you can expect to secure is a nine or ten thousand dollar man. You cannot get an oustanding man in the profession for that salary. I am one of those who believe that the time has already passed when this house should consider the revision upwards of judicial salaries in Canada. I do not say that in respect of all our courts, but I do say it in respect of our higher courts. This I realize would not be an opportune time to suggest such an increase, but in years past I have had a very strong opinion that the salaries of judges in our higher courts should be materially increased. We recall that a committee of this house was appointed to consider this matter two or three years ago. That committee did not report favourably in regard to increases in judicial salaries. Some other consideration, sessional indemnities or something of the kind, became involved in the deliberations of that committee, and no favourable recommendation was made at that time. But I believe the day is not far distant when we shall have to revise upwards the salaries paid to some of the judges of our higher courts if we are going to continue to insist upon securing the ablest and best qualified men to administer the laws of this country. I believe that the administration of the law is a more important branch of the government of a country than the executive authority which is vested in the government. If our laws are properly administered, fairly and honestly administered, we have gone a long way in the government of our country. But if our law is not fairly and fully administered, then our decline is not very far distant. For myself may I say that I do not think it would be proper to reduce the salary of a judge without his consent under the circumstances under which he has been appointed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is not a reduction in salary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well then this deduction, or whatever my right hon. friend chooses to call it—this ten per cent cut which is proposed in the present resolution. Have I made myself clear now? I do not think that judicial salaries should be subjected to the proposed ten per cent reduction. It has been suggested to me that it might not be constitutional to attempt it. That is a debatable point. The judges of some of our courts are appointed directly under the authority of the British North America Act. The judges in other courts are appointed under authority of the statutes of this parliament. It may be that something may be urged against the constitutionality of such a proposal in respect to those judges who are appointed under the British North America Act, while other considerations might be involved in the case of judges who are appointed under the authority of acts of this parliament. Our county court judges, our supreme court judges, our exchequer court judges have all been appointed under the authority of our own acts. Not so however in the case of the superior courts of the provinces of Canada which existed at the time of confederation and have since been continued. The judges of those courts were appointed pursuant to a section of the British North America Act, and a serious question might arise as to the constitutionality of any act we might pass with regard to them.

Mr. GARDINER: Under the section of the British North America Act by which these judges were appointed, is the salary set?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The salary is not set by the British North America Act, but was set by this parliament. The British North America Act provides that we shall appoint the judges, pay their salaries and allowances. In that connection a point occurs to me which may be discussed when we proceed, a few days hence, with a bill to amend the Judges' Act. I question whether the Dominion of Canada should be called upon to pay the ordinary travelling expenses of the judges in Canada, although we have done so since confederation. The provinces administer the law in the provinces, and the judges are responsible for that administration, but we have been in the habit of paying the expenses of judges travelling throughout their own counties in the administration of provincial laws. That is a question however for future discussion. We have always paid these travelling expenses because the word "allowance" occurs in the British North America Act. There is a strong opinion however that the word "allowance" refers to a retiring allowance or a leave allowance. If it were intended that we should pay travelling expenses undoubtedly the words "travelling expenses" would have been inserted in the act. However, that is not the question now before us.

For the reasons I have already stated, personally I am opposed to the ten per cent cut in judges salaries, but I agree we have a right to tax those salaries should we see fit to do so. We did so when we imposed the income tax.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Without amending the constitution?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A question as to the constitutionality of our action was raised, and a decision was given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in favour of the right of this parliament to tax judges' salaries. While I do not think we could properly subject judges' salaries to this ten per cent reduction, I will say that it is entirely within our power to subject them to a ten per cent tax. That is the distinction I draw between the two. I do not want to interfere with the solemn contracts we made with those men when they were appointed to the bench. I desire to keep judicial appointments entirely free from influence or threats. I want judges to feel absolutely secure in the positions they hold; I want them to administer the laws of this country without fear or favour from any quarter or section, and I desire that they receive sufficient salaries and emoluments to make them absolutely independent of any influence whatsoever. If we continue to maintain proper conditions we will secure proper and just administration of our laws. Such is the way in which a high standard of administration of the law has been secured in Great Britain. In that country exceedingly high salaries are paid to judges, and I believe judges there have themselves agreed to a very substantial reduction in their salaries. That of course is a matter of agreement. Salaries of judges in Great Britain are sufficiently high to attract many of the ablest men at the bar in England. We must also consider the security of the position, as well as the substantial salaries and the care taken upon retirement. I consider judicial positions in Canada as something distinct entirely from ordinary positions under the government. We have always endeavored to treat them as distinct; the country in general respects its judiciary very highly and I would not be one to interfere lightly with salaries which we are pledged to pay.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I believe the minister was regretting the inadequacy of the remuneration which rendered it almost impossible to bring to the bench the services of the most outstanding lawyers at the bar. The suggestion, which seems to have some merit, has been made to me—and I am speaking only as a layman—that the qualities in a lawyer which tend to make him most successful in private practice, from a financial point of view, are not necessarily the qualities which would make him the best judge. That is, the impartial, judicial qualities which are so essential in a judge, and without which a judge cannot be most effective, are not always found in the most successful lawyers. Naturally however some qualities of the successful judge are found in the most successful lawyers pleading at the bar. Would the minister tell me if there is anything in that point, and if we are still able to secure men who, though admirably adapted to judicial duties, have not been the most successful in private practice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There may be something in the suggestion my hon. friend has made. I have known lawyers who were not very highly regarded at the bar, but who were enormously successful in certain lines of legal practice which, one might say, was not of the highest type. Such however are not the men we seek to put upon the bench. We have to look for men of undoubted integrity, men who hold the respect of the communities in which they live, men whose knowledge of the law is undoubted, and men who bear unblemished character. While my hon. friend has suggested that there have been long lists of applicants, for judicial positions, may I say to him that during the year and a half that I have been in the Department of Justice that has not been the case. I have found it very, very difficult to secure the most suitable men for the higher courts in Canada at the salaries which we now pay. I have received many refusals from men I have asked to consider judicial appointments. I think perhaps that does not apply in as great a degree to the county courts as it does to the higher courts. There is not the same difficulty in securing excellent men to accept county court judgeships. But to secure the services of outstanding men in the legal profession to fill the higher court vacancies has, in my experience of the last eighteen months, not been the easiest matter.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I think the minister did not grasp fully the import of my question. When I referred to lawyers who were eminently successful in higher practice but did not possess the judicial qualities necessary in judges I was not reflecting upon the character or integrity of those men, but was rather referring to the fact that their abilities may have been confined to those which enabled them to succeed in certain branches of law. Yet that fine judicial or impartial quality which sometimes is detrimental to lawyers is an essential in judicial practice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We try of course to secure broadminded men not only with a knowledge of the customs of the country, and a wide knowledge of law, but who have engaged in general legal practice. I agree that men who have specialized in one line of legal work may not prove to be the best judges. We seek to secure our judges however from men who are accustomed to appear before the courts, who have enjoyed varied practice in our provinces, and men whose character and integrity is undoubted. Forty years ago in Canada, at the salaries then offered, which were much lower than they are now, it was not so difficult to attract leading lawyers to the bench. I can assure the committee however that it is much more difficult to-day owing to the very modest salaries which we pay to judges in this country.

Mr. SANDERSON: Replying to the Minister of Justice, I should like to say that he has not been fair to me so far as the vote this afternoon was concerned. I was not in the chamber when the vote was taken; had I been here I would have voted for the resolution, and I so placed myself on record a week ago to-night. I said I was not opposed to the ten per cent cut, and the minister was not fair to-day when he insinuated that I ducked the vote. I want to tell him that while I have not been in this parliament as long as he has, and with all due respect for his experience and years in the house, he cannot charge me with ducking a vote since I have been here.

The minister said he thought there was no use replying to me as he could not convert me. I admit at once, Mr. Chairman, that he can never convert me. Let me refer him to his own chief. Speaking in his own city of Guelph some time ago, and on the same platform with his chief lieutenant, the right hon. Prime Minister stated that he "never had any use for converts, because you could never trust them." I do not presume to say the right hon. gentleman was referring to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) when he made that statement.

In dealing with the exemption of judges' salaries from the ten per cent cut, although the Minister of Justice did refer to the matter of contract before he sat down, he based his whole argument on the presumption that the judges do not have enough to live on, that they made great sacrifices when they were elevated to the bench. In fact he went so far as to say that the integrity of these men depend on the salaries they get. I have always understood that when a lawyer accepts a judgeship he does so because his professional standing enables him to serve his country. A few nights ago I referred to the exemption of the army officers from the operation of this ten per cent reduction in salary, and my good friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) referred to them this afternoon. I think he put the case very clearly before the committee. If we have any class of civil servants that are overpaid and underworked—my friend says "useless," but I will not go so far as that—they are the army officers attached to the permanent force, not only at headquarters in the city of Ottawa but in every military district in the dominion. It is true they are not very large in numbers, perhaps between 150 and 200, but the average pay drawn by each of those men ranges between $6,000 and $7,000 a year, with free house and found, as we used to say in the old days. My hon. friend says "beer."

Mr. DUFF: In the officers' mess.

Mr. SANDERSON: I prefer to leave that out of the discussion. But they are well paid. As a matter of fact in comparison with ninety-five per cent of the civil servants living in the city of Ottawa or those outside Ottawa they are much better paid. But there is another feature to be taken into account: these men draw large pensions when they retire, pensions running anywhere from $5,000 up to $7,000 a year, but they do not contribute a single solitary cent to the retirement fund. I am told my information is not correct; if so, I will withdraw that statement. May I ask the Minister of Finance if the army officers of the permanent force pay anything into the superannuation fund?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, they do.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have stated to the contrary. My information is wrong. But that does not hurt my case a particle. I say they are overpaid for the work they do. Perhaps those men do more loafing and more swanking and more parading and less work than any other body of men in the service of the crown. But, oh no! you must not cut their salaries. Why should they be exempt? No reason has ever been given why they should not participate in this salary reduction. I do not think any reason can be given for their exemption. I would urge on the Minister of Finance that he go into the pay and allowances of these army officers, that he check up on the amount of work they do—or rather on the amount of work they do not do—and include their salaries in the ten per cent cut.

Then the Royal Canadian Mounted Police apparently are not to be subject to this ten per cent cut. I see no reason why they should be exempt. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police have done credit to Canada all down through the years, the reputation of the force extends all over the world, their record of personal sacrifice and fidelity to duty is perhaps unequalled by any similar force in the world. But I am inclined to think that the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are ready to bear their share of the ten per cent cut. Why should they be exempt? Then there are the lieutenant-governors. I did a little figuring to-night, and I can tell the Minister of Finance that he can save $8,000 or $9,000 a year by making a ten per cent cut in the salaries of these gentlemen. Nobody would object to such a reduction; I doubt even if the lieutenant-governors themselves would demur. Men of the type who become lieutenant-governors accept the position because they have the financial resources to enable them to maintain the social traditions of their office.

About an hour ago the Minister of Finance went so far as to say that perhaps the question of exemptions would be further considered. I would ask him to reconsider them carefully. One of my hon. friends says "prayerfully," and as I look on the minister I think he is a man of prayer. So I hope he will reconsider these exemptions carefully and prayerfully. I plead with him to make no exemptions, to treat all civil servants alike in regard to this ten per cent cut. I need not refer to the condition of the farming industry and to the plight of the unemployed, but I tell the government that this is a time to proceed very carefully and not divide the masses against the classes. Therefore, once more I urge them to reconsider these exemptions very carefully.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend a few moments ago stated that the reduction of judges' salaries in England was made with the consent of the judiciary. May I refer him to the Spectator of January 23, 1932, where he will find this paragraph:

> There is a great deal to be said for the protest of the high court judges against the compulsory reduction by an order in council under the Economy Act, of their by no means excessive salaries from £5,000 to £4,000 a year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am very glad my hon. friend has brought that to my attention, because while in London last autumn I heard that many of the judges did not object to the reduction. But what he has stated is no doubt correct.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, there is one matter which my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) referred to that I think may have left a wrong impression on the house, although of course, this was unintentional on his part. A reference to section 12 of the Civil Service Act will show how the matter of compensation is dealt with. Section 12 says:

> The commission shall, from time to time, as may be necessary, recommend rates of compensation for any new classes that may be established hereunder, and may propose changes in the rates of compensation for existing classes.
> 2. In each class there shall be a minimum and a maximum salary rate and such intermediate rates as may be considered necessary and proper to provide increases between the minimum and maximum.
> 3. Such proposed rates of compensation shall become operative only upon their approval by the governor in council, and, where any increased expenditure will result therefrom, when parliament has provided the money required for such increased expenditure.

Mr. VENIOT: But recommendations have not been submitted by the Civil Service Commission in connection with this cut.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not dealing with that. I am saying that any rate fixed or any increase proposed or recommended by the commission is operative only when approved by the governor in council.

Mr. VENIOT: They have to propose it.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with conditions year by year, and over periods of years. According to the express terms of the contract those payments are dependent upon the annual vote of parliament for that purpose.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

Mr. DUFF: That refers to an increase, not a reduction.

Mr. CAHAN: That refers to the entire payment on account of the civil service of this country. I have before me a copy of the estimates for the year ending March 31, 1932, which shows the amount to be voted, and entirely conditional upon the vote of parliament, to be $12,673,104 while the amount in the estimates authorized by statute was only $358,666. Under the statute there can be no contract outstanding with a civil servant where the salary is not fixed by statute, which in law—I am not discussing morals—is binding until the actual vote is made for that purpose year by year. The salaries are fixed by the Civil Service Commission, but such compensation has no legal effect whatever unless year by year there is placed in the estimates a sum to cover the total amount to be voted for the civil service, and until that amount has been voted.

Mr. DUFF: Then could the salaries of civil servants be changed year by year, up or down?

Mr. CAHAN: If parliament in any year does not choose to vote salaries for any class of civil servants, they receive nothing and in law they can claim nothing, because their salaries depend entirely upon the discretion of parliament as exercised year by year.

Mr. VENIOT: They can leave the service, and in that way you would cut down the staff.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; they may go out of the service, but I am dealing with this other question. My hon. friend from Ottawa suggested that there was a fixed contract. He did not use that term, but that was the impression I thought might be left upon the minds of hon. members, whereas in fact there is no fixed contract, as there is in the case of judges. There is no such fixed contract with the civil servant.

Mr. DUFF: What would happen if the salaries of judges were not voted?

Mr. CAHAN: The salaries of judges are not voted annually by this house.

Mr. DUFF: Yes they are.

Mr. CAHAN: No, they are not; they are statutory and not voted year by year. In the estimates for last year, under administration of justice, there appeared the sum of $2,124,300 representing the salaries of the judges of this country, which are not voted year by year by this house but which are fixed by statute. The payment of those sums out of the consolidated revenue fund does not depend year by year upon the vote of this house. Judges are in an entirely different position from members of the civil service whose salaries are always dependent and contingent upon the vote of this house from year to year.

Mr. VENIOT: Are not the civil service salaries contingent upon the vote of this house year by year because of the fact that there is a minimum and a maximum?

Mr. CAHAN: No, that is not it; the entire amount, minimum or maximum, is so dependent. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and I make that reference in order to distinguish between the conditions under which the salaries of civil servants are paid, and the conditions under which the salaries of judges are paid. I am dealing with the whole body of civil servants. There may be some of them who have salaries fixed by statute, but they must be very few indeed because in the whole civil government estimates there is only $358,660 appropriated by statute for such salaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I point out that it made no difference in England, under the economy act?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not an expert on the economy act; I have not read it and I do not know what are the powers of His Majesty in council under it. Therefore I do not propose to discuss it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. gentleman knows that the salaries of judges were fixed under the Act of Settlement, and that this was abrogated by order in council.

Mr. CAHAN: It could be abrogated by order in council only if the parliament of Great Britain, which is supreme in the exercise of its discretion, definitely and specifically authorized His Majesty in council to do so by order in council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question of statute or contract did not stop them.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, but if you wish to deal with the matter under our constitution you cannot do it as we have dealt with the civil service salaries, which depend from year to year upon an annual vote. In order to make this deduction from the salaries of judges it would require a specific amendment to the Judges Act, specifically deducting from their salaries a certain amount, or reducing their salaries by a certain sum. In the estimates for this year we cannot deal with judges' salaries in that way. We can reduce the amount voted for the civil service of this country, but in doing so we are not violating any contract with any civil servant. I am quite clear as to that.

Mr. POWER: May I just take up that point with my hon. friend? As I understand his argument, it is based on page 10 of the estimates on which the salaries authorized by statute are set forth, and my hon. friend states that these salaries cannot be reduced except by a special act of parliament. Have I understood his argument correctly so far, that salaries authorized by statute, namely those of the Governor General, the High Commissioner for Canada in London, the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, and so on, can be dealt with only in that way? That is to say, to back up his argument that this obligation to the judges is a statutory, contractual obligation my hon. friend points to the estimates? Allow me to point out to him that one of the bodies not exempt under the terms of this resolution, so far as I know—I am sure it is not exempt—is the Civil Service Commission. Anyone who knows what I have had to say in this house with respect to the Civil Service Commission knows that I am the last one to defend it. But I will say that if an injustice would be committed to the judges in asking them for this forced voluntary contribution, just as great an injustice would be committed to the Civil Service Commishsion, because they are listed as amongst those whose salaries are statutory. They are so listed in the estimates. Moreover, reading the Civil Service Act I find that:

> There shall be a commission called the Civil Service Commission, consisting of not more than three members appointed by the governor in council.

And what is their tenure of office?

> The commissioners in office on the 24th day of May, 1918, shall hold office during good behaviour. Each subsequently appointed commissioner shall hold office during good behaviour for a period of ten years from the date of his appointment, save that his tenure of office shall cease upon his attaining the age of sixty-five years. . . . There shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, to the chairman, a salary of seven thousand dollars, and to each of the other commissioners a salary of six thousand dollars per annum.

There, if anywhere, is a straight contract between the members of the Civil Service Commission and the government of Canada, ratified and confirmed by statute of this parliament, providing that the chairman shall receive the sum of seventy thousand dollars during the course of ten years.

Mr. CAHAN: Who denies it?

Mr. POWER: Then why do hon. gentlemen opposite, why does the Minister of Justice, why does the Secretary of State, why does the Minister of Finance come to us and say, "We cannot reduce the salaries of judges because forsooth their salaries are guaranteed by statute," when there is a far greater guarantee by statute to the members of the Civil Service Commission whose salaries we are reducing. We want hon. gentlemen opposite to be fair.

Mr. CAHAN: There is nothing in this resolution reducing them.

Mr. POWER: But there is in the estimate. The position is worse than ever. We were informed by the Minister of Finance this afternoon that certain persons were exempt, namely, judges, officers in the army and navy, representatives of the crown and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The estimates show the salaries of the civil service commissioners: one at $6,300 and two at $5,400, making a total of $17,100. By statute of the parliament of Canada, by the law of this dominion, there is a contract between those commissioners, for whom I have no love, and this country, a contract which provides that their salaries shall be, in one instance, $7,000 and not $6,300, and in the other instance $6,000 and not $5,400. I suggest to the Secretary of State that he had better follow the example of the Minister of Justice who, during the whole course of his remarks a few minutes ago, departed altogether from the contractual obligation theory and based his plea in favour of the judges upon the ground of propriety.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not making any argument with regard to the judges. I was simply pointing out to my learned friend the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) that there was a distinction as regards civil servants whose salaries are contingent upon a vote of this house. If my hon. friend wishes to take up the case of the members of the Civil Service Commission on the ground that their salaries are statutory, which they certainly are according to the section he has read, that is a matter which will fairly come up when the proposals contained in the bill are under discussion.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. POWER: The whole argument we have heard all day is now discarded, that the judges were in a different position from everyone else because there was a contractual obligation confirmed by statute. If my hon. friend will read the Judges Act he will see that our obligation towards the judges is not as great as our obligation to the Civil Service Commissioners. What do we provide in the Judges Act? There is the following provision:

The Supreme Court of Canada

The salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be as follows:

	Per annum
(a) The Chief Justice of Canada.	$15,000
(b) Six puisne judges, each	12,000

Their salaries are provided for only for one year, whereas the civil service commissioners are provided for for ten years, and we are obligated to pay those salaries. Each one of those commissioners, were it not for certain prerogatives of the crown, could go into any court in the land, he could go into any court if he had such a contract with a private concern and sue under it and collect. I may tell my hon. friend something while I am on this subject. In my own city of Quebec we have a body known as the Quebec Harbour Commission, and since the hon. gentleman's friends came into office they have taken it upon themselves to dismiss a certain number of people for what they called political reasons, but merely because we had hearkened to the cry of the hungry and helpless and appointed them under the harbour commission. The firm of which I am a member took forty cases of that kind before the courts of the province of Quebec for wrongful dismissal, dismissal without notice, and were enabled to collect on behalf of these poor people something like $15,000 which the treasury of this country paid. Now if this government were amenable to the ordinary laws of the land they also would be obliged to pay the salaries of the civil service commissioners.

I return now to the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice with regard to propriety. Every phrase he used in urging upon us not to reduce the salaries of the judges was in direct contradiction of the contractual theory of his honourable friend the Minister of Finance. He urged upon us not to reduce the salaries of the judges because it was very difficult to obtain good men to fill these positions. I agree with him. I am not one of those who think the judges' salaries should be reduced, particularly. But they of all people, if they are patriotic, if they have a love of country, if they are men of standing as the Minister of Justice says and as I believe, should be the first to make a temporary contribution. We are speaking now on the basis of a temporary contribution; we are not speaking on the basis of finding men to fill the position. We are asking these honourable and estimable men who hold these positions to join with their fellow citizens, those who receive lower salaries, in making a contribution to pay for the cost of government. And they should not be denied that privilege. Every argument which my hon. friend used in support of his case for the judges, the argument, for example, that they had to withdraw from other business, that they are set apart, so to speak, can with equal justice be urged on behalf of the railway commissioners of Canada who, even though their names are not amongst those entitled to exemption, are entitled to salary under an act of the parliament of this country. Every one of those arguments can be urged on behalf of the Board of Pension Commissioners, on behalf of the members appointed to the pension tribunal, and on behalf of the pension appeal board. Not a word is said by the Minister of Justice which does not apply equally to these, and perhaps a little more so in the case of those appointed to the pension appeal court and the other courts dealing with soldier problems; because during the time they occupy these positions they cannot possibly practise any other profession. In the course of time, at the end of ten years, if they are obliged to vacate these positions, they will find themselves without anything whatever with which to face the world. If there is one position more than another that should be exempt it is that of the pension tribunal and the pension appeal court. The members of these bodies are obliged to devote themselves to a very special category of cases dealing with a very special kind of legislation. They are unable to form any connection which will be of use to them when they retire, and they should be protected at least to the extent that their salaries be not reduced any more than those of the judges.

I again urge upon the ministers that their contention as to statutory obligation is not sound either as to theory or practice, and that the argument of propriety applies equally to other public officers and representatives of the crown as to judges. I urge upon the Minister of Finance, before he introduces his bill, to consider carefully whether, if there is to be a sacrifice, it should not be general and apply to all classes of the community.

Mr. DUFF: Just along the lines of the argument of the hon. member for Quebec South, I think the Minister of Justice and my good friend the Secretary of State told us that the judges were in a different position from members of the civil service because the former had contractual rights and their salaries were authorized by statute and did not have to be voted, whereas those of the civil service as a whole had to be voted by parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: I was dealing with civil service employees.

Mr. DUFF: Yes. I understood the Secretary of State to say that the salaries of civil service employees had to be voted by parliament, and if parliament so desired it did not need to vote them at all, but the judges' salaries were authorized by statute and consequently had to be paid whether we voted them or not. In this country there is another class whose salaries do not have to be voted by parliament. This is the class of which I spoke this afternoon. The salary of the Speaker of the house does not have to be voted by parliament; it is authorized by statute. Will the Secretary of State, who is a great constitutional lawyer, please look at page 15 of the estimates for 1933? On that page the amount to be voted is given as $897,934.40; there is authorized by statute $1,270,000, making a total of $2,167,934.40. The items which I intend to read are authorized by statute and do not have to be voted by the house; yet the government—and I presume the Secretary of State is just as guilty as any other members of the cabinet—in spite of the fact that these votes are authorized by statute, deliberately by order in council or by vote of the council or by some other means decided to cut the salary of the Speaker of the house from $6,000 to $5,400.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. member allow an interruption? May I call his attention to the fact that on page 15 certain salaries are marked with an asterisk and a note at the foot reads:

These reductions will be authorized by legislation.

Mr. DUFF: That does not make any difference. It is true there is a footnote saying that these reductions will be authorized by legislation. Why is there not a similar footnote in regard to the salaries of the judges?

Mr. CAHAN: Where there is a salary fixed definitely by statute, a reduction in that salary must be by legislation. In the case of civil service employees, where no statutory salary is fixed, a reduction may legally be made at any session by a reduction in the vote of this parliament. The Minister of Justice has given his reasons why a reduction has not been made in the salaries of judges.

Mr. DUFF: My hon. friend must think he is in the police court, not in parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: I will say to my hon. friend that if I were in the police court, I would have a more intelligent audience than now in addressing my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Does that apply all round?

Mr. DUFF: Does that apply to my hon. friends on his side of the house? My argument is this: if the government in their wisdom can make this footnote on page 15 and deduct $600 from the salary of the Speaker of the Senate; if they can deduct $38,400 from the indemnity to senators, which is statutory and is not voted by parliament; if they can deduct $600 from the salary of the Speaker of the house; if they can deduct $400 from the salary of the deputy speaker of the house; if they can deduct $99,000, Mr. Chairman, from the poor and small amount, that we get for our sessional indemnity, then with respect to the judges they should pass the same legislation, about which the Secretary of State speaks, as they do with regard to members of parliament. My hon. friend's argument falls to the ground, I say without fear of contradiction that everybody in the country shall be treated alike. I hate to see my hon. friend lose his $1,400; it is not fair that he should lose it any more than that I should lose my $400. I am opposed to this reduction. My hon. friend was elected in his constituency on the understanding that he was to receive a sessional indemnity of $4,000. He was taken into the cabinet with a contract, either verbal or otherwise, that for his services he was to receive $10,000 as a minister of the crown.

Mr. VENIOT: It is fixed by statute.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, and I say it is a shame that my hon. friend has to accept $1,400 less than he is entitled to from the people of this country.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The Secretary of State has not submitted anything new. He and I have solved many a riddle before and this is no worse than others. I never said that the salary of the civil servant was statutory; I said that it was a contract. When my hon. friend reads the act, he does not say anything new. The act says: "for existing classes", and the Secretary of State well knows that when those classes are changed, the civil servant does not suffer a reduction of his salary but continues in that class until the end of his term. Then the new incumbent takes the position subject to a reduction. There is a contract that the new incumbent shall accept the position at the reduced remuneration. There is no power either in the Civil Service Commission or in this parliament to decrease the remuneration while that incumbent is there, and the fact that these amounts are voted yearly does not detract at all from the contract. This parliament could not anticipate and say in one year we will vote hundreds of millions of dollars to pay what has been contracted for when these civil servants entered into the service of the state. The hon. Secretary of State has not in any way met the situation by citing the Civil Service Act. There is no change there at all.

Mr. CAHAN: Except that the contract is conditional upon parliament voting the money from year to year.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Parliament votes the money as a result of contractual obligation.

Mr. CAHAN: No. The obligation is conditional.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would like to say a few words in connection with this phase of the resolution. It is amazing to me that a government that makes any pretensions at all to follow democratic principles should take such a course as this government is following in regard to the proposed exemptions. I listened to the leader of the opposition today making a case for a graduated reduction in civil service salaries, and I listened to the reply of the Minister of Finance, who asked with a large gesture; Do you want to make the civil service a preferred class? Here in these exemptions we have a preferred class. The judges are the highest paid servants of the state, and they are not necessarily the most useful part of the service. We are being asked for equal sacrifices. Is it equal sacrifice to make a deduction of ten per cent from the salary of a man receiving only eight or twelve hundred dollars a year—and there are large numbers in the civil service in that class—while those who are getting salaries ranging up to $15,000 are exempt? Is that equality of sacrifice?

However, the point I wish to make is this: There is always a reason why people do things. The reason brought forward by the government for making the reductions is that the country is in difficulties and they desire each one to contribute his share in order to help balance the budget. But does it not seem strange that all these exemptions are of people who have to do with the enforcement of law? That is the point I would like cleared up. The Secretary of State says that the reason they have been exempted is that the judges' salaries could not be reduced without an amendment to the Judges Act. But why could not an amendment to the Judges Act be brought down simultaneously with this resolution? I do not see any difficulty in that regard. The sinister fact of the situation is that all those we are dealing with—judges, mounted police, military—have to do with the enforcement of law, and I can come to no other conclusion than that they were exempted from the reduction in order that there might not be any dissatisfaction among those who had the enforcement of law in their hands. I protest against that with all the strength at my command.

There is another point I wish to make. Before these judges come those who are charged with contravening the law. You reduce the salary of a civil servant who is receiving less than $1,000. He has to keep himself and his family on that salary, and then because of economic pressure he is perhaps driven to do something in contravention of the law, and is brought before the judge, a judge drawing a comfortable salary. I would like to know how a judge in that position could pass sentence upon a person who is living in such different circumstances. There is no possible reason that I can find for these exemptions except that the government are fearful of what may happen in this country because of the depressed condition of the people owing to the hardships which they have to put up with. The government do not want to be put in the position that Great Britain was in when she made a reduction in the pay of the navy. The government is afraid of what may happen. I think they should at least have the courage to treat the whole civil service alike. If any further legislation is necessary it should be brought down at once. The government should show that it intends to legislate for the whole country on the basis of the democratic principles to which we have been accustomed in the past.

Mr. HEENAN: Before the Minister of Finance rises—I know he has had a very hard afternoon—I would plead with him to reconsider the position in which the prevailing rates men will be put if a further reduction of ten per cent is made. It is quite evident from what was said in the house this afternoon by another minister of the crown that private employers having already reduced the wages of labourers, the government has reduced the wages of its employees to the same level. What I want to point out to the minister, and I know he will get the point, is that in the event of the government reducing the prevailing rate men another ten per cent, private employers will insist on their men coming down to the same level as the government men, because they will say that the government rate is the prevailing rate.

Mr. RHODES: If my hon. friend is referring to this salary reduction as a cut in wages, I do not follow him.

Mr. HEENAN: The Minister of Railways and Canals admitted to-day that he had already cut the wages of the men on a certain job because he found that the government had been paying more than the prevailing rate paid by the private employers in that district. I shall not argue that point. But as a consequence the rates for the government prevailing rate men in that district are now on a level with the rate paid to labourers of private employers, and my point is that if the minister gives these prevailing rate men another ten per cent cut, private employers will bring down their wages to the same level by reducing them ten per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I can only repeat to my hon. friend that I do not regard this resolution as effecting a salary reduction. Call it anything you like, but the salary remains the same. That is what I say.

Mr. VENIOT: They do not get the money, that is all.

Mr. HEENAN: I know that when I go home after this session I shall figure that my indemnity has been reduced by ten per cent. I want to be helpful to the minister. I want him to get this point and I know that he will be fair enough to see that in those cases where men have already been cut—

Mr. RHODES: If I understand my hon. friend aright, he is suggesting a sort of hide-and-go-seek game as between the government employees and private employees. I do not think he would seriously argue anything of the kind.

Mr. HEENAN: I hope Hansard gets me correctly. I am afraid I am something like the Minister of Railways and Canals; I am thinking one thing and saying another. I want to impress upon the minister, however, that where the prevailing rate of wages has already been reduced, no further cuts should be made. Such action on the part of the government would be an inducement to private employers to cut still further the wages of their men. If that were the case, the different governmental departments would have to make further wage cuts down to the prevailing rate among private employers, and there would be no end to it. I hope the minister will keep that in mind when he presents his bill.

Mr. RHODES: I think the fears of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River are quite unnecessary; he need have no misgiving whatsoever on that score.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It is quite clear that at least on one point we have come to agreement, namely, with regard to the statutory obligations we owe to judges. That argument would seem to have fallen on the ground and must be abandoned. Speaking of the exemptions on February 26, the Prime Minister said that owing to the peculiar statutory position of judges, an exemption would be made in their case, and that among others to receive similar consideration would be railway commissioners. Turning to page 28 of the estimates I find that among the payments authorized by statute are the salaries of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It would seem to me therefore that there can be no legal argument upon the question of statutory obligation so far as judges are concerned, so that the discussion resolves itself into a consideration of the propriety of the action.

Following the argument of the Minister of Finance, and accepting his statement that no reduction in the salaries of judges is contemplated, I suggest that we should permit the judges among others, to accept this temporary sacrifice and equalize the burden on all sides.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. I have great difficulty in understanding how he reconciles, in regard to both grading and exemptions, the position he takes as Minister of Finance dealing with income tax legislation, and the position he takes as Minister of Finance dealing with this reduction in salary. How does my hon. friend, on the one hand dealing with the income tax, defend a graduated tax which bears less heavily upon those receiving small incomes and more heavily upon those whose incomes are large, while, as Minister of Finance dealing with civil service salaries he urges there should be a horizontal cut which leaves out altogether any graded arrangement?

Further, how does he, in dealing with the income tax, justify an exemption of small salaries on the score that the people receiving such salaries are least able to pay, but when dealing with a reduction of salaries of public servants exempt the largest salaries to the exclusion of all others? I remember that when the budget was introduced last year such exemptions as there were to a further upward gradation under the income tax were upon the large salaries. The present Minister of Finance was not in that office at that time; it would almost seem that the hand which had to do with the budget of last year had something to do with the drafting of these salary exemptions. I should like to know how my friend the present Minister of Finance justifies the exemption of high salaries, so far as these reductions in salaries of the public service are concerned, and goes to the opposite extreme when it comes to exemptions under income tax legislation, namely, exempting not the highest but the lowest salaries.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I assure my right hon. friend there is no deduction to be made to the effect that the person who drafted the income tax of last year is the one who drafted this resolution. I can assure my right hon. friend upon that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Or inspired it?

Mr. RHODES: As a matter of fact he had no knowledge of it. If there were no income tax I could see the force of my right hon. friend's argument when he says there should be a graduation with respect to the contribution being asked from civil servants this year. Inasmuch however as there are income taxes, if my right hon. friend would carry his argument reductio ad absurdum, he would finally leave the high salaried men with no salary whatever. In the circumstances I regard the cut of ten per cent as the one more equitable in the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about exemptions? My hon. friend has not told us how he justifies in the case of income tax exemptions of those who have small salaries and no exemptions of those who have high salaries, whereas, in the present instance he justifies the exemption of high salaries and does not permit an exemption in low salaries.

Mr. RHODES: I was not referring to exemptions; probably there has been too much discussion on that score.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will let us have an answer to my question, we may be able to get to the next stage on the resolution.

Mr. RHODES: I may have misapprehended my right hon. friend's meaning; I hope he is not objecting to the fact that we have made exemptions in the lower salaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am trying to get at the principle which governs. My hon. friend will agree that in regard to income tax, exemptions are made on the salaries of those who have small incomes, but not on large incomes.

Mr. RHODES: Or dependents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: On the principle of the tax bearing on those best able to carry it.

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the principle there laid down and acted upon. If that principle is carried through in matters of taxation generally, how does he justify the exemption of the largest incomes, so far as these deductions in salaries are concerned?

Mr. RHODES: May I answer my right hon. friend in this way: In the first place he must remember that the higher salaries are subject to the dominion income tax, a graded tax bearing more heavily upon the higher salaries. The same principle applies to those who pay municipal income taxes. In some cases civil servants have to pay three income taxes—dominion, provincial and municipal. As I had pointed out to me, in one province the income tax has been doubled. That means that there is a very substantial portion of the salary of the highly paid officials taken away. If the reductions now before us were to be continued and were based upon an expectation of permanency, my right hon. friend's question might be an appropriate one for discussion at this point, and we might consider whether the system of grading should apply. In this instance however there is only one contribution for one year, and I submit that the method suggested by the government is the fair one.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I wish to make it clear that I am not objecting to the cut in indemnities, but I am objecting to the cut as it applies to civil servants.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to provide for the deduction of compensation in the public service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the minister feel that in view of the discussion to-day he may wish to modify this particular measure before he presents it to the house?

Mr. RHODES: If it is decided, Mr. Speaker, that any amendments are desired they can be made in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, March 7, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Second report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Senn.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as we do not reach the orders of the day until late in the day, if at all to-day, there is a matter which I would like to mention to the Prime Minister on the order for motions which is of importance at the moment, and which may not have occurred to him.

There appears to be an obvious necessity for the voting of money for unemployment relief, and particularly for supplying seed grain and other forms of farm relief to those who are in need in the west. What I wish to say to my right hon. friend is that if he will bring into the house a supply bill asking for the amount that he may regard as necessary and wish to have for this month, so far as the opposition is concerned we will be prepared to do what we can to facilitate its passage rapidly through the house. We recognize that it is a week since the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act lapsed and that my right hon. friend will certainly be coming to parliament for some moneys, for this purpose. If a supply bill is brought in at any time to provide what may be necessary for the balance of this present fiscal year, so far as the opposition is concerned we shall be prepared to agree to any suspension of the rules which will allow the bill to go through this house with as little in the way of criticism or delay as possible.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I assure the right hon. gentleman that I appreciate his observations, but the government has not overlooked the fact that it is necessary to provide money for seed and feed.

But it is not its direct responsibility; that rests with the provinces. Our duty is to confer with them as to their financial position and give them such assistance as we may. That will be found stated in the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of last session. Believing as we do that a national emergency exists that demands our giving that assistance it is proposed to proceed with order No. 13 to-morrow, notice having been placed on the order paper some time before the 26th of February, but obviously the title as it now appears would be improper because the first of March has passed; but the sense of the measure proposed is to extend the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act to the first of May, 1932, and not to proceed by way of a supply bill for reasons that I shall endeavour to explain to the house when we reach order No. 13 which I propose to take up as the first order of business to-morrow when government orders are called. I thank the right hon. gentleman for his offer of assistance so far as the dealing with this emergent situation is concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would like to make clear to my right hon. friend that one reason I mention the matter immediately is that if it is proceeded with by means of a supply bill I believe there will be no question as to the rapidity with which the bill would pass, but if my right hon. friend has in mind proceeding with a bill such as the one passed at last session, which was intended to meet a situation while parliament was not in session, I may say that we on this side would have to take very strong exception to proceeding in that way.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BRADETTE

On the order for motions:

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): On a matter of personal privilege, Mr. Speaker, in a letter which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last Saturday from James Hoey, Sr., Ottawa, it is stated in the first sentence of the last paragraph that the members of parliament received the sum of $4,000 for attending during the emergency session of the fall of 1930. After making inquiry I wish to state to the house that the members of parliament attending that session received only the sum of $375. I think that misstatement should be corrected.

OPIUM AND NARCOTIC DRUG ACT

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 26, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MacLAREN: The purpose of this bill is to make certain amendments to the act to bring it into conformity with the Geneva convention which was held last year. As hon. gentlemen will remember, the convention was laid before the house last week by the Prime Minister, and in order to conform with the conditions laid down in the convention these amendments to the act are necessary. They are few in number. One is in reference to the definition of drugs, to provide that it shall include "by synthetic process" as well as by natural process. Another amendment rather broadens the definition of opium. There are also two minor changes in addition to the amendments which are necessary to bring the act into conformity with the Geneva convention. One is to remove a misunderstanding with regard to the act which exists at the present time, and the other is to permit the use in small quantities of the drug cannabis sativa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27, to amend the Excise Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The proposed bill is one to amend the Excise Act in relation to its administration. I do not think there is any matter of principle proposed in the bill upon which there could be a divided opinion. I do not like to take up the time of the house in explaining these matters, all being unrelated to each other, but the bill will provide for the definition of a provincial analyst; that the commissioner of excise may exercise administrative powers when these are delegated to him by the minister. At the present time it is doubtful whether the commissioner of excise has the right to revoke a licence for brewing beer. An amendment will provide that the minister shall not be required to sign all these revocations of licences for the privilege of brewing beer. The bill also provides that the penalties and forfeitures recovered under this act shall be the property of the crown. There is at present some doubt as to that, and the doubt will be removed. Then there is the right given to druggists as defined in the act to obtain alcohol for use in the manufacture, compounding or dispensing of medicine for pharmaceutical preparations. Provision is made for the trying of cases, and the necessity for this arises from the fact that one province in particular, Prince Edward Island, has given to a tribunal certain legislative powers, which we wish to use. The proposed amendment the purpose of which I have outlined will make easy the trial of such cases.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code (promoting changes).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The purpose of this bill is to attempt to clarify or remove some of the more objectionable subsections of section 98 of the criminal code. The first change is the insertion of the word "physical" before the word "force". According to the proposed amendment seizure of property can be made only after a search warrant has been issued, and such property may be confiscated only when the charges are proved. The burden of proof of innocence is removed from the accused. On a number of occasions the looseness of this wording has proven a difficulty, and for many years the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada has been protesting that this section should be altered. In 1920 a report was given to the congress concerning the present section. It was pointed out that upon one occasion a judge charging a jury had said:

> Mr. Russell gave us his idea of a sympathetic strike. He said, "When a dispute originates between an employer and his employees, and when the labour organizations see that organization being beat, they come to their assistance by calling a strike to force their employers to bring force to bear upon the original disputants to make settlement." Force, force, force.

The report continues:

> Any dictionary will show that "force" has a very wide meaning, covering influence, pressure and the like. If the statute meant physical force it would not go on to enumerate "violence" and "physical injury." It must therefore, have a different meaning from "violence" and "physical injury."

The proposed amendment would seek to clarify the subsection.

Then, subsection 2, to be repealed, reads as follows:

> (2) Any property, real or personal, belonging or suspected to belong to an unlawful association, or held or suspected to be held by any person for or on behalf thereof may, without warrant, be seized or taken possession of by any person thereunto authorized by the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and may thereupon be forfeited to His Majesty.

The amendments I am introducing to-day do not touch the question of unlawful assembly. The one to which I am now referring merely seeks to safeguard those who are not members of an unlawful assembly but may easily enough, be inconvenienced or suffer hardship through the sections as they now stand. Provision is made that a search may be carried out after a warrant has been issued, but that there should be a search without any warrant, and a seizure without any conviction does not seem to be in keeping with the best British traditions.

Then, there are one or two sections which have to be renumbered. Into a discussion of those sections I will not at this time enter.

Then, subsection 4 to be repealed is as follows:

> (4) In any prosecution under this section, if it be proved that the person charged has > (a) attended meetings of an unlawful association; or > (b) spoken publicly in advocacy of an unlawful association; or > (c) distributed literature of an unlawful association by circulation through the post office mails of Canada, or otherwise, > it shall be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary that he is a member of such unlawful association.

It seems quite unfair that in this way the burden of proof should be placed upon the accused. Any chance passer-by might stop to listen to a speaker on a street corner and might find that the speaker to whom he had been listening belonged to some unlawful association. At the present time there is no safeguard. Then, a person may pass on a piece of literature he has obtained, which action, in itself, would be considered proof that such person belonged to an unlawful association. To an innocent man such legislation is most unfair. To prove innocence would be next to impossible because such an accused person would not be in a position to bring proof from any member of an existing unlawful association.

Subsection 6 is amended by striking out the words "or is about to be" and also by inserting the words "if the charges are proven" before the words "may be forfeited to His Majesty" at the end of the subsection. At the present time the subsection reads as follows:

> (6) If any judge of any superior or county court, police and stipendiary magistrate, or any justice of the peace, is satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any contravention of this section has been or is about to be committed, he may issue a search warrant under his hand, authorizing any peace officer, police officer or constable with such assistance as he may require, to enter at any time any premises or place mentioned in the warrant, and to search such premises or place, and every person found therein, and to seize and carry away any books, periodicals, pamphlets, pictures, papers, circulars, cards, letters, writings, prints, handbills, posters, publications or documents which are found on or in such premises or place, or in the possession of any person therein at the time of such search, and the same, when so seized, may be carried away and may be forfeited to His Majesty.

It would seem only fair that we should not charge a man or allow him to be charged with some crime which a magistrate may conceive is about to be committed. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that British tradition and practice relate only to crimes already committed. I do not think any magistrate, however clear-headed he may be, is in a position to say whether or not a crime is about to be committed. I would strike out that section. Further, I do not think a man should have his property confiscated until charges are proven. The insertion of the words "if the charges are proven" would take care of the difficulty I have mentioned.

Then subsection 9 provides merely for renumbering. I should like to read that subsection, because the next one to which I shall refer would not be understandable without first hearing subsection 9. It is as follows:

Any person who circulates or attempts to circulate or distribute any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind, as described in this section, by mailing the same or causing the same to be mailed or posted in any post office, letter box, or other mail receptacle in Canada, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

I am not now proposing that the clause I have just read should be changed—although I do think it should be changed. It is an integral part of the legislation concerning unlawful assemblies. A few days ago when I attempted to introduce an amendment regarding unlawful assemblies it was voted down, and I feel I would not be in harmony with the practices of this house if I were to introduce any matter the principle of which has already been decided upon. I do however urge the repeal of subsection 10, so that we may safeguard those who are not members of an unlawful assembly. It reads as follows:

Any person who imports into Canada from any other country, or attempts to import by or through any means whatsoever, any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document of any kind as described in this section, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than twenty years.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that a man might very readily import a pamphlet from Great Britain and find that it came within the prohibited list described in the preceding subsection, in that it advocated force or was issued by an organization that under the previous sections was deemed an illegal organization. In that case the importer would be liable to a twenty-year penitentiary sentence. It is obviously absurd that such should be the case. In Great Britain there are no unlawful associations such as come within the scope of our Criminal Code. I might write a British publishing house, and they quite innocently might send me their literature, and on receiving that literature this subsection would render me liable to a twenty-year penitentiary term. The fact is that the word "force" is so loosely used in this act, and force has been so generally recognized as being justifiable on certain occasions, that there is a whole literature dealing with the use of force that might come under the ban. A recent writer in the Canadian Forum of Toronto has listed some of the books which would come within this section. He states:

To begin with there is a large and diverse group of works whose main object is to prove that in certain circumstances it is not only justifiable but a positive duty to use force to bring about a governmental change. The Spanish Jesuit, Mariana, devotes an entire chapter of his De Rege et Regis Institutione to a defence of tyrannicide. A whole host of Huguenot writers preach rebellion as a religious duty in such works as Duplessis-Mornay's Defence of Liberty Against Tyrants, Béza's Rights of Magistrates over their Subjects, and the anonymous, Whether it is Lawful for the People and the Nobility to take up Arms. So does the Roman Catholic Rossaeus (probably the Bishop of Senlis) in The True Power of a Christian State. Buchanan, a Scots Presbyterian, follows suit in his De Jure Regni Apud Scotos; Milton contributes to the list no less than four works justifying the rebellion against Charles I (the two Defences of the People of England, Eikonoklastes, and the Tenure of Kings and Magistrates), and Locke's Treatise of Civil Government is a defence of the "glorious revolution" of 1688. Any competent political scientist could no doubt produce at a moment's notice a similar "Index" twice as long; but this random selection is sufficiently formidable.

Then there are other writings, which, while not exclusively or mainly concerned with the advocacy or defence of force, do nevertheless incidentally counsel it or praise historical instances of it. The writer continues:

Chief among these, of course, is the Bible, notably in the account of the revolt against Jeroboam in I Kings. The British and Foreign Bible Society had better take steps at once to issue special expurgated editions for Canadians only. Otherwise it may wake up to find itself an unlawful association. The early Greek writer Theognis (accessible to the unlearned in an English translation by the Rev. J. Banks), according to the New English Dictionary, is guilty, like Mariana, of advocating tyrannicide. Macaulay's History of England is another attempt to justify the revolution of 1688. Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic and the Rev. J. N. Figgis' from Gerson to Grotius, contain glowing panegyrics on the revolt of the Netherlands against Spain. G. M. Trevelyan's England under the Stuarts traces all our liberties to the revolt against Charles I. A. W. Tilby's British North America, Sir George Trevelyan's American Revolutions, and George III and Charles Fox, Ramsay Muir's Short History of the British Commonwealth, Basil Williams' Life of Chatham, and the Cambridge History of the British Empire, are all so incautious as to praise the American revolution. Worst of all—'twas whispered in heaven, 'twas muttered in hell—the Ontario High School History of England (if my memory serves) quotes with gusto Chatham's "I rejoice that America has resisted." If these works fall victims to the new censorship, how many histories of the French revolution, the first Russian revolution of March, 1917, the Spanish revolution, and the Fascist march on Rome will escape?

When such a reputable journal calls attention to the serious dangers implicit in this section, it seems to me that it is not unreasonable that we should seek to safeguard the interests of the public at large. I ask also that subsection 11 be repealed. It reads as follows:

It shall be the duty of every person in the employment of His Majesty in respect of his government of Canada, either in the Post Office Department, or in any other department to seize and take possession of any book, newspaper, periodical, pamphlet, picture, paper, circular, card, letter, writing, print, publication or document, as mentioned in this section, upon discovery of the same in the post office mails of Canada or in or upon any station, wharf, yard, car, track, motor or other vehicle, steamboat or other vessel upon which the same may be found and when so seized and taken, without delay to transmit the same, together with the envelopes, coverings and wrappings attached thereto, to the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This if thoroughly carried out would in effect turn all our post office and customs officials into a set of spies who would be constantly on the look out for some chance piece of literature of this class for confiscation, and our mails would never be safe. I would suggest that this is quite out of keeping with the very basis of our boasted British freedom.

I would point out again that this proposed amendment to section 98 does not touch the main principles embodied in that section. I should like to have seen the whole section repealed, but I am not at liberty to attempt such a repeal on this occasion. Under the circumstances the best I can do is to try to introduce legislation which will at least safeguard the ordinary citizen who is not a member of any unlawful association against the dangers of this section, and ensure that to a certain extent our homes and liberties will be a little more secure.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH moved that said bill be read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DORCHESTER PENITENTIARY—WARDEN

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What was the cost of the residence built for the warden of Dorchester penitentiary?
2. What was the cost of the residence built for the deputy warden?
3. What salary does the warden receive?
4. What extra allowance does the warden receive?
5. With how many cars is the warden provided for his personal use?
6. What is the cost each of the houses now being built for the staff?
7. What was the original cost, and what is the operating cost per month of the heating plant?
8. What was the original cost, and what is the operating cost per month of the electric plant?
9. What sums have been paid to Mr. T. Edwin Oulton or his wife for sand and gravel?
10. Who owns the farm from which this sand and gravel is taken?

1. $22,241.93.
2. $22,241.93.

Note in re answers 1 and 2, as above:

The two houses were constructed at one and the same time, both being identical, and cost divided between the two on completion.

3. $3,540 cash per annum.
4. Perquisites valued at $840 per annum, which include house, light, heat, water and uniforms.

5. One only for official business.

6. 5 new single houses completed at cost of $10,126.15 each:

1 double tenement completed; 2 double tenements completed outside only, and foundation built for another at total cost of $28,-098.79, to date.

7. Original cost of heating plant was included with shop buildings thirty-seven years ago and probably cost less than $5,000.

The system of central heating is adopted and the average cost for the last three months of winter was $1,787.39, including the heating of the whole prison and buildings attached thereto. In summer steam heat is only required for cooking.

8. Cost of electric plant, $8,041.

Electric plant not operated since February, 1929. Current has since been purchased from New Brunswick Electric Power Commission under contract.

9. $19,107.13, has been paid to Mrs. Oulton during a period of seven years.

10. Manford Buck owns sand rights which are leased to Mrs. Oulton.

QUEBEC LEGISLATURE—RESOLUTIONS

Mr. DORION:

1. Did the Dominion government during the year 1930 receive any resolutions adopted by the legislature or legislative council of Quebec, if so, what are said resolutions?
2. Did the government receive any such resolutions during the year 1931, if so, what are said resolutions?
3. Has the government received any such resolutions since the beginning of the year 1932, if so, what are said resolutions?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. No.
2. No.
3. No.

UPPER WHITE HEAD, N.S., WHARF

Mr. DUFF:

1. Was a new wharf built at Upper White Head, county of Guysboro, Nova Scotia, last year?
2. If so, on whose recommendation was said wharf constructed?
3. How much did said wharf cost?
4. Were tenders called for said wharf?
5. If not, how much was paid by the government per lineal foot for logs and how much per foot for timber and plank?
6. What was the name of the foreman?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes, under U. F. R. Act, 1931.
2. Petitioned for by residents of large section of Guysborough county and recommended by district engineer.
3. $11,945.85 including cost of a wharf shed.
4. No.
5. 9″ logs and piling up to 22′—13 cts. per lin. ft.

9″ logs and piling up to 27′—15 cts. per lin. ft.

9″ logs and piling up to 32′—15 cts. per lin. ft.

Heavy sawn timber—$40 per M.

Plank—$25 per M.

Ballast floor logs up to 17 ft. long—6 cts. per lin. ft.

Ballast floor logs 17 to 24 ft. long—8 cts. per lin. ft.

6. David Duncan.

P. T. AHERN

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is Mr. P. T. Ahern mentioned as secretary clerk at page L-4 of the last report of the Auditor General?
2. Do the letters secretary mean that he has been acting as secretary to anyone?
3. If so: (a) to whom; (b) for how long?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. Yes.
2. No.
3. Answered by No. 2.

SOLICITOR GENERAL—SECRETARIES

Mr. POULIOT:

1. How many private secretaries, joint private secretaries, assistant private secretaries and secretary clerks have been working for the Solicitor General in Ottawa since August, 1930?
2. What is the name of each one and when has each one of them been appointed?
3. Did any one of said private secretaries, joint private secretaries, assistant private secretaries or secretary clerks accompany the Solicitor General to the disarmament conference this year?
4. If so, how many?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. One private secretary, one joint secretary, one secretary clerk.
2. Jules Landry, September 15, 1930; Miss M. M. Turcotte, August 19, 1930; P. T. Ahern, November 15, 1931.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.

MINISTERS' CLERK—QUEBEC

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Is there a clerk in the minister's office at Quebec?
2. If so, who is he?

4. He is at the disposal of all ministers.

BROCKVILLE—PUBLIC BUILDING

Mr. SANDERSON:

1. What work was done in and about the Dominion public building at Brockville, Ontario, within the last year?
2. What was the cost of the work?
3. Who was the contractor for such work?
4. Were tenders for the work advertised for, and, if so, when and where?
5. If not advertised for, how were tenders called for and how was the contract awarded?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. New post office fittings, lock boxes, etc. Alterations to brickwork, carpentry, plastering, electric wiring and fixtures, terrazzo floor, and painting and decorating.
2. Total cost including superintendence $8,110.85.
3. For interior fittings, Canadian Office & School Furniture Co.; for lock boxes and plates, Rubenstein Bros.; for structural alterations and additional work, F. W. Clow; for additional electric wiring and fixtures, A. Louch.
4. No.
5. Tenders for interior fittings were invited from: Canadian Office & School Furniture Co.; Office Specialty Mfg. Company; Renfrew Wood Products; Interior Hardwood Company. For lock boxes, etc., from: Rubenstein Bros.; Office Specialty Mfg. Company; Robt. Mitchell Company. For structural alterations, painting, etc.: Tenders were invited by a local architect at Brockville; from local contractors. Three tenders were received. The lowest tender in each case was accepted.

GUELPH, ONT.—POST OFFICE

Mr. HEPBURN:

1. Have tenders been called for the construction of a post office in Guelph?
2. Was anyone authorized to state on or about November 13, 1931, on behalf of the government that a new post office was to be built in Guelph to provide relief for unemployment, and that the closing date for the acceptance of tenders would be December 10, 1931?
3. Was anyone authorized to state on behalf of the government that the actual cost of the post office aside from the value of the land would be from one hundred thousand to one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Yes.

1. Did Samuel Sons and Company, Toronto, receive some $15,000 in gold, or any other amount, through the Receiver General's office in Toronto a few days after Great Britain went off the gold standard?
2. If so, for what service?
3. Did the Dominion Square Corporation of Montreal receive from the Department of Finance some $75,000 in gold, or any other amount, last September or October?
4. If so, for what service?
5. What other amounts, if any, were paid other Canadian firms in connection with the exchange situation?

Mr. RHODES:

1. A redemption of Dominion of Canada notes, as provided by law, was made at the office of an assistant receiver general on September 26, 1931, to one who gave his name as Norman Samuel, of Samuel Son & Company. The amount was $14,600. The department has no knowledge of the uses made of the gold by the recipient.
2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Gold issued in redemption of Dominion of Canada notes from September 21 to October 19, 1931, the date of passing of order in council No. P.C. 2617, to public bodies, banks, firms and individuals—$5,318,461.49.

2. What are the powers of said Gravel, as director of unemployment for the district of Montreal?

Mr. GORDON:

1. Attached is a memorandum containing the instruction given to Mr. L. G. Gravel on his appointment as assistant to the dominion director of unemployment relief for the district of Montreal.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Memorandum for Field Representatives of Dominion Unemployment Relief Branch

Cooperation with provincial authorities

1. Officials of the Dominion unemployment relief branch will cooperate with the provincial authorities to the end that the need of the unemployed is relieved.

Technical detail covering projects

2. Technical details of construction of projects are under the control of provincial and municipal authorities, or, in the case of federal projects, the appropriate department of the Dominion government.

Employment selection

3. Duties should include protecting federal interests along the lines of seeing that those in need are given employment regardless of race, religion or political affiliation.

Employment service of Canada

4. The employment service of Canada should be used wherever possible as medium for hiring labour.

Returned soldiers

5. At least ten per cent of men employed should be returned soldiers if available.

Married men

6. It is preferable that married men or single men with dependents be given preference on work where they reside.

Elimination of case not in need

7. On investigation if it is found that men not in need are employed, or men are not properly employed according to regulations, such cases should be followed up with proper authorities with a view to correcting condition.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Hours

8. The maximum day is eight hours, unless otherwise previously approved by the Minister of Labour.

Wages

9. See that the wages as set forth and authorized by the province or municipality are being paid and that clause 8 of general regulations, P.C. 2043, is respected.

Deductions for board

10. See that deductions for board (or medical treatment in relief camps) is according to provincial regulations.

Transportation

11. A memorandum is being sent you setting forth the arrangements for reduced transportation charges for workers going to relief work.

Percentage of labour to total cost of works

12. Note clause 14 of dominion-province agreement, "of the amounts expended pursuant to provisions of clauses 6, 8, 9 and 10 hereof not less than forty per centum thereof shall be expended for labour unless a modification of this requirement is previously agreed to by the Minister of Labour".

Press comments

13. Any articles appearing in the local press adversely criticizing the administration of the unemployment relief should be investigated when practical with a view to establishing the accuracy, or otherwise, of such statements, and steps should be taken to rectify any failure to comply with regulations.

Complaints

14. In taking action on complaints referred to you, effect an adjustment if possible.

Relief camp conditions

15. If relief camps are not properly organized as to housing, board, sanitary conditions, etc., direct the attention of the proper authorities to the matter.

Correspondence

16. Forward to this office copies of all communications addressed by you to provincial or municipal authorities. Address communications to "Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief, Department of Labour, Ottawa".

Direct relief

17. See that only such relief be given as is specified in general regulations P.C. 2043 when said relief is being contributed to from federal funds.

Lists of approved works

18. Lists of works approved under the agreement with province will be furnished to you. If you find any works being carried on to which it is proposed that the federal government should contribute, other than those appearing on the lists sent you, advise the Dominion unemployment relief branch, Department of Labour, Ottawa.

General Instructions

Staff

1. No appointments can be made except by order in council.

Supplies

2. Requisition for supplies needed should be forwarded to this office.

Rent of premises

3. No premises may be rented except on authorization from this office.

Provincial reports

4. Statistics and expenditures reports are received at Ottawa from province. Specimens of forms used will be furnished to you. Assistant to director will be called upon to secure any special reports from provincial authorities when necessary.

Cost of administration

5. No portion of provincial or municipal administration charges may be paid (see general regulations P.C. 2043, clause 13).

Expenses

6. All expenses for travelling must be approved by assistant to director for province and all expenditures over $2 covered by voucher. In the case of hotel expenses the statement of account issued by hotel to be attached.

Weekly report of localities visited

7. A weekly report is required showing projects visited.

Correspondence

8. Correspondence should be brief as possible.

Deductions

9. Deductions from wages of workers are not allowed for any reason whatever, except in the case where the worker is engaged in camps at a specific rate of pay and a certain deduction is to be made for board. No amounts for taxes may be deducted from the workers' pay. Municipal authorities must pay the workers, in full, amount of wages due them for their work.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIRING FUNDS

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What is the amount, to date, of the civil service retiring fund?
2. Does the government loan or utilize the said retiring fund?
3. What percentage in interests is allowed on this money?

Mr. RHODES:

Superannuation fund (act of 1924)	$33,798,174 37
Superannuation fund (act of 1893)	2,080,980 14
Retirement fund (act of 1898)	6,528,204 08
	$42,407,358 59

2. As authorized by statutes, contributions are paid into consolidated revenue fund.
3. Superannuation fund (act of 1924) four per cent; Retirement fund, five per cent.

PENSIONS FOR CABINET MINISTERS

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Did the Canadian parliament enact legislation in 1905 to the effect of creating a pension for cabinet ministers who were in office five years?
2. If so, what are the names of those who have benefited, up to date?

Mr. RHODES:

1. Yes, by chap. 30, statutes of Canada, 1905, repealed by chap. 40, statutes of Canada 1906.

2. Payments were made in 1905-06 to the following: Hon. A. G. Blair, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Sir John Carling, Sir Adolphe Caron, Hon. John Costigan, Hon. Geo. E. Foster, Hon. John Haggart, Sir Hector Langevin, Hon. Clifford Sifton, Hon. J. Israël Tarte, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What is meant by Canada occupying a temporary seat at the meetings of the League of Nations?
2. Are there additional advantages enjoyed in occupying a permanent seat at said meetings over those of a temporary seat?
3. Are the expenses of the Canadian delegates included in the amount of $205,000 plus $80,000 for labour organization, which is supposed to be the contribution of Canada to the League of Nations for 1931?
4. If not, what is the amount of the expenses incurred by the Canadian delegates to the League of Nations in 1931?

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Neither Canada nor any other member of the league occupies a "temporary seat" at the meetings of the League of Nations, The reference may possibly be to the fact that the council of the league consists of five permanent and nine non-permanent members, and that from 1927 to 1930 Canada held one of these non-permanent seats.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. $16,060.63.

GASPE POSTMASTERS

Mr. BRASSET:

1. How many postmasters were dismissed or resigned in the county of Gaspe, since August, 1930, up to the present date?
2. In each case, what was the date of his dismissal or resignation, the name of the post office, the name of the postmaster, the reason for his dismissal and the name of his successor?

Mr. CAHAN: Stands as order for return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot see why a question of this sort should require an order for return. It is a very simple question. I am afraid the Secretary of State has an old list in his hand.

Mr. CAHAN: The information has to come from the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department. It covers a number of cases with the reasons for dismissals. I thought that was a proper subject for an order for return and I asked that it stand in that way.

DISMISSALS OF POSTMASTERS

Mr. ST-PERE:

1. How many postmasters were dismissed between the dates of August 7, 1930, and February 1, 1932?
2. What are the names of those dismissed, the reasons assigned for such dismissal, and the names of the post offices?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure authorized in the province of Nova Scotia for federal public works to be paid for under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized, (b) the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for contribution to works being constructed or contributed to by the provincial or municipal authorities in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for direct relief in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 stand.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets of men employed on the breakwater on the south side of Cape Sable island, in connection with the expenditure of moneys during the last six months under the Unemployment Relief Act of last session.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets and vouchers in connection with moneys spent in the last six months on the wharf on the west side of Port Dufferin, Halifax county.

Mr. RALSTON:

For a return showing the pay sheets in connection with the repairs of the breakwater at West Baccaro carried on during the year 1931.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the Minister of Public Works allow Nos. 4, 5 and 6 to pass? The first one has reference only to pay sheets and nothing else; the next one has to do with pay sheets; the third one has to do with a return which, as I understand the matter, is not under the Unemployment Relief Act and therefore will not be the subject of the return which is coming down on March 15?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have no objection to the motions.

Motions agreed to.

WHARF AT BARACHOIS, N.B.

Mr. VENIOT:

For a copy of the pay sheets in connection with construction of a wharf at Barachois, Aboujagan river, county of Westmorland, New Brunswick, and a return showing: (a) the names of the men employed, and their respective wages since the work was undertaken to date; (b) the quantity of stone and lumber purchased, from whom purchased and the prices paid for such material; (c) the amount expended to date; (d) to whom cheques were sent in payment of wages and material; (e) whether or not the expenditure was made under the Unemployment Relief Act; (f) whether or not the work was done under contract or by days' work.

Mr. VENIOT: This is in the same category as those submitted by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. I would ask the minister if he would agree to let this go through.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (e) covers the whole of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion stood by arrangement on several former occasions.

Mr. VENIOT: The only question that would come up in the report to be submitted would be paragraph (e), "whether or not the expenditure was made under the Unemployment Relief Act." The rest does not come under the act, and I cannot see any objection to letting the motion pass.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY EMPLOYEES

Mr. REID:

For a return showing the number of persons in the employ of the government in connection with the Commons chamber, the Senate chamber and parliament building generally, with the various salaries paid.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member does not specify any particular date, so perhaps this motion had better stand.

Motion stands.

POINTE LEBEL, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. CASGRAIN:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents in connection with the dismissal of Mr. Honore Chouinard, postmaster, at Pointe Lebel, in the county of Saguenay; also for a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to the inquiry held in 1931 in connection with charges made against said Honore Chouinard, including the proof and evidence of all the witnesses heard at said inquiry, and the decision arrived at by the commissioner who held the inquiry.

PORT DANIEL EAST POST OFFICE INVESTIGATION

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of the evidence and report of the commissioner of the investigation held by order of the Post Office Department in September, 1931, at Port Daniel East post office, county of Bonaventure, Quebec.

ROBITAILLE, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. MARCIL:

For a copy of the correspondence exchanged between the patrons of the Robitaille post office, county of Bonaventure, and the department, regarding that post office, during the year 1931.

LAPRAIRIE, QUE., POSTMASTER

Mr. DUPUIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, or other documents relating to the dismissal of Noel Fontaine, postmaster at Laprairie, county of Laprairie, Quebec, including full report of an inquiry into charges brought against him, with proof and evidence submitted thereto; also a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents relating to the appointment of his successor.

NOVA SCOTIA RURAL MAIL CONTRACTS

Mr. MacLEAN:

For a copy or list of all rural mail contracts put up for public tender since March 1, 1931, up to March 1, 1932, in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, showing amount paid under old tender and also amount paid under new tender in each case.

ST. THOMAS, ONT., PUBLIC BUILDING CARETAKER

Mr. HEPBURN:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, telegrams, ratings and other communications to or from the Minister of Public Works and any other minister, officials of the government or any member or official of the Civil Service Commission, or other person or persons, in any way relating to the appointment of a caretaker for St. Thomas public building, since November 25, 1930.

REPRESENTATION OF PATRICIA

IMMEDIATE ENFRANCHISEMENT OF RESIDENTS OF THE DISTRICT

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River) moved:

Whereas, citizens of Canada residing in the Patricia district in the province of Ontario, are deprived of the right to vote in any federal election, owing to the fact that the district of Patricia is not included in any federal electoral district;

And whereas, a federal general election may be held at any time.

Therefore be it resolved: That necessary steps be taken to immediately provide for the enfranchisement of the citizens of Canada residing in the Patricia district.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is short and concise in form, but in order that members of the house may know its significance, I shall make a short explanation thereof. In the Patricia district which lies directly north of the Kenora-Rainy River riding there are between five and six hundred citizens who have been disenfranchised. A large portion of this district is within the province of Ontario, but for some reason or another at the last redistribution it was not included in any electoral district. The reason for this action may have been that very few people were residing in the district, but since that time the development of the mining areas therein has advanced quite rapidly. At the Howey mine alone there are between five and six hundred people employed.

In 1929, prior to the provincial elections, the provincial government of Ontario extended the franchise to the people in this district, but up to the present time they have not been taken into any federal constituency. In May of 1930 the government introduced a bill to enfranchise these people, but the bill subsequently was withdrawn apparently for lack of information in connection with the territory. During the discussion on this bill my duties as minister of labour took me to Fort William where a labour dispute had arisen and I was not able to be present in the house to give the information which I am sure would have been appreciated. In the elections of 1930 between five and six hundred citizens were not permitted to vote.

At the last session I introduced a private bill but after some discussion the six months' hoist was moved and the bill did not advance any further. I leave it to the house to say whether or not it is fair and in the interests of democracy that between five and six hundred people should be unable to vote. My bill specified that this district should be added to the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River, and that may have been the reason why it was not permitted to advance further. The present resolution leaves it with the government to say in what electoral district this territory shall be included. I hope the house will see its way clear to adopt this resolution.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the house in discussing this matter. The only reason I take upon myself the duty of answering on behalf of the government is that, like the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Heenan), I come from that particular section of the country. I have no quarrel with the statements made as to the need of these people having the vote. Through an error they were not granted the vote at the last elections, but it is the intention of the government that this right shall be given them before the next elections are held. A census has been taken and there will be a redistribution before the next elections, and I think under the circumstances it would be a duplication of work to pick out at this time and deal with one particular section. I think the house will agree that the wise course to follow is to allow this matter to stand until next year, when, in all probability, there will be a redistribution and this section of the country, along with others, can be given the necessary attention. That appears to me to be the reasonable attitude under the circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister who has just spoken (Mr. Manion) whether he is in a position to give any guarantee that this government will last until after the next redistribution. I ask this quite seriously. I do not mean that any of us are anxious that the government should not have ample opportunity to redeem all its pledges, but there are always possibilities of a government disintegrating and going to pieces, and it would be a great pity if the people of this part were again left without an opportunity of voting should an election come before redistribution.

Mr. MANION: I cannot give a written guarantee, but so far as one can foresee in the ordinary course of human affairs this government is going to last not merely until after the next redistribution but for a number of years thereafter. I can assure my hon. friend that there will be a redistribution and that this question regarding Patricia will be looked after. But I am afraid that my right hon. friend will be sorry if that is done because when the opportunity comes, the people there will likely vote as many of the people up there did last time against his party.

Mr. HEENAN: I am well satisfied that the government has now taken the position that these people should no longer be disfranchised. It will be noted that in my few remarks I did not lay any blame on any government or party. I simply asked that these citizens be enfranchised. The Minister of Railways, however, I think rather qualified his statement that they would be enfranchised. I think he could go further than he did and say that before another election takes place, whether a redistribution bill has been brought down or not, this territory will be taken care of.

Mr. MANION: I think I can easily go that far, but I am quite sure that it will be attended to by redistribution.

Mr. HEENAN: Then under those circumstances the government might accept the resolution.

Mr. MANION: I would rather that my hon. friend withdrew it. He has accomplished what he had in mind.

Mr. HEENAN: All right. I ask leave to withdraw my motion, Mr. Speaker, on that assurance.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to withdraw his motion?

Motion withdrawn.

WESTERN FREIGHT RATES

REDUCTION OF DOMESTIC RATES ON GRAIN AND GRAIN PRODUCTS

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from one point to another point in any one of the said provinces, be substantially reduced.

He said: I do not propose to speak at any great length or possibly to take all the time allotted to me in presenting to the house arguments in favour of the resolution standing in my name. The resolution calls for a substantial reduction in domestic freight rates. The question of freight rates has long been a vexatious one. Not only has it been frequently debated on the floor of this house but for a number of years back it has been debated by practically every organization of the farmers of western Canada and by boards of trade of the different cities of the west, and resolutions urging a reduction in freight rates have been forwarded to the government of the day and the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not think it would be wise or serve any useful purpose for me to present to the house a great volume of figures in support of my argument. Figures have been presented from time to time and have not availed very much. I think it would be better for me, Mr. Speaker, to make a plain statement of fact and use some commonsense argument in support of the resolution.

I do not attach any weight to the argument that this question should not be dealt with until the appeal from the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners has been decided. That decision should have been given by the late government as far back as January, 1930, but the government was more or less self-confident and felt secure in their position, and they left this question, together with many other important problems, on the doorstep of the present government. The situation, however, is now such that it is due to the western farmers and producers that we should endeavour to settle this question now and do what is fair and right. Many arguments could be adduced which have previously been given, and probably the discussion which will take place on this resolution will be more or less of a rehash of some of the arguments of the past, but I think I can bring to the attention of the house one or two arguments in particular in favour of a substantial reduction in these freight rates, which have gained force within recent months.

I would refer to the fact that during the last session we placed a duty on corn. By so doing we shut out from the consumers in British Columbia the supply of that feed. It will be remembered that during the debate last year on the question of placing a duty on corn, figures were given by different members of the house, showing conclusively that as far as food values are concerned barley is equal if not superior to corn. The figures were given and the house was informed of experiments that had been carried on, all conclusively in favour of barley. In our three western provinces there is an annual increase in the production of barley. Manitoba is the largest producer of barley, but we in the province of Saskatchewan are now growing this grain because we can seed it late in the season, and the farmers are able to till their land in the spring and get a growth of the noxious weeds, and then destroy that growth and seed barley. We have had some excellent crop yields in that way. We should at least endeavour to have our coarse grains from the prairie provinces put on the market in British Columbia and the eastern provinces on a fair and equitable basis both to the producer and the consumer. Further, each year there is a greater demand in the provinces, for barley and coarse grains, so that shipments from one point to another within the province as well as inter-provincial shipments of these grains are increasing. Let me cite a case that we had this year in the southern part of the three prairie provinces. In the dried out areas of the province of Saskatchewan many farmers who are not dependent altogether upon the aid given by the government have to bring in feed grains from other parts of the province. I should add that many Saskatchewan farmers within the last few years have begun feeding cattle for the eastern and overseas markets, a practice we wish to encourage.

May I review the circumstances of one particular case in my own district. I refer to an industrious farmer who, through drought and the cut worm, lost his first seeding but who decided in the first ten days of July to re-seed with oats. He was most fortunate in that several local showers passed over his farm, and as a result he had a splendid crop of oats which, unfortunately, were too late to mature. He left the crop until frost came, then put the binder in his fields and harvested about four or five hundred loads of sheaf grain. Having only fifteen horses on his farm, and in order to get a reasonable return from his sheaf feed, he visited the stock yards at Moose Jaw and there purchased 80 head of cattle which he is feeding this winter. To feed properly and to get the desired results he has found it necessary to ship in coarse grains and grain products to mix with his green feed. Already he has shipped in three cars, and certainly the freight rates figure greatly in his costs. I believe that more and more throughout the years we will find that the freight rates discriminate against the farmers. In my twenty years' experience in farming and handling grain there has not been one year when there have not been interprovincial carload shipments and shipments between points within the province.

While in the west there has been a gradual increase in grain production there undoubtedly has been an increase in diversified farming, a part of the agricultural industry which all hon. members wish to foster and encourage. While there has been a healthy increase in the production of grain and in diversified farming there has been an even greater increase, proportionately, in interprovincial shipments and shipments within the provinces. I think figures can be produced from the freight departments of the two great railway companies to prove the accuracy of my statement. There are two arguments in support of this reduction which to my mind are very important and have not yet been presented to the house. Referring particularly to diversified farming I would say that within recent years in western Canada some splendid stock farmers have developed. Some very fine pure bred herds have been established, and if any hon. members have not witnessed a stock parade at one of our class "A" fairs, such as those held at Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon and Edmonton, they have a treat in store for them.

Mr. BENNETT: And Calgary.

Mr. McINTOSH: What about the class "B" fairs?

Mr. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I was going to mention that some very splendid parades have been held at class "B" fairs. One can see stock valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars pass in review. Such an industry should be supported and we should endeavour to assist by a specific reduction in freight rates. These farmers have to import grains which they do not produce in their own district and more particularly products from grain such as bran and shorts.

One of the arguments in favour of the present rates was that they were maintained in order not to discriminate against shipments to certain points of delivery. In order not to discriminate against such points of delivery it has been found necessary to discriminate against the great majority of farmers but I think it is high time we gave sufficient consideration to the matter to see that no longer shall there be discrimination against those who are interested in a basic industry.

At the present time a rate known as the terminal rate provides for free haulage for a distance of one hundred miles between the points of Fort William and Winnipeg. Certainly such an arrangement does not allow for a fair or reasonable rate to points farther west. Certainly there is discrimination in favour of Winnipeg and other large distributing centres. Here again no useful purpose could be served by a continuation of the system now in use.

At the outset I said I did not think it necessary to give figures in support of my argument, but at this time may I put on record only a few. I am about to quote carload rates on grain and grain products in cents per hundred pound shipments from points within the province, both east and west. For the sake of convenience I am taking a point in the constituency I have the honour to represent in the province of Saskatchewan, namely Indian Head:

Carload rates on grain and grain products in cents per 100 pounds

	Domestic rate	Export rate
From Indian Head, Sask., to Moose Jaw, Sask., distance 90 miles	14 cents	—
From Indian Head, Sask., to Swift Current, Sask., distance 200 miles	20 cents	—
From Indian Head, Sask., to Vancouver, B.C., distance 1,160 miles	52½ cents	27 cents

Hon. members will notice that there is a difference in the domestic and export rates between Indian Head and Vancouver of 25½ cents. If the standard were changed from the 100 pound basis to the bushel basis, and the commodity changed to barley there would be a difference between domestic and export rates of 12 cents. From Moose Jaw to Vancouver, a distance of 1,060 miles the domestic rate is 50½ cents and the export rate 25 cents. Hon. members will note that there is a difference of two cents between domestic and export rates between Indian Head and Vancouver and Moose Jaw and Vancouver. The figures I have given would show clearly that if there were two cars of grain shipped from Indian Head west, one of which had been left at Moose Jaw for domestic consumption the rate would be 14 cents. If the second car was taken on to Vancouver and there used for domestic purposes, on a basis of the export rate per mile haulage they would take it from Indian Head to Moose Jaw for two cents. To my mind that is unreasonable and there could be no justification for such a rate.

Let us now consider shipments to points east. From Indian Head to Moosomin, a distance of 100 miles, the rate is 14½ cents. If the car were taken on to Fort William, 620 miles farther, it would be taken that extra distance for 4½ cents. I cannot see that such an arrangement is fair or equitable, because the producer within the province should be considered. Also from any point in Saskatchewan to Montreal there is only a three cent differential as between the domestic and the export rates. I have just quoted figures to show that the differential from any point in the province to Vancouver is twenty-five cents. Why there is this discrimination as between the east and west bound rates I cannot understand, and I do not think any satisfactory explanation has been offered. Similar figures could be produced with respect to shipments from Manitoba and Alberta. I might say that when the question of these discriminatory rates was before the railway commission the argument presented by the governments of the three prairie provinces in every case was to the effect that there should not be any differential. I might also mention the fact that when its decision on the case was handed down by the Board of Railway Commissioners—it was quoted last session by an hon. member when speaking to the freight rates question—the Hon. Frank Oliver, then a member of the commission, gave a dissenting judgment. It is not necessary for me to read it now; it will be found at page 1813 of Hansard of last session. Mr. Oliver was of the opinion that there should not be any differential at all, especially on coarse grains, low grade wheat and feed wheat.

The whole thing boils down to this, that on a basis of equal freight rates the price in Vancouver would be twenty per cent in favour of barley as against corn; on the present basis barley is adversely affected to the extent of fifty per cent. I am informed that last fall after the imposition of the duty on corn many of the poultrymen and dairymen in British Columbia tried our western barley for their stock and found it in every respect equal to corn, if not better. They are prepared to use our coarse grains, and with a proper adjustment of the freight rates there would be no difficulty in our finding a very good market for them in that province.

Prior to the consolidation of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk railways, we had a freight rate from the western provinces to Fort William of two cents less than the present rate. For example, from Indian Head to Fort William it was seventeen cents per hundred pounds, as against nineteen cents per hundred pounds now. That was owing largely to an agreement made between the Manitoba government and the Canadian Northern railway at the time when the provincial government guaranteed the bonds of the railway. The railways were able to haul domestic grain at a profit at that rate when there was only a single track line to Fort William, the freight cars were small, the engines were also small, and the rails were light. Surely to-day with double track lines, heavy rails, large capacity freight cars and powerful engines the railways ought to be able to haul domestic grain at a profit if the old rate were reestablished. At the present time it is very difficult to get a 1,000 bushel car, the railway agent wants you to load grain into a 1,200, 2,000 or 2,500 bushel capacity car. As for the engines, to-day they are so powerful they can haul from twenty to twenty-five more cars than in the old days.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we could secure a fair and equitable adjustment of these rates I think it would be a very substantial benefit to all our producers of grain in western Canada; some three million people in the three prairie provinces who would be directly affected. The prosperity of Canada generally depends on the success of our great basic industry, agriculture, and, I repeat, those engaged in agriculture in the prairie provinces would be directly benefited by this proposed rate adjustment. And I am confident that the railways themselves would benefit if this adjustment were made. I think it is generally admitted that the railways make the greater part of their earnings on the haulage of export grain, and I think the movement of domestic grain should be on just as favourable a basis. Why should the railways charge so to speak a double rate and in some cases more for moving grain a hundred miles within a province than for hauling it seven hundred miles to a terminal? It is high time that this matter was given very serious consideration. I trust this resolution will meet with favour from this house, and that, being so endorsed it will be favourably considered by the government. If there are any obstacles in the way of action being taken due to judgments on appeals being still pending, I think such judgments should be delivered without further delay.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, coming from the province of British Columbia, it gives me great pleasure to second the motion of my hon. friend from the prairie provinces (Mr. Perley) having for its object a reduction of the domestic grain rates. This matter has been brought to the attention of the house almost every session for the last five years, and the facts have been placed before by hon. members so fully that I shall be very brief in my remarks.

As the last speaker (Mr. Perley) has said, some further arguments have been brought forward that might well be considered in dealing with the subject. Under present conditions we believe that a reduction in the domestic grain rates, particularly as applied from points in the prairie provinces to the province of British Columbia—to which I shall confine my remarks—might be in the interests not only of the producer and consumer, but also of the transportation companies. I am free to recall the speech made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) on the 10th of February last. He was referring to the problems his department had to face at that time, and one problem which was causing his department a great deal of worry was that of finding how we could influence the movement of trade so that there might be an easier and more equitable flow of goods from one part of the world to another and from one part of the country to another. Canada, with a population of ten million people, extends for some four thousand miles from coast to coast, and within our country we find that because of climatic and perhaps other conditions, in one section we can produce commodities to much better advantage than is the case in another section. This is so in the matter of grain, which is under discussion to-day. Perhaps in no part of the North American continent can grain be grown so successively as in the prairie provinces, and we in British Columbia are interested in grain from the standpoint of feed. As I say, under present conditions it might be good business to lower this rate, and I have no doubt that by doing so we would increase the consumption and also increase the car haulage for domestic purposes.

I have in my hand, as perhaps other members have also, a letter from the Canadian Coal Committee. I was quite taken with the argument contained in the letter in regard to a request for a reduction in the freight rate on coal from $6.75 to $5 per ton. It is pointed out that this would work to the advantage of everyone concerned, and I think the same would apply to grain. They say that by this reduction the consumption of Canadian coal in the east would be increased, and that it would mean greater business to the transportation companies. With a revenue of, say, $10,000 per train of 2,000 tons, having in mind the thousands of cars rusting on sidings, the engines which are idle, the train crews seeking relief and the miners of Alberta who have to be clothed and fed, they say the fixing of a rate of $5 per ton would make possible such a movement that it would be a proper move to make from a national point of view, if only as a temporary measure. Further they say:

> Ontario consumes over 4,000,000 tons of domestic fuel per season and if Alberta could only secure 25 per cent, or one million tons, it would mean 500 trains of coal, with a gross revenue to the railways of approximately $5,000,000, plus the benefit which would come from the expenditure of wages of the miners, train crews, teamsters, coal yard employees, and all those other people who would be directly or indirectly employed.

I think if we had time we could show that a reduction in grain rates would also greatly increase the business of the transportation companies. As I said before, the question of a reduction in domestic freight rates as applied to British Columbia is not new, and it is not necessary for me to go extensively into its history, but I wish to place before the house briefly where the matter stands at present as far as my province is concerned. A few years ago this question was referred to the railway commission, who heard the application in 1926 and gave judgment in 1927. An appeal was taken to the former government, which was heard in 1929. Although they had months to consider the question no judgment was given; the privy council as then constituted vanished after the election of 1930, and the new government came into power in September of that year. As we understand it, this means a new hearing, because while the personnel of the court is gone the appeal still exists. Briefly, that is how the matter stands and we believe that if it had not been for present conditions not only in Canada but throughout the world, this matter would have received the serious consideration of the privy council much sooner.

The last speaker referred to the discrimination shown in export over domestic rates to British Columbia. Without question the domestic rate of 41½ cents per hundred pounds from Calgary to Vancouver is excessive and discriminatory. It has been pointed out on more than one occasion that with an export rate of 20 cents, apart from the cost of sacking the grain, when our wheat reaches Yokohama and Hong Kong frequently it has paid no greater freight rate than we pay from prairie points to the Fraser valley and Vancouver island. The last speaker also referred to the all rail export rate from Fort William to Montreal, which is 34½ cents per hundred pounds, while the domestic rate is 3 cents greater, or 37½ cents. The distance from Fort William to Montreal is over one-half greater than the distance from Calgary to Vancouver, and there would not appear to be any reason for the difference between the export and domestic rate from prairie points to Vancouver. The differential on the haul from Fort William to Montreal, as I have pointed out, is 3 cents, while the differential on the haul from Calgary to Vancouver is 21½ cents.

Unfortunately the same rate applies to the poorer grades of grain. As I have already said, under normal conditions the prairie provinces produce the highest quality of wheat, oats and barley, but from time to time a considerable proportion of the crop is damaged through exceptional seasonal conditions, and rendered unfit for export. The bulk of this damaged or low grade grain can be used for feed for cattle, hogs and poultry. Damaged grain, of course, is not as suitable for feed as sound grain, but if it can be secured at a sufficiently low price it answers the purpose fairly well. The present domestic rate of 41½ cents per hundred pounds makes impossible the use of such grain by the poultry and dairy farmers of the Fraser valley, and compels them to either pay this added cost of 41½ cents per hundred pounds or, as the last speaker said, buy imported corn.

My hon. friend also referred to the matter of barley. As hon. members will recall, last year a duty of 25 cents was placed on corn in order to encourage the use of barley in the feeding of poultry. I made inquiries from some of the largest poultry plants, as well as from the milling people in my district. They assured me they had used considerably more barley this year than they ever did before and they found it very satisfactory. We find at the same time large shipments of corn came from South Africa free of duty under the British preferential.

If we are to carry out the principle that we established last session, of trying to encourage the poultrymen of British Columbia to use more barley, it is essential that we be in a position to lay barley down at a lower rate than at present if we expect to compete with imported corn. The whole question of transportation will no doubt come before the government and the house before long, and at that time it might be well to take into consideration the matter of rates under the question of cheaper transportation of products of this kind from one part of Canada to another.

It has been argued that the rate should be the same as the export rate. I do not know that the farmers of British Columbia are united on that. We would be satisfied with a small differential rate; if the differential on the westbound rate were reduced to the same level as that of the eastbound rate, that is, 3 cents, it would give relief to the poultry and dairy industry in British Columbia. It would give us a rate of 23 cents instead of 41½ cents per hundred pounds. The retaining of the small differential would tend to establish a greater milling industry in the west. If this were done I believe it would be possible for the dairymen, and to a certain extent the poultrymen, to procure mill feeds at a lower rate than at present. The dairymen do not feed the whole grain; they depend almost altogether on mill products, such as bran, shorts and so forth.

I have tried to draw to the attention of the government, first, that lower rates on grain for domestic use would tend to relieve to a great extent the conditions prevailing in the poultry and dairy industries owing to the existing low market situation. Second, it would enable these men to produce at a lower cost and better to meet competition on the world market. Third, the lower rate would without doubt increase the consumption in British Columbia of the prairie grain, which would be beneficial to the producer on the prairie and at the same time, as I pointed out, give more business to the transportation companies. I have great pleasure in seconding the motion.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to me to support this resolution this afternoon. If my memory serves me aright, last session I made some mention of domestic freight rates, but I was rather advocating a tariff on corn. I said that there was one great obstacle in the way and that was the domestic rate, and after what has been said in the house to-day, I think hon. members will be convinced that such is the case.

I notice this resolution refers only to grain and grain products. I wish it had gone a little further and included other commodities. I want to submit to the house a few figures in connection with domestic rates on gasoline. I believe this question was up in the house a couple of weeks ago and I should like to give figures to show what it costs us for gasoline. We have a farmers' cooperative and we handle our own gasoline. We have a tank at Delisle. I find that the freight rate on gasoline from Calgary to Delisle is 57½ cents per hundred pounds. The other day the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) mentioned that the weight was 8 pounds to the gallon, and I think he also said there was a shortage. I should like to quote one shipment in that regard. Last summer on one shipment we had a shortage that amounted to $38 a car, and the average weight to the gallon was 7 pounds instead of 8 pounds. Last summer our business amounted to 10 tanks of gasoline shipped into Delisle and on that we had a deficit of $380.

Let me compare the rate on gasoline and on coal from practically the same distance. The rate on coal from Drumheller to Delisle, a few miles less than from Calgary to Delisle, is 13½ cents a hundred pounds, while the rate on gasoline from Calgary to Delisle is 57½ cents. We feel that rate on gasoline is excessive. In other words, it amounts to about 4⅘ cents a gallon. Our gasoline, laid down at Delisle from Calgary, costs practically 19 cents a gallon, and the first indebtedness on that is 4⅘ cents for freight. In other words, if the freight rate were deducted, the gasoline would cost a little less than 15 cents a gallon. The high freight rate is one great reason for the excessive price of gasoline at the present time.

I do not think it is necessary, in connection with the domestic freight rate, to take up much of the time of the house, because figures have already been submitted that demonstrate the importance of something being done, and I hope that action will be taken in connection with the matter. When we were discussing last session the question of imposing a tariff on corn I could appreciate the difficulty that the British Columbia members felt would arise if something were not done in connection with the domestic rate on shipments into that province. I thought I was rather exaggerating when I said that it was possible to ship grain all the way to Great Britain and back into British Columbia and save something over shipping it under the domestic rate, but from the figures submitted here to-day I find that I was quite right in my statement. I do not know whether it has ever occurred to hon. members it is possible under the present domestic rate to ship barley all the way to Sweden or Denmark for less than we can ship it over the border into British Columbia. Since we have become so interested in the bacon type of hog in western Canada, under the present rates we are making Denmark and Sweden our greatest competitors because we can send them the feeds such as barley and coarse grain cheaper than we can ship them to our neighbours in British Columbia. This shows that something should be done in the way of reducing freight rates.

A little over a year ago I had a letter from the secretary of the Conservative organization in Manitoba, and he quoted a farmer who undertook to ship a car of barley into British Columbia where the net return for the car was $1.95. Therefore the present rate and prices prohibit the shipment of barley into that province.

Mr. MANION: I think the hon. member said you could ship grain from the prairies to Denmark cheaper than to British Columbia.

Mr. LOUCKS: Yes.

Mr. MANION: Has the hon. member the figures?

Mr. LOUCKS: No.

Mr. MANION: I am rather doubtful.

Mr. LOUCKS: If the minister will take the figures already quoted, he will find the domestic rate from Alberta into British Columbia is just about double.

Mr. MANION: I agree with that one point, but not with the rest.

Mr. LOUCKS: I was referring only to the domestic rate. We can ship grain to Great Britain, Denmark or Sweden at a rate cheaper than that for domestic shipments.

Mr. MANION: That is partly correct. I have the figures here which show that the rate to Liverpool is a little higher than the domestic rate.

Mr. LOUCKS: I noticed a question was asked the other day in connection with the shipment of Australian wheat to British Columbia, and it seems almost ridiculous that wheat can be shipped to Vancouver from Australia cheaper than it can be shipped from Alberta. The price of wheat is now about thirty and some odd cents a bushel, and it seems almost impossible to believe that Australia can be a competitor. I attribute this to the handicap of the domestic rate. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) mentioned a letter which he had received in connection with domestic rates, and no doubt many hon. members have been thus circularized.

Considerable rolling stock could be put to work if the domestic rate was brought into line with the export rate. Every western farmer is concerned about this matter, and I think every hon. member from the west will endorse this suggestion. Millions of bushels of barley could be shipped from western Canada to British Columbia if these rates were adjusted and brought in line with the export rates. I have confidence something will be done. I know it is a matter for the railroads but to a certain extent this government is responsible in seeing that the rate is brought into line. I feel assured that this resolution will receive the endorsation of the house.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to rise in support of this resolution. I am sorry I was not prepared at the time the resolution standing in my name was called and I began to fear that this matter would not be discussed at this session as I was informed that my resolution could not be again placed on the order paper. I am glad however to join with hon. members opposite in support of the resolution.

It is not my purpose to cover the ground that was covered last year. At that time many figures were quoted, many figures have been quoted to-day, and it would be wearisome and a vain repetition to cover all the details. I intend to deal more particularly with the domestic freight rates appeal now before the governor in council, as I find there is considerable doubt in the minds of many persons regarding the matter. I hope to be able to clarify this situation. In all kindness I point out to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) that he did not give the true position of this appeal or the proper dates.

Before doing this, I should like to say that the poultry and dairying industry of British Columbia have reached a point where if something is not done and done real soon there will be no poultrymen or dairy men to provide traffic for the railroads. The following account of a meeting of poultrymen in British Columbia appeared in the Vancouver Province:

> Many coast poultry farmers have given up the battle against high freight rates and other handicaps but the industry as a whole—

That is, the poultry industry.

> —is still fighting for reduced charges on prairie feed despite the disheartening record of the past couple of years.
> "Undoubtedly many producers are going out of business and the railway rates are one of the principle causes," said G. P. Wallace, president of the Canadian Poultry Pool Limited, in commenting to-day on an appeal for the poultrymen made in the legislature by Captain MacGregor Macintosh.
> The islands member said Japan can import grain at half the cost of British Columbia and charged the railways with building traffic at the expense of Canada's taxpayers.
> To show the decline in the industry, Mr. Wallace pointed out that in 1929 British Columbia shipped 389 carloads of eggs to outside markets while in 1930 there was a twenty per cent fall to 310 cars, and in 1931 a thirty per cent fall to 221 cars.
> "It is true that the cost of grain has decreased," he said, "but so has the price of eggs, while freight rates have remained unchanged. There is still a difference of about $4.30 a ton between the export and domestic rates to the coast."

It is startling to realize that our competitors in Japan and China can obtain their grain requirements from the grain fields of Alberta, good No. 2, No. 3 and No. 4 grain as against the poorer grades which we have to feed, at a rate of about $7 per ton delivered—that is the Shanghai rate— as compared with $8.30 for Vancouver delivery. The article continues:

> We think that we are entitled to the same rate as foreigners. We are trying to build up a valuable export trade here in British Columbia. We are making occasional shipments to Great Britain but we find that producers in England can buy Alberta wheat just as cheaply as we can while it costs us seven or eight cents a dozen to deliver the eggs in the old country. The point is that we have a specialized industry here in British Columbia with both our markets and feed sources great distances away. Montreal and other eastern Canadian cities are our main market while our feed comes from the prairies.

We believe we are entitled to special consideration. We do not expect the railroads to lower domestic rates in all parts of Canada but we think we are entitled to expect the same arrangement that has been put into effect in other parts of the dominion.

Since my arrival in Ottawa I have received many letters and telegrams citing the serious position of the poultrymen and dairymen. I will quote from one letter only, received from a man in my own constituency. He says:

Dear Sir,—

I am a member of the British Columbia Egg and Poultry Association. Our association shipped twenty-two cars of eggs to Montreal during the two months December, 1931, and January, 1932. For the grade "Firsts" our net return at the ranch was five and a half cents per dozen on the above shipments.

Get that, Mr. Speaker—five and a half cents per dozen was the net return at the ranch. He continues:

Candling costs were under five cents a case. Freight five cents. You would know better than I what the consumer paid in Montreal.

He goes on to say that we should get some help from the federal government, and at the foot of the letter is this tragic note:

Shall we join the unemployed?

The dairymen in British Columbia are also in a precarious position. Two years ago they were receiving from 65 to 70 cents a pound for butter fat. This year they are receiving 22 cents per pound. They are also faced with further serious competition in that Alberta is shipping into British Columbia, I was going to say cheap butter, but butter at a cheap price, which comes into the city of Vancouver. It was in the first instance presumably made for consumption as butter. Many restaurants and other concerns now take this butter and rechurn it back into cream. Then they buy some skim-milk or milk from the Fraser Valley Cooperative Association and resell the milk with from three to five per cent butter content which has been made out of the butter that has come in from Alberta. Our dairymen are faced with this further serious competition. The price was not low enough at 22 cents a pound, I suppose, and it is now going lower due to this serious and undreamt of competition.

When it is remembered that the freight rates on grain constitute fifty per cent of the cost of the grain, it will be realized how serious a matter it is to the poultrymen and dairymen who must of necessity purchase it for feed. The feed they purchase is of poor quality, not grade number two or three or four, but the lower grades selling at a lower price. In some cases the grade is so low that I wonder the stuff is put on the market at all, but that is by the way.

It is with particular reference to the delay in deciding the appeal from the Board of Railway Commissioners that I wish to speak. When I introduced this subject in this house last year the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made the following statement, which will be found at page 1795 of Hansard of last year:

I just put it again to this house, and I put it to my hon. friend: Does he not think that the amendment he has proposed has served its purpose and should be withdrawn? Does he think it is fair to any body of men—suppose he were one of them—

Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver): Will the Prime Minister give us the assurance that, so far as he is concerned, he will expedite the proposed hearing as much as possible after the close of the session.

Mr. Bennett: I am coming to that; I think it is a highly proper question and, indeed, it was not necessary to ask it. On two occasions the government was of the opinion that it should fix a future date on which the matter could be heard; but considerations of moment came up that made it impossible to fix a date. It is the intention of the government, however, to hear that appeal just as early as it is possible to do so, consistently with the duties of the administration while parliament is in session. We cannot hear it while parliament is in session.

Since the house prorogued parliament has been out of session for some six or eight months, and this appeal still has not been heard before the governor in council. I wish to deal specifically with this matter because I feel that if it is properly brought to the attention of the government, some action may be accorded to us. I should like to quote from the report of the Board of Railway Commissioners, in which a history of this appeal is given, at page 252 of Volume XVII, by the Hon. Frank Oliver, who was one of the commissioners. He says.

From time to time steps towards equalization of mountain with prairie rates were taken, chiefly on representations made by the province of British Columbia. At the date of the order in council of June 5, 1925 (P.C. 886)—

That was the western grain rates case.

—the westbound grain rate was 22½ cents per 100 pounds to Vancouver from Calgary, 642 miles, and from Edmonton 765 miles, as compared with 26 cents from both points to Fort William, a distance of 1,243 miles from Calgary and 1,227 miles from Edmonton.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the grain is carried for 26 cents when it is going east for export, or more than twice the distance than when it is going west.

It will also be noted that the Canadian Pacific Railway have added some 136 miles to their route because they charge exactly the same as the Canadian National Railway which hauls the grain from Edmonton, which is 136 miles further than from Calgary to Vancouver. Continuing to quote:

The rate on grain and flour for domestic use in British Columbia was 41½ cents per 100 pounds as compared with 21 cents for export from Calgary and Edmonton to Vancouver—

That information should be brought up to date. The information that I have received to-day is that the export rate from Calgary is now only 20 cents. He continues:

—with a correspondingly increased rate from more easterly prairie points.

In regard to export grain rates westbound, the situation requires special explanation.

An order of the board was issued on September 2, 1925, as follows:

"That the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railway Companies file tariffs, effective not later than the 15th day of September, 1925, reducing the rates on grain and flour to Pacific ports within Canada for export—

I want it to be noted that the order was dealing entirely with export rates. Domestic rates are not mentioned at all. He continues:

—to the same rates proportioned to distance as such grain and flour would carry if moving eastward for export."

The order was the result of a hearing which had taken place in Vancouver on November 5, 1924, before the chief commissioner and Commissioner Oliver. This sitting was held in pursuance of order in council of date October 2, 1924, which authorized the hearing and "effective action" in regard to export grain rates westbound on an appeal of the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta from a decision of the board dated June 30, 1922.

Immediately following the issue of the equalizing order of September 2, 1925, an appeal was entered by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Montreal Board of Trade and a number of allied and associated interests.

I would ask you to note, Mr. Speaker, that the board of trade of Montreal intervened; I suppose they did not want to see Vancouver develop as an export port, so they joined with the Canadian Pacific Railway in opposing British Columbia's application in regard to this rate. He continues:

The appeal was heard in Ottawa on September 29, 1925, by the full board. On December 19, 1925, decision refusing the appeal was rendered by Mr. Deputy Chief Commissioner Vien, which was concurred in by the chief commissioner and Commissioner Oliver. Not having secured the approval of a majority of the board, the appeal failed and the order of September 2, 1925, was therefore confirmed.

I would ask you to note further, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian Pacific Railway refused to obey the order. They appealed, and when the decision went against them they still refused to obey the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I ask this house to take serious note of the attitude of that great railway corporation towards the order of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The commissioner continues:

The Canadian National system had given due effect to the order by reducing their westbound rates on grain from the prairies to Vancouver to the same per mile rates as provided on grain traffic over their main line to Fort William.

The Canadian Pacific Railway had made some reduction in their rates, but instead of computing westbound rates on actual mileage from prairie points on their main line to Fort William, they had taken the eastbound mileage basis of the National main line (which was at that time and still is the subject of a special complaint before the board) and had added a computed (non-existent) 130 miles. Calgary is 642 actual miles from Vancouver. Red Jacket on the Canadian Pacific main line is 646 miles from Fort William; it pays an 18-cent rate. Therefore under the board's order of September 2, 1925, Calgary is entitled to an 18-cent rate to Vancouver. But the rate schedule actually charged by the Canadian Pacific from Calgary to Vancouver is 21 cents.

Two crops have moved under these rates. It is estimated that the gain to the railway company by its failure to fully comply with the board's order has been not less than from one-half to three-quarters of a million dollars on the amount of each crop actually moved.

Mr. TURNBULL: Is the hon. member quite sure that the order of September 2 was confirmed? Is it not a fact that the board, being divided, provided that the whole matter should be reviewed and reheard as part of the general inquiry?

Mr. REID: If the hon. member will just let me complete what I am saying he will find that I am about to make a full explanation of the whole case. If the hon. member will be content to listen I will come to his point in a moment.

It is very important that the findings of the chief commissioner be given in regard to this matter, and I believe what I am about to read will state the whole case, so far as the province of British Columbia is concerned. The findings of the chief commissioner are as follows:

That following the approval of the said order in council P.C. 886—

That is where I think the whole appeal has been clouded. There have been so many appeals that one member will be quoting P.C. 886, and the other Board of Railway Commissioners general order P.C. 420, which dealt specifically with only one part of the inquiry. The findings continue:

That following the approval of the said order in council P.C. 886 and the amendment of section 325 of the Railway Act in 1925, the Board of Railway Commissioners issued general order No. 420 on the 9th day of July, and then on appeal being made and heard they issued order No. 36769.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, there have been so many orders that one has difficulty following them and learning the truth from them. The finding continues:

That on the 2nd of September, 1925, the board, following the hearing in the city of Vancouver in the month of November, 1924, issued general order No. 36769, directing the railways to equalize the rates on grain and flour moving to Vancouver and Fort William for export, but omitted any reference to domestic rates.

Right through, I may say that practically all these appeals have been on export rates. The appeal by British Columbia, which was heard when the commissioner was in that province, was on domestic rates. They found that owing to P.C. 886 which was a general rates inquiry, until a decision was given regarding domestic rates they had no right to hear any evidence, because such a hearing should come under the purview of P.C. 886.

However to continue with the findings of Hon. H. A. McKeown, may I read the following:

(a) That order 36769—

Which was an order authorizing them to equalize rates westward as well as eastward.

—was made after a complete consideration of everything involved.

(b) That the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has not complied with the said order, and its action cannot be justified.

That is, in disobeying the order—

That the application to rescind order 36769 should be dismissed.

They appealed the order after it was given, and the appeal was dismissed.

(d) That the operating cost is not any greater than the cost incurred in Ontario, and not as great as the cost incurred in Quebec and New Brunswick.

(e) That the difference in cost of operation in the province of British Columbia and the prairie provinces is no greater, in fact not as great as the difference in the cost incurred in New Brunswick and Ontario, where no differential in the rates is made, and for that reason the application of a differential in British Columbia to compensate the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for higher operating cost was unjust.

(f) That the tolls charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the carriage of goods in, to, from or through British Columbia are discriminatory, and that the discrimination was unjust.

(g) That the charging of a higher toll in British Columbia based on so-called mountain operation cost is a violation of the terms of union under which British Columbia entered confederation.

(h) That the Canadian Pacific Railway Company having received large subsidies for the express purpose of overcoming the physical difficulties throughout its system, cannot now in justice be heard to urge these difficulties to uphold a discriminatory scale of rates which such subventions were given to overcome.

(i) That the cost of operation on the Canadian National Railways is no greater in British Columbia than it is in the prairie provinces, and that there is no justification for a higher toll on the latter road for the carriage in, to, from or through British Columbia than it charges for the same or similar service in the prairie provinces.

(k) That the domestic rate of 37½ cents per 100 pounds from Fort William to Montreal, and 55½ cents per 100 pounds from Fort William to St. John, and 57 cents from Fort William to Halifax, is out of line with all rates in the territory east of Fort William, and has never been questioned by the consumer, flour miller and other consignee of eastern Canada,— —for the reason that it is not a rate they are compelled to use, having available the rates of the lake carriers that serve the bulk of the population of Ontario and Quebec and practically all of the milling centres and distributing centres such as Port McNicol, Port Colborne, Windsor, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec city, where the rate of the lake carrier instead of being 37½ cents to Montreal is between 10 and 11 cents. In addition to that western Canadian grain for feeding live stock, dairy stock and poultry is not used to anything like the same extent in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that it is in British Columbia. Had the eastern flour miller, the consumer and consignee been dependent upon the all-rail rate for prairie grain and flour, they would have made some effort to secure the reduction of that rate to bring it in line with other rates that exist throughout the territory.

And this is the reason:

(l) That the all-rail rates covering the movement of domestic grain from Fort William to points in eastern Canada are paper rates, or rates under which nothing moves, and are not comparable with the rates from prairie points to Fort William or to Vancouver that carry all the traffic, and do not indicate anything as to the reasonableness of the rate to British Columbia or to Fort William. The fact that they are the only rates that the consignees and consumers of eastern Canada have not complained about, although they justify more complaint by their obvious high level and comparative unreasonableness than any other rates in eastern Canada, establishes beyond question that they are not rates under which any appreciable amount of traffic moves.

(n) That the cost per ton from Fort William to Montreal on grain moving by the lake carriers for domestic consumption is 11 cents per 100 pounds, or $2 per ton, as compared with the cost from Calgary to Vancouver of $8.30 per ton.

Then, note this Mr. Speaker:

That the consumer of grain and flour in Vancouver, and the dairy farmer, live stock feeder and poultry man in the territory contiguous to Vancouver pays 372 per cent more than the consumer of grain and flour in Montreal, or the dairy farmer, live stock feeder or poultry man contiguous to Montreal has to pay in transportation for grain and flour produced in western Canada, although the distance from Fort William to Montreal is 997 miles, or 353 miles further than the distance from Calgary to Vancouver, which is 642 miles.

The whole matter of appeal is under a sort of cloud, and is not clear to most hon. members. Probably I should repeat the history Appeals were made by the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta against the decision made in the year 1922, a decision made on the export rate. The Board of Railway Commissioners heard the appeal on November 5, 1924, and when the appeal was made three commissioners were present. May I repeat that the appeal was upon the export rate, only. On September 2, 1925, the board issued an order reducing the rate on export grain. Appeal was made against this order by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company with whom was joined the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal. The first order which was issued on September 2, 1925, was confirmed, because when appeal was heard three commissioners agreed, and three disagreed. The three commissioners who agreed were those three who had heard the appeal; the three who disagreed were those who had only read the evidence, and were not present in person when the appeal by the province of British Columbia and others was placed before them and the information thereby made available. An order in council was passed on June 5, 1925—and it is in connection with this order in council that confusion has arisen. While one order had been given in the year 1924 and carried on to the end of the year 1925, another order had been given instructing the Board of Railway Commissioners to go into the whole question generally of rates throughout the whole of Canada. Chief Commissioner McKeown has said that no directions were issued, when that order was given, to hear the appeal by the province of British Columbia. The chief commissioner is reported as follows:

> In some quarters it has been suggested that the various applications made to the board under this investigation—
> P.C. 886, under date of June 5, 1925—
> —have given it the character of being simply an effort to reduce rates in different localities. Such applications are numerous and insistent, but we are acting under an order in council which has in view the establishment of a rate structure fair and reasonable and equal in its application throughout the country.

The chief commissioner adds that the order in council does not pertain to the establishment of a rate structure in any one locality. This decision was rendered on August 26, 1927, and I find that order number 448, a copy of which I have under my hand, took the whole rate structure throughout Canada into consideration and reviewed the export rate at that time, but gave no decision whatsoever on the domestic rate. I claim that the appeal of the British Columbia government now before the governor in council is hardly sufficient in itself. I think the government should have taken into consideration general order 448 which was issued in August, 1927. This did not specifically deal with British Columbia's case with respect to domestic freight rates. It is with a view to expediting this mater and to clarify it that I have gone into it at some length. I hope the government will see the difficulty as I see it, because if action on the appeal is delayed much longer I fear the poultry and dairymen will be faced with complete disaster.

Another serious aspect of the case is that at the present time we in British Columbia are debarred from appealing to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Last year the management of the British Columbia Egg Pool appealed to the railway commission. I have before me a copy of their case, and also a copy of the findings by the board. Of course, the pool asked that the domestic freight rate be just the same as the export freight rate. The commissioners were in doubt whether they could hear the appeal and delayed giving their decision until their return to Ottawa, when they notified the pool that as the matter was already before the board the appeal could not be heard. So not only are the poultrymen suffering from the high freight rates they have to pay for an inferior quality of feed, but they cannot even appeal to the railway commission on this point as long as this matter is before the governor in council. Some action is necessary, and I am in great hopes that the necessary steps will be taken. As I say, last session when I introduced the question action was promised by the Prime Minister. Personally I am disappointed that no decision along those lines has been given. If the governor in council cannot deal directly with the question I urge that the government refer it to the Board of Railway Commissioners again with specific instructions to hear the appeal of the British Columbia government and the poultrymen in the matter of the domestic freight rates.

Again I urge on the government the necessity of doing something before disaster overtakes the poultrymen and dairymen of British Columbia. If the government are not prepared to grant the required reduction at once, let them refer the matter back to the Board of Railway Commissioners. In 1930 the government of British Columbia engaged counsel, and that counsel is awaiting along with counsel for the poultry pool of British Columbia and other associations to go before a tribunal with their appeal. We feel we have justice on our side, and that we have every right to ask for and obtain the same treatment in this respect as has been accorded the other provinces. Across the line our competitors can ship their eggs from Seattle east cheaper than we can, and they can ship their wheat from points in Montana and elsewhere much cheaper than we can. Our competitors in Japan enjoy a similar advantage over us. They can buy our good grain and get it landed in Shanghai at $7 a ton, while we have to pay $8.30 a ton from Edmonton and other points. What chance shall we have to compete with these people so long as this discrimination against us continues?

I am glad to join with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and I am hopeful that as the motion has been introduced by one of the government supporters it will meet with more serious attention at the hands of the government than the appeal I made last session.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I certainly must support the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), Mr. Speaker, but as this is, I think, the eighth time that I have brought the matter up myself, or supported somebody else in doing it, I lend my support rather with that hope deferred which maketh the heart sick. The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Reid) said he had great hopes of action being taken at this session. Well, all I can say is that while I admire his optimism I do not share it. He buttresses his argument by the statement, "We have justice on our side." Yes, but it needs more than justice to get action in parliament. It is needless for me to rehash or repeat the arguments in favour of the adoption of the principle we ask for as they have been so often stated, and as the facts have never been contradicted. While the resolution is drawn on general lines, what we in British Columbia want is a reduction of the local domestic freight rates to the point where they will be equal to the export freight rates.

There is one point that none of the previous speakers has touched on. There has been a continual fight over rates westward for, I suppose, fifteen years, and the Hon. John Oliver when premier of British Columbia was very prominent in the matter. On two occasions—the member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) alluded to one of them—he was successful in getting a reduction on the export rate. In neither case, however, was there any corresponding or similar reduction made in the domestic rate. Twelve years ago there was a differential, but it was not nearly as large as it is now. Let us say that it was considered fair and reasonable at that time; since then the export rate has been substantially reduced twice, but the domestic rate has not been proportionately reduced, and my argument is that if the differential between the export and domestic rates was right twelve years ago it cannot possibly be right now because it has been twice increased since that time.

The hon. member for New Westminster told the house that the poultrymen would go bankrupt if something were not done. He might have gone further and said they are bankrupt now; they are selling out their stocks day by day and week by week. Possibly to-day the government will say what they said last year, that the Liberal government also neglected this matter. That is true, but the "et tu Brute" argument is not very strong; at least the Liberal government did hear the case even if they did not give a decision, though I agree they were far too long hearing it. At any rate, the present government fell heir to this question in August or September of 1930. The matter was brought up in this house last May, and the government pointed out that it had not been in office very long, and compared the short period in which they had not dealt with the matter with the several years that had lapsed before the Liberal government considered it. That was quite true, but it is not a good argument now, a year later. In dealing with this matter last year the Prime Minister called attention to the fact that many years ago parliament established a court known as the Board of Railway Commissioners, and he pointed out that it was just as much a court as the exchequer court or the supreme court of Canada, with all the rights, powers and opportunities to examine into these things. Of course he was right in that. Then he said:

> That tribunal having been created, we have endeavoured to the best of our ability to ensure it from interference by parliament. Why? Because parliament is composed of partisans.

He went on to say that the court gave judgment in the matter of British Columbia freight rates, and that the judgment did not support the views put forward by those interested. Then he said:

> There is a right of appeal to the governor in council—that is to say, a right of appeal to the partisans. There are those who think that this right of appeal should not exist.

His reference to partisans, of course, has to do with the fact that the privy council, meaning the government, is not composed of men skilled in the intricacies of railway rates, and they are partisans in the sense that they are members of one political party. With that I quite agree, and I might just quote a sentence I spoke in reply:

> I fully agree with the remarks of the Prime Minister concerning the difficulty of a political partisan body—because that is what the Privy Council of Canada is—dealing with a matter of this kind. However that is at present the only means of redress we have. I suggest that the matter should be referred not to the privy council but to the supreme court, which is not a partisan body and which has more time, opportunity, facilities and experience in weighing evidence properly in a matter of that kind than has the privy council. The supreme court could not be accused of being partisan in its views.

Those were the views I expressed then, and that suggestion would entirely meet the objection raised by the Prime Minister, that taking an appeal to the privy council was really taking an appeal from a court to a partisan body. I quite agree with that view of the Prime Minister, and I do think the appeal should lie to the supreme court.

Then the question came up as to when some action might be expected on the appeal and last year the Prime Minister said:

> It is the intention of the government, however, to hear that appeal just as early as it is possible to do so, consistently with the duties of the administration while parliament is in session.

That was an indication that it could not be heard while parliament was in session. On February 11 of this year I asked when this appeal might be expected to be heard, and the Prime Minister said:

> That appeal has not been heard by the present government and it is impossible to say when a date will be fixed for the hearing.

This does not look very hopeful for a hearing in the near future. The matter has dragged for a long time, and I am afraid there is little hope of a satisfactory result when it is heard. Referring to the same volume of Hansard, for May 20, 1931, I find the right hon. Prime Minister using these words:

> I may say to the house that this government will not—and this is very significant.

> —unless it is a case in which a palpable error has been made that requires only an insignificant exercise of power—undertake to deal with these highly technical matters. I do not regard the privy council, either as at present constituted or as it has been in the past, as fitted by training to determine these questions.

He goes on later to say:

> If it is clear or reasonable from the appeal —one cannot anticipate the judgment—that the matter should be reconsidered that, of course, will be done.

So the Prime Minister said very clearly that he did not think the privy council was the body to deal with the matter, and that the most that might be expected would be to have the matter sent back for a rehearing. Possibly if we can get nothing better we will have to be satisfied with this; at least something will be accomplished. It may be that the railway board will have a better light on the matter, and recent events may have helped them change their mind. For instance, we have been importing wheat from Australia. I prophesied that a couple of years ago and was laughed at, but it has happened. We are also importing corn from South Africa, and I do not think we have any reason to be proud of either of those things. If we so manage our railway rates that it pays to import wheat from Australia and corn from South Africa it would seem that we are negligent in our duties to the producer on the prairies and to the consumer in British Columbia.

The argument always put forth before the board of railway commissioners by the railways is that the export rate is not profitable, and therefore they cannot agree to make the domestic rate the same. That is a very poor argument; if it applies to the one case it should apply to the other also, but we find the railways always anxious to get export business, though they claim it is not profitable. It must be remembered that the cost of hauling wheat from the prairies to British Columbia is exactly the same whether the wheat is for export or for domestic use. It goes on the same train; it is only a matter of switching the cars. If the railways take that attitude they should wish for no traffic at all, but we do not find that; they are reaching out for all the export business they can get, but they should be careful lest they kill the goose that lays the golden egg. What will it profit them to keep up this high rate on domestic traffic if the consumer is driven to Australia or South Africa for his commodities? In one regard I am not sorry this has happened, because it may give the railway companies and also the board of railway commissioners the idea that it is not always profitable to try to squeeze more than the traffic will bear—and that is what it amounts to in this case.

The government have three choices in the matter, and I would join with other hon. members in asking them to follow at least one, because total inaction is not to be defended from any point of view. The government could change the act so that the appeal would not lie to the privy council but to the Supreme Court of Canada; that would release the government from an invidious position and would put the matter in the hands of those best qualified to deal with it. Another course they might follow would be to hear the appeal and give a decision one way or the other, or finally they might refer it back to the board of railway commissioners. So far as I am concerned I should like to see the matter referred to the supreme court. Then there would be no undue delay and the question would be dealt with on its merits, with no suggestion of political influence or anything of that kind. I think this would be the most satisfactory position for the government or any government in the future to take. I join with those members on both sides of the house who have pressed this as being a very urgent matter in British Columbia. People who continually cry out about a certain question of injustice are apt to get looked upon as men with a perpetual grievance. But a matter is never settled until it is settled right and to my knowledge this has been going on not for five but for possibly eight years, and I think the time has come and, indeed, has long since passed when the matter should be brought to a decisive end. I hope the government will take action along one of the three lines I have indicated, but for any sake let us get some action of some kind.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, the question of domestic freight rates has come very closely home to us, particularly in the southern part of Manitoba, because this year we have found it necessary for various reasons to bring in from other points different kinds of feeds, coarse grains and roughage. We have found that freight rates for shipment even for short distances have been almost staggering. It is for that reason in particular that I should like to avail myself of the opportunity of taking part in this debate.

One matter that was mentioned by some of the other speakers should be further emphasized owing to its effect on the whole dominion. Efforts have been made by our farmers' organizations to establish a systematic live stock marketing scheme for Canada. Western cattle have been taken to eastern feed lots and there kept coming along as export requirements needed them. When one looks over the cost of domestic freight rates, one realizes how difficult it is for eastern feeders to secure at anything like reasonable prices, western feed grain with which to finish the cattle. To my mind there is an opportunity to develop quite an industry for the live stock men of this country. In eastern Canada, if I understand the situation, there is usually an abundance of high class rough feed, which at times has to be supplemented by coarse grains from other parts of Canada. If we had a freight rate structure whereby these people could secure those coarse grains at a reasonable figure, one could imagine how a very satisfactory industry could be built up in feeding western cattle near the seaboard on some of our eastern feed lots, thus making a profit for the men who are feeding them.

Looking back at the situation as it exists with us particularly in Manitoba and observing what was going on last fall in districts where feed was scarce, I may point out that the matter of truck service was quite a problem. I know of several men who purchased grain fifty, sixty or seventy-five miles away, and instead of bringing it in by train, they were hiring trucks to draw it in, simply because the domestic freight rate was prohibitive and they found it much more economical to bring the grain in by truck than to have it shipped in the ordinary way by rail. This is a graphic example of lost revenue for the railway companies. Had those rates been reasonable, the railways would undoubtedly have had the business. We in Manitoba will require a good deal of grain during the coming season. Most of it will be shipped in from northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta, but some of it will come from northern Manitoba where there is a surplus of feed grain. The strange thing is that in buying grain for feeding purposes, we ordinarily have it shipped to Winnipeg on the Fort William basis, pay the full Fort William freight on it to Winnipeg and then have it shipped out on local freight from Winnipeg to points in southern Manitoba. This seems a most ridiculous situation and one which should be remedied in the very near future.

Reference was made this afternoon to an effort to do something for the growers of coarse grain in western Canada by placing a duty on corn coming into this country. I think I said last year that in my judgment a reasonable domestic freight rate on barley would have been more effective and a much more reasonable proposition than placing a duty on corn. For the life of me I cannot see why we build up all these facilities for handling commodities in this country and then handicap them so that they cannot be used. A reasonable domestic rate on grain shipped from point to point within Manitoba would be more effective in this connection than placing a duty on corn.

I should like to take just a moment to point out to the house some of the extreme differences that present themselves in comparing the domestic with the export freight rate. The extreme is so great that it looks almost as if some error had been made in making up the freight rate structure.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. MacDonald, Cape Breton South): His Honour the Speaker will be absent for a short time and has asked me to take the chair. I ask the indulgence of the house.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was about to discuss the differences between the export and domestic freight rates as applied to certain grain movements. On shipments from North Battleford to Vancouver the export rate on wheat is 14·4 cents per bushel while the domestic rate is 30 cents; in other words, the export rate is 15·6 cents per bushel less than the domestic. On oats from the same point the export rate is 8·1 cents per bushel and the domestic rate, 17 cents per bushel, a difference of 8·9 cents per bushel. Following this shipment through to Shanghai and allowing for all intervening charges such as handling and ocean freight, it works out that the poultry feeder in Shanghai can secure our feed wheat for 4·85 cents per bushel less than the poultry feeder in British Columbia, and he can secure our oats for nearly 2 cents per bushel less. On shipments of barley from Arcola the export rate is 13·92 cents per bushel and the domestic rate, 25·68 cents, a difference in favour of the export rate of 11·76 cents per bushel. Carrying this shipment of barley through to Shanghai it will be found that the Chinese feeder can secure barley for 2·8 cents per bushel less than the feeder in British Columbia.

Going the other way and taking shipments of grain from the bay ports, it will be found that the export rate is 7·7 cents per bushel on barley and the domestic rate 19·9 cents, an advantage in favour of the export shipper of 12·2 cents. After allowing for all charges such as elevator charges and ocean freight, this barley can be delivered to feeders of live stock in Liverpool at 6.85 cents per bushel cheaper than it can be delivered to feeders in St. John. That seems to be too much of a discrepancy.

Looking at the question from another angle we find that at to-day's price No. 4 C.W. barley is worth 38 cents per bushel at Fort William. The freight rate from Souris, Manitoba, to Fort William is 8·16 cents. The local price at Souris less the elevator charges is 31·84 cents per bushel, and it costs 34·5 cents per bushel in freight and other handling charges to place the grain in the hands of the feeder in the maritimes. The feeder in the maritimes has to pay 31 cents per bushel plus 34·5 cents per bushel in handling charges, making a total of 65 cents per bushel for the barley for which the farmer at Souris receives only 31 cents per bushel.

Let us now consider feed wheat shipped from Arcola, Saskatchewan. At to-day's prices this wheat is worth 45 cents per bushel; the freight to Fort William is 11 cents per bushel, making a value of the grain at Arcola, less elevator and handling charges, 33 cents per bushel. The domestic rate to Vancouver is 25·6 cents per bushel, and the Vancouver poultry feeder has to pay 33·5 cents per bushel plus 25·6 cents for freight, a total of 59·1 cents per bushel for feed wheat for which the farmer at Arcola receives 33 cents. We are trying to establish live stock and poultry industries in Canada and yet we oblige the producers to pay these excessive freight rates. For the life of me I cannot understand a policy which gives a greater advantage to the feeder of bacon hogs in Denmark than is given to the feeder in eastern Canada. Likewise, I cannot understand why an advantage should be given to the poultry raiser in China over and above that given to the poultry raiser in British Columbia.

A few days ago the hon. member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail), speaking on the resolution in connection with the bonus on wheat, said in effect that she would support the principle of paying a bonus to the western farmer if it would keep him out of mixed farming. I should think it would be much more reasonable to adapt our freight rate structure so that an advantage could be given both ways. At the present time if the eastern farmer wants to buy our western feed grain he is obliged to pay more because of the domestic freight rate. If this rate was reduced by, say, five cents per bushel, it would mean that we could produce and deliver that barley at five cents per bushel less, and the advantage would work both ways.

Manitoba, which is one of the older grain producing provinces, is particularly interested in the domestic freight rate structure. On account of the invasion of weeds and the running out of land the farmer in Manitoba has been forced into the growing of coarse grains, and as time goes on he will be compelled to grow a still larger percentage of this class of feed. I think it is only fair to state that Manitoba did not secure the same proportion of the five cent bonus on wheat as did the other western provinces, and consequently we are more interested directly in the reduction of domestic freight rates. More live stock should be fattened in eastern Canada with western grain and the poultry producer of British Columbia should be given an opportunity to produce more of the country's requirements. The climatic conditions alone are sufficient to justify that contention. If these men were given the opportunity of securing our western feed grains at a reasonable rate, I think it would work out to the advantage of all concerned, the railways included.

I cannot understand why we should have a domestic freight rate structure which leaves us in our present position. The poultry raiser in British Columbia has to pay 4.85 cents per bushel more for wheat than does the poultry producer in China; he has to pay 2.8 cents per bushel more for barley and 1.99 cent per bushel more for oats. On an average the European feeder can secure his grains from Canada at 6.85 cents per bushel less than the eastern Canada feeder. Surely this works an injustice and is something that should be rectified in the very near future.

I am very glad that this subject has again been brought to the attention of the house, and I hope that this time some definite action will be taken in respect to it. We are particularly interested in the matter at this time because of the very severe crop conditions which we have had in practically all the western provinces; consequently we do feel that we have an added right to ask for some sort of adjustment in this regard. I therefore have very much pleasure in supporting the resolution.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have listened most of the afternoon to the debate which has taken place on this question, and it has been a most interesting debate from every standpoint, a debate which I think showed moderation and fairness to a large extent, if not completely. Perhaps in a sense, though I do this with no controversial desire, I might except my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), because he seemed to think it very fair that the late government had done nothing for three years after the decision had been given in this case by the Board of Railway Commissioners, either to change that decision or to refer it back to the board, yet he seemed to think it most unfair that this government in less than one year and a half in power should not have settled the whole question. I think that this government has had very much more difficult and serious questions on its hands than had the late government during at least the last three years of its regime, and I think that the government of to-day has had a good deal of reason for being hesitant in undertaking more heavy responsibilities. I should like generally though to compliment all the speakers, particularly the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) who introduced the resolution, and members on both sides of the house by and large, because generally speaking they spoke in a very moderate tone and I believe from their own standpoint were speaking as fairly as any of us would desire them to do.

It seems to me that there were two questions involved in the discussion which followed the resolution. The resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from one point to another point in any one of the said provinces, be substantially reduced.

I think the word "should" ought to have been placed in the resolution. At any rate it is a very general resolution, but my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni and the other members from British Columbia on both sides of the house who addressed themselves to the question were speaking largely from the British Columbia standpoint, and so I say that there were two distinct questions involved in the discussion. There was first the question as to the domestic and export rate on grain to British Columbia, and secondly there was the question of freight rates on grain in general throughout the four western provinces. They are two questions quite distinct, and it was not on the latter question that there was an appeal to the late government from the decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners. The appeal was on the first question, that of domestic and export rates on grain to British Columbia.

May I say at the outset that I sympathize very sincerely with my hon. friends from all parts of the western provinces who were speaking on behalf of the grain growers of those sections, because no one realizes more keenly than the government the serious plight in which the grain growers of the west find themselves. We all realize that they have been very badly hit. The prices of their commodities have gone down to perhaps one-third of what they were a few years ago, and consequently a reduction of one cent a bushel in freight rates is of very great importance to them. On the other hand, the two great railways of this country, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, as everybody in this house knows, have also been very hard hit, and while I do not wish to be construed as opposing the resolution—because I do not feel that I am capable any more than this house in general is capable of passing judicially on the merits of the case—at the same time I feel it my duty as Minister of Railways to point out to the house some of the difficulties of the question. After all, as Minister of Railways I am speaking for the government, but on the other hand, the railways themselves have no representation in the house to express their side of the question, and I feel that in fairness to them I ought to give a few of the arguments, whether I agree with them or not, which the railways put forward on their side. In other words, I am pointing out that there are two sides to this question, and that probably the truth lies in between the two, as it usually does with most questions. Fairness demands, however, that I offer a few of the reasons given by the railways why they do not agree at once to what looks on the face of it to be a very fair demand.

Export rates not only on grain but on all commodities are usually lower in all countries than domestic rates. They are lower because of the advantage which they give to producers and traders in a country to compete with traders in other countries on what somebody has expressed as a free trade basis. They give them an opportunity to compete in outside markets. Our export rates on grain are lower than our domestic rates, but so are our export rates on practically all other commodities. I do not wish to take up time by quoting rates on too many commodities, but I have a statement under my hand of the export rates on very many commodities and in practically every case they are very much lower than the domestic rates. For example, the domestic rate on apples per 100 pounds in carload lots to Halifax is 58 cents, and the export rate is 39½ cents; on automobiles the domestic rate is 119 as opposed to 74; copper, 77½ as opposed to 55; iron and steel, 35 as opposed to 22; newsprint paper, 19½ as opposed to 15; packing house products, 114 as opposed to 93. I pick those out at random merely to illustrate the point which the railways make, that the export rates are lower not only on grain but also on all commodities for the reasons I have just given.

Yet at the same time one feels a good deal of sympathy with the arguments that have been put forward by various speakers in the house this afternoon, because it does not on the face of it seem fair that the export rate on grain, for instance, from Edmonton to Vancouver is 20 cents and the rate from Vancouver to the orient 18½ cents, making a total from Edmonton to the orient of 38½ cents, whereas the domestic rate from Edmonton to Vancouver is 41½ cents, or a difference of 3 cents in favour of the orient. I agree that that does not seem reasonable. On the other hand, some speakers have pointed out that they could ship grain more cheaply, so far as rates are concerned, to Denmark and Great Britain than, for example, to Vancouver.

Mr. CANTLEY: Or to Nova Scotia.

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to deal with Halifax, because I have not the figures at hand, but according to the figures that I have been given I would say Denmark certainly has not any advantage. The export rate from Edmonton to Vancouver is 20 cents, and from Vancouver to Liverpool 22½ cents, making a total of 42½ cents, while the domestic rate is 41½ cents. The difference is slight, but the export rate to England, and I presume to Denmark, although I have not the Denmark rate, is only very little higher than the rate to Vancouver.

Mr. REID: Are the rates which the minister has been quoting for one hundred pounds?

Mr. MANION: Yes, in all the rates I have quoted. While I sympathize with the view of many of the speakers here this afternoon, and while, on the face of it, it does seem foolish that one should be able to ship grain from Edmonton to the orient more cheaply than from Edmonton to Vancouver, at the same time the whole freight rate structure of our country is such a strange, complicated and confusing, patch-work quilt, if one may put it that way, that I do not like to put up myself as a judge. I say frankly that I do not think I, or any other hon. member of the house, after hearing the debate which has taken place, is capable of putting himself up as a judge without at least having the fairness to hear the other side of the question. Therefore I find it difficult to concede that the resolution should be accepted by the house, although I am not dealing at the moment with the disposition hon. members may make of it. At any rate the railways should have a right to present their side of the question.

I think various speakers to-day have given the history of freight rates. So far as British Columbia freight rates are concerned—and I am referring not to the larger issue, but to the domestic freight rates as opposed to export—as has been stated this afternoon the matter has been before the Board of Railway Commissioners, evidence was taken in the years 1926 and 1927, and on August 26, 1927, their decision was handed out. With the exception of Mr. Oliver, who gave a dissenting judgment, the judgment of the railway commissioners was that "no justification could be found for the reduction." I think six or seven commissioners listened to the discussion, and gave a decision with which only Mr. Oliver did not agree.

The same order which gave that decision imposed the Crowsnest rates to Vancouver. Previous to that time the export rates to Vancouver were from 23 cents in 1915 to 35 cents in 1920; by this order they were lowered to 20 cents. After the Board of Railway Commissioners gave their decision an appeal was made to the late government, and hearings were held before that government on October 15, 16 and 17 of 1929. While the election did not take place until July of 1930, the late government gave no decision—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct.

Mr. MANION: If I am wrong I should like to be corrected.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hearing was adjourned from September, 1929, at the request of the province, and was resumed in January, 1930. The House of Commons met on February 20 of that year.

Mr. MANION: At any rate, the late government did hear the case on October 15, 16 and 17. I have no record before me to the effect that the hearing was adjourned, but I do not question the remarks of my hon. friend. However if the government heard the case finally in January, 1930, they had six or seven months in which to give their decision, and yet they gave none. I merely point that out as an historical fact showing that no doubt the late government were in the same position as we are—simply somewhat confused about the merits of the case.

Since we came into power I have on many occasions had this case before me. I sympathize with the statements made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house concerning what would appear to be an unfair condition whereby domestic rates are higher than export rates. I have discussed that question with the heads of the two great transcontinental railway companies in Canada, and have been in conference with men in their traffic departments. I remember on one occasion having an interview with Mr. Stephens of the Canadian Pacific Railway Traffic Department and Mr. Burnap of the Canadian National Railways Traffic Department. Those two gentlemen were in my office regarding this question for an hour or longer on one occasion, and at that time I took the attitude which has been taken by many hon. members to-day to the effect that they might well throw off something from the domestic rate, thereby bringing it into closer alignment with the export rate. I argued that they might build up traffic which does not to-day exist and thereby add business to the railway companies. That was my feeling at that time, and speaking personally I cannot say that I have changed my views. Their reply however was that the export rate is not a fair one. They said, "We did not agree to the export rate; it was imposed upon us by the Board of Railway Commissioners." They claimed that it was a losing rate, and that in any event they could make no money from it. Further they said, "If you wish to approximate these rates the fair thing to do would be to raise the export rate, thereby bringing it closer to the domestic rate, rather than to lower the domestic rate." That is their argument and their side of the question.

They viewed the matter from another angle which I shall now outline. They said, "Suppose we agree to your suggestion"—may I add that the discussion was informal—"Suppose we agree to your suggestion, the next move would be that all the prairie provinces would demand the same lowering of rates we might give to British Columbia. Then would come the maritime provinces who in turn would demand a lowering of their rates. The result would be that a change in the freight rates in one section would promote applications to the railways from the whole country to bring rates into alignment with the lowered scale permitted in one section." There is a great deal of truth in that contention, and I think the discussion I have outlined shows that the railway companies have some grounds for the stand they have taken.

At this time I shall endeavour to give you some of the arguments they put before me, not necessarily in discussion but also by letter and on various occasions when the matter was under consideration. They claimed, first, that any change would affect the whole freight rates structure. Secondly, they said that if we applied the export rate on grain to British Columbia in connection with the domestic grain shipped to that province, and applied the same rate to grain shipped throughout the western provinces, the railways would suffer to the extent of nearly $2,000,000. They said the actual cost to them in 1930 would have been $1,680,000. They take the position that as the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway are not in a good financial condition at the present time they should not be asked to carry any greater load. We who have been following the railroad situation know that their statement of conditions is the correct one.

Further, they say that on the 20 cent export rate from Edmonton or Calgary, for instance, they are actually subsidizing export trade. They have figures to show that the railway companies are now subsidizing exports because they say on the 20 cent rate they are losing money. They pointed out to me that the Seattle export rate is from 31½ cents to 37½ cents as compared with the Canadian rate of 20 cents, the compared rates covering equal distances. In fact, they used those figures as an argument to show that they were giving much lower export rates than were given at Seattle, and that therefore they should be permitted to raise that rate.

They took the further stand—and I am attempting to give their arguments justly and fairly, not necessarily supporting them, because the house has a right to hear both sides of the question—that the Canadian rates on grain are the lowest in the world. They positively and absolutely make that statement, and have stated over and over again, and have presented evidence to prove—some of which I have in my hand—that in the United States the rates are higher for like distances.

For the information of hon. members I should like to review a few of the figures given to me to illustrate their point. From Brandon, Manitoba, to Fort William, a distance of 552 miles the export rate per 100 pounds is 16 cents. From Boyle, North Dakota to Duluth, a distance of 553 miles, the rate is 27 cents. Hon. members will take note that the second rate I have given is nearly twice the amount of the first. From Oklahoma city to Galveston, a distance of 552 miles, the rate is 33 cents. Hon. members will note that the 33 cent rate is more than twice as much as the rate from Brandon to Fort William. Then from Routledge, Manitoba, to Fort William, a distance of 592 miles, the rate is 18 cents; from Elmdale, Kansas, to Chicago, a distance of 589 miles the rate is 33 cents. I ask hon. members to compare that with the 18 cents rate from Routledge to Fort William.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the hon. member quoting domestic rates?

Mr. MANION: No, these are export rates which have been given to me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The minister has been quoting export rates so far as Canada is concerned, but I should like to know if he is not quoting American domestic rates?

Mr. MANION: If the information before me is not correct I have been misinformed and deceived. I can see no reason why they should make their comparison on different bases. I have enough confidence in the people who supplied me with this information to know they would not misinform me, when I am giving their arguments. The heading which appears on the sheet I have before me is as follows:

Statement in letter of January 9 attached; corrected in accordance with letter from Board of Railway Commissioners T. D. 14157, dated February 1, 1932.

I have had the information contained on this sheet checked by some of the officials in my department, and am informed by them that the comparisons are correct. I have no desire whatever to misinform the house. I should very much resent being supplied with information prepared on different bases.

Mr. VALLANCE: I know the minister wishes to be fair; I should like to ask him a question. Has the minister a comparison of domestic and export freight rates in the United States and Canada?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I have that exact information. The broad general statement is made however that the export rates in the United States are higher than they are in Canada. The exception is made that the export rates on the Atlantic coast are exactly in the same position as the export rates in Canada in that particular area. But on the west coast they claim the export rates from Seattle are much higher than the export rates from Vancouver. A moment ago I gave the rates from Seattle as compared with those from Vancouver. On the Atlantic coast they claim—and I think rightly so; I remember the rates very well because I had occasion to study them when dealing with the Halifax question—the rates from the American Atlantic ports are on exactly the same basis as from St. John and Halifax. These are the comparisons for like distances on the same basis.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Those are internal rates. My hon. friend is quite correct about the Seattle rate.

Mr. MANION: They are both on exactly the same basis, whether internal or export.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the hon. minister is quoting export rates to Fort William.

Mr. MANION: No, the matter would be deceptive from their standpoint if I quoted the rates on two bases. From Billings, Montana, to Duluth, 899 miles, the rate is 39½ cents per hundred pounds; from Herbert, Saskatchewan to Fort William, 899.8 miles, practically the same distance, the rate is 22 cents per hundred pounds, while from the same point to Vancouver, 993.4 miles, the rate is 24 cents per hundred pounds. From Billings, Montana, to Seattle, 1,012 miles, the rate is 33½ cents per hundred pounds; from Uren, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver, 1,016.8 miles, the rate is 25 cents per hundred pounds. From Poplar, Montana, to Seattle, 1,094 miles the rate is 46 cents per hundred pounds; from Belle Plaine, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver, 1,093 miles, the rate is 26 cents per hundred pounds—hardly more than half. From Coutts, Alberta, to Fort William, 1,253.3 miles, the rate is 26 cents per hundred pounds. Those are the rates given to me, and I am putting them on record in justice to the railways, because I believe they have a right to show their side of the question.

Some time ago Sir Henry Thornton handed me another statement in relation to freight rates in general—it was prepared for him by the Bureau of Economics—in which he claims that from 1923 to 1930 inclusive if the freight rates in Canada were as high as the freight rates in the United States their earnings would have been greater by from fourteen and a half million dollars in 1926 to twenty-six and a half million dollars in the peak year, 1928.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is that on grain alone?

Mr. MANION: Yes, on grain and grain products.

Mr. DONNELLY: Have you any domestic rates on grain in the states of Montana and Dakota which you can compare with the domestic rates in Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. MANION: No, I have not.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is what this question is.

Mr. MANION: No, it deals with two distinct questions—with the export rates from Vancouver, versus the domestic rates to Vancouver, and with rates in the western provinces on grain.

Mr. BROWN: We can only have a fair comparison of freight rates in general if we know the domestic rates in the United States as well as the export rates.

Mr. MANION: I do not carry the whole rate structure in my pocket. I am not trying to make out a case against this resolution; I am simply stating the railways' side. I have no personal interest in the matter any more than have my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The domestic rate is higher in the United States.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) agrees that the domestic rate is higher in the United States than in Canada. That is what the railways claim in a general way, that all the domestic rates in the United States are higher than those in Canada. The figures I have given are the export rates on grain and grain products.

Mr. REID: I have the domestic freight rates from points in Montana to the Pacific coast states and they are much higher than from points in Alberta to British Columbia.

Mr. MANION: That agrees exactly with what I said.

Mr. REID: They are lower in the United States, I mean.

Mr. MANION: No, my hon. friend said higher a moment ago, and the railways take the stand that they are higher. My hon. friend had an opportunity to deal with the matter before six o'clock, and I do not wish to argue on something with respect to which I have not the statistics. My hon. friend may have an opportunity of putting his figures before the house later. I simply wish to state on behalf of the railways that at least before coming to a decision the house should have both sides of the question presented to it. The railways give the comparative per ton mile rate for grain and other commodities, and they show that the rates on grain are less than half the rates on other commodities. Of course, that takes in package freight and all that sort of thing. Perhaps it is not a point of any great importance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the railways claim that the rates are much lower in Canada than in the United States, and they feel that in view of their financial condition—and everybody here knows it to be somewhat serious—they should not be asked to absorb any greater loss than they are absorbing at the present time. May I point out, for example, that the Canadian National Railways for January and February have not been making their operating expenses. As they express it, they are "in the red," which is a very serious situation for any railway to be in. The other railway may not be in that condition, but it is also losing revenue heavily. The revenues of both roads have been going down very markedly this year even compared with last year. They claim, with some justification I think, that they should not be asked to take a further cut in freight rates without good cause. They point out that freight rates in the United States have not been lowered, but that on the contrary, recently the Interstate Commerce Commission granted increased rates on a number of commodities in an effort to put the railways of the United States in a better financial position.

There is one other point. An hon. member speaking to-day compared the export rate via British Columbia with the export rate from Fort William to Montreal and pointed out the differential was greater in the former case. I do not question that at all. It must not be forgotten that the rate from Fort William to Montreal is kept down by water competition, and consequently is bound to be lower than the rate in a section where there is no water competition.

It does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, nor do I think it does to my hon. friends who have argued this question, that either the government or the parliament of Canada is a rate making body. We have not the facilities to deal with such a complicated question. Surely the House of Commons has fewer facilities than has the government, because one side of the question has been presented here to-day, and unless I had chosen to give some of the arguments of the railways which they have passed on to me—and I have given them without necessarily claiming that they should be accepted—there would have been only one side of the question before the house. The House of Commons is not a rate making body, neither do I think the government of Canada is a rate making body. I remember reading a speech by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in which he pointed out that it was doubtful if there should be an appeal to the governor in council from judgments of the railway commission with respect to freight rates. I think there is sound justification for that position. The Board of Railway Commissioners is a judicial body created for the purpose of dealing with freight rates. On the whole I think the railway commission is an excellent body. It gives its full time to questions of freight rates, and, generally speaking, it should be able to give reasonable satisfaction to the various sections of the country with respect to the general rate structure.

In view of this, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle, who so eloquently presented his motion to the house, and those on both sides who have so ably supported him, should realize that they have explained their case very thoroughly to the government and that the government is seized of its importance. I think I can say to the house that within a reasonable time the appeal will be disposed of by the government in some way that at least will be fair with regard to the merits of the case. I can assure not only the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, but also the other hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house, who have taken a strong attitude on this question, that the government will give deep consideration to the matter, and I believe that as far as the government is concerned the question will be disposed of in the near future.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think all members of the house, without regard to where they sit, will commend the statement just made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). Apart from the somewhat remarkable and indelicate subtlety with which the resolution of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was supplanted on the order paper by the resolution now under consideration, I think this debate has been carried on quite free from political considerations. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and also my good friend from Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) upon the way in which they conducted this debate; with regard to the contribution of my hon. friend from Fraser Valley this afternoon, it was in very marked and I might even say remarkable contrast to his contribution last year during a somewhat similar debate in this house.

I wish to correct just one observation made by the Minister of Railways, in regard to the progress of negotiations under the late administration. The hon. member for Fraser Valley very properly said this afternoon that this or a similar resolution has been debated for five or six years in this house, and my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has made some very comprehensive contributions to the discussion. I think, sir, all members of this house should congratulate my hon. friend from New Westminster upon the remarkably exhaustive and comprehensive contribution he made, not only this afternoon but a year ago as well; he made a complete analysis of the situation.

As my hon. friend the Minister of Railways said quite properly, there are two considerations which should be analysed in discussing this matter. In the first place there is a marked and a proper grievance on the part of the dairymen and the poultry raisers, speaking particularly of British Columbia, because of the differential between the export and the domestic rates. I think the Minister of Railways is quite correct in stating that in the main domestic rates are higher in the United States than they are in the Dominion of Canada, but I believe my hon. friend will find that the differential between the domestic rate and the export rate is not as great in the United States. That is the specific complaint in British Columbia, that the differential between 20 cents and 41½ cents is far too great. A government such as we have to-day, with its Canada first policy—I am not taiking politically, but rather in regard to the foundations of a tariff structure—surely should condemn a policy which makes it possible to export Canadian grain to China and Japan, permitting them to enter the $50,000,000 British market and sell their eggs at lower prices than the Canadian poultrymen. It seems to me there is something wrong.

I quite agree that there are two sides to this question; there is the larger, national side to it, and I am not unmindful of the fact that to-day in this country there is a large body of opinion holding the view that it is necessary, in order to maintain the vitality and the permanence of our railways, that there should be a general increase in freight rates all over the country. I am somewhat affrighted lest the deliberations now under way in Canada in regard to our railway structure and our railway financial condition may imperil even the Crowsnest pass agreement, which has given great relief and opened up many avenues of progress to western Canada. In the main, sir, considering the present financial stringency and economic depression in every province of Canada, I think we may be exceedingly fortunate if we are able to maintain the freight rate structure on its present basis, remembering the tremendous railway problem confronting us as a nation. At the same time, if there is to be a general increase in freight rates in order to keep our railways in existence, I do not know that the Canadian people would object so very much, but I do think that every intelligent opinion is properly directed against inequality as between one section and another with regard to the freight rate structure. For a number of years our people in British Columbia, have felt this differential very keenly; as I said last year, it is a matter of life and death to the poultry raisers and the dairymen of the Fraser valley, so we on this side appreciate the very fair and conciliatory attitude of the Minister of Railways this evening.

May I further point out to my hon. friend that the decision given in August, 1927, by the Board of Railway Commissioners, on the application made in 1926, was not submitted to the previous administration until September, 1929. In that appeal were joined together the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, and at the request of the provinces the appeal was postponed until January of 1930. The session of that year, as those who were here will recall, opened on February 7, so the very consideration adduced by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister during the debate a year ago, that the government could not be expected to hear the appeal while parliament was in session, applied with equal force during the session of 1930. Immediately after that we had an appeal to the country, with all the tumult and turmoil of a general election. So I do not think, sir, any undue blame can be attached to the old administration for being dilatory in hearing this appeal.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, I addressed a request to the Prime Minister, which was referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for New Westminster. My request was for an assurance that after the session was terminated this appeal would be heard without undue delay. That assurance was given and will be found at page 1795 of Hansard for last year. To-night my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has repeated that assurance, and with that assurance I suppose the house must rest content. I think hon. gentlemen opposite will find us on this side fair minded in supporting action along this line. There are two great issues to be considered; there is the question of assisting a wonderful body of people, some of the finest citizens in Canada, and there is also the larger national issue which is now under review by a great quasi-judicial tribunal, so while we are awaiting their decision perhaps this particular question is not possible of immediate solution.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I should like to make clear to the hon. gentleman that discussions did take place with the representatives of the provinces having in view the fixing of a date for the hearing of the appeal, but a combination of circumstances, all of which I have never been able fully to understand, made it impossible to fix a date satisfactory to all. Recently we again instituted some inquiries, but I cannot explain it further than that. I do not know just what discussion did take place with the representatives of the various provinces, but at any rate the action we took did not result in a hearing being held.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, until I had the pleasure of listening to the remarks of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion). When I occupied a seat on the other side of the house two or three years ago I directed the attention of the house to this question, and my attitude has not been altered in the slightest degree by the fact that I now occupy a seat on this side.

What I want to point out to the house is how the unfairness of the freight rate structure as regards the movement of flour and meal from the western provinces to the maritimes affects us in the maritime provinces. The minister was good enough to say that the domestic rate to Halifax on flour and meal was 57 cents per hundred pounds while the export rate was 35½ cents per hundred pounds. That is equivalent to a difference of practically 43 cents a barrel as against the maritime provinces and in favour of the export trade. In fact, we are bonusing our competitors in Europe at the rate of about 43 cents a barrel on flour and meal. In the maritime provinces we consume annually over a million barrels of flour and meal, so that we are overtaxed annually on freight rates nearly $450,000. That has been going on for some considerable time. The railways say that unless they meet that rate the business will go to New York. I should like to point out that the whole Atlantic freight structure is a matter of negotiation between the several shipping companies engaged in the transatlantic trade, and if our friends who are putting boats on from Halifax wished to make an arrangement so far as the Atlantic traffic is concerned, they could do so. Why they have not done so, I do not know, but they are not likely to do so as long as the railways of this country are prepared to give them the export freight rates they have been giving them in the past.

That is a condition of affairs which I think the whole house will admit is grossly unfair so far as the maritime provinces are concerned, and while I am a member of the house, I shall not remain silent in regard to the matter. In effect we are bonusing our competitors in Germany and other parts of the continent engaged in the production of iron and steel to the extent of over 40 cents a barrel on an essential article of food for our own work people, our coal miners and steel workers. Surely there is some way in which this matter can be rectified, and until that is done, while I am sympathetic, so far as our two railways are concerned, I shall tell the minister that the existing rate structure constitutes a grievance against which we must protest. It is unfair, unnecessary and uncalled for, and I hope the minister will take the matter into serious consideration and see that it is rectified within a reasonable time. I know that he is sympathetic, and I rely on his giving as soon as possible his best consideration to the grievance we complain of.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I too feel compelled to support the resolution so ably presented to the house by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) and supported by hon. members on both sides. The debate has very clearly demonstrated three facts: first, that the farmers are very anxious to sell their grain to the poultry raisers and dairymen of British Columbia; second, that the dairymen and poultry raisers of that province are very anxious to buy that grain, and, third, that the cost of transportation from the prairie provinces to British Columbia is altogether too high, the domestic rate being exorbitant as compared with the rate for export.

It seems as though it must be hard indeed to justify a rate of $8 a ton from the prairie provinces to Vancouver when the rate to Japan is only $7 per ton. I shall say only a few words; I rise simply to support the resolution and at the same time to supplement information given by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) with regard to the domestic rate across the border on grain going west.

I have before me the British Columbia Cooperator for the month of November, 1931, and I notice it gives the rates from points in the United States to the west coast and from comparable points on our side of the line also to the Pacific coast. These rates are as follows:

	Miles	Domestic Cents
From Radnor, Alberta, to Vancouver	608	41
From Kalispell, Montana, to Seattle	607	30
From Indus, Alberta, to Vancouver	659	41½
From Missoula, Montana, to Seattle	656	27
From Ernfolk, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver	1,000	50
From Laurel, Montana, to Seattle	996	37½
From Chaplin, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver	1,012	50
From Billings, Montana, to Seattle	1,012	38
From Pasqua, Saskatchewan, to Vancouver	1,074	50½
From Judith Gap, Montana, to Seattle	1,088	37½

From these figures it will be noted that the rate on the other side of the line is about three-quarters of the rate on this side. I have an idea that if the rates were reduced on this side so as to make the domestic rate comparable with the export rate, a great benefit would ensue not only to the poultry raisers and dairymen of British Columbia, and the farmers of the prairie provinces, but also, because of increased haulage, to the railways themselves.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to agree to a very large extent with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) when he says that in general rate making is a question for the Board of Railway Commissioners. Whether we get the best results from them or not, the fact is that in the main parliament has entrusted to their hands the question of rate making. On August 26, 1927, they came to a conclusion with regard to a portion if not all of this particular resolution, from which decision the three western provinces and the United Farmers of British Columbia, whose headquarters are in the Fraser river valley, have appealed. That appeal has not been brought on for hearing since the present government took office, and if the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) will dig into the facts with regard to the delay in the hearing, I think he will find that the federal government is not very much to blame with regard to the matter. The hearing before the previous government took place in part in the fall of 1929. The final argument before the previous government was not in the latter part of January, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) stated. Of course he wanted to get fairly close to the time when the session met. To be exact, the final argument took place on the 16th and 17th of January, 1930. No decision, however, was reached.

While I say I am in agreement to quite an extent with the contention that rate making should be in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners, nevertheless parliament has two functions. It has a legislative function whereby it can, if it so desires pass legislation which ties the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That was done in the session of 1925 with respect to the question of the Crowsnest rates on grain and flour moving eastward, and by order in council P.C. 886 it was directed that freight rates eastward and westward should be equalized. That was why the export rate to Vancouver was reduced to 20 cents. But while parliament has a legislative function, it has also an educative function. Surely parliament should at least lead public opinion. Public opinion is to some extent moulded by the debates which take place in this house, and public opinion has an effect upon railways.

I listened with much interest to the figures given this afternoon by the Minister of Railways and Canals, but I confess that I have not as much confidence in figures supplied by the railway companies as I once had. At one time it was stated on no less an authority than Sir Henry Thornton that wheat could be shipped by barge from the Canadian National Railways terminal on the western coast to Victoria for not more than $8 per carload. Application was made to the Board of Railway Commissioners that the Canadian Pacific Railway be ordered to provide a rate from Victoria to Vancouver, and this company, through the use of the amazing experts it has to figure out costs, succeeded in proving to the commission that it could not be done for less than $30 per car. I think something like that must have occurred when they figured out the domestic rate from Edmonton to the coast at 41 cents, and claimed that that was the lowest possible rate which could be maintained.

The poultry and cattle industries on the lower Vancouver mainland and on Vancouver island are very important. The poultryman in British Columbia must compete with the poultryman in the Montreal district. During a hearing before the Board of Railway Commissioners on various points, one of the railway commissioners stated that the consumer of grain and flour in Vancouver, and the dairy farmer, the live stock feeder and the poultryman in the territory contiguous to Vancouver, pay 372 per cent more than the consumer of grain and flour in Montreal, or the dairy farmer, the live stock feeder and the poultryman in the territory contiguous to Montreal, in transportation costs on grain and flour produced in western Canada. The distance from Fort William to Montreal is 997 miles while the distance from Calgary to Vancouver is only 642. The western poultryman is therefore under a considerable handicap as compared with his Montreal competitor, and possibly something should be done. However, if the reduction of this rate is going to cause a tremendous loss to the railroads; if it means that either the railroad companies or the poultrymen on the lower Vancouver mainland will have to go under, I would prefer to save the railroads.

The arguments now being used against this reduction were used in 1927, 1928 and 1929 when the railroads were able to obtain plenty of freight. To-day transportation conditions are not as good, but if they improved the railroads would still use the same arguments. It is worthy of note that when the railroads chose to reduce their passenger rate between Ottawa and Montreal they increased vastly the traffic between those two cities. The traffic was there but it was not moving because the transportation cost was too high, but when the fare was reduced to a very marked extent the railroads were able to obtain many passengers and make more money than they had made at the higher rate. The consumer in British Columbia is obtaining his wheat and flour from Australia rather than from Alberta, in my opinion because the freight rates between Alberta and British Columbia are prohibitive. If the railroads could see their way clear to lower these rates to some extent they would induce traffic to move which would be much more advantageous than no traffic at all. The railroads might begin to make a little money instead of not making any. They have idle rolling stock, they have idle engines, they have idle men; the overhead still goes on but there is no traffic in grain and flour because the rate is prohibitive. If their costs are figured on the same basis as when the rolling stock was busy, they might have an argument, but I submit they would be much better off to be using their rolling stock than to allow it to stand idle and rust on the tracks. Other businesses find that it pays to keep their plants moving even if they make little or no profit.

If grain could move from the prairies to Vancouver and to Vancouver island there is no question that the live stock and poultry industries would be built up much more rapidly than is now the case. By giving these industries a chance to live the railroads would increase their traffic and as they increased their traffic they would increase their profits.

There is another point to be considered in connection with this reduction. This resolution asks that the domestic rate be substantially reduced while, if I remember aright, the resolution moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was of a different nature. This resolution covers more ground and is different in character. The hon. member's resolution suggested that the export and domestic rates on grain moving from the prairies to the coast should be the same, but that request is contrary to the desire of the three western provinces and the United Farmers of British Columbia. There is a reason for that. The export rate on wheat does not apply to wheat exported through Vancouver or Victoria to the United States; any wheat travelling through these points to Seattle has to pay the domestic rate. If the domestic rate is made to equal the export rate it is feared that our hard wheat would then move to Seattle to be milled, exactly as it is moving to Buffalo. The result would be that the by-products from such milling would be available for American stock and not for the feeding of stock on Vancouver island and on the Vancouver lower mainland. We would then be assisting in building up competition in the United States against our own producers. Without our hard wheat the United States could not make a flour to compete with Canadian flour, yet we supply them at Buffalo with our wheat to enable them to make flour to undersell our flour on the markets of the world. We do not want a repetition of that on the Pacific coast, and for that reason the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan and the United Farmers of British Columbia, in the case they have laid before the governor in council, have asked that the domestic and export rates be not necessarily the same but be brought closer together, taking into consideration the desirability of maintaining the advantage of milling in Canada as against milling in the United States. There is a difference of opinion as to what the differential should be, but I do not think it is more than ten cents in any case. It is felt that if the domestic rate was reduced to 30 cents that differential would be ample to ensure the milling of our flour either at the coast or on the prairie provinces.

My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) was a little astray with regard to what happened as to the first decision on domestic freight rates. That decision was afterwards rescinded. On September 2, 1925, there was a general order—in the middle of the election, one of my colleagues suggests—made by either two or three of the members of the Board of Railway Commissioners, equalizing freight rates east and west and equalizing, to some extent, the domestic and export rates; but in the meantime, after this had been referred to the board, only a part of whom had heard the application, another general order had been made by the government, this famous P.C. 886 in which a general inquiry into freight rates was ordered. Now as soon as the decision of September 2, 1925, was arrived at after a hearing by a part of the board, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company applied to the complete board to rescind the order, and on the application to rescind, as my hon. friend from New Westminster said, three members of the board were in favour of rescinding and three in favour of the order. But the application to rescind did not fail, as my hon. friend said, and the order of September 2, 1925, was not confirmed, as my hon. friend said, but the six commissioners agreed that the matter would be reviewed again as a part of the general freight rate inquiry. That is what happened at that particular time.

When the general freight rate inquiry came on the decision was arrived at in the autumn of 1927. The united board dismissed the application to make the domestic rate the same as the export rate and left it at 41 cents per one hundred. It was from that decision that the present appeal was taken and is before the government at the present time.

There is one particular in which a lower rate would be of very great advantage to the northern parts of Alberta and Saskatchewan in particular—probably to southern Alberta more than to southern Saskatchewan and not so much to southern Alberta as to the northern part—and that is with regard to the movement westward of low grade grains, below contract grades. Owing to weather conditions the north is likely to have a greater share of off-grade grains than the south, and the market for these grades, especially since mixing with the higher grades has been abolished, has become a difficult proposition. If there was some way of providing a special rate so that the low grade grains could be carried back and forth through the provinces and from northern Alberta to Vancouver and Vancouver island, it would be a great relief to the farmers of northern Alberta in particular, and to the feeders of grain in the southern part of British Columbia.

In connection with the rates on grain there is this to be observed. The present so-called Crowsnest rates on grain and flour are now statutory. They were statutory for many years as a matter of agreement between the railway and the crown, confirmed by statute, and maintained until suspended in 1919. That suspension was lifted in 1925, but instead of restoring the Crowsnest rates in toto the act, being chapter 52 of the statutes of 1925, gave the board the power to fix rates and enforce a reasonable rate structure. That abrogated the Crowsnest pass agreement and the Crowsnest pass rates. The Crowsnest pass agreement covered some twelve different articles, and by that act of 1925, while we did succeed in getting the Crowsnest pass rates on grain and flour established as maximum rates on those two commodities, we lost the benefit of the Crowsnest pass agreement on every one of the ten other commodities covered in the agreement. If my hon. friends opposite would examine the effect of that on the price of farm machinery and the price of lumber in western Canada, they would be doing a much better service to their constituents than by trying to make out that reductions in the tariff in farm machinery have reduced the price, because the price of farm machinery was never reduced by the Liberal government during all the years between 1921 and 1930. In fact the price of farm machinery was higher in Canada the day they went out of office than the day they came in, in spite of the fact that the tariff was reduced and in spite of the fact that the whole sales tax was taken off —and maybe because of that fact rather than in spite of it.

I might remind the members of the house, Mr. Speaker, that the west has not entirely forgotten that they have lost the benefit of the Crowsnest pass agreement on everything but grain and flour, and some day when times are a little better and the railways, under the direction and guidance of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, become more prosperous than they are at the present moment, we are coming back to the board to see what we can do in that regard.

Mr. RALSTON: While on the Crowsnest pass agreement, will my hon. friend permit me to remind him that while the Crowsnest pass rate was lost on some commodities, at the same time it was made to apply to all stations on all lines, whereas previously it applied to only a very few stations?

Mr. BROWN: Every Conservative in the house opposed the restoration of the Crowsnest pass agreement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was part of the bargain with the Progressives in 1925. That is why you are over there.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friends will not take the debate out of my hands, I will agree with my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) that the maximum rates were applied to all the railways while the railways had contended that they applied only to the railways in existence at the time of the agreement.

Mr. RALSTON: And applied at all points.

Mr. TURNBULL: And at all points. Between 1903 and 1919, not one bushel of grain travelled on Crowsnest pass rates but at three cents a hundred less than Crowsnest pass rates. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) said two cents. Perhaps he will allow me to say that the rate to-day from Winnipeg to Fort William is 14 cents per hundred, and from 1903 to 1919, the rate was 11 cents.

Mr. RALSTON: All the harder on the maritimes.

Mr. TURNBULL: That may be all the harder on the maritimes. That was by reason of the legislation passed by my hon. friends in 1925. Some day we are coming back for that three cents per hundred as well.

The west is under particular difficulties in regard to freight rates, particularly my own part of the country. I have watched the freight rate structure for some years, and rightly or wrongly I have come to the conclusion that there is an underlying principle with regard to the fixing of freight rates. The principle I saw established in regard to freight rates was the principle first established by the railways themselves, and confirmed more or less by the Board of Railway Commissioners as applied to the rates in force when the board was appointed. As I see it, the idea of the railways was to move the farm products of western Canada into eastern markets at as low a rate as they reasonably could, and as a result the freight rates on farm products travelling eastward were lower than the freight rates on farm products travelling westward. I do not know how that affected the maritime provinces. On the other hand, the rates westward on manufactured goods and building materials were lower than the rates eastward, and to-day manufactured goods can still be shipped westward more cheaply than eastward, which is a great handicap to the development of the manufacturing industry in western Canada. On those principles the railway rates were established. Then when my hon. friend the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) attempted to establish a port at Vancouver and have an elevator built at Vancouver harbour, which my hon. friends for many years called "Stevens' folly," the fight began to get a freight rate which would make it possible to move the grain westward to Vancouver. That is where the fight for an equalization of freight rates westward began. That fight has continued down to the present day with some success, but perhaps not with success as complete as it might have been. We have still the mountain differential to fight with; there is the difference of 15 per cent. I think the Board of Railway Commissioners have found that freight can be moved west as cheaply as it can be moved east. There are still more than 120 miles to pay for which do not exist between Calgary and Vancouver owing to the longer haul between Edmonton and Vancouver. All these years, since there has been a harbour at Vancouver, the battle has been on to secure an equalization of freight rates westward. It has been conducted mostly in the interests of the elevator companies and the farmers who sold wheat to elevator companies for export. The result of the battle has been that export rates from time to time have been reduced by the railway commissioners, either under direction of parliament, or without direction of that body. However, the domestic movement was comparatively small, and while the export movement was reduced the domestic remained stationary at the old high level which was established before the Board of Railway Commissioners came into being. That to my mind is the reason—and I am speaking more in argument than from figures—why there is such a spread between export and domestic rates from Alberta to the Pacific coast. While that may be a matter for the Board of Railway Commissioners to decide, the fact is that that body has made a decision, and has decided against any reduction in domestic freight rates west. So that if the governor in council, when this matter comes before them, decide to refer it back to the Board of Railway Commissioners, they will be faced with the necessity of sending it back with some direction, because since the board has already decided against the western provinces there is very little use sending it back to them to make a further decision unless some direction is given that they decide more favourably than they did the last time.

There seems to be evidence to show that it is in the interests of the country that such action be taken. After all there have been occasions in days gone by when parliament exercised that right, when they found it in the interests of the people generally to lay down a policy for the Board of Railway Commissioners to follow; because after all parliament is supreme. It could direct by statute that the Board of Railway Commissioners follow certain principles. If parliament chose to say to the Board of Railway Commissioners that in the opinion of hon. members assembled, domestic freight rates are too high, and that in the interests of the Dominion of Canada and of the railways that rate could be reduced, although I am not an experienced parliamentarian, my own poor opinion would be that parliament would be justified in laying down such legislation. I am not saying such a right is one which should be exercised on all occasions; it should be exercised only with the greatest hesitation and the greatest care, because after all, the striking of freight rates is a very intricate problem. It is a matter to be settled not by a court of 245 persons, but rather, as the Minister of Railways has said, by a very much smaller court which could have the advantage of hearing both sides of the question.

For the life of me I cannot understand why the domestic freight rate cannot be lowered to the advantage of both the railway companies and the industries in the Fraser valley to which my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) is so partial. In addition the industries on Vancouver island, to which he has not made reference, would benefit, as would the farmers in the prairie provinces. I am told that every week about 300 empty railroad cars are carried from the mainland to Vancouver island, and that in those cars products of Vancouver island are brought back to the mainland. I cannot see why the railroads would be under any great expense if they were to put wheat in those cars; it could be taken to Vancouver island with very little added cost. If such traffic were encouraged it would become extensive enough so that the cars might be taken over full instead of empty. It seems to me that if the matter is properly put before the railway companies—as I hope it will be—in the course of time, with public opinion behind us, we may reach a solution satisfactory to all concerned.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this discussion, until I heard the remarks of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). First of all may I deal with the statements made by the hon. member for Regina to the effect that the resolution now under discussion proposed by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) is entirely different from that proposed by my good friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid). May I be permitted to read the resolution as presented by the hon. member for New Westminster:

That, in the opinion of this house, it is expedient that the freight rates on grain and grain products destined to points in British Columbia from the prairie provinces of Canada be carried by the railways at the same rate as grain and grain products for export to other countries.

May I say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, however, that I am really more pleased to support his motion. What does it say?

That, in the opinion of this house, the domestic freight rate on grain and grain products moving from any point in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, to a point in any of the said provinces, or from one point to another point in any one of the said provinces, be substantially reduced.

I think those of us who are farming in any of the four western provinces will receive greater benefit from the resolution presented by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle than from the one presented by the hon. member for New Westminster. Under that resolution it would be possible for a farmer in the northern part of Saskatchewan to ship low grade wheat, or any wheat for that matter, to the southern part of the province, and receive the export rate thereon. I am all for it.

The Minister of Railways made comparisons of the rates on other commodities moving in Canada, both for domestic and export purposes. I took down the figures, and although I did not manage to get his facts concerning all commodities, I did get the information concerning the transportation of apples both for domestic and export use. He said that apples for domestic purposes carried a freight rate of 58 cents, and for export 39 cents. I should like to point out to the minister that there is only about 19 cents difference between the export and domestic rates. However, in a distance of 1,015.3 miles from North Battleford to Vancouver the rate for export is 24 cents per 100 pounds, or 14.40 cents per bushel on wheat. For domestic purposes the rate is 50 cents per 100 pounds or over 100 per cent more for domestic than for export.

Mr. MANION: What is the export rate?

Mr. VALLANCE: Twenty-four cents per 100 pounds, and the domestic is 50 cents, a difference of more than 100 per cent. Therefore the figures placed on Hansard to-night by the minister will make the farmers in the three prairie provinces, if I know them at all, just that much more anxious to put up a barrage to see if this wrong cannot be righted.

Mr. MANION: I gave the figures only to show that there was a difference in the export rates on other goods as well as on wheat. I was not defending the situation.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, I understand that. I am merely showing the difference between the export and the domestic rates. The other day we had a spectacle—and I use the word advisedly—of a cargo of wheat, 250 tons, coming from Australia to Vancouver which was not permitted to land because of disease. If it is possible for Australia to ship wheat to Vancouver and sell it to the poultrymen of that province cheaper than it can be secured from Alberta or Saskatchewan, I think it is time something was done. It was good feed wheat, outside of the disease which prevented it from entering.

Might we not look forward to a discussion of interimperial and preferential trade at the forthcoming Imperial economic conference? Would it not be possible for Australia, India or any other portion of the empire to ship wheat into Vancouver harbour cheaper than it can be secured from the prairie provinces, until these rates are rectified?

I have risen, Mr. Speaker, merely to point out these facts. I have before me a statement of the differences between the export and domestic rates on many commodities, but I think if you go through the schedules you will find that nowhere is there such a disparity as that which exists on the rate on feeds that we export to Vancouver.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution has been presented in such detail and with such a wealth of argument by the mover and those who have spoken in his support as to render it unnecessary for me to deal with it other than briefly. It is, however, I think extremely desirable that someone from the province of Alberta should at least express an opinion, and a very decided opinion, as representing the sentiments of that province.

As has been stated by other speakers, this matter in its present or a somewhat similar form has been before the house for some eight or ten years. During all that time this grievance, as we term it, has existed, not always in the same proportions as now, but still it has existed, and I believe that almost every session during that period although it has been very fully discussed nothing has been done. In a word, the situation has remained unchanged.

As I have intimated, it is not my purpose to go into the subject fully, but it does appear to me that we are in a very anomalous position at the present time. Under our national policies as a parliament and as a government we are doing what we can to encourage not international and foreign trade only, but to develop domestic and interprovincial trade to the greatest possible degree. I am fully in favour of developing to the maximum trade between the component parts of Canada. There are no two parts of the Dominion that offer greater opportunities for an interchange that will be mutually beneficial than do the province of British Columbia on the one hand and the prairie provinces on the other. I have always felt that my own province in particular, Alberta, and the province of British Columbia are complementary and supplementary one to the other to a very marked degree, and that they should to a far greater extent than has been the case during the past years go forward side by side working together in their mutual interest. In this case it is a very great pleasure to me, as it has been to many others in the house, to find a subject upon which we may agree so fully and an end towards which we can work in such complete harmony.

The situation has been laid before the house, a situation under which thousands of farmers within the British Columbia valleys, where the climate and soil are admirably adapted to the most intensive forms of poultry raising, dairy farming and other kindred forms of agriculture, find themselves completely handicapped through the fact that although grown only a few hundred miles away the products of the great grain fields of the prairie provinces are almost inaccessible to them, that they are shut out from the use of those products by a wall greater far as barrier than distance, by a wall more exclusive than oceans and continents, by a wall erected in a wholly arbitrary fashion—a wall of excessive freight rates. On the other hand, the farmers of the prairie provinces, looking westward as their shortest and cheapest route to the markets of Europe and to the great and developing trade in the orient which they visualize as their most hopeful market in the future, are also looking closer home across those mountain barriers beyond which they see thousands of potential and wouldbe customers—customers anxious to purchase their grain products and to exchange their own in return.

This is a situation which I think should not be beyond the intelligence and ability of this house and this government to rectify. It has been stated by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion)—and in a general way I am in agreement with him—that by reason of the characteristics of their make-up neither the house nor the government is the best possible court for deciding a question so technical in its nature as that of freight rates. But on the other hand I conceive that this parliament must be responsible at least for one thing—for the laying down of national policies, and that within the lines of those policies all commissions of a technical character must function. I submit that parliament itself cannot delegate to any other body, especially a body that is not responsible directly to the people, the right to determine what policies shall be followed—policies for which parliament itself must be responsible. As I see it, we confer upon the railway commission power, not to lay down policies for this country, but within the limits set by parliament to look after the details of which the minister spoke. And when we deal with matters of internal trade, matters which must affect intimately the well-being and livelihood of the people of two or more provinces, then we enter a field which is too large to be left wholly to the railway commission or to any other body which we may constitute.

Possibly it is true that the right of appeal to the privy council from decisions of the railway commission should not continue, that such appeals should be heard by the supreme court, the exchequer court or some other tribunal. But so long as the present law continues in force that responsibility rests on the government, and until the law is abrogated that responsibility cannot be evaded by the government. I am not going into the question now as to whether undue delay has taken place on the part of this government or its predecessors. I do suggest, however, that sufficient time has elapsed and that now we may well look to the government for action of one kind or another. Whether it be in the form of a reference back to the railway commission with instructions as to the lines within which they should work and the goal towards which they should strive, or in the direction of designating some other and perhaps more suitable body to do this work, in any case let us put an end to this period of suspense and indicate to the farmers and the other citizens of the provinces interested that within a reasonable time this disability shall as far as possible be removed, and those necessary goods shall go on backward and forward at the least possible cost.

It has been argued, and perhaps with some truth, that the Canadian Pacific Railway faces certain definite geographical handicaps, that it has a heavy mountain grade and that it cannot be reasonably expected to haul tonnage over the mountains at anything like a prairie rate. It might also be said, and has been said, it would be totally unfair to use the comparatively low and easy grade of the Canadian National railways as a weapon with which to coerce the other system. But, Mr. Speaker, let us go back a few years, comparatively speaking, and what do we find? We find that the Canadian Pacific Railway, being first in the field, had ample opportunity and a perfect right to have chosen that low grade had it so desired, but at that time those directing the Canadian Pacific Railway did not see, nor could very many men foretell, the tremendous movement of freight westward which might develop. So, not foreseeing that great movement, their actions would indicate that they naturally expected the factor to which they must look for their greatest profit to be the passenger traffic and, by providing a scenic route over and through our beautiful mountains, they exepected to attract a great tourist traffic and provide themselves with ample profit. Possibly they were quite justified in figuring it in that way, but is it right that the citizens of these provinces should be compelled forever to pay scenic freight rates because, forsooth, thirty or forty years ago the Canadian Pacific built a scenic railway in order to attract tourist traffic? Is it right that we should be forever debarred from the advantages which would naturally accrue from the easy grades which the Canadian National railway now follows? It has been proved and demonstrated, so amply and so frequently as to require no repetition, that following the line of the Canadian National railway westward we find grades that compare favourably with those found in the movement eastward, so the mountain differential is a fantasy, a mere dream, a figment of the imagination, with no actuality in fact. There is no such thing as a mountain grade or a mountain range when going through the Yellowhead pass. Most of us have travelled over that road and we have seen for ourselves. We have seen the number of freight cars a locomotive will haul both east and west, and perhaps it is not necessary to assure you, Mr. Speaker, or to indicate to any hon. member of the house, that the power used to haul a train of cars from the prairies to Fort William is sufficient to haul at least an equal tonnage through the mountain passes.

Under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that our present policies encourage the development of domestic and interprovincial rather than international trade, to a greater degree than ever before it is imperative that we should take action in this matter and make it possible for that interprovincial trade to proceed. It does seem to me that a curious paradox exists. By means of subsidies and tariffs and every possible policy within the grasp of the government of this country we have done our best to encourage this trade as between provinces, and the paradox is that we should longer tolerate a freight rate structure which is indefensible under any circumstances—indeed which no one has endeavoured to defend, except to say that it is necessary to find from some source profits which are not obtained elsewhere. So it is that we compel those who wish to ship their grain within the country to pay for a loss which has been sustained on another part of the system. That is the only argument I have heard, and that argument cannot be sustained morally or logically.

In view of these facts I repeat that this house should indicate its desire to have something done. I was glad to hear the sympathetic expressions which emanated from the Minister of Railways, and I think we should indicate to the railway commission that, leaving to them the settlement of those matters of detail which are within their province, public policy and public necessity alike demand that this matter should be reconsidered in the light of the greatest good to the greatest number, in the light of justice and common sense, and that this curious, archaic anomaly of freight rates should not longer exist. The Minister of Railways said he could discover no specific basis upon which our freight rate structure was built; to a layman like myself, and I may be pardoned for saying in some degree like himself, it is a confused patchwork of rates apparently based on some factor with which we are not acquainted; thrown together, complicated and so complex in its nature that we cannot properly comprehend it. That may be true, Mr. Speaker, but we can comprehend this particular item; we can see here something which should not exist, and therefore I repeat that parliament and the government should indicate very clearly to those charged with the immediate responsibility that this state of affairs must not continue, that they must so arrange our rates that they shall no longer act as an effective barrier against natural interprovincial trade and the proper future development of the western provinces.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I had not intended to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker; I felt that my colleague from Macdonald (Mr. Weir) had well presented the case for Manitoba. I felt also that the discussion had been carried on at a very high level, with no indication of any party bias, and it was not until the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) made his speech and showed that he could not forego the opportunity, as he thought, to make a little cheap political capital, that I thought I should have a word to say.

The hon. member for Regina sought to make a point by urging that those on this side of the house should have remembered that certain things were omitted from the Crowsnest pass agreement when it was restored, instead of giving our attention to reductions in tariff. Perhaps I might briefly review the facts in that regard, and I think I will state those facts in such a way that no person will dispute them.

As the hon. member pointed out, that agreement was suspended in 1919, and the suspension lapsed on July 8, 1922. For the three years following that, the whole matter was in a somewhat unsettled condition, being discussed by the Board of Railway Commissioners and the courts. I need not go into that. But in the session of 1925 the government of the day brought in a resolution restoring in part the Crowsnest pass agreement. If that were the whole story, we might even claim that half a loaf was better than no bread. If the Conservatives of that day had had their way, we would not have had even half a loaf, for during all the discussion from 1921 onward the whole force of the Conservative party in this parliament was arrayed against the restoration of the Crowsnest pass rates. No person will dispute that statement, for Hansard will show it. But I say, when we make that statement we have not told the whole story. The agreement was only partly restored. The contention had been raised that the agreement applied only to that part of the Canadian Pacific railway which was in existence when the original agreement was made. So, when this bill was brought down in 1925 by the government of the day, it is true it abrogated the rates on goods moving west, but it made it clear that the rates on grain and grain products applied not only to that portion of the Canadian Pacific railway which was in existence when the agreement was originally made, but to the whole Canadian Pacific system and to the Canadian National system as well. I can understand now the kind of argument that the hon. member for Regina gives to his electors when he goes through his constituency.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but I cannot allow to go unchallenged the statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown).

Mr. BROWN: I can prove every word of it.

Mr. BEYNON: Well, the Votes and Proceedings will bear out something very different. If the hon. member will take the trouble to refer to the Votes and Proceedings of that date, he will find there a different story entirely. He says that the government of that day brought in a measure restoring in part the Crowsnest pass agreement. It was not necessary for the then government to bring in a bill to restore that agreement; all the government had to do was to sit still and let the agreement go back into force. The hon. member for Lisgar knows that. He ought to know, if he does not, that a committee was appointed, at the instance of the government, to consider the matter. That committee consisted of Conservatives, Liberals and Progressives, the Liberals having more on it than either of the other parties in the house, and the Progressives being the next largest group. In that committee a resolution was proposed to allow the Crowsnest pass agreement to go back into force in its entirety. The committee was equally divided on the resolution and the Liberal chairman gave his casting vote that the agreement should not go back into effect in its entirety. That is borne out by the Votes and Proceedings and everyone in the house is aware of the fact. Yet the Liberals will go throughout the country telling the people: We restored the Crowsnest pass agreement. It did not need any restoration at all; all the then government had to do was to sit still and let it go back into force.

The matter of freight rates is very intricate, and when a layman who has no knowledge of railroading attempts to deal with it, he is naturally going to be met with the statement that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." There is a good deal of justification for that statement as regards the question of dealing with freight rates. Therefore I do not propose to deal with the scientific side of freight rates or to question the arguments put forward by the railway companies, as I do not feel I am in a position to do so. But in connection with freight rates I wish to point out some things that I think might be considered.

We are told in this world to accept things as facts when in reality they are only theories. To illustrate what I mean, when the steam engine was first proposed as a motive power for transportation, the people of England appointed a commission to inquire into the feasibility of using steam on railways for transportation purposes. That commission consisted of very able men, and hon. members might be astonished to know that its report read something like this: that steam as a motive power in transportation might be of some value particularly in the matter of transporting freight, but for anyone to suggest that the travelling public would trust themselves in a railway carriage drawn by a steam locomotive at the ridiculous rate of fifteen miles an hour, was absurd; such a thing would never take place. How far astray that theory was, time has amply proven.

There is another illustration that is perhaps even a little more in point. There was a time when it was believed that penny postage was the most absurd thing in the world. Why, the idea of carrying a letter for two cents was unthinkable! But when penny postage was introduced the volume of mail handled increased at such a rate that after all the post office returns were better at the two cent rate than they had been at the ridiculously high rates formerly charged. When you start to apply that principle to the question of freight rates, in order to be fair to the railways and to everybody else you must acknowledge that another factor enters into the question: that is, that we are living in a country some four thousand miles in extent and a great deal of it very sparsely populated. The question naturally arises: Even if those rates were reduced very materially, is it possible to develop sufficient business? Is sufficient business there, or can it be brought there to make those rates pay? The railways tell us that they have investigated this matter and that their experts tell them it is impossible to make those rates pay; that the business is not there, nor can it be developed. But again I say to the railways: that is, after all, a matter of theory, because it has never been tried. The only way to demonstrate whether, on a reduction of freight rates, sufficient business will develop to make the railways pay on those reduced rates, is to make the experiment. Until that is done we are acting entirely on a basis of theory. I am not prepared even to say that my opinion is that the railways could be made to pay better on that very much reduced rate, but it would be a very useful experiment, and if it should work out, it would be like the penny postage, a great blessing to humanity. We must not presume simply because this theory has stood for so many years that it is a fact. After all it is only a theory.

The question arises as to why the government is not dealing with this. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), who is always very clear and moderate in his statements, has suggested that it is time the government did something. This appeal, however, was brought by the provinces and I do not think they are at the present time very anxious to have it heard. That perhaps is the reason why the government has been unable to get them together. They may not have stated frankly the reason, but I think they do not consider this an opportune time to have the appeal heard. How the government is going to bring the appeal on unless the provinces come forward with their case is something I do not know. The Prime Minister (Mr Bennett) stated that a date was set, but that the provinces stated they were not ready to go on; consequently the appeal was not heard. As the hon. member for Regina has said, unless the government is prepared to give some direction or offer some suggestion there is little advantage to be gained simply by hearing the appeal and sending it back to the railway commission to be retried. That body decided on the evidence placed before it and without a specific direction no doubt would decide again in the same manner.

I think everyone agrees that the railways are in a very difficult position, and it is well known that the people of this country are carrying a great burden in that connection. Any government which attempts to deal with this situation as far as the western provinces are concerned is faced with a very serious problem. I doubt very much if there are many people who, after having this question explained, would be prepared to suggest to the government that it adopt a definite course one way or another. It will be said, of course, that the people are looking to the government for a lead, but I think they can rest assured that the government will take definite steps in this respect. That the rates are entirely out of line would seem evident from the fact that goods can be shipped from Calgary to the orient at a lower rate than they can be shipped to Vancouver.

If I had any objection to the resolution it would be that it does not go far enough. The people in British Columbia grow some splendid fruit which is needed badly in the western provinces. There are occasions when we in the western provinces are hungry for fruit which is rotting in the orchards of British Columbia. Perhaps the railroads will take it into their heads to try the experiment which they have made in the passenger rates between Montreal and Ottawa. However, there is this difficulty: you cannot develop freight over night; it would take some little time and the railroads might get weary of well doing before the results of the reduction in rates would be felt. That the railroads are facing a serious problem I think is apparent to every hon. member in this house. The one encouraging feature of this debate is the fact that hon. members on both sides have recognized the necessity of protecting the railroads to the extent of allowing them to charge a fair rate in order that they may keep going and serve the people of this great country.

I am heartily in favour of the resolution, but I would like to see it go a little further so that we could get the products of British Columbia into the prairie provinces. I am not an expert in freight rates and I am not prepared to say what should be done, but I certainly would like to see an experiment made to test the old theory that a reduction in rates will not produce a sufficient increase in business to justify its being put into effect.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the suggestions offered by various hon. members this afternoon and evening with respect to the differential which should apply in the freight rates through the mountains. May I express some regret that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has extended his resolution to take in the movement of freight within the prairie provinces themselves. One of the difficulties which we experienced as a government was in having an inquiry which had been submitted to the railway commission enlarged in scope when it appeared before us for consideration or on appeal. I think to take one step at a time would be to make progress in the right direction Let us first get settled the question of the differential between the export and domestic rates on grain to British Columbia.

I sympathize somewhat with the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). His is an old grievance one which is comparable with the trouble we are having in Alberta with respect to the rates to British Columbia. I do not see the necessity—nor has this ever been asked, except by resolution—for making the domestic and the export rates comparable, but there should be some paring down of the domestic rates on grain to bring them more in line with the export rates.

I do not intend to traverse the whole field, but may I say that in my opinion parliament is totally unfitted to deal with a matter of this kind. We may express an opinion, but we have not the time or the opportunity to obtain full information with respect to all aspects of the question. May I carry that point a little further and say that despite the fact that it has had an opportunity of hearing both sides of the question discussed, despite the fact that new matter has been interjected into the discussion, the government must find itself in a very difficult position in coming to a decision upon a question as involved as this. I have had the privilege of listening to two or three appeals from the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I am firmly convinced that the government should not be a court of appeal. A question of this kind should be submitted either to the supreme court or to the exchequer court. Coming to a conclusion in connection with freight rates is most difficult; both sides of the question are advanced so strongly, precedents have to be considered, and then there is a possibility of that happening which has happened to-day—a continued extension and widening out of the circle of the application until you finally reach the stage where you do not feel like taking the responsibility of a decision. There must be considered the possibility of jeopardizing the interests of the railroads, one of which is a national undertaking, and of necessity entitled to some protection from the government.

It is very difficult, therefore, for a government to come to a decision upon a question so involved as that of freight rates. I think I am safe in stating that during the time the Liberal party was in office we followed the practice of returning these questions to the railway commission for consideration. Something of that kind could be done with this matter. The commissioners could be instructed to give consideration to the question of the differential between the export and domestic rates on grain going to British Columbia, and I am not unmindful of the fact that perhaps something might be done to solve the problem facing the maritime provinces.

These two questions are similar in every particular. Products are going to the ports of export and in no way do they interfere with the internal rates either in the maritimes, in Quebec and Ontario or the prairie provinces. If these two questions were out of the way and some readjustment made, I think it would go a long way towards the settling of this vexed question which has been agitating the mind of parliament and particularly of the people of Alberta and British Columbia. May I say here and now that I think the government would be wise, if appeals are to be allowed to have the act amended, to have at the earliest possible date those appeals go to the supreme court or the exchequer court.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the suggestions made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) with regard to the responsibility or jurisdiction of parliament in a matter of this character. For parliament as a body to attempt to adjust freight rates or to go into all the details in connection with freight rates is entirely out of the question. My opinion is that for the government itself to act as a court of appeal to hear cases coming from the railway commission and to go into the details of freight rates is also out of the question. But freight rates being what they are, applying as they do to all commodities in Canada that must be transported, often considerable distances, and being so intimately linked up with our export trade, being in a word one of the most important factors affecting the Canadian people, I believe it would be well for parliament to lay down a principle that should apply in determining the differential between the export and domestic rates in all parts of Canada. I might stand here and cite case after case, not so exaggerated perhaps as those that have been cited as between the prairie provinces and Vancouver, but nevertheless showing a very wide spread between the domestic and export rates which it is difficult to understand. It is indeed difficult to understand sometimes why domestic business is penalized as it is, but the problem that must be dealt with is this: the railways must have revenue, and we must treat all classes of industry fairly. We cannot select a particular commodity or a particular locality and apply a principle with respect to it that should not be applied to every other commodity and in every other part of Canada. Having given the matter such consideration as it can give in a debate of this character, and having ascertained the general view of the country in regard to the subject, parliament might well appoint a committee to study the question and hear interested parties in all parts of Canada, with a view to laying down the principle that should be followed in determining the extent of the differential between the export and domestic rates and between the short-haul and long-haul rates. In that way something might be accomplished; but simply to throw the question back to the railway commission without instructions is to invite a decision similar to the one already given.

I do not agree with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who has just spoken, that these questions should be settled one at a time, because when you deal with one particular commodity or one particular locality, you cannot help but discriminate against some other commodity or some other locality. If the railways are to get sufficient revenue to make it possible for them to continue to operate, when the freight rate is reduced on one commodity moving from one particular point to another, it must perhaps be raised on some other commodity, and you are simply taking the burden from one industry and placing it on another. The problem is so vast, the details are so innumerable, the range of country is so wide, the number of commodities that have to be transported is so large, that the question can be adequately dealt with only after an intensive study of all industries and after hearing all interested parties. But the subject might be referred to a committee of this house to report back the principle it thinks should be followed in determining what the differential, if any, should be.

It must also be borne in mind that one of our tremendous problems is to get our export products, particularly of the west, into the world markets on a basis that will enable them to compete. There are many commodities—lumber, for instance, newsprint, pulp, coal in the east and the west—vital to different parts of this country, and in my opinion the only way in which the sense of parliament and of the people can be ascertained is by having the whole subject carefully inquired into by some body which will hear evidence from all parts of Canada and from all classes of people interested. It can then be determined whether it is the general desire to have the differential narrowed, and a principle can be laid down which will guide the commission in working out the details and reaching its decisions.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I cannot very well let this resolution pass without saying a few words on behalf of those whom I have the honour to represent in this house. It is all very well for the people of the west to talk about the disparity in freight rates and ask for substantial reductions on grain and grain products, but I wonder if some of our friends have ever thought of the conditions that now prevail in the province of Quebec, the people of which are suffering at the present time to a greater extent perhaps than those of some of the western provinces. Inequality of freight rates is not justifiable in relation to goods of the same class shipped a similar distance, but this condition does exist in the province of Quebec and is creating a most undesirable situation in various parts of our province. Perhaps it is not known to all the members of this house, but it can be shown that there is charged the sum of $12 to $13 for shipping a cord of fuel wood from the colonization districts to the central markets in our province. That is out of all proportion. It is also out of proportion to charge a rate of $1.08 per one hundred pounds for goods of the first class shipped from Montreal to Montmagny, a distance of 307 miles, when the same class of goods is transported at a rate of 83 cents per one hundred pounds from Galt to Sudbury in the province of Ontario, also a distance of 307 miles. As a result of this disparity in freight rates the traders and shippers of the province of Quebec are called upon to pay in a year over $100,000 more than are the people of the province of Ontario for the movement of goods of the same class over the same distance.

The maritime provinces have special freight rates for their coal. The prairies have special freight rates for their grain, their cattle, and coal from the province of Alberta. Last year parliament voted a bonus to help the distressed farmers of the west in the shipment of their grain to the export market. Ontario has the advantages of its lakes and a rail tariff lower than prevails in the province of Quebec. It is true that the province of Quebec is served by the great and mighty St. Lawrence, but this river does not serve the outlying and remoter parts of the province. It can be affirmed with safety that the province of Quebec has not the same advantages from the point of view of railway rates that are enjoyed by the other provinces in this dominion. The difference in the cost of transportation is particularly high as regards goods shipped from remote districts, such as the Abitibi district and from part of the county which I have the honour to represent in this house. Transportation costs as they affect these two districts, and no doubt other districts in the province of Quebec, are of such a nature as to impose a real hardship on the traders and shippers in those districts, placing them in a very inferior position from the point of view of agriculture, trade and industry, as compared with the other provinces. This is also a serious obstacle to colonization, working against the policy which every government nowadays has in mind, that of keeping our people on the land.

I should not like to see the present proposal adopted unless the same opportunities were given to the province of Quebec as would appear to be offered to other parts of the country by the resolution now before us. Therefore I move, seconded by Mr. Brasset, that the following words be added to the motion:

> and the domestic freight rates in general, now prevailing in the province of Quebec are prohibitive and of a nature to injure agriculture, colonization and industry in general, and should also be substantially reduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Are those words to be added at the end?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, I have moved that these words be added to the resolution.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, before the question is submitted I should like to say a few words, because I believe I have given somewhat more study to the matter than has the hon. member (Mr. Casgrain) who has just resumed his seat. I should like to ask him in what way the maritime provinces secured a special freight rate from the Dominion government or from the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. CASGRAIN: A few years ago there was a readjustment of freight rates, at which time special rates were given and the Canadian National Railways assumed a certain part of the cost of transportation. That additional sum was added to the cost of operation of the railways.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: But for what reason? It would be well for any hon. member standing in his place in the House of Commons to know what he is talking about. What was the reason?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I know the maritime provinces got more than the province of Quebec ever got.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The reason was that there had been imposed on the maritime provinces a 90 per cent increase in freight rates, and for years those provinces laboured under that handicap. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he confer with his colleague to his right, from whom he might receive substantiation for my statement.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, as the discussion on the original motion has been quite exhaustive there is very little left for one to say. The justice of the proposal is so apparent that no further comment is necessary. Two carloads of grain may be shipped from a given point in the prairies to the city of Vancouver. The ultimate destination of one carload may be China, while the other is to be used locally, either in the Fraser valley or in some other part of British Columbia. Although the two cars are coupled to the same train and arrive together in the city of Vancouver, one carries double the freight rate of the other, and really pays a bonus on export. The question whether or not the railway companies can afford to handle the grain at a given rate does not, in my view, enter into the discussion. If they can afford to handle grain at the export rate, then they are charging an exorbitant domestic rate. If they are receiving only a proper domestic rate, then they must be losing on their export trade, and the country, from the public treasury, is bonusing exports. Surely something is wrong one way or another, and the matter ought to be adjusted. We are faced with a condition under which the farmers in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia are consuming the coarse grain produce of the prairies, and are paying more to feed their stock than the farmers in Europe or China. Such conditions should not obtain. We have done a good deal of talking about securing the British market for our bacon, and competing with Denmark. As a matter of fact, we are bonusing the Danish product in the British market by selling grain to the Danish producer cheaper than it is sold to the eastern farmers. Surely such a condition ought to be rectified.

There can be no question that parliament is supreme over all the courts. The railway commission and the courts of law have their respective jurisdictions, but in the last analysis the responsibility rests upon parliament. If the railway commission fails to act, parliament is responsible. A little more than a year ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when visiting the western provinces announced that we would be given the Crowsnest rates on grain to Churchill. There was no question of referring the matter to the railway commission or to a court; the decision was made arbitrarily in the interests of the people and as a matter of plain justice. Moreover, the proposal was approved by the great majority of the Canadian people. Here is another case equally as if not more important, a matter of tremendous interest not only to the producer of coarse grains in the prairie provinces but to the consumers in Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia.

I am not sure what the exact procedure should be. Perhaps the whole question should be referred to a special committee; I do not know. But I believe if such a reference were made, and if a conference were held with the heads of the railway systems, something could be done. At any rate there is no use evading the responsibility resting upon parliament to wipe out a discrimination which is a disgrace to Canada and to the whole freight rate schedule.

Mr. H. A MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, although I am in favour of the proposed resolution of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), advocating lower freight rates, I believe it does not go far enough. The live stock industry is not mentioned. I should like to see a reduced rate on live stock, and the old rates of the year 1900 restored. I am sorry the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is not in his seat, because I think he was in the province of Manitoba when the Conservative government brought in a rate much lower than the Crowsnest rate. From 1900 until 1917 the Crowsnest rate was forgotten, and then as a war measure it was taken away from the people of Manitoba. At one time we enjoyed a ten cent rate on wheat. To-day from Brandon to Fort William there is a sixteen cent rate. In those years we had a 60½ cent rate on live stock from Winnipeg to Montreal; to-day we are charged 85 cents.

Wheat can be milled in transit. Suppose, for instance, we stop a carload of wheat at Portage la Prairie, and it is there milled. The miller receives the benefit of the through rate. But if you bring a trainload of live stock from western Canada and want to feed the stock in transit no such privilege is available. The old Manitoba rate applied on all commodities, and the Crowsnest pass rate was not to be compared with it. That old rate was secured by the Conservative party when they were in power in Manitoba. I think the hon. member for Lisgar will remember the occasion and will probably be good enough to give the Conservative party some credit for obtaining that rate. It saved millions for the province.

Now, if feeding-in-transit privilege could be secured for live stock shipments it would greatly help the live stock industry. During the past nineteen years the railways have earned a profit of $520,000,000 in the west, and $241,000,000 in the east. The capital investment in the west is half that in the east. In other words, the railways have earned twice as much in the west on half the capital investment that they have in the east. A statement to this effect appeared in the Manitoba Free Press of November 14, 1927. Anyone who has travelled on the branch lines in Manitoba is familiar with the old rattletrap cars that have been transferred to western Canada after having been withdrawn from service on the eastern lines.

The farmer pays the freight rate on screenings to Fort William. I should like to see something done to secure a lower rate on screenings from Fort William back to Manitoba and Saskatchewan, for it is very suitable feed for live stock. Under the old Manitoba rate Saskatchewan got the benefit through to the lakehead on every commodity coming in and going out. The Crowsnest pass rates that my friends talk so much about all over the country apply only on grain and flour.

All through the years I have been a champion of lower freight rates. No man can exist on the farms of western Canada to-day while the present freight rates continue in force. When you complain to the railway companies they say the rates are due to the labour costs. I take issue with that statement. In the early days fourteen cars of cattle constituted a train, the crew numbered five, and the rate was 60½ cents a hundred pounds. What do you see to-day leaving Winnipeg? You see a seventy-car train in charge of the same number of men as formerly, five of a crew. True, the men are paid a little more money; true, there is a little more upkeep on their locomotives and track, but they are pulling a much greater tonnage, and it is not labour that is responsible for the present freight rates at all.

I am in favour of this resolution, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to see it go further and apply to live stock as well as to grain.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr Speaker, there is no doubt that the poultry raisers and the dairymen in the lower part of British Columbia are suffering from the excessive freight rates charged on grain and other products used in those industries and moved from the prairie provinces. I know as a matter of fact that on a carload of wheat from Calgary to Vancouver for export you pay 20 cents per hundred pounds, while on a similar carload moved into Vancouver for domestic consumption the rate is 41½ cents per hundred pounds. I think that differential is entirely too great. It is paid for by the people all over British Columbia, not only by those engaged in the poultry and dairy industries, but as well by all the consumers of flour and grain products throughout the province. Were it not for that excessive differential the price of those products would be very much reduced throughout the province.

But there is another angle of the question which I have not heard discussed to-day. While the differential is too great and while the freight rate is too high, we must also remember that we have a certain number of grain growers in British Columbia, and that although the rate is excessive so far as the consumer of grain products is concerned, it also acts as a protection to the grain growers; that is, the grain grower in British Columbia gets a certain advantage because the freight rate is higher. It will be noticed that the difference between the two rates is 21½ cents per hundred pounds. That amounts to $4.30 a ton which the grain grower in British Columbia gets over and above the price he would get if that rate were not in effect. So there are two angles of the question so far as my province is concerned. But at the same time, looking at the question in a reasonable way, I should say that the differential is entirely too great.

I was very much struck by the argument advanced by the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) as to British Columbia and Alberta being complementary one to the other. They are to a very large extent, and I think very much more so than any other two provinces. We have many things in British Columbia which they require in Alberta, and likewise there are many products of Alberta besides grain which are used very largely in British Columbia. The opportunities for the development of business between Alberta and British Columbia are very promising, and in that respect it would be much in the interest of both provinces to have the Pacific Great Eastern connected up with the Canadian National Railways at Prince George, because if that connection were made Alberta would have the opportunity of sending to British Columbia down through the great central valley, the Fraser river valley, her products which are required all through that country by the live stock industry. I believe in British Columbia we have nearly 250,000 head of cattle, of which about 110,000 are in the Cariboo district, that great central valley of British Columbia. This is one of the largest natural areas for the development of the live stock industry in Canada; it is capable of immense development, and I believe if the Pacific Great Eastern were connected up with the Canadian National at Prince George there would be a large amount of traffic in order to provide the live stock industry with coarse grains and other products of the prairies. I point that out as one of the things that seem to make Alberta and British Columbia fit in so well. It is a matter well worth the consideration of the house, and I hope it will be taken into consideration when the question of freight rates as between those two provinces is under discussion.

I did not intend to say very much, Mr. Speaker; I sympathize sincerely with the poultrymen and the dairymen of the Fraser valley, who use a large amount of the grain products grown in Alberta. They are paying entirely too much of a differential; the differential should be more like that existing in the rates between Winnipeg and Montreal. If we had something approaching that figure I do not think there would be many complaints, but at present in my opinion it is entirely out of line.

Mr. J. ARTHUR DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have closely followed the remarks made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) in connection with the resolution before the house, it strikes me, however, that there are, in this dominion, other provinces besides the western provinces. There is, for instance, the province of Quebec and that of Ontario, both of which are equally entitled to government favours. If the sponsor of this resolution had wished to be fair to all, he should have included, in his request for lower freight rates, the province of Quebec whose products are shipped to the western provinces, this would have helped to promote between the provinces an exchange of products and thereby put into practice the policy so strongly advocated of "Canada First."

For a number of years past, and even to-day, Quebec is called upon to stand the racket. The government, at the last session, thought first to grant the western provinces a rebate of five cents on each bushel of wheat exported. We requested a rebate for Quebec butter but we failed to obtain it, the government positively refusing to entertain such a request.

When a request is made to parliament care should be taken to avoid causing any prejudice to other provinces interested, but rather see that fair play to which they are entitled is observed and that they are not called upon to bear the extravagances of the others. Since the western people have but few products to dispose of on the Canadian market, it strikes me that the government should not bleed us to death to foster the sale of these products to the detriment of other provinces. Canada is at present in a very critical state, our railways are almost bankrupt, it is inexpedient to ask the government a rebate on freight rates. We should rather encourage them to practise economy and try to find work for the people of this country. The government instead of thanking employees for their services should, on the contrary, keep them at work, and make sacrifices in order that all may be given an opportunity to earn a living, it should moreover find them work, help in reestablishing the "bonne entente" which must exist between the provinces, and avoid all discrimination.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): I should like to say just a word or two on this subject, Mr. Speaker. This matter has a great many angles. Probably the differential between export and domestic rates is necessary in order that our wheat may be exported in competition with the other countries of the world, but the people in my riding suffer from that differential. In the town of Richford, Vermont, twenty miles south on the Canadian Pacific railway, Canadian mill feed, shorts, bran and middlings, can be bought for less than they can be bought in my own home town. I am told that is so because the people in that city are able to buy full carloads or trainloads of mill feed while we have to rate a local car and pay a special domestic rate from Montreal. That is one of the disabilities under which the dairy farmers of the eastern townships are suffering to-day. It is hard for us to buy mill feed at these high prices and compete with the people across the line. If that price could be reduced; if we could get a domestic or a through rate from the west right to my town, we could buy mill feed for a great deal less. As it is the trains come to Montreal from the west; they are broken up and distributed to different parts of the province, and we have to pay the domestic rate. That is something which I should like the government to take into consideration.

I am very much in favour of having the question submitted to a competent body of men who will deal with the matter intelligently. I think the suggestion of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) was a good one, namely, that the House of Commons is not in a position, has not the expert knowledge, to deal with the question in the manner in which it should be handled, and so far as the Board of Railway Commissioners is concerned, I am not in a position to say whether it is a competent board to deal with the matter or not. Certainly the rates should be adjusted in the best interests of the majority of the people.

Mr. J. T. SPROULE (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I believe the house would welcome a reduction in rates all the way around. I notice hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that they would be very much in favour of rates being reduced. It seems to me freight rates at present are so high that many commodities cannot be moved. For instance, it is impossible to-day to move straw and hay and some other commodities of that nature. If therefore, the rates could be reduced, much benefit would ensue. One of the previous speakers pointed out that the statement has been made that the rates cannot be reduced because the railways are losing money now. On some of the branch lines there are trains going out drawing four, five or six cars although they could haul ten or twelve cars at the same cost. If the rates could be reduced, there are many commodities that could be moved, thereby giving occasion for the employment of a great deal of labour.

For instance, take potatoes. What can be done with them at their present price? You can take almost any form of produce you like and you will find the freight rates are almost as high as the price of the commodity itself. Does it not sound reasonable that if those freight rates were reduced, a great deal of labour would be involved right along the line? An hon. member on this side of the house pointed out how the introduction of the penny postage had brought about an increase in revenue. I have noticed that since the reduction in the week-end passenger rates most of the railway coaches are crowded and the railway is deriving a great deal of revenue in that way. I have heard many people say that at those rates they would rather take the train than drive their cars. Similarly, there is moving by truck to-day a great deal of freight that would go by rail if the freight rates were within reason. Would the railways not be justified in making the experiment? It has been said that the railway men have figured the matter out, but at the present time there is a good opportunity to make the experiment in order to try, by reducing the rates, to move some of these commodities to the places where they are required.

Let me go a little further. A great deal of live stock to-day is being moved by truck. In our locality they have trucks that will hold almost as much as a cattle car. I have seen a truck that contained seventy hogs and ten sheep. If any more than that were put in a cattle car, the chances are that some inspector would come along, and if there happened to be a dead animal in the car, the man who made the shipment would be fined. But that truck carried those animals 175 miles without one dying; it landed them at their destination about eight or ten hours sooner than by train, and with that much less shrinkage. What does that mean? It means that the railroad must develop a very fast service and reduce the rates if it is going to compete with the trucks.

Take the case of a man who raises hay and is prepared to sell it for $5 or $6 a ton. The freight rate from around my district to Toronto is $4.50 a ton. Do you mean to tell me the man who owns the land, raises the hay, cuts it, presses it, draws it to the station and puts it into the car, is not doing more labour than the man who hauls it from that station to Toronto? Is there any comparison? Yet I can mention different localities where hundreds of tons of hay that were lying in the stack a year ago are still there to-day. Why? Simply because the farmers cannot afford to sell it and pay the freight on it. These are the conditions.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, March 8, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY PROBLEM OF CANADIAN SYSTEM

Hon. R. D. MORAND (East Essex) presented the first report of the special committee on radio broadcasting.

Mr. MORAND moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAYS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Wednesday the 9th instant to the end of the session government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence on Wednesday over all business except questions by members and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION OF BRITISH BOYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon); in his absence however I am content to direct my question to the Prime Minister. My inquiry is based on an item which appeared in last night's issue of the Ottawa Citizen under the heading of "Protests Bringing Boys Into Canada." The article is as follows:

A protest against the proposed bringing of 500 boys into Canada during the present year from Great Britain has been made by Rt. Rev. John C. Farthing, bishop of Montreal. The bishop sent his protest to the Dominion government and the government of Ontario.

"The boys," the bishop said, "are to be offered as sacrifices to keep together immigration organizations of various kinds. Surely it would be better to disband every organization rather than keep them together at the expense of 500 old country lads."

I wish to ask if these boys are being brought to Canada with the approval of the government, if the movement is government assisted, and what guarantee the government will have that the boys sooner or later will not become part of the ranks of the unemployed, and public charges requiring deportment?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will agree that such a question requires notice, because obviously papers and documents must be referred to. I have heard of the matter, but an answer will be given to-morrow.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to a statement made in the city of Victoria a few days ago by the Minister of Public Works of the province of British Columbia to the effect that money which had been promised under agreement by the federal government had not been supplied, and that as a result thousands of men during the last four or five months have been unemployed and still remain so. I should like to ask if that statement is true?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have not had notice of the question of my hon. friend, but I may say that so far as this government is concerned moneys have been sent amounting to about $3,025,000 to be devoted towards unemployment relief in the province of British Columbia. So soon as the legislation, of which notice has been given, has passed this house—if it does pass—I anticipate further moneys will be sent to that province. I have been handed a telegram dated Victoria, March 4, 1932, as follows:

Hon. H. H. Stevens,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa, Ont.

Press report on my evidence before commission on unemployment not correct. Have laid no blame for any difficulties in connection with the unemployment relief on federal government, nor have I any intention or reason for doing so.

R. W. Bruhn.

THREATENED DEPORTATION OF UNEMPLOYED AT THE PAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to press despatches a considerable number of unemployed men who are now at The Pas are threatened with deportation. Is it the policy of the Department of Labour to deport these men whose crime seems to be that they are unable to find work?

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I can answer the question merely by saying no, but if occasion demanded the answer could be amplified.

IMPERIAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

RECIPROCAL TRADE PREFERENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on the following press report from Sarnia, dated March 4:

Great things were expected of the economic conference, declared Colonel Sutherland. But it should be understood at the outset that Canada must give as well as receive. If Great Britain gave Canada preferences; she in turn would expect to receive preferences enabling her business men to transact business with this country.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) will be rid out of the party for uttering such heretical political doctrines, or will the Prime Minister himself be compelled to eat leeks—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron): —as a paregoric to enable him to make such a complete somersault in fiscal viewpoint as will allow him to face the approaching Imperial economic conference on sound economic lines?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has read a document which does not constitute a question.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron): Certainly, it is a question addressed to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

SEED AND FEED RELIEF

DISTRIBUTION THROUGHOUT MUNICIPALITIES IN MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I should like to direct a question to the government based on a telegram I have in my hand:

> Distribution of seed grain through municipalities in Manitoba will burden financial resources of said municipalities far beyond their ability to undertake. Strongly urge that you use your best endeavours to have Dominion government undertake finance one-third of freight charges and assume one-third of any losses by municipalities resulting through distribution of seed grain. Provincial government has already undertaken to assume one-third in both instances.
> John Bracken.

Is the government prepared to advise the house as to what action, if any, has been taken in this regard; and if no action has been taken, is the government in a position to state what its policy will be in this respect?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There will be a statement made this afternoon, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NORTH BATTLEFORD—ST. WALBURG-BONNYVILLE BRANCH LINE RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Regarding the North Battleford-St. Walburg-Bonnyville branch line railway, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Another railway line to Timbuctoo?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, nor to Honolulu—may I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if he is aware of the existing railway situation in northwestern Saskatchewan:

1. That orders have been issued to the contractors instructing them to stop work.

2. That cancellation of grading contract has taken place.

3. That there are at least 100,000 bushels of wheat in the districts affected that will have to be hauled over often impossible roads to the nearest railway point, fifty and sixty miles distant.

4. That hundreds of settlers for the last two years trekked into these districts from the dried-out and near dried-out areas southward on the understanding that railway construction would be undertaken forthwith.

5. That a great deal of hardship will be endured and increased direct relief required this year if the government decides the cancellation order must stand.

6. That by withdrawing the large amount of equipment from the district at heavy cost the expenditure involved would go a long way to grading the remaining thirty-five miles of road and completing the sixty-nine miles ready for the steel at slight cost?

And if he is, in view of all the circumstances submitted, will the minister seriously reconsider the whole question with a view to giving these far northern settlers the railway accommodation which is their just due?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): According to my information, Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the situation on that branch line this year as compared with last year. Last year the railway company notified the contractors that they were not going on with the work beyond a certain expenditure. The attitude this year is exactly the same as it was last year; there has been no further cancellation according to the information given me. This branch line is in exactly the same position as other branch lines throughout the western provinces; due to decreased earnings the management feel they can allow construction to stand in abeyance until financial conditions become better. I shall look at the question to-morrow, and if a further reply is required I will give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. McINTOSH: May I remind the hon. minister that last year he did reconsider the problem and very kindly brought forward an appropriation for more work. The settlers, I have no doubt, would be pleased if he would do the same thing this year.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

CHEQUES WITHOUT FUNDS—GRAND JURY SYSTEM IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill No. 22, to amend the criminal code (cheques without funds and grand juries).

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS INCURRED IN 1931

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 21, respecting the Canadian National Railways, and to authorize additional provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1931.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask, has this bill been approved by the committee on railways and shipping?

Mr. MANION: Yes, it has.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it the intention of the Canadian National Railways to reduce the number of employees, or will they leave things undisturbed as far as possible?

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, the intention of the Canadian National Railways management in regard to the number of their employees is not made known to me at any time. The management have entire control of the number of men they will employ and they neither ask my permission nor discuss the matter with me in any way. I am informed that they keep on the payroll as many men as they require to carry on the operations of the road, and lay off those whom they feel they can dispense with.

Mr. POULIOT: Have orders or instructions been given to the management to reduce their staff?

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Mr. MANION: The government never gives any orders to the railway management in regard to the administration of the road in any way, shape or form.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious of course from the language of the motion that it was placed upon the order paper prior to the first day of March. It will be necessary, when the house is in committee, to give effect to the principle of extending the time for the operation of the statute to May 1, by amending the words that are used.

Last year it will be recalled that this parliament enacted a statute whereby certain powers were conferred upon the governor in council to deal with unemployment and farm relief. It is well to keep in mind the provisions of the preamble of that measure, for they indicate clearly the constitutional division between the rights of parliament and the rights of provincial legislatures. The duties and obligations that fall upon provincial legislatures, under our constitution, are largely though not wholly defined by section 92 of the British North America Act. The balance, or remainder or residue of powers, including those specifically named in section 91, rest in this parliament, and it will be observed that words used in the preamble of the statute passed last year are:

. . . . and whereas it is in the national interest that parliament should support and supplement the relief measures of the provinces and other bodies in such ways as the governor in council may deem expedient, and for that purpose should vest in the governor in council the powers necessary to insure the speedy and unhampered prosecution of all relief measures and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada . . . .

That is a very concise and clear statement of the constitutional position of this parliament. It was so stated, of course, in 1930, and was agreed upon, I think, by all parties in the house in statements made from time to time during the course of the debate. The primary obligations rest with the municipalities and the provinces; the duty of parliament, in a national crisis or in a great emergency, is to assist and supplement the efforts of the provincial authorities.

I mention that because there seems to have been, judging from some of the questions asked within the past few days, a very distinct misunderstanding with respect to this phase of the question. I observed, for instance, that questions were asked as to why the Dominion government did not deal with the problem of seed and fodder. Obviously that obligation does not rest upon the Dominion government; it rests, of course, on the provincial authorities, acting either directly or through the city, town or municipal authorities which have been set up.

In this regard I think it perhaps desirable, although I did not so intend until yesterday, to read to the house a statement of the law as defined by the late Lord Chancellor Haldane in two cases that went to the privy council from this dominion. One was the case in which this parliament set up the court of commerce, which was to regulate prices of commodities and deal with the rights of traders; the other was the case in which, after the war, the Dominion government conferred upon an official power to fix the price of newsprint, and it was contended by the Winnipeg Free Press that no such power rested with the parliament of Canada but that the power to regulate prices, arising out of property and civil rights, must of necessity, be a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the provincial authorities. I think it well, therefore, in order that there may be a clear statement of the position placed upon Hansard, to read a few words from the judgment of Viscount Haldane in the court of commerce case, supplemented by a brief reference to his judgment in the Free Press paper control case.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would the right hon. gentleman give us the citations for those cases?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the citations before me, but I think one was in 1922, while the other was in 1919. They are both reported in the appeal reports of Great Britain. This is what Viscount Haldane said:

As their lordships have already indicated, the jurisdiction attempted to be conferred on the new board of commerce appears to them to be ultra vires for the reasons now discussed. It implies a claim of title, in the cases of non-traders as well as of traders, to make orders prohibiting the accumulation of certain articles required for every-day life, and the withholding of such articles from sale at prices to be defined by the board, whenever they exceed the amount of the material which appears to the board to be required for domestic purposes or for the ordinary purposes of business. The board is also given jurisdiction to regulate profits and dealings which may give rise to profit. The power sought to be given to the board applies to articles produced for his own use by the householder himself, as well as to articles accumulated, not for the market but for the purposes of their own processes of manufacture by manufacturers. The board is empowered to inquire into individual cases and to deal with them individually, and not merely as the result of applying principles to be laid down as of general application. This would cover such instances as those of coal mines and of local provincial undertakings for meeting provincial requirements of social life.

Legislation setting up a board of commerce with such powers appears to their lordships to be beyond the powers conferred by sec. 91. They find confirmation of this view in sec. 41 of the Board of Commerce Act, which enables the Dominion executive to review and alter the decisions of the board. It has already been observed that circumstances are conceivable, such as those of war or famine, when the peace, order and good government of the dominion might be imperilled under conditions so exceptional that they require legislation of a character in reality beyond anything provided for by the enumerated heads in either sec. 92 or sec. 91 itself. Such a case, if it were to arise would have to be considered closely before the conclusion could properly be reached that it was one which could not be treated as falling under any of the heads enumerated. Still it is a conceivable case, and although great caution is required in referring to it, even in general terms, it ought not, in the view their lordships take of the British North America Act, read as a whole, to be excluded from what is possible. For throughout the provisions of that act there is apparent the recognition that subjects which would normally belong exclusively to a specifically assigned class of subject may, under different circumstances and in another aspect, assume a further significance. Such an aspect may conceivably become of paramount importance, and of dimensions that give rise to other aspects.

That is a quotation from the judgment of the committee in the court of commerce case. Later the paper control case came before the judicial committee and Viscount Haldane again delivered judgment, using these words:

It is clear that in normal circumstances the Dominion parliament could not have so legislated as to set up the machinery of control over the paper manufacturers which is now in question. The recent decision of the judicial committee in the board of commerce case (1), as well as earlier decisions, show that as the Dominion parliament cannot ordinarily legislate so as to interfere with property and civil rights in the provinces, it could not have done what the two statutes under consideration purport to do had the situation been normal. But it does not follow that in a very different case, such as that of sudden danger to social order arising from the outbreak of a great war, the parliament of the dominion cannot act under other powers which may well be implied in the constitution. The reasons given in the board of commerce case (1) recognize exceptional cases where such a power may be implied.

In the event of war, when the national life may require for its preservation the employment of very exceptional means, the provision of peace, order and good government for the country as a whole may involve effort on behalf of the whole nation, in which the interests of individuals may have to be subordinated to that of the community in a fashion which requires s. 91 to be interpreted as providing for such an emergency. The general control of property and civil rights for normal purposes remains with the provincial legislatures. But questions may arise by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concern nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

The overriding powers enumerated in s. 91, as well as the general words at the commencement of the section, may then become applicable to new and special aspects which they cover of subjects assigned otherwise exclusively to the provinces. It may be, for example, impossible to deal adequately with the new questions which arise without the imposition of special regulations on trade and commerce of a kind that only the situation created by the emergency places within the competency of the Dominion parliament. It is proprietary and civil rights in new relations, which they do not present in normal times, that have to be dealt with; and these relations, which affect Canada as an entirety, fall within s. 91, because in their fullness they extend beyond what s. 92 can really cover. The kind of power adequate for dealing with them is only to be found in that part of the constitution which establishes power in the state as a whole. For it is not one than can be reliably provided for by depending on collective action of the legislatures of the individual provinces agreeing for the purpose. That the basic instrument on which the character of the entire constitution depends should be construed as providing for such centralized power in an emergency situation follows from the manifestation in the language of the act of the principle that the instrument has among its purposes to provide for the state regarded as a whole, and for the expression and influence of its public opinion as such. This principle of a power so implied has received effect also in countries with a written and apparently rigid constitution such as the United States, where the strictly federal character of the national basic agreement has retained the residuary powers not expressly conferred on the federal government for the component states. The operation of the scheme of interpretation is all the more to be looked for in a constitution such as that established by the British North America Act, where the residuary powers are given to the Dominion central government, and the preamble of the statute declares the intention to be that the Dominion should have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

Their lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that however the wording of ss. 91 and 92 may have laid down a framework under which, as a general principle, the Dominion parliament is to be excluded from trenching on property and civil rights in the provinces of Canada, yet in a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war, there is implied the power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the Dominion as a whole. The enumeration in s. 92 is not in any way repealed in the event of such an occurrence, but a new aspect of the business of government is recognized as emerging, an aspect which is not covered or precluded by the general words in which powers are assigned to the legislatures of the provinces as individual units. Where an exact line of demarcation will lie in such cases it may not be easy to lay down a priori, nor is it necessary. For in the solution of the problem regard must be had to the broadened field covered, in case of exceptional necessity, by the language of s. 91, in which the interests of the dominion generally are protected. As to these interests the Dominion government, which in its parliament represents the people as a whole, must be deemed to be left with considerable freedom to judge.

I have made these extended references and read these extracts from the judgments, not because they are new to many hon. members, but because some of the lay members of the chamber may not, perhaps, be fully aware of the clear line of demarcation between powers that are vested by our constitution in the provincial legislatures on the one hand and in the federal parliament on the other.

Now we endeavoured in 1930 and again in 1931, to keep that clear line of demarcation before us and to point out that there was not such a national emergency, in the sense in which that term is used in the judgments of the privy council, as to warrant the exercise by this parliament of the powers conferred upon the provinces. There is no power, for instance, as I read the judgments or as I understand present conditions in Canada, to enable this parliament to seize upon or take from the provinces the powers that are conferred upon them. They must still function as provinces; they must still discharge their constitutional obligations and duties; they must still meet the situation as it arises. But in view of the national character of the unemployment problem, national in the sense that it extended from one end of the dominion to the other; in view of the acute difficulties that were occurring in one province of the confederation by reason of three successive crop failures, it became apparent that this dominion, through the federal parliament, should intervene; and the method by which that assistance could be given was to supplement and assist the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations.

That, I think, is a fair statement of the situation. Upon that we proceeded; and having regard to what was said a few days ago with respect to another question by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), I desire to point out that we followed exactly the same course, by some strange circumstance, that had been suggested by him. In other provinces, as I said, we endeavoured a year ago to induce the provincial authorities to create, if necessary, such bodies as, in their opinion, not ours, would best discharge the duties which rested upon the provincial and not the dominion authorities. For instance, in the province of Prince Edward Island, which has a small population of less than 90,000 people, they dealt with their problem very simply. They determined, in view of existing conditions, to what extent in their judgment the dominion could best assist and supplement them in their work by pointing out that national undertakings, public works, bridges in connection with railways and wharves, might be undertaken as federal works. And certain appropriations out of the fund voted last year—the blank cheque, so-called—were made in the form of orders in council which I had hoped would be laid upon the table to-day but which unfortunately the printer has not completed to enable their being tabled at the moment. That was the position in that province. In Nova Scotia, again, where a great storm, one of the greatest within the knowledge of living men, had destroyed many small breakwaters and wharves in the harbours an opportunity was afforded for the federal power to exercise its jurisdiction with respect to these matters, to rebuild and repair wharves and breakwaters and facilities that have been provided for the fishermen in the ports along the coast of Nova Scotia. In New Brunswick, where the coastal line is not so long, and where conditions are somewhat different, opportunities were afforded for the federal government to proceed with certain undertakings, not large in extent of the expenditures of money, but very considerable, because in that province work was being carried on in large measure by reason of the destruction by fire of harbour facilities in St. John. In the province of Quebec the federal undertakings were determined; and it will be recalled that a communication was sent by the Minister of Labour to every federal member of the House of Commons, asking for a report as to what in his judgment might be useful undertakings to aid unemployment.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They were not acted upon.

Mr. BENNETT: Suggestions were asked for, and in some instances they were acted upon, and in others not. But may I say to the house that if all the suggestions that were made had been acted upon the exchequer would not have been equal to the demands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Were they more extensive than the promises that were made in 1930?

Mr. BENNETT: Much; they were so extensive that no government could contemplate carrying them into effect. The ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) is saying something. May I ask him to speak up; it does not disturb me. I shall be glad to hear what he says.

Mr. VENIOT: Especially when recommended by a Liberal.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no warrant for that statement, none whatever. Unfortunately there are gentlemen who cannot see it otherwise. For instance, the other day I was talking to a gentleman who was present at a meeting in the county of Gloucester where the ex-Postmaster General was addressing a gathering, and he held up a letter received from the Minister of Labour and said, "The provincial authorities have nothing to say about this; it rests with the federal members, and I am the man to determine it here, not they." I merely mention that—

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister has made that statement he will give me the privilege of dealing with it.

Mr. BENNETT: Not now; you will have an opportunity.

Mr. VENIOT: I want the statement taken back because it is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman says it is not true—

Mr. VENIOT: It is not true in the way the Prime Minister puts it.

Mr. BENNETT: In the way in which the hon. gentleman made it, it is true; let us put it that way.

Mr. VENIOT: I want the right to reply to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to ask a question of the Prime Minister? If not, he is out of order.

Mr. VENIOT: It is not correct in the way he has stated.

Mr. BENNETT: I trust the hon. member will not say it is incorrect even in the way in which he said it.

Mr. VENIOT: It is incorrect in the way you state it.

Mr. BENNETT: Then let us say it is correct in the way in which the hon. gentleman said it at the meeting in question. Now, it has been contended that the suggestions thus sought were not acted upon. Well, it was idle to expect that all the suggestions offered could be acted upon. But I believe it will be found that, regardless of political considerations in any way, shape or form, employment was given to those who needed employment to the fullest possible extent, having regard to the fact that the government determined that it would not embark upon a wholesale expenditure of public moneys merely because suggestions were made that would involve that being done. That is fundamentally clear. If all the suggestions which were made were placed before this house they would give to the country a composite picture of a desire to enter upon unbridled extravagance to an extent wholly out of keeping with our present economic condition.

Then we went to the next phase. We approached the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the western provinces and dealt with them in the same manner. There then came up the question of determining how we could best supplement and assist the provinces in the discharge of their constitutional obligations. We sought to assist the provinces regardless entirely of the political affiliations of those who directed the administrations. Much comment has been made in this house in connection with conditions in British Columbia. That government was Conservative and the contention has been made that we did not fall in with all the suggestions made by the province. That is not untrue; it is correct because we were unable to do so. At least some commendation has come from quarters usually lacking in praise of the action taken in that regard. The province of Quebec, a Liberal government, formulated an extensive program which it sought to have carried out by the joint operation of the provincial and federal authorities and in some instances with the aid of the municipalities. These representations were canvassed and in the end an agreement was arrived at, which agreement will be laid upon the table of this house. The same applies to the province of Ontario, to the western provinces and to the Pacific province of British Columbia.

That is a method by which we endeavoured to give effect to our constitutional duties, to supplement, under the conditions which existed, the legislative power which this parliament had conferred upon it. Complaints were received from time to time. In some instances it was contended that only Liberals were being employed; in other instances it was contended that only the supporters of former governments were being employed, and in others, that only Conservatives were being employed. In the end, to meet this situation as best we could—it being a difficult situation at best—we asked reasonably responsible men to observe and report upon the work being done, to see that the effort was commensurate with the money being expended and to see that the work stipulated for was being performed according to the terms of the contract.

I submit to this house that in the main we have had remarkable success in dealing with this problem. I will go a step further. We have expended moneys which were appropriated directly for that purpose under the control financially of the Auditor General and of all the departmental engineers responsible for such expenditure—Public Works here, Railways there and Department of Interior works here. These departments and their officials along with the Auditor General's check upon expenditures have been responsible for the work being carried on. As to the work done by the provinces, we had no power to say that it should be done at the least possible initial expense so far as the appropriation was concerned. We told them that we would not pay any part of the administration cost; we told them that the cities and towns would have to pay that. We told them that as they had shovels, picks and other facilities which could be utilized for giving effect to their undertakings, they should be used. We told the Department of National Defence that it should lend its tents and other facilities of that kind to enable the work to be carried on in the national parks. That was done. With the minimum of new material and the maximum utilization of facilities which we had, the work was carried out expeditiously. I shall not read from the report which I have because it would not be fair to those who may follow me and who have not this document before them. I had hoped that this document would have been available to all before I made this statement.

While there always has been and always will be difficulties in connection with public expenditures by reason of the fact that there are men and women who will always think it desirable to get something for no effort from government, and that to impose upon government is a virtue and not a vice, I contend that in the main millions of dollars of public money have been expended fairly since this parliament adjourned in August last until to-day. As nearly one hundred cents for the dollar as it is possible to get in public expenditure has been obtained, and much employment has been given to those who needed it. If at times there have been causes for complaint, as there have been, we have endeavoured to rectify whatever difficulties or whatever wrongs existed as expeditiously as possible. At the end of this period we face this parliament with some sense of pride in the fact that these vast undertakings have given employment to over 300,000 men working over 6,000,000 hours. While that does not mean that each man has had long work, while it does not mean that each had many hours of work, it means that by the judicious rotation of the work and by the giving of employment for a half day or a longer period, we have been able to accord that which we started out to accord, namely, relief to a large number of those who demanded and required it. That is what we endeavoured to do and that is what we did do. Our duty and our obligation were to provide relief, and that is what we endeavoured to do through the medium of the provinces.

We did not come in direct contact with the municipalities; our contact was through the provinces because the municipalities are the creation of the provinces. A still greater difficulty became apparent in September, that is, that the municipalities and the provinces could not undertake to provide the necessary finances to enable them to defray the expenses they had incurred. Not being able so to do, what was to happen? There was only one thing, that we should lend them the money which they could not otherwise borrow. This government in the exercise of the powers conferred upon it under the statute made loans to the provinces for the purpose of enabling them to discharge their obligations under their agreements and for the purpose of enabling the municipalities to discharge their contractual obligations. This money was loaned at the rate of interest which it had cost us. In response to a question asked a few days ago there has been laid upon the table of this house a statement indicating the sums of money which have been loaned. For instance, at the end of February the province of Saskatchewan had been advanced over $16,800,000; the loans to Alberta amounted to more than $4,600,000; the loans to Ontario were in the form of advances which have been offset by accounts for which we are liable with the exception of $190,000; the loans to British Columbia amounted to $5,600,000 and to Manitoba, $3,775,000.

Those represent moneys that were advanced by the dominion for the purpose of enabling the provinces to meet their constitutional obligations, except with respect to the province of Saskatchewan about which I shall presently speak and the province of Ontario where an advance was made which was paid by credits which they were entitled to receive under their agreement, and which credits have entirely wiped out the advance that was made.

The obligation which was not one we ourselves assumed but which was one we had to assume if the work was to be carried on, was an obligation that came upon us by reason of the economic conditions that prevailed in consequence of the disruption of the financial structures of the world after Great Britain went off the gold standard. Now I ask the chamber and particularly hon. members opposite if they have any complaint to make with regard to the manner in which we have met those responsibilities. We found every one of the four western provinces, for reasons which I shall not discuss, unable to secure money with which to discharge their obligations in New York. Were we to let those provinces default, or were we to lend them the necessary money with which to meet their obligations? Is there any hon. member who will stand up in his place and say: You should have let them default. That is the problem which confronted us—default or a loan. Is there any hon. member present who would suggest that we should have chosen the former alternative and not the latter? While some hon. members may suggest that it is undesirable to make advances to the provinces under the conditions that prevail, there is no member sitting either to the left or to the right of the Speaker who does not realize the fact that if any province, however small, wherever located, defaulted, this would injuriously affect the credit of Canada as a whole, and what is more, adversely affect beyond any words that I might use, the future of the people of this country.

Mr. EULER: Were the sums that were advanced to the provinces taken from the proceeds of the service loan?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That includes the amounts mentioned by my hon. friend as lent to the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, prior to the end of February. I fancy an illustration will serve the purpose of my hon. friend who has just asked me the question, as we both come from Alberta. In January, for instance, we provided $320,000 to meet the interest on the maturing New York obligation of Alberta and on the thirteenth of the same month we provided $2,822,000 for a loan also due in that city.

The province of Manitoba had an obligation amounting to $2,000,000 maturing in New York and we renewed the obligation for $1,000,000 and paid $1,000,000 on account. We also incurred at that very time the responsibility for paying that renewal at the date of maturity.

I now come to the second branch of our activities which arose out of the situation existing in Saskatchewan. It will be within the memory of most members of the house that on Dominion day of last year I referred to the condition which prevailed in that province. Saskatchewan is largely an agricultural province; it has a population of slightly over 900,000 souls. Seventy-six municipalities with a population numbering several hundred thousand have, for three successive seasons, been without a crop, and the soil, alluvial in character, fertile beyond words, has become so disintegrated by reason of the fibres being broken, that it is blown about by every wind that passes over the area in question. The soil that once was bright with verdure is now dark and as barren of vegetation as the floor. This, may I say to the chamber, has brought about the largest problem that the Canadian people have ever had to face. I wonder how many people at the maximum does this house think were actually fed during this winter in Saskatchewan?

Mr. McINTOSH: About 300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member is quite right—something over 300,000. I put it to my fellow Canadians if they know of any major task Canadians ever discharged with greater efficiency and less noise? It was effectually, efficiently done, and what is more, with medical services, with plain but ample food, with fuel, over 300,000 people at the maximum, or nearly one-third of the population of Saskatchewan, were taken care of in that province this winter.

Mr. DUFF: By the provincial or the federal government?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. In that instance we did just what I said a moment ago: we asked the provincial authorities to set up a commission, which they did, presided over by a gentleman of means who is giving his services voluntarily, assisted, I am proud to say, by a member of the profession to which I belong, who, day after day and week after week, abandoning his own business, has been giving of his great abilities to the solution of the problems that have arisen. We also had representatives there for the purpose of assisting them. If Canadians have cause to be proud of anything, it is of the fact that through various organizations, such as the Red Cross and other associations of that character, by the free and voluntary gifts of men and women in eastern Canada to their less fortunate fellow citizens in the west, there have been sent not less than ninety-nine carloads of vegetables, clothing, other commodities of various kinds for free distribution amongst the people in that area and other parts of Saskatchewan. The churches offered to undertake part of that work; they did it and they did it well. The other day I heard of a case where a man of some means obtained some jars of jam which were being distributed, to which it was thought he had no claim, and indeed he had none. I do not dispute the soundness of the criticism; I mention it merely as indicating that is only a small matter when one considers the large, broad question of a commisison functioning with the aid and assistance of your government, whereby upwards of 300,000 men, women and children in peace time, were provided with the necessities of life, cared for during the winter and now, at the beginning of March find themselves at least in health and strength and, I am bound to say, with an optimism and courage with respect to the future that would shame some of us who live under different conditions. I shall not go further into the details of this effort, but I have no doubt that it is one in which hon. gentlemen opposite will feel, as we all do, a sense of pride, that a condition so strange in the life of a country, that privation and suffering that might have been so dreadful, have been met as they have.

Mr. DUFF: Did the money go directly from the federal treasury to the relief commission or to the province?

Mr. BENNETT: By arrangement made with the province and with the banks we deposited the money in the banks to the credit of the relief commission, the credits being made in this fashion:

Date—1931	Amount
September 19	$ 500,000
October 23	250,000
December 9	500,000
December 17	1,000,000
1932	Amount
January 4	$ 750,000
January 21	750,000
February 5	500,000
February 18	500,000
February 29	500,000
Total	$5,250,000

All of which we have paid. Believing that we were but giving voice and effect to the wishes of this parliament the government undertook the payment of 100 per cent of the relief thus afforded in those communities where there had been no crop for three successive years, because the municipalities and provinces were in such financial conditions that, I need hardly mention to this house, they could make no contribution at all.

In that regard reference has been made to the fact that promissory notes were signed by which they undertook to repay the sums so advanced. Well, sir, I will tell this house exactly what was done, because that is one of the instances in connection with which I remained long enough in Regina to take some personal interest in the procedure, and to lay down what I conceived to be the proper rules which should govern in determining how relief should be granted. First, a survey was made of every municipality; it was not guess work, but made by men employed for that purpose who visited every settler, taking from each one a statement of what he had, of his financial position, and asking him to sign a declaration as to the truthfulness of the statements thus made. That was No. 1.

No. 2: An estimate was made by the settler himself as to what he would require, not as money, but for the purpose of meeting the demands made upon him and his family for food, fuel, clothing and matters of that kind and, sir, it was my privilege at the beginning of the year to visit one of the depots from which clothing was being distributed. When I saw the character of the requests being made, and the care with which apparently those who asked for assistance indicated their requirements, I realized that here was a people who were not taking an opportunity to provide themselves with things they did not require, but were asking those things necessary to meet only their most urgent requirements, having regard to the conditions under which they were living.

Then the question arose as to whether or not they should sign promises to repay what had been expended. That is debatable; there are those who hold the view that they should not be required to do so. I have no complaint to make, whatever view is held. However, the settlers affected were most insistent, the ones with whom we came most in contact, that they should be permitted to sign an undertaking to repay.

Mr. McINTOSH: Do many of them not deny that?

Mr. BENNETT: I have no doubt some deny it, but I am speaking only from what I myself was told by settlers I met in Regina. Whether or not that feeling was general, I am not in a position to say; naturally I have to take the reports which come to me. I must say, however, I never witnessed a finer spirit on the part of men and women who had homes, mark you—good homes—who had homes which had been in their possession for ten years, fifteen years or twenty years, who had barns, sheds, fences, wells and equipment but who for three years had had no crops, whose resources were gone. They had, however, a natural pride which belongs to the race and breed from which they sprang to desire not to accept charity but to accept a loan from the people which one day they might repay. For my part I have no objection to offer to criticism and I suspect from what I heard in Regina that the relation between the loan and the promise to pay is not greatly different from that of cause and effect. I still think it was not an improper thing to do, because let me say that since August, 1930, it has been my unfortunate experience sitting at the treasury board to have placed before me at almost every meeting, anywhere from ten to one hundred cases in regard to which the commission, as the hon. ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) will remember, was set up to deal with seed grain, feed and relief expenditures made in the northwest territories and the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during periods of time which are now long past. Some of them go back to the years 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904 and 1905, and all along the years, because as I told the house last year there have been very few years since 1870, when relief on some scale has not been granted in western Canada, when that part of Canada was still territories. For, as territories, it will be recalled they were, in a sense, wards of this dominion, and we took the responsibility which under the constitution now rests with the provinces.

We are now confronted with the next problem, that of providing the seed for the cropping or sowing of those vast areas. Of course ever since last fall we have been endeavouring to ascertain just what the future would likely be. We have received from those most vitally affected a statement as to what they believed—having regard to their knowledge of conditions and the history of the past as to moisture and the general turn of events whereby we have cycles of crops, and so on—the future might reasonably be, so far as crops in a particular area were concerned. We have asked the premiers of the three prairie provinces for their views. We have asked them what assistance they will require to enable them to provide seed and feed, and the supplies with which to put in a crop. Then as to fuel—whether it be used for mechanical appliances, traction engines, or oats and hay for horses—whatever it may be—we have asked them to give us estimates of the cost. The province of Alberta has taken great care to endeavour to spread out their resources to the limit of their power, and their estimate is that if they are provided with $140,000 it will be sufficient for the areas which under normal conditions they would take care of but which at the present time they cannot do without some assistance. In the province of Manitoba we were advised that something less than $700,000 would take care of requirements. When we come to the province of Saskatchewan however we must consider that there are upwards of 4,000,000 acres of land upon which we have to determine as best we can, with the aid and assistance of the best experts available, what to do.

As no doubt hon. members are aware, in the United States there has been placed a limitation upon the acreage which will be seeded. That limitation is based upon what has been done in previous years. A sum was recently voted by congress for the purpose of extending credits, and hon. members will recall that something like $50,000,000 is to be made available for purposes I am now discussing. A limitation however has been placed upon the amount which may be advanced in any specific case either for food, seed, fuel or fodder.

The federal authorities feel that they are not in as good a position as the provinical authorities to arrive at a proper judgment. Therefore we have concluded that instead of doing what has been done in days gone by, merely undertaking the responsibility for seed and feed as a national or dominion obligation, we will advance the necessary moneys by way of loans to the three provinces on their treasury bills, to enable them to provide seed and feed to fulfil the requirements of their agrarian populations. It may interest this house to know that we took steps last year to acquire through the aid of Mr. McFarland—who has so generously and freely without salary or compensation given of his time in the management of the wheat pools—sufficient quantities of wheat to take care of that situation at a price which I should say is at least ten cents lower than the rate to-day prevailing. That will be of some assistance to those who have to place their crops in the soil. It will require approximately for all purposes, for seed and feed, whether you use it to purchase hay or oats, or fuel oil or gasoline to put in the crop, approximately six million dollars to care for the requirements of Saskatchewan.

This, then, is the situation that confronts us. I have endeavoured to indicate to the house as clearly as I could in broad and general terms, without trespassing too much upon its time, the sweep of our undertakings and the general principles that have governed us in the administration of the statute that was passed last session. But this government have had a greater sense of their responsibilities because of the fact that we were vested with larger powers. In practice, I may say, we realize now that the statute that conferred these powers upon the government without naming the amount available was vastly to the advantage of this dominion, and had it been otherwise we could not have accomplished the purposes that we did accomplish without the expenditure of much more money. That is our profound conviction, and it is the opinion of the business men with whom we come in contact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Are the sums which my right hon. friend has said have been placed to the credit of the relief commission in Saskatchewan for the purpose of relief a part of the moneys advanced to the province, or are they contributions from the federal government?

Mr. BENNETT: I thought, Mr. Speaker, I had made myself clear when I said that the grand total of the sum advanced to Saskatchewan was $16,800,000, but of that sum $5,250,000 represented advances—all expended at this time—to the relief commission, which will not be repaid to us, and which, as I said last session speaking in this house, was a contribution made by Canada to a national emergency on a scale—may I say?—which we Canadians have never heard of before.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that mean when those notes are repaid the money will not come back to this government?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I say so far as we are concerned, we have not received any treasury bills from the province of Saskatchewan for the repayment of these amounts, neither have we sought them.

Mr. RALSTON: Five million dollars?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. That is a matter for future consideration and adjustment. It was discussed at some length the other day by hon. gentlemen.

Mr. BROWN: Is that amount represented by the notes taken from the farmers?

Mr. BENNETT: Whether or not notes have been given for the full five million dollars I cannot say. My own opinion would be that there are not notes for any such sum as that. But as far as we are concerned, we have advanced that money to the province for the purpose I have indicated, and, as I have said, to the extent to meet the whole one hundred per cent of cost because the province is not in a condition at the moment to make any contribution to it.

An hon. MEMBER: To whom are those notes payable?

Mr. BENNETT: As I understand it, to the commission. I was indebted the other day to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) for seeing one of those notes for the first time. I think it read: To His Majesty's government in right of the dominion.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter, however, that will have to be dealt with and adjusted in the future. I merely mention it in passing because at the moment the expenditure for seed and feed advances is to be covered by the treasury notes of all the three provinces in order that we may be able to meet the situation that exists.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In this case it is expected that all the advances for seed and relief to carry the people through the summer will be repaid by the provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as the immediate advances are concerned, we are at the moment taking the treasury notes of the provinces and treating them all on the same basis; but, as I ventured to say the other day, and I now repeat, all this must necessarily be a matter for adjustment, but left in such shape that there can be at least no cause for complaint on the part of any person however careful he may be in regard to the expenditure of the nation's money. That is the position up to that point.

Mr. DUFF: I think the right hon. gentleman stated that altogether the federal government had advanced something like $16,000,000 to the province of Saskatchewan, and that out of the $16,000,000 some $5,250,000 was advanced to the relief commission. Am I right in saying that the province of Saskatchewan, treating it as a corporate body, would owe the federal government $11,000,000, because the other $5,250,000 was advanced to the relief commission as a separate amount and the province therefore is not responsible with respect to it?

Mr. BENNETT: There are some limitations, but in a broad and general way that is a correct statement of it in figures.

Mr. MARCIL: What relief has been accorded to the eastern provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: The relief which in the judgment of the provinces and municipalities was necessary to meet the situation. In the province of Saskatchewan a relief commission was set up, but broadly no relief commissions have been set up in any other province, although there has been a cooperative effort on the part of voluntary organizations with the municipalities and the provinces. The amount and extent of the relief are not matters over which the dominion exercises control, except, I trust, by way of kindly suggestion; the provinces determine what they should do.

Mr. POWER: Is the $6,000,000 included in the $11,000,000?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. POWER: That is a straight loan to Saskatchewan?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a straight loan for the present, but, as I said to the hon. member for Weyburn, all these matters must in the very necessity of things be matters for discussion and adjustment when the crisis is passed. When we were confronted with the situation the question we had to consider was how we would meet it, whether, as was suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday, by a supply bill, or in the same manner that I have indicated, namely, by extending the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 for a further period of two months up until the first of May. Now, so far as a supply bill is concerned, I think it is fairly obvious to those who have followed me that to ask for any particular sum of money at this time in the form of a supply bill with the usual limitations that are imposed upon such measures would not meet the situation. In our judgment at any rate, having regard to our experience, it would not. Parliament is in session, parliament has the fullest opportunity to consider and criticize and deal with every step the administration takes. I am not lacking either in sympathy or respect for the views that were so strongly urged last session, and doubtless will be again urged, against our taking the course which I am asking the house to permit us to take, namely, to declare that the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931 shall continue for a further period of two months. I do that, you may say, with some reluctance, but I do it because I believe it is the only method having regard to the necessity for elastic provisions to deal with complex problems promptly. But I do sympathize with the views expressed in a few words yesterday by the right hon. leader of the opposition, and so I suggest to this house that we frame and add to the single section of the bill which makes the provisions of the statute of 1931 applicable for another two months, a provision whereby every order in council that is approved by the Governor General shall be laid upon the table of this house at the next sitting following its passing. That, of course, would be the next day, if the house were in session. I cannot but think, having regard to the gravity of the situation and the difficulty of dealing with it by any hard and fast rule, that this chamber will confer these powers upon this government. I would not deprive this parliament of its right to criticize freely and, if it thought desirable, destroy this administration for the improper discharge of its obligations, but I can conceive of no way in which this house can have larger powers conferred upon it than by the method I have suggested, so that in every instance it might have the fullest opportunity of dealing with these matters.

The answer is, of course, that it is done before the opportunity is afforded to criticize.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, sir, I can only record my own experience since August last in dealing with this matter, and I do say frankly to this chamber that I know of no way by which you can deal with this difficult problem unless you have the widest discretion in an administrative sense. After all, it is a problem of administration, and I know of no method by which you could deal with these problems as problems of administration unless you have the powers I have indicated. I will give an illustration. Last year we took power to deal with peace, order and good government. In the fall it became apparent that it was vitally important that we should make our practice uniform with that of the United States with respect to the valuation of securities held by insurance companies. Many of the United States companies were doing business in Canada and many of our Canadian companies were doing business in that country. Forty-eight superintendents of insurance got together, and forty-seven of them agreed that for the purposes of valuation, the conditions being so exceptional, the average value for the last five quarters should be the governing valuation for certain classes of securities. Unless that power had been conferred upon us by this statute we could not have enacted the order in council, which was published in the Gazette and which all hon. members of this house no doubt have seen.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Are you sure you are right in that?

Mr. BENNETT: I am perfectly certain that no one will question the fact that when you begin to deal with hundreds of millions of dollars, and when you remember that it is not the values of to-day that concern the policyholders but the values in future, based upon what money will earn and what it is necessary to set aside for the purpose of meeting liabilities in the future, to place a value based upon the average value for the last five quarters, as they did, with our companies doing business in the United States and their companies doing business here, was but to say that there should be some measure of certainty and uniformity in fixing values in the most important matter with which we as a government had to deal at the moment. We must remember the magnitude of the sums involved, and the fact that the happiness of the people may be in some sense disturbed by any condition arising that would bring about a disturbance of the stable foundations on which these institutions have been built Unless we had possessed that power we could not have passed that order in council.

Now I put it to the house whether or not there is an element of grave risk if such a power is not vested in the executive at a time of great flux and change in the economic conditions of a country. The possibilities of abuse are always present in the minds of a parliament—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Just one question. Apart from this order in council respecting the Insurance Act, which virtually amended that statute, were there any orders in council passed under that peace, order and good government provision of the statute of last year, amending other acts of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: As far as orders in council amending acts of parliament are concerned, I have nothing in mind at the moment. There may be something of which I cannot think just now, but all the orders in council will be laid on the table at an early date, and an opportunity will be afforded for the discussion of them. The reasons, of course, for the particular order in council to which I referred, which was published in the Gazette and which no doubt the hon. gentleman has read, were not only the conditions to which I have referred but also a judgment of the privy council which was delivered in October, and also the necessity for providing uniformity.

Let me put it this way: If an insurance company has a mortgage, it is still regarded as an asset at its face value, as a mortgage. However, with shares and bonds, the value fixed is the average value for the last five quarters, which was considered fair by the insurance superintendents to whom I have referred. There are other matters that arise from time to time. What we seek by this resolution is authority from this house to continue until the first day of May the provisions of the statute which was enacted last session. It confers a wide discretion upon the executive; I said so last year, and I repeat it now. I am not one of those who do not understand and appreciate the attitude of mind taken by the opposition with respect to this question, but I do say with some degree of pride and satisfaction that although that statute came into force in August and we have administered it ever since, you will have great difficulty and indeed I think you will find it impossible, sir, to point to any case in which there has been an abuse of authority under it or where there has not been an honest administration of its provisions. That I believe I can safely say.

Mr. DONNELLY: The right hon. gentleman referred to the $6,000,000 for feed and seed in Saskatchewan. Has he made any estimate of the money which will be required to provide relief for the unemployed and the distressed in this dried out area until they get a crop, which will be about September 1 next? If so, could the Prime Minister give us the amount of the estimate, and tell us whether provisions have been made to look after these people?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a most difficult thing to do; it depends so much upon the season, the production of vegetables and so many other things which my hon. friend, living in a part of that area, knows as well as I know. The government and the commission are unable to express, in terms of dollars, their view at the moment of what may be required, although they believe that with the opening of spring they will be able to do so, and I trust that between now and May I may be able to give this house a fairly reasonable and intelligent estimate of the position. I think the hon. gentleman knows quite as well as I do, if not better, how difficult it would be at this time to give that estimate in dollars and cents.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is to be the policy of the government with regard to provinces other than Saskatchewan after May 1?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a question which at this time I can answer; that must be dealt with later. There was one other matter which I am reminded was dealt with by order in council; that was the question of the export of gold. I thought perhaps that was well known to all hon. members of the house, but that is another case. It was mentioned the other day in answer to a question. The passing of an order in council prohibiting the export of gold except under licence was done under the provisions of the statute. That occurs to me as I pass on, and that became very essential for reasons I think I made quite clear to the house the other evening.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, usefully add more to the explanation which I felt it incumbent upon me to make to this house in asking that you do now leave the chair that the committee may consider this resolution. I am reluctant, in the constitutional sense, to ask for the continuance of these powers; I am not reluctant on any other ground. And if I knew of any other method which I believed would accomplish the end we have in view, of assisting in the fair discharge of our obligations, I would not ask this. But after the most careful thought that I have been able to give to the subject—and I will welcome any suggestions that others may offer towards the solution of the problem—I know of no way, except by this method, whereby we can assist the provinces and supplement the work they have to undertake, and at the same time have ready at all times the executive power which would enable us, if the occasion arose, to deal with the situation on a competent basis. It is for that reason that I commend this resolution to the favourable consideration of the house, realizing that I have taken much longer time presenting these various matters to the chamber than I had expected, but realizing also that the house required of us some account of our stewardship in the discharge of the great responsibilities that rested upon us in view of the wide discretion and the great powers which were committed into our hands.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure the house and the country will appreciate the lucid and comprehensive statement which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has just made of what he very rightly terms the stewardship of the government in its administration of the statute of this parliament respecting unemployment and farm relief. I could not help feeling, as my right hon. friend spoke, that the responsibilities of office are having a wholesome and chastening effect upon him, and that he is beginning to realize that, in many courses of action which have been taken in the past, he would have been wiser had he then entertained and espoused with the zeal he has done to-day the views he has expressed to the house this afternoon. May I say that, with most of what my right hon. friend has said by way of exposition I have no exception whatever to take. I can only regret that when he occupied the position of leader of the opposition and the government of the day was seeking to defend the treasury, as he to-day is seeking to defend it, he did not then join with us in expressing agreement in the view we then put forward as to the respective responsibilities of the municipalities, the provinces and the Dominion, for those views were precisely the same as the views which to-day he says the present government entertains.

May I also express regret that during the period of the general election, when my right hon. friend was appealing to the electorate, and particularly when he was dealing with this all important question of unemployment relief, he did not then put forward, as the government of the day put forward, the view of the respective relationships and obligations of the dominion, the provinces and the municipalities, in the way in which he has stated them this afternoon. I might go further, and say that I regret that at the special session of parliament, and at the last session as well, when we were presenting some of the points of view which he has presented with such force and eloquence to-day, my right hon. friend did not at that time accept the view we were urging upon the government. Had he done so, the country to-day would be in a very different position, and the federal treasury would have to its credit an amount very considerably more than it has at the present time.

My right hon. friend opened his address by enlarging upon the jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces respectively in the matter of unemployment relief. He cited from decisions of the privy council as rendered by the late Lord Haldane in the board of commerce case, and in the case of newsprint prices, each of which judgments was mentioned in order to emphasize the point which the right hon. gentleman was seeking to drive home, namely, that with respect to matters of unemployment relief the obligation in the first instance was a provincial obligation, and that, so far as the federal government was concerned, its part in the matter was that of supplementing the provinces and coming to their aid, only when the provinces themselves were unable to cope with the situation. May I remind the house that this was the position which we, as a Liberal party, when in office, took from the outset. It was the position we took during the period of the campaign. And it is the position we have taken since we have been on this side of the house. If there has been a different position taken, if my right hon. friend has stressed the point that the emergency has been of a national character, so great as to necessitate the exercise of powers by the federal government much wider than would otherwise have been the case, he himself has been the one to put forward that point of view and to press it to the extreme he has. I want to make quite clear that at last, after dealing with this problem of unemployment relief for a year and a half, my right hon. friend now states a position which he asks us to support, in direct opposition to the view as stated by him when he was on this side of the house, during the general elections, and when he first came into power.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope my right hon. friend will not think I am interrupting him, but the language I used a year ago I have in front of me, exactly as I used to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Those who have heard my right hon. friend will have no difficulty in seeing the accuracy of what I have said as to his presentations. Indeed, as my right hon. friend was reading the judgment of Lord Haldane, and when, in particular, he emphasized the point that the federal jurisdiction overrode that of the provinces only in a time of emergency in the nature of war, I was somewhat surprised that it did not occur to his mind at that moment that with respect to the statute passed at the last session of parliament, we on this side of the house urged that very reason as one why the enactment should not be adopted. We pointed out that the statute passed at the last session, giving to the government powers to deal by order in council with peace, order and good government, was one which could be justified only in time of war, insurrection, invasion and that as a matter of fact, even in time of actual war, the government of Sir Robert Borden had never sought to obtain from this parliament powers as extreme as those which the right hon. gentleman asks that this parliament should enact. To-day he is asking us to reenact the very statute to which we took exception in such strong terms at the last session of parliament. I say to my right hon. friend that, when he asks us to-day to reenact the statute passed at the last session, we must confront him with the argument which he himself has presented this afternoon as one against taking that particular course. There does not exist at the present time an emergency equivalent to that of actual or threatened invasion or war. There does not exist the condition which, according to the judgment of Lord Haldane, is the only one which would justify giving to the government the powers which the Prime Minister is asking under this particular act. So much for the first part of my right hon. friend's remarks.

May I say to my right hon. friend that when he was speaking to the public of this country about the cries of little children, about what he termed the smug complacency of the then Prime Minister who he said was deaf to the cries to heal their pain, which were being made to my right hon. friend as a Canadian and as a Christian, he was not stressing, as he has done to-day, the jurisdiction as between the provinces and the dominion in the matter of unemployment relief. Being in power to-day, instead of making his appeal to the human needs and aspects of the situation, he gives as consolation to the hungry and starving two judgments of the late Lord Haldane.

I come now to the next point with which my right hon. friend dealt. He spoke of the loans which this government has made to the provinces since September last. In dealing with that point, he said that the government's action was based on the alternative of either making loans to the provinces or of allowing the provinces to default in their obligations. He asked the house whether the government was not in the right in making the loans, instead of permitting the provinces to default. I say to my right hon. friend that if, before making the commitments which he has made with respect to the expenditure of public moneys, he had accepted the suggestion made from this side of the house at the special session, and again with particular emphasis at the last session of parliament, and had called a conference of the dominion and the provinces to discuss their financial relations, he might not have been obliged to make the loans he has made during the last few months, and he certainly would not have been obliged to make them to the extent to which they have been made.

My right hon. friend must surely recall that when he and his colleagues were introducing measures to provide for the voting of large sums for unemployment relief and for the reenactment of grants in aid to the provinces for technical education; when they were introducing legislation with respect to old age pensions, construction of highways, and other matters, we on this side urged strongly that before making commitments which involved so considerable a drain on the federal treasury, the government call the provinces into conference and discuss with them the whole financial situation of the provinces and the dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember that, because it was very strongly stressed from this side. If that suggestion had been followed, if that course had been adopted, the situation to-day would be very different from what it is. I think it is an open secret that, in dealing with the provinces, my right hon. friend told the premiers or provincial treasurers that, with respect to expenditures which they were making, he in control of the federal treasury and of the government of Canada would not countenance loans to them beyond a certain point unless they discontinued some of their expenditures and curtailed in many ways the outlays of public money.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think that is correct; I recall no occasion on which that was so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend say that in no case did he put pressure upon the provinces to curtail expenditures which they were making?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a different thing. I never made it a condition with any province that they should curtail any specific expenditure. I understand that their banks told them that they had to balance their budgets; that is as far as I know, but I certainly did not impose any conditions except that we should have vouchers indicating what the expenditures were for.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend did not caution the provinces with respect to expenditures, I think he failed to discharge his duty as he should have discharged it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a different thing from saying I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am somewhat surprised to hear my right hon. friend take exception to a course of action which I think so highly commendatory, and which I for one would approve as being the right course to take.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman said I imposed conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never used the word "conditions."

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The word "conditions" came out of my right hon. friend's mouth when he was seeking to offset what I had said. I did not use that word at all and my right hon. friend knows I did not.

Mr. BENNETT: I know my right hon. friend did; he said that I had told them that they could not get money unless they did so and so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Every hon. member in the house heard it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hansard will show what was said. Hon. gentlemen on this side have as good hearing as hon. gentlemen opposite, and they know that what I said was that it was an open secret that my right hon. friend had put pressure upon the provinces to seek to curtail some of their expenditures. I think that is what he should have done, and I am very sorry to hear him say that he did not do it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what was said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is to be understood that provinces like British Columbia are to be free to spend public money in any way they please and are, notwithstanding, to get all they want in the way of loans from this parliament, then we are embarking upon an expenditure of public moneys which is wholly indefensible. If the course I suggested has not been taken, it should be taken, and the provinces given to understand that, if their expenditures are unwise or injudicious, they must be curtailed if they expect to have their revenues supplemented by loans from the federal treasury to meet an emergent situation.

My right hon. friend spoke, next, of the province of Saskatchewan, and he dealt with what he described as the admirable manner in which relief had been administered in that province. He stressed the splendid service which had been given by the unemployment relief commission, and he drew the attention of the house to the fact that the federal government made its contribution to the province by means of a cheque payable to the unemployment relief commission. He stated that this commission had carried out the work of unemployment relief in cooperation with the province and the municipalities, and in addition to what was being achieved by voluntary cooperation, and that it had used all the safeguards it could in the matter of protecting public expenditure.

If an unemployment relief commission has worked so successfully in one province in connection with the expenditure of public moneys for relief, why has not my right hon. friend adopted, before this, the suggestion which has been made over and over again from this side of the house of having an unemployment relief commission deal after the same manner with dominion unemployment relief? Instead of giving to the governor in council the power to spend money at its will without consultation even with parliament, why are we not doing what was done in Saskatchewan, particularly when, as the Prime Minister says it has, the example has so much to commend it? I say to my right hon. friend that even now he should adopt that course, notwithstanding the fact that he has not adopted it up to the present time.

With the example of Saskatchewan before him, instead of coming and asking this parliament to give to the government the power, by order in council, to grant unemployment relief and relief for distress in rural areas, my right hon. friend should establish immediately an unemployment relief commission, composed, as I stated the other day, of representatives of the different economic interests involved. This commission should be given the power to do what may be necessary and this parliament should make its cheque payable, through the executive, to the relief commission, which body would transmit to parliament a full statement of the manner in which the money has been expended. I say that it is no longer defensible to ask parliament to vote further sums to the governor in council when, out of the lips of the Prime Minister himself, we have the declaration that unemployment relief has been better administered under a relief commission in Saskatchewan than has been the case elsewhere.

I stress that again, and in speaking of it, may I point out another feature? It seems to me most unfortunate and indeed lamentable that, after having spent millions of dollars, as the federal government has done, upon unemployment relief, as a result of the legislation of the special session and also that of last session, we have nothing at all in the way of accumulated information which can be put at the disposal of parliament to guide us in regard to this great subject of unemployment relief.

If a commission of the character which I have mentioned had been appointed over a year and a half ago, or when the government came into office, that commission, if composed of the right personnel, as it might well have been, would to-day have had a fund of information which it could place before a committee of parliament with respect to the whole problem of unemployment relief, information the like of which could not have been obtained in any other way. A commission of that character would have been in a better position than any other body to advise parliament as to the considerations of which account should be taken in the enactment of a compulsory unemployment insurance measure. But, while we have spent our millions of dollars, we have practically nothing to show for them, except the report which will be brought down indicating the total amount of expenditure, the total addition thereby to the public debt, and the way in which it was made. It is not, however, yet too late to do something that will be helpful to parliament and to the country in the way of acquiring that special information and knowledge, which should be gathered for the use of parliament at subsequent sessions, and which at the same time will safeguard further expenditures in a manner which, according to the Prime Minister's own statement this afternoon, is the best of all.

Those, I think, were the main points to which my right hon. friend referred, until he came to the concluding portion of his address. There he indicated the problem with which the government is at the moment confronted. It is the same problem that confronted the government at the special session. It is the same problem which confronted the government at the last session. The only difference is that we have had now an experience of a year and a half which we had not at the outset, and that experience certainly ought to guide us with respect to action which should hereafter be taken. My right hon. friend was quick to recognize that there are very strong reasons why, with parliament in session, there should not be given to the governor in council power which might, with plausible excuse or reason, be asked for in times when parliament is not in session. I wish to speak with particular reference to that aspect for I do not like to witness the gradual elimination of the duties and functions of the Commons, one might almost say, the disappearance of parliament itself through the surrender of its rights and responsibilities to the executive and a parting with their control over expenditures on the part of the people's representatives in this house.

But, before I go into that, the most important phase, may I say a word or two about the measure which is now before the house. The motion is:

That the house go into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931 is an act to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief, and the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. The section to be amended is section 8, which reads:

This act shall expire on the first day of March, 1932.

As I pointed out the other day, this act expired on the first day of March, 1932. When I spoke last on this measure, it was the first day of March, and I was prepared to leave it an open question as to whether the act would expire at midnight of that day or whether it had expired at midnight of the previous day. I think the latter view is the correct one, but, at any rate, there can now be no question about the act having expired. Therefore, chapter 58 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931, which we are now being asked to amend, no longer exists. That statute is as dead as a door nail. How can parliament be asked to amend a statute which does not exist? How can we be asked to amend an extinct, a dead, a defunct statute? Parliament can revive a statute; it is possible for the ministry to bring in a bill reenacting an old statute, but, in the form in which it is now before the house, the resolution is asking parliament to do something which it is impossible for any parliament on earth to do.

It is not befitting the dignity of parliament, it is a contempt of parliament that it should be asked to amend a statute which no longer exists, and I wish to state at once that we on this side must take very strong exception to the House of Commons attempting to proceed in any such way. After all, we have responsibilities in the matter of the precedents which we set in this parliament. Surely my right hon. friend is not going to associate his name with a precedent that will mean that, hereafter, any hon. member will be wholly in order if he brings in a bill to amend some statute that is no longer in existence, some enactment that has disappeared into the limbo of forgotten and abandoned things. If we have power to amend this statute, which was passed last session and which expired on the first day of March, any hon. member can, with propriety, introduce into the house a bill to amend any enactment that has been passed by this parliament at any time since it came into being. When the commissioners revise the statutes and discard old enactments that have ceased to exist, they are at least supposed to be serving a useful public purpose, namely to keep, in a form which will be readily accessible, those enactments which are alive, which still have the force of law. But this statute has no longer the force of law. It is, as I have said, no longer in existence. I protest against the introduction of this resolution, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will take the position, as the presiding officer of the house, that in the form in which it is presented it cannot be entertained.

In saying that, let me make this perfectly clear. I am not raising this objection as a merely technical one. I am raising it, as I have said, because I feel that the precedents which are established in this house are all-important, and that members of the House of Commons incur a very grave responsibility in countenancing precedents which should not be set. To make clear that this exception is not being taken on merely technical grounds; that we are not trying to obstruct the voting of any moneys which may be necessary in order to give the provinces the needed loans that my right hon. friend says he now proposes to give them, let me say again as I said yesterday: If my right hon. friend will drop the resolution which is now before us and ask his Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to come to the house this evening with a supply bill indicating the amount of money which the administration feels it will be necessary to have in order to meet the situation between now and the first of May, or the period during which parliament may be in session, if he will take that course, and move that the rules be suspended so that such a supply bill can be speedily passed through the house and sent over to the Senate, we of the opposition will cordially join with the government in agreeing to the suspension of the rules, and will seek to expedite the passage of such a measure through the house to-day. I make an urgent appeal to my right hon. friend,—who as Prime Minister surely has an appreciation of the responsibility involved in the setting of a precedent, who surely venerates British parliamentary institutions and would like to have them upheld—I appeal to him at this time not to be responsible for a controversy in this house over the method of doing something which all of us, regardless of the parties to which we belong, are prepared to assist the government in doing and say should be done, particularly when that controversy relates only to the taking of a right course, and the avoidance of a course which hitherto has not been taken in this parliament, and cannot be countenanced under constitutional practice and procedure, as we have sought to uphold them.

I know my right hon. friend has power through parliament to revive a dead statute; he can bring in a bill to provide that a certain enactment, known as chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, be reenacted. I say that that course will have to be taken before he can obtain the relief he seeks. Relief cannot be obtained under the terms of the resolution before us. Again I urge the ministry not to create a controversy, particularly when delay might only serve to cause added suffering to many people throughout the west and in other parts of Canada. There need be no delay whatever. As I have said we can expedite a supply bill to the extent of having it pass this House of Commons to-day, if the ministry wishes to proceed with it in the regular manner in which all supply is granted by parliament.

Moneys required for purposes of unemployment and farm relief should be voted in a manner similar to the regular votes of supply in the House of Commons. May I compare the resolution now before us with the resolutions of the two previous years which have preceded bills for the purpose of securing from parliament relief for the unemployed. The first measure of the government opposite with respect to unemployment relief, and which had to do with the granting of public moneys, was preceded by the following resolution introduced in this house on September 10, 1930, during the special session:

> That it is expedient to provide that a sum not exceeding twenty million dollars be appropriated and paid out of the consolidated revenue fund for the relief of unemployment in constructing, extending or improving public works and undertakings, railways, highways, etc., that will assist in providing useful and suitable work for the unemployed, all as set forth in a bill founded on this resolution.

At that time hon. members on this side of the house took exception to the government proceeding by way of a special bill rather than by the customary way of bringing in a supply bill. We drew attention to the fact that the House of Commons should exercise control over expenditures, and, if a supply bill were brought in, a certain amount of money would be voted for use until the beginning of the new fiscal year. Had a supply bill been introduced, the government would have been in a position to meet all its obligations. At that time we urged the government, in the expenditure of large sums of public money, not to depart from the long established practice of proceeding in the regular way through a supply bill. We also drew attention to the fact that, according to the practices of parliament, not only should the expenditure of the amount named be confined to the fiscal year, but the specific purposes for which the moneys were required should be set out. Had the government voted a sum necessary or sufficient for the period of time for which it was required, pending the regular session of parliament the amount named at the outset would never have been permitted to assume the proportions set forth in the bill. There never would have been a suggestion of $20,000,000, but, as I said the other day, the amount required would have been about $4,000,000.

Having secured this vast sum of $20,000,000, the government when it came to parliament again found it very difficult to name any sum which would be required, and for that reason they went further than they had previously gone and asked us to vote a blank cheque. The first resolution was a departure from the practice of parliament, in that the amount required was not voted as supply is ordinarily voted, for the period only of the fiscal year or part of a fiscal year. Having obtained the $20,000,000 the government made commitments with respect to the greater proportion of that money for expenditures, not in the last part of the fiscal year 1930-1931, but for the next fiscal year. Those commitments led to the expenditure of millions of dollars which otherwise would never have been spent. My right hon. friend takes pride in these actions of his government. I say, that they wasted public moneys through the manner in which they made commitments for its expenditure during the spring, summer and fall months. Those expenditures would never have been what they were had the government followed the customary procedure of asking parliament, the people's representatives assembled, for the amount required for the fiscal year, and for that period alone. Having made that mistake twice, do not let us repeat it a third time.

At the time the government took that course, we pointed out that, if parliament once departed from constitutional procedure, one could never tell to what lengths such departures might lead. Our representations at that time proved to be true with respect to the measure brought in at the following session. At this point, I shall read the resolution introduced at that time, and ask hon. members to contrast it with the one to which I referred a few moments ago. The first one named a specific sum of money, specific objects or works upon which this money was to be spent At least it had that virtue. The next year, however, what there was of virtue in that regard in the first resolution was entirely lacking in the second and in the bill based upon it.

The resolution introduced on July 27, 1931, was as follows:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to employment and farm relief; and for the maintenance and peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

Here was a resolution which went very much farther than the original resolution. The first unemployment legislation enabled the government to make commitments beyond the fiscal year; in that particular it was bad enough. The measure I have just read, however, gave the government power to spend any sum it pleased, and, to all intents and purposes, it substituted the executive for parliament during the period of time to which it applied. It took out of the hands of parliament altogether the control of the public moneys that were being spent. Now, that is a very serious thing. Let me repeat: the second measure took from parliament altogether, from the time that parliament ceased to be in session to the time of its reassembling this year, all control of public expenditures with respect to anything that might be said to have to do with unemployment relief and with the relief of distress. That was an extreme step, a step, I think, the like of which has never been taken in this or any other parliament.

But what is now being proposed? That step was defended a year ago on the score that parliament was then about to prorogue, that the unemployment situation would exist throughout the winter, that the government must be given a free hand to deal with it. Parliament was not in the mood, nor, had it the time when the measure was introduced, to consider as carefully as it should have the consequences of a step of the kind. But parliament is in session now, and we are being asked to do, for the period of time that parliament itself is in session, something to which we took exception with respect to the period during which parliament would not be in session at all. I say, Mr. Speaker, there can be no excuse for any action of that kind. We might as well abandon parliament altogether. Why are we assembled here if while the people's representatives are in session the ministry is to get power to do, by order in council, anything it pleases?

Stop for a moment, and look at the bill more closely. It asks that this power be given for the months of March and April; that is, up until the first of May. I assume this parliament is going to continue in session at any rate until the first of May. I have my suspicions whether the government has not in mind the adjournment of parliament on the first of May, if we are not in a position to prorogue at that time. I repeat, parliament is now in session. Why should any power be given to the government to do by order in council what can be done in the regular way by parliamentary enactment? We cannot permit a step of that kind to be taken, if it is at all possible to prevent it. We do not wish to obstruct the government in any legislation they may have in mind. We do not wish to add an hour's delay to their obtaining any sum of money that they may consider necessary to meet existing needs; but we cannot countenance a step which means giving the government power to do by order in council, while parliament is in session, the thing which parliament itself alone should do. It is an indignity to parliament itself that any such power should be asked for.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Contempt.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why should members of parliament assemble here at all, unless it be amongst other things to exercise some control over the expenditure of public moneys? That is the fundamental basis of everything we hold dear in the way of responsible government. We cannot jettison the whole institution of responsible government just because the Prime Minister says it is going to be difficult for him to make up his mind what amount of money is needed.

My right hon. friend says there never was a problem as great as the problem with which Canada was faced last year. As I have pointed out, my right hon. friend has a way of saying, as well as doing, the extreme thing. Surely the problems with which this country was confronted during the period of the war—

Mr. BENNETT: We never had 100,000 people hungry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend still holds the view that the problems confronting his government are greater than the problems which Sir Robert Borden had to contend with during the period of war. I can never entertain that view, nor do I think any hon. members on the other side will ever agree with their leader in that respect. But Sir Robert Borden never asked parliament to do what the Prime Minister at the present moment is asking parliament to do. Sir Robert Borden asked parliament to vote, year by year, what was needed to maintain the armies at the front and to meet all the expenditures that were essential in connection with the war. He called a special session of parliament in order to obtain in a regular way the money that he required. He did not at that session ask that the House of Commons should give his cabinet power to pay out of the treasury what moneys they might consider necessary during the next few months or during the period of the war. He named the required amount. He was perfectly frank in saying: This amount may not be sufficient. It may be too large or it may not be large enough; but, if it is not large enough, I will bring parliament back, and I will obtain authority for further expenditures. Now, my right hon. friend has parliament in session. He does not need to summon parliament again to get an additional sum for the purposes for which he now requires this money. He has indicated this afternoon that something like, I think, $7,000,000 will be required for the purpose of loans. Well, let him ask for $7,000,000 for the purpose mentioned and we will vote it. If, between now and the first of May, he finds $7,000,000 will not be sufficient, let him come back and tell us it is not sufficient and say what additional sum he requires. But I submit he has no right, while we are assembled here, to ask for a blank cheque to do as he pleases by order in council.

But the act he desires us to reenact goes very much further than the voting of public money. Look for a moment at the act, the provisions of which we are being asked to renew at the present time. There are really three distinct measures in one in this enactment. I pointed that out last session when the government was asking us to pass it. There is a measure for unemployment relief. There is also a measure for farm relief, and a measure to confer on the government certain powers with respect to the "peace, order and good government of Canada." At the time, we took exception to these three distinct measures being passed as one. However, they were passed. But now, while parliament is in session, we are again being asked to give to the government three separate enactments in one for this period of time. I think my right hon. friend can hardly have considered the real significance of the action he is asking parliament at the moment to take.

With respect to the "peace, order and good government" clauses of this enactment, last session, I drew attention to the fact that the language was taken from legislation passed during the period of the war, that it was the language of the War Measures Act, which conferred very wide powers upon the government. But I drew attention to the further fact that the enactment, which originally conferred those wide powers on the government of the day, made it very clear that those powers could only be exercised in case of actual war or invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended, and that they could not be exercised at any other time or for any other reason. Last session my right hon. friend secured from parliament the right to exercise at will, during the time parliament was not in session, those powers which heretofore had never been exercised except during a period of war, insurrection and invasion. Now he comes to ask us to allow him to exercise them while parliament itself is in session. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we, as members of the House of Commons, responsible to the people of this country, cannot surrender every obligation that is imposed upon us to protect their rights. My right hon. friend read from Lord Haldane's judgment paragraph after paragraph which asserted that, even with respect to such a comparatively small matter as that of overriding the jurisdiction of a province in certain particulars, it could not be done by the government except at a time of actual war or of an emergent situation that was so grave as to make it appear that war was already upon us. At the time I took down the words quoted by my right hon. friend from the judgment of Lord Haldane, and they were "a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war." That was the only occasion mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: Or famine.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Famine connected with war.

Mr. BENNETT: Famine need not necessarily be connected with war.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The words were "a sufficiently great emergency arising out of war."

Mr. BENNETT: Or famine; the word famine is there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend read two judgments; at any rate whether it was war or war-famine; both have to do with war or with situations arising out of war. I do submit, Mr. Speaker, even if it might be necessary for any reason to give the government of the day power to deal with certain matters by order in council when parliament is not in session and when it might necessitate a delay of a month or more before action could be taken by parliament, there can be no excuse whatever for conferring that power upon the government while the representatives of the people surround the ministers of the crown in parliament assembled. So I say to my right hon. friend that we must strenuously oppose the legislation in the form in which he is seeking to introduce it.

May I briefly summarize our position, as I have endeavoured to state it. With the object which the government has in view, namely supplying public moneys for purposes of relief, we are in complete accord and agreement. We are ready to leave to the judgment of the ministry itself the amount it may need for the purpose of dealing with unemployment relief, the supplying of seed or the meeting of any other need which would come within the provisions of the legislation proposed. All that we ask is that the ministry bring in a supply bill indicating the amount they wish to have for the general purposes, and allow us to vote the required amounts in that form. We take exception to the course the ministry seeks to follow, first of all because it asks us to do something which is impossible. I am going to appeal to you if need be, Mr. Speaker, to give your ruling on that point: to decide whether or not the resolution which is before the house is one which this house can entertain, asking us as it does to amend a dead enactment. I say we cannot do it; we should not be asked to do it; and it is an indignity to be asked to do it. But, assuming that the government should get around that difficulty by introducing some other resolution which will revive this dead enactment, assuming they do so and then ask us to amend it, we will have to take exception to doing so for the reason I have mentioned—that it overrides the customary procedure and that there is no necessity therefor, since parliament is here assembled and at a moment's notice can, if what is suggested is right and proper, do anything the ministry wishes it to do.

My right hon. friend says he will lay on the table of the house the orders in council that are passed the day after they are passed. We want to know the contents of an order in council, not the day after it has been passed, but the day before it is passed, and the representatives of the people have a right to such knowledge. If my right hon. friend thinks it is necessary to have money for some particular purpose, let him come to this house and ask for supply for the required purpose and give us a chance to discuss the matter. If we approve of the measure proposed we will pass it, but we cannot surrender the right to control public expenditure, and we cannot pass over all the powers, the dignities, the rights, and the responsibilities of the House of Commons to an executive which wishes to place itself wholly beyond the control of this legislative body.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Geary): Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I ask for a ruling on the point I have raised, as to whether this House of Commons can entertain a resolution which asks for the amendment of a statute which does not exist.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it will be within your memory that when I began my observations this afternoon I directed attention to the fact that the resolution bears the date of February 26. At that time it was a proper motion; the statute did not expire until March 1, but as an amendment is not competent until after you, sir, have left the chair, the motion being that you do now leave the chair, the amendment could not be made until the house went into committee on the resolution. That is the position.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even if Mr. Speaker did leave the chair would an amendment then proposed to a defunct statute have any force?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I said it would be necessary to amend the resolution to make it conform to what is the principle, namely, to extend the provisions of the statute until May 1. Inasmuch as the statute has now expired, different words will have to be employed than would have been used prior to the first of March.

Mr. BOURASSA: You will revive the statute?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I direct attention to the fact that a resolution such as this has to be submitted to His Excellency the Governor General for his approval. I do not see how it can be amended after that, unless there is a new resolution submitted to His Excellency.

Mr. BENNETT: The rule is this, that if there is no departure from the principle it does not require resubmission. If, on the other hand, the principle of the measure is different, then it cannot be so amended. Inasmuch as this is subsequent to the date of expiration it follows that the language will be different, but the principle is that the provisions of that statute will continue to be operative until the first day of May.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the date is the very essence of this resolution.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to make another point in connection with this point of order, and it is this: My right hon. friend suggests that because this resolution was on the order paper on February 26, before the statute actually expired, therefore it would be effective to extend the old statute.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said just the opposite.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought that for the last two or three days my right hon. friend has been suggesting that he is trying now to extend this statute rather than to revive it. I want to point out to him that after this resolution is passed it will be only the foundation for a statute which will have to be passed subsequently and assented to by His Excellency the Governor General. After it is assented to, it will have effect only from the date of assent.

Mr. BENNETT: Unless it is retroactive.

Mr. RALSTON: That is my point. If it is made retroactive it will cover a greater expenditure than is covered by the resolution now before the house, because the present resolution only covers expenditures from the date of assent to May 1.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit to my right hon. friend that that is the situation. This resolution does not purport to be retroactive; it only purports to clear the way for a bill which will come into effect on a subsequent date, after being assented to by His Excellency, and that bill will provide for expenditures from the date of assent to the first of May. I say if my right hon. friend wants to make the bill retroactive he will require a new resolution, because this resolution is not wide enough to cover it.

Mr. POULIOT: Just putting monkey glands in a corpse.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, Mr. Speaker; a point of order has been raised. Your honour was asked to decide whether or not this House of Commons can entertain the resolution which is before the house at the moment and which states that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend a certain statute. That statute does not exist. The point which is being respectfully taken by the opposition at the moment is that chapter 58, which this resolution seeks to amend, does not exist, having expired on the first of March; therefore as the matter now stands this House of Commons could not amend it if it wished to, because it cannot amend something that does not exist. My right hon. friend, speaking a moment ago, said that a notice was put on the order paper a few days ago—February 26, to be exact. That was a notice of motion for leave to introduce a measure; but this House of Commons never gave its consent, during the period of time the act was in existence, for the introduction of such a measure. I am quite prepared to concede that if, before the expiration of the act, this house had given leave to introduce the measure, the mere fact that we had not been able to complete all the stages of the bill before the time named for the expiration of the existing statute had elapsed would not be a reason why the proposed measure should not continue to be considered. But I do submit that when the House of Commons itself did not give any leave to introduce a measure of the kind, and in fact has not yet given leave, because the measure has never been before us, we cannot be asked at the present time to amend something that does not exist. That, in a word, is the position. No leave has been given to introduce the proposed bill; no leave has been requested to introduce it until to-day, which is eight days after the act which it is proposed to amend has expired. In the circumstances, we submit that the ministry cannot or should not be permitted to proceed with the measure.

Mr. RHODES: May I say one word on the point of order. I think we are all agreed upon this point: that when this notice of resolution was placed on the order paper, and was in order, if it had been moved at any time prior to the first of March it would have been perfectly competent for us to proceed with it and the objection which my right hon. friend and those who agree with him have raised could not have been raised. But, I submit, the point is this: that the principle underlying this resolution was that there should be made available after the first of March the provisions of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act; and when this notice was given it was a question of continuing the act. I am at one with my hon. friend when he says that you cannot amend an act now out of existence, but that is a mere question of verbiage, for an amendment could properly be made to this resolution in committee, confirming the principle underlying the resolution when originally placed on the order paper. I submit that the message of His Excellency covers that very point, and it seems to me it brings the question of order down to a very narrow compass. It is as to whether it is competent for us now in committee to amend the resolution to give effect to the principle which was contained in the resolution when it was originally placed on the order paper, a change in verbiage being necessary by reason of the fact that we have passed the first of March when the old act expired. I submit under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, that it is quite competent that the motion that you do now leave the chair be put, and that an amendment in accordance with the suggestion made by the Prime Minister can properly be made in committee of the whole, where alone it can be made.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) obviously concedes that the resolution as it is is out of order—

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —because he suggests that it should be amended and be drawn up in proper form when it goes to the committee. The Prime Minister also said that. May I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the resolution is out of order it cannot go to committee; it must be ruled out of order. Moreover—I repeat this because your honour was not in the chair at the time—a resolution such as this has to be submitted to the Governor General and approved by him, and it cannot be changed unless it is submitted to His Excellency and a new resolution is brought to the house. The Prime Minister says, "Yes, if it is another principle." But it is another principle under the circumstances, because the very essence of this resolution itself is the date mentioned therein. I submit that if it is out of order at the present time it cannot go to the committee.

Mr. RHODES: On the point of order I must take exception to the statement made by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), who says that I made the statement that this resolution was out of order. I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Inferentially.

Mr. RHODES: I argued that it was quite in order. That was my whole argument, and unless I fail to understand the English language I thought I had made that abundantly clear, from my point of view at least. The whole point of the resolution is as to whether the principle is being preserved. It is a question of verbiage and nothing else, involving an amendment which could be called for in committee arising out of circumstances which did not exist at the time when the notice of the resolution was placed on the order paper.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to take issue with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) with regard to what he suggests is the principle of the resolution. This resolution is presented to the house on the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General, from whom, on the advice of the ministry, all recommendations for money bills come; and a request has come from the crown that we should amend an act which was passed last session by striking out the word "March" and substituting therefor the word "May." Obviously that amendment will be effective only from the date His Excellency approves of the bill which is passed, founded on that resolution, and therefore the principle of the resolution which is now before the house is that His Excellency desires and recommends, through his ministry, that this house shall vote such moneys as the government may see fit to authorize by order in council after the date of the passage of the bill founded on the resolution. I am pointing out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to my hon. friend, that if it is suggested, as the Prime Minister does suggest, that as soon as this bill is in committee we are going to make it retroactive and have it cover sums of money from the first of March up to the date of the passage of the bill, then that is a different principle from the one which has already been recommended and submitted to the house on the recommendation of His Excellency. In other words, as a consequence of the bill being made retroactive, a very much larger sum may be voted. When you are speaking of the principle of a money bill you are speaking of the extent of the money to be voted as well as of the purpose which it is to be applied. I submit, therefore, that the resolution is out of order if, as both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance suggest, it contemplates being made retroactive from the first of March.

Mr. RHODES: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I point out, in answer to my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who asserts that in the message from His Excellency all that was asked was that the word "May" should be substituted for the word "March," my hon. friend has misapprehended the entire purport and reason for a message at all. It is that His Excellency approves of the expenditure provided under a money bill. The question of May or March is a mere question of verbiage and detail.

Mr. RALSTON: It has an effect on the amount of money.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is trying to argue that you cannot spend as much money in seven weeks as in eight. I may say to him that I could spend as much in one day as in two months. There is no force whatever in that argument. My hon. friend is trying to turn his argument in two directions. In the first place, he says that His Excellency agreed to the word "May" being substituted for the word "March," and that the act shall be extended for a period of two months. In the second place, he takes the ground that if this resolution is amended it will mean that there will be a week with respect to which the measure will have to be made retroactive, thus covering the very ground agreed to by His Excellency in the first instance. My hon. friend argues that a further message will have to be sent to His Excellency to ask that he agree to the first week in March being covered. I submit my hon. friend is arguing against himself; he should withdraw either the first or the second portion of his argument, because taken together they are not tenable. The sole question before the house at the moment is whether your honour shall or shall not leave the chair—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. RHODES: —for the purpose of the house going into committee to consider a certain resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is out of order.

Mr. RHODES: The question of the legality of the resolution can be determined in committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I assume that when this resolution was submitted to His Excellency there was then in existence chapter 58 of the statutes of last year, and I assume that on the advice of either the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) or the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) His Excellency was apprised of the exact section of this resolution which was to amend an existing statute of Canada involving the expenditure of money. I think the house is entitled to know whether or not His Excellency has been apprised that this House of Commons is to be asked to approve a resolution to amend a statute which has expired since the approval of His Excellency was first obtained.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the Minister of Finance is as dull as he would have us believe. I did not suggest in any way, shape or form that His Excellency had ever approved or recommended to this house a resolution which would be the basis of a bill to support the spending of money from March 1 to May 1. What I did say—and I repeat it—was that all His Excellency has agreed to is a resolution to cover the expenditure of money only after a bill founded on the resolution becomes law and has received the approval of His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has anticipated my ruling, the only ruling possible in the matter, as I see it. The motion now before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: For a specific purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER: —for a specific purpose. When the house has gone into committee and undertakes that specific purpose is the proper time to raise the question as to whether or not this resolution is in order. I refer the house to standing order 60 which reads:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint;—

That has been done.

—and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote do pass thereupon.

It is not in order to now pass upon the terms of the resolution which it is proposed to discuss in committee. All that can be done by the house is to go into committee of the whole to consider the resolution as read, at which time it may do anything it pleases. In my opinion the time has not arisen to decide whether or not the proposed resolution is in order; the only motion before the house is that the Speaker do leave the chair, and that motion is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If your honour's view is that the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair for the house to consider something which is not within the jurisdiction of parliament is in order, then I must take exception to your honour's ruling and appeal therefrom. I regret to have to do this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Bennett, seconded by Mr. Rhodes, having moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

A point of order has been raised by Mr. Mackenzie King that the resolution is out of order. The Speaker having decided that the only motion before the house is that the Speaker do now leave the chair, which is in order, and Mr. Mackenzie King having appealed from said decision, the question now is: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained?

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, in the debate on this resolution I submit to hon. members that everything in connection with the whole history of unemployment and farm relief is open for discussion. I think hon. members will find in the resolution now before us, innocent looking though it is, more objectionable features than were to be found in the monstrosity of last session which passed under the caption of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act.

In effect, the suggestion now is made that we should reenact the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act as from the date the bill to be founded on the proposed resolution becomes law, namely when it receives the assent of His Excellency the Governor General. Hon. members will have to consider whether, after the experience they have had in the last year, they are content in effect to put upon the statute books of the session of 1932 an act in the terms of the unemployment and farm relief act of last year but expiring on the first of May next.

In the year 1930 the need, as it was represented throughout the country, was for relief and adequate measures to deal with and to remedy unemployment. Everywhere on the hustings and at various meetings addressed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) promises were made that unemployment would be ended. No suggestion was given at that time that there could be any doubt about it; no qualifications were attached in any way. The statement was made that unemployment would cease and that work would be available for all who were willing to work.

When at the special session of 1930, however we came to consider the medium through which this relief was to be accomplished, we were met with a proposal, not carefully considered and capable of meeting the situation having regard to the various avocations to be considered, but comprised in a bare, bald provision to the effect that there should be contributed out of the consolidated revenue of Canada the sum of $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. Owing to the fact that the present Prime Minister wanted to go immediately to attend meetings of the Imperial economic conference, parliament passed the measure. At the same time amendments were made to the tariff changing not only the schedules but giving to the governor in council many of the powers of parliament with regard to the valuation of goods for duty purposes.

Winter passed; unemployment was not relieved, but became greater than before; so that in the session of 1931 we were met with a proposal that measures for unemployment relief should be given a new lease of life, and that the bill which the government is now attempting to resurrect, and which was to enable the Prime Minister to carry out his pledges, should be passed. That bill was passed—a bill giving to hon. members occupying the treasury benches all the powers of parliament, so far as the exercise of legislative and administrative jurisdiction was concerned, and containing no limit as to the amount which might be spent. In other words, the powers of parliament and the unlimited resources of the treasury of Canada were taken into the hands and keeping of the cabinet. During the past year that act has been in operation. One might have expected that during that time the government would have gained sufficient experience to enable it at this time to come before the country and make a proposal which would deal in a businesslike way, with our unemployment situation. Instead of that however we have before us what at first sight would appear to be an innocent resolution, an innocent amendment, reminding one of the old game we used to play at school, but instead of rubbing out "x" and putting in "o" we are now rubbing out "March" and putting in "May". The purpose of the bill is to vest in the members of the government of Canada until the first of May those wide powers to which I have referred. One might have imagined the government would have realized that a large number of people in Canada have only the commodity of labour for sale, and that in some way or other, with its vast powers and the ability it is supposed to possess, the government would have made it possible for those labouring men to dispose of that commodity in exchange for wages.

When the right hon. gentleman was sitting on this side of the house I have heard him make statements constituting not a suggestion of policy, nothing definite as to what he would do, but consisting for the most part of this phrase repeated over and over again: "Statemanship is not so barren but what a solution can be found for any problem which presents itself." At other times when my right hon. friend was asked what his policy was he has quoted those words of Gladstone of which he seems to be so fond: "When I am called in I will prescribe." He has been called in. An opportunity has been given to him to prepare the prescription. In this year of grace 1932, after sixteen months trial of makeshift legislation, at a time when the life of a bill is about to expire, there is put on the order paper of this house a suggestion that such bill be renewed for a period of two months. What does it mean? The meaning is that my hon. friends opposite have not been able to work out a solution for the problem; it is a confession of defeat and an admission that they do not know what to do. Like Micawber they hoped that something would turn up, that times would get better and that unemployment might decrease. But conditions did not inprove; from day to day they became worse, and finally one day in council meeting someone said: "The Unemployment and Farm Relief Act is running out; what will we do about unemployment?"—and the casual answer was "Oh, well, let us extend the old act for a couple of months." That is the policy which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and his cabinet bring before the country at this time. After the promises which have been made, after the undertakings which have been given, after the support which has been received, after having had a comfortable majority on that side of the house in order to work their will and do whatever they wish, yes, and with the whole power of parliament in their hands, they have to confess: The best we can do is to renew the note for a couple of months in the hope that something will turn up.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And they are late at that.

Mr. RALSTON: And as my hon. friend remarks, before the renewal comes the note is overdue. One would have thought that when this session was called early in February, and the figures showed that unemployment was even worse than it had been—I am sorry to say—when that situation appeared one would have thought that the very first piece of legislation to be put on the order paper by the government would be something in connection with unemployment. What do we find? The Juvenile Delinquents Act has to be amended and that is trotted out, the Destructive Insect and Pest Act has to be passed through all its stages, and investigations have to be launched about this, that and the other thing because somebody happened to make faces at somebody else; all these things are dealt with, but no action is taken with respect to the vital question of unemployment until February 26, three days before the act ran out—at that they had to count on leap year, and then this resolution is put on the order paper. Its purpose, as I said before, is simply to scratch out "March" and put in "May." Possibly by that time parliament may be prorogued. But that is the way the unemployment problem has been dealt with by the government. Some member of the government woke up to the fact that they were pretty nearly at the end of the month and made the bright and original suggestion: We will run the act along until the first of May.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the act itself, because having had this experience the government knows what that legislation has enabled them to accomplish. Judged by the test of experience I submit that the legislation has proved to be pitiably inadequate and futile as a practical measure to relieve unemployment. I submit further that the cost has been extravagant and the expenditure wasteful. I submit, thirdly, that, due to lack of proper supervision, in many cases the relief has not reached those for whom it was intended.

Let me deal first with the results accomplished in the way of providing practical employment. The only statement we have is that which was made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) on February 23rd in connection with the debate on the amendment by the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) to a motion that your honour leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply. This afternoon the Prime Minister in proposing the resolution gave us a comprehensive and lucid statement, as it was quite properly characterized by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), with regard to the operation of the act. But after all this was only a general outline, and even yet we have not been advised what the government knows with regard to the actual experience and the details of its administration. The only information given to us is to be found in the figures which were furnished by the Minister of Labour a couple of weeks ago in which he told the house that there was spent in 1930 $70,472,832, of which the federal government's share was $17,372,848; and that in 1931 the aggregate expenditure was $76,426,387, of which the federal authorities spent $32,822,847.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to correct the hon. gentleman—not spent; authorized.

Mr. RALSTON: I thank my right hon. friend for the correction. The country, then, has been committed to an expenditure of $146,899,219; that is the total of federal, provincial and municipal expenditures, as I understand it, less $50,195,695, which has been spent or undertaken to be spent by the federal government, leaving a balance of $96,703,524 for expenditures undertaken by the provinces. So that in round figures the federal government has spent, or committed itself to an expenditure of $50,000,000; the provincial and municipal authorities, $100,000,000. Here is where my difficulty comes in. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister says that there are commitments for some of this; some has not been spent—how much I do not know. Can my right hon. friend give me any information with respect to the amount expended?

Mr. BENNETT: Not half has yet been expended; if that is what the hon. gentleman means.

Mr. RALSTON: Not half of the federal commitment—

Mr. BENNETT: Has been spent.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the labour been performed?

Mr. BENNETT: Not entirely. The position is this: at the end of the year the provinces took an inventory of the situation with the municipalities to see what works might not be continued; and in the light of the knowledge which is now before the government one half probably of the $32,000,000 has not yet been expended.

Mr. RALSTON: I find it very difficult to deal with the matter, Mr. Speaker. I shall have to deal with it on the figures furnished by the Minister of Labour and as they appear in the Labour Gazette; then my right hon. friend and his colleagues can point out any inaccuracies in my calculations. I think the Minister of Labour did say the amount had been spent, and I take it the labour had been performed, but possibly cheques had not been issued. The difficulty is to find what was spent and what employment was provided. If you look at the Labour Gazette of September 31, you will find that up to August 31, 1931, there had been 327,990 men employed doing 7,228,744 so-called man-days' work. According to the statement made by the Minister of Labour the other day from August 31, 1931, up to January 31, 1932, there were 334,301 men employed for 7,415,973 man-days. That means that for that first period every man worked an average of 22 1/20 days —dividing the number of men into the number of man-days; and for the latter period, up to January 31, 1932, there were provided 22¼ days for each man, or a little over 44 days' work per man during the combined periods. Therefore as a result of this unemployment relief measure, during the period from October 1, 1930, to January 31, 1931, roughly four hundred working days, there has been supplied only three days' work out of a month to the men who have been given employment. Am I not correct in saying that the act has proved to be pitiably inadequate to provide employment for the great number of men who are out of work? I think any measure which could not provide more than three days' work a month for the number of men who apparently are idle is a measure which has not succeeded to a very great degree in satisfying the undertakings which were made by the Prime Minister at the time of the election.

That is the result as far as the provision of employment is concerned. It means that work was provided for ten per cent of the time for six per cent of the population of Canada by this measure which was to provide work for all who were willing to work—work and not doles—and which was to end unemployment. Now let us look at the cost, and here is where I find some difficulty, because my right hon. friend the Prime Minister says it is not all expended as yet. However, taking the amounts as given by the Minister of Labour the other day, I find that there was spent or committed for some $146,899,219 by federal, provincial and municipal governments.

Mr. STEVENS: And railways.

Mr. RALSTON: Did the Minister of Labour say anything about railways?

Mr. MANION: I did not speak at all.

Mr. RALSTON: No; my friend the Minister of Labour was the one who gave the figures, and I did not hear him say anything about railways. As I say, there was spent some $146,899,219. To employ all those men at $3 per day for the 14,000,000 odd man-days—that is, combining the two groups of man-days of about 7,000,000 each, you would have spent something like $44,000,000 instead of $146,000,000. Someone may say the difference is made up by the cost of materials. It is a pretty large percentage for materials—that is, if you assume that $100,000,000 out of the $146,000,000 was spent on materials. Possibly it may not have been spent, as my right hon. friend says; we only have the statement made by the Minister of Labour, but this fact remains, that to pay those men $3 a day for every day they worked would have cost $44,000,000; and the next fact is that according to the Minister of Labour we have committed ourselves to spend, or have spent, some $146,000,000, or three times the amount spent for labour. Possibly much of that went for materials, but does anyone say that those who produced the materials are necessarily those for whom employment should be provided? This money was a special vote for the purpose of providing employment for those specially in need, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it has got a long way beyond that when we have spent $100,000,000 more than would actually be necessary to pay the men for every day worked under this scheme.

Now, with regard to the effect, the other day my right hon. leader quoted figures to show that there is a decreasing line of index figures of employment in practically every vocation; that we are without rejuvenation of industry, notwithstanding the tariff; that we are far from being back to the days of 1927 or 1928, or even 1926 as far as employment is concerned. I could give, Mr. Speaker, many figures which are published in the statement of the Bureau of Statistics, but I will content myself with placing on Hansard just one series of figures which appear in the February statement, just issued. I refer to the index numbers of employment by economic areas, and I will give the figures for five dates, January 1, 1930, January 1, 1931, February 1, 1931, January 1, 1932, and February 1, 1932. For the whole of Canada the employment figure on January 1, 1930, was 111·2; on January 1, 1931, it had gone down 10 points, and was 101·7; on February 1, 1931, it had gone down another point and was 100·7; on January 1, 1932, it was 91·6, and on February 1, 1932, it was 89·7, which does not show much success in providing employment as far as industry is concerned. Someone may ask what figures I can give with regard to employment generally, with regard to the labouring classes. I have inquired, but I am unable to find any survey made by this government since last September which would give us any idea of how many unemployed there are in this country at this time. There was an estimate made of something like 330,000, I think, in September last, but from that time on we have had no information whatever and no one can tell. But I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if anyone needs to have statistics quoted to show that there is unemployment in this country at the present time. All you have to do is ask the federated charities; ask the Red Cross; ask the relief societies; ask the citizens' committees; go out on the street, and you will know whether unemployment has been lessened or whether it has been even improved as a result of the legislation we are asked to renew.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the scheme has failed as far as providing work for any great number of men over any sustained period is concerned; it has failed as far as cost is concerned; it has failed because the figures of employment have gone down instead of increasing; it has failed to show any improvement in the unemployment situation, and lastly the scheme has failed also in that in a great many cases it has not reached the people for whom it was intended. To-night I do not propose to go into a number of individual cases, but I want to make a statement with regard to some cases which have come to my notice and which have been brought to my attention, in order to indicate at least in some instances what has happened with regard to this money. Cases have been brought to my attention in which men with bank accounts were given employment; men in good circumstances have been given work in connection with unemployment relief. One case brought to my attention was that of a man so well off that he was able to loan money to the school section. Work has been given single men with no responsibilities whatever. Men of this kind have been taken on in connection with unemployment relief work in the section of the country which I happen to represent, and they have kept out of work sons of widowed mothers who were the only support of the family; returned soldiers in need; men with large families of from five to nine children who had to get help from their neighbours. These have not been allowed to work, while men of the class to which I have referred have been taken on these jobs supposed to have been provided for those most in need.

I am not suggesting that this has been universal; I certainly hope it has not, but I am saying that it has resulted from the lack of supervision which I brought to the attention of the former Minister of Labour myself. I came to Ottawa to see his officers in an endeavour to have these things run in such a way that those who needed work should have it, but I am sorry to say that at least in a number of instances that idea has not been carried out. I think the right hon. Prime Minister perhaps has not grasped the situation when he speaks in generalities and says that by and large the thing has been well done. The individual we have been trying to reach is the man hard up, the man down and out, the man who is destitute, the man whose family is in need. It does not do him any good to say that a large part of the money has been well spent, or something like that. The thing is that he has been left off the job; his family are in want and have to be helped by neighbours, while others in good circumstances are taken on.

That situation could be cured only in one way. It could not be cured with people staying here in Ottawa and issuing orders. It could not be cured by passing orders in council; one such order in council was passed.

The only way to cure it is to evolve a system whereby the work in the community will be dealt out and apportioned by some independent body like the Red Cross, the overseers of the poor, a citizens' committee or something of the kind which knows conditions in that locality and is able to say, "This man is in a more needy position than the other man and we do not care anything about the man's race, colour, politics or religion. Unfortunately that has not been done; all the orders in council that were issued from Ottawa, and all the supervision that was attempted to be carried on from here did not help one little bit to get that man who needed work a position, so long as the actual dealing out of the work, the apportioning of the work, was left to the local patronage committee in the particular neighbourhood where the work was going on.

Now that is what has taken place; that is the complaint I have with regard to even the number of men mentioned here who are supposed to have got work. There were a good many of them who were in a very much better position financially than many of their neighbours who were refused work because of political partisanship on the part of those who actually had charge or took charge of selecting those who were to be taken on. And it could not be otherwise so long as you had, in a great many cases, men who needed work kept standing outside a Conservative government committee room, waiting to hear whether or not their names were going to be put on the pay-roll in connection with the job. So long as that was the situation you could not have a fair distribution of the work. In many cases this was not done, but in many cases it was done; and I say, regardless of the fact that hon. gentlemen who occupy the government benches may have had the best intentions, the result has been that in many instances the work has failed to go to those for whom it was intended.

I brought to the notice of the Minister of Labour some of these very matters and asked him to investigate it; I asked him whether he would not appoint someone altogether outside the realm of political patronage. In connection with an ordinary public work, if the friends of those in power happen to be put on the job, very well; I am not making any complaint. But when money is voted for people who are unemployed and destitute, and an order in council is passed providing that the money shall be given to those who need it, the government cannot go too far in seeing to it that that intention and that spirit is carried out and that those should be given jobs who are in need of work.

What is suggested to be done here is that this act which has not worked out in practice, shall be resuscitated, resurrected and once more put into force. My right hon. leader has shown more clearly than I can why this piece of legislation should be rejected at this time and why the suggestion which he has made should be accepted with regard to assisting those in want. Last year we protested and warned our friends that this was not the sort of legislation to pass in the year 1932. We pointed out that there was no need of taking the powers contained in this act. Well I remember the night the Solicitor General, a member of this government, dared us to vote against the bill. He intimated that if we voted against it it would be said that we were taking the bread out of the mouths of women and children, and he dared us to oppose the bill. We did not vote against the bill but we protested as strongly as we could and told him that notwithstanding the fact that it was against our ideas of responsible government we would vote for it in order to see that the object at which it aimed would be accomplished. That evidently has been taken as a sign of weakness. As my right hon. leader suggested this afternoon, the government should not ask us to do it again. An offer has been made whereby money will be provided without stint to take care of the present situation, and I submit that the Prime Minister and his government should seriously consider that offer. What is the situation? It is proposed now that we shall pass an act vesting all the powers of the federal parliament, as to peace, order and good government in Canada, in hon. gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches, and that, forsooth, while we are sitting in this House of Commons, sent here supposedly by the people to represent them under the constitutional prerogative which is theirs, while we are actually sitting here our friends on the treasury benches may be over in the east block passing an order in council to send an expeditionary force to China under the provisions of that act. While we were actually assembled that might be done. An hon. member suggests that this is preposterous. It may be preposterous; nevertheless that is the exact position. And what is more—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman doesn't mean that, of course.

Mr. RALSTON: I do.

Mr. BENNETT: Does he know nothing about the Militia Act and the calling together of parliament?

Mr. RALSTON: I know about the Militia Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Then why make that statement?

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will read the Militia Act he will see that it provides that parliament shall be called together. But parliament is here already, and the Prime Minister and his government can, if they see fit, send an expeditionary force such as I suggest. They can do more than that. Under the rules as to peace, order and good government they could if they so desired—I know they would not do it, but this serves to indicate how preposterous this legislation is—pass a regulation to the effect that any of us who did not bow and take off our hats as we passed them should be guilty of an offence against the peace, order and good government of Canada and liable to a fine of a thousand dollars or imprisonment for three years. It is done in Italy, as my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) says. I suggest this merely to show how preposterous it is to think of our vesting in hon. gentlemen opposite all the powers we are supposed to exercise when we represent here the people of the country. But my right hon. friend will say, "Hold on. What we will do is to bring in the order in council which we have passed in the morning and lay it on the table of the house in the afternoon and tell you we have done it." What good will that do? Suppose they make a treaty; well, it has already been done, and they are merely locking the stable after the horse is stolen. My right hon. friend knows that in England they have passed the Abnormal Imports Bill, giving the government power to make certain regulations with regard to certain imports; and they have been so careful about it that the government is required to lay the order in council on the table of the house and if it is not ratified within twenty-eight days it ceases to be law. The Prime Minister does not even offer us that sop in connection with this legislation. He proposes to be able to pass orders in council and will merely lay it on the table and tell us it has been done. That is not constitutional government, and there is nothing at this time that requires the passage of any such legislation.

A good deal has been said about the blank cheque. In this regard, Mr. Speaker, I only want to refer to a rule with which you are more familiar than the rest of us. We are asked to pass a bill giving to our friends unlimited power to vote unlimited amounts of money. Here is the rule which governs us in matters of this sort—standing order 61:

> All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house, as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

That is the power we want to exercise, to direct and limit, to prescribe limitations and qualifications of the grant. But my hon. friends opposite propose that we shall give up that right entirely and hand it over to them, even though we may happen to be in session at the time.

The Prime Minister regaled us this afternoon with a few decisions of the privy council with respect to constitutional matters. I am not going to deal with them now, but with all due deference to him I do not think they had a great deal to do with the discussion in connection with this bill. They did indicate that the War Measures Act had been held to be intra vires of this parliament. No one is suggesting that this act is not intra vires in the wide terms in which it is framed. My right hon. friend read a passage to the effect that the government had some discretion in deciding whether the time of emergency had actually come. But let me read to him a decision with regard to the rights of the House of Commons and the limitations upon the executive with respect both to the taxation of the people and the expenditure of the people's money. This was a case that occurred in England during the war, and it came under the Defence of the Realm Act. A regulation had been made whereby the food controller could regulate the sale and distribution of milk. The food controller had imposed upon one particular individual a tax of two pence per gallon in connection with the distribution of milk in a certain area, and the individual had agreed to pay. Upon being advised afterwards that it was unconstitutional and ultra vires the individual refused to live up to his agreement and the result, in short, was that the crown failed to recover. Why? Because if an act does not in the most express terms give away to the executive the powers of parliament, those powers shall be held not to have been surrendered. The following is a passage from the judgment of Lord Atkin:

> No power to make a charge upon the subject for the use of the crown could arise except by virtue of the prerogative or by statute, and the alleged right under the prerogative was disposed of finally by the Bill of Rights. It may be convenient at this stage to remind ourselves of this statute, an act for declaring the rights and liberties of the subject.

I ask my right hon. friend to listen to this—of course there is no personal implication intended. The judgment continues:

After reciting that the late king, by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, judges, and ministers, employed by him, did endeavour to subvert and extirpate . . . the laws and liberties of this kingdom . . . by levying money for and to the use of the crown by pretence of prerogative for other time and in other manner than the same was granted by parliament . . . all of which are utterly and directly contrary to the known laws and statutes and freedom of this realm, the lords and commons declare that levying money for or to the use of the crown is illegal; and pray that it may be declared and enacted that all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the above declaration are the true ancient and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom and shall be strictly holden and observed . . . and all officers and ministers whatsoever shall serve their Majesties and their successors according to the same in all times to come, all of which their Majesties are contented and pleased shall be declared and enacted and established by authority of this present parliament and shall stand, remain and be the law of this realm for ever, and the same are by their said Majesties by and with the advice and consent, &c., declared, enacted and established accordingly. Though the attention of our ancestors was directed especially to abuses of the prerogative, there can be no doubt that this statute declares the law that no money shall be levied for or to the use of the crown except by grant of parliament. We know how strictly parliament has maintained this right—and, in particular, how jealously the House of Commons has asserted its predominance in the power of raising money. An elaborate custom of parliament has prevailed by which money for the service of the crown is only granted at the request of the crown made by a responsible minister and assented to by a resolution of the house in committee. By constitutional usage no money proposal can be altered by the second chamber, whose powers are confined to acceptance or rejection.

and note this Mr. Speaker,

"Similar elaborate checks exist in respect to authority for expenditure of the public revenue, both in respect to obtaining the statutory authority to expend money and to obtain the executive acts necessary to place the money at the disposal of the spending authority."

And there he goes on to speak of "the historic struggle of the legislature to secure for itself the sole power to levy money on the subject, its complete success in that struggle" and "the elaborate means adopted by the representative house to control the amount and the conditions and purposes of the levy." That is the principle which I invoke here. I submit that this decision goes the full length of intimating how far parliament may insist on its ancient rights to regulate, to limit and to qualify grants of money. I say that the bill proposed to be introduced will be in direct contravention of the principles laid down in this case and which have governed our responsible institutions for hundreds of years.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part to-night in this debate may I say that I do not think there has been a question before this house for years which included in its make-up so many angles which any Liberal would like to discuss. In discussing this question of the administration during the past year of unemployment and farm relief, may I touch upon a point or two raised this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). He made the statement that there must be a clear line of demarcation between dominion and provincial jurisdiction, and went on to argue that apart from the promises made in 1930 the policy of the government since coming into office has been to deal with this unemployment problem and this relief question largely in a municipal and provincial manner. It is true the federal government has taken action but that action has been anything but purely national action and, therefore, the promises and pledges given to the people in the elections have not been adhered to. I am at a loss to know just where the Prime Minister stands on the question of jurisdiction, provincially or nationally, because he has made more than one pronouncement in this house which has left considerable doubt. Sometimes he stands for the supremacy of the provinces, sometimes he stands for the supremacy of the dominion, and at other times he throws the one into the other and tells us that the both combined can do practically anything as far as the public funds of the country are concerned.

Apart from the constitutional question, there is a moral obligation devolving upon the Prime Minister and his government, but that fact was by no means emphasized this afternoon strongly enough. The Prime Minister dealt with the taking of notes from those granted relief; he argued that these notes were taken so that the relief need not be considered as charity. The danger is that these notes will constitute a political hold upon the individual during elections, and this is a danger to democracy and to the wise expenditure of public funds. I am opposed to that principle and I do not believe the government will gain one cent by the taking of these notes from the destitute farmers in western Canada.

These men, once they understand the situation, will do their best to repay the government if they ever should have money, and I believe that they would pay the government more willingly without a note than they will with one. Much of this money will never be repaid, so why have notes signed? That is a question which will have to be explained so that destitute western farmers from whom these notes have been peremptorily demanded will know exactly the reason why they have had to give them.

This afternoon the Prime Minister admitted that in asking for approval of this resolution upon which a bill will be based he was asking for authority outside of the ordinary authority constituted in any Canadian parliament. That is an important admission. It is so important that it brings before us the whole development of responsible government in this country. I am one of those who say that apart from the development of constitutional government in this dominion, there is not much else nationally worth while. If we throw to the winds the results of the fight our forefathers made to win the rights of responsible and representative government in Canada, we have not much left. In 1840, when we were handed a constitution, and when the right of responsible government was won in this country, we thought we had passed forever any days like those through which we are now passing; we thought the question of responsible government was settled for good, although in 1843 it was taken away and then restored in 1849. But from 1849 on we did not think the head of any government, Liberal or Conservative, or whatever the party in power might be, would ever, at least in our national legislature, dare infringe upon parliamentary usages and powers as was done last year and as is being done now.

Therefore I say that it devolves upon us on this side of the house to oppose any move for any authority that we do not think is necessary, any move to take away from parliament any sovereign authority it possesses, any move to take away from the members who are here their rights under the constitution, because those rights have been guaranteed and have been handed down to us from generation to generation. Consequently, although we on this side of the house are prepared to vote without any delay or procrastination, any amount of money that is absolutely required for seed and feed, yet, if the Prime Minister of the day will not so arrange his legislation that the idea of giving the executive too much authority is eliminated, nothing is left for us to do but to oppose such unwarranted autocracy and to oppose it to the bitter end.

In speaking on the question of unemployment, I think it might be well to get a historic perspective of unemployment conditions in Canada during the last few decades. Prior to 1896, after the Conservatives had been in power, almost eighteen years from 1878, what were the conditions in this country? We know commerce was at a low ebb; we know that industry was practically strangled; we know that deficit after deficit was shown by the government of the day every time the house would meet, and we know that the great west was not even opened up under the high tariff of the past. We know Canada was discouraged and by 1896 the business of the country was almost at a standstill. Then the people of Canada took it into their hands to deal with the question of unemployment, to deal with a tariff machine the working of which had baffled the Conservatives, and questions that the powers of the day could not successfully face themselves. At that time the people of Canada defeated the government that was then in power and put a Liberal government in its place. What was the result? For the next number of years unemployment disappeared; there was no unemployment from 1896 to 1911. There was progress all along the line, industrially and commercially, and Canada developed and progressed as never before.

Then in 1913, under a Conservative government again, we find unemployment coming to the fore. We find another depression which lapsed when the great war began. But in 1920 and 1921, after Conservative rule for ten years, unemployment conditions again developed in Canada, and before the people could acquire control of the situation we had deficits as in days gone by. In 1920 there was a deficit of $92,000,000; in 1921 there was a deficit of $81,000,000, so that you have in two years a deficit of almost $200,000,000. Along with these deficits there was unemployment. Commerce was at a standstill as previously; industry was not developing, and consequently the country was not progressing nor was it as prosperous as it should be. Again the people of Canada took things into their hands, and in the election of 1921 the government of the day was defeated and the Liberals were returned to power.

The Liberals remained in power from 1921 until 1930. What were the conditions during those nine years? It did not take long for deficits to disappear. From 1924 on there were no more deficits. Trade grew as it had never grown before. There was prosperity abroad in the land. Unemployment disappeared and was an unknown quantity for nine years. The reason was that there was in power a party that had a Liberal policy, a policy that tapped the resources of the world and linked Canada up with them, that tapped the resources of the empire and linked Canada up with them, a policy that encouraged trade within the confines of the dominion.

It might be well to point out that prior to 1930, even though times were prosperous and conditions were good, a very important world situation was developing and that world situation, so far as strangling trade is concerned, was caused by the erection of tariff walls practically all around the world. The erection of those tariff walls produced such a situation in the markets of the world that every nation was out for himself, out for the principle of economic nationalism, out for the principle of self-sufficiency, which in the last analysis always proves wrong. In this case it proved wrong too, helping to develop an international situation that was dangerous. What did our opponents say? They said: Here we have a party in power and a situation developing and we are going to hold them responsible for the whole thing. In 1928 and 1929 they went across Canada from ocean to ocean, and what did they say? They blamed the condition that was developing upon the Liberal prime minister of the day, upon the Liberal party, upon the policy of the Liberal party. They said: Unless you remove this party from power; unless you have a change of policy; unless you have Conservative high tariffs rather than Liberal trade treaties and Liberal low tariffs, you are going to have national destruction follow in the train of the party in power—follow in the wake of Liberalism. So they went from one part of Canada to the other, and by their talk and exhortation and declamations they practically undermined trade, commerce and industry in the dominion, with the result that by the time the election took place in 1930 a situation had developed that was somewhat dangerous. What did they assert? They asserted: This is not a world situation; this is a national condition, and it has been brought about by the policies of the Liberal party, by the Liberal party as a governing force in Canada, and therefore that party ought to be defeated. They went out in the election; they carried that fight into the election, and there is no question that they made a political football of unemployment.

In May, 1930, the unemployment index in Canada was practically 9 per cent, whereas in the United States it was 20 per cent, and in Great Britain 14 per cent. For the next two or three months that unemployment index remained practically stationary. After the promises and pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite were broadcast throughout Canada and reached the minds of all the Canadian people, after the promises were held out to thousands and thousands of people with the argument that they would be given jobs and that about a billion dollars would be spent to give them jobs, unemployment grew apace. Never before in the history of Canada did it grow with such rapidity. The result was that conditions became worse and worse until the time of the special session of parliament when there were 200,000 unemployed.

What policy do we find hon. gentlemen opposite evolving to meet the unemployment situation? We know they did only one thing, they had only one policy, a policy sixty years old, the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald involving high tariffs, restricted markets, exploitation of individuals, and so on. They said, "If this cannot cure unemployment, nothing will." So they went to work and raised the tariff wall sky high around Canada, they did exactly what the other nations of the world had been foolishly doing; they played the high tariff game to the limit and it is no wonder to-night that we find they have sown to the wind and reaped the whirlwind. Moreover, their action taken during the special session of parliament in 1930 was repeated in the regular session of last year. Last year they deliberately raised the tariff, schedule after schedule, where lower tariffs had been in effect for years.

So to-day we have a situation in Canada whereby unemployment is gradually becoming worse; thousands upon thousands find themselves out of work. On August 1, 1930, the employment index was 118; that was a time immediately after the election. On December 1, 1931, the employment index was 99·1; on January 1, one month later and in the year 1932, employment had dropped down to 91·6. On February 1, only a few days ago, the employment index was only 89·7. So the pendulum, so far as employment is concerned, has been swinging down dangerously from 118 to 89·7.

What about unemployment? When the Conservatives assumed power on July 31, 1930, unemployment was rated at 9·2. On December 1, 1931, it was 18·6—double the amount it had been a year before. On May 1, 1930, the figure was 9; thus unemployment had increased only ·2 per cent in two or three months. Let us, however, note the increase since that time. From about 9 per cent the index has gone to over 18 per cent—actually to over 21 per cent on January 1, 1932—in other words unemployment in Canada has more than doubled. This question arises: What policy has the government to meet the unemployment problem?

Mr. SPENCE: Let us hear your policy.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am asking for yours.

Mr. SPENCE: Give us yours.

Mr. McINTOSH: You are on the government side of the house, and are responsible. It is about time your government came forward and told the country what is its unemployment policy. If they do not they are bound to "perish in the attempt" to effect a cure for national conditions.

Now, what were we told during the election campaign of 1930? At Victoria the Prime Minister said, "It is not doles you want, it is work." But their policy to-day is one of doles. The people do not want doles, they want work. The reason there is not sufficient work is that the policy of the government has been futile. Once more I ask hon. members in the cabinet what their unemployment policy is. Is it one of doles? Is it one of high tariffs? Is it one of restricted markets? Is it one of trying to get something from world and empire nations without a reciprocal trade arrangement? It is about time the country knew the policy the government is endeavouring to formulate.

I said that at Victoria the Prime Minister had said, "It is not doles you want, it is work." At Calgary he said, "The question has got beyond a municipal question, it is beyond a provincial question; it is a national problem." At Edmonton he said, "You return us to power and we will give work to all who can or will work." At Moncton, New Brunswick he said, "If you return us to power we will solve the unemployment problem or perish in the attempt. We will bring employment and prosperity to Canada as a whole. We are going to take hold of the problem and solve it." At another point in New Brunswick the Prime Minister said he was out to give equality of opportunity and fair trading privileges to the Canadian nation among the other nations of the world. More than that, in the province of Quebec he said, "It is not conferences you want; you want work." At Montreal he said, "It is a national problem." At Sarnia what did he say? He said, "Some person is to blame for unemployment; who is it?" The inference was that the Prime Minister of the day was to blame, that the Liberal party was to blame and that if the present Prime Minister were placed in power he would solve the unemployment difficulties and receive credit for its solution. There is the situation—clear and plain.

What is the result? To-day after eighteen or twenty months of Conservative rule in Canada unemployment is worse than it ever has been in the history of the country. Not only has unemployment grown, but the government has no policy but one of autocracy—none whatsoever. As a consequence we may expect as in the past a waste of much public money and no progress made until eternal nature will rejuvenate not only unemployment but the party which arrogantly promised to solve it.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I was interested in some of the remarks made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). I want to congratulate the Minister of Labour upon the high position he holds in his party and in Canada. He comes from my native county and I am only too pleased to see him occupying his present important position. I know whatever he tries to do he will do sincerely. In congratulating him however may I say that in some of his explanations before the house a few days ago he touched upon the fact that times are not as prosperous as they had been in previous years. At that time I believe the minister was comparing the year 1930 with the years 1928, 1929 and those preceding. If at that time he was comparing the year 1929 and preceding years with years which have followed he was quite right in stating that conditions are not as prosperous. May I point out that in the year 1929 the total trade of Canada ran to $2,654,000,000; in 1930 it dropped to $2,300,000,000; in 1931 it dropped to $1,700,000,000. Gradually since 1930, or since the Conservative party has been in power trade has been disappearing, growing less and less, until to-day instead of trade valued at $2,654,000,000, we have a trade of only about $1,000,000,000. No wonder unemployment has increased, no wonder many people are discouraged, no wonder it is high time to increase purchasing power to put the people on their feet, no wonder Canadians are asking: What is this government doing by way of hammering out a real all-Canadian policy?

The hon. Minister of Labour in discussing unemployment spoke about the railway situation and said that Canada was over-railroaded. That may be true with respect to certain parts of the dominion—we have miles and miles of railway duplication in certain parts of western Canada; these sections, have certainly been railroaded in a wrong way. But there are other parts in northern Alberta, in northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba that are not over-railroaded. It is these very parts that are going to suffer now by reason of the policy that hon. gentlemen opposite are putting forward not only with respect to unemployment, but with respect to every other problem confronting the country. Only this afternoon I asked a question on the orders of the day about a belt of territory in northern Saskatchewan that requires a railway over one hundred miles in length. That territory is between North Battleford and Edmonton and extends northwestward towards the Pacific ocean. There is not a foot of that country but would pay for the grading and steeling of a railway. Into that part of Saskatchewan for the last two years settlers have trekked from the dried-out and near dried-out areas. People have also come in from all parts of the dominion. Apparently that section is not to be given the railway facilities that are due it, if we do not get the government to reconsider the railway problem in the upper end of northwestern Saskatchewan. Those people are miles and miles from a railway, they are raising hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat, to say nothing of coarse grains and live stock but they have to haul these products for forty, fifty and sixty miles to the nearest railroad point over nearly impassable roads.

Mr. GORDON: How can they haul their products over impassable roads?

Mr. McINTOSH: They try to do it. I ask if that is a fair and equitable policy? Those settlers are doing pioneer work, they are driving back settlement miles and miles into the north country, and the productiveness of its soil will furnish traffic sufficient to pay every cent of the capital expenditure for railways. I claim the time has arrived when those settlers ought to be given their just dues in a railway sense—they should be given the railway facilities that will enable them to develop that northern part of Saskatchewan and make it the garden of prosperity, which it will certainly become if the settlers there are given a fair deal. Thousands of settlers have gone into that northern area until to-day it is the hope of Saskatchewan. If railways are not built through that fine section of country, will you tell me how the people are going to carry on? It cannot be done, that is all.

There is another aspect of the problem that I might bring to the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon). Relief camps have been established in that northern area. If last fall before the cold weather came on the Dominion government had seen fit to put those men to work on the sixty-nine miles remaining to be steeled and the thirty-five miles remaining to be graded, that railway would have been completed. But time was wasted, the situation was dilly-dallied with, nothing was done, and now we are told that no more railways are to be built—that the Canadian National Railways are hard up; but meanwhile the Canadian Pacific may go on with their branch lines.

Mr. MANION: Are the Canadian Pacific building any branch lines?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Mr. MANION: What are they building at the present time?

Mr. McINTOSH: They have built the line from Debden to Meadow Lake.

Mr. MANION: What are they building now?

Mr. McINTOSH: They are building a line from North Battleford to Shellbrooke, and no intimation has been given that they are going to stop work.

Now, I am going to touch on the question of unemployment, for the reason that in 1928 the report of the committee on industrial and international relations on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity was accepted unanimously by this house. Many hon. gentlemen opposite were then sitting on this side, and having allowed the report to go through unchallenged they accepted the principle of unemployment insurance. The subject was further dealt with in 1930, when the committee brought in a report which after a spirited debate was endorsed by the house. One part of the report recommended that the principle of insurance against unemployment be endorsed, and also the principle of financing, namely, contributions by the state, by the employer and by the employee. The committee stated that it was no use to inaugurate a system of unemployment insurance unless a number of the provinces cooperated. The committee stated further that they felt the need of statistical data on unemployment and employment and recommended that at the next census provision should be made to secure such data.

When that report was before the house the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Liberal party endorsed it, but only after a long debate on an amendment that was defeated did the opposition allow the main motion to be accepted on division. That meant they were opposed to the report—to the principle of unemployment insurance they supported the year previous. But what is their position to-day on the question? At the present time we find the right hon. gentleman and his party asserting they are on absolutely different ground. Now, they say they are in favour of unemployment insurance. Last session, on April 29, the right hon. Prime Minister gave a statement to the house and to the country on unemployment insurance. And what did he say? Here is the position that he and his party took on that occasion:

I repeat that we have the power to appropriate the money we collect to any useful purpose this parliament may determine. The parliament of Canada may determine what shall be done with the moneys collected from the taxpayers.

All right, if they can do that without regard to the question of respective jurisdiction so far as unemployment insurance is concerned they can do it just as well with regard to the relief of unemployment. There is no need for the provinces and the municipalities to have got hopelessly muddled up in the matter. Further, he said:

This government is anxious and willing to promote in every possible way the advancement of social legislation along the lines suggested.

What a different position from that taken by him in 1929. Then he opposed the resolution, he would not let it pass except on division. In 1931, two years later, he favours it, and not only so, but says he favours the advancement of social legislation along the lines suggested. In conclusion he said:

I say to him—

That is, to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who brought in a resolution which was debated and later withdrawn after the Prime Minister made his statement.

—on behalf of the administration that at the earliest possible moment consistent with obtaining information that is essential to make any measure of insurance worth while, we will use that information for the purpose of preparing and submitting to this house a measure embodying the views I have expressed.

There you are; the Prime Minister is here on record as being in favour of unemployment insurance; he is on record as saying that all he was waiting for was information which was to be obtained through the census taken last year. If that is the position of the government and of the Prime Minister in connection with this great problem, why has not something concrete in the way of unemployment insurance been submitted to this house? Why have we not heard a word about this question since last year? The Prime Minister said he was in favour of it; presumably he spoke for the government also, but there has not been a move made, not a step taken, not a thing done for months, with the result that conditions are getting worse. My own opinion is that something constructive must be done at once or conditions will get worse than at present, and they are serious now.

What are they doing in the United States in connection with this problem? They are in a worse mess industrially than that in which we find ourselves, because of their high tariffs and because of their false policy of restricting markets, all of which they have carried on and daringly gloated over for the last eight or ten years. Are they sitting down, doing nothing? Are they exhibiting a smug complacency towards the problem? Are they satisfied to continue to vote money for the payment of doles? Are they content to follow the practice of the past, or are they out to evolve a definite policy in order to solve the problem, not only industrially but socially as well, and having in mind the benefit to the economic structure of the nation? They are not resting on their oars at all; they are taking some action. I should like to see the government of the day in Canada do the same thing or, if the policy adopted or about to be adopted by some of the states is not suited to this country, let the government dig up something that will be satisfactory, something to mark progress, to show that the government is in earnest in attacking this problem by some other method than the payment of demoralizing and pauperizing doles.

In six of the eastern states of the union, Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Ohio, they are attacking this unemployment problem in earnest. The governors of these states appointed an interstate commission to investigate unemployment and make a report. That investigation has been held; that report has been presented to at least one of the governors, the governor of New York state, who has sent the report to the state legislature asking that it take action. There is one important point in that report—namely, that of compelling each industrialist to build up a reserve, holding him responsible for stabilizing employment within his own industry—to which I should like to refer, as showing the way they are attacking this problem of unemployment in the republic to the south of us. Great Britain and the nations on the continent of Europe have approached it in a slightly different way by pooling the contributions of the state, employer and employee, but they have made progress. Canada has done nothing in either direction. Canada has made no move. Although the government said they would do something, they have done nothing, aimed at nothing and apparently hit it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take exception in the strongest possible manner to the resolution now before the house. I do so for several reasons, the first of which is that it leaves entirely unsettled and undetermined the principle of the unemployment and farm relief policy of the government of Canada. This government has been in power since the middle of 1930. They started out with a more or less well defined policy for the relief of unemployment through the construction of public works, but of course that policy was not new. I can remember hearing it advocated in this house during the last parliament, when the country was enjoying a very considerable measure of prosperity. There were a few members who said that in days of great surpluses we should not construct public works on an extensive scale but should lay up our money against the day when we would have adversity, and then we could spend it for the relief of the unemployed for whom we might have to provide.

When the government came into power they adopted that as their policy; at the emergency session of 1930 we were asked to vote and did vote $20,000,000 for the relief of unemployment. From that time until the end of the fiscal year on March 31, 1931, something more than $17,000,000 was either expended or appropriated for the relief of unemployment, and almost that entire sum was devoted to the construction of public works. The policy of constructing public works in order to relieve unemployment has certain apparent advantages. In the first place it gives wages to the unemployed and provides purchasing power which otherwise they would not have; in the second place it provides a market for materials, and in the third place it gives a stimulus to business in the localities where the works are carried on. At present in the United States of America there are many prominent public men who advocate the adoption of a similar policy, but the federal government of that country has not seen fit to do so on any large scale.

During the last few months there has been a considerable amount of discussion in the papers and before the public as to the advisability of continuing the policy of spending money on public works for the relief of unemployment. It is urged that this is a most expensive policy; it has been pointed out that since last August for every man-day of work that has been supplied the unemployed of this country, something like $10 has been spent by our various governments. If we consider the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) we find that it works out to about this figure. Speaking in the house during a debate a few days ago the minister gave the total amount spent from August 1, 1931, to the end of February of this year, and he also gave the number of man-days of work during that time. The result of those two figures, as I have indicated, shows that not this government alone but all governments in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, have paid about $10 for every man-day of work that has been supplied.

The financial papers particularly have taken exception to that policy. A fair example of the criticism one finds in those newspapers is found in the Financial Post of November 14, 1931, under the heading The Nation's Business. This is what the Post says:

> There is an idea that all this huge expenditure of government funds is creating prosperity. It is doing nothing of the sort; it is creating a worse crisis than the one it is designed to relieve. One may question that the expenditure of public money is even adding to the total of jobs that are available. We are given extensive figures to show how many men have been put to work on relief programs. But we will never know how many of these men are being denied the privilege of working at their regular jobs or on new private projects because the threat of high taxation and the freezing up of bond markets is holding back normal business development. Many institutions in Canada have large buildings planned and will go ahead with them as soon as they can see light; but they will not be able to see light so long as our governments endanger the credit basis of the country by their unchecked spending schemes. It may indeed be that every government job created now causes a private job to disappear.

Hence agitation has arisen, more or less extensive, for an alteration in the policy of the government. A policy is now being urged upon the government of confining our assistance to direct relief alone, a policy of curtailment of public expenditures, thrift, economy, reduction of the civil service, reduction in the salaries of the civil service and a decrease in expenditures on public works to the irreducible minimum. My criticism of the government, and it seems to me that it is an unanswerable criticism, is that the government, from the very time it assumed office, has never pursued consistently either the one policy or the other. It seems to be in a muddle and has no clearcut conception of what the policy of this country should be, whether it should be a policy of expenditures or a policy of retrenchment. I suggest, therefore, that before the Prime Minister comes before this house, as he does to-day, and asks for a renewal of the dictatorship mandate, so-called, he should lay before the house the fundamental principle—I do not mean the details—upon which he proposes to proceed during the coming months.

I said that the government has not been consistent. Let me illustrate what I mean by that. We appropriated something over $17,000,000 between the emergency session of 1930 and the end of the fiscal year March 31, 1931; but when the public works estimates were brought down in the following spring we found that in the estimates for 1932 there was a decrease in the appropriations for public works as compared with the preceding year of $17,694,166.31. That is to say, while with the one hand the government was spending about $17,000,000 on the expenditure theory for the relief of unemployment and the relief of depression, it was curtailing expenditures in the Public Works department alone to the extent of a little over $17,000,000 on the thrift, economy and retrenchment theory. In other words, what the Department of Public Works was doing the Department of Labour was undoing; or, if you like to put it the other way, what the Department of Labour was doing the Department of Public Works was undoing. There has been no consistency in the government's policy.

The Prime Minister reaffirmed the expenditure policy at the end of the session of 1931. At the end of July or August 1, 1931, he came before the house and, in asking for the very bill which we are asked to extend to-day, he said that the government would continue its policy of constructing public works for the relief of unemployment. And he told us in this debate this afternoon that a great many expenditures on public works had been made in various parts of Canada. Moreover, when the Public Works estimates were up not long ago the Minister of Public Works justified certain isolated projects in various constituencies of the dominion on the ground that they were necessary for the relief of unemployment. I do not want to go into that particularly, but one that will occur to us is the Haileybury breakwater expenditure of $45,000 which was justified on the ground that it was necessary for the relief of unemployment. But at the same time, in the public works estimates for the year 1933, we find a reduction in public works appropriations as compared with the previous year of $10,120,000 odd. So that we see that the policy of the government has not only been inconsistent from the time hon. gentlemen opposite took office, but it has not been uniform in various parts of Canada. It varies from place to place and from time to time and at the same time. It is impossible for the government to make any progress if they concurrently pursue two entirely incompatible, inconsistent and contrary policies. Moreover, before the Prime Minister asks the house to give him another blank cheque and to give to his government power to legislate for the Dominion of Canada, he should say by what principle he is going to be guided. What is the principle that is to guide him with reference to these expenditures in the future?

I have another objection to the resolution, and that is that it does not take into account certain emergent situations which are arising in various parts of Canada. We know that there is an emergent situation in the west; there has been since the very serious weather conditions of the year 1931; and the government has taken hold of that situation and has been careful to meet it to the best of its ability. But situations are arising elsewhere which should be brought before the House of Commons—not before the members of the government, the cabinet council, but before this House of Commons. Very little has been said by members from the maritime provinces about conditions in that part of the country. I gather the impression, from persons with whom I have talked, that they think that the maritime provinces are in a comparatively prosperous condition. I was pleased to hear to-day that Quebec and the maritime provinces did not require any direct assistance to their governments from the federal government, while this fact was not true of any other province in Canada. But let me say to the Prime Minister, to the government and to this house—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is wrong with respect to Ontario. Ontario did not either; the two and a half millions was advanced merely for work that had been done.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Prime Minister made an explanation this afternoon regarding Ontario, the significance of which I hardly caught. I understood that there was a small sum advanced to Ontario, but the right hon. gentleman's explanation is, of course, accepted, although it has very little to do with my argument. What I want to say is something about conditions in the maritime provinces. In those provinces, apparently conditions are getting worse. I wish to refer particularly to the situation which has arisen recently in the coal industry. In the month of January or December the government of Nova Scotia appointed a commission to investigate conditions in the coal industry in that province, and that commission brought in their report on February 19. The report revealed an exceedingly serious state of affairs, and when I say exceedingly serious I mean just that. The recommendation of the commission was that 2,000 men must go out of employment permanently. It means that something must be done for these men and their families, representing a population of 10,000. To give an idea of the seriousness of the situation, let me read a statement issued by Premier Harrington of Nova Scotia on February 19, 1932:

> The royal commission examining into the coal industry of the province has filed its report, and in view of the importance and urgency of the matter I am giving it publicity at once so that all our people may realize that we are faced with one of the most serious situations that has ever confronted Nova Scotia.
> The report of these capable and independent commissioners makes it clear that it is not a choice as between a wage reduction or not for the miners, or whether some miners shall be laid off by certain pits being closed,--it is the vital single question of whether coal mining in Nova Scotia can be continued as a major industry at all.

Towards the end of the statement the following appears:

> It is the purpose of the government immediately to cooperate with the federal government in an effort to work out a plan through which the least possible hardships will result to heads of families and their dependents affected by the reallocation proposals now recommended.

My submission is that a matter of such importance as the reorganization of the coal industry of Nova Scotia should de dealt with by this parliament and not by order in council, which is the power that the government is asking for by the resolution presented to-day. I am more familiar with the conditions existing in the agricultural industry in my province—I come from an agricultural constituency—than I am with those affecting other industries. The condition of agriculture is becoming gradually worse, and in all probability a situation will arise necessitating relief for agricultural distress in the maritime provinces. This matter is one of sufficient importance to call for the united consideration of this house rather than for action by order in council. I object to delegating to the government my responsibilities as a representative from the maritime provinces; I prefer to attempt to exercise to the best of my ability those responsibilities, having been elected for that purpose and having that duty vested in me under our constitution.

I submit that the most serious objection to be taken to this resolution is that a violation of the constitutional rights of the members of this house is being sought by the government of the day. It is hard to find words strong enough to characterize the action of the government in attempting to put through this resolution. It was bad enough in the emergency session of 1930 to ask for a vote of $20,000,000 for works which were not specified; it was worse in the session of 1931 to get from this parliament a blank cheque and legislation which set up a dictatorship between sessions, but it is infinitely worse for the government to have the temerity to come before this house and seek to perpetuate that dictatorship while parliament is in session.

This matter was up for discussion during the latter part of July and the first part of August, 1931. At that time we objected to certain features of certain sections of the act. The first objectionable feature with which we dealt was that no limitation was placed upon the powers of the government. Section 4 of the act reads as follows:

> The governor in council shall have full power to make all such orders and regulations as may be deemed necessary or desirable for relieving distress, providing employment and, within the competence of parliament, maintaining peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

In other words, the government was granted all the powers of parliament itself. It means that a bill passed by this house and the other chamber and assented to by His Excellency may be repealed the next day by the government sitting over in the east block or wherever it functions. They are permitted to go fair in the face of the wishes of this House of Commons; they can pass an order in council repealing legislation which the house has adopted. There has never been anything so outrageous in the history of this country. It may be said that they would not do that, but we can point to many instances where something almost as bad has been done between sessions, and to this I will refer a little later.

The second objectionable feature in the act was that there was no limitation either of the amount which could be expended or of the purpose for which it should be used. Section 2 reads as follows:

> There may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as the governor in council in his discretion may deem expedient to expend for relieving distress, providing employment and maintaining within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

The third objectionable feature was that power was being granted to create new crimes, to set up extraordinary courts and to prescribe new and unusual modes of procedure. Section 5 reads:

All orders and regulations of the governor in council shall have the force of law and shall be enforced in such manner and by such court officers and authorities as the governor in council may prescribe, and may be varied, extended or revoked by any subsequent order or regulation;

That is, the right of trial by jury might be taken away, or might be granted where it was not applicable. The section continues:

—but if any order or regulation is varied, extended or revoked, neither the previous operation thereof nor anything duly done thereunder shall be affected thereby, nor shall any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued, accruing or incurred thereunder be affected by any such variation, extension or revocation.

The fourth feature in the act to which we objected was that by implication it granted power to repeal existing legislation. Section 3 reads:

Without restricting the generality of the terms of the next preceding section hereof, and notwithstanding the provisions of any statute or law, the governor in council may,—

The section goes on to outline the powers granted notwithstanding the provisions of any other statute. It is clear that under this section the government has power to repeal by order in council the legislation of this parliament.

These were the main objectionable features which were pointed out when the act was passed. If there was any justification for such sweeping legislation it was because of the nearness of prorogation, but certainly there is no justification to-day, when we are practically beginning a new session, for the extension of that legislation. At that time we said that the act attempted to take away from parliament matters which should be under its exclusive control, that it established a virtual dictatorship, that it violated the basic principles of the control of parliament over national expenditure, that it was more sweeping than the war measures of the government of Sir Robert Borden, that it was a piece of despotism without parallel in the history of Canada, and that it was the worst piece of autocratic power which a Prime Minister or government of this country had ever attempted to assume. All that was true, and it is doubly true to-day when similar legislation is being sought while we, the duly constituted and elected representatives of the people, are assembled here and ready to discharge our duties.

I do not know upon what grounds this legislation can be justified. I understood from the Prime Minister yesterday that to-day he would give us some reasons why he would prefer to take this course rather than to proceed in the regular way by means of a supply bill. I listened to his address this afternoon but the reasons were not forthcoming. He said nothing in his speech to indicate where the advantage would be in proceeding by this method rather than by a supply bill. The only measures which he forecast were measures of expenditure, the only amount which he mentioned was one not exceeding six or seven millions of dollars. If the right hon. gentleman desires merely to spend a few million dollars, why does he not name a sum abundantly sufficient to cover his requirements? If he did, we in opposition would be willing to vote that amount. What reason is there for taking to himself and his colleagues the power to legislate? What reason is there for taking from us the power to do that which by constitution we are elected to do? None whatever has been suggested. Why should the government have power to amend and repeal this and the other act and then come to parliament and say: it is a fait accompli; there is the order in council; the thing is done and you can like it or lump it; criticize if you will, but it is all over. No reason was given by the Prime Minister this afternoon and I suggest no reason can be given. Last summer certain reasons were advanced. First, he said that between sessions he did not know how much money he would require. The answer made to him then is the answer we give him to-day: Make the sum large enough and we will vote it. To that very reasonable proposal he turns a deaf ear; for reasons that have not been given, he rejects it.

Last summer another reason advanced for the passage of this legislation was that all sorts of things might happen before the next session. The Prime Minister did not know exactly what might happen. He thought there might be some agitation in the country; he hinted at some disaffection among the labouring people, and that it might be necessary to take these extraordinary powers in order to deal with that situation.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say any such thing as that—not in those words.

Mr. ILSLEY: Of course not in those words, but the Prime Minister said it.

Mr. BENNETT: Read what I said.

Mr. ILSLEY: One never quotes a person's words precisely. I gave exactly the meaning of what the Prime Minister said, and I was exceedingly careful in so doing.

Mr. BENNETT: Read it.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the words of the Prime Minister:

> In that regard the measure provides for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. It is not for a moment to be thought that an insignificant number of strongly vocal persons shall be able so to affect the populace of this country as to make it impossible for us, in cooperation together as Canadians, to work out our destiny. I say that class, happily, is few in number. But in this present situation they now see an opportunity propitious to the prosecution of their pernicious political doctrines. This is a land of freedom where men may think what they will and say what they will, so long as they do not attack the foundations upon which our civilization has been built. But as we have freedom, so have we justice, and it is not just nor right that now or at any other time we should permit such action by words or deeds as may tend to unsettle confidence in the institutions and customs under which we live. Most of our legislation is framed upon that assumption.

And so on. That, in effect, is what I stated in the house a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, will the hon. gentleman say that there is anything in that quotation where the word "labour" is used? Will he say it is there?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly it is not there.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he made a statement which is untrue. That is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Prime Minister is continually talking about the danger of communistic outbreaks. Does he deny that?

Mr. BENNETT: What has that to do with labour?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if the right hon. gentleman cannot see what it has to do with labour, I cannot take time out of my forty minutes to explain the matter to him.

Let me continue. That was suggested. The point I want to make is that whatever justification there may have been last summer for that reason, there is no justification for it to-day. We have in the criminal code the celebrated section 98. It probably goes too far; I believe I would have voted for an amendment to it; but it is in the code, and so long as we have a government that will not permit a member even to introduce or to receive first reading of a bill providing for any change of a letter or a word in section 98, what is the sense of their taking power to legislate for the purpose of dealing with the communist menace? If legislation is necessary in connection with present conditions we are here to legislate. Therefore there need be no delay about the matter; consequently the reasons which were urged last summer cannot be urged to-day.

Last summer the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) suggested that we had to take these great powers to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, because the use of these words brought the power to pass this measure within our jurisdiction. I do not want to speak disrespectfully, but there certainly was nothing in that contention, and I do not think the Minister of Justice seriously urged it. It was completely exploded, as anybody who refers to the debates of that day will discover, by the speakers who followed him. But the minister clearly intimated that, while that was a reason for the government's taking those enormous powers, it was not anticipated the administration would act under them.

That brings me to the question of what was done under those powers. I do not know all that was done because I have not any return of the orders in council that have been passed under this extraordinary legislation. But I know two things that were done. First, we prohibited the exportation of gold except under licence and by chartered banks. We did that under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931, on the nineteenth day of October last. On New Year's eve, the thirty-first day of December, the government in a great rush put through another order in council, one that the Prime Minister referred to this afternoon, enabling the life insurance companies of Canada to place a false valuation upon their investments so that there would be no danger of two or three of our insurance companies being declared insolvent. That is an accurate statement of the situation. The Insurance Act requires that life insurance companies value their securities at the market valuation at the time, in this instance as of the thirty-first day of December. That might have led to disaster to certain life insurance companies, so the government on the thirty-first day of December put through an order in council, a copy of which I have under my hand, enabling those companies to take the valuation as of June 30, 1931 instead of December 31, 1931. That the government did under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act of 1931, I have no doubt, at the instance of two or three insurance companies including the largest life insurance company in Canada. That order in council was passed under a measure enacted by parliament for the relief of unemployment and farm distress, by virtue of the legislative powers delegated to the government by parliament.

So far as the exportation of gold is concerned this act has expired. So far as I can learn, it is now legal to export gold—if I am wrong about that, the Prime Minister will correct me. The time limit is stated in the order in council to be March 1, 1932, and it cannot be extended under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. If it is important that there should be legislation prohibiting the exportation of gold, the matter should be dealt with by parliament, and if it is important to deal with it now, it should not be dealt with by order in council. The other day the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) brought up a question in connection with this matter. He asked: Why should the producers of gold in this country be paid a premium? The people should have an opportunity to express their views on this subject through their representatives in parliament. Yet the government, if they get this legislation through, are likely to go over to the east block and pass, over the heads of members of parliament, some sort of order in council affecting the gold standard. Last fall a man in my constituency said to me: "Do you know what this government have done? They have gone off the gold standard under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act." The people are not so foolish as the Prime Minister thinks; they follow these things; they have a sense of humour when dealing with these matters. They think it is incongruous, under an unemployment and farm relief act, to prohibit the exportation of gold. I repeat, when it is desired to deal with such matters as the gold standard and the exportation of gold, we are the people to deal with them and not the governor in council under such dictatorship legislation as is embodied in this act for the relief of unemployment and farm distress.

Let me come to the other legislation about the insurance companies. At the present time there is before the Senate a measure dealing with this matter and in due course it will come before the House of Commons. The bill is very sweeping in its character; I should say the order in council and probably the bill fly in the face of recent decisions of the privy council. That is disputed; there are different ideas in regard to it, but we do not know what the government are going to do if they get this bill through. As I have already pointed out, on New Year's eve they repealed by order in council certain sections of the Insurance Act. How do we know, if they get this bill through, they will not do something equally outrageous while we are sitting here?

Mr. POWER: Abolish the privy council.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, as my hon. friend has said, they may abolish the privy council. How do we know if the government gets this legislation through they will not permit the Sun Life Assurance Company or some other insurance companies to place another valuation upon these securities? The people who have paid their money into these insurance companies are very much interested. By way of indicating a ground for interest in the matter may I quote from the Montreal Gazette of March 7, 1932 as follows:

> Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada,
> Head Office, Montreal
> Stock Transfer Department
> Notice is hereby given that the stock transfer books of the company will be closed from the 17th to the 31st of March, both days inclusive, for the preparation of the dividend to become due and payable on the 1st day of April, 1932, to shareholders of record at the close of business on March 16, 1932.
> By order of the board.
> H. W. K. Hale,
> Secretary.

This company intends to declare and pay a dividend on its $2,000,000 capitalization; whether it will be to the extent of 25, 50 or 75 per cent I do not know. They have been paying pretty heavy dividends lately. However, the money that I as a policyholder have been paying in, and that policyholders from all parts of Canada have been paying in, has been invested by this company in watered stocks, in a long assortment of securities which have gone down disastrously in value, and certainly if this question were brought before parliament and the country instead of before that secret body known as the governor in council or the cabinet there are hon. members in this house who would insist upon seeing that these companies cease to pay such dividends.

Mr. BENNETT: May I correct the hon. gentleman? I know he does not desire to do injury to anybody. The truth is that every investment made by the Sun Life Assurance Company was an investment authorized by law, the statute having been passed by this parliament under the aegis of a Liberal administration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not concerned with picking up a little point of party politics.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; knowing the hon. member as we do, we are sure he would not do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said nothing to the contrary. I think the Insurance Act should be amended. I am saying however that the Sun Life Assurance Company certainly pursued a policy with regard to speculative investments which was not pursued by any other company in the Dominion of Canada, with possibly one exception. The Prime Minister knows that, and that is all I said. I did not say they made illegal investments, but I said they made speculative investments, which turned out disastrously. With that statement I think the Prime Minister will agree.

I do not wish to go further into that question because undoubtedly it will come before the house when the matter of insurance is under consideration. The point I am making is that we should not delegate to the Dominion government our responsibility to deal with these matters. Under our constitution we are the persons to deal with them. As I said at the outset, the principle underlying the government's policy should be laid down and not evaded or left in the air. Hon. members should pass upon that principle, and then upon the details as well. The duty of a member of parliament is not simply to make himself felt by writing to the Prime Minister, making a speech on a motion to go into supply, or airing his views on the orders of the day. He has an even greater duty—that of focussing his mind upon each bill, clause by clause, and assisting in the framing of legislation. If we are going to scrap our constitution, let us go ahead and scrap it, but for the time being I am not prepared to scrap it. I say that so far as I know, nothing as outrageous as what this government is now attempting to do was ever heard of in the history of this country, or any other part of the British Empire.

I know the Prime Minister does not like to submit his measures to the house. I suppose he thinks he receives only factious opposition. I suppose he thinks he receives no cooperation. He certainly will not receive cooperation if he seeks to divest us of our responsibilities. If he permits us to exercise our responsibilities he may expect some measure of cooperation, but if he seeks to reduce this body to the level of a debating society rather than recognize its great functions, traditions and responsibilities, then he must expect quite a bit of talk. And there will be quite a bit of talk before he gets this outrageous bill through the house.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, when the Unemployment and Farm Relief bill was before the house in the session of 1931, I registered my bitter opposition. I felt that no such powers as outlined in that measure should be given to the governor in council. I felt the measures were too drastic as regards both the relief of the unemployed and the provision for contemplated action to preserve the peace, order and good government of the country. After witnessing the operation of the act I am more opposed to it than I was a year ago. We have seen how unsuccessfully the measure has worked out in certain sections of the Dominion of Canada. This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) —he will correct me if I am wrong—admitted that one-half the commitments under the relief act of last year have not been carried out, and the work has not been accomplished. If that is so, why should we have an extension of that measure to May 1?

I ask the question for this reason: It was distinctly understood last session by all hon. members that any commitments entered into before March 1, 1932, were not to be affected by the lapse of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. That being so, why are we now asked for an extension of two months? Commitments made by the government under that act have not been fifty per cent expended. There is no need of an extension to meet unemployment conditions. There can be no need of an extension to meet the relief the government desires to give to the western provinces, because this afternoon the Prime Minister said that relief for the western farmers in the matter of the purchase of seed is the responsibility of the provincial government, and that the federal government would come to the assistance of the provinces only when the amounts of their commitments were made known. In one province the commitments are estimated at $6,000,000. Then, what is the reason for an extension of this measure? If the government have been working on the assumption that commitments made prior to March 1, 1932, would be affected, they should have made provision accordingly at an early date after the opening of parliament. If they did not make provision and were acting on the basis that the commitments would be affected, then they were negligent in carrying out their duty to those requiring assistance.

Now, sir, in rising I stated that I was opposed to this measure more strongly than ever on account of the personal experience I had had in carrying out the objects contemplated by it. Some of those who have spoken to-night have referred to the way in which unemployment relief was administered in certain of the provinces. I do not intend to refer to any other province than my own—New Brunswick, where I have positive knowledge of the methods adopted. The other evening when I spoke on the question of unemployment relief I complained that certain work had been carried on in a partisan manner, and that large numbers of men in my county had received work who were not entitled to it, for they did not require any relief. I did not then enter into any particulars; now in order to show how this work was carried on allow me to particularize. I am prepared to stand behind these particulars. I have before me a record of persons employed on unemployment relief work in the county of Gloucester. Let me say to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that notwithstanding the fact that one of his officials has reported that the work complained of by me the other evening was not dealt with under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, I say to the minister that $47,000 was expended in the county of Gloucester under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, and that the gentleman who was sent by the Department of Labour to investigate the matter has the evidence of witness after witness to prove that not only those who did not need relief were given work and the poor men who needed it thrown aside, but that political influence was exercised in awarding the work. Under the regulations issued by the Department of Labour to the provincial government of New Brunswick—

Mr. GORDON: That was provincial work.

Mr. VENIOT: I say it was not.

Mr. GORDON: I know it was.

Mr. VENIOT: Where was the $47,000 spent?

Mr. GORDON: I know the work to which the hon. member refers was provincial work.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the Minister of Labour tell the house where the $47,000 was expended? He will not do so simply because he does not know. The $47,000 to be spent under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act was spent in the county of Gloucester. The minister has not the information in his possession, he cannot produce it. I challenge him to produce it.

Mr. PRICE: Neither can the hon. member for Gloucester county prove it.

Mr. VENIOT: I am not addressing myself to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price); when I do it will be time enough for him to reply. I challenge the Minister of Labour to produce details of the expenditure of the $47,000 granted the county of Gloucester under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, and if he does I will show him where and how the work was done. I reiterate, the work I am going to refer to was done under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, and there can be no doubt about it. The other night I gave the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) credit for the way in which he acted in the matter. He put a stop to irregularities, but the Minister of Labour never undertook to do anything. The work on the Grande Anse breakwater was unemployment relief work done under the direction of the federal department of Public Works. Why did I complain there? This is one of the reasons. I found that on that work the foreman named Theriault had his two sons employed.

Mr. PRICE: What of that?

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Morand): Order.

Mr. VENIOT: That was in direct violation of the orders issued by the Department of Public Works. When it was reported to the minister of that department he looked into it and had the irregularity stopped. We have another case of a father and his son sixteen years of age at work, while another man with a family of seven children was denied work.

Mr. PRICE: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I will not. That man was turned down and told distinctly that he was on the wrong political side. The resident engineer in St. John was instructed to look into the matter. He did, and the foreman had to admit that he had used that language. We have numerous similar cases in connection with works carried on in the county of Gloucester.

The other night I said that the government had not displayed sufficient care in approving of the relief project. Let me emphasize that to-night. I hold in my hand a return laid on the table embracing all the projects accepted by the federal government for work for unemployment relief in the county of Gloucester. I have before me a statement of projects accepted by the Department of Labour covering an expenditure of $750,000 for unemployment relief work in New Brunswick. The date of approval is November 26, 1931. Three quarters of the money was spent months before the federal government ever approved of the projects. I have here particulars of $26,500 to be spent in the county of Gloucester, and approved on November 26, 1931. Every cent of that money was spent before that date.

Mr. GORDON: Was it well spent?

Mr. VENIOT: No, it was not. That is what I am complaining about, and if the minister will give me a proper investigation, if he will name a commissioner to come to Gloucester county with a detailed statement of the money spent there under unemployment relief, I will undertake to prove under oath the statements I am making to-night. What more do we find? They lacked sufficient care in approving of these projects. In the list of projects approved on November 26, 1931, we find the town of Sunny Brae, with the amount of $1,750. That money was all spent before the Department of Labour approved of that project.

Mr. PRICE: The hon. gentleman would not dare make that statement in the city of Moncton.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, I will make it in Sunny Brae. Take the money spent in Gloucester, Northumberland, Restigouche and many of the other counties; you will find that it was expended before approval was given.

Mr. PRICE: You would not dare say that in New Brunswick.

Mr. VENIOT: I would say it anywhere.

Mr. PRICE: No, you would not dare.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Speaker, surely I am entitled to speak for forty minutes without interruption by the hon. member for Westmorland. I am sorry he thinks it is his duty to interrupt me; I would rather see him stand up and defend his constituents and plead for their rights, especially the rights of the railway men who elected him.

Mr. PRICE: I will do it, and I will take you to task for attacking Barachois and Aboujagan.

Mr. VENIOT: I never attacked them; I asked for information. Surely as a member of this house I am entitled to that information, and when it comes down my hon. friend may not be so proud of it.

Now, sir, let me point out another injustice that has been done in Gloucester county. The incorporated town of Bathurst, with a population of about five thousand, undertook to pave all the streets in order to relieve unemployment, at an expenditure of $225,000. When this work was almost completed they applied for a share of the federal money under this act, but their request was refused. Work remained to be done to the extent of about $28,000, and when the town applied for assistance in completing that work their request was approved and they received $7,500. While Bathurst was doing work to the extent of $225,000, in order to relieve unemployment, with not a dollar contributed by the federal government, other towns which had completed the work planned before November 26 were paid the full federal share of the cost of those works. So to my mind this act has not been administered in an honest and fair way.

This afternoon the right hon. Prime Minister stated that at a certain public meeting in the county of Gloucester I told the people that I had received letters from the federal Department of Labour asking for recommendations as to the work which should be undertaken in Gloucester county in order to relieve unemployment, and that I flaunted those letters before my audience and said I was the one who should look after that. I then interjected that the Prime Minister had been misinformed. I think that information was given to the right hon. gentleman within the last forty-eight or seventy-two hours, and I wish to tell him that whoever made those statements to him led him astray, because there is not one word of truth in them. It is true that I did read in public the letters sent me by the Department of Labour; I did read in public the regulations under which this money was to be spent, and I explained to the people that there was to be no discrimination, political, racial or religious. There was a by-election going on, and I explained that everyone working on the roads had a perfect right to vote as he saw fit, that this money was not the money of Liberals or Conservatives; it was money voted by the parliament of Canada to help the unemployed in that county. What happened when I was making that explanation? The letter from which I am reading now is on file in the Department of Labour, and it contains this statement with regard to the parish of Beresford:

That all the supervisors of roads in this parish were acting in the same way as did Supervisor Cormier, I may say that on October 18th I was addressing a public meeting in the parish hall at Petit Rocher on behalf of the opposition candidate. I had been asked a question touching the expenditure of unemployment relief money. I was explaining that the instructions issued by the federal Department of Labour set forth very plainly that there was to be no discrimination whatever along political lines in the expenditure of this money, that this money should be earned by those really in need of it, and that no matter what might be said by the other side, everyone was free to vote as he saw fit notwithstanding that he might be employed under the supervision of the provincial government. I was flatly contradicted by a man in the audience, and when I inquired who the person was he did not hesitate to come forward and inform me that he was a supervisor of roads and would have charge of this expenditure, and added "Pas un seul Liberal aura de l'ouvrage de chômage. C'est Coffyn, et non pas Veniot qui verra à cela." And this supervisor certainly did keep his word.

He said, "Not a single Liberal will have any part of this unemployment work. It is Doctor Coffyn"—who was the provincial government candidate—"that will look after it and not P. J. Veniot."

That partisanship was carried on throughout the length and breadth of the county of Gloucester. There was a by-election in that county; the Premier of New Brunswick addressed a public meeting in the town of Bathurst on the Friday night before the election, and said:

We do not want Doctor Coffyn elected in Gloucester because we need his vote to maintain the government in power. We want him elected so that we will have reason to do something big for Gloucester county along the lines of the unemployment relief aid to be given by the federal government and the province of New Brunswick.

There was a bribe held out to the electors of that county; they were told that unless Doctor Coffyn was elected, unless they returned a man who was favourable to the government, the government would measure the relief to be doled out in Gloucester county by the actions of the electors on polling day.

Mr. PRICE: I don't believe the premier ever made such a statement.

Mr. VENIOT: And I know you would say, if he did make it, that he had no right to make it, wouldn't you?

Mr. PRICE: I would simply say just now that he didn't make it.

Mr. VENIOT: He did make it. The hon. gentleman has no right under the rules of the house to question my veracity.

Mr. PRICE: He didn't make such a statement.

Mr. VENIOT: Let me go a step further. I hold in my hand a letter over the signature of W. H. Coffyn, provincial candidate in the county. This is addressed to Supervisor Max Arseneau. Here is the letter:

Six Roads, October 24, 1931.

Supervisor Max Arseneau:

Please see that Peter Gauvin has work on the road when you do your work next. It will be to our mutual advantage.

(Signed) W. H. Coffyn.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that another provincial employee?

Mr. VENIOT: They are all provincial employees who spent the unemployment relief money in New Brunswick. That is the reason I object to it; that is why I say politics is creeping into the expenditure of the money, and it should not be allowed. But I go further than that. Just to show the opinion that is spreading among the people, that this unemployment relief money is to be expended along political lines, I have an extract from a letter which I am going to read:

I was successful in getting the amount authorized for expenditure in your district, but the patronage is entirely in the hands of the four defeated candidates.

I would advise you to take up the matter direct with them, as I regret that I have nothing whatever to do with provincial matters, and this work is being done entirely through them, although the federal is contributing; unfortunately I have no say whatever as to patronage in the local.

Mr. PRICE: By whom is that signed?

Mr. VENIOT: Without being saucy to the hon. gentleman I may tell him it is none of his business. Now there is an example of how patronage came into the distribution of this unemployment relief money. That is signed by a federal member. Here is a man who is writing for work; he writes to get an order to go to work. He cannot get it without an order and he is told, "If you want an order you will have to go to the four provincial candidates defeated in the provincial election." Do you mean to tell me that under conditions of that kind, I can approve of or support the same system that was in practice last year and which evidently is to be put into practice this year? The unemployment relief money was used as a political fund in Gloucester county.

There was another by-election in the province of New Brunswick, in the county of St. John. There are only about eleven or twelve thousand inhabitants, and for the money that is on this list as having been approved of on November 26, 1931, and in 1930 work was done in the county of St. John to the extent of $52,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When was that by-election?

Mr. VENIOT: Last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the money was voted by this parliament?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, quite true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was not a cent spent in the county of St. John.

Mr. VENIOT: Don't be too quick. I have here proof that work in the county of St. John was done to the extent of practically $52,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But long after the by-election.

Mr. VENIOT: That was approved November 26, and every cent of the money was spent during the summer time and a lot of it during the election; and that money spent in the county of St. John during that by-election was transferred to the projects submitted to the federal government and approved November 26, 1931. I am sorry to say that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about. I have an absolute statement here from the department. I will go further. As regards this expenditure in St. John as well as the expenditure in the county of Gloucester during these by-elections, I challenge the Minister of Labour to bring down the pay sheets, to bring down the detailed accounts showing the dates on which the money was spent. Then this house will know who is telling the truth and who is not.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the house just now, because it is almost eleven o'clock. I have more to say, but if I entered now upon other arguments which I wish to advance, and which I shall advance on some other occasion, there would not be time for me to finish. I see by the clock that it is now five minutes to eleven and therefore I will say no more at the moment.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 9, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to lay on the table of the house the report under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, together with copies of the orders in council passed under the authority of the statute.

I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Sauvé:

That seven hundred copies in English and three hundred copies in French of this report be printed, and that rule 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does that include the orders in council which have been adopted under the provisions for "peace, order and good government," or are they documents by themselves?

Mr. GORDON: The orders in council are documents by themselves; they are not included in the printed report.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And will not be printed?

Mr. GORDON: I had not anticipated that there would be any necessity for printing the orders in council.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Can the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) indicate when the report will be printed? I know that in the past it has been arranged sometimes to have the printing done a little in advance of the orders of the house.

Mr. GORDON: I think it will be only a day or two before the report is printed. I have asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to speed up the printing. I am sending the right hon. gentleman a copy now.

Mr. CAHAN: The report is probably printed by now.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 29, to amend the Railway Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, section 179 of the Railway Act provides that in the event of a railway company deviating any of its lines or closing a terminal or a station, involving the necessity of its employees leaving their homes and moving to another point, they must first obtain the leave of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and the board may order such compensation to the employees as in their judgment the case warrants. I propose to amend this section by adding after the words "nor create a new divisional point" the following words:

Nor make any change in the routing of traffic, nor run crews through divisional points where their homes are established, nor make any other change.

And at the end of the section to add these words:

No such change shall be made or authorized without thirty days' notice of the intended change to the employees concerned.

Subsections 1 and 2 of section 250 arbitrarily prohibit any superstructure being erected over a line of railway that does not provide a fixed clearance of seven feet between the highest freight car used on the railway and the lowest beam of the structure. Subsection 5 however, grants the railway commission authority to give special permission in certain cases to change this arbitrary clearance. It is proposed to amend subsection 5 by adding the following words:

Provided that no exemption shall be made from the operation of this section nor any change made in the standards fixed by this section until due notice and hearing is first given to all parties interested.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 30, to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

He said: The regulations for the disposal of quartz mining claims in the Northwest Territories were established by order in council under the authority of section 35 of the Dominion Lands Act, being chapter 113, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, while quartz mining claims in the Yukon territory are granted under the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, which does not permit of any amendments except by legislation.

The purposes of this bill are twofold:

1. To make it possible for the governor general in council to extend to holders of mineral claims in the Yukon territory the same measure of consideration as it is possible to extend to holders of mineral claims in the Northwest Territories in the matter of relief from representation work on mineral claims;

2. To provide a penalty clause designed to prevent misrepresentation as to work claimed to have been done on a mineral claim, and to prevent removing or disturbing any legal post or stake marking a claim.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

FELIX BARTHOLOMEW LEBLANC

Mr. DUFF:

1. Has Felix Bartholomew LeBlanc been appointed to the position of customs officer at Arichat, Nova Scotia?
2. If so, was said appointment made by the Civil Service Commission?
3. Is the said incumbent a returned soldier?
4. Is he a Canadian citizen?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. No.
4. Yes.

GOVERNMENT ELEVATOR—PORT PRESCOTT, ONT.

Mr. ROSS:

1. How much: (a) wheat; (b) other grain or cereal has been received at government elevator, Port Prescott, since opening?
2. How much: (a) wheat; (b) other grain or cereal has been received at the elevator at Little Cataraqui bay, since opening?

GEORGE FLETCHER

Mr. BOUCHARD:

1. Has a contract been let to George Fletcher to carry the mail from Bailieboro to Millbrook, Ontario, during the year 1932?
2. Has Mr. Fletcher a wife and children dependent?
3. Was R. J. Porter's tender lower than Mr. Fletcher's for this contract?
4. If so, how much lower?
5. Were any complaints ever received regarding Mr. R. J. Porter as a mail carrier during his twenty-six years of service as such?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.
2. Department has no official information.

3 and 4. Yes. $11 lower, but owing to special representations made regarding the situation of tenderers, and also the war record of Mr. Fletcher, he was allowed to reduce his tender by this amount to the rate of the lowest.

5. No.

* TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES—PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. FOURNIER:

1. How many letters were sent to temporary employees of the Department of Public Works advising them that their services would be no more required after the last of March, 1932?
2. How many of said employees are native born?
3. How many of said employees are French speaking?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Stand as an order for return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works just what is the reason for having this question stand as an order for return. It requires simply a word in answer to each of the questions.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I think somewhat more detailed information is required than my right hon. friend suggests in order to complete the answer to this question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first question is:

How many letters were sent to temporary employees of the Department of Public Works advising them that their services would be no more required after the last of March, 1932?

Surely one word would answer that. The next question is:

How many of said employees are native born?

Surely one word would answer that. The next question is:

How many of said employees are French speaking?

Surely one word would answer that also, so why should this question be made an order for return?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It will take some time to get this information, and I should think if it comes down as an order for return it will be as satisfactory as an immediate answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I certainly think these questions that can be answered briefly should not be made orders for returns. It may be different if questions require a great deal of research, but the letters here referred to have been recently issued and it should not take long to secure the information.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I want to assure my right hon. friend that there is no desire on the part of the government to escape giving the information.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the question might stand instead of being made an order for return.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Very well.

Question stands.

PENSION APPLICATIONS

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. How many cases were referred for award to the proper authorities under the meritorious clause since the new machinery of pensions tribunals and appeal court was formed?
2. How many such applications were granted?
3. How many such applications are still awaiting decision?

Mr. MacLAREN:

1. Fifty-seven.
2. One.
3. Fifty-six.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

Mr. PORTEOUS:

What were the exports from Canada, and value thereof, of agricultural products, each year from 1929 to 1930, inclusive, of the following: (a) live stock and products thereof; (b) milk, cream and dairy products; (c) wheat; (d) total agricultural products except wheat?

Mr. STEVENS: Stands as an order for return, now tabled.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

Mr. AHEARN:

1. How many officers retained in the Royal Canadian Air Force are married men?
2. How many of these married officers have not seen war service?
3. How many wives and dependent children are affected by the release of married officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force?
4. Is the government considering absorbing married officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force into other branches of the government service?
5. How many non-permanent officers of the Royal Canadian Air Force, who were first advised that their services were no longer required, have since been reengaged?
6. How many of such officers have war service?
7. How many of such officers are married?

PUBLIC WORKS EMPLOYEES

Mr. CHEVRIER:

What are the names, length of service, nature of work and number of dependents of each permanent employee of the maintenance staff of the Department of Public Works, Ottawa, who have been notified that their services will not be required after the 31st of March?

TOBACCO EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. GOTT:

1. How much excise tax per pound is collected on domestic raw leaf tobacco when used in licensed factories in Canada, and how and when is the tax collected?
2. What amount was collected for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1930, and 1931?
3. What was the total amount of tobacco consumed in Canada each year from 1908 to 1931, inclusive?
4. How much tobacco was grown in Canada during the years 1908 to 1931, inclusive?
5. How much tobacco was imported into Canada in the above years, and from what source were the said imports?
6. How much tobacco was exported from Canada during the above years, and to what countries?
7. What rebate of import duty is allowed on imported raw leaf when manufactured for export purposes?
8. What bonding privileges are extended to licensed manufacturers when raw leaf tobacco is imported by them?
9. How much imported raw leaf tobacco was used for export purposes during the years 1908 to 1931, inclusive?
10. What were the average prices received by the tobacco growers of Canada: (a) for their 1929 crop; (b) 1930 crop; and (c) 1931 crop?
11. How do the departmental officials arrive at the average price paid for tobacco in the United States?
12. Does the Canadian government classify the different types of tobacco raised in Canada, imported into Canada and exported from Canada?
13. If not, for what reason?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CABINET MINISTERS—AUTOMOBILES

Mr. GEORGE SPOTTON (North Huron) moved:

For a return showing: (a) how many automobiles were purchased for the use of cabinet ministers during each of the fiscal years ending March 31, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929; (b) the make of car used by each minister and the price of each of the said cars; (c) the cost of maintenance of each of the said cars, showing in detail the salary of chauffeur, oil and gasoline, repairs, housing, depreciation and other charges.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): If the house is interested in getting this information, as I have no doubt it is, it will be equally interested in getting like information for the years immediately preceding and immediately following those mentioned. Accordingly I would move that the motion be amended by adding in line 4, after the word "1929" the words "also the fiscal years ending March 31, 1930 and 1931, and the fiscal years ending March 31, 1919, 1920 and 1921."

Mr. BENNETT: I think we might shorten this by accepting the amendment proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the mover of the original motion will accept the amendment.

Mr. SPOTTON: I think the right hon. gentleman had better ask his own questions.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

COMMONS AND SENATE EMPLOYEES

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): moved:

For a return showing the number of persons in the employ of the government in connection with the commons chamber, the senate chamber and parliament building generally, with the various salaries paid.

Mr. SPEAKER: When this motion was called previously I pointed out that there was no date mentioned.

Mr. REID: With the consent of the house I will amend the motion by inserting the words "from March 1, 1931, to March 1, 1932."

Mr. SPEAKER: With the amendment, shall the motion carry?

Motion as amended agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS—QUEBEC

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South) moved:

For a return showing list of all works carried on in the province of Quebec during the calendar year 1931 under the Unemployment Relief Act by the government of the Dominion of Canada out of its own moneys, and to which no contribution has been made either by the municipalities or by the government of the province of Quebec, together with copies of letters and correspondence indicating on whose recommendation said works were undertaken.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the return tabled today covers the major part, if not all, of the information asked for in this motion. There may be letters and correspondence that do not appear in the return as tabled, but undoubtedly the rest of the information will be found in the return.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it understood that the minister will bring down what is not in the report?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) that I would inform him to-day with respect to the Easter recess. If it is acceptable, as I understand it is from what was said yesterday, it will be proposed to adjourn on the Wednesday evening preceding Good Friday and convene again on the succeeding Tuesday. I said Thursday, yesterday, but Thursday will be a holy day. This arrangement will allow us to sit on Wednesday, and, if the house thinks desirable, we might sit until eleven o'clock. At any rate, I will give notice in the ordinary way on the order paper.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That would be wholly acceptable to the members on this side

Mr. BENNETT: We spoke to Mr. Gardiner and I understand he is satisfied.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The house will be interested in the information which I have just received that our colleague the Hon. Maurice Dupré, Solicitor General, was to-day unanimously elected vice-president of the Naval Committee of the Disarmament Conference. The proposal was made by the Italian representatives, and in view of the unanimity with which it was received the ordinary rule of secret balloting was dispensed with.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I would direct a question to the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). In the speech from the throne it was announced that there would be amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, and I would ask the minister whether we may expect these amendments shortly.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I regret to say that I fear it will not be possible to lay before parliament at this session a bill to revise and consolidate the Canada Shipping Act. While the work of the officers of my department in this connection is well in hand, it is not yet sufficiently advanced to permit a bill being brought down. Anyone who has made a study of the present act will realize that the work of revising it is one of great magnitude and of no small importance. The present act contains eighteen separate parts, each dealing with a different subject, the whole comprising 950 sections. It was only last fall that the statute of Westminster was passed by the Imperial parliament, and the British Commonwealth Merchant Shipping Agreement was signed at London only on December 10, 1931. By this agreement the governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland undertook to propose any necessary legislation and to take such other steps as may be necessary for the purpose of giving full effect to the agreement. The revision of the Canada Shipping Act, when it is complete, will have to conform to the agreement, and after full and lengthy consideration the officers of my department have proposed that the most desirable way to secure the legislative uniformity contemplated by the agreement is to have model sections of the law set up which would be embodied in the statutes of all those parts of the commonwealth which are signatories to the agreement. This matter is now engaging the attention of my department, but I may add that I intend to bring before the house this session such amendments to our coastal laws as are most urgent at the present time.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Will opportunity be given for all interested parties to present their points of view—shipping masters, the various labour unions, and others who are very keenly interested, such as the marine engineers?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that representations were made some time ago by the different associations interested. At any rate, the bill will be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries and any interested party will have an opportunity to present objections or offer suggestions.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Does the minister intend to bring down at this session legislation with respect to the inspection and enforcement of safety appliances on board ship while in dock?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that the chief object of the amendments will be with respect to our coastal laws for the purpose of putting Canadian bottom owners on the same footing as the American. There may be other amendments, but I cannot say offhand whether the amendment suggested by my hon. friend will be embodied in the bill.

TRADE TREATIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): May I call the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to the following despatch, dated March 8, and ask a question based upon it:

> New Zealand Treaty Waits on Canada
> Wellington, New Zealand, March 8.—"Unforeseen delay at the Canadian end" has temporarily held up progress on the trade treaty between Canada and New Zealand, Downie Stewart, finance minister, said to-night. The proposals negotiated between Mr. Stewart and H. H. Stevens, Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, at Honolulu, are ready, however, for submission to the New Zealand parliament. Mr. Stewart added he had been informed by Mr. Stevens that pressing political problems had precluded immediate submission of the proposals to the Canadian cabinet.

Will the minister say whether this despatch is correct, and what these political problems are.

Hon. H. H STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The answer to the question is that in the course of a few days a statement will be made to the house regarding the Dominion government's position in connection with the New Zealand treaty.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Prime Minister whether negotiations are proceeding with the government of France with respect to a treaty between Canada and France on trade matters. I ask this question because I believe despatches have come from France which would indicate that the French government is contemplating banning fresh fruits from Canada and putting a prohibitive duty of $1 a bushel on imports of grain as a consequence of the abrogation of the treaty we had.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No such information has reached the government, nor have we received any communications since the last despatch was sent, indicating a willingness to resume discussions looking towards an amended treaty

MONTREAL POSTAL TERMINAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Mr. RINFRET (Translation): May I inquire from the Postmaster General whether his department has completed or will soon complete the purchase of the necessary land for the erection of a postal terminal, near the Bonaventure station, in Montreal, and when we may expect to see the work started.

Hon. Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I think that this question comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart).

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) advise the house what members of the council are replacing, in their absence, the minister without portfolio (Sir George Perley) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupré) on the subcommittee for the administration of the unemployment relief act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): In view of the fact that no further new matters are being considered, no appointments have been made. As occasion necessitates these appointments will be made, but at the moment there is no necessity. The members of council as a whole have considered such matters as require attention since the departure of the ministers referred to.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No Quebec men?

Mr. BENNETT: There are Quebec men on the council as a whole.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committe of the whole on the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, to my mind the resolution which has been introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is one of the most important pieces of legislation brought before the house this session. It deals with unemployment and farm relief and affects not only tens of thousands of people; when the husbands and wives and children are taken into account it means that probably a million and a half or two million people are affected. The discussion thereon should receive the serious thought of every hon. member.

We have had in this country from time to time what have been known as hard times or depressions, and it must be said of the Canadian people as a whole that they face a crisis or anything which seems to be in the nature of a disaster with courage second to none. We have had depressions before, and in all probability as time goes on we will have others. They will occur when this government has passed on and perhaps when most, if not all, of the hon. members have left the scene. We had a depression which started in 1921 and extended into 1922 and 1923. I do not intend to deal in detail with the period of the great war, but for a moment I should like to go back to those days.

During the years from 1914 to 1918 the people of this country were under terrific stress and strain. They were keyed up from time to time with the news from the front; some of them were waiting anxiously for the cables announcing the causualty lists, and so on, but their morale was sustained not only by their loyalty but because they were kept busy. There was no unemployment and, after all, the great tonic for idleness or for worry is activity and work. I might say that not only was every man and woman active in connection with the war, but there was also some profiteering, with which I do not intend to deal.

I desire to contrast that trying period from 1914 to 1918 with this depression, which in its magnitude and its ramifications is perhaps the greatest we have experienced. I am not unmindful of the efforts put forth by this government to grapple with the situation which confronted them when they took power in 1930 and which has continued down to the present day. I do not intend to hark back to the election campaign of 1930 other than to say that in the campaign the present Prime Minister, then the leader of the Conservative party, and all his candidates, made of unemployment a federal issue. Nothing was said in regard to the provinces taking part in this work, and very little in connection with the participation of municipalities. The then leader of the opposition made it a federal issue. He told the people of this country, not once but a dozen times, in so many words: If you elect me as Prime Minister and I form a government, with my bow and arrow I will kill and end unemployment in this country. That was the effect of the words he uttered. It is only fair to make a few observations in connection with the methods adopted by this government in regard to unemployment. As I said before, I am not unmindful of the efforts put forth, nor do I think the people of this country are unmindful of them; but I do think the majority of the people are of the opinion that whatever the efforts may have been, the results have fallen far short of expectations.

First of all, I should like to go back to the special session held in September, 1930. That session was called largely for the purpose of devising ways and means and passing legislation to end unemployment. The first method adopted by the government at that special session was the raising of the tariff to a point higher than any other government has ever attempted to raise it, and higher, I hope, than any government in the future will attempt to raise it. But this did not have the effect of curing unemployment; on the contrary, it made the unemployment greater, because people of moderate means had to pay more for the necessities of life. Therefore the increase of the tariff had no effect at all in the way of alleviating unemployment.

Then there was the measure under which an amount of $20,000,000 was voted to relieve or put an end to unemployment. I am not criticizing that in any way, nor did the opposition criticize it at the time it was brought in. They did have something to say as to the way in which the money should be spent, and made certain suggestions which were not taken seriously or acted upon by the government; but the principle of asking for a vote of $20,000,000 was not opposed by hon. members on this side. As a matter of fact, the opposition would not at that time have criticized the granting of a larger sum, but the government thought $20,000,000 was the amount they should have to spend.

I want to speak of the mistakes the government, in my judgment, made at the time they had that amount voted. First of all, the government made a mistake even before the calling of the special session—and in the remarks I make I want it to be clearly understood that I am not in any way critical of the hon. gentleman who held the portfolio of Minister of Labour from the inception of this government until his resignation a few weeks ago. He is a capable man, a man of integrity, and one who, I think, has for many years kept in close touch with labour conditions in Canada. I am sorry, that the gentleman, as the Prime Minister pointed out not long ago, has become a casualty through being overworked and broken in health. But in that appointment to the portfolio of labour the mistake made by the government was this: if there is any place where a minister of labour should not have a seat, it is in the other chamber of this parliament. He was not close to the common people. He could not occupy a seat in this house in the special session of 1930 or in the session of 1931. Many questions were asked of the Department of Labour; sometimes they were answered and sometimes they were not. But in my opinion the results would have been far better for this country and for the people who are out of employment had the office of minister of labour been occupied by a member of the House of Commons.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: When the Hon. Mr. Murdock was Minister of Labour in a Liberal government, had he a seat in the House of Commons?

Mr. SANDERSON: Yes, he had.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: He was defeated and was appointed to the Senate.

Mr. SANDERSON: He was not appointed to the Senate until years after he was minister of labour.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Not at all.

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not mind interruptions if they are relevant. I shall answer any question I can, but as regards the question of my friend, he is wrong in his facts, because the Hon. Mr. Murdock was never minister of labour while he sat in the Senate.

Another mistake that I think the government made was that they linked themselves up with the provinces and municipalities. If I may revert to some remarks I made a few moments ago, they made the issue that primarily the question of unemployment was a matter for the federal parliament. Then they attempted to make some arrangement first with the provinces and through the provinces with the municipalities. The result is that the whole matter has been confused; there has not been either head or tail to it. There are two principals: the federal government and the provinces, with the municipalities as a side partner. The result is that if a member rises and asks a courteous, intelligent question in regard to the expenditure of federal money on unemployment relief, it is very difficult to secure an intelligent answer. I say that in no spirit of criticism. It would have been far better if the federal government had assumed the whole responsibility for the payment of money in connection with unemployment relief and had in some degree worked in conjunction, if they wished to do so, with the provinces and the provinces with the municipalities, but there should have been some scheme worked out so that the responsibility in regard to the payment of these amounts could at least be put on someone's shoulders.

Mr. McGIBBON: What does the hon. member suggest the federal government could have done instead of what they did do?

Mr. SANDERSON: That is a fair question, and I am prepared to answer it. As a matter of fact, I was coming to it. I would say: follow the advice that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave to the government the other day, namely, that it would have been far better if this relief work had been carried out by a commission rather than through any government. Such a course would have done away with a great deal of the difficulty, unrest and dissatisfaction that prevail to-day in this country in regard to the expenditure of the money.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the hon. member eliminate the provinces and the municipalities in connection with this expenditure?

Mr. SANDERSON: I do not say that I would do so, but I would suggest a responsible commission composed of responsible men, not politicians, either members of the government or members of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. SANDERSON: Hon. members can take that as a joke, but I mean it just the same. I would suggest a commission where no politics could creep in. If the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) will wait a moment or two, I shall endeavour to give my reasons for saying why I think the appointment of a commission would have been much better than the way in which the matter has been handled by the government since 1930.

These questions sometimes get me off the beaten path. I want to go back to the $20,000,000 voted at the special session of 1930. We find, according to the statements made from the government side, that out of the fund of $20,000,000 the sum of $17,372,000 was expended. The whole amount apparently was not required, or at least, if it was required, it was not spent. The $17,372,000 formed part of a total expenditure by the provinces and municipalities of approximately $70,000,000. That proves, to my mind at least, that $3,000,000 was not used, so that there was lack of business ability, lack of coordination and lack of cooperation between the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities. But I do not blame the municipalities in that regard. I am endeavouring to establish merely that the whole scheme has been worked out in a very unbusiness-like way. I repeat, that the federal government should have been in control of the situation from the first, perhaps having a commission working for or under it to some degree. I do not think any member of this house will get up and say that the efforts put forth by this government in the special session of 1930 did very much to alleviate unemployment. Unfortunately—one does not like to say this, but we must face the facts as we see them—the unemployment situation has gradually been getting worse ever since this government came into power, despite the fact that it has had practically a free hand to grapple with the situation. My hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario, as a medical man, knows that if he is prescribing for a patient who gradually gets worse under his treatment instead of better, and concludes that his treatment is not the right one for the case, he may consult with some other member of the profession or perhaps call in another doctor to prescribe for the patient.

I am not insinuating at all that the opposition should be called in to deal with the present state of affairs, because they will be called in by the people of this country just as soon as they have an opportunity to speak their minds.

Mr. EMBURY: We shall have to be a whole lot sicker than we are now for that to happen.

Mr. SANDERSON: The whole management or mismanagement of the situation does not stand very much to the credit of the federal government or of some of the provincial governments, as I shall endeavour to explain in a moment or two.

I come to the session of 1931. At that session there was a long discussion of the unemployment question, and very late in the session, two or three days before the close, a measure was brought down by the government asking for what is commonly known now as a blank cheque in dealing with the unemployment situation. That blank cheque was given to them, although hon. members on this side opposed it, pointing out at the same time that if the government in their wisdom wished to ask for fifty or one hundred or one hundred and fifty million dollars, or any other stated amount, it would be voted without question. But no, the government must have a blank cheque and unlimited powers, and they got both. We do not know how much of the blank cheque has been handed over to the provinces, although figures have been given as to the amounts for some of the provinces. I do not think, however, that any hon. member on the other side of the house will say that since the government was granted a blank cheque and unlimited powers in the session of 1931, unemployment has lessened. On the contrary, from 1931 down to the present day, just as from 1930 to 1931, the unemployment situation has been gradually getting worse; there are thousands more unemployed men and women in this country to-day than there were a year ago.

Now I come to at least a partial answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario about the commission and about the spending of this money. I do not charge the right hon. the Prime Minister, any member of his government, or the government as a whole, with having played politics in the expenditure of money voted for unemployment and farm relief. But I do say this, that either with or without knowledge, consciously or unconsciously, the federal authorities placed in the hands of the provincial governments something that most of the provinces at all events have used for political purposes. I want to speak particularly of the province of Ontario.

Members from Nova Scotia and from Saskatchewan have pointed out in this house that politics did enter into the spending of the money voted for purposes of unemployment and farm relief. Speaking as a citizen of Ontario, and knowing something at least of politics in this province, I say that the fund has been used in Ontario for political purposes. I want to say a word or two about the political machine in the province of Ontario, and when I say the political machine I mean the provincial political machine. Of course, in a federal election the provincial political machine comes out to do duty for the federal party, but primarily it is a provincial political machine. Its chief architect and designer is a gentleman who now occupies a high position in London, England, but that machine is still in existence, and its ramifications are numerous indeed. It is surprising how this political machine is manned. It is manned by officials of the highways department of the province of Ontario; it is manned by the officials of the liquor control board of the province of Ontario, and when I say "officials" I am not referring at all to the commissioners; it is manned by officials who have to do with old age pensions in the province of Ontario; it is manned by officials who have to do with mothers' allowances in the province of Ontario; it is manned by officials of that great public institution, the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission.

Mr. MANION: Might I offer a suggestion to my hon. friend? Does he not think that in fairness, having made a general statement of that kind, he should give more details, rather than leave it in the form of a general statement? Those are pretty serious charges, and it seems to me that my hon. friend has said either too much or too little.

Mr. SANDERSON: In reply to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), I do not think I have said too much or too little, and if I have the time I may say a good deal more before I sit down.

Mr. MANION: There is plenty of time.

Mr. SANDERSON: In regard to the manning of the political machine by officials of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, let me say that part of the machine is not working true to form; for there has been to some extent a backfire from the gun they have been firing in that part of the political machine. But I repeat, Mr. Speaker, in the province of Ontario the political machine is manned by officials of these different departments and commissions as I have stated here on my responsibility as a member of this house. They have built up that great political machine in the province of Ontario. I will not say that they have taken the money out of the treasury, but the fact that they have the spending of the money through their officials has resulted in their using it, if not directly at least indirectly for political purposes.

My friend the Minister of Railways thought I had said too much or too little. Well, I am going to tell him something more. During the last year and a half there have been several by-elections for the legislature of Ontario, and to my knowledge hundreds and hundreds of unemployed men were stopped outside the polling booths by Conservatives and warned that they had better be careful how they marked their ballots, because if it was found they had voted against the Queens Park candidate they could take it for granted that they would not get any work or relief from the unemployment fund. If that is not playing politics I do not know what is. So I repeat that in Ontario, unfortunately, the money received by the province under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act has been used to further the purposes of the political machine.

I regret that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) is not in his seat. He holds a very important portfolio. There is no doubt of his ability, nor of his integrity so far as I know; but I am a little doubtful of him in some other respects. I am told that his sponsor was the distinguished gentleman who now occupies such a prominent position in London, England, and that it was he who tutored the minister in the craft of politics. So we had an excellent combination—an apt pupil and a very clever teacher. On February 23 last the minister took part in the debate on unemployment, arising out of the amendment moved by the member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) on the motion to go into supply. One would naturally expect that in what was his maiden speech as Minister of Labour he would have at least said something in regard to the policy of the government or what he himself thought should be done to help dispel the dark clouds of unemployment and distress that hang over the country. I have read his speech carefully in Hansard of that date. He was not subject to the forty-minute rule and consequently spoke at length. In all kindness to him I would point out that he took up almost three-quarters of an hour in criticizing the immigration policy of the former administration, and tried to argue that the policy was largely the cause of the present unemployment and distress. Well, the hon. gentleman came into this house after the elections of 1930, and I would refer him to a speech delivered on March 9, 1928, by the then hon. member for Vancouver North, Mr. McRae, who sat on this side as a member of the Conservative party and of the opposition. His fellow Conservatives applauded the scheme that he outlined for colonizing fifty million acres of land in the far west at a cost involving not millions but billions of dollars. If the then government had taken his advice and carried out that policy the country would now be bankrupt.

After attacking the immigration policy of the late administration, the minister launched an attack on the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, who held the portfolio of labour in the late Liberal government. I hold no brief for the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River; he is well able to take care of himself and usually does, but I would say to the minister that if he puts as much energy into his work and gets as close to the labouring people of Canada as did his predecessor, he will have a record to be proud of when he retires from the Department of Labour. On that occasion he regaled the house with a vast amount of correspondence from people up in northern Ontario, from mayors, presidents of boards of trade and others, all throwing boquets at the administration. One would expect an hon. gentleman holding the very high and responsible position of Minister of Labour to maintain debate, especially during this trying period, on the high plane of national politics rather than descend to the low level of ward politics. But a perusal of the correspondence is sufficient to convince one that it could have no place even in the discussion of a village council.

Now, to come to the resolution itself:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

The Prime Minister is a very eminent lawyer, and I do not pretend to follow him in the citations he read to the house yesterday from a judgment delivered by the late Lord Chancellor Haldane, but it appears to me as a layman using ordinary common sense that he is attempting to resurrect something that is dead. He is trying to amend an act that became null and void on March 1 last. This resolution requires an undertaker to bury it, and when that is done the government should bring in some live act in its place.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to farm relief as it pertains to the province of Ontario. We have heard a great deal in regard to the money spent in Saskatchewan and the other provinces of the west for direct farm relief, but if this government does not take some steps to relieve the situation in this great province of Ontario, before long they will be confronted with a situation that will tax all the resources of the country. During the course of a debate the other day the Prime Minister stated, in reply to a question as to farm products and their prices, that the farmers of this country had better read the book written by the Duchess of Atholl. If that is all the relief the government is prepared to give the farmers of Ontario and of the other provinces, then it is a sorry day for the farmers and for the whole Dominion of Canada.

I want to repeat what has been often said in this house that if the basic industry of this country cannot prosper; if the farmers cannot find markets for what they produce, at prices which will at least give them some profit, that industry is doomed. This is the situation facing the farmers of Ontario to-day, as well as those of every province in this great dominion. I hope the house will not permit the Prime Minister to force through this blank cheque again. The right hon. gentleman likes to cite precedents from the mother of parliaments, as he calls it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, as one who has had considerable relief work done in his constituency I can hardly let the statements just made by my hon. friend (Mr. Sanderson) go unchallenged. The hon. gentleman said this money was used for political purposes. I agree with the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) that if a man stands up in this house and makes a charge as serious as this, at least he should be prepared to give some proof. The only proof suggested by the hon. member who just took his seat was that somewhere, at some time, some persons had been told by somebody that if they did not vote for a certain candidate in a certain by-election—which the hon. gentleman did not name—they would be deprived of relief work. The one outstanding thing that has struck me during this debate has been the lack of real criticism by the opposition. Perhaps they are performing what they think is a party act, but it does not take very much intelligence to understand that really there is no enthusiasm behind what they are doing; their efforts are not well directed, and above all no alternative plan has been suggested. I defy any member of this house to go into the ridings where this money has been spent and successfully criticize the way it has been handled. I do not say there have been no mistakes; there have, but what undertaking of such magnitude ever was carried through without mistakes being made? The opposition have suggested no alternative. What would they have done with these tens of thousands of people, men, women and children, literally starving in this country? When I remember that notable speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), with the background it had—that speech that acted as one of the most powerful weapons in sweeping hon. gentleman opposite from the government benches to the opposite side of the house—I should think they would have left this subject alone.

We had unemployment then, Mr. Speaker; we still have it and everyone regrets it, but what would hon. gentlemen opposite have done? I asked the hon. member who just took his seat what he would have done, and what was his answer? He said he would have appointed a commission. Was that an alternative policy? I ask him now, as I ask any member opposite, what he would have done that the government did not do. Would they have started a dole?

Mr. MITCHELL: You started it yourselves.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. gentleman says we started it ourselves. I will do this; I will go into Hamilton at the next election and defend the labouring people there against him on this question.

Mr. SANDERSON: Did I understand the hon. member to say he will go into Hamilton and speak against the labour candidate?

Mr. McGIBBON: No, I said I would defend this legislation, and I think it can be defended successfully. Through this legislation seven million man-days of work were given the people of this country. Is that nothing to be proud of? Did it have no effect on the prosperity of the country? Perhaps it had not much effect, but I will tell you what it did right in my own riding; it had the effect of keeping body and soul together for a lot of those people who would have starved without it. There is no question about that. When this work started last fall a man came to me and said, "McGibbon, I have a wife and eight children. I have nothing; I have only earned $63 in the last four months, and my prospects for the future are no better."

Mr. POULIOT: There are 550,000 like that.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, but it only emphasizes the need for legislation of this kind, and the fact that it should not be stopped from the first of this month. Now what should we have done with these people? That is the question before the house and no doubt before the government. These people had nothing to eat and there were, in my opinion, only two things to be done, possibly three. You could hand them out a dole or you could put them to work. The government decided to do the latter, wisely, I think. Others may differ and they have just as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine, but I think it was a wise business, good business both from the man's standpoint and from the country's. It certainly saved the man's self respect when you gave him a job whereby he could earn his own living instead of being put on the dole. It was certainly in the interests of the country even if you got only forty or fifty or sixty per cent of value for the money you spent. And so the government decided, wisely, in my opinion, to go into the policy of road building. The Dominion government could not do otherwise: that goes without saying; and that was what I meant when I asked the last speaker what was his alternative policy. I am not a lawyer, but I do not know of anything they could have done except to hand out money, and they chose to save the self-respect of the people of Canada by endeavouring to get some value for the money that was spent.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. gentleman says he would hand out money, and the money has been handed out by the federal government. Is he in favour of, and does he endorse, the action of this government in handing out sums to the provinces without any check, without any audit on the expenditures, without any idea as to where the money is to go or who is to get it?

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not in favour of that, but that has not been done.

Mr. SANDERSON: But it has been done.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not without an audit and check; not at all. I think there is something to be said for the principle which has been announced and which I stated in this house ten or twelve years ago, namely, that the body responsible for raising money through taxation of the people should be responsible for the spending of that money. There is a good deal to be said for that principle. But when you are faced with a national emergency, with humanity in one scale of the balance and legal quibbling and technicalities in the other, then I say that the people of this country will not tolerate the overriding of humanity by technicalities.

How was the money spent? I happen to know a good deal about the way some of it was spent. I do not think we got as much value as we should have, and that is possibly inevitable in any undertaking of such magnitude. But I do know that we got value. The first thing that happened was this. I myself put an advertisement in every paper in my riding, asking all those out of work to register. That was the first thing. Then certain works were laid out to be undertaken and certain quotas of men drawn from every municipality. How was that done? The reeve and council of the municipality were asked to pick the men, and who could know the politics of the reeve in any township or municipality in the riding? That was the way it was done, and the money was spent through the officials of the provincial government. The hon. member says they are political heelers. I want to tell him that the principal official in the district of Muskoka was a Liberal, one of the worst Grits I think you could find in any county in the province of Ontario. He handled all that money and none of us objected.

An hon. MEMBER: Was he a good Grit?

Mr. McGIBBON: You will have to define what that is before I can answer. However, when he wanted men he wrote to the reeve of the municipality and said, "Send me ten, twenty or thirty men," as the case might be. How could politics enter into a scheme of that kind? The men went on and did their work for a week or two and then they were let go and others were taken in their places, and not all from my riding by any means. I believe many came from the riding of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat; many came from Oshawa; many came from Galt, and some from Preston. And they were selected in the identical way that those in Muskoka were selected. The reeve or the mayor of the municipality was asked to select those who were in want, and those who presumably were most in want were first sent to work. That was the way the work was carried on throughout the districts of Parry Sound, Muskoka and Haliburton, and from actual knowledge I can say that I do not know how some of these people would ever have got through the winter had it not been for the work provided by this government and the provincial authorities.

I ask hon. members: Is it not fair, when a man rises in this house and claims that this money was used for political purposes, that he should at least give some proof? I know that in the north country it was not so used; politics never entered into it anywhere. I can say further that it has done a great amount of good for the poor people of these working districts in the north. If hon. gentlemen have any suggestion to offer, why do they not offer it? I am not advocating it, but I think it is a debatable point whether we should not distinguish between wages and relief. We had many complaints from farmers, when they paid $2.40 a day, that the wages were away beyond anything they could afford, and we had some complaints from industry along the same line. Of course there was this to be said, that the men were not given continuous work; they were not expected to have continuous work. They had probably one week out of two or three. But I think it is a debatable point, if this is going to be done again, whether you should not build your camps, put in your cooks, and have every man who is in want go there and keep him and feed him. Let him do what he can but keep him continuously. The money would take care of a far larger number of people than it would under the past scheme. I do not know whether that would appeal to everyone, but what did appeal to me was this: that it was rather a hardship to put a man on for a week and then turn him off for two weeks or so. The demand, however, was so great that it was almost impossible for everyone to be taken on and kept on continuously. I say, therefore, taking into consideration the objections of the farmers, the manufacturers and so on, that it might be debatable whether there was not a better scheme than the one we employed. But the situation was largely similar to war conditions. There was nothing to guide us and we had to act as best we could and obtain the best results possible.

What I rose to say was this. As regards that part of the country with which I am concerned, where I had considerable intimate knowledge of the spending of the money, I can assure the house that politics never played any part in it for five minutes. I do not think politics had any effect at all. Undoubtedly mistakes were made that should not be made again, but I resent people getting up in this house and making accusations of a character so serious as those made this afternoon, without any proof whatever.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of greater interest to the members in this corner of the house than that of the relief of unemployment, yet I must confess to an almost overbearing sense of futility in attempting once again to try to set forth our position with regard to such matters. While the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) was speaking I looked around the chamber and I noticed that there were only twenty-five members on the government side of the house, including two cabinet ministers, and only twenty-six or twenty-seven members on this side. It does not seem as if this question is of any vital importance to the membership of this house, and, more than that, it seems to be taken for granted that any discussion which takes place on the floor of this house will be of no great importance in modifying the views of the government. Some hon. member said the other day that to a very considerable extent we have degenerated into a debating society. If this is a debating society, I suppose the only thing we can do is to keep up the debate in the hope that some time we may get a break.

In his remarks when introducing this resolution the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) took a great deal of trouble to attempt to shift the responsibility from the federal government to the governments of the provinces. As has been pointed out, that was a great contrast to the attitude he took before the last elections. I should like to read two sentences only from the Prime Minister's speech delivered at Calgary on June 12, 1930. He said:

> I say to you, my fellow citizens, my fellow Canadians, speaking to the larger audience, I am convinced this problem has now ceased to be local and provincial and has become national in its importance.

And a little later:

> I propose that parliament shall formulate a definite plan for permanent relief, and that parliament, as representing the people, shall deal with this national problem and provide amelioration for the condition in order that next winter the Canadian people may not be facing the crisis which is upon us without having a remedy at hand.

As I have said, that was back in June, 1930. The next winter came, another winter came and we are well on into the spring and yet no permanent plan has been devised nor does it appear that the Prime Minister is making any effort to carry out his promise that a plan should be brought before parliament. He appears to be proposing to go on in the manner indicated by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), that is, drifting along and doing what at the moment seems to be best. It is against that kind of haphazard action that we protest.

I do not think there is any use worrying about whether or not this matter comes under provincial or federal authority. Even the Prime Minister had to admit that the provincial authorities, especially in the west, were almost bankrupt. No provincial government, especially those in the west, is going to protest against the Dominion government dealing with this question of unemployment. Only two days ago I received the following telegram from Premier Bracken:

> Distribution seed grain through municipalities in Manitoba will burden financial resources of said municipalities far beyond their ability to undertake. Strongly urge that you use your best endeavours to have Dominion government undertake finance one-third of freight charges and assume one-third of any losses by municipalities resulting through distribution of seed grain. Provincial government has already undertaken to assume one-third in both instances.

A very serious crisis is facing the farmer in the west. The provincial governments are coming forward and making their proposals but apparently they can obtain no satisfaction whatever from the federal government. What is to be done? Under these circumstances we find the Prime Minister reading elaborate and lengthy extracts from some judicial decision in connection with the exact point at which federal and provincial jurisdiction may be doubtful. I do not think that is in keeping with the promises he made and the attitude he assumed before the elections.

Last evening we listened to a very brilliant speech by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). I agree with him to a large extent, especially when he states that there is great danger that parliamentary authority may be abrogated by the taking of such action as we are now asked to take. The Prime Minister in attempting to meet this objection the other day, said:

> . . . having regard to the gravity of the situation and the difficulty of dealing with it by any hard and fast rule, that this chamber will confer these powers upon this government. I would not deprive this parliament of its right to criticize freely and, if it thought desirable, destroy this administration for the improper discharge of its obligations, but I can conceive of no way in which this house can have larger powers conferred upon it than by the method I have suggested, so that in every instance it might have the fullest opportunity of dealing with these matters.

That sounds very well, it sounds as if parliament has authority but in actuality we know that the government has a majority of some thirty members and that on any vital question it can count on the solid support of that majority. Even on minor matters the government seems to feel quite safe in relying on the support of its following, which means in effect that this parliament has little authority. It is all very well to say that in form, measures have to be submitted to parliament, but in actual practice it means that what the Prime Minister says goes. When the Prime Minister makes a statement he can count on the loyal support of every last member of his party, and therefore what we say here is of practically no value. I think we have had an almost unseen change in the character of our British institution. When parliament was first organized there was no political machine such as we have to-day and under those circumstances a speech in the house might have some weight and a proposal could be discussed on its merits and there might be some check enforced, but to-day there is very little check.

I would not object quite so strenuously to the dictatorship which is rapidly being developed if that dictatorship were in the interests of the great majority of the people, but I do not believe that is the case. As far as I can judge from the various measures presented to the house, this dictatorship is essentially in the interests of the financial groups of this country. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, the only two illustrations that the Prime Minister gave of the power which he asked to be conferred upon the government with regard to peace, order and good government, were relative to financial measures. Mention was made, for example, of the export of gold. I was rather interested in a reply which was given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to a question I asked the other day, to the effect that gold issued in redemption of Dominion of Canada notes from September 21 to October 19, 1931, the day of the passing of order in council P.C. 2617, to public bodies, banks, firms and individuals, amounted to $5,318,461.49. That means that certain individuals and firms were able to secure, in exchange for dominion notes, gold which, I am credibly informed, was then shipped to pay their debts in the United States. That may have been quite legal, but I urge that the ordinary man cannot get gold for that purpose. I know of a number of cases that have been brought to my attention where men have applied for gold and have been refused it. It is a most serious situation where certain preferred groups can secure gold and make their payments in the United States thus saving what one time was something like 25 per cent of a discount. That is a serious state of affairs.

Mr. MANION: May I point out to my hon. friend that no special groups got the privilege of exchanging Dominion of Canada notes for gold? The matter depended on the circumstances in each case, and each case was dealt with on its merits. I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to be unfair. There were people who were so unpatriotic as to desire to secure gold in order to make the premium on it, and those people had to be refused.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to know what the difference is between making a premium on gold here and sending it to the United States and saving the discount there.

Mr. MANION: There were reasons for holding the gold in Canada, so far as possible, unless there were better reasons for sending it to the United States.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not disputing the general policy, but friends of mine have gone to the banks and asked for gold, and while I think they were just as patriotic as the people to whom gold was given, they were refused.

Mr. MANION: That may have been for good reasons.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is an arbitrary practice on the part of the government in that it depends entirely on them and comes under this relief measure as to whether certain people will be able to secure gold in exchange or not. The Minister of Finance, may I say to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), said that this redemption of Dominion of Canada notes was as provided by law. I should like to ask the Minister of Railways why, if this redemption was as provided by law, some people secured gold whereas others were refused it.

Mr. MANION: Because, as I said, it all depended on the circumstances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then it is not law if it depends on circumstances, because this means in effect that the matter is left to the arbitrary jurisdiction of the government in power. That is my objection.

Further than that, may I point out another matter which comes very close to this. Recently the provincial savings bank of my province had to close its doors, and the accounts were transferred to the chartered banks. We have not yet been told just why that was done. If the Dominion government could come to the rescue of certain individuals and, if necessary, supply gold, I should like to know why the dominion could not come to the rescue of the provincial savings bank of Manitoba.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Did they not do so?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend makes a positive statement. When he says that they did not do so, he does not know the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have a full statement on that matter, because even such a paper as the Winnipeg Tribune, which is usually a staunch supporter of the government, charges in its editorials discrimination by the government against Manitoba. When public charges of that nature are made, especially by such a newspaper as that, it is high time for the government to give some sort of explanation of the matter. But my object in raising the question was simply this, that I say a dictatorship such as is developing in this country is particularly dangerous when it is used in the interest of financial groups rather than in that of the great majority of the people.

The Prime Minister has again and again objected to the dole. He has said that as long as he is Prime Minister he will not consent to the adoption of it. In my judgment, he and his government have adopted the worst kind of dole which I know. The so-called dole, or the unemployment insurance scheme in Great Britain, is infinitely preferable to the scheme that we have in this country. I admit there have been some abuses connected with the unemployment insurance scheme in Great Britain; there is no doubt of that, but I know men, irrespective of party in Great Britain, who say that they would not think of getting along there without the unemployment insurance scheme. What have we here? Simply a hand-out. That is all it means. We have no system whatever; we have no way of encouraging people to save; we have no way of stimulating people to work. We simply have the government giving when it has to do so and now apparently proposing to carry on the same practice. There seems to be no arrangement for any change whatever.

I should like to urge upon the members of the house that the present situation shows no sign of improvement. It is barely possible that the enormous amount of credit recently injected into the financial system of the United States may have some influence on the situation in this country. Some people are building their hopes on that. I am not at all sure that will affect us very materially in Canada. I am inclined to think the international situation is much more serious than most of us imagine, and has a far greater effect even on this continent than most of us are willing to concede. In any case there is no immediate prospect of improvement in the situation, yet in spite of this the government have no plans. Several of the members have said that the government have actually provided relief for many people. That is true, and to that extent the government has to be commended. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) said that the government had helped many people in that it had helped them to keep body and soul together. I wonder why it is we should be content to keep tens of thousands, yes, hundreds of thousands of people in a condition where the best that can be said is that body and soul are being kept together. Is that anything of which to be proud? During a week-end recently I happened to take a stroll over the mountain in Montreal, and as I passed beautiful residences extending mile after mile—with here and there one boarded up, it may be said, because even in those high circles they are beginning to feel the effects of present conditions—I could not but be impressed by the fact that we still have enormous wealth in Canada. When there are people whose wealth is indicated by beautiful homes in Montreal, Toronto and other cities; by bank accounts, bank balances, investments which can be made in bonds as soon as such issues are put on the market, I cannot see why a large part of our population should be condemned to a condition under which they can do no more than keep body and soul together. There are people throughout the country who are still living in temporary shelters built on dumps and garbage heaps. People by the thousands are going in and out of missions where they are rapidly becoming demoralized by the whole atmosphere of charity which prevails. Men have to go to soup kitchens and take their places in bread queues. Is this the treatment that should be meted out to citizens who have hitherto been regarded as respectable Canadians? In my own city, where I think we are taking as good care of the unemployed as anywhere in Canada, we have some five thousand odd families on relief. I wish hon. members could understand what it means for these families to be in receipt of charity week after week, month after month, and now year after year. Not only does it mean that the man is rapidly becoming incapable of work and that his wife is becoming discouraged, but it means that these people cannot pay their doctors and dentists' bills, that some are having to take their children out of school, and generally speaking that they are losing heart. It is all very well for the Prime Minister to say that the people of the west are optimistic. I know the optimism of the people of the west, but I say that there are large numbers of the people of the west who are not now optimistic and have no right to be optimistic under the conditions that prevail to-day. They are losing heart.

In addition to those five thousand odd families on relief, there are some six thousand single men who are being fed daily in big dining halls. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario rather boasted that the government had provided work, but the work actually provided amounts to a very small proportion of the relief given, and the government it is rumoured, is even now proposing that it will give up its scheme of providing public works and fall back on straight relief. It is pointed out that the providing of work is too expensive, and that it would be a great deal cheaper if the government simply handed out straight relief. I hope there is nothing in that rumour, because it is far better to keep the public works going and let men obtain work and maintain their self-respect than to go on with this idea of being indefinitely on the dole, for that is all it is—indefinitely on the dole.

The Prime Minister in a number of his references has, it seems to me, rather suggested that these unemployed people were blameworthy, had to be guarded against, and all that kind of thing. I want to urge very strongly to-day that unemployment under modern conditions is no crime whatever. It is undoubtedly still a crime to steal, but I would like to know whether any hon. member here would say that under no circumstances a man was justified in taking food when he was starving. That is the issue we shall have to face.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. gentleman kindly tell the house where the Prime Minister ever said that these unemployed were blameworthy?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: According to the press, when he interviewed a delegation of the unemployed the other day, he came very near to saying that.

Mr. MANION: He did nothing of the sort. He merely criticized their method of putting up a demand and the generally offensive method of the spokesman for the party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Their methods may have been offensive, but again and again I have read accounts of the reception which the Prime Minister has given to the unemployed, and certainly one would think that he was dealing with a group of near criminals instead of with men in almost desperate straits. Possibly sometimes such men do not know the polite language to use and so do not use it under the desperate circumstances in which they find themselves.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): You should not read those Grit papers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether it was in Grit or Conservative newspapers.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to urge this, that the people who own property and wealth do so because of existing social arrangements, not necessarily because of their own virtue or their own abilities. I think of the way in which the natural resources of this country, the mines, the timberlands, the water powers and so on, have been alienated in the past. I do not think the fact that a man owns any of these things to-day is any indication that he has any more ability or is any more moral than those who are without them, and that is putting it very mildly in view of the large number of scandals we have had in this country in which graft has gone on in the securing of the public resources doubtless indicating a still more widespread practice along these lines. Whether the present owners have obtained these resources legally or not, they own them because of the legislation that exists at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: Beauharnois.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, Beauharnois is one example, but by no means the only one. I would urge the same thing with regard to the people who own factories, and who to-day in many cases are laying their men off simply because the times are not such as to enable them to make profits. I would say that these people who own factories and who have made money in the past from them have done so simply because of the arrangements of society. Have we not sat here ever since confederation and handed out special privileges to the manufacturers? Of course we have, and they have made their money in that way, and yet some of these people who have made their money in that way would lecture the poor unemployed because they do not use polite language in making their requests of the government. Look at the big bond issues which have been over-subscribed sometimes within a few hours after being put on the market, and which bring to the holders as high a rate of interest as six or seven per cent. Does anyone mean to say that those who are in receipt of a steady income from sources such as these have any more right to enjoy life than the poor people who are going up and down the country seeking in vain for work? I think of the statements of the banks which are paying their usual dividends and in some cases giving premiums to their shareholders. How can they do so? It is because of the Bank Act which we put on the statute books of this country nine years ago. Is not that the reason? We know that the Canadian Bankers' Association spent $100,000 in lobbying here in order to get that Bank Act framed to suit their own convenience. They are able to pay these great dividends because of the arrangements of society. I think, too, of the insurance companies, some of them bolstered up, as was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, at a critical time, in spite of the act. I think of the owners drawing their dividends because of our social arrangements.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about the policyholders?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, what about them?

Mr. NICHOLSON: What about their dividends?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about them? What does the hon. member mean?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I would like my hon. friend to follow that through.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not following it through. My hon. friend evidently wants to talk about that. I say that the owners of these life insurance companies are drawing their dividends. What about the watered stock that we have in this country, and in connection with which, through the arrangements of high finance, a large number of our people have been bled? I say again that fortunes built up in this fashion are owing to the existing social arrangements and because of the legislation that we have on our statute books. And now these people who have built up their wealth by means of that legislation are telling us that the government must keep their hands off and must not give a few dollars to help the unemployed, that we have no money in this country with which to undertake relief work. I would point out that even papers like Toronto Saturday Night are saying to-day:

Despite all the striving of men after gold, its value in the last analysis is determined by the goods it will buy—the things we eat, wear and use in our everyday life.

And in the same way the real value of bonds is measured. In other words, the worth of a bond to its owner is measured by the goods which its interest and its principal, on repayment, will buy.

Measured by this standard, high-grade bonds now yield more than they have for many years. They present an opportunity for investment that comes only once or twice in a lifetime.

Again:

The income from $100 invested now in the 15-year bonds of the province of Ontario gives a yield of 8·43 per cent, as compared with 6·60 per cent in December, 1920. That is, the real yield of money is 1·83 per cent greater than in 1920.

And every thoughtful buyer is urged to invest in bonds now. Thus, as we have said again and again, owing to the change in the buying power of the dollar, money is simply rolling into the pockets of those who have had a better chance in life, of those who had a head start. Yet we do not seem to be able to get anything worth while for the relief of the unemployed, nothing in the way of setting up such schemes as will permanently bring those now unemployed a decent standard of living. I do not know how much longer the people of Canada will stand what we have been seeing lately, when the millionaire Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh, no, there is no shame in that. When the millionaire Prime Minister of this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame! Order!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, there is no shame in that. When the millionaire Prime Minister of this country is surrounded by a heavy guard—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Shame again! Even the Ottawa Journal thought that was a shame —surrounded by a heavy guard will actually undertake to lecture a few poor people because they are dubbed communists—who may be communists for all I know—and who come here almost in desperation, and do not speak to him in the most polite language or do not prefer their requests in a parliamentary fashion. I say I do not much wonder that the people are becoming desperate across this country; I do not much wonder that our jails are beginning to fill with so-called "criminals," I do not much wonder that the Prime Minister and some others are having to be attended by bodyguards; I do not much wonder at this because you cannot expect that hundreds of thousands of people are simply going to lie down and die or continue indefinitely to be mere hewers of wood and drawers of water on a pittance that, as the member for Muskoka-Ontario says, is sufficient merely to keep body and soul together.

I remember some years ago reading a story by Conan Doyle about a whaler. They had had rather hard luck, and in pursuit of whales they had got far to the north, but the captain persisted in maintaining his course. The season was becoming late, ice floes were gradually pressing in, and there were only one or two avenues of escape left. The crew became almost mutinous, and even the officers, who under the ordinary discipline that prevails are supposed to be very loyal to their captain, were getting dubious and urging that he should turn south while it was still possible to do so. Then one night at a late hour the ship's doctor, a young medical student, happened to be on deck, and unexpectedly he came upon the captain performing some mystic rites. All of a sudden the doctor realized that the captain was mad, that here they were in these far northern waters with every avenue of escape rapidly closing up and the ship commanded by a captain utterly irresponsible as a navigator.

An hon. MEMBER: What is your illustration?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My illustration is that the ship of state to-day is in command of a captain who seems to be so obsessed with his own ideas, so sure, I might say, of his own importance and of the impossibility of his making a mistake in judgment, that we are deliberately sailing on at a time when there might be some avenue of escape, and when, if I am rightly informed, even some of his own crew are beginning to get dubious of the successful outcome of his course.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time not only have we to deal with the ordinary type of unemployed; we have to do with a very large number of mechanics who had accumulated small savings while employed. Those savings are being rapidly depleted, and they will not be able to keep going much longer. Others have been drawing on their insurance, some of them have been mortgaging their homes, and in many instances they are in danger of losing their property. What is going to happen unless we have some policy that will start up public works and employ these men? I think I might speak to-day not merely of the so-called labouring men but of our business men as well. In my own constituency and in other cities which I visit from time to time scores of businessmen come to me at their wits end what to do next.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that we are facing a crisis. As I see the matter, we have reached the stage when we cannot at the same time pay the dividends which are demanded and pay wages as well. I think, to put it in a nutshell, that is the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. Enormous indebtedness has been piled up and we are asked to pay interest on those debts and at the same time to provide hospitals and other public services of all kinds. We cannot do it. That is one of the inherent contradictions of the present system which is beginning to manifest itself.

What are we going to do? It would seem as if the government now in power, sensing somewhat the issue at stake, is determined at all costs to maintain the present system, to pay the dividends, to pay the interest on the bonds, no matter what happens to the people outside. I would suggest that before very long a new policy has to be adopted by which we will place the interests of the men, women and children of Canada before the interests of the bondholders and the financiers.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "Order," says somebody. Yes, that is supposed to be a very dangerous doctrine. But I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a new line-up is coming in this country. The old divisions between Liberals and Conservatives are not going to amount to very much in the near future—they do not amount to a great deal with the ordinary people to-day—and in the new line-up that is coming we shall find on the one hand the private interests of this country—which are linked inextricably with those of the United States—and on the other the great masses of Canadians who have a right to live. We talk about our Canadian citizenship, but for many men to-day Canadian citizenship does not mean anything. All it amounts to at best, as the member for Muskoka-Ontario put it, is the possibility of keeping body and soul together.

Mr. McGIBBON: I rise, Mr. Speaker, to a point of order. I say the hon. member can draw no such conclusion from my remarks.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario did say that he thought the government ought to receive our commendation because they had provided relief which at least had helped many men and women to keep body and soul together. I give them full commendation for that, but I say that is not the standard we should have in this dominion; we should have a higher standard than that. I should like to go back to the days of our fathers and our grandfathers when they settled in this country. I have come from two or three generations of Canadian stock, and I say that when our forefathers set up their homes in this country they were trying to work out a democracy in which every man would have a chance to live, and live decently.

An hon. MEMBER: They worked.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, they worked—and that is the point I do not like about hon. members opposite. They imply that people who are not working to-day do not want to work; which is a lie. The vast majority of the people who are out of work to-day would work if they had a chance, and it is that slander on the common people of this country that I do not like and against which I protest. The fact is that most of them want to work, and they are just as anxious to work as those pioneer people about whom I have been speaking.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. member who is now speaking has said that hon. members of this house have stated that those who are out of work do not want to work. I demand that he withdraw that statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was not my statement. I said that interjection of an hon. member opposite implied that a large number of those who were out of work did not want to work. If it did not imply that it did not mean anything.

Mr. McGIBBON: I dispute that; the hon. member did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the remark of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that the inference to be drawn from the remarks of hon. members is a lie, is not parliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I said, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; I want to be clear on this matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: In parliamentary language it would be proper to say that it was not correct. To say it is a lie is not parliamentary, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw that statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to make my statement. I said that the implication was that the majority of the people who were out of work did not want to work, and I said that such a statement was a lie.

Mr. SPEAKER: Which is not parliamentary, and I ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I refuse to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is too experienced a parliamentarian to disregard parliamentary practices.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I did not accuse any hon. member here of telling a lie. I do not know whether you, sir, can catch what I am saying. I did not accuse any member here of uttering a lie; what I did say was this: The hon. member who interjected that word "work" would seem to imply that the majority of the men out of work did not want to work and would not work. I said that a statement that most of the men unemployed to-day would not work was a lie, but I did not put that statement into the mouth of the minister. I merely said that would seem to be implied.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister did not make any such statement, and the hon. member has not heard anyone else make any such statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then I will make it a hypothetical statement, if you like.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the hon. member's statement is that if such a statement were made it would be a lie?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so. I say that if that was the implication, or if that statement was made, it would be a lie.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Speaker, I think we will find to-morrow, when we read Hansard, that the statement now made by the hon. gentleman is not correct.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I would—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would point out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Except with the unanimous consent of the house the hon. member cannot continue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All I would say, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for more than forty minutes; his time is exhausted.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, for the last couple of days I have been listening to the debate that has been proceeding in the house. To use the ordinary words that we hear so often, I did not intend to take any part in the discussion this afternoon, but a few statements have been made by two or three speakers with which I should like to deal.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who has just taken his seat, spent a little over forty minutes—because I noticed the time when he rose—in making a speech full of destructive criticism. I carefully listened to the hon. member in order to see whether, in his whole speech, he would offer one constructive suggestion, and I say without fear of contradiction that no matter how carefully his speech may be read to-morrow, not one word of constructive criticism will be found during the entire course of his remarks. The hon. member spoke at great length in criticism of the present government, and particularly of the Prime Minister; he said that all we were doing in regard to the unemployment situation was giving a hand-out, when as a matter of fact no one knows better than he that for a year and a half now we have been supplying employment, so far as we could and also so far as the financial condition of this country would permit, to those out of work. The figures have been placed on Hansard not once but many times; they have been published many times also, showing that over 300,000 men were given employment for a time at any rate. I do not know exactly the length of time, but I know that some 330,000 men have been given employment. Is that a hand-out? I do not think it is. There is no doubt that mistakes have been made by the present government in the handling of this very serious problem; no one will question that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: The hon. member who is the whip of the Liberal party says "hear, hear." If we have made any mistakes to compare with the blunder they made in denying unemployment, or with the blunder made by my hon. friend's leader when he said he would not give a five cent piece to any province for the relief of unemployment if that province had a Conservative government, I do not know what those possible blunders may be. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as usual, played the demagogue; he referred to the enormous wealth of this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would ask your opinion, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, as to whether or not the word "demagogue" is parliamentary?

Mr. SPEAKER: To call another hon. member a demagogue or to accuse him of playing the demagogue is not parliamentary.

Mr. MANION: I do not know another word to take its place, Mr. Speaker, so I will withdraw it. After all "demagogue" is not such an ugly word to use; it simply means playing to the people, and if there is anyone in or out of this house who plays to the people more than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I do not know who he is. The hon. member also talked of bank balances and of the interest on loans. Again and again in this house I have heard him stand up and talk of the dividends that are paid, and ask why we do not take those dividends from the people and give them to the unemployed. The hon. member suggested at least, if he did not absolutely propose it, that we take the bank balances—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must rise to a point of order. I made no suggestion like that at all; I made no suggestion of that character whatever.

Mr. MANION: I am very glad the hon. gentleman is not suggesting that, but if he was not doing so I really do not know what he was suggesting when he spoke of bank balances.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I think I must have that statement withdrawn; I made no such statement.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman talked of bank balances—

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I made no statement, Mr. Speaker, such as that attributed to me by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion).

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has denied it; that is sufficient.

Mr. MANION: I do not know to what the hon. gentleman was referring, then, when he spoke of the immense bank balances, the enormous wealth we have in this country, the dividends paid, the interest on loans and all that sort of thing. I should like to point out to him what is an absolute fact. The other day I made an inquiry as to the number of people in this country who have bought dominion bonds to the value of less than $2,000. I found that there were some 218,000 people in this country to-day holding bonds of the government of Canada to the amount of less than $2,000. These are poor people; they are certainly not the millionaires whom the hon. gentleman apparently likes to tilt at. They are ordinary working people who have shown that commendable quality of thrift, the practice of laying aside a part of their earnings to provide for their old age. Yet the hon. gentleman suggests that they have no right to, and should not be permitted to keep, fairly-earned dividends which they receive from the bonds of this government, or from bonds of any other description, though as a matter of fact the figures I gave have reference to federal bonds.

Finally, without wasting much more time on the hon gentleman, may I say that he was most unfair to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as he usually is. He made a statement which I should say is false, but I cannot say it is false because I should be ruled out of order. But it is false just the same, whether I am ruled out of order or not.

Some hon MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I submit that if the rules of the house are to be disregarded by a minister we may as well go home. The minister has accused me of making a false statement. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he is not in order in making that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the minister to accuse the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) of making a false statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, he did.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If the hon. gentleman will say that he did not I shall be glad to accept his statement; but certainly, as my ears caught it, he accused me of having made a false statement.

Mr. MANION: I will make this statement, that the hon. gentleman made a statement which he knew was not according to the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: That is certainly unparliamentary.

Mr. MANION: All right, I withdraw that too; I will endeavour to save a little of my own time. So far as I can see, the hon. gentleman is much more touchy than we are in regard to many of his own speeches. We have sat here and listened to speeches from him that contained statements that should have been contradicted forthwith, and this is one of them. The statement to which I refer he made with reference to the Prime Minister. He said that the Prime Minister went in surrounded by a heavy guard when he appeared before a group of unemployed. That is absolutely not so. I was present, as were also the ministers sitting around me to-day, when the Prime Minister appeared on the occasion in question and there was no guard whatsoever around him.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There were heavy guards at the gates.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend did not say heavy guards at the gates; he made the statement that the Prime Minister was surrounded by a heavy guard. I say that the Prime Minister was not surrounded by any guard whatsoever. He went with the other members of the cabinet and met the group of unemployed, and there was no appearance whatever of any guard except a couple of policemen who ordinarily are stationed in front of the door.

Mr. POWER: What about the cavalry and the tanks all around the building?

Mr. MANION: I am not talking about cavalry and tanks.

Mr. POWER: They surrounded the building, didn't they?

Mr. MANION: They may have surrounded the building but they did not surround the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister was not heavily guarded.

Mr. POWER: They weren't surrounding us; we don't care.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They were at every gate; we could not get in.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps they should have surrounded the hon. gentlemen. I have listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodsworth) for ten years, and I know of only one country of which he has ever had a good word to say. He came to this house in 1921 and I had been here some little time before that, and in all that time I have never heard him say a good word for any government in this country. He never had a good word to say for hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power and he has never had a good word to say for us. He does not believe in the government of this country at all. That is the attitude he takes. The only country for which he has ever had a good word is Russia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I deny that and I ask that the hon. gentleman withdraw it.

Mr. MANION: I have the floor. That is a question of fact and the hon. gentleman can deny it if he wishes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of Railways has the floor and, except on a point of order or on a question of privilege, he may not be interrupted even to be asked a question unless he consents.

Mr. MANION: Now, Mr. Speaker, I admit that a stupendous experiment has been going on in Russia, and I admit that there is probably some good in that experiment. I admit that probably some good will come out of it.

Mr. POWER: Sure; you are imitating it here. The government is imitating it.

Mr. MANION: I also admit that our system, what is known as the capitalistic system, has made rather serious mistakes. That is the system which obtains in all countries outside Russia, and I admit that it is making mistakes; for it does not seem right that some of our warehouses should be full while there are hungry people not only in this land but in other countries where the same system prevails. I admit all that; anyone who has eyes in his head cannot but admit it. But to suggest that the experiment which is going on in Russia is superior to the system which now obtains in that country, and which has obtained for a hundred years or more, the capitalistic system, so-called, is in my opinion a long stretch of the imagination. It is a suggestion which can come only from one who is biased in the extreme in favour of the Russian experiment.

We must not forget—and this is a point which it is well to keep in mind at all times—that this Russia which is so much praised in the speeches of my hon. friend, is the same Russia that has done so much of which the world cannot but disapprove. I read one speech the hon. gentleman made the other day outside this house. He has spoken since his return from Russia, and his whole attitude towards that country and its form of government is much more friendly than his attitude towards the type of government which we carry on in Canada. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech of the hon. member reported in the Ottawa Citizen of February 25. This speech he delivered before the Gyro club. I do not intend to read it, but I may say that in it he praised the Russian civilization. Perhaps I might quote a sentence:

> The people of Russia, while they have no incentive to work with the idea of saving vast sums of money or obtaining power by that means, are imbued with a lofty patriotism.

And then he goes on to praise it. But do not forget, when you compare Russia with this dominion, as I am comparing the two countries at the moment, that it was this same Russia, of which the hon. gentleman speaks so highly, that murdered the royal family. It is this same Russia that has been endeavouring, ever since the present group in power took charge, to wipe out the intelligentsia, to coerce the workers and in every way to compel them to labour practically as slaves. I have many quotations which I have not had the time to put into any sort of order, but which would show beyond any question the coercion of the workers in prison camps and so forth. It is this same Russia that has abolished religion. All of us, whether we be Catholics or Protestants, or whether we belong to any other religious denomination, have respect for some religion; but in Russia they have attempted to abolish religion. It is this same Russia, again, that has scorned the honour we bestow upon marriage and family life. It is this same Russia that has taken some three million people and not only sent them into exile but to a large extent murdered them, and for what crime? For the crime of seeking to be thrifty. I speak now of the kulaks. These people have met with this fate because they tried to save some money in order that they might take care of themselves in their old age—one of the most creditable qualities in human nature. One of the most commendable characteristics of a man is that he should look after himself and his children, and this is the crime for which these people have suffered. Let me quote for a moment from some articles on the kulaks. I have read many statements by observers in Russia and they agree that three million kulaks were driven into exile or murdered by the present Russian government. Here is a statement from the Toronto Globe, Associated Press cable:

> It is estimated that there are some 3,000,000 kulaks in Russia at present. Recently it was discovered that many of them were pretending not to be kulaks and were reaping rewards usually reserved for Soviet citizens in good standing. Investigators also reported that they were ensconcing themselves in governmental positions and taking every opportunity to commit sabotage.

Further on we read:

> Probably there is no class in Russia more hated by the Soviets than the kulaks, who were prosperous peasant-farmers before the revolution. Most of them suffered confiscation of property and loss of citizenship, and thousands were exiled to the Arctic regions, where they work in lumber camps and on road construction, or do other menial labour. They are considered enemies of communism, and extermination of their class is looked upon by the government as one of its most important policies.

Then again:

> Included with the kulaks among the outclassed in Russia, are the "nepmen," or former merchants and traders, and the "leshenitz," or priests, former czarist officers, ministers of state and others of their class.

I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared some time ago in the Ottawa Journal, dealing with the experiences of Henry Wales, a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune. It states:

> Mr. Wales wrote from Archangel, describes the living conditions of the kulaks who have been exiled to Siberia. (The kulaks were the prosperous peasant farmers who objected to confiscation). In two churches in Archangel they are housed under conditions that Mr. Wales describes as a charnel house. They are kept there, like cattle, until they begin their long tramp over the icy tundras and snow-covered trails to the distant regions to which they have been deported.
> Mr. Wales visited one of these churches, saw hungry, starving, vermin-covered, ragged peasants herded in a way that shocked and revolted him. He writes:
> "Like wild beasts in the cages of a menagerie, they sit with starving eyes, peering from emaciated faces, gray, brown, almost black from crusts of dirt. Their withered hands and fingers look like claws and talons, and their great masses of matted hair, long, unkempt beards and moustaches have not seen shears or razors for months."

Mr. Wales then goes on to describe the abuse and practically torture meted out to these kulaks. I have another article, which I shall not quote, which states that the government is still making the same drive on the kulaks. These men were successful peasant farmers and they are considered to be criminals. They are being treated worse than the czarists ever treated those whom they sent to Siberia. In those days when a man was found guilty of treason he was sent to Siberia but he was given some sort of living. In fact, many of the men who are to-day the leaders in Russia are men who had been sent to Siberia. The present government of Russia is not satisfied to treat the kulaks in this way; if they are not murdered they are driven into prison, they are starved and refused the rights of citizenship. This is the country which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre praises on every possible occasion.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Will the hon. minister advise the house what all this has to do with the unemployment in Canada?

Mr. MANION: I will come to unemployment in Canada in a few moments. The hon. gentleman has been sitting in this house for some time and I do not remember his offering any suggestive criticism to help unemployment.

This is the same Russia that repudiated its debts to the other countries of the world; this is the Russia that is spreading propaganda throughout the world in an attempt to make all other governments of the same type. This is the autocracy such as my hon. friend describes us as being, but if he used the same forms of speech against the government of Russia they would soon send one of their O.G.P.U. officers to him in the middle of the night and he would not be known any longer in Russia. This is the country which has wiped out absolutely freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of any kind —all forms of freedom of which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is in favour. The hon. gentleman has stated in this house, not once but many times, that he is no communist; he has stated that and I accept his statement, but I do say that if he were a communist he would talk exactly as he is talking.

I shall say a few words with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson). He spoke this afternoon for forty minutes; he made many generalities but offered no constructive criticism. I have listened to many hon. members on the other side who have taken part in this debate but I have heard nothing constructive. They have been absolutely barren so far as anything helpful to us is concerned. The hon. member for South Perth to my mind adopted a most unfair attitude towards the different commissions of the province of Ontario. He mentioned the hydro electric commission, the liquor commission, the mother's allowance commission, the old age pensions commission and practically every provincial commission of Ontario. He stated that the officers of these commissions were playing politics with the people of Ontario, that they were taking part in politics on behalf of the Conservative government of that province. I interrupted the hon. gentleman and invited him to give more details. I pointed out that he had said either too much or too little. I say in all fairness that without giving more details than he gave, and he gave none, the hon. gentleman should not brand the whole group of commissions of the province of Ontario as players of politics without offering some proof. Generalities will not get the hon. member anywhere; they probably do no damage to the province of Ontario, but they belittle the parliamentary life of our country.

Mr. SANDERSON: I want to ask the hon. minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) has spoken already.

Mr. MANION: I have no objection to hearing anything of which the hon. member wishes to remind me.

Mr. SANDERSON: In my remarks this afternoon I did not refer to the members of the commission. I said the officials, and I stand behind that statement.

Mr. MANION: To make a general statement like that without giving any proof whatsoever only belittles the whole parliamentary life of our country.

Hon. members on the other side have criticized us severely because of what they call our lack of fair treatment of the unemployed. The number of unemployed has been given at 350,000 and other such figures, and the hon. gentleman himself I think used the figure of 350,000. He mentioned also the name of a former organizer of the Liberal-Conservative party, General McRae. He criticized that gentleman for advocating the bringing in of people to the Peace river territory. General McRae was speaking for himself, and I will admit quite frankly that many of us spoke in past years in favour of immigration. My hon. friends criticized General McRae and those others who spoke in favour of immigration, but during their years in office—they were in power from 1921 to 1930—they showed no signs of a wisdom greater than ours in that regard. I have the figures showing the immigration into this country from 1926 to 1930, during the regime of my hon. friends. They are as follows:

1928	167,000
1929	165,000

During 1930 this government was in power for five months, but we had no control over the immigration which occurred during that year. Under the regime of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) 730,000 immigrants were brought into this country. That is just double the highest figure given for unemployed in the Dominion of Canada to-day, in fact, it is about three times the highest figure given by anyone who is at all dependable. How many immigrants were permitted to come into this country during 1931? The figure is, 27,500, a small number as compared with the vast number brought in during the regime of the previous government.

My hon. friend and his friends have abused us for what they say is our lack of policy in connection with unemployment, but I know of no sound policy carried out by them during the time they were in power. Unemployment was observable to everyone in 1929, but my hon. friend's leader denied at that time that there was any unemployment. In fact, he did not admit it until the elections were half over, and then he had to admit it because he had been nearly howled down by the unemployed in various sections of western Canada. I have no desire to hark back, but at that time the right hon. gentleman took the attitude that he would not give a five-cent piece towards the unemployed in any province governed by a Conservative administration. That was the attitude taken by his leader, and yet my hon. friend stands up in the house and belittles us because we have not solved a condition which is world-wide in extent. Neither he nor those in the cabinet of his leader at that time showed any particular foresight; they had no plan of any kind, and the only thing they did during their five years' regime was to boast of conditions over which they had absolutely no control. My hon. friends opposite have said that they are ready to cooperate with us. Has anybody in the house seen any signs on their part of cooperation at any stage? They find fault with every move we make. The leader of the opposition yesterday, when he was criticizing my right hon. leader stood in his place and asked my right hon. leader: Did you not warn the western provinces they must economize? If my right hon. leader had said yes, the leader of the opposition was ready to berate him for that. But my right hon. leader said that he had not warned them at all. Then my right hon. friend went round three sides of the house and criticized my right hon. leader for not having warned them. That is the kind of cooperation we are receiving from my hon. friends opposite.

Even in regard to the loan that was raised, which was partly for use in connection with unemployment relief, the leader of the opposition, when he spoke in Halifax or some other maritime city, did not cooperate in the raising of that loan. Indeed, in the maritime provinces he spoke against the loan.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not.

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I have not under my hand the right hon. gentleman's speech, but I remember very distinctly the right hon. gentleman's attitude at that time, and it was certainly not encouraging the people of this country to lend any money to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I supported the loan very strongly. I took exception to the particular designation that was given to it.

Mr. MANION: My right hon. friend must have supported it under his breath, because none of us heard him doing so.

As regards the economic conference, when the leader of the opposition was Prime Minister, he and his Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) used to ask in a shocked manner: If the Conservatives were elected, whom could they possibly send to the economic conference? That was one of their stock arguments: "If this Bennett crowd should be elected, who can possibly go to the economic conference?" Not only did we send the present Prime Minister of Canada and his confreres to the conference, but they arranged matters so that another economic conference is to be held in this country, and in bringing that economic conference to Canada they achieved a success which has never before been equalled by anybody at such a conference.

Why, when the wheat bonus was given to the western farmers, not one of my hon.

friends opposite praised us; they have been finding fault with us ever since for giving the five cent bonus on wheat. They have been talking again and again not only about our failing to relieve unemployment, but our failing to do anything that my right hon. leader promised when he went throughout the country.

Mr. BOUCHARD: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend says: Hear, hear. That shows about as much intelligence as most of the speeches the hon. member makes. The leader of the present government, as nobody will question, promised many things when he went through the country, but he has carried out a greater proportion of those promises in the time that he has been in power than any other prime minister has done in a similar period. Let me name a few of them. He called a special session, which he had promised. He put through a $20,000,000 vote for unemployment, which he had promised. He attended the economic conference, as he had promised, and he is bringing this conference back to Canada. He started the building of the trans-Canada highway. He imposed the tariffs which he had promised in order to help the industries of this country. His promise in regard to the St. Lawrence waterway, he has carried out in conversations with the United States government. In regard to unemployment relief he has helped 350,000 of the Canadian people to get work which they could not have got under any policy which anyone in the house has heard enunciated by any one of my hon. friends opposite in the last three years. There has been no policy enunciated by them that would bring about work for anybody. Their only policy is one of fault-finding and criticism of what we have done. It is a destructive policy, a destructive criticism, without any suggestion towards relieving conditions. Everybody realizes that we are not to blame for unemployment in Canada to-day and that we have been making a good effort towards relieving it. I admit quite frankly that we have not been wholly successful, but we are making a good effort. We have in Canada to-day a condition of unemployment just as all the other countries of the world have. The United States, in proportion to population, has a worse condition; free trade England, in proportion to population, also has a worse condition; even France, which until recently had a better economic condition than any other country, now, it is estimated, has a million or more unemployed.

In this country we have a condition which is due to a world situation and not to anything we have done, and, I say frankly, not due to anything the leader of the opposition has done; one which is due to the aftermath of the war, to the demands for reparations by various countries, particularly, perhaps, by some of the richer countries; to the pocketing of gold by two great countries, the gold being put in such a position that two of them possess the large proportion of it; to the competition of Russia, which is on a cheaper economic plane than any of the so-called advanced countries of the world, and, finally, to a great extent to the decrease in the selling price of the commodities of this country. There has probably been a decrease in the purchasing power of the western farmers of anything from two to three or four hundred million dollars due to the decrease in the price of commodities. Has that been on account of anything we have done? Everyone knows very well this is also a world condition. The purchasing power of the west has been practically wiped out, and because of that the factories of the east have been closed. I say, without fear of contradiction, that when conditions come back in the world in general, Canada will be one of the first countries to recover.

I have heard no word of praise from my hon. friends opposite in regard to the magnitude of the task successfully carried out by my right hon. leader, in the relief of 300,000 people in Saskatchewan. I have noticed, by the way—and this is rather interesting as I have been watching to see how it would turn out—none of the farmer members opposite for the three prairie provinces has found fault, because they realize full well that this government has done a noble work in trying to help out those three provinces. This work is worthy of praise, and yet the government has received from my hon. friends opposite no praise for anything it has done.

Let me say in closing that the question which we are facing to-day is a world one, one that is bigger than any party, bigger than any government. I believe my hon. friends opposite—and I have heard some of their friends say this in private conversation—would be taking a much bigger attitude if they came forward gladly and willingly and cooperated instead of giving us lip cooperation and active opposition. But the latter is what they have been doing. I say in all sincerity, in this trying time, the greatest ordeal through which the dominion has ever passed in its history—and I do not except anything; I do not except war times, because we were then all buoyed up by patriotism, by the desire to put down a foe who wanted to rule over the world—the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the other members of the late government and their friends behind them would be showing a much bigger attitude, a much truer Canadianism if they came forward gladly and willingly and really cooperated with us in these trying times.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member is calling us disloyal again.

Mr. MANION: Who used the word "disloyal"?

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member is mentioning the word now. It is the same old cry as before.

Mr. MANION: Why is my hon. friend bringing in the question of loyalty now?

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member mentioned it.

Mr. MANION: I never mentioned loyalty at all. If the question of loyalty were at issue, I could discuss it quite readily with the hon. gentleman. I made no mention of loyalty except in passing, in implying that it would be a loyal attitude to take. I do not question the loyalty of my hon. friends opposite. I presume they are as good Canadians as we are. But I say they would be taking an attitude better for this country and for the world if, instead of this captious criticism in which they are and have been indulging during the whole session, they came forward and helped us during these trying times, leaving their able criticism—because they can give able criticism—to things which should be criticized. I have no doubt the government has performed some acts which are open to criticism, some acts which have nothing to do with the trial through which we are passing. My hon. friends opposite will find chances to criticize us as they always do, but at the present time they should stand shoulder to shoulder with us in an endeavour to help us solve this problem instead of doing everything they can to block us.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) for his friendly advice as to the attitude that I in common with my friends on this side of the house should take. Let me assure him that in the remarks which I shall make I shall try, first, to speak to the question before the chair, and secondly, to avoid the spirit of bitterness which he has displayed in the few words with which he has favoured us. Indeed the hon. gentleman has done very well for one who said at the beginning of his remarks that he did not intend to address the house. I noticed, however, that he came well prepared with full quotations to give to my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

Mr. MANION: I had them right in my drawer.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let me say to my hon. friend about Russia, that Russia is attempting a great experiment. They are carrying on a government there in a way that I do not approve. They are doing it by means of a huge bureaucracy. In another part of Europe they are attempting another experiment on strictly opposed lines. There is a country in Europe where they have established a system of absolute autocracy. But in the British commonwealth of nations, and especially in Canada, we believe in representative government and in a democracy, and that is the reason why I am opposed to the resolution and to the policy of this government, which is trying to install autocracy in this Dominion of Canada. My right hon. friend is laughing.

Mr. BENNETT: I am laughing at you.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you very much. May I tell my hon. friend that he sometimes gives us cause to laugh and to smile. Otherwise we have only to pity the poor people who have to suffer on account of the deeds of hon. gentlemen opposite.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 10, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Second report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Matthews.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

M. WERBENUK

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. Has a contract been awarded to M. Werbenuk for carrying mail between Poplarfield post office, Manitoba, and railway station?
2. If so, were public tenders called, if not, for what reason?
3. What was the amount of contract?

Mr. SAUVE:

1. Yes.
2. No. Cost under $200 per annum.
3. $93.90 per annum.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. How many persons are at present detained in the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary?
2. Does the government intend to increase the staff of guards for the public safety during the summer months?
3. Are the penitentiary employees under the eight-day regime?
4. If not, what are the reasons for not adopting the eight-hour day regime in such institutions?

Mr. GUTHRIE:

1. 1,068 as on February 29, 1932.
2. Staff is always increased as the needs of the institution require, and safety to the public demands. A seasonal increase is always necessary for work in summer. Total number of officers as on February 29, 1932:

Permanent	119

3. No.
4. This has been discussed on many occasions and it has not been found possible to adopt. Winter hours are shorter than summer hours. Penitentiary Act, Sec. 62 (2) calls for at least ten hours hard labour. The eight-hour system would call for shifts and change of officers during working hours, thus dividing responsibility. Officers are allowed three weeks' holiday per annum, and one rest day in seven, besides sick leave on full pay.

CONVERSION AND NATIONAL SERVICE LOANS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the total amount of money borrowed under the conversion loan of May, 1931?
2. What were the total expenses incurred in securing the conversion loan: (a) commissions to chartered banks and brokers; (b) advertising, travelling and all other expenses?
3. What was the total amount of money borrowed under the national service loan of 1931?
4. What was the total expense incurred in securing national service loan of November, 1931: (a) commissions to chartered banks or brokers; (b) advertising, travelling and all other expenses?

Mr. RHODES:

1. $643,109,300.
2. (a) $2,960,358; (b) $599,425. Commissions and all other expenses represent 55/100 of 1 per cent on the principal amount.
3. $221,198,200.
4. (a) $1,819,106; (b) $266,000 (estimated, accounts not yet complete). Commissions and all other expenses represent 95/100 of 1 per cent on the amount raised.

Note: Under 2 (b) and 4 (b) are included cost of advertising, printing, engraving of bonds, clerical assistance and other expenses.

QUEENS COUNTY, N.S.—INDIANS

Mr. DUFF:

1. What was the name of the medical officer in charge of the Indians of Queens county, Nova Scotia, previous to 1930?
2. What salary did he receive per annum?
3. What is the name of the medical officer now engaged by the government in looking after said Indians?
4. How much does he receive per annum?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Dr. C. S. Hennigar, Liverpool, Nova Scotia.
2. He was paid on the call or account system and earned $334.50 during the last 12 months of his employment, November 1929 to October 1930, inclusive.
3. Dr. T. R. Ford, Liverpool, Nova Scotia.
4. He is paid on the call or account system and earned $612.75 during the 12 months of the calendar year 1931.

* BICKERDIKE PIER

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Who are the lessees of the Bickerdike pier from the Montreal harbour commission?
2. What has been paid by any department of the Dominion government to the Canadian Import Company for coal during the years: (a) 1925; (b) 1926; (c) 1927; (d) 1928; (e) 1929; (f) 1930; (g) 1931?
3. Is the Hon. Lorne C. Webster, senator for the Stadacona district in the province of Quebec, president of the Canadian Import Company?
4. Has the Canadian Import Company a lease or concession from the Quebec harbour commissioners in connection with the supply of oil to steamers?
5. If so: (a) how long is the lease for; (b) what rent is paid?

Mr. CAHAN: This is a repetition of a question asked on the orders of the day some time ago, and it is answered in a return which I laid upon the table of the house this afternoon.

* GAZETTE PRINTING COMPANY

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How much has The Gazette Printing Company, Limited, been paid by the Dominion government during the following years: (a) 1925; (b) 1926; (c) 1927; (d) 1928; (e) 1929; (f) 1930; (g) 1931?

2. Is the Hon. Smeaton White, senator from the Inkerman district of the province of Quebec, president of The Gazette Printing Company, Limited?

Mr. CAHAN: This is a repetition of a question asked some days ago, and it was answered in a return which I laid upon the table of the house yesterday, March 9.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to amend the Bankruptcy Act, and to provide for the administration of the act by the Minister of Finance, and for the appointment of a superintendent of bankruptcy and the payment of his expenses from a percentage of the gross receipts out of the sale of any property of the debtor; and to provide for such assistants as may be required, and for the licensing of trustees and payment of fees therefor.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

INQUIRY FOR REPORT OF EVIDENCE BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. An investigation is being held by a committee of the Senate in connection with the Beauharnois matter. In the past we, as members of the House of Commons, always received copies of the proceedings in such investigations, but so far we have not been furnished with any of the reports concerning this inquiry. When we hold an investigation in this house, reports are sent to the members of the Senate, so I should like to know if we may not be furnished with copies of these reports.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I will have inquiry made in order to ascertain why copies have not been supplied to members of the House of Commons.

TRANSPORTATION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Railways, if there is a possibility of the report of the commission inquiring into railway matters being tabled before the Easter recess.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The answer to that question will be no. Lord Ashfield has been detained somewhat longer than he had expected because of urgent matters of public business in connection with the transport bill, and I am not in a position to state exactly when he may be expected to arrive in this country. Therefore I can only say with certainty that there is no likelihood of the report being tabled before the Easter recess, and I am sorry I cannot give the right hon. gentleman any indication as to when it may be delivered to the government.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my right hon. friend if there is any possibility of the treaty between Canada and the United States with respect to the St. Lawrence waterway being signed before the Easter recess?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I should think the probable answer would be no.

SALMON FISHING REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): About a fortnight ago a delegation waited upon the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) with regard to the salmon regulations in the province of New Brunswick. I should like to ask the minister if he has been able to decide upon an answer to that delegation or, if not, when that answer may be expected.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Acting Minister of Fisheries): We have made up our minds on that question and have decided not to change the present regulations.

Mr. VENIOT: That is, not to grant the request of the delegation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Exactly.

NEW ZEALAND TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether the New Zealand treaty will be tabled and presented to parliament before the Easter recess?

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have nothing to add to the answer I gave yesterday.

ALLEGED RUM RUNNING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether his attention has been drawn to the following report which appeared in the Star a few days ago:

> Produce and Stock Bartered for Rum
> Quebec, March 2.—Produce and live stock are being used by people along the north shore to purchase liquor from rum runners, in cases where no money has been available, and unmolested activity on the part of the same rum runners are responsible to a great extent for the poverty which exists among fishermen and shore people, it is claimed by officials of the Fisheries department of the province, and in view of existing conditions it is probable that the attention of the federal authorities will be drawn to the matter, with a view to having patrols established all along the coast line, so as to halt this traffic.

I would ask the minister whether he has been made aware of the conditions that seem to exist, according to that report, and whether it is the intention of the government to see that some remedy is provided to put an end to such conditions.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (Minister of National Revenue): I had not heard of the conditions mentioned by the hon. member, but now that he has brought the matter to my attention I shall inquire into it and give an answer later.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Yesterday the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) asked a question with reference to the personnel of the subcommittee that has been set up to deal with the administration of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931. I find on inquiry that the Minister of Fisheries is a member of that committee. When the Minister of Fisheries became Minister of Finance the Acting Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Duranleau) took his place on the committee, the appointments being made by office and not by names. As Acting Minister of Fisheries the Hon. Mr. Duranleau is therefore a member of and sits upon that committee.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 9, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following proposed resolution:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yesterday, at the close of an impassioned speech in which moderation was conspicuous by its absence, the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) exhibited a rather delightful piece of humour when he asked the cooperation of my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), myself and others on this side of the house. Cooperation in what? Cooperation with whom? We are ready to cooperate, but can we do so by supporting the measure which is now before the chair? It is a direct refusal of cooperation; it is a challenge to parliamentary institutions. Does not the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) realize that he is going altogether too far in the direction of personal power and autocracy? He is asking the elected representatives of the people of Canada to abdicate the control and sovereignty of parliament. He is asking full authority to legislate by order in council, to amend statutes, to decide anything while parliament is in session, to enter into any expenditure of public money without previous parliamentary authorization; and he kindly suggests and generously offers to communicate to us the decision after it will have been reached. Sir, is not that an utter disrespect for and contempt of parliament? Is it not adding insult to injury? How can we cooperate upon such a basis?

We have been elected to a legislative body, and the seriousness of the situation and the complexity of the problems which face this country at the present time make it all the more necessary that we should all endeavour to find the solution of these problems. We are willing to work; we are willing to sit on committees; we are willing to consider any proposal, any measure which this government has to offer; we are willing to adopt such measures if they are in the public interest. But we are not ready to vest in the Prime Minister a dictatorship, to transfer to him and his cabinet the rights and authorities of this parliament, and to delegate to him the mandate which we have received from our constituencies. How can we cooperate when the decision has been reached before being submitted to parliament? How can we cooperate when the policies of the country are devised, decided and executed by order in council, and more particularly when important matters are decided one way and modified, altered, changed or cancelled before we have even had the chance of knowing it? How can we cooperate when this government one day preaches the expenditure of public money for the relief of distress in the country, and the next day preaches strict economy, curtails expenditures, retires civil servants, cuts salaries and so forth. Our rulers, like Penelope, the wife of the great Ulysses, are undoing during the night the work that they have done during the preceding day.

You must admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is rather difficult for reasonable men to cooperate with inconsistency, whim and whimsicality. No executive in the world has achieved the autocratic power of the present Canadian cabinet—I am speaking of countries with representative parliaments. I think the nearest parallel in history is to be found in the Committee of Public Safety during the terror of the French revolution. Like this government, that committee had an all powerful executive, controlling all things; like this government, that committee had the support of a majority in the convention. All the powers were held by that committee and it became such a despotism that it was the strongest and most ruthless which history has ever recorded. Of course, I do not suggest that this will happen in Canada; I do not believe the Prime Minister will go beyond certain limits. But has a free parliament the right to establish such a dictatorship? Has it the right to take a chance? Are we justified in abdicating all control and placing the rights and liberties of the Canadian people in the hands of one man, however distinguished he may be? The right hon. gentleman possesses great qualities but he will pardon me if I say that he possesses also some substantial imperfections. He has some characteristic features which are not unmixed qualities, and history proves that no man is great enough to endure well-nigh absolute power without a certain amount of moral weakening and that uncontrolled despotism always inflicts serious injury to the body politic.

May I quote the words of my right hon. friend uttered while he was in opposition. At that time he was complaining that the then Minister of Labour, Mr. Heenan, was endeavouring to enact legisluation which gave the power to make regulations in order to carry out the provisions of the act, and here is what he said:

> I consider the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) a fair-minded minister but I do not think that it is in the interests of Canada that powers so great should be conferred upon any one individual under the modern democratic form of government where the temptations for abuse are as great as the powers here conferred.

The first departure by this government from sound constitutional practices occurred at the special session of 1930. At that time my right hon. friend asked this house to vote the sum of twenty million dollars to be used for such purposes and under such terms and conditions as the governor general in council would prescribe. That was a violation of the well known principle that the commons has full and unrestricted control over the destination of public money. Every sum taken from the consolidated revenue fund must be applied to a special purpose; it must be voted by parliament either under a statute, when the expense is a permanent one, or by an annual vote in the estimates, as is generally the case. That is the only possible way for parliament to retain its control over the expenditure of public money. In either case the destination must be described and at no time until this government took office had this principle been denied or violated. As my right hon. leader said, even during the war Sir Robert Borden not only specified the amount of money which he asked parliament to vote for the carrying on of the war but he gave the details as to the destination of that money. He said that so much was needed for expenditures connected with the Niobe or the Rainbow, so much for the purchase of a submarine or so much for the purchase of horses. Parliament always was given the fullest details. Had my right hon. friend then been on this side of the house and the government of the day had attempted to do that which is being attempted to-day we would have heard that which Dicey, Anson and Redlich say in the most eloquent terms.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend realize that his government passed a statute by which the government was authorized to guarantee the bonds of the Montreal harbour bridge in an unnamed sum, and that it is costing this country nearly $700,000 per annum? The estimate of the cost was given at $6,000,000 while the guarantee has amounted to over $19,500,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the last part of my right hon. friend's question answers the first; he says there was an unnamed sum and then he says that the expenditure was much higher than the sum which had been named.

Mr. BENNETT: The sum is not named in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that unconstitutional?

Mr. BENNETT: The sum of $6,000,000 was not named in the bill; a question was asked as to the amount.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was certainly stated to the house in my presence.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister stated $6,000,000, but that amount does not appear in the bill and the cost was $19,500,000.

Mr. STEVENS: A blank cheque.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the same thing as Sir Robert Borden did during the war. The sum was not specified in the bills he introduced but he took good care to give all the details.

My right hon. friend threatened us with the calamity of his being unable to attend the Imperial conference, and as we could not afford to suffer his absence we allowed this measure to go through. Last year it became still worse. Chapter 58 of the statutes of 1931 was passed, and it is now proposed to resurrect this measure and extend its provisions for two months. I then stated that the bill gave a blank cheque to the government and the power to expend any amount of money for any purpose whatever. I stated, and my words can be found in Hansard, that the provisions of the act which permitted the taking of any steps to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada gave to the government the powers given to the parliament of Canada under section 91 of the British North America Act. I protested against that legislation but we were told that our misgivings were unfounded, that the things we feared would never happen. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) discarded all our statements and said that the words "peace, order and good government" were inserted in the statute to give authority to parliament to vote a blank cheque for the purpose of relieving distress and unemployment. My hon. friend said:

> If the bill is not founded upon the theory that it is necessary to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, then parliament would have no authority to pass it. Without these words the bill in the form in which it is enacted into law might be set aside when challenged in the courts.

And again:

> We recognize this emergency by the adoption of these words from the British North America Act, and they were placed in the bill as the foundation of our authority to pass such an enactment. They have nothing to do with the question of enforcement; they are merely a declaration to give us the jurisdiction which we know we have under the circumstances but of which we want to be sure. . . . We are guaranteeing relief in order to maintain peace, order and good government. That makes it constitutionally certain that the bill will not be set aside.

The Prime Minister, when he referred to that provision about law and order, spoke only of possible troubles in Canada and said that it was good policy, good statesmanship on the part of the government to provide for any such disturbances. He said:

> It is not for a moment to be thought that an insignificant number of strongly vocal persons shall be able so to affect the populace of this country as to make it impossible for us, in cooperation together as Canadians, to work out our destiny. I say that class, happily, is few in number. But in this present situation they now see an opportunity propitious to the prosecution of their pernicious political doctrines. This is a land of freedom.

And so on. He continues:

> If the government is given reason to believe, as there may be some cause for its so believing, that there is a settled purpose in the minds of a considerable number of people—not large, numerically, but scattered over the various parts of Canada—to take action against the maintenance of law and order, or make attempts to impede the difficult task with which we are charged, then we will take such action as in the judgment of the executive of this country, the cabinet who are the board of directors for the time being administering the affairs of this country, as will free this country from those who have proved themselves unworthy of our Canadian citizenship.

At no place in their argument did either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice suggest or represent or intimate that this law would be made use of to amend the statutes of the country generally. What has occurred? The Prime Minister, in the course of his remarks when introducing this resolution, spoke about an order in council concerning the returns to be made by the insurance companies. When I asked him whether there were other orders in council under that clause relating to peace, order and good government, he said that he did not know of any, but the Minister of Justice whispered to him that there was one concerning the prohibition of the export of gold.

Yesterday some orders in council were laid on the table of the house and I have been able to find at least three of four or more of them passed under this provision of peace, order and good government. The first I find is order in council P.C. 2238, guaranteeing repayment to the chartered banks mentioned in it, of the amounts of money advanced by them to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited, in connection with the crop of the year 1930. I do not think my right hon. friend has treated parliament properly in that regard. During the session of last year the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) on three different occasions asked a question about this matter. The first two questions were answered by the Prime Minister that they were not strictly according to the rules and therefore could not be answered, but finally, on May 14, 1931, the hon. member for St. Henri, as reported on page 1575 of Hansard, asked the following question:

1. Is the government aware that the Canadian banks have advanced, in loans or guarantees, the sum of $68,000,000 to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited?
2. Has the government, to date, guaranteed the banks interested in these loans in favour of wheat pools, for said amount of $68,000,000, totally or partially?
3. If partially, up to what amount?

The answer was:

Mr. Bennett: As the question now reads, the answer to the first part would be no. The answer to the second part would depend upon what portion of the first part it has reference to. No guarantee has been given for $68,000,000. An arrangement was made. At the moment I think the responsibility would be $2,000 or $3,000, provided the security upon which the advances by the banks are made is liquidated at reasonable prices. At present market prices there will be practically no liability.

Parliament sat until well into the month of August, but no legislation was submitted to it, yet on the 12th September this order in council was passed, and mark the wording of it:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 11th September, 1931, from the Minister of Finance, recommending that, in pursuance of the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931, and of an undertaking on behalf of the government, made before the session of parliament at which the said act was passed, to implement by legislation the recommendation hereinafter set out, the governor in council guarantee repayment to the chartered banks hereinafter mentioned.

And so forth. I have no time to read it all, but I draw the attention of the house to the fact that the promise, the undertaking, had been given prior to the session of parliament—it is so stated in the order in council—that there would be legislation to implement the guarantee of the government. No legislation was introduced in parliament although the matter was referred to on three different occasions. Then, after the session was over, an order in council is passed as a substitute for the legislation that should have been passed by parliament. There were no communistic activities in connection with this.

Then there are three orders in council, again guaranteeing advances by the banks to the marketing agencies mentioned in those orders. I have not time to refer to them.

The second order in council to which I wish to refer is the one dealing with the prohibition of the export of gold. This was passed on Monday, the nineteenth day of October, 1931. But before I refer to it, I would ask the government at least to submit to parliament legislation to ratify the order in council with regard to the guarantee of the advances by the banks.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no liability at the moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: So much the better, but that does not alter the fact that the government has done by order in council what should have been done by legislation.

As regards the order in council dealing with the prohibition of the export of gold, that again is passed under the provision regarding peace, order and good government. A penalty is fixed of a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years, or both fine and imprisonment. It is stated in the order that these provisions shall come into force on the 19th day of October, 1931, and shall continue in full force and effect until the first day of March, 1932. If this order is renewed or extended, I hope it will be done by an act of parliament and not by a juggling of the calendar by substituting May for March as is proposed to be done by the resolution now before the house.

Then on the 27th October, 1931, order in council P.C. 2693 was passed, virtually amending the Bank Act, authorizing the banks to make to the government returns with regard to securities in another way than that fixed by the Bank Act. It also has force and effect until the first March, 1932. I ask the government, if this order in council is to be extended, that this should be done by act of parliament. The Bank Act is one of the most important acts. It is sacred legislation. It is different from the others in this, that we have a revision of the Bank Act every ten years, when a committee of this house studies any proposed changes most carefully. Surely the Bank Act should not be amended by order in council without authority of parliament.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the hon. member explain further what changes were made?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid I have not time to do it.

Mr. STEVENS: No complaint about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We are complaining now.

Mr. MANION: You are always complaining over there. We do not mind that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not complaining as much as you would if you were over here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then on December 16, 1931, P.C. 3087 was passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), increasing the strength of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police by three hundred men, with an added expenditure of $274,135. I do not want to comment upon that, but perhaps it is the reason for the fine parades we are witnessing on different occasions around the parliament buildings.

Then there was the order in council virtually amending the Insurance Act. Section 34 of the Insurance Act provides that the stocks held by the insurance companies must be valued at their market value. That was amended by order in council. It is stated in that order in council that the privy council has virtually declared that the Insurance Act is ultra vires and that it is proposed at the next session of parliament to bring in a new law which the law officers of the crown believe will be intra vires. But before this new law is put into force we have this order in council. I have seen the bill which is presently before the Senate and I notice that section 54 of that bill is exactly the same as section 34 of the Insurance Act as it was. There is no change made there at all. Will that order in council be extended for another year? If so, I say again that this parliament has the right to discuss and pass upon such a matter. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there one of those five or six orders in council which I have mentioned passed in the interests of the unemployed? This whole legislation was passed presumably for the relief of distress and unemployment and the clause about peace, order and good government was included only to give authority to the government for that purpose. But these orders in council which were passed concerning the insurance business and banking and the mounted police, were they orders in council passed in the interests of the unemployed? They took the place of acts of parliament, which is exactly what we foresaw would happen as the use to which the clause would be put when the legislation was before the house.

But bad as that legislation was, the present proposal is many times worse. This parliament is in session and the government is asking power to amend to-morrow a statute which we may pass to-day in this House of Commons. The suggestion that the rights of parliament will be safeguarded merely by tabling at the next session of parliament any orders in council that may be passed is preposterous. It reduces parliament to a formless debating society, carrying on in a vacuum of futility.

Sir, the legislative function is to formulate what is to be and what should be the law of the country. The function of the executive is to carry out the law as formulated by this parliament. It is parliament that has the power to decide what the law is and what the law should be. It is parliament that has the control of the treasury, of the levying of taxes and of the manner of spending those taxes. It is the only effective agency in any British House of Commons for controlling the departments of government. The goal of democratic government is a satisfactory understanding between those two branches of government. Fundamental laws have defined what are the proper functions of each. The struggle of the House of Commons in England extending over many hundreds of years was carried on to ensure the control of parliament over the executive—not the control of the executive over parliament.

The Prime Minister pleaded that to proceed in this way would give greater convenience to the government in the serious conditions that now face the country. Doubtless absolute and autocratic power is more convenient than a free government. But does Canada want that? Our system is one of check and balance to make it sure that none of the divisions of the government shall become so powerful as to have the others at its mercy.

When in opposition my right hon. friend the Prime Minister referred frequently to that clever book of the present Lord Chief Justice of Great Britain, Lord Hewart, entitled The New Despotism. I might say that the Prime Minister's is a newer and stricter and narrower despotism. I have here a fine quotation of Lord Hewart which I should like to put on Hansard if I had time, but perhaps at some other stage of the bill I shall have the pleasure of doing so. But Lord Hewart was speaking only of regulations which permitted the departments virtually to make the laws of the land. He never even dreamt that it would come to the mind of any ruler to assume the power of amending the statutes and the laws of the country. No wonder parliament is losing some of its former high position in popular esteem. My right hon. friend is responsible for it. This decline in the moral authority of parliament is due to the assumption by the Prime Minister of powers over the House of Commons which would have been undreamed of fifty years ago, and he is reducing the members of parliament to a condition of almost servile impotence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. Parliamentary government is the form of free government, and I cannot forgive my right hon. friend for undermining—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friends over there remind me of the words of an American reformer, Lincoln Steffens, who said that he could forgive Philadelphia for being corrupt but not for being contented. I could forgive my hon. friends opposite for being made impotent by the actions of the government they support, by losing their parliamentary rights, but I cannot forgive them for being contented and satisfied with that situation. The control by parliament over the executive is no longer even a theory; it has become a fiction. The process is reversed; it is the executive which controls parliament. It is a revolutionary process, but revolutionary in the sense of reaction and contrary to all national traditions.

Had I time I would quote the words of the president of the Canadian Bar Asosciation which held its annual meeting at Murray Bay last year, when he called attention to the danger of such legislation. I am opposed to this government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, and I am glad everybody knows it, and that everybody can see it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am opposed to this government ridding itself of constitutional restraints. If a majority in parliament has its rights, I claim that the minority also has its rights. We have the right to consider all public business submitted which is going to be the law of the land. We have the right to require full publicity of public business. I have been sent here by my constituents to speak their voice in this parliament and to share in the work of legislation. They trust me; they may be wrong, but they have been trusting me for about thirty years.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, Mr. Speaker, you have no mercy.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset may I convey to my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), my sincere congratulations upon the eloquence he displayed in his address, the choice of diction he used, the grace with which he presented his material, and especially, upon the high-powered sophistry of his argument. My hon. friend would have us believe that he, and he alone, is the protector of the people's rights in the parliament of Canada. Recently there was introduced in the Quebec legislature an iniquitous bill known as the Dillon Bill, which not only deprived the elected members and those who were not elected of the right to protest against corruption, but was made retroactive, and was supported by the newspaper controlled and partially owned by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat.

It would appear that my hon. friends opposite are possessed of some peculiar mental condition which prompts them to conjure up in their imaginations constitutional questions. We all remember, sir, that in 1926 a constitutional question was conjured up in the mind of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He went to the country at that time and was, I think, returned on that constitutional issue. What was the contention? It was that Canada was being sold out to Downing Street. However when the hon. gentleman who now, with such distinction, occupies the position of Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) called for a return of the correspondence passing between the right hon. gentleman and the then Governor General, Lord Byng, we found that it was the right hon. gentleman himself who wished Downing Street domination in Canada. That was the constitutional question of 1926. I venture this, Mr. Speaker, that had not Lord Byng been imbued with the splendid traditions which have always characterized governors general in Canada, had he been able to tell the Canadian people what actually happened on that occasion, my right hon. friend's constitutional issue would have fallen to the ground, and he would have returned to parliament repudiated by the Canadian people.

I am at a loss to understand why, when the Conservative party of Canada introduces or attempts to introduce measures to assist men without work and women and children without food, all conceivable constitutional objections are taken by the opposition, and even appeals are taken against Your Honour's rulings. Had the appeal which was taken only a few nights ago been carried, what would have been the result? There was at that time no amendment before the house, and had the appeal from Your Honour's ruling by the right hon. the leader of the opposition been sustained by that vote all unemployment relief would have been precluded.

The control of parliament over taxation is a fundamental principle of British government. So fundamental is it that we did not require the comments of such a great champion of constitutional government as my hon. friend who just preceded me to put us right in the matter. I say that the elected representatives of this or any other parliament have the right, if they desire to exercise it, to delegate to the government the power to control taxation and the expenditure of money. There is not an authority on the constitution of this country or on constitutional practice prevailing in any British country saying that parliament's control over taxation and expenditure must have unanimity of opinion from all elected members. It is quite competent for the majority of elected members to delegate that power to the executive. If my right hon. friend thinks it is a constitutional question, let him ask members of this parliament and they will give him his answer, because the great majority in this house have faith in their right hon. leader and will be prepared to delegate power to the cabinet.

There is no more a constitutional question at the present time than there was in 1926. To state that there is a constitutional issue herein involved is merely subterfuge. It is sheer persiflage,—merely, an effort by the Liberal party to give effect to that policy on unemployment which in the last few years they have pursued with such unenviable distinction to themselves. What was their policy when in power? The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) had a policy then; he was prepared, with his charitable disposition and from the goodness of his heart, to give a five cent piece to the unemployed if they would vote Grit.

Just before I leave the constitutional question, what is the alternative suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite? It is that a commission be appointed which would be responsible to no one at all in the spending of the money of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite would take away from parliament control over taxation; they would take away from the cabinet the right to receive that control from parliament, and they would vest it in an irresponsible, roving commission. That was the alternative announced by the leader of the opposition, which received vociferous applause from the hon. gentleman who just made his constitutional speech. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk glibly of orders in council; after listening to them one would think there was something sinister or reprehensible about the passing of an order in council in order to do the greatest work this parliament and this government can do, that is, protect human life in this country. May I point out, sir, as my right hon. leader pointed out, that the previous government appropriated money for the Montreal harbour commission by order in council; they practically destroyed the dairying industry of this country by order in council, and during the time my right hon. friend and his distinguished deskmate, who just resumed his seat, were in power, their government passed 53,968 orders in council. So let us hear nothing more about the passing of an order in council being something sinister; it is merely a fantasy of the imagination of hon. gentlemen opposite.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, we have no other measure before parliament through which the unemployed may be assisted. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been able to make no suggestions, and now they ask us to cut off relief entirely from now until May 1. My conscience will not allow me to be sidetracked by constitutional arguments; I want to tell you that I think as much about the poor men and women who are unemployed as I think of the constitution of our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggest absolutely nothing; they want to cut off relief entirely, but we want to carry on this relief because, when men through no fault of their own are out of employment; when women and children are suffering, we believe public funds should be made available to protect the welfare and the lives of our citizens.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in connection with the very important question under discussion at the present time. But before dealing with the resolution I wish to refer briefly to the statement made in the house yesterday by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who I am sorry is not in his seat.

Mr. SPOTTON: He is not far away.

Mr. MacINNIS: If my hon. friend from North Huron (Mr. Spotton) will keep quiet now, we will give him an opportunity to speak when I am finished. That is the proper procedure in parliament; if he does not know it he should be told, because he is continually interrupting.

Replying to the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), the Minister of Railways and Canals took rather a peculiar line, which showed that if he is not a good cabinet minister at least he is a good politician. Having nothing else with which to reply to the statements which had been made, the minister tried to make a noise about something entirely different; he brought up something not even mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the question of Russia. Instead of telling us something of the policy of the government in regard to unemployment he dealt in great detail with the murder of the czar and the royal family, Russia's repudiation of her debts, her irreligion and lack of respect for the female of the species. This may have been good politics, but it did not throw any light on the subject under discussion. However, since the minister did bring up the matter I think it only right that something should be said in reply.

My hon. friend was very much concerned about the attitude of the Soviet government toward the kulaks, the rich peasants of Russia. I should think he would be concerned rather with the condition of the unemployed in this country. He gave extensive quotations and blamed the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for praising everything Russian. Just a week ago yesterday, after the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had made another speech, the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. MacNicol) took a good deal of the time of the house to point out the bad things the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had said about Russia, so between the two hon. members we may possibly reach the truth. At least one person has gone to Russia who is quite capable of telling about things as he saw them, without fear or favour.

The Minister of Railways and Canals quoted from an article by Henry Wales, correspondent of the Chicago Tribune. I have here another despatch from Mr. Wales which appeared in the New York Times of March 29, 1931, giving an account of an interview with Michael Tzetlin, vice-chairman of the Soviet executive committee at Archangel. This is what he says in connection with the kulaks:

> The state is aiding them to build homes and create new villages, composed of kulaks exclusively, where they can hunt, fish, farm, enter the timber industry or do whatever they please. The government is giving them all the land they want, providing lumber, building materials, food supplies and clothing, and establishing postal, telegraph and transportation services in the newly opened territory.

I wonder whether the government of Canada is doing that much for the unemployed in this country. Are we getting these facilities? Is anything being done to set up the unemployed so that they may become self-supporting? Absolutely nothing. We shall shortly come to what the government is actually doing. This writer goes on to say:

> The kulaks are not guarded. Each village has its militiamen, the GPU (secret police), the same as all other communities. Each settlement chooses its own mayor—tzaritza, we call him—who is responsible to the authorities for law and order in his community.
> Records show the death rate among kulaks transported here not above the normal rate among the local populaces.

One more quotation with reference to the kulaks:

> The liquidation of the kulaks is a great reform measure—an emergency similar to mobilization in war time. It is hard on them. So was freeing the slaves hard on southern plantation owners in America. So was the prohibition law, which legislated out of business an entire industry in the United States.

When the Minister of Railways is discussing Russia he should not forget that Russia at the present time is at war; it is making war on poverty, on ignorance and on the superstition that has grown and fattened under the czarist rulers. Nor should he forget that when this country was at war it conscripted Canadians and sent them away, not to some place where they could earn a living but into the front line trenches, to fight the German army, an army with whom personally they had no quarrel. Let me read from a speech made not so very long ago by Sir Arthur Currie, to show that the place to which we sent the Canadians who were conscripted during the war was not at all as good a place as where the kulaks were sent by the Soviet government. And remember that the kulaks were the class in Russia who would not cooperate in the socialization of the machinery of production in the interests of the people as a whole. As an hon. member says, they were like Tories. Sir Arthur Currie, before the National Republican Club of New York, said:

> Let me give you one picture of war, a memory I carry from the battle of Amiens. That battle was a great victory. It was perhaps the greatest triumph we had. Our troops went into it fit and healthy, high-spirited and well-trained. We had plenty of artillery, we had plenty of tanks. The Germans were completely surprised and thoroughly beaten. At the end of the day I was asked to go back to a casualty clearing station. I was told that something was wrong. I went back. And there I saw the aftermath of victory. Something was indeed wrong. The extraordinary secrecy of the movement had somehow hampered the army medical services. I saw ambulance after ambulance full of wounded men, some shrieking, some groaning, some dying, some dead, some just suffering in patience, waiting to get to the hospital gate. Inside the doors of the building used as a hospital, its windows boarded up tight so that no light would reveal its position to enemy aircraft, the fumes of acetylene gas from the lamps, the terrible smell of gas gangrene from some of the wounds, the sickening odour of ether, the white faces of the worn-out nurses, the blood-stained hands of the doctors, who had to work as fast as butchers—only to save and not to kill—made a scene of horror that I can never forget.

As I said a moment ago, the Soviet government are at this moment at war; they are making war on poverty and on all the other conditions that were left them as a heritage by the rulers who preceded them. More than a decade ago we were at war with a different enemy, and the people of this country thought that was a good and sufficient reason for taking the able-bodied men of Canada, whether they wished to go or not, and placing them in the midst of such conditions as Sir Arthur has outlined in this address to the National Republican Club. Surely if it is right and proper in the one case it is right and proper in the other. I will leave the Minister of Railways there; it is not necessary to say anything further in that connection. The statements he made in regard to Russia were exploded long ago, and apropos of this I would paraphrase slightly a few words of Lord Macaulay's in reference to something similar. These stories are now altogether exploded. They have been abandoned by statesmen to aldermen, by aldermen to clergymen, by clergymen to old women and by old women to the Minister of Railways and Canals.

We are discussing now the act which was passed last year, empowering the governor in council to do certain things during the parliamentary recess. It will be remembered that when that act was introduced the date of its expiry was fixed at March 31, and it was pointed out to the Prime Minister that the house would likely be in session prior to that date and, in order that the act might not be in force during the session of parliament, the date was changed from March 31 to March 1, as parliament, being then in session, could deal with any questions that might arise. Now, with the house in session, hon. gentlemen opposite are asking us to extend the act for another two months, and this without giving us any indication of what they are going to do at the end of that time. I opposed the bill when it came up last year. I told the government, when opposing it, that I should be quite willing to meet any member of the government before any Labour audience in the country and justify my position.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member couldn't stand up.

Mr. MacINNIS: Hon. gentlemen opposite could not stand up; that was why they did not accept the challenge. I am still opposed to the bill, but I am prepared to go to this extent, that if the government, in asking for this extension of the act, will undertake before May 1 to place before the house proposals dealing definitely and permanently with unemployment, I shall be willing to grant the extension, much as I object to it. But so far we have had nothing to indicate that they are willing to do anything of the kind. Most likely when May 1 comes the house will prorogue and then they will go on under the same system they had before.

Mr. ARTHURS: They would have to pass another bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: Probably a last-minute extension before the house adjourns. Now, during the discussions in the house we have heard a good deal about promises and particularly preelection promises. Personally, during the election of 1930 I made one promise only—possibly two. I said I was quite willing to support any legislation that might be brought down in this house in the interests of the working class whom I represent and that on the other hand I would oppose any legislation that was not in the interests of that class or which would extend special privileges. We have been accused on many occasions of being always in opposition and never having a good word to say for the government. May I say that the first words I uttered after I came down here to the special session in 1931 were in favour of the government for having made provisions to deal with unemployment. The government was being criticized at that time by the opposition for not furnishing more details of the proposed expenditures in connection with the twenty million dollars. Possibly if I had been in the house a little longer and had not been feeling so timid my remarks might have been more extensive, but on September 12, as appears on page 184 of Hansard, I said:

I find myself very much in agreement with the position taken by the hon. the Prime Minister. Under the circumstances, considering the short time between the election and the date of calling parliament, I do not think that he could have done more than he has done. Considering the wide field he has to cover and the details the unemployment problem involves it would have been impossible to make detailed estimates of what he intended to do with the appropriation for which he is asking.

I think that showed some appreciation of what the government was doing at that time, and I think it was a reasonable position to take.

Mr. ARTHURS: It would be to-day, too.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, not to-day. The government has had eighteen months in which to investigate the situation and to make definite plans to meet it; it has had an opportunity to know its extent, its scope and its causes. This government could have done this had it been anxious to do so, but that I doubt. Anyone taking the trouble to look at page 166 of the same Hansard will discover that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who spoke yesterday, spoke along the same lines as myself at that time.

When we came down here last year the situation was much worse than it had been in September, 1930. As soon as possible after the house got down to business we took up the question of unemployment, and on various occasions we asked the government what it intended to do. I would like to refer to some of the occasions during the session of 1931 when we raised this question of unemployment. I will refer to the endeavours made not only by the Labour members and the members of the farmer group but also by the independent members. On March 20 the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) asked the ministry if special measures were being taken to deal with unemployment. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) declined to answer. On March 31 the hon. member for North Winnipeg moved the adjournment of the house to discuss the question of unemployment. The Speaker ruled him out of order, but later he discussed the question under another order of procedure. On April 24 the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) asked whether or not the government intended to call a dominion conference on unemployment. On May 25 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) drew the attention of the then acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) to conditions existing in Nanaimo due to unemployment and urged the government to deal immediately with the situation. The minister replied that the matter was purely a provincial one. On May 26 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni discussed upon the motion to go into supply the urgent necessity of holding an unemployment conference with the provinces. I might just mention that upon that occasion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself, as the Labour members in this house, took part in the debate. No member of the government took part, not even the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Spotton).

Miss MACPHAIL: He does not take part in any debate.

Mr. SPOTTON: He does not get a chance.

Mr. MacINNIS: He has not the intelligence to take part.

On June 8 the hon. member for Comox-Alberni again brought up this question and called upon the ministry to declare its immediate intention, but the Deputy Speaker ruled him out of order. On July 9, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked when unemployment legislation would be introduced and the Prime Minister replied that it would be introduced when the business of the house had been practically disposed of.

During the session of 1931 the government should have been investigating the unemployment situation, but regardless of our efforts in the house the government did nothing. On June 4, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), speaking during the budget debate, said that that was not time to be making proposals in connection with unemployment which might be anticipated next autumn. I believe it was on June 15, that the then Minister of Labour, Senator Robertson, started on a trip to British Columbia. On his way west there happened to have been a few showers and the prairie provinces looked fresh and green, but when he returned to Winnipeg there had been some hot weather which had burned up what little verdure had come up with the showers and the conditions were so appalling that he wept. Yet a few days before that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had told us that that was no time to be making provisions for unemployment which might be anticipated next autumn.

Mr. STEVENS: Would my hon. friend indicate where he got that statement? I am quite certain he has misunderstood the purport of my remarks.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not take the trouble to make a note of the page in Hansard, but if the minister will look up the speech he made on that date and can point out to me that I am wrong, I will withdraw my remarks.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the hon. member refer to May 4?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, June 4.

We have been accused by hon. gentlemen opposite of not offering any constructive suggestions with regard to unemployment. I think it is rather difficult to offer to the mid-Victorian minds of the hon. gentlemen opposite any suggestions which would meet their wishes in this matter. The suggestions they want are ones that will deal with the unemployment situation and leave the social relations between the various classes in the country as they were before. We maintain that would be a waste of time, and while there is a great deal of time wasted in the house, I do not propose to waste my time by making any such suggestions.

Mr. SHAVER: Does the hon. gentleman mean by his previous statement that the only suggestion he has to make is a social revolution?

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend can have either a social revolution or a social evolution, whichever he prefers. If he wants a social evolution, he will have to plan it; if he has not a plan, he will have a social revolution.

Let me, however, draw the attention of the house to some suggestions that we made last session. When the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne was taking place, we moved the following subamendment:

> This house fully realizes that there exists in Canada an economic situation which constitutes a national emergency, which can only be met by extraordinary measures;
> This house is of opinion that the present situation calls for the greatest possible degree of cooperation on the part of all its members, and to that end, and that this cooperation may be given in the most practical and efficient manner, Your Excellency's advisers should give consideration to the appointment of a special committee of parliament, to which committee would be assigned the duty of examining into the causes and extent of the present depression, with the view of suggesting such appropriate action as might best correct the present situation and relieve present suffering, and as might also render less probable the recurrence of such disasters in the future;
> This house urges that the need is great and immediate, and that this committee should be appointed without delay, that it be given all necessary powers and authority, and that it be instructed to proceed with all expedition and to report to this house during the present session of parliament.

I well remember when this subamendment was considered by our group. I believe it was the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) who was given the task of drafting it. I remember very well with what sincerity he went about the task in order to frame an amendment that would meet the wishes of the government, in order that we might offer our cooperation in a situation that we felt was so difficult. I felt very doubtful that we would accomplish anything. As a matter of fact I felt I could say and possibly did say, that the subamendment would not be accepted. Indeed, I felt sorry for the hon. member for Red Deer who was so sincere in the matter. I knew what would happen to the subamendment when it came into the house. What happened to it reminded me of my Sunday school days, of a scriptural quotation which refers to pearls and certain animals, a quotation which it might be unparliamentary to use in the house. That is exactly what happened to our subamendment when it appeared before the house, and as an hon. member near me now suggests, they got away with it.

On May 1 or May 6 last, I am not quite sure which, the hon. member for Red Deer moved a resolution for the appointment of a council of social and economic research. That was refused by the government last year. This year it came up again and was accepted in a modified form by the government. If the government had accepted it last year, they would have been at least one year ahead in the matter. When the budget was brought down, we moved an amendment along similar lines to the one moved to the address. That again was turned down.

Then we took up the question of unemployment insurance, and impressed upon the government the necessity of instituting legislation that would in some measure meet the difficult situation. We were, of course, promised that the matter would be dealt with before the government's term came to a close. This would seem to indicate that they were not fully convinced of the efficacy of unemployment insurance in meeting the situation nor of the need for it at this time.

May I say a few words in connection with the situation as it exists in British Columbia? As a matter of fact, this question has been discussed in the house on at least one occasion since the opening of the session. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) took up the case in reference to the municipality of Burnaby. On looking over the Vancouver papers of a few days ago, I find that the Burnaby situation is at least as bad as if not much worse than as stated by the hon. member. In the Vancouver Province of March 1, I find that the Burnaby storekeepers told the municipal council that the limit of credit on relief orders had been reached. In the past wholesale houses have been accepting relief coupons from retailers in payment of their bills, but they have notified the retailers that those relief coupons will not be accepted in future. The treasurer of the municipality stated that no payments on direct relief had been made since December 19, 1931; that bankers enabled the municipality to carry on to December 31, and that since that time they have found great difficulty in meeting the situation. He states that the two governments, the provincial and the federal, owe the municipality at the present time $187,000 on account of relief work and direct relief.

In British Columbia the provincial parliament is at present sitting, and I understand that a committee of the house is investigating the administration of unemployment relief there. There seems to be considerable difference of opinion between the federal and provincial governments as to what has been done in regard to financing unemployment relief. Mr. Bruhn, Minister of Public Works for the province, states:

> Thousands of men have for four months been out of work in British Columbia relief camps because money promised by the federal government never came to Victoria.

He was examined at the time by General J. A. Clark, counsel for the committee. Mr. Pooley, Attorney General in the provincial parliament, stated that the provincial administration had received certain moneys from the federal government, but it was money that was loaned to the province and municipalities and was part of the relief which was to be borne eventually by the province and municipalities; but of the government's own share they had not received one cent. He said that it was only within the last few days that an arrangement had been reached whereby the men were given board and $7.50 per month in the camps.

On February 20 there were 70,616 registered unemployed persons in the province of British Columbia. That is a most serious situation, Mr. Speaker. I read in the Vancouver Province of March 1, 1932, that the city which I have the honour to represent in part, the city of Vancouver, made a demand upon the provincial secretary, Hon. S. L. Howe, for the sum of $760,028 as the share which the two governments were contributing for unemployment and direct relief as from October, 1931, and it is stated that of the city's share of the $950,000 relief program—incidentally this work is expected to be completed by the end of this month—the provincial government has paid only $198,960 on relief work and $12,000 on direct relief.

Surely there must be something wrong with the administration of relief in the province of British Columbia, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that as the federal government is to some extent financing the province and municipalities in connection with unemployment, as the relief of unemployment is accepted as a joint responsibility of the federal, provincial and municipal authorities, it is high time that this government appointed somebody to look into the situation with a view to clearing it up and giving to the unemployed in the province of British Columbia a fairer deal than they have been getting in the past.

Mr. TURNBULL: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes.

Mr. TURNBULL: Does he realize that for the last forty minutes he has delayed parliament in making the necessary arrangements to take care of the situation?

Miss MACPHAIL: Make your own speech.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the hon. gentleman has a question to ask I shall try to answer it.

Before I sit down I should like to quote an editorial in this connection from the Vancouver Province. It reads as follows:

> When Alice, in her travels through Wonderland, stumbled upon the Mad Hatter's tea party and took her seat at the table, she was met with cries of "No room! No room!" There was plenty of room, for the table was long and there was no one present save the Mad Hatter and his friends, the March Hare and the Dormouse. But the cry went up all the same.
> There is a Mad Hatter's tea party in progress in British Columbia. Six thousand men, who have been idle in the well-equipped road camps of the province since last fall, are trying to sit down at the table where jobs are dispensed, and the cry goes up from the Mad Hatters and the March Hares and the Dormice of our governments: "No work! No work!" There is plenty of work. There are some thousands of miles of highway in the province, and great stretches must be put into repair if they are to be useful for resident and tourist traffic next summer. The men to do the work are eager and waiting. The equipment is ready. The work, if undertaken, could be done at a ridiculously low cost. But it isn't being done. How could it be done at a Mad Hatter's tea party?

Mr. C. N. DORION (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend in the course of my remarks to broach the subject of the Russian Republic or the Soviet government. However, so much praise has been lavished on that country by members of the Labour party, that I feel somewhat amazed that they have not yet emigrated to parts which appear so congenial to them. I do not intend to put Russia on trial, only we all know that, over there, the state is everything: the state not only embraces the army, the navy, the police, labour, industry, agriculture and trade; it not only owns the lands and the industries but it also owns the family. I would therefore advise those who admire so much that country and wish to bring up a family to emigrate to Russia and offer that Republic their first born child.

I listened a short while ago to the hon. member for Quebec East making an appeal to those who hold in high esteem the Canadian constitution. This reminds me of the 1926 election campaign when, in Quebec, the same appeal was made to our people; it was pointed out that members of the government then, had crossed over to London to obtain advice concerning the management of Canadian political affairs. We are, in Quebec, used to appeals of that kind. However, the hon. member for Quebec East forgot to mention one thing: when he censures the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) because the latter introduces measures for the relief of unemployment, when he censures him because he has orders in council passed to rescue and help those in need, the hon. member for Quebec East, I say, forgets one thing, it is that, under the Liberal regime, the government transferred by order in council, to a private company, one of the finest Canadian assets, namely the Beauharnois canal.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): That was not contrary to the constitution.

Mr. DORION (Translation): By order in council, that water-power was handed over to a company of capitalists with the evident design—that has since been proved—of obtaining subscriptions to the electoral fund, so as to maintain the Liberal party in power. Now, the opposition feels somewhat shocked because the Prime Minister takes the necessary steps to help the unemployed and relieve their distress. But they were in no way shocked then, when one of Canada's most valuable assets was transferred, by order in council, to a private company.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): That is why you approved of it.

Mr. DORION (Translation): As the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) stated a short while ago: the members of this house are quite entitled to transfer their powers to the executive, they are perfectly entitled, as representatives of the people, to give to the Prime Minister and his colleagues a power of attorney to pass orders in council when the latter think they are necessary for the best interests of the people.

What would have happened if this power of attorney had not been given to the government? Last year, some time previous to the provincial election, the Quebec Prime Minister (Mr. Taschereau) at the outset of his electoral campaign, in the county of Portneuf, speaking at St. Raymond, stated that he had no need of federal assistance to solve the unemployment question, in Quebec. On June 14, 1931, the date of that meeting, he added:

> If, next autumn, unemployment still persists in its acute stage, we shall not have to call upon municipalities. We shall ourselves carry out the necessary work to relieve our people. By means of improvements which we intend to carry out, we hope to reduce unemployment, next autumn, to its lowest point and the departments which employ labour will receive from the treasury all the necessary funds.

Mr. Taschereau, I repeat, stated in Quebec, at the outset of the provincial election that he had no need of federal assistance, that he was able by himself to solve the unemployment problem in Quebec. We were in session here last year, when Mr. Taschereau made that statement; if we had then said to ourselves: Mr. Tascherau is perhaps right, he has no need of federal assistance to solve the unemployment problem in Quebec; we shall vote a certain amount, but we shall not include Quebec in the estimate, because Mr. Taschereau declines to accept assistance, what would have happened? What would have been the results, if the measure we enacted last year had not been adopted? What would have happened, if the act we propose amending to-day had not existed?

Mr. Taschereau received as his share nearly $5,000,000 to help him in carrying out certain public works; Mr. Taschereau was only too glad to accept dominion aid. If we had followed the advice the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) gave us this afternoon, if we had voted only a specific amount, the province of Quebec would not have received a cent in the course of the last twelve months.

The constitution is made a subject of debate; well, we also have a high esteem for our constitution, we admire it as much as do our hon. friends on your left, sir, we stand by it, and shall champion its rights if need be. We are as good Canadians as are anywhere to be found; however, there is no transgression of constitutional rights when we give our government a power of attorney to enact measures and pass orders in council, under special circumstances, when the country has to face one of the most critical periods of our history.

I can well understand the attitude taken by hon. friends on your left, sir; it is the history of the Liberal party in the past which repeats itself; each time that these gentlemen deliver a speech either in the house or elsewhere, it is always with an eye on the forthcoming elections. They are ever ready to resort to all means, such as to move resolutions, introduce motions with the aim of preparing public opinion, in Quebec, for the next general election. This will not work any more and our hon friends know it. There are in the house members who are quite aware of what is happening, who see through the plans of their opponents. Thank heaven, we are no longer deceived by the Liberal party, we can see through their strategy, and at the next general election, we shall be in a position to uphold with success the policy of our Prime Minister.

I heard, the other day, the hon. member for Quebec East call the Prime Minister: "Mussolini." Well, I prefer a Mussolini to those who are quoted as an example by our Liberal friends or the Labour group: the Lenines, Trotskys, Stalines and others of the same stamp. I prefer to all those men, one like Mussolini who, through his energy has saved his country from destruction, and from being the prey of bolshevism as it exists in Russia. I wish that all countries had at the head of their government a Mussolini, especially in the hard times we are passing through. If all countries had as leaders, men as firm, energetic and as patriotic as the one who is at the helm of our government the world would soon become normal again. Mussolini! that does not constitute an insult for the leader of the Conservative party, we accept the title as a compliment paid to our Prime Minister.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Then, do not complain.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Nobody complains.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I had not intended, sir, to take part in this debate, but after listening to the hon. member for Quebec East lecturing us on the constitution and dwelling so much on a subject which we are in the habit of hearing in Quebec, I was wondering if we were going to witness a constitutional battle? There is very little need of making a fuss over the present resolution, there is no constitutional question involved, since, I state again, it is the privilege of hon. members of this house to transfer their powers to the government.

Now, sir, I would request the hon. member for Quebec East to forward a copy of his speech to the Prime Minister of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, because if anyone actually needs a lecture on autocrats, on the one man government, it is certainly the Prime Minister of Quebec. If one wishes to learn what autocracy means, one has but to travel in Quebec, under the present regime. It exists in our province for all those who differ with the Prime Minister and his hon. friend the member for Quebec East.

The hon. member for Inverness mentioned a short while ago the famous Dillon bill enacted in Quebec by the provincial liberal party and we are fully aware that the hon. member for Quebec East is one of the leading spirits of that party. If the hon. member for Quebec East wishes to discuss autocracy or tyranny, let him tell us about the Dillon bill which the Hon. Mr. Taschereau forced through the legislature in order to legalize in Quebec the elections which were stolen last summer!

Mr. DENIS (Translation): A poor plea.

Mr. DORION (Translation): I trust, sir, that when the hon. member for Quebec East has an opportunity of advising the Quebec Prime Minister—seeing that he is reported to be an adviser of Mr. Taschereau—he will hand out the very same kind of advice as he gave to the house this afternoon.

I shall close my remarks by stating once more that, as members of this house, we have the right and authority, constitutionally, to transfer to the government, exceptional powers in order that they may govern in the best interests of Canada, especially when the country is passing through one of the greatest crises known in our history.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I followed very closely the speech of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion). I would have been pleased had he given me an opportunity to answer his comments, but he restricted his remarks to the field of provincial politics. He made an attempt to refute the speech so well delivered and so concise of the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), but he completely failed in his task. I trust that some day he will deliver a speech which will afford me an opportunity of answering.

Mr. Speaker, continuing in English, may I say I am proud to associate myself with the remarks of the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) wherein he so ably and so well expressed democratic and Liberal principles.

I am quite sure the brief exposition by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) will not in any way detract from the words of the hon. member for Quebec East. I am sorry I cannot follow the hon. member for Inverness in the multiplicity of subjects he has so ably and briefly touched upon; however after reading his remarks in Hansard, I trust that at another point in this debate I will have the opportunity of saying something in reply.

It is rather singular that when a question of this kind, namely unemployment relief, is discussed in the house hon. members on the government side should make a hasty exit. My complaint is not personal, but I notice that he who of all others ought to be here, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), abstains from presence in the house, and until this moment we have not been favoured with an explanation of the government's policy in the matter of unemployment relief. I think it is unfortunate that they have not paid more attention to representations made to them. We have listened to complaints on many occasions throughout the session but, outside of the report the Prime Minister gave to the house a few days ago, and outside of the most feeble attempts on the part of the Minister of Labour to explain the policy of the government, we have had no pronouncement from the government. It is rather painful to have to speak on a matter of this kind when one represents, as I do, over 6,000 registered unemployed in this city of Ottawa, a number which is increasing daily owing to the continued dismissals from the public service. I say that we ought to have the attendance in the chamber of at least the Minister of Labour.

Even at the risk of repetition, Mr. Speaker, I think in order fully to present the situation I should place on Hansard a few figures to show that the condition with which we are now confronted is due to the fiscal policies of the present administration, and that the doctrines they enunciated—not the policies they put into practice, because they have not followed any particular policies—have led us deeper into the quagmire, thereby increasing unemployment.

I do not want to quote these figures at great length, but I think it well that they should sink into the minds of the people of Canada. When the Liberal government came into power the national debt had reached a tremendous figure, but each successive year from 1924 the debt was decreased. These decreases were as follows:

1926	27,706,587
1927	41,896,729
1928	50,984,137
1929	71,345,528
1930	47,741,705

In 1931, instead of a decrease there was an increase of about $83,000,000. That was not our fault; that was brought about because of the change in policy. Now let me give the figures of our exports and imports:

	Imports	Exports
1922	$ 747,804,332	$ 753,927,009
1923	802,579,244	945,295,837
1924	893,366,867	1,058,763,297
1925	796,932,537	1,081,361,643
1926	927,328,732	1,328,700,137
1927	1,030,892,505	1,267,573,142
1928	1,108,956,466	1,250,598,034
1929	1,265,679,091	1,388,896,075
1930	1,248,273,582	1,144,938,070
1931	906,612,681	816,938,048

These figures are significant; something follows from them. When the Conservative party came into power they proceeded to disturb the whole economic structure of this country by the adoption of a new policy; they raised high tariff walls until we would have thought the amount of duty collected would be far in excess of that collected under the Liberal administration. In 1928 the amount of duty collected was $189,956,582 and in 1929, not under Conservative high protection but under the policy of medium protection and world trade, the duty collected was about $208,000,000, showing the enormous amount of trade that was being carried on. In 1930 the amount dwindled to $164,374,195, but after these high tariff walls were erected in 1931 the amount of duty collected was only $122,542,785.

There was a reason for that change. By putting on these excessive tariffs both imports and exports fell off, because when we would not deal with other countries they would not deal with us, and as a result unemployment increased. Back in 1930 the Liberal administration knew conditions were not what they should be throughout the world; we knew the crisis was spreading over the world and that some day it would strike Canada, so we shaped our course accordingly. The Dunning budget was brought down; our policies were so shaped as to prepare this country for the Imperial conference, so that something might be done to the mutual benefit of all concerned, but when the elections came on someone came along and made lavish promises which at the time he knew never could be fulfilled. The Canadian people were in a state of excitement; they listened to the doctor who offered them a ready cure for all their ills, instead of taking a more moderate course, which might have taken a little longer but which would have brought results. But the medicine proved to be worse than the ills, and now we are suffering from unemployment to an unprecedented degree. That can only be ascribed to the policies put into force by this administration.

Now we have reached a point where the unemployment problem must be solved, and for some time past the Prime Minister has had on the order paper a resolution which he says is designed for this purpose. In 1930 we voted some $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. I think it was a bad move, but nevertheless we let the measure go through. In 1931 we gave the government power to do as they pleased. That may have been a mistake also, but it was done in order to give the administration a chance to see if they could meet this difficulty. Instead of doing that, however, they have simply complicated matters, and now the Prime Minister comes along with a resolution designed to renew that measure. Why was not that brought down by the Minister of Labour? It concerns unemployment and surely belongs to his department. Let me just trace this resolution from the day of its introduction. On February 26, at page 558 of Hansard, the resolution was introduced, but since then it has had just as much ill luck as the statute has had which it seeks to amend. When it was spoken to by the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker said the resolution as it appeared on the order paper was not in regulation form. Then it came up again, and at page 747 of Hansard, following an objection by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff), Mr. Speaker stated that the resolution was on the order paper by mistake. So it has been having a hard time.

The situation is this: The Prime Minister is now endeavouring to amend a statute that has expired. I have absolutely no quarrel with the idea of expediting the passage of a measure designed to relieve those who are suffering; I have no hesitation in saying that I should be delighted to facilitate the passage of such a measure so far as I might do so personally. But in order that the matter might be placed clearly before the house my right hon. leader indicated his position, as reported at page 914 of Hansard:

> If my right hon. friend will drop the resolution which is now before us and ask his [Mr. Chevrier.] Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) to come to the house this evening with a supply bill indicating the amount of money which the administration feels it will be necessary to have in order to meet the situation between now and the first of May, or the period during which parliament may be in session, if he will take that course, and move that the rules be suspended so that such a supply bill can be speedily passed through the house and sent over to the Senate, we of the opposition will cordially join with the government in agreeing to the suspension of the rules, and will seek to expedite the passage of such a measure through the house to-day.

I am in full accord with that expression. On the other hand, I wish to have it understood by those who have sent me here that I am trying to discharge the duty with which they have entrusted me; for there are certain responsibilities that rest upon members of parliament as custodians of the rights and liberties of the people, and we must see that the proceedings are carried out in accordance with the rules of responsible government and constituted authority. We are now faced with this resolution, and I will give my view of it. The resolution reads:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8 and substituting the word "May" therefor.

We have had substitutions before; this government seems to be omnipotent in the way of making substitutions and changes, and only last year a minister of the crown showed how, by an amendment through order in council, radishes could be changed into potatoes. Personally I believe that this is a very bad method of legislating in matters of such importance. I cannot understand how the Prime Minister, with all his wonderful attainments, can entertain the idea that he may legally change this statute in the way he proposes. I do not see how he can put life into a dead statute. I, for one, object to this house being taken for a morgue. This statute is dead, and this is no school of pathology; it is not a school of anatomy. We are not here to dissect a dead statute, to amend a dead statute by trying to add something new to it. We are not here for that purpose. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, our doctrines are alive, our principles are full of life, we are full of blood and vigour and youth. We are not dealing with dead issues or dead tissues, but we are dealing with a live question; and it is highly unbecoming of this house even to suggest that there is any possibility of amending a dead statute. I am going to show that it cannot be done. I have searched the authorities far and wide and I must say that in none of the encyclopaedias of law which I have consulted have I been able to find one precedent for the suggestion that one may amend a dead statute. It has never been heard of; there is no precedent for it in English law. I have not looked into Chinese or Russian law, having contented myself with looking into the system of laws under which we live; and as I say, I cannot find a single precedent for the proposal. This is a dead statute, I repeat; and when we try to give effect to it in the way proposed, we might as well go into the outside world and inform the unemployed that this law is a robot. We might as well do that.

What does the preamble say? Let me quote:

Whereas by reason of the continuing world-wide economic depression—

There was a depression then.

—there exists in many parts of Canada a serious state of unemployment and distress. . . .

Then section 2 provides:

There may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as the governor in council in his discretion may deem expedient to expend for relieving distress, providing employment and maintaining within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

It is well that the people of Canada, the unemployed, should know that the governor in council may, in the discretion of his power, spend any money he may deem expedient for these purposes. These are wide powers, and now we are asked to amend a dead statute in order to continue them. But the fatal clause is this:

This act shall expire on the first day of March, 1932.

With all deference to the Prime Minister, I cannot find any proposition of law anywhere that could possibly justify him in amending this dead statute. Once a promissory note is given for any length of time, if that note is not protested the endorser is free. An agreement is made for a day or for a year, and the obligations thereunder are discharged at the end of that time, so that you cannot resuscitate it nor amend it, although you can make another agreement covering the matter. You may revive a dead statute; but as I shall show it is not considered wise. It is regarded as poor policy to revive a dead statute, but you may revive it. You cannot, however, amend a dead statute, and on March 1, this statute died. That was the last day of its existence.

I take my authority from Craies on Statute Law, third edition, page 344. But before I quote any authority, perhaps I may observe that in this matter, as in others, the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister have no doubt made up their minds, so that whatever we may say will be of no avail. At page 344 of the 1923 edition the following appears:

It is now rare to revive an expired act. The only recent instance is the revival of the Alien Act by the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act, 1882.

Now I turn to Halsbury's Laws of England, volume 27, page 158, section 301:

After the expiration of a statute, in the absence of provision to the contrary,—

And there is no provision to the contrary in this statute.

—no proceedings can be taken on it, and proceedings already commenced ipso facto determine.

That is Halsbury's opinion, and I would rather take it than the opinion of the Prime Minister. I know what will be invoked in this argument; we shall be referred to the practice in England. But the practice in England and the practice in Canada are totally different. In England there are two acts; one is the Acts of Parliament Expiration Act of 1808 and the other is the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, which are two different laws passed for two specific purposes, and which do not exist in Canada. And if these laws were passed in England it was because it was recognized that they were necessary for some purpose, some utility. So that if we have not those laws in Canada, the cases covered by them in England are not covered here. Now what is the practice in England? Let me cite again from Craies on Statute Law, at page 344:

It is provided by the Acts of Parliament Expiration Act, 1808, that "Where any bill may have been or shall be introduced into this present or any future session of parliament for the continuance of any act which would expire in such sessions, and such act shall have expired before the bill for continuing the same shall have received the royal assent, such continuing act shall be deemed or taken to have effect from the date of the expiration of the act . . . and such act shall have expired before the bill for continuing the same shall have received the royal assent, such continuing act shall be deemed or taken to have effect from the date of the expiration of the act intended to be continued as fully and effectually."

What is the argument presented to the house. It is said that the resolution was on the order paper before March 1; that is true, but that was not a bill. Even if a bill had been before the house it would have been of no avail, because that bill would not have been presented in time. We have no act in Canada such as the Acts of Parliament Expiration Act. Even though the notice of motion was on the order paper before the statute expired, the Prime Minister is not out of the difficulty of trying to amend a dead statute. Another law in England is the Expiring Laws Continuance Act, and I quote again from page 343 of Craies as follows:

> It is now the practice to pass an Expiring Laws Continuance Act each session, and to put into a schedule each temporary act which it is intended to continue.

We have not such an act in this country. This statute is dead; as my right hon. leader has said, it is as dead as the dodo. I quote from page 342:

> As a general rule, and unless it contains some special provision to the contrary, after a temporary act has expired no proceeding can be taken upon it, and it ceases to have any further effect. Therefore, offences committed against temporary acts must be prosecuted and punished before the act expires, and as soon as the act expires any proceedings which are being taken against a person will ipso facto terminate.

There is no precedent under British law whereby anyone can be tried under a dead statute. An amendment to a statute must be carried before the act expires. I do not know that I could have made my case any plainer than by the citation of this authority. No precedent can be found for the proposition that a dead statute can be amended. A statute can be kept alive, and there are many examples of this fact in British law. The statute of June 6, 1797, 37 George III, chapter 70, an act for the better prevention and punishment of attempts to seduce persons serving in His Majesty's forces by sea or land, contains the following provision:

> Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act shall continue to be in force until the expiration of one month after the commencement of the next session of parliament and no longer.

That is an example of good draftsmanship. The act could not expire before the session started, and there was at least one month during which amendments could be submitted. That is following out the principles of responsible and constitutional government. This principle is carried out in some of our own statutes, and I will cite a few. Take, for instance, the Supreme Court Act. Under the old practice it was necessary that an appellant should enter his appeal within thirty days, and if this was not done, leave to appeal was refused and many hardships resulted. Section 41, of this act now provides that the judge may grant this leave even after the thirty days have expired. When a statute prescribes that a certain thing be done within a certain time, that thing cannot be done once the statute has expired. I say that is the most elementary principle of law. The same principle is carried out in the Bankruptcy Act. The statute of limitations provides that after six years a debt cannot be recovered; that is the end of it, the time has elapsed and nothing can be done. I quote from Dwarris on statutes, volume two, page 670, as follows:

> If an act be penal and temporary by the terms or nature of it, the party offending must be prosecuted and punished before the act expires, although the offence should have been committed before the expiration of the act. The party cannot be punished after it has expired, unless a particular provision be made by law for the purpose.

How can a statute which has expired be amended? In England the statutes are classified by groups, and I hope that some day the same thing will be done in connection with our laws. For instance, they have in England what are known as expired statutes; these are temporary acts which have ceased and have not been revised or continued by annual expiring laws, continuation acts or otherwise. They have what they term spent acts, which are acts which have worked the purpose for which they were passed. Then there are acts which have been repealed in general terms, that is, repealed without special reference thereto. Then there are acts which have been verbally repealed, that is, acts that are inconsistent with or rendered nugatory by later acts. There are suspended acts where the effect is obtained equally by a later act. There are also obsolete and unnecessary acts, but there is no mention of dead acts; a dead statute is not recognized under British law. I should like to quote from Surtees vs. Ellison, to be found in 9 Barnewell and Cresswells, at page 752, as follows:

> It has been long established that when an act of parliament is repealed it must be considered (except as to transactions past and closed) as if it had never existed.
> It is certainly very unfortunate that a statute of so much importance should have been framed with so little attention to the consequences of some of its provisions.
> It is said that the last will of a party is to be favourably construed, because the testator is inops consilii. That we cannot say of the legislature, but we may say that it is magnas inter opes inops.

In other words, "penniless amid great plenty," meaning that the Prime Minister, in the midst of all his counsellors, is without counsel. He had a bevy, a host of counsellors around him, but he had no counsel, not because he had too many counsellors, but because he would not accept their counsel.

In the case of Kay versus Goodwin, 6 Bingham, at page 582, Judge Tindal says:

> I take the effect of repealing a statute to be to obliterate it as completely from the records of the parliament as if it had never passed.

That is when a statute is repealed; the situation is worse when it is dead. He continues:

> It follows therefore that this statute having been repealed by 6 George IV, the power of enrolling under 5 George II has perished with that act.

That sounds like the Prime Minister perishing in the attempt! How much more forcibly must what I have cited with reference to a repealed statute, apply to a statute that is dead! When you repeal a statute, what you do is to take a statute that is in full life and vigour and simply cut it off automatically by putting another act on the statute book. But when you let a statute linger, lie there, die of inanition; when you have means at your disposal to revive it and you let it die, how can you say you can amend it? No, you cannot. The government is trying to make out a case where there is no precedent for the very good reason that nobody ever thought of such an anomaly. It is analogous to the idea that when a horse is dead it is dead forever.

I for one cannot subscribe to the view that we can amend this statute. Consequently I am opposed to the adoption of this resolution, because of its unconstitutionality, and also because of its character, as others who have preceded me have stated. For those reasons I cannot accept it. The way was well indicated to the government to deal with this matter as it should have been dealt with, and I have no hesitation in saying that if the Prime Minister will only recede from the untenable position he has taken—and for what reason he has taken it, he is the sole judge —then for my part I shall offer no objection to his taking the course suggested. I would be extremely happy to see those who are suffering and for whom this measure is designed, receive the benefit of it, but I feel I must discharge the duty which my constituents have imposed upon me, of fighting to the last ditch against any attempt to pass this legislation through the parliament of Canada, in this unconstitutional manner.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in congratulating the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) on his learned and excellent speech. He has shown a deep knowledge of law, and the precedents which he has quoted are not only in accordance with the law as it is interpreted by all, but also in accordance with horse sense, common sense. It is pretty hard for us to speak in the house, seeing we are discussing a corpse; it is like a mortuary, not the House of Commons. But I do not wish to say anything unpleasant to my hon. friends opposite. I desire only to say this: First of all, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his speech the other day praised himself a great deal by saying that the work he had done was magnificent. This was more praise to himself than to anyone else, because, as everyone knows, he assumed the responsibility for the whole thing. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon), the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall), and the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) are continually burning incense under his nose and he seems to like it a great deal. I do not blame them for being loyal to their leader, but I hope he will not be asphyxiated by the amount of incense that is burned. They might be called, in a very courteous way, shriners. They may be in one sense loyal to their leader, and no one can blame them for that, but they have to be loyal to the people. They must also be loyal to the traditions that have existed in this country for over a century.

My objection to this resolution is that it takes us a hundred years back. The hon. member for Inverness said: Let us quote the law; let us quote authorities showing that the country shall not be governed by orders in council. I have under my hand an old book, one that dates back to 1834, in which are contained the ninety-two resolutions that exemplify the fight made by our forefathers against the Family Compact, against those autocrats who wanted to control the government of this country. Thanks to the spirit of justice, the courage, the fairmindedness and the patriotism of our forefathers, we have enjoyed liberty for a long time. The principles of English government have been recognized in this country, but now that apparently things are to be changed, it might be proper to read to the house some excerpts from those ninety-two resolutions. No one can blame me for doing so, as the Prime Minister has quoted long excerpts from judgments rendered by Lord Haldane. This book is dated February 21, 1834. Resolution 79 reads:

> Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that this house, as representing the people of this province, possesses of right, and has exercised within this province, when occasion has required it, all the powers, privileges and immunities claimed and possessed by the Commons house of parliament, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Resolution 80 reads:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that it is one of the undoubted privileges of this house, to send for all persons, papers and records, and to command the attendance of all persons, civil or military, resident within the province, as witnesses, in all investigations which this house may deem it expedient to institute; and to require such witnesses to produce all papers and records in their keeping, whenever it shall deem it conducive to the public good to do so.

Other resolutions are very interesting and important. May I read to the house resolution 64. It states:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the claims which have for many years been set up by the executive government, to that control over, and power of appropriating, a great portion of the revenues levied in this province, which belong of right to this house, are contrary to its rights and to the constitution of the country; and that with regard to the said claims, this house persists in the declarations it has heretofore made.

Resolution 65 reads:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the said claims have been vague and varied; that the documents relative to the said claims, and the accounts and estimates of expenses laid before this house have likewise been varying and irregular, and insufficient to enable this house to proceed with a full understanding of the subject on the matters to which they related; that important heads of the public revenue of the province, collected under the provisions of the law, or under arbitrary regulations made by the executive, have been omitted in the said accounts; that numerous items have been paid out of the public revenue, without the authority of this house.

Mark that, Mr. Speaker, "without the authority of this house." It goes on:

—or any acknowledgment of its control over them, as salaries for sinecure offices which are not recognized by this house, and even for other objects for which, after mature deliberation, it had not been deemed expedient to appropriate any portion of the public revenue; and that no accounts of the sums so expended have been laid before this house.

Resolution 68 reads:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the result of the secret and unlawful distribution of a large portion of the public revenue of the province has been that the executive government has always, except with regard to appropriations for objects of a local nature, considered itself bound to account for the public money to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury in England, and not to this house, nor according to its votes, or even in conformity to the laws passed by the provincial legislature; and that the accounts and statements laid before this house from time to time, have never assumed the shape of a regular system of balanced accounts, but have been drawn up one after the other, with such alterations and irregularities as it pleased the administration of the day to introduce into them, from the accounts kept with the Lords of the Treasury, in which the public money received was included, as well as all the items of expenditure, whether authorized or unauthorized by the provincial legislature.

Resolution 69:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the pretensions and abuses aforesaid have taken away from this house even the shadow of control over the public revenue of the province, and have rendered it impossible for it to ascertain at any time the amount of the revenue collected, the disposable amount of the same, and the sums required for the public service.

Resolution 71:

Resolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that this house will hold responsible for all moneys which have been or may hereafter be paid otherwise than under the authority of an act of the legislature, or upon an address of this house, out of the public revenue of the province, all those who may have authorized such payments or participated therein, until the said sums shall have been reimbursed or a bill or bills of indemnity freely passed by this house, shall become law.

That is what our forefathers voted for nearly one hundred years ago because they were imbued with the British principles of government and because they knew what fair play was. They knew that ever since Magna Charta the House of Commons in England has had control over expenditures. Now what control have we over public expenditures when everything is done by order in council? As my great leader the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) stated, the duty of this House of Commons is to control the expenditure of public money. But now everything is done by order in council. Everything is done in secret. We have a star chamber in the East block. How long will it last? We in this parliament know nothing of what is done there, whereas every matter of public expenditure should be decided by this House of Commons and by parliament. Under our constitution not even the Senate can introduce a money bill. It must be introduced in the House of Commons. If money measures cannot be introduced even in the Senate, how is it that this government can decide everything by order in council in the East block, with the members of the House of Commons knowing nothing of what is being done there?

I have quoted excerpts from the ninety-two resolutions, Mr. Speaker, and may I say that I speak in accordance with the traditions of my own family because among those who voted for the ninety-two resolutions in the Quebec assembly on February 21, 1834, there was a humble country merchant, my great grandfather, who had as much respect for British institutions as I have. Although he was only a country merchant he knew that the very foundation of British parliamentary institutions was fair play and respect for the precedents established in centuries of struggle in England. But now we have a man who is arrogant enough to say: Here I am; I am the great ego; as the leader of my party rightly said last year, everything is torn down and the constitution of this country is made a scrap of paper. That is all that we have now, and where are they going? The other day I read in the newspapers that in the United States they are going to forbid trips on ships going nowhere. That is where this ship of state is going under the leadership of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It is going nowhere. I shall not say with my hon. friend from Winnipeg that the Prime Minister is mad. I shall not say that of him or of any of his crew, but I will say that they are all seasick and that the people of this country, the passengers on board the ship, have nothing to eat. The conditions, Mr. Speaker, are very sad. Then we have the ignorance, the gross ignorance, of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) who is not willing to educate himself, to inform himself about the troubles of the people of this country. He is so ignorant, Mr. Speaker, that he gave this answer to a question of mine.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I will prove it. He is so ignorant that the other day, March 3, he answered in this way to a question of mine. I asked:

Since August 1, 1930, did the Minister of Labour make or give to the press statements about unemployment in this country?

The minister's answer was:

Prior to February 3, 1932. No information. Since February 3, 1932. No interviews.

He was Acting Minister of Labour, and he did not know what his minister, whom he was representing in this house, was doing. Then I asked this question:

If so: (a) at what dates; (b) what was the number of the unemployed in this country each time?

The minister's answer was:

Answered by No. 1.

That was no answer. It is sad, Mr. Speaker, very sad. The trouble about unemployment in this country is this, that there is no contact between the millionaires who sit on the treasury benches and the common people. They do not know the sufferings of the common people in this country. They are well fed, satisfied and happy, and they cannot imagine that in the cities and in the rural districts there are people who are suffering poverty and hunger, people who have not their advantages, if they are advantages, but, Mr. Speaker, freedom of speech is more real wealth than all the millions of all the men who sit on the treasury benches. The whole trouble over unemployment is that the members of the government, although they might be well-intentioned, do not actually know anything about the troubles of the people. Unemployment has grown worse ever since this government came into power.

Last year when the Prime Minister was presenting his resolution he said that the people in the west had money, that they had cars, and did not suffer from anything. If I remember correctly as my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) said they had no money, he asked why. We may illustrate it this way: After luncheon any one may say, "I have had a good meal." Then the housekeeper may come and ask, "What would you like to have for supper"? "Anything, anything—I am not hungry; I will take anything for supper." Hon. gentlemen opposite are well fed; they are satisfied, and they do not understand the troubles of the people. I pity many of my hon. friends opposite who have not the courage to say to their leader, "Direct your energies towards the miseries of the common people; look into the homes where there is sadness, and where they are worrying about the future. Then you will realize that something has to be done right away."

Some time ago my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) said he wanted the advice of all people concerning unemployment. We on this side of the house are ready to give it to the house. My leader advised the appointment of a commission, a recommendation with which my hon. friend opposite was in accord when he sat on the opposition benches. Now, however, they are making their own decisions, and their eyes are blindfolded. They are deciding, "Well, this will do, just for the time being."

Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make—but at this point would you call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, as quoted in the Montreal Gazette of October 16 of last year, said at Windsor:

> Civilization was being challenged; it was on trial, and "it is the duty of all good Canadians to give serious thought to the whole matter to avoid our civilization going the way of civilizations of the past."

I have already quoted the answer given to my questions by the Minister of Labour, who I regret is not in the house at present.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes, he is.

Mr. POULIOT: I said the Minister of Labour, not the Minister of Railways; I am sorry the Minister of Railways is not the Minister of Labour, because I think he would do very well. I have quoted the answers given by the Minister of Labour, and they are no answers at all. I may say—and I will prove it—that the Conservative party has played politics in connection with unemployment. To start with the highest, I would quote what was said by the Prime Minister at Moncton, according to the Montreal Gazette of July 11, 1930:

> "I promise you action," the opposition chieftain declared at one stage. "He promises you consideration of the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment. Which plan do you like?"

Undoubtedly the only reason why the present leader of the government made such a declaration was that at that time it was highly improbable that he would ever lead the government of Canada; that was why he was talking through his hat. On August 22, nearly a month after the election, the then Minister of Labour said:

> I do not for a moment suggest that the present unemployment is due to any governmental activity or lack of governmental activity. Unemployment is not purely a Canadian problem. It is world-wide.

He was inferring there that the Liberals were not responsible for unemployment conditions. I asked for public statements made by the Minister of Labour, but I was given no answer, so I had to find them myself. Some of them I will quote to the house. On February 17, 1931, he said that the end of the depression was approaching, that we were to see results soon. The article in the Montreal Gazette of that date begins as follows:

> Like his scriptural namesake, a modern Gideon arose yesterday, sounded a trumpet note and scattered the forces of darkness when Senator Robertson, Minister of Labour, smote economic depression as if it had been the host of Midian, showed what powerful action the federal government had brought into the field to relieve suffering, and announced means by which it hoped to guard against any recurrence of conditions which Canada has endured in the past fifteen months. He foresaw, though disclaiming the gift of prophecy, that, by May or June, the results would be felt more than at present, and asked his audience to picture for themselves what the plight of unemployed Canadians would have been like had the present government not taken action in the special session of parliament which Premier Bennett called last autumn.

On May 30 of that year he thought his optimistic views were justified. There is an article in the Montreal Gazette of that date containing a statement by the Minister of Labour, which ends in this way:

> The statement of former Prime Minister Mackenzie King, issued last night, when he said employment conditions in Canada were now much worse than when the special parliamentary session was called last November, was referred to by the senator.
> Senator Robertson contrasted this statement with one made a year ago, while Mr. King was Prime Minister, in which, the senator continued, Mr. King had stated there was no unemployment in the Dominion. "His present statement is probably as accurate as his former one," Senator Robertson remarked.
> Senator Robertson concluded it was his earnest belief, based on constant study of the situation, that Canada had a better chance for rapid recovery and development than any other country.
> Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, former Conservative Prime Minister, tendered the thanks of the club to Senator Robertson, adding that he himself nowadays had a sense of quiet and serene retirement and could enjoy sitting back.

The present Minister of Labour has ignored my inquiry for these statements, so it will be good for him to read them in Hansard tomorrow. On August 18 last, a year after the statement by the minister that unemployment conditions were international, the Prime Minister put the blame on the Liberal opposition for the delay in helping the unemployed. He declared that the Liberals had caused obstruction during the previous session, and that during the last session the opposition asked for more than six hundred returns, all for money that they had themselves voted. He said, that number is without parallel in modern parliament. Is it because I requested fifty or sixty returns with regard to the Riviere du Loup station that there are five hundred thousand unemployed in this country? Then on December 21, 1931, the then Minister of Labour sent an S. O. S. appeal to the Red Cross, and on January 27 of this year the Prime Minister heard the policy of labour. The Montreal Gazette reports the interview as follows.

> World-wide influences, not internal considerations, will determine the end of the depression in Canada, Prime Minister R. B. Bennett told a deputation from the Trades and Labour Congress to-day. And, he added, "Ten million people have a very slight influence in world matters."

If the Conservative party have not played politics in connection with unemployment, then I say they know nothing about present conditions. The suggestion I have already made, and which I will repeat for the benefit of the government, is this: Since this government has been in power nothing has been done to ascertain the causes of unemployment. The blame has been placed here and there, but no member of the government has gone to the root of the evil in an endeavour to discover the causes or to remedy them. During the war people were wounded; one man lost a leg; another was wounded in the eye; another was wounded in the lung, but the same remedy was not applied to each. Doctors looked after each case, each of which was treated in a different way. Cases of unemployment are not the same; for instance you cannot successfully put white collar unemployed to work on the trans-Canada highway. A special remedy has to be found to cure the evil in each separate case. This is what we expected from the leader of the government when he came into power and it is pure horse sense, common sense. If you do not know why anything is wrong, how are you going to set it right? It is impossible; no one can do it. First of all you have to go to the source of evil if you want to remedy it. That is elementary. Now I take the liberty, in all sincerity, and as earnestly as I can, to suggest to the members of the government that they urge upon their leader how essential it is to the unemployed in every constituency in the country that an inventory be made of all those who are out of work. I suggest that a complete inventory be made showing how long each individual has been in the country; what was his occupation; for what firm he had been working; for what reason he left that employment, and so forth. Then we should see what can be done for these men. After that inventory had been made—and it might be made by the social organizations such as the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, the Salvation Army, the Red Cross Society, all admirable institutions that have done so much to relieve distress among the unemployed at various times—the government would then be in a position to inform the greedy manufacturers who have enjoyed high tariffs that, inasmuch as it was understood at the special session that they should not under any consideration lay men off seeing that they had received increased tariffs, they should make provision whereby such men might be employed. If something of this kind is not done the number of unemployed will increase considerably, and the evil will grow worse until saner methods of relieving it are adopted.

I have here the report of the Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief for 1931, and for the previous year, 1930. On October 2, 1930, a statement was made by the Minister of Labour that the sum of $90,000,000 was to be spent for unemployment, and on November 2, Mr. Tom Moore, President of the Trades and Labour Congress, stated that this government had not spent any more on public works than the other governments. In fact, they had spent less. My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) showed that last year there was a substantial cut in the estimates, a reduction greater than the moneys spent by the government to relieve unemployment. I submit that the money which was voted by the Liberal government should have been spent in accordance with the estimates that were passed by this house. Had that been done, unemployment would have been relieved to a greater extent than it was by means of the moneys voted specially for the purpose.

We were told that high tariffs would have the effect of relieving the unemployment situation. On the other hand, the Hon. Mr. Dunning, when Minister of Finance in the King government, said that he saw no remedy in higher duties. He knew that the tariff had been used as an argument for lowering wages, according to a statement that had appeared in the papers. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was reported as stating that shorter working hours were inevitable, and Lord Inchcape, a distinguished English gentleman, made a speech to the same effect. But let me quote the following opinion:

Failure to recognize trade as interchange; obstacles placed in the way of reciprocal trade are, perhaps, the main causes of the world's present troubles.

Who said that? That statement was made by the Prince of Wales at Buenos Aires on March 14, 1931; and the Prince of Wales is above political parties. He made that statement with a view, no doubt, to bringing the leaders of all governments to their senses.

The real cause of unemployment in this country is that trade is much smaller than it was before. And why? Because of high tariffs. The United States began by erecting tariff walls against all other countries and their example has been followed by various other governments. What has been the result? It has been that trade has been more and more localized, and the fact that our trade is less and less international, accounts to a large extent, for unemployment in Canada. A great regret of mine is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) was ill in the fall of 1930. At that time our treaties with Australia and New Zealand were allowed to lapse without being renewed, and we lost our trade with those countries. So great a blunder was this that, upon his recovery, the minister made new treaties with Australia and New Zealand. I am anxious to see the treaty with New Zealand submitted to this house. Those treaties, I say, should have been renewed as early as possible; at any rate arrangements should have been made to preserve to us our customers in that part of the world. That trade was essential to the welfare of Canada.

On October 30, 1930, Mr. Tom King a distinguished journalist now in the United States, made the statement that President Hoover had been slow in realizing the situation in that country. He saw the unemployment crisis only when visiting Cleveland, and the conditions that then existed were expected to result in a Democratic victory in the elections. President Hoover started the move to revive industry in the United States by providing a fund of $500,000,000 to release frozen assets. I cannot quote all the newspapers in this regard but I might refer to an editorial that appeared in the Gazette of October 8, 1931. With reference to the Hoover plan, this paper said editorially:

> But they do not and cannot reach to the root of the depression since they do not affect, in any degree, the position of the republic in its economic relations to other countries.

Let me now quote President Beatty, and in this regard may I say that if I were the Prime Minister of Canada I would not go to Montreal to meet the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway; I would summon him to my office in Ottawa, as I would summon the president of any railway, or bank, or big corporation. Mr. Beatty is reported to have said on March 16, 1931:

> "I believe that one of the most deterring influences of the resumption of normal trade is the presence of huge war obligations; repayment of which and the interest upon them are reducing the buying power of debtor countries to such an extent as to make normal trade conditions impossible," said E. W. Beatty, K.C., president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in addressing the combined Board of Trade and Empire Clubs here to-night.

Our debt to-day has increased by more than two billion dollars. According to the year book of 1931, in 1911 the total debt of Canada amounted to $474,941,487; the net debt amounted to $340,042,052, a per capita indebtedness of $47.18. By 1921 the total debt had increased to $2,902,482,117; the net debt to $2,340,878,984, and the per capita debt to $266.36. The net debt in 1921 was nearly eight times the net debt in 1911, while the per capita debt was nearly six times as much. Why? This money had to be spent for the war. It has been said by economists that out of the money voted for war purposes, one-third was well spent, one-third was wasted and one one third was stolen. With the increase in debt amounting to $2,000,000,000, it will be seen that $666,000,000 was well spent, $666,000,000 was wasted and $666,000,000 was stolen by the profiteers.

Mr. HACKETT: What proportion of that $2,000,000,000 was spent on railways?

Mr. POULIOT: I shall not try to educate my hon. friend. He is generally mixed up with the figures he gives to the house so I am not surprised that he does not understand mine. The latter part of the money was spent for McAdam shovels, old horses, Valcartier butter, drugs—I will not mention names—and bully beef.

An hon. MEMBER: And bacon.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend mentions bacon. Oh! Sir Joseph Flavelle is our own Sir Basil Zaharoff. I should like to quote a little poem which illustrates my point, as follows:

> "From Front de Boeuf, that Norman bold,
> Of Saxon men the foe,
> I draw my blood—at least I should—> Refer to 'Ivanhoe.'"

> "He led the beef trust of his day,
> Of packers I'm the chief,
> They called him Norman Front de Boeuf,
> I'm Baron Front de Beef."

The ancestors of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) were United Empire Loyalists who came to this country in order that they might retain their liberty. My grandfather fought along with the grandfather of the leader of our party (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the liberty of Canadian people. I am surprised to see that the members of the Conservative party who say that they are the successors of Lafontaine, Macdonald and Cartier, the framers of our constitution, do not abide by and respect that constitution. We have to defend the constitution drafted by Macdonald and Cartier against those who take their names in vain. It is our duty to defend the constitution and we will fight the government to the last ditch to prevent it from taking to itself the rights of parliament.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to take part in this debate because of the remarks of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), who asked for some constructive proposal from this house to assist in dealing with the question of unemployment in Canada. Before proceeding to offer any constructive proposals, I should like to make it clear that I do not agree with the statement of policy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in regard to the responsibility of this parliament so far as unemployment is concerned. The Prime Minister said that the duty of caring for the unemployed rested primarily upon the municipalities; if the municipality was unable to deal with the situation, it should appeal to the province for assistance, and if the province was unable to deal with the problem it should apply to the Dominion government. I would point out that this parliament has control of the vital economic policies which determine whether or not the people of Canada are going to have employment. We have control of immigration; we have control of tariffs; we have control of banking, currency and credit. Whether or not the people are to have employment depends upon the policies laid down under these three heads. The municipalities and the provinces are helpless in the matter; they cannot protect themselves against unemployment if certain policies are carried out by this parliament. The government has said that this is a national emergency, and I am sure that the municipalities and provinces are not responsible.

Let us deal first with immigration. I would refer hon. members to the statement made about a week ago by the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon). He pointed out that in the sixteen months ended July 31, 1930, about 221,000 people were brought into Canada, of whom 99,367 were adult males. He then went on to say that many of these people are to be found to-day among the unemployed in our large cities. These people have contributed largely to the unemployment problem which is facing the country to-day. Why should this government say that the responsibility of taking care of the unemployed rests primarily upon the municipalities? It does not rest there at all, it rests upon this parliament. It was the federal government that carried out the policy of immigration under which these people, who are now unemployed came to Canada and who, under our policy, are a charge upon the municipalities.

In that speech the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) referred to the unemployment relief measure which was brought down by the government in 1930 and under which the house voted $20,000,000, the bulk of it to be used for unemployment relief work. The minister says, as reported on page 441 of Hansard of this year, that the measure resulted in a total expenditure of $70,472,832, the federal government's share being $17,372,848. In my opinion this policy was absolutely unfair to the provinces and to the municipalities. Of the $70,000,000 which was spent, only $17,000,000 was supplied by the federal government, a government that came into office as the result of a campaign in which they promised, if returned to power, to cure unemployment. All they did in that year was to pay one-fourth of the amount that was spent on unemployment relief. On behalf of the municipalities and the provinces I want to protest against the policy which has been carried out in that respect. Of course the provinces and the municipalities were helpless in the matter; they had to accept the policy of the federal government.

As regards tariffs, both major parties in the house agree that the tariff policy of this country affects employment. That being so, why do we not frankly admit that unemployment is a federal matter? The unemployment which exists in Canada is primarily due to policies which are enforced by the federal government. The best minds in the world to-day admit that the money policies which have been in force in various countries during the last few years are primarily the cause of unemployment, and certainly the municipalities and the provinces have no way of protecting themselves against money policies which may be adopted by this parliament.

I want to point out further that the Prime Minister, when he was touring Canada during the election campaign of 1930, did not promise that if he became Prime Minister he would assist the provinces and municipalities in caring for the unemployment which they were unable to take care of themselves; he said that he would cure unemployment. But when he comes into office, the first year he is in power he assumes a liability for only one-quarter of the total amount which is spent in that regard. Last year when the municipalities and provinces became so hard up, he had to assume a larger share.

The Dominion government could create employment in this country. They have an act giving them the very widest powers imaginable. If they have not cured unemployment, the inference is plain that they either will not or cannot suggest the policies that will cure it. I should like to point out that the policy which has been in force for dealing with unemployment relief, that is, direct relief, has not been fair. As I understand the matter, the municipalities must pay at least one-third of the amount which is expended upon direct relief. In order to protect itself from a large influx of the unemployed, one city must be careful not to give any more relief than that given by another. The result has been that at least in some cities, an unemployed man cannot get any relief unless he has been a resident there for three months. Cases have come to my attention where men who came to Calgary from other municipalities could not secure any relief except by begging from door to door. That is not the proper policy for dealing with unemployment or for affording direct relief. The federal government, should, I think, have assumed the major share of the expenditure for the direct relief which was given.

In regard to the unemployment relief work which was undertaken, there was far too much delay in securing approval of the different works, because they had to be passed upon by three different authorities. The federal government would have been well advised to send one man or, if necessary, two or three of them, to western Canada with ample power to agree on the spot as to what work was to be done, thus permitting the federal, provincial and municipal authorities to agree upon a particular work and put it into operation immediately, instead of having various suggestions passing back and forth among these different authorities. Much of the work that was undertaken was held up until very late in the fall; in fact, some of it was undertaken after winter had set in, and I do not think we got as good value for the money expended as we should have secured had the work been arranged directly and expeditiously.

I should like to suggest that the unemployed people in Canada be registered. We should know what kind of work they are fitted for, and each man who records himself as in need of employment or assistance should be given some kind of registration card or certificate. Two or three full meals a day should be provided for every unemployed man until work is offered to him. I would suggest, I suppose I had better say a non-partisan commission, representing all industries in Canada, including agriculture, to study the country's needs and the possibilities of creating employment, and to see that employment is provided in the way of constructive work so that we may get value for the money expended.

I want to make a definite, and, I think, a constructive proposal to the government. The particular work which I believe might be undertaken, without waiting for a great deal of survey, would be the construction of homes in Canada, decent homes for our people to live in. If we wish to get people interested in this country, people to have faith in Canada, as the advertisements say, there is no better way of doing so than by getting them into homes of their own. There must be at least 2,000,000 families in Canada, and I think it is safe to assume that one-tenth of them have no decent homes in which to live. That gives us a field for a great deal of employment. I am not going to suggest that the government should start to build this year 200,000 houses, but we might very well make a start with at least 50,000. I do not think there is anything impossible about that. I believe the construction of 50,000 homes at this time would afford employment to the bulk of the men who are now unemployed. Those houses can be built out of Canadian lumber, Canadian cement; in fact, I think we have in this country industries which will supply all the materials for those houses, for example, saw mills, cement mills, brickyards, and most of them idle.

Mr. MORAND: Where is there a shortage of houses in this country?

Mr. COOTE: I shall point that out in just a minute. We have, as I say, all these building materials available, and we certainly have plenty of workmen wanting jobs. Why not bring the workmen and the materials together and build the homes where they are needed? They are needed both in the country districts and in the cities. In the country districts there are odd cases where families are still living in dugouts; on the prairies there are thousands of families living in shacks, and those people would be glad to have real houses to live in. I can show my hon. friend who has questioned me, families who are living in shacks built of one-ply of boards and one-ply of building paper, and who this winter have endured once or twice a temperature of twenty-five degrees below zero. The coal they are burning has been furnished in some cases by the municipality. There is no doubt about a great number of houses being required in certain cities in Canada. I find in the Halifax Citizen a report which says that a housing commission in Halifax has just made an investigation and a report which reveals conditions in Halifax that rival the slums of China. Perhaps that will convince my hon. friend that some new houses are needed. I shall quote very briefly from that report itself:

The problem of housing in Halifax has of late challenged the attention of the lovers of our city and of those interested in the health and welfare of our people, and well it may, for Halifax is infested with a high percentage, per house population, of tumbledown shacks where whole families eat, sleep, bathe and live in a single room, where cellars reek with filth and vermin, where sewerage runs riot—hovels unfit for human habitation and typical of the worst slum conditions to be heard of anywhere.

The report continues:

There are many cases of excessive rentals and some flagrant instances of overcrowding and overcharging. A few illustrations may be given from the survey files:

One room in cellar occupied by five persons, per month, ten dollars.

One room in cellar occupied by seven persons, per month, six dollars.

Mr. Speaker, I would appeal to the members for order while I read these few figures. I would like to read the last two again so that some hon. gentlemen may become aware of the housing conditions existing in the city of Halifax, as reported by this housing commission:

One room in cellar occupied by five persons, per month, ten dollars.

One room in cellar occupied by seven persons, per month, six dollars.

Living quarters in loft of barn, six persons, per month, twelve dollars.

Four rooms occupied by nine persons, per month, twenty-five dollars.

Seven rooms occupied by twenty-eight persons, per month, one hundred and fifty dollars.

Two cellar rooms occupied by eight persons, per month, ten dollars.

One dark room, door only, occupied by three persons, per month, ten dollars.

The report goes on to say:

It is conditions such as these which may yet bring to Nova Scotia a maximum rent as well as a minimum wage.

I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe that those conditions can be duplicated in some other cities in Canada. I remember quite well that a few years ago a witness from the city of Montreal appeared before the committee on agriculture and colonization when we were inquiring into the question of immigration, and told us of conditions in the city of Montreal which were practically on the same lines as set forth in this report of the Halifax housing commission.

Have I said enough to convince hon. members of this house that there are houses needed in Canada for our population? How can we expect to raise in Canada a decent, God-fearing, healthy population such as we should have if they are to be housed under conditions such as obtain in that old and fair city of Halifax, conditions which I am sure are duplicated in many other Canadian cities? In what better way could the government provide employment than by building houses for our people? That is certainly one thing that is needed. We do not need more food in Canada, though we do need some way of getting the food from the farms to the people in the cities who are hungry. I believe that there is plenty of clothing and plenty of shoes in Canada, but there are not enough houses to accommodate our population. The government from now on I think need not say that there has not been a constructive proposal put before them in connection with unemployment.

I had expected that before this some hon. member would have asked me: Where will you get the money? I am quite surprised that that question has not been asked. In reply I think I had better quote the words which are attributed to the Prime Minister, who, speaking at Montreal in the last campaign in reply to a lady in the audience who asked where he was going to get all the money required to fulfil his promises, said, "From taxation, where we always get it." That would have been my answer if somebody had asked me that question. But if I had my way, that is not where I would get it, because we are already taxing industry out of existence, and I do not think we should add to its burdens to get money even to build houses. I am going to suggest a way of getting the money which I think is orthodox or very nearly so. It has at least an air of respectability.

I would create a corporation and officer it with a few public spirited citizens, practical men who I believe could be secured and who would give their services for a few thousand dollars per year. I would charge them with this work. When they begin to build the houses they could issue bonds, which would be secured by a mortgage on these houses. Those bonds could be taken to our treasury board just as the banks bring bonds to the treasury board, and the treasury board could advance dominion notes against the bonds in the same way as dominion notes are advanced to the banks. This building corporation could then pay for materials and the wages of its workmen with these dominion notes. The houses would be sold on easy terms, extending perhaps over ten or fifteen years, with a rate of interest not exceeding, I would hope, about two per cent; and as the payments came in, the money could be used to retire the dominon notes issued to construct the houses. I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a reasonable proposal. I am not going to be too specific in suggesting detailed plans for carrying out the proposal. I should only get into difficulty if I did so. I am quite willing to leave the details to the government to be worked out, but I am quite sure that if they picked out the right men, and they are available in Canada, there would be nothing impossible in working out such a scheme. If necessary the cooperation of the municipalities could be invited. Montreal, Toronto, Halifax, and many other cities in Canada would, I think, be glad to cooperate with the Dominion government in working out such a plan. The municipalities themselves have not got the money to spend. Some of them I know are practically bankrupt to-day, and they are only spending what the bankers will allow them to spend, but they might assume some responsibility in connection with this housing scheme.

I could go on and suggest one or two other proposals to the government. I should be glad to do it, as I am sure many other hon. members of this house would be, if the government really wants constructive proposals, I am sure that we can find plenty of employment for every man and woman in this country. If the farms in western Canada could this summer employ all the men they really need, they would take fifty thousand men, probably more, off the labour market. Several thousand men could be put to work ridding the road allowances and vacant lands in western Canada of weeds. That would be very constructive work; it would add to the national wealth, and I believe we are justified in spending money that will result in increasing the national wealth. The money which would be put into circulation by a housing scheme such as I have suggested would increase trade, and as the dominion taxes are largely levied on trade, it would increase the revenues of the country. Moreover, it would assist the government in balancing its budget and would relieve it of a large expenditure for direct unemployment relief. I would suggest also—and I suppose there is not much likelihood of my suggestion being accepted—that if any such proposal be undertaken a certain percentage of the wages of the workmen engaged be reserved and set to their credit in what might be termed an unemployment insurance fund to take care of them next winter when they are out of work. I would suggest that in future we should not endeavour to do road work or work of that nature in the dead of winter. It is largely a waste of effort and money. Let us put those men to work in the spring and summer months, and save from their wages enough money to take care of them in the winter time.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member who has just spoken will pardon me if I do not follow his very interesting argument. At this juncture I just wish to consider the constitutional issue arising out of the proposal of the government.

Ever since gentlemen opposite came into power I have endeavoured to reduce to a minimum my criticisms of their executive policies, especially in regard to unemployment. But when the measure for which an extension is now proposed was brought forward last year I made the observation, and I repeat it to-night, that in times of great crises, in times of war, famine or economic depression, there are two dangers to avoid. One danger is to stick too narrowly to the strict letter of the law and thereby impede the action of the powers that be, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal governments, because, after all, the salvation of the people is the supreme law. The other danger is, that, confronted with an emergency, with new problems cropping up suddenly or taking abnormal proportions, parliaments and peoples are tempted by a clean sweep to do away with the most precious safeguards that experience and the wisdom of centuries had brought them to adopt for their own safety. When during the emergency session the government asked for $20,000,000, I entered a mild protest; but at that time I did not push my views very far because, after all, the amount of money was limited and it was simply and solely to be applied—or perhaps misapplied, which expression might be used concerning every amount of money we vote—for a specific object.

Last year, however, I protested strongly against the unlimited powers asked by the government,—powers which, in effect, would permit the ministry to make, amend, or repeal laws during the recess. The Prime Minister gave some reasons for asking passage of the bill; and those reasons he reiterated this year. Of course, admittedly, it is much simpler for a government not to be handicapped by the shackles of parliamentary institutions; no doubt about that. An economist with very broad views, Mr. Einzig, points out that, thanks to the absolute power put into his hands, Signor Mussolini was capable of dealing effectively with certain problems in Italy which probably could not have been solved by a regularly constituted government. No doubt about that; no doubt at all. Likewise, at the other end of the European situation, both geographically and constitutionally, no doubt Lenin and, now, Mr. Stalin, have been capable of accomplishing things, good or bad, which not even our Prime Minister could accomplish.

I hope hon. members will not think I am comparing either the men or their talents. I am simply comparing institutions and functions. I do not quite partake of the surprise or indignation of my Liberal friends at the attitude of the Prime Minister. It was to be expected, sir. No doubt the Conservatives knew, when they chose their leader, what kind of man they were choosing.

Mr. DURANLEAU: A very good man.

Mr. BOURASSA: A very powerful man, I admit; I have said that very often. Even before the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) was one of the obedient followers of the Prime Minister I made that statement. I have known the Prime Minister for a much longer time than has the Minister of Marine, and I have much personal admiration and friendship for him. Perhaps he would not want me to state my friendship in public, because he might be compromised with some of his friends. Intimately, however, I think, he accepts those terms of friendship. When he was chosen leader of his party I predicted that if he ever came to power we would have the most authentic autocrat Canada has ever known. He has the will, the talent and the power. To a certain extent the people of Canada have got what they deserved. I warned my friends in my little constituency that if the Conservatives came to power unemployment would not be ended. I advised those people to discard ninety-five per cent of the promises made by the Conservatives to that effect, and told them to await results. The year has passed, and results show they were justified in waiting. But as to the kind of government the people of Canada have, they have what they voted for.

Let us come back to the measure now before us. May I say it is a logical sequel to the political temperament of the leader of the government? He was absolutely himself when the other day he said, "I cannot conceive any other means by which I can rule this country." Of course he cannot; of course not. A man is never as powerful as when he rules according to his own temperament. The weak leader is the one who rules according to the dictates of his friends, although he does not believe in them. A certain ruler in France said, "Oh well, I must follow them; I am their leader." The Prime Minister of Canada has reversed that. He has said, "You boys follow me, and obey; I am your leader,"—and he is, no doubt.

So we are faced with dictation and autocracy. I am told that this afternoon some hon. members opposite expressed their pride and contentment upon being reduced to the state which, by historical comparison, I shall endeavour directly to describe. Given those circumstances, if the government intends to play its game fully and openly I can see no reason why, after this law is passed, parliament should not be dissolved immediately. Why keep us here? We want to economize; why spend the money of the country, and ours? Why deprive the poor people of so much public money and keep us here sitting, talking, listening, drinking and eating, if the government of the country is to be reduced to the dictation of one man, with, of course, such number and quality of executioners as may be needed?

Powerful governments were carried on in that manner; great empires were built up for a time. The power of the sultans of Constantinople once threatened to cover practically the whole of the basin of the Mediterranean, north Africa, Spain, the south of France, the whole of Asia Minor, Egypt, Greece, and all those countries that have since become what are called the Balkan nations. No doubt that great empire could not have been built up with a parliament. No doubt the manner in which the sultans made and imposed their laws made them much more effective than any law that can be passed or framed under the guidance of a parliament. There is not the slightest doubt that if George III and Lord North had persisted in their endeavours to rule their newly acquired empire in the manner which brought about the revolution of the United States, and had succeeded in bringing the minds, the souls and the bodies of all the liberty loving British peoples to the state of subserviency in which hundreds of millions of people submitted to the dictates of the sultans, the British empire would have been more united than it is. I mean it would have been more united by a rule of iron, but less united by the love of liberty and the adherence to a standard of government which has never had a superior in the history of the world.

What was the government of the sultans? Of course the sultans by themselves could not do everything, and that will be the experience of the Prime Minister before very long, with all his great ability. He is now ruling his majority; there is no difficulty in that. He is ruling his cabinet, also without much difficulty; but before very long he will find out that after all a man, even a superman, has only twenty-four hours a day in which to eat, sleep and work. He will find out that even from his point of view he will be obliged to get someone to carry on some part of his work. I believe I begin to perceive in what manner he will execute his one-man-made laws; it will be in a manner similar to that of the old sultans. They had two bodies of men to aid them in ruling their empire; they maintained physical peace with the aid of the janizaries. We are beginning to have them around this house. I met one of them at one of the posterns of this parliament; he nearly took my cap off my head and asked me what business I had coming here. This was no longer ago than last week. Then the sultans carried on their inside government with a very peculiar kind of executive body, the eunuchs. They were very effective and devoted servants; not much more so than those who surround the Prime Minister, but on the whole they were very obedient. Of course once in a while the janizaries poiniarded the sultan or the eunuchs hanged him and threw his body in the Bosphorus, but the system worked for some time.

Evidently the Prime Minister is preparing this parliament to fill the functions of those civil servants of the sultans. I am given to understand that some of the young members of this house this afternoon expressed their pride at being reduced to that state; but even at my age I do object. The old sultans at least had one excuse; they kept around them harems of wives and concubines; and no doubt so far as that portion of their administrative work was concerned it was a proper thing to secure civil servants carefully prepared for the work of looking after that portion of their government. But I do not believe that to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, to give food to the poor or work to the unemployed, it is absolutely necessary to reduce parliament to that state. Perhaps in the senate we could do so—as a matter of fact I think the passing of time has attended to that—and intellectually at least it would seem that a number of hon. members of this house are also prepared to fulfil that role. But, sir, I claim that in the year of grace, 1932, in a country built up by the representatives of two of the most civilized European countries, with the addition in the last twenty-five years of newcomers from other free, Christian countries, Canada is not yet prepared for that kind of government.

There are two considerations urged by the government in asking for these extraordinary powers. The one is the consideration of money, and the other is what I might call the legal or administrative consideration. Let us consider the question of money first. Let us suppose that last year, before realizing exactly what was the position in Canada, before being able to measure the needs of all the provinces, the municipalities and the different classes in Canada, the government conscientiously felt that they could not exactly state the amount of money they required. At least they could have asked for a certain sum, and they could do that this year. If that amount did not prove sufficient they could have done what all governments have done under regularly constituted authority; they could have issued governor general's warrants to carry on their work of helping those who required help, and later asked parliament to ratify the expenditure of the amount over and above the sum of money voted at the previous session. What reasonable man would have refused that ratification—of course, without divesting himself of I will not say the privilege but the essential duty of members of parliament, which is to look into the manner in which that money was spent? That must be apparent to anyone who has taken the trouble to read British history, whether he be English, Scotch or French by origin; to whatever race he may belong; who feels some degree of pride, call it racial pride, intellectual pride or, as in my case, political pride, in the traditions of British government.

I repeat what I said last year: The essential function of the House of Commons and the representatives of the people is to control the exchequer. For centuries and centuries the British House of Commons did not pass laws; the legislative power was vested practically in the hands of the king and the lords. Later on, with the evolution of time, the House of Commons, forced, so to speak, by the people whose cry increased, and who were acquiring a new sense of their rights and of their liberties, the commons asserted their duty, as the elected representatives of the masses who pay taxation, to control legislation as well as the spending of money; because after all, especially in modern times when economics play such a role in the life of a nation, you cannot separate the power of legislation from the power of taxation. They go hand in hand.

Now, with regard to this new measure, parliament is in session. The government, or rather the Prime Minister, who is the whole government, can come every day and make suggestions, or even charge one of his followers, whether a minister or not, to make suggestions. He can always come to parliament from day to day; and by looking at the order paper you can see that at least the government does preserve some show of consideration for the legislative power of the house. The ministry ask us to pass this bill and that, to amend this or the other law. Why come with a piece of blank legislation and ask us, while we are here in session to discuss every measure proposed, to abdicate our functions and give the government a free hand? They pay no more regard to us than, not to any man on the street, but to any dog or cat. They say to us virtually, "Pass such laws as we want to have passed".

It may be said that the government will not abuse its powers. Sir, many times men who have encroached upon the liberties of the people have made use of that argument. Many times servile followers of would-be dictators have also made that appeal to the people: "Place your confidence in this or that man because you know he will not abuse it". Well, if intelligent and reasonable men have learned one thing from the history of government it is that the danger is precisely to invest men who inspire confidence in the people with unlimited powers. Once the precedent is made, once the power is granted and put into the hands of one man, it may be misused to-morrow either by that man or by someone else unworthy of the confidence of the people. Time and again I have heard the right hon. gentleman, when sitting on this side of the house, quoting from his marvelous memory and knowledge of British history this, that and the other precedent of British parliamentary government, urging that we respect those sacred bases of parliamentary institutions. Now, sir, if precedents are good when you are in opposition, to prevent a government from abusing ordinary powers, then why do these gentlemen ask us now to pass legislation which all precedents condemn from top to bottom?

There is just one evidence I wish to cite with regard to the abuse that can be made of these powers. Reading Hansard, I notice a slight altercation which took place yesterday between my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), with reference to the order in council, or rather the law passed in the form of an order in council, amending the Finance and Bank Acts and putting into the hands of the government the arbitrary power of saying whether or not people who had entered into engagements in New York to pay their bonds or notes in gold should do so. The Minister of Railways has insinuated that that power has been exercised only for the prevention of speculation. The Minister of Railways is very patriotic. He trembled at the idea that some unworthy Canadians would take Canadian gold and ship it to New York to make twenty per cent profit out of it. Is he sure that of the five million dollars which his leader has permitted the banks to export to New York, not one dollar has been used in speculation? What guarantee has the government that the clients of the banks did not play the New York market with the gold shipped under special authorization given them by the government? But I will cite a counter instance. An acquaintance of mine in Montreal carries on a large boot and shoe industry—not one of these new mushroom concerns in which there is no responsibility, but a factory established nearly fifty years ago. This concern was managed by the father of the man to whom I refer, and has been in this man's charge ever since. He is practically the owner of it. The factory employs hundreds of men and operates, I believe, in the constituency of Maisonneuve, in the eastern section of Montreal. Last fall he had to ask himself the question whether he should carry on his operations, for he was losing money every day, every week, every month. He gathered his men together and said to them: You worked for my father, some of you; some of you have worked in this factory all your lives, and others from ten to twenty years. If I consulted only my ledgers and my personal interests I would close the gates to-morrow; or I could spare about one-fifth of you and continue employing the rest half days. But I can do something else which I am putting up to you: I am prepared to keep all of you at salaries reduced by ten per cent, and in doing so I shall still lose money. Well, they accepted that offer and he carried on. This man is making fine footwear. He has to import a certain proportion of his materials from foreign countries, Europe and South America, through New York; and, of course, all his accounts are payable on bills of exchange in New York. He went to the Receiver General at Montreal to get gold and could not get it. He went to the bank, and took some bills issued by this government in the name of the crown and stamped payable in gold—one hundred dollar bills, five hundred dollar bills and one thousand dollar bills. He then said to the Receiver General, "Here is the promise of the crown of England and the government of Canada to pay in gold; will you give me gold for it?" What was the answer? "No, sir; we have orders from Ottawa not to give any gold." And so he had to pay an increased rate in New York of twenty per cent in order to keep his men alive. Is that speculation? I do not blame the government particularly for this; but under provisions of this sort, by the exercise of purely arbitrary power on the part of a couple of men in Ottawa, the reason invoked being the public good and public necessity, the door is opened to that sort of abuse which the Minister of Railways has denounced, as well as that other sort of abuse which I am pointing out to the government this evening. This is the only instance I shall mention.

Now to come back to the terms of the act which we are asked to prolong. The last clause provides that within fifteen days after the expiration of the act all orders in council, with a statement of all money expended, shall be laid before parliament. If we pass what is asked of us, what does it mean? From the time that bill is passed until May 15, the government will have no account to render to parliament. The government, through the Prime Minister, has promised to table all orders in council after they have been passed; in other words, he will apprise his eunuchs of what he has decided before to do. But with regard to the amount of money? Nothing at all; that will go until next year. Because when May 15 comes we shall be in a hurry. The economic conference of the empire will be near at hand. At that conference the sultan of Canada is going to settle everything for all the empire. In spite of his admirable talents, in spite of his superhuman genius, it will take him a few days to cogitate over the needs not only of Canada but of Great Britain, of Ireland, south and north, of South Africa, of Australia and New Zealand, not to speak of that little portion of the empire called British India. I admit that the Prime Minister is a powerful man; but if he is going to save and rule the empire, if he is going to put everything right in every portion of the empire, if he is going to work out an imperial tariff which will contain all that the Canadians want and all the advantages that the British ask for, if he is going to adjust everything, if he is going to make four or five hundred million people in the British Empire believe that what is black and red is blue, that one law can operate one way, another law another way and the two laws operate the same way at the same time, it will take him some time, first, to prepare his data and, second, to understand something of the mentality of people in other parts of the empire, especially in India. There are there 80,000,000 Mussulmen who are not at present in favour of government being carried on by eunuchs. Then there is that little man with the homespun shroud, now in gaol, who exercises more power than even our own sultan here in Canada. It may be only moral power, and I admit that in North America, in Canada as well as in the United States, moral power counts for very little alongside of money power. However, even in countries where the golden calf is the idol of all races and creeds, as it is in Canada and the country to the south, there are still some people who believe in moral force, in certain principles of government, in certain guarantees of liberty, and who are not prepared to barter those advantages acquired by centuries of struggle, by the shedding of blood and by the sacrifice of everything which is true to man and woman. There are all over the world, and even in Canada, those people who undoubtedly want food, who undoubtedly want work, but who want something else beyond.

In this little bit of paper before us, so insignificant to the man whose mind is entirely connected with politics or money, lies a threat to all those sacred principles which, for my part, I am not prepared to let pass without entering my protest and without entering the protest of the humble men and women who sent me here. Those settlers in the mountains, those lumberjacks working in the camps, do not forget the days when their forefathers were struggling to acquire our political liberty; and while I will not say they are prepared to fight, they are prepared to live in dire physical circumstances if necessary to preserve that liberty. They are not prepared to sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. I represent those people, and in their name and in the name of hundreds of thousands of other Canadians, to whatever race they belong, I say that there is something over and beyond party strife, there is something over and beyond devotion to one government or to one man; it is devotion to principle and faithfulness to those foundations of popular and parliamentary government for which we have struggled so long. It takes a much shorter time to destroy than to construct. If this insidious thing is allowed to creep into the foundations of our system of government, while perhaps only one stone will crack this year, perhaps only one part of the wall will fall, the danger will be there.

Judging by the attitude taken by the majority in this house it would appear that the people of Canada have come to the point of being prepared to renounce the basic principles of government. For what? To save them, or the country? No, simply to make matters easier for the government. Let us grant that the right hon. gentleman had full grounds for asking for this legislation last year. He has made use of it and I do not say now that he has abused it. I do not think that he has abused it any more than any other government would have. But surely he has acquired some experience of the needs of the country. At the opening of this session he and his colleagues told us that the worst days were over, that conditions were improving and that they had the situation well in hand. If that is so, what need is there of asking for an extension of legislation which they do not need to control matters which are improving and to cure evils which they claim have diminished? The government has around it the elected representatives of the people of Canada who can tell them from day to day what the need is in their constituencies, in their districts, in their provinces and in their parts of the country.

By adopting this procedure the government perhaps is making it easier for itself at the present time; but the Prime Minister and his colleagues will find out that the more they continue on this course the more difficult it will be to satisfy the people. Why? If they acted with the advice and cooperation of parliament they could divide with all of us the responsibility of the measures they pass. Every hon. member of this house, whether Conservative or Liberal, to a certain degree could be held responsible for a share of the measures adopted and of the money spent; but by doing what they are doing now, the government, or rather the Prime Minister, is adopting this attitude: I have no confidence in your representatives, not even in mine; I have no confidence in the men whom you have sent here; I have no confidence in their integrity or in their technical knowledge; I have no confidence in their simple knowledge of facts; and I take it upon myself to know everything, to cure everything and to make a choice of all the remedies which I have to offer, but I keep a certain number of gentlemen here at your expense to talk. To talk about what? If this is to be the procedure, why keep this order paper? All the legislation which now appears on the order paper could be carried out by order in council. Why have a subsidy bill? Why announce a budget? All that could be done in the Canada Gazette, or the Prime Minister could make a speech and say: Here is what I have decided to do to cure all evils; I have done away with this useless parliament, I have sent the members back home and spared to you the expense of their upkeep. The houses of parliament at Ottawa could be turned into a large technical school, a hospital or a house of refuge for the people who have no place to sleep. He could treble the number of janizaries that would be provided, and train the kind of civil servants I have referred to. Everything required could be provided by order in council.

I appeal now to my hon. friends on the other side and ask them if they told their electors that they had such confidence in their leader—their confidence is justified fully in the ordinary sense—or did they—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Yes.

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. gentleman is so sure that he replies "yes" before he even hears the question. If he composes the dialogues for his plays in the same manner, they must sound queer to the ear and must appear as though he is writing upside down in the Chinese fashion.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): There is no buffoonery in my plays.

Mr. BOURASSA: Then the hon. gentleman is not writing true to himself. What I was going to say was this: Why did my hon. friends, when they appealed to the electorate, not say to them: It is useless for us to go to Ottawa; we have a leader in whom we have full confidence; all we ask you to do is to vote a plebiscite on our heads or our backs and write "Bennett"—"vote for Bennett."

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): We did.

Mr. BOURASSA: Then tell them: we will stay at home.

The Acting SPEAKER (Mr. Casselman): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. BOURASSA: That closes the matter.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to follow an old parliamentarian like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), a man whose ancestors have fought for responsible government and constitutional administration, particularly on the issue which is presented by the resolution under discussion. I am somewhat surprised to find to-night most of the opposition to this resolution coming from members on this side of the house. I had hoped that hon. members opposite would rise and express definitely their opinions on it. Shades of Macdonald and Cartier! Are these men, now sitting mute, followers in such a matter of their old chieftains? I would in all kindness suggest to them that their vision has been obscured by political considerations; they are blinded by partisan zeal in following their leader. I suggest to them, also in the same kind spirit, that if they were as conscious as we are on this side, of the duties and responsibilities that devolve upon the elected representatives of the people, they would rise in protest and indignation against this resolution. Further, I would suggest to hon. members opposite, and particularly would I make this bold suggestion to the leader of the government (Mr. Bennett): Let him advise His Excellency to dissolve parliament and let us appeal to the people on this broad issue of responsible government. Do the people want an autocratic form of government, with unlimited and unrestricted powers? The right hon. gentleman and his Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) are laughing. They consider this question of responsible government and constitutional administration a huge joke.

Mr. MANION: No, we were laughing at the hon. member.

Mr. FACTOR: I am glad to hear that. I am glad to hear they are laughing at an exponent, although a young one, of responsible government. I should like to tell the hon. gentleman that there are Canadians who, while they perhaps lack food and shelter, are not lacking in a knowledge and understanding of our traditions and institutions such as should be exhibited here. There are Canadians who, while they perhaps lack employment, are not lacking in appreciation of the courage and heroism of those who, in the early dawn of our history, passed through the hell-fire of discord and rebellion in the effort to create responsible government and constitutional administration in this country.

I should like in the first place to protest against the method in which this resolution has been submitted to the house, as well as to the time of its presentation. May I first, however, make this general observation: I think even hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me that unemployment is the dominant problem facing this country to-day. I am sure they will not contradict me when I say that unemployment is more severe now, greater in degree and extent, than it was in 1930. Yet in spite of this fact, in the speech from the throne there is not a word about unemployment or its relief, and during the days and weeks since parliament met on the 4th of February, there has not been a word about the matter. Whether this is a coincidence, I do not know, but I would refer to a curious thing which has occurred: in the Votes and Proceedings of February 23, 1932, on a motion for supply the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) moved an amendment criticizing the policy of the government, suggesting:

> That the failure of the government to implement its pledges and promises has caused privation, want and suffering amongst thousands of Canadian citizens; that in the opinion of this house the provision of employment for our people is the most pressing problem before the government, and immediate measures effectively to relieve the serious unemployment situation should be presented to parliament by the government without further delay.

Curiously enough—or is it a mere coincidence?—on the following day, in the Votes and Proceedings of February 24th we find the Prime Minister giving notice of the following resolution:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

I heard of some order in council that the government passed changing potatoes into radishes, but I have never before heard of a resolution the purpose of which is to juggle with our calendar and change the month of March into May.

I object to the method in which this resolution is presented. I should like to draw the attention of the house to the original resolution upon which the act is based, and the time at which it was presented. I want to refer to Hansard of 1931, at page 4282 and to read this remark which was made by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King):

> Hon. members have before them a copy of the orders of the day on which appears the resolution which you, Mr. Speaker, have just read to the house. They will observe that if no reference is made to either the committee of supply or the committee of ways and means, this resolution constitutes the only order upon the order paper. It is not only the last government order to appear, but it is the only order which remains to be disposed of on the order paper to-day.

When the Prime Minister introduced the resolution on which the legislation of last year was based he used the following words, which will be found at page 4275 of Hansard of July 29, 1931:

The adoption of this resolution lays the foundation for the introduction of a bill for the purpose of vesting in the governor general in council during the recess of parliament and until the end of the fiscal year—

Mark those words, "during the recess of parliament and until the end of the fiscal year." To continue:

—full power to redress so far as it is possible the conditions of unemployment and distress now prevalent in certain sections of the dominion.

The Prime Minister himself when the legislation was introduced last year did not intend that it should extend beyond the recess of parliament or beyond the expiry of the fiscal year. Now, sir, he comes along and introduces this resolution. I say in all truth and sincerity it is an assault upon the rights of the elected representatives of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FACTOR: Some hon. gentlemen say, "Oh, oh." Very well, I shall go further than that and say that there is danger in this legislation, danger not only to the rights of the people who send their representatives to parliament but danger to the freedom of the people themselves. There is always danger, sir, when a government obtains autocratic and unlimited powers and is backed by a docile majority.

That was what the right hon. gentleman said in submitting on July 29, 1931, the resolution upon which he based the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act. And now he throws into this house a resolution which goes a step further. The act has expired. True, the government order was on the order paper a few days before the act had expired, but the right hon. gentleman had since the 4th of February to consider unemployment relief measures and to present them to the house.

The world has passed and is passing through a great upheaval. Values have disappeared. The flood of unemployment has spread itself throughout every country in the world, and Canada in common with every other country is suffering as a consequence of the world depression. I must frankly and freely say to this house that no government could end unemployment in Canada. This government cannot end unemployment, and I firmly believe the Liberal government could not end it. Further, I do not think a Labour government could have ended it. But we did not promise to end unemployment, whereas the right hon. gentleman did. He promised it for a purpose, and that purpose he has accomplished. While he promised to end unemployment, we on the other hand said to the people at large that unemployment was becoming a world problem, and because it was becoming a world problem we advocated the calling of a conference, the bringing together of leaders in commerce, finance, industry and labour with a view to considering on a nation-wide scale the problem of unemployment in the light of world conditions, and perhaps finding some solution. The right hon. gentleman opposite made his promises to end unemployment and was elected to office. Now is not the occasion, nor have I the time, to discuss the causes that are responsible for the world depression, but I venture to suggest that when the historian records these trying days he will note as one of the main causes responsible for this depression the fact that every nation had walled itself in behind high tariffs. Every nation has stopped buying from other nations, and all are trying to sell to other nations. I venture to suggest that the right hon. gentleman and his government, elected on the promises they made, are not responsible for world conditions, but I do say that they are responsible for aggravating unemployment in this country because of their policies respecting trade.

I will go a step further—I hesitate to say this, but I say it simply because it is the truth—and assert that this government is responsible for something that is far more serious even than tariff tinkering. This government is responsible for the loss of courage and confidence which is noticeable in our people at the present time. Business is drifting aimlessly; money is being hoarded; capital is not being invested. Can you blame people for losing confidence when we have a government that swings from one extreme to the other in every sphere of governmental activity? In unemployment, first of all, the government advocated a policy of reckless expenditure of borrowed money. Now they are contracting that into a policy of strict economy. They swing from one extreme to another in their tariff and trade policies. Somebody has called the government's tariff regulations the pyjama tariff regulations because they are put on at night and taken off in the morning. Nothing has done more to disturb business and business stability in this country than the tinkering with the tariff by orders in council which has taken place under this government. How can the people be inspired with confidence and courage in such trying times when we have a government which swings from one extreme to another as this one does?

Undoubtedly we are faced by a grave national crisis. We are living in times of national peril, and always in times like these there are two schools of thought. The one school advocates this policy: These are trying days; there is a national emergency; democratic institutions are too fickle to carry on with. Let us have an autocratic form of government; let us have a leader, call him what you will—dictator, autocrat, or prime minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sultan.

Mr. FACTOR: Or sultan, but let us have a man who is strong enough to hold the reins of government irrespective of all democratic institutions and irrespective of responsible government and constitutional administration. That hon. gentlemen opposite advocate this policy is evidenced by the fact that they have not stood up in opposition to the resolution we are now considering.

On the other hand, there is the school of thought which says: Trust the people. Have confidence in them. Administer with knowledge and with tolerance. Let the people rule. Let the people's representatives have their say.

I want to suggest to the Prime Minister that I think it is time for him and his government and his followers to get into closer touch with the great masses of the people. I say to him, not in any way offensively, that he is quite intimately acquainted with the wealthy people throughout this country, but he is not so intimately acquainted with the great suffering masses of the people. Here is an opportunity for the Prime Minister to go on the public platform and suggest to these men and women with whom he is so intimately acquainted, the people of wealth and means and resources, that this country is suffering intensely, that we have a huge national debt, that we are overburdened with taxation, that this country has been very kind to those who are now possessed of so much wealth; and is it not about time they came to the rescue of their country with their worldly possessions? Is it not about time they contributed, for the assistance of our country in these trying days, some of the money they drew out of our natural resources? I believe that all of us on this side of the house would be prepared to follow the Prime Minister in that course. Why not create a large emergency fund of millions of dollars subscribed by the wealthy to help a country overburdened with taxation?

I had not intended to quote any authorities concerning the control of taxation by parliament. This government however seems to ignore fundamental principles, and I feel it would be well to quote from Durell on parliamentary grants. I dare say the principle of the control of taxation is common knowledge to every hon. member, and undoubtedly the Prime Minister is thoroughly acquainted with it. It may be worth while, however, to place the following quotation on hansard:

> The bedrock on which the English system is built is the principle of the maintenance by parliament of control over the grant which it makes. It is one of the old standing principles of our constitution that the House of Commons should control the finances of the country; that is the right, privilege and duty of the house. It has been achieved by means of struggles lasting through centuries. The cardinal principle on which the whole of our financial system is based is that of parliamentary control.
> Upon the fundamental principle laid down at the very outset of English parliamentary history and secured by three hundred years of mingled conflict under the crown, and peaceful growth, is grounded the whole law of finance and consequently the whole British constitution.

I was very much interested to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) not only criticizing Russia—which he had a right to do, and perhaps to a certain extent was justified in doing—but attacking this side of the house for the carping criticism which he said was being levelled at the government, and suggesting that more cooperation be given. May I suggest to the minister that cooperation involves the action of two parties? Cooperation does not mean that the government proposes and that the opposition functions merely as a rubber stamp to any proposals submitted. Cooperation, sir, means that we on this side of the house who have our duty to perform as elected representatives of the people, submit certain suggestions to the Prime Minister and his followers. If they really want our cooperation why do they not adopt our suggestions? The Prime Minister laughs. What did we suggest to the right hon. gentleman? We suggested that he pursue the constitutional method of obtaining money to relieve unemployment, that he bring in a supply bill and that he fix the amount he needed. We hope the Prime Minister does not think that he, his followers and his press can misrepresent the opposition in this matter.

The so-called carping criticism, which the minister has said was lodged by the opposition, is more than criticism; it goes to the very root and foundation of our political institutions. When we suggested that the Prime Minister bring in a supply bill, he said, no, he would not do it. Being a new member, sir, I am not quite initiated into the mysteries of this institution called parliament. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why he extends the statute only to the month of May. Why not June? Why not July? What will happen in May? Does the right hon gentleman say unemployment will cease in the month of May? Does he say that when this act expires prosperity will be with us? Or is the extension of the act merely an excuse to hide the definite and constructive policies of the government with regard to unemployment, if they have any? Is the proposed amendment merely a subterfuge to have this act extended until the month of May and then, perhaps by order in council, extended further?

I was surprised that the right hon. gentleman came to parliament to have this act extended. As I read some of the sections I concluded he could have passed an order in council extending the life of the statute, and under those circumstances there would have been no need to come before parliament. He had authority vested in him under that act to change any legislation; why not this very act? Orders in council have been passed amending the Bank Act, the Insurance Act and other legislation; why does he come to parliament and ask us to extend this particular Act? What will happen in May? Will this parliament be in session? If so, what will the right hon. gentleman do? Will he come again and ask parliament to extend the life of this statute, or has he any other proposals concerning unemployment? Because sir, we frankly submit to the house and to the people of Canada that the relief granted under the present act has been entirely and wholly inadequate.

At this time may I quote a few figures? I am told that during the last eighteen months $150,000,000 were spent in unemployment relief and the relief of distress in agricultural districts. I was amused to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals criticize hon. members on this side of the house for not extending praise to the government because it had fed 300,000 starving Canadians in Saskatchewan. Just imagine sir; the right hon. gentleman, vested with unlimited powers under this act, backed by all the resources of Canada, by all the resources of the provinces and the municipalities, succeeding in feeding 300,000 starving Canadians! Truly, truly we on this side of the house should present him with a bouquet, an embossed address, and a hearty vote of thanks for feeding those starving Canadians, considering the resources he had at his disposal.

What did the expenditure of $150,000,000 provide? Roughly speaking, there were provided about 14,000,000 man-days' work at a cost of $150,000,000, or more than $10 for every day's work given. That was the cost. Where is the balance? Where did the balance go? This huge sum expended for unemployment would provide work for only about 30,000 people, if we allow each person eight hours per day. Therefore 30,000 people were supplied work during a period of eighteen months at a cost of $150,000,000. That, sir, was the accomplishment of the right hon. gentleman and his government, vested with all the authority they possess under this act.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, with an appeal to the Prime Minister. I ask him to stop this discussion, this waste of time in opposition to this measure. He cannot blame us for opposing it; we on this side of the house are still Liberal, not only in name but in principle as well. If the Prime Minister had adopted the suggestion of my right hon. leader and brought in a supply bill a few days ago, by now the bill would have been law and he would have had millions of dollars to spend in the relief of distress in the west and of unemployment throughout Canada. I ask the Prime Minister again to stop this useless discussion; let him introduce a supply bill asking for any amount he thinks necessary to meet the situation. We on this side of the house will expedite its passage in the shortest possible time, and to that end will cooperate in every way we can.

Mr. HERMAS DESLAURIERS (St. Mary) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill under discussion is certainly different from the one which was adopted last year. In my opinion, it greatly differs not only as to the date but especially as to the principle. This measure which is introduced under the plea of emergency, at a time of crisis, will be enforced during the sitting of the house while last year's act was to only become law after the prorogation of parliament.

The purport of this measure is first to relieve the unemployed, and, secondly, to maintain social order throughout the country. The government had recourse to this radical procedure because it suited them, seeing that we are experiencing hard times—a crisis—and that it is impossible for them to specify the necessary amount to cope with all cases which may arise.

It is difficult not to protest against a measure which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) himself qualifies as radical. I can understand that he might have insisted on having such an act adopted in an emergency, but at present, when parliament is in session, nothing of the kind exists. If something unforeseen happened, while parliament was in session, I feel certain that nobody in the house would dare refuse a reasonable proposal from the Prime Minister to meet such a situation. We are aware that it would be impossible for him to determine precisely the amount that he might need under such circumstances; thus in September, 1930, at the special session, if I recollect well, nobody criticized or found too large the amount of $20,000,000 which we were asked to approve. Parliament seemed to have had, at that period, confidence in the integrity and financial ability of the Prime Minister. Even to-day we feel that if he would only specify an amount, parliament would again trust him, and might I further add that, as it was done in the case of the $20,000,000, he would only expend the strict amount necessary to relieve the situation and meet the conditions which might arise. In the usual course of things, under every government, how often have considerable amounts been voted at one session, revoted the following year and once more the third year, without finally being expended? It is a usual practice. Very often the government has had to grapple with gigantic enterprises, for instance, under the government of Sir John A. Macdonald, the building of the Canadian Pacific; the state ownership of railways under the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen's regime and the requirements of the great war, under Sir Robert Borden's government. Always, under these circumstances requests were first made for an initial amount and later parliament was asked for additional sums. Did we not, when it was a question of voting the necessary money to build the transcontinental, the Welland canal, the Parliament Buildings, follow the same procedure, even when the first estimates hardly amounted to half the final cost? Whenever the country is going through a period of stress, when the health of the people is threatened, when its morale may be affected, political parties should help one another and cease to search in every part of the country for exaggerated cases of distress to exploit them at public meetings or in the house; they should on the contrary display in such periods of hardship a great coolness of mind and endeavour to raise the people's hope for better days in the near future.

In 1914, when the war was at its worst, and the Germans swept everything on their march, when success after success attended their arms, when Paris was threatened and the destiny even of our country might depend on the result of the war, the cooperation of parties was certainly then more urgent than at present. Yet, Sir Robert Borden never thought of abolishing the rights of parliament, he never asked the representatives of the people to give way and to invest him with all powers to administer the affairs of the country; on the contrary, he earnestly sought the cooperation of the right hon. leader of the opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and that of his supporters. I still recall the memorable meeting of Sohmer Park, in my constituency, where the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, spoke. Later on, at the "Monument National," the hon. Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, then Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and the hon. senators Beaubien and Dandurand, took part at a great rally in order to cooperate and help to solve the problems of the war.

Never before has an attempt been made to destroy the fundamental principle of self-government, as it is done in this bill. The government must not think for a moment that our opposition to this measure is prompted by a lack of sympathy on our part for those who are in distress; the human feelings of the representatives of the people cannot be questioned, whether they belong to one party or another, they will, I think, acknowledge that when hard times are here, we must provide bread, first, for the Canadian born, and after, for the poor immigrants brought to our shores by every government, too often under false representations.

We have heard much criticism in connection with the distribution of the funds voted for unemployment. We all agree, I think, that the Prime Minister's good intentions are above suspicion, if there happened to be cases of dishonesty and patronage, it is due rather to the defects in the system of distribution, and, under the circumstances, I think, this is an excellent opportunity for him to repeat the prayer of the German: "Lord, relieve me of my friends; as to my enemies I shall take care of them."

The direct assistance, the dole system, is I think a dangerous one. It tends to foster idleness among the people, and may give rise to most undesirable problems. The appointment of commissions, to which I have often been opposed, is also often the cause of complications in the administration of public moneys. It is better to entrust this distribution to those who are better suited to do so, in this instance, to the provincial and municipal authorities, both in their respective spheres; it is better to entrust them with the care of solving their own problems, and if need be help them by grants, in the same manner as the federal government does in the distribution of subsidies to the provinces. Should an exceptional situation develop in one province, as at present, in the Western provinces, and more particularly in Saskatchewan then they can consider the best means to take under such circumstances, with Parliament's approval.

A suggestion was made in the House to carry out an inquiry on the economic and social conditions of the country. I fail to see the practical side of this suggestion. During a period of disturbance, conditions may vary from day to day, week to week, and the findings of this inquiry, misapprehended under the circumstances, would be, to say the least, worthless. The provincial and municipal authorities have at their disposal the necessary organization to carry on that work from day to day, while the Dominion government, to deal with the unemployment problem, only needs a staff to verify the reports forwarded by the provincial authorities.

There can be no question, with reference to this bill, of asking the representatives of the people to make suggestions to the government in connection with the administration of the unemployment fund. In parliamentary procedure these necessary and useful suggestions to the government should be made when the budget is brought down. It is more difficult to-day to make suggestions because one is at a loss to know what will happen to-morrow.

This bill aims at undermining the fundamental principle of self-government, and conferring upon one man, the Prime Minister, the power of disposing of large amounts from the Treasury, without the authority of Parliament. This is one provision of the bill under which the Prime Minister, in my opinion, takes useless risks. Indeed to me it does not seem wise on his part, in his personal and own party interest to take upon his shoulders such a great responsibility and expose himself to much criticism, be it justified or not, when he could so easily share that responsibility with Parliament, and thus face all criticism from whatever quarter it might come, while proceeding in a constitutional way.

Nobody in the House doubts the integrity of the Prime Minister or his financial ability. What Parliament claims, is the right of expressing its views in financial matters, in the interest of the country, and, to share in the administration of public funds, either through suggestions or sound criticism.

After listening to the reading of the many telegrams, quotations and newspaper cuttings with reference to the distress which fills the country, when I see the Prime Minister introducing such a radical measure after the lamentations which have been heard in this house, I contend that he suggests that the government is in despair and that it offers a splendid opportunity to agitators prepared to spread among the people revolutionary social doctrines and contaminate the minds of the people.

I fail to see that, on behalf of Canada, an emergency exists for such measures, exists just now, and let me assure the Prime Minister that so far as Quebec is concerned, if nobody suffered from cold or hunger, it is not due to his administration—though I willingly acknowledge his sincerity in this connection—but it is due, among the farming classes, especially to Providence, and in our towns, to cur lay and religious organizations both Catholic and Protestant. Without these two factors, we would have had to register in Quebec the saddest disaster in our history.

I understand this measure to be a temporary one, and I trust that it will be the last of its kind introduced by the Prime Minister, if he wishes us to be more agreeable in our comments in the future. I wish to protest both on behalf of my constituency and myself against this radical way of administering the country, for I was unable to discover in the arguments of the leader of the government any urgent motive which could authorize him to make use of such radical methods, as those we are asked to approve to-day.

Mr. ELIE-O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to protest against the resolution submitted to the house. There is certainly no doubt that the government is at present very much embarrassed to find means to relieve the unemployed and at the same time assist the farmers. But it is also true that there are other means to relieve them than by laying hands on the legislative powers of Parliament and creating a dictatorship when this house is in session.

At the risk of repeating what was stated by other speakers who preceded me in this debate, I shall narrate the political history of the Conservative party from the day they assumed power. First, without going back too far in the past, I nevertheless wish to briefly state again the pledges given in the course of the last election, and remind the house that, at the 1930 election, the leader of the Conservative party travelled from one end of the country to the other, stating that the depression which was everywhere was due to the nine years of bad administration under the Liberal regime; he added that when given power he would find means to relieve the situation and bring back the country to its normal state. Addressing himself to the unemployed he pledged himself to find work for all those who wished to work and that their labours would be well remunerated; turning to the farmers, he told them that he would see to it that their products would bring in far better returns than during the last years of the Liberal regime.

The people believed to a certain extent these fine pledges because, already, the country was feeling the first pangs of the world-wide depression. The Liberal leader had made preparations to ward off this depression when it would reach our country, and through the medium of Hon. Mr. Dunning's budget had found it possible to reach the various markets of the Empire, establish better trade relations so as to later spread our trade to all markets of the world. In order to attain this end the Liberal government thought it good policy to make concessions so as to receive some from other countries.

The Conservative party, having assumed power, considered that this policy was absolutely wrong and wishing to follow up their cry of "Canada First," made a complete change. It also had made very fabulous pledges in connection with the tariff and had assured the people that with a high tariff, industries would flourish, and, the latter being prosperous the working classes would have work and would be in a position to purchase farm products, the result would be that all classes of the community would enjoy a prosperity unknown until then. These pledges were so alluring that people believed in them.

The unemployment situation having become worse, notwithstanding all the pledges given to the unemployed throughout Canada, the leader of the Conservative party called a special session for September, 1930. This short session was intended to relieve the depression as promised. The people were under the impression that pursuant to the pledges made, day labour would be given to all those who wanted to work and thus increasing the purchasing power, the farmer would easily sell his products. However, the remedy was not as effective as one could have expected. The special session having been called, parliament met and the Conservative party introduced a measure in which they requested $20,000,000 for unemployment relief. Although this session was called specifically to discuss unemployment, a bill dealing with extraordinary changes in the tariff was also introduced; almost every item of the tariff schedule was altered; the greatest protection was given to people in industries and manufacturers. The time had arrived when these people expected to see manna fall from heaven. Often in the past they had asked for higher tariff, but never had they obtained it and never had they expected to obtain as much as they were given at that special session.

Did this protection give the good results which were anticipated? For a while it may have stimulated business, but in the wake of the world-wide depression they soon realized that it became more and more difficult to sell their products abroad. I shall not insist on the meagre results obtained at the Imperial Economic Conference, in London, by the Prime Minister and his lieutenants. This failure was not of a nature to increase our trade with the other countries of the empire. Our purchasing power having decreased, the business people and manufacturers found themselves also in a critical position and were unable to find a market for their products.

Let us examine how these measures were adopted. They were enacted within a few days after the Conservative leader, who had begun to reveal himself under his true light, as we know him to-day, had stated: You must necessarily adopt these measures; they must be enacted within a few days, because otherwise I shall not attend the Imperial Economic Conference. The following suggestion was made by the leader of the opposition: Allow some of your leading lieutenants to remain in Canada, we shall carry on with the session and you will be free to attend the Imperial conference. I wish to be present here myself, retorted the Prime Minister, and these measures must appear in the Statutes of the Dominion of Canada previous to my departure. Already the leader of the Conservative party was showing signs of his predilection for a dictatorship. He was not yet known under his true light, however, signs were not wanting that, little by little, he would lay hands on all the privileges and prerogatives of the Canadian parliament.

In order to convince the house and Canada that this government had not made a deep study of the needs of the country, it is only necessary to recall that, after having had $20,000,000 voted to relieve the unemployed, by the end of the fiscal year only $4,400,000 had been expended, namely, from September to the end of March. There still remained more than $15,000,000 which has not been utilized. This proves that the government was not in touch with the situation and was ignorant of the needs of the unemployed. The fiscal year having expired, instead of having other amounts voted, as it was done later on they continued to spend what remained of the $20,000,000, and according to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), a sum of over $15,000,000 was thus distributed.

I again state that from then on we could foresee what the Conservative leader's attitude would be; at the time, the Prime Minister not wishing that his own followers should discover that their leader was really a dictator making them yield little by little to his will and gradually inuring them to his methods, began by having them adopt the $20,000,000 measure so as to, later, obtain their assent in having the house enact all the bills that he might wish to introduce.

At the 1931 session, after sitting in camera over public affairs, he came before parliament and instead of conforming himself to custom and usage by asking that a fixed amount be voted either in the budget or through special legislation, for a specific end, as he had done, in 1930, with the idea of having people believe that he intended to carry out his electoral pledges and thus amazed them by amounts as fabulous as his pledges, he refuses to specify an amount. We shall he says, take all the necessary money to solve the problems with which we shall have to deal, not only do we ask for all the funds necessary, but we still want more. We want to have this money voted by a special act which will authorize us to deal, by order in council, with all the business we see fit, and which will empower us to amend the acts adopted by parliament and that are the exclusive prerogative of the latter. We wish to have the full control over public affairs for peace, order and good government throughout the dominion.

The people therefore thought that, that Conservative party had not only $20,000,000 at its disposal but an unlimited amount which would help in bringing back prosperity. First, $20,000,000 were asked at the special session of 1930, and later a blank cheque was requested at the 1931 session; yet after all this, they inform us that no remedy can be found to relieve the depression. People are wondering what they will request at the next session. This is the natural consequence of the dictatorship inflicted on the house.

We protest, sir, against this resolution which reads as follows:

That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following resolution:

Certain newspapers of this country contend that this resolution is absolutely harmless and that it should not lend itself to any criticism on the part of the opposition. However, when one scrutinizes it more closely, when one is made aware of what happened under the dictatorship which began at the 1931 session, and which has become more exacting this session, we are entitled to wonder what will be the result.

According to the statement made the other day by the hon. Minister of Labour, in the house, the government authorized, by order in council, in the course of the year 1931, the expenditure of an amount totalling $32,800,000 so as to meet the obligations contracted to relieve the unemployed, and out of this amount of $32,800,000, 7,415,973 days of work were provided for 334,301 persons, or 22⅔ days to each person. Is it possible to imagine such a wretched result under such a dictatorship: only 22 days of work for each person employed by virtue of the unemployment relief act, adopted in 1931. $32,800,000 seems a very large amount to a labourer whose wages are $2 or $3 per day; he has no idea what it represents. The labourer is told that the government spent $32,800,000 which furnished 7,415,973 days of work to Canadians from March, 1931, to February, 1932; this seems a great achievement, however if the hon. Minister of Labour had been in earnest, he would have added that this amount only represented 22⅔ days of work for each person, he would have further stated that the Dominion government in making the outlay of $32,800,000 had obliged the provinces to subscribe an equal amount, if not a larger one, and that the municipalities had been forced to contribute an amount equal to that of both governments, provincial and federal. Notwithstanding all these outlays the depression has further spread since; according to statistics compiled by the "Child and Family Welfare Journal," the number of unemployed in Canada actually varies between 400,000 and 450,000.

Weighing these facts and noting how agriculture is languishing everywhere, one easily realizes that agriculture did not receive the necessary aid. It has been asserted that in the province of Saskatchewan there has been no crop, this explains why the farmers of that province are in great difficulty. Such a situation however should not exist where crops have not failed, yet the facts are there to prove, that even the farmers of Ontario are almost bankrupt. I shall have an opportunity of referring again to Ontario when the agriculture estimates are before the house or when the budget is brought down. I shall simply state to-day that the farmers are unable to meet their obligations because they cannot even sell their products at cost price. Owing to this fact, their purchasing power has greatly dwindled and they find themselves in a difficult situation. Their condition is so critical that the Ontario government has recently adopted a measure to prevent the sale, by creditors, of farmers' lands which are mortgaged. They can be forced to pay the interest and taxes, but not the capital. Otherwise the situation would become intolerable, and farmers in most cases would be despoiled of their possessions. Considering the difficult situation in which our people find themselves at present notwithstanding the $20,000,000 voted last session, and the unlimited amount requested at the 1931 session, or the pledges made by the leader of the Conservative party to relieve unemployment and assist agriculture as he stated at Moncton, New Brunswick on July 10, 1930:

The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work or perish in the attempt.

Could we not request the Prime Minister to implement his pledge. Instead of introducing an arbitrary measure, he should admit that he failed in his task and that he is ready to appeal to the people to find out whether they endorse his conduct when he requests this Parliament to despoil itself of all its prerogatives, so as to allow him to adopt or amend any act according to his whims, or again, to vote him unlimited amounts without previously submitting estimates or stating how they will be spent. I think it would be most interesting to make an appeal to the people in this connection.

The leader of the Conservative party also stated at Moncton:

Mr. King promises to study the unemployment problem; I pledge myself to put an end to unemployment. Which plan do you like best.

I put it to the house and the country whether it would not have been wiser to first study the unemployment problem, follow the suggestions made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and then deal with this problem in the right way rather than use half measures.

It would be quite to the purpose to apply to-day, to the right hon. Prime Minister the words he used when speaking at Vancouver, on June 18, 1930, as published in the Montreal Gazette, the following day:

However blind he may be to your future, and deaf to your present needs, surely he cannot stop his ears with smug compliance and self-esteem to the cry that carries across the nation—the cry of destitute and hungry, the cry of mothers and fathers and little children who call to us as Christians and as Canadians to heal their pain.

That is the kind of appeal which the Prime Minister made at the last election, what has he to say, to-day? That this crisis is world-wide and difficult to deal with. What does he want to-day? He wishes to extend the life of this Act by which he arrogates to himself all authority and, together with the cabinet in council, he wishes to have a free hand, even when Parliament is sitting. We must, sir, as representatives of the people strongly protest against the principle of his Act. We however, find no fault with the following words included in the resolution:

That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following resolution:

But we are opposed to the following principle laid down by this resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

This may seem of no consequence to those who are not acquainted with the provisions of chapter 58 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931. They are unaware that this means the placing at the disposal of the government of unlimited amounts; they are ignorant of the fact that this Act empowers them to pass whatever orders in council they please, either to amend our laws or favour any industry without the consent of Parliament or without the representatives of the people having anything to say in the matter. It simply amounts to a dictatorship, especially when Parliament is in session. When Parliament is not sitting, perhaps there can be some excuse for assuming such powers, as unforeseen cases may arise necessitating special measures, however, when Parliament is in session, it is perfectly ridiculous to request such powers. These methods remind us of the time when we were governed by the Family Compact, and when the Canadian people had not the right to elect their representatives who were appointed by the State. To-day, the representatives of the people are not chosen by the State, but measures are enacted by the government without the consent of Parliament.

What is the difference between the policy of this government, led by the present Prime Minister, and that of the Family Compact which ruled when our forebears demanded liberty, claimed their rights and wished to establish in this country the justice and fair play which characterizes British legislation or when they insisted to be given in this country a constitution which would enable the people to have a voice in all matters through their representatives?

I do not wish to stir up any feelings over this question, on the contrary, I simply wish to point out our views on the principle involved. We wish, without playing politics, to strongly protest in the House and throughout the country against the principle set forth by the Family Compact, and thus follow in the footsteps of the champions of the early days of the colony. We are fortunate to have had as an example, Papineau in Quebec and Mackenzie in Ontario, to champion the rights of our people.

The government, sir, wishes to have our cooperation to enact this measure. We are willing to cooperate in every way possible. However, as stated this afternoon by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), what kind of a cooperation does the government expect? They ask us to entrust everything to them, to vote an unlimited amount; and later on they will inform us, through the Prime Minister, what was decided by order in council. What further cooperation do they ask? To afford them the means, still through orders in council, to upset our statutes as they please, whether it is a question of insurance, gold export, the Bank Act or other important laws upon which depend the whole economic situation and the welfare of our people. Like our forebears we must strongly oppose this dictatorship and protect our people in order that they may enjoy their liberty and that our Parliament may preserve intact its prerogatives.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members on the other side have been asking for constructive suggestions, I have one or two to offer, but I was wondering if it would be agreeable to your honour to call it eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 11, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) presented the report of the special committee appointed to consider and report upon Bill No. 4, to amend the Patent Act, as follows:

Your committee have duly considered Bill No. 4, intituled: "An Act to amend the Patent Act" and have agreed to report said bill with amendments.

For the convenience of parliament, the committee ordered that the bill in its amended form be reprinted.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. CAHAN: I move that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the motion not require notice?

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps the house will give its unanimous consent to the adoption of the motion now. The sole recommendation is the reprinting of the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: As a matter of fact, a motion is not necessary for that purpose. The report requires the reprinting of the bill and instructions will be given that it be done.

Motion withdrawn.

BEAUHARNOIS POWER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Some days ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) whether he could give to the house any information with regard to guarantees which may have been given by the government to the banks for financing the Beauharnois enterprise, and at that time he intimated that he would make a statement a little later. Can he give us any information now?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There are certain matters under consideration and discussion with respect to the subject. When they are concluded I shall make a statement to the house. I am not in a position to do so at the moment.

REPORT OF EVIDENCE IN HEARING BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I desire to answer an inquiry made yesterday by the hon. member for St. Henri (Mr. Mercier). I find upon inquiry that on receipt of the printed evidence given before the Senate Beauharnois inquiry each morning, 250 copies are immediately forwarded to the distribution office for distribution to the members of the Commons. The chairman of the committee is informed by the superintendent of distribution that these copies are available to any members who ask for them, and have been since the inquiry began.

Mr. DUFF: They were in our boxes to-day.

WHEAT BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): In view of the fact that the farmers of the west are making preparations for the new crop, is it the intention of the government to have the five cent bonus on wheat apply to the present year's crop?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have no statement to make, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND FARM RELIEF

CONTINUANCE ACT, 1932—CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

The house resumed from Thursday, March 10, consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a bill to amend chapter 58 of the statutes of Canada, 1931, striking out the word "March" in section 8, and substituting the word "May" therefor.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, while listening to this debate, I have observed that hon. members on the government side are continually reiterating that no constructive suggestions have been offered by this side of the house with respect to providing for unemployment relief. Let me remind the house, and particularly hon. members opposite, that several constructive suggestions have been put forward on this side. I can recall at the moment that my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) on different occasions has suggested to the government the advisability of bringing in a supply bill providing for whatever amount they might deem necessary for the immediate continuance of unemployment relief, stating that he would guarantee, so far as the opposition was concerned, to put it through in the shortest possible time. On this occasion I want to repeat that offer. I would ask the government in all sincerity to bring down a supply bill this afternoon for any amount they might consider necessary to provide for the relief of unemployment, and this side will guarantee to put it through within an hour. While they are considering that suggestion, and in the hope that they will accept it, we might discuss another constructive suggestion—and again I offer this to the government in all sincerity. I suggest that at this session they might bring down a bill to provide for unemployment insurance. There is no question that an unemployment insurance system for Canada can be instituted and worked out to the best interests of the country.

Canada has been described by some people as an eight-months' country; that is to say, a great proportion of the workers of the country are employed only eight months of the year. Any of us who have observed the affairs of this dominion as they relate to labour know that there are many men who are out of work in Canada four months in every year by reason of seasonal occupations. We could, therefore, establish an unemployment insurance scheme at the outset on the basis of sixteen weeks.

As is well known, Great Britain embarked on an unemployment insurance scheme in 1911, and since that time Italy, Australia, Bulgaria, Switzerland, Poland and Germany have established compulsory insurance systems, while many other European countries have provided relief through other measures. One measure is to provide such relief by subsidizing trade union benefits. Within the British Empire itself the Irish Free State, New Zealand, and one state in Australia, namely, Queensland, have state unemployment insurance. There is little doubt about it that public opinion is now ripe for such a scheme in Canada. This House of Commons has endorsed the principle of a system of contributory unemployment insurance. The provinces were canvassed by the late Liberal government and many of them put themselves on record as in favour of the establishment of an unemployment insurance scheme. They now realize that unemployment insurance is one means of meeting the problem for those who are willing and able to work but who are unable to find employment.

Personally I have given considerable thought and study to the question of unemployment insurance as it is carried out in other countries and as it would operate in Canada. There are also several good articles on the subject, one in particular which I have in mind having been written by Professor Harry Cassidy, director of research on the unemployment research committee of Ontario. I refer to Professor Cassidy of Toronto university. The Prime Minister has said that he is waiting for some information. Well, we have the information that can be secured through the Dominion Bureau index, which gives the number of unemployed persons in Canada; and we have the figures collected by the Labour department showing the number of those employed in industry through trade unions, as well as the figures which we have secured through the recent census. We can therefore fairly estimate that there are about two million wage earners and low-salaried men in Canada, the percentage of unemployed being about eight per cent. If we adopted regulations precluding those who would not be entitled to benefits it would reduce the percentage to about seven. So that if we take the bulk of two millions and estimate that seven per cent are usually unemployed for at least four months in every year, there would be entitled to benefits from the fund about 140,000 persons. Assuming that the benefit range would be from $30 per month for single men and $65 for married persons, that would be $80,000,000 a year. Allowing $10,000,000 for administration expenses the total amount required to provide benefits and for administration would be $90,000,000. Assuming there would be three groups making contributions to this fund, the workers, the employers and the state. In order to raise the contribution to be made by the workers, each man would be required to contribute $15 per year or 30 cents per week; one or two per cent of the payroll of the average employer would raise the $30,000,000 required from that group and the remaining $30,000,000, would be contributed by the federal government or, if it desires to cooperate with the provinces, it could contribute $15,000,000 and the provinces the remaining $15,000,000. Such a scheme could be inaugurated and put into effect in Canada without any further delay.

There will be times when the benefits will be drawn from the fund for a longer period than four months, but this could be guarded against by a well thought out plan of public works. We must admit that cycles of unemployment and periods of depression will occur again. There has not been one ten-year period during the last sixty or eighty years which has not included a period of depression. With the intensive competition which this country is facing, with the progress we are making in replacing man-power with machinery, with the restriction which is going on in our world markets, we must face the situation that each recurring period of depression will be greater in extent.

In order to protect this fund from over-withdrawals during a period of depression we should change our method of conducting our public works program. I know it would be very hard for the government to restrain the members of parliament who ask for public buildings, new docks and wharves, additional dredging and other kinds of public works, but if we are to face this problem in a manful way and realize what is before us we should refrain from carrying on public works when times are good so that in times of depression we will be prepared to launch an extensive program.

The scheme must be national in scope. If only a few provinces put it into effect, there would be a run on them by the unemployed workers. Even though all the provinces put the scheme into effect at once, it would not work successfully because of the fact that so many workers in Canada travel from one province to another. There should be some central authority to direct the workers to where they are most needed. There should be no further worry with regard to our jurisdiction in the matter. Some of the provinces already have signified their willingness to co-operate in such a scheme. We have invaded the provincial field in other matters such as highway construction, technical education, employment offices and old age pensions. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said that this government can vote money for anything which in its judgment is desirable. I do not overlook the fact that the Conservative party, now the government, received from the electors at the last elections a mandate to deal with unemployment on a national scale, and it has asked from parliament the right to do anything under any circumstances that it wishes. There is no excuse to delay any longer. Any question of waiting for further information, of gathering additional statistics or of hearing the opinions of actuaries is, to my way of thinking, only stalling off the proposition. This scheme has been tried in other countries and we have had an opportunity of observing the failures and successes of these countries and, benefiting by that knowledge, we should be able to enact a measure to provide an unemployment insurance scheme for this country. This is one more constructive suggestion which I offer to the government of the day.

I assure the government that if it will enter sincerely into this project and bring down a measure, so far as I am concerned—I know many other hon. members on this side will do likewise—I will cooperate with the government in an effort to see that the necessary legislation is enacted during this session.

Speaking in connection with the measure before us, if it can be called a measure, I must say that it is to be regretted that the government has not presented to this house some concrete proposal to deal with the unemployment situation in Canada. With all the experience it has had and with all the criticism that has been levelled against it, one would have thought that the government would have had something better to offer than this haphazard and hit-and-miss method of dealing with unemployment. I shall not deal at this time with the many promises made to the electors during the recent elections any more than to say that the government has failed signally either to end unemployment or to provide proper methods of relief. When the supporters of the government go through the country and tell of the millions of dollars they have spent and of the work given to thousands of people, they do not deceive anyone but themselves.

The methods adopted by this government to relieve unemployment have proved utterly inadequate. We have been advised by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) that since the commencement of this undertaking, under the Unemployment Relief Act, and up to January 31 of the present year, 327,590 persons were given 7,228,744 days' work, or an average of about twenty-two days' work each in that period, and in the latter period, to take the minister's own figures, 334,301 persons were given 7,415,973 days' work or an average of twenty-two days' work each. I do not need to point out to the minister that we now have before us the report of the director of unemployment relief and the minister's figures do not exactly jibe with those contained in the report. There is, however, a difference of only about half a million days' work and 5,000 persons, but that does not alter the argument to any great extent. Therefore we have given these men an average of three days' work each per month, if you figure it from the time they first began, to the 31st January, 1932. In all sincerity I ask whether the members of the government consider that is taking care of the unemployed of Canada.

What has this cost the country? To meet this, the federal, provincial and municipal authorities have been committed to an expenditure of $146,899,219, the federal government's share being, in round figures, about $50,000,000, and that of the provincial governments and municipalities about $100,000,000.

This scheme was supposed to be launched for the purpose of giving work and wages to our unemployed. Let us see what amount out of this $146,000,000 has been paid to the workers. We find that since the beginning of the unemployment relief, if we take both periods combined, 14,644,717 days' work was supplied. At eight hours a day and at thirty cents an hour, that would amount to $2.40 a day, so that the total amount paid would be $35,147,320.80. Therefore, those who received employment did not receive even one-quarter of the total amount expended, approximately $112,000,000 having gone for some other purpose. The government has not as yet given the house any information with respect to that, but I am satisfied that at least $112,000,000 has not gone into wages for those men.

If we divide the amount paid in wages by the number of men who have been paid, we find that for sixteen months these men have received an average of $53 each. I ask members of the government or any of their supporters how they think those men can live for sixteen months on $53, and in that I am giving the government the advantage in the figures. It is not sufficient for the workers of the country, nor is it good business for the country itself. Yet we find members of the government and many of its supporters taking great credit throughout Canada for the magnificent manner in which they have contributed to the assistance of the provinces. I think in all fairness they ought to point out that while the government are pretending to contribute with the one hand to assist the provinces, they are with the other withholding from the provinces large federal expenditures and obligations.

If we take the Public Works estimates of last year and this, we shall find that last year's estimates show a reduction of $17,000,000 as compared with the previous year. That $17,000,000 would have provided a considerable amount of work from the federal government at fair rates of wages. This year's Public Works estimates show a further reduction of $10,000,000, so that in the two seasons combined, the federal government has withheld work to the extent of $27,000,000. That is not all. It will be recalled that during the recent election the Conservative party obligated themselves to take over the full cost of old age pensions. It was estimated by a committee of this house that an old age pension scheme for Canada would cost in the neighbourhood of $24,000,000. This year the government will pay not over $7,000,000, so that they are withholding $17,000,000 that they obligated themselves to take over and pay to the provinces in connection with old age pensions. A number of the provinces have been depending upon the federal government assuming the entire cost, and several of them, relying upon the promises of the Prime Minister, have spent money in other ways.

I need not dwell upon the fact that last session there was put through the house a technical education bill, whereby the government promised the provinces a considerable amount of money which they have not received, but which, according to law, is due to them. I need not point out that the government during the last election promised to construct a national highway, the work to be carried on as a federal scheme. What is the situation? The fact is that the government has contributed 50 per cent of the expense in connection with the trans-Canada highway, requiring the provinces to pay the other half, and I think, up to the present time, according to the report, it owes the provinces somewhere in the neighbourhood of $5,000,000 which it should have paid in connection with that highway. What I want to point out is this: hon. members opposite are telling the people that the government is spending $146,000,000, when the fact is that two-thirds of that amount has been spent by the provinces instead of by the federal government. My hon. friends ought also to tell the people of the millions of dollars being withheld from the provinces because the government is not carrying out its obligations. I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that from now on we do not intend to allow that kind of bluff or make-believe to go in this country.

Complaints have been made from the government side of the house that no constructive suggestion has emanated from this side. I would remind hon. members that when the right hon. the Prime Minister was leader of the opposition he declared over and over again that the government must be responsible for any measures that were brought down, and particularly he emphasized that he did not intend to prescribe until he was called in. Well, he has been called in and he has been working at his job, but up to the present time his policy has been an utter failure so far as providing work for the unemployed in this country is concerned. Further, I would say with regard to constructive suggestions, that both last session and again this session I listened to the right hon. leader of the Liberal party state in this house that if his government had been returned to power he would have dealt with the unemployment situation in a more scientific way. He would have called in representatives of all those interested in the unemployment situation in Canada, the representatives of the provinces, of industry, commerce, labour and other interests, and surely out of such a conference there would have come, and could come yet if the government would only accept the suggestion, a far better and more equitable and more adequate policy than we have at the present time. So I hope, Mr. Speaker, that even yet the government will take that suggestion into consideration and call a conference of all those interested so that we may tackle this unemployment insurance question in a more scientific and more equitable way, and provide a more adequate system for taking care of the unemployed citizens of Canada.

Mr. L. E. PARENT (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in the debate on the government's resolution which endeavours to secure discretionary powers in order to draw funds from the treasury to relieve the unemployed, farmers and those who are suffering in this crisis which is world-wide and in which Canada has not been spared. I shall refer to the causes of the present situation in order to justify my opposition to this resolution. Experience has taught us that this act has had ruinous and inefficient results, and furthermore, this bill is ultra vires at its very face.

In July, 1930, the people of Canada were called to the polls to elect a government. The Liberal party retiring after four years of administration, four years of prosperity, but at the outset of the present world-wide crisis, was seeking from the people a renewal of their mandate. Realizing the difficult situation and the problems which the incoming government would have to face, the Liberal party moved for a commission to study the question of unemployment, in order to solve this crisis, find work for the unemployed and relieve those who were in distress.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), then leader of the opposition, and his followers, travelled throughout the country advocating a different policy and being very lavish with their pledges, charging the outgoing government of being responsible for the depression existing then. Thereby they undertook to find a remedy to the crisis and bring back prosperity to this country. They stated that the Liberal government was responsible for this unemployment because of its majority in parliament by which it enacted all measures necessary for the welfare of the country. The leader of the opposition, now the Prime Minister made very definite pledges as well as did hon. members on your right, sir, who now form the government, and on the faith of these specific pledges or promises, the people confided in the Conservative party so as to afford them an opportunity to fulfil these pledges.

What has the government done since then? What has happened since that date? Hardly more than a month after the election a special session is called so as to fulfil part of these promises and find work for the unemployed, for all who wished to work to make a living and for the farmers who were to leave their fields to seek elsewhere food for their family. Refusing to listen to the suggestion of the opposition to appoint a commission on unemployment, composed of experts in finance, industry, trade, agriculture and representatives of labour, in order to study the problem and take the necessary measures to meet the crisis which had spread over the country, the government purely and simply had $20,000,000 voted.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): That is an old story.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): It cannot too often be told.

The government had $20,000,000 voted though not assuming alone the responsibility of the distribution of this fund, but they made the provinces and municipalities partly bear this responsibility and forced them to contribute and share the burden which the Conservative party had assumed at election time.

In September, 1930, when a special session was called to deal with unemployment, there were but 117,000 people without work in this country, according to the Labour Gazette and the Dominion government statistics. Stress, must be, sir, laid on these figures. It was to relieve these 117,000 unemployed that $20,000,000 were voted, to which amount must be added $50,000,000 contributed jointly by the provinces and municipalities in a ratio which had been fixed according to circumstances which might develop, this meant an outlay of $70,000,000 to relieve the situation. Thus, $70,000,000 were expended in 1930-1931. With what result? With the disastrous result that on January 1, 1931, 62,500 people were added to the list of unemployed. The situation far from being relieved in the autumn of 1931, the number had increased to 350,000; 233,000 having been added to the September 1930 list, while millions of dollars were voted to relieve the unemployed. I trust that these gentlemen will take good note of these telling figures. The Prime Minister, in the course of the electoral campaign proclaimed throughout the country, on every public husting and by means of radio broadcasts, that should he be raised to power, he would take the necessary measures to find work for every one who desired to work, thus putting an end to unemployment. What faith can we repose today in his new pledges?

As a proof of my contention that this policy to relieve the unemployed was a failure, I shall quote a short news item which appeared in La Patrie on September 5, 1931, dated Ottawa, and published by the Canadian Press:

> The number of unemployed in Canada has increased to over 530,000, according to Mr. G. Robertson, Minister of Labour.

I think I have sufficiently established that the government's policy to relieve unemployment was a complete failure. Furthermore, to this failure must be added this exaggerated high tariff on over 200 items in connection with imports which inevitably resulted in reducing our foreign trade and the number of workmen in our factories. Owing to overproduction the manufacturers were unable to find markets for their products, while in previous years under a moderate tariff the Canadian manufacturers were able to sell abroad a great quantity of their goods, which necessarily gave work to a great number of people and provided a living for all. I shall refer later to this tariff question.

At the last session, in 1931, just before prorogation, after five months of deliberation, the government, by its majority, notwithstanding the protests of the opposition, forced through the house Bill No. 58, granting a blank cheque on the treasury, without furnishing details as provided by the statutes, and this, still with the intention of helping the unemployed, those in distress, the farmers in the west, and, to also maintain peace and good order.

What policy was followed by the government in 1931, in the expenditure of these millions of dollars in pursuance of its authority to sign a blank cheque? The government spent enormous sums, obliging the provincial governments and municipalities to contribute to these funds, hence affecting their credit, encumbering the budgets of the latter, forcing the country into debts by contracting heavy obligations, so that, to-day, the government finds it necessary to increase the ratepayers' taxes. What was the outcome of this policy? Statistics published in 1932, show us that since September, 1930, according to the figures quoted just now by the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), 334,000 unemployed were given work; representing 7,400,000 days of work, this amounts approximately to 22 days of work for each person, at a cost of $70,500,000, or about $10 per working day, during a period of six months. Is this satisfactory? No, if we consider that the unemployment problem has not been solved and that the purpose aimed at has not been achieved, since statistics prove that the number of unemployed is larger to-day than it was in September, 1930. The Labour Gazette in its issue of January, 1932, at page 69, states that the labour market has been quieter in factories, during 1931, than in other years since 1926. The following figures are quoted: 4,400 factories, in 1930, employed 525,000 workmen; in 1931, 4,670 factories employed only 467,711 people. This is the result of the failure of the exaggerated tariff policy of this government.

Let us now examine the assistance given to farmers in the west, for whose relief millions of dollars were voted. I do not intend to criticize this measure since the government has thought fit to have such enormous sums voted; it is quite evident that the government overlooked the poor farmers of the other provinces who are in distress. I think that the other provinces should have been consulted previous to the government pledging its credit for so many millions of dollars in order to assist part of the country only. It was a matter which affected the people's money as a whole, hence this procedure cannot be approved.

The resolution begs leave to introduce a bill to extend for two months the powers by which the government was given the famous blank cheque, thus allowing it to make the same outlays as in the past. This measure is contrary to the principle of our constitution and deprives parliament of its prerogative. It is our duty, as members, to oppose this unconstitutional measure which has no precedent in our parliamentary history. When this bill asking for a blank cheque was introduced, the government first stipulated that it would end with the fiscal year; it was, however, decided later to extend it to March 1, 1932, seeing that the session was to really begin this year one or two months before March 1. This afforded an opportunity to the government to introduce this bill at an earlier date than it did. Parliament has now been sitting since February 4. Has the right hon. Prime Minister not had sufficient time to introduce heretofore this measure to solve the unemployment problem and evolve means to meet the present crisis, instead of asking parliament to extend an act which has expired and by which no solution to the unemployment question was found?

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Will the hon. member allow me to put a question? Did your constituency request you to oppose this measure?

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Everybody is discontented.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): My answer to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Barrette) is that I was given a mandate as the hon. member was, and when I express such a view, I am certain of receiving the approval of my constituents. Anyhow, I take the whole responsibility.

The Prime Minister stated in Victoria B. C. during the election in July:

I shall call a session to give work and not dole.

I think, sir, that the Prime Minister must regret, to-day, his last words "and not dole" because he would probably have recourse to dole instead of work, especially after the experience of the outlay made in 1930 and 1931. To corroborate my statement, I shall quote figures which speak for themselves and over which, I hope, hon. members on the government side will ponder. According to the statistics relating to the work carried out in 1930-1931, to relieve unemployment, as agreed with the provinces, municipalities and railway companies, work was given to 334,000 persons, that is 7,400,000 days of work in round figures, this meant an expenditure of $70,570,000, of which $14,342,962 was provided by the Dominion government. During the same period 438,777 persons, either single or family supporters, received, I shall not say as dole, but as direct aid an amount of $7,000,000. We must bear this in mind.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Not too much.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): It is not any too much; as we shall see. These amounts included the contributions of the provinces and municipalities. Every unemployed to whom work was given therefore cost the country $210, while in the other case, direct assistance, the cost to the country for every person relieved was $16.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Was Taschereau opposed to this?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I am not called upon to discuss here provincial politics. When the opportunity comes, I shall invite the hon. member to discuss them.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): We shall be there.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): Any one, sir, who wishes to give himself the trouble can easily compare these figures and prove to his satisfaction that the assistance given through work cost the treasury fourteen times more than direct aid, for each person relieved.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Be serious.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I am absolutely so and I challenge the hon. member to deny these figures. Then, why not have brought down a measure substituting direct assistance instead of assistance through work, since we have to deal with an expenditure of millions of dollars, of enormous sums drawn from the treasury.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): What do you suggest?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): I have just mentioned it. If the hon. member did not catch my words, I would beg of him to listen more closely to my remarks. He will have an opportunity to read Hansard and he will then understand what I said.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): Cross over, you will hear better.

Mr. PARENT (Translation): May I request the hon. member to have the courage to rise and deliver a speech in his turn.

The country, sir, would be $55,000,000 less in debt, if the government had adopted the system of direct assistance to the unemployed. Are you aware how much the government would have economized? $5,000,000, per year, in interest on the amounts expended on unemployment. These figures are worthy of consideration and constitute a sufficient motive to oppose the present resolution.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Where do these figures come from?

Mr. PARENT (Translation): From statistics. I think I have sufficiently shown the grounds on which I base my views on this question. I shall close my remarks by asking that we all cooperate and have confidence, while we are passing through this difficult period. It is most encouraging to note that notwithstanding the critical stages through which all nations passed during this crisis, nothing happened to affect Canada's resources and dampen its faith in the future. Her lands, forests, mines, water powers and farms constitute an asset which is an assurance for the future and a stimulus to further effort. The skill shown by Canadians to utilize their resources has in no way diminished. In times of depression and distress, when the economic equilibrium is upset, it is a national duty to introduce measures to meet the existing conditions. A true appreciation of our national resources and the wealth which industry and labour can produce give rise to real confidence in the future, and this confidence must be the foundation of all improvement in our economic conditions. However, it behooves Parliament to pass laws which have no connection with radical measures, pull down tariff walls, substitute a moderate tariff and foreign trade treaties which will re-establish throughout the world the trade relations which were so advantageous to Canada during the last period, and which I think, is the only solution possible to the unemployment problem in Canada as well as abroad.

Mr. J. A. DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): I had not intended to take part in this debate as I wished to allow members of the legal profession the task of pondering over the constitutional aspect of the resolution under discussion. I had hoped that the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) would give us the benefit of his professional training but I fear that it will be denied to us. We should, however, rejoice in having been enlightened by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) who perhaps does not shine as brightly as the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Duranleau). At the risk of appearing discourteous towards the former, I shall state that his legal attainments seem rather dull compared with those of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe). I shall ask him to follow the advice which he ventured to give to the hon. member for Quebec East and further suggest that he send a copy of his speech to the Prime Minister of Quebec, who will not need a great effort of mind to perceive the difference between the two speeches.

The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency was entirely outside of the subject discussed and alluded to a certain measure adopted by the Quebec legislature and which, I think, did not please our Conservative friends of that province: the famous Dillon Act.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is certainly famous.

Mr. DENIS (Tranlsation): I shall say to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency that this legislation was enacted to redeem the honour of the province of Quebec, attacked and outraged by a mountebank using the election funds, the source of which is as well known by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency as that of Beauharnois. The hon. member has no right to insinuate that the Liberals of Quebec stole the election in the last provincial campaign. His charge is absolutely false and untrue. He has neither the right to insult the people of Quebec by insinuating that they were bought.

Mr. DORION (Translation): They were robbed, it is quite a different story.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): The hon. member has no right to insult his fellow citizens of Quebec.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency contends that the hon. member for St. Denis is reading his speech.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): No, I have simply some notes.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): You are not consistent.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It is preferable to what you do, as you never read.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is better not to open one's mouth than to say stupidities.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): It is redeeming the honour of Quebec to pass an act in protest against such an outrage to the respectability of the citizens of that province.

I shall be brief, sir, in my remarks to the house in connection with the resolution under discussion. This resolution aims at amending the act passed at the last session, granting the government the right to expend millions of dollars to relieve the unemployed without having to submit the amount to parliament for its approval.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Do your constituents protest?

Mr. DENIS (Translation): They are opposed to the means which the government has recourse to obtain these funds.

Mr. SPEAKER: Members have no right to interject remarks while an honourable member is speaking.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): My constituents are proud—

Mr. DORION (Translation): Of their representative.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Yes, my constituents are proud of their representative, they rejoice in a constitutional and representative government—

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Such as ours.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): —and they are glad to know that we shall vote against a resolution which would deprive their member of all his responsibilities and prerogatives, a resolution which is introduced by an autocratic government such as we have at present at the helm of the affairs of this country. I therefore am opposed to this resolution asking that this act which expired on March 1 be extended to May 1, because it is unconstitutional and because the Prime Minister has no right after the expiration of an act to request an extension of time for the operation of the statute.

I wonder what the government has done to fulfil its pledges to the Canadian people, that they would solve the question of unemployment in three days, bring back prosperity to the farmers by giving them the opportunity of selling their products at better prices, open up new markets for the sale of manufactured goods? Let us set aside, for a moment, the last two pledges just mentioned to refer only to unemployment. Let us examine what the government has done to solve this serious problem.

At the special session of September, 1930, the government had $20,000,000 voted to relieve the unemployed. From this amount it authorized the outlay of $17,372,848; however, we note that, in the estimates of that year, the government reduced by $10,515,210.32 the sums voted to carry out certain works. It is therefore not $17,000,000 which the government expended to help the unemployed but simply the difference between $17,000,000 and $10,000,000, namely, about $7,000,000. This measure was evidently introduced for the purpose of deceiving the unemployed, in having them believe that the government was giving them much assistance when, in truth, they were doing very little for them.

In the city of Montreal, where the unemployed were quite numerous, the work intended to relieve those people during the rigorous season of winter, only began in February, 1931, and terminated in October, 1931. I wonder if the unemployed of Montreal feel very pleased with a government which was to give them the means of earning the food which they and their family needed, and which, on the contrary, occasioned much suffering by neglecting to give them work when their family was in distress.

Last session, contrary to parliamentary traditions and to the principle of self-government, the cabinet was given a blank cheque to relieve the unemployed, and it authorized the outlay of $32,822,847, of which half has not yet been expended. On the other hand, we find in the estimates of that year a reduction of $25,000,000 in the votes for public works; if this amount is deducted from that drawn by virtue of the blank cheque given to the government there only remains a sum of $7,500,000 to relieve unemployment.

The city of Montreal, which I have the honour to represent was granted a sum $4,800,000, of which the Dominion government's quota was $1,200,000. Are you aware, sir, when the work intended to relieve unemployment started? It was only started at the beginning of February. At the present time half of the work has not been started and our poor unemployed had to endure great hardships throughout the winter, while expecting the relief intended for them, pursuant to the legislation enacted in the course of last session. Considering how this money was distributed, I wonder whether we have not the right to exact from the government instead of asking the house an extension of the extraordinary and unconstitutional powers that the majority in the house granted them, that they introduce a bill specifying the necessary amounts they need to relieve unemployment.

The government should also oblige municipalities to carry out the work intended to aid the unemployed within a reasonable delay so as to be a real help to the latter. I do not wish to criticize the government more than it is necessary, but it is their duty to see that those in charge of the work in Montreal expend the money allotted to them during the winter season, instead of in summer, when the unemployed can better look after themselves.

Notwithstanding the formal pledge given to the house by the government that these funds would be distributed without favouritism, I charge the civic authorities of Montreal with having distributed the money to benefit their political friends, and I repeat the charges which were made before the municipal council of Montreal by the official representative of this government.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): Please, confine your remarks to federal politics.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall close my remarks. .. ..

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): It is time.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Considering the actual state of affairs in this country and the further spread of this economic crisis, I repeat to the government that they have lost the Canadian people's confidence and neglected their duty; out of the funds that we thought were spent to help the unemployed, one third only has reached them while two thirds were pocketed by a few profiteers, friends of the government. As profiteers, these people have not their equal.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Name them.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): They always took advantage of crises to amass wealth. We still recall those who profited by the war, and we shall not forget those who, during this economic crisis, after pledging themeslves in order to win the election, did not, as promised, relieve the distress in three days, improve the lot of our farmers, develop, through treaties, our foreign trade and bring back prosperity by utilizing the national and great resources which Canada possesses. This government through its high protective policy, has considerably restricted our foreign trade, and because of this policy the surplus of our factories remains in storage and is destined to remain there as long as this government is not ousted.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): In forty years from now.

Mr. DENIS (Translation): Owing to this government being so unpopular, I think, for their own sake, they should appeal to the people and request the latter to renew their mandate which they juggled out of them by their false pledges. The government should not persist in following this policy which, instead of solving the serious problem which faces us, complicates it the more. Instead of persisting in this policy which ruins and bankrupts the country, the government's duty is to appeal to the Canadian people, and I feel sure that, the latter having found out the error they made in 1930, will again repose their confidence in the Liberal government, their old servants, who will lead, as they did between 1921 and 1930, the country in the path of prosperity.

Mr. J. L. DUGUAY (Lake St. John) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate, I have no intention of destroying the hopes of the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), however, I received this morning from the municipal council of St. Joseph d'Alma, where I reside, a resolution which reads as follows:

That this council deem it their duty to earnestly request, on behalf of the public interest, that a new agreement or arrangement be made between the government at Ottawa and the Quebec government in order that an additional sum be allotted to continue the work begun and carried on this winter on the Quebec-Lake-St.-John road, in the Laurentian Park, from now on to July 1, 1932, with a gang of 500 men.

I also received a telegram which reads as follows:

Further grant not forthcoming previous to extension of the Unemployment Relief Act. Situation critical for Jonquière. Insist to have bill passed as soon as possible. Acknowledge telegram immediately.

I have read to the house these two documents not with the idea of championing the Conservative policy, or attempting to show that political interest alone actuates the members of the opposition, but simply to find out the reason of the attitude of those members who rise at all times to speak not in the public interest, but simply to foster their own political purposes. These gentlemen in the opposition contend that they are the champions of self-government and the constitution; after having endeavoured to destroy it in 1926, we hear them, to-day, exclaim on behalf of the constitution: You cannot enact this measure to relieve the unemployed.

I am made to realize, sir, the importance of the people's representatives in this house, by the interest which the unemployed, in my county and district, take in our proceedings. We should not consider the question under discussion from the viewpoint of politics and we should not debate the question with the idea of gaining some political advantage. Yet, the opposition, to-day, impugn the constitution and smile benevolently to all that flavours of communism in our province and throughout Canada, because they hope by these to attain power. They endeavour to prove to the people that they are in good faith! If hon. members in the opposition were in earnest in their contentions, if they were sincere in the statement of their wrongs—especially the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) who seeks to be looked upon in Quebec as the champion of his country—if they were in earnest in their aspirations, they would not have thought fit to so strongly oppose the measure which is before the house, they would not discuss endlessly this problem. I am convinced that to-day the electorate of Quebec take these gentlemen at their worth and will do so in the future.

In the interest of the unemployed, in the interest of those who seek bread for their families, this bill must be immediately adopted; and the longer the opposition delays its enactment, the longer the people of Quebec will remain in need, and they will not forget it at the next election.

Mr. BARRETTE (Translation): The longer the Liberals will remain in the opposition.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I do not intend to take more than a few minutes discussing this question, but I believe that the people whom I represent in this house will expect me, on a resolution of such importance, affecting as it does the very foundations of our governmental institutions, to express my views. In a recent debate in this house some of us, including myself, were accused of not giving full credit to the government for what they have done in the way of meeting the unemployment situation during the past year. We are prepared to give the government full credit for all they have done, and we realize that they have had a gigantic task on their hands. That, however, does not prevent us from voicing criticism when we realize that mistakes have been made.

I am fully aware of the conditions that exist in the province of Saskatchewan. Last summer I had an opportunity of driving through about 150 miles of territory where not a spear of anything was to be seen growing, except Russian thistles, and in all that territory the only machines I saw employed were two machines which were cutting Russian thistle. The conditions were terrible and it was necessary for the government to do a good deal towards relieving the situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), told us a few days ago that 300,000 people had been given relief in Saskatchewan. That, I believe, is true and we give the government credit for what they have done in this regard. The thing we object to is this, that in the session of 1930, there was enacted such legislation as rendered this relief necessary to the extent to which it was given. Let me explain what I mean. Had we a market in Saskatchewan for our beef, pork, mutton, wool, butter, eggs, poultry and such other produce as we have on our farms, this unemployment relief would have been in large measure unnecessary. Our British preference in 1930 was wiped out. We have practically no market for anything we have to sell, and outside of a few municipalities, where there was absolutely nothing, around the borders of that area in the province of Saskatchewan there was plenty of feed available, so that if the farmers had a proper market they would not have found it necessary, at least to the extent they did, to look for assistance.

Probably the Prime Minister is not as conversant as some of the rest of us with the conditions that existed in Saskatchewan during former depressions. I remember two or three other periods in which we had crop failures with consequent depression in that province. The Prime Minister mentioned the fact that no noise was made on this occasion. In 1914 there was a failure throughout the greater part of western Saskatchewan and relief was given, but no noise was made about it. Nor were the provinces and the municipalities bankrupt through the relief they extended. In 1919-20 it was necessary, in the part of the country from which I come, to give a good deal of relief, and again it was given without much noise. It was handed out through the municipality and handled very effectively. No noise was made about it.

We do feel that although the government have done a great deal in the way of affording relief, criticism is due for the very reason that the Prime Minister gave in his address on March 8, when he told us of the money that had been spent and the number of days' work that had been provided. But as my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) pointed out last night, it represented something over $10 for every day's work. The people are wondering why when such large sums of money were expended they received such meagre wages for the work they performed. Had the government adopted a reasonable policy we believe this situation could have been handled much easier. The high tariff legislation passed at the special session of 1930 has kept us out of the markets of the world and it has also kept up the prices of the products which the farmer is compelled to buy. During that session the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) gave the number of unemployed by provinces, and I quote from page 63 of Hansard as follows:

> I find that at present in the province of Alberta there are 5,155 unemployed; during the winter it is contemplated that that number will reach 6,650. In British Columbia at the present time the unemployed number 7,692 and it is expected that during the winter that number will increase to 14,700. In the province of Saskatchewan the present number given is 5,276 and it is expected to rise during the winter to 8,201. In Manitoba the figure is now 6,950, with a possible 9,600 in the winter. In Ontario the figure is given as 49,367, rising to 82,214. In Quebec the present number is 41,190, as against an anticipated number of 49,290. In New Brunswick the present number is 500 and it is expected it may reach 2,850. In Nova Scotia the present number is 1,800 and it may rise to 2,350.

At that time there was a total of 117,930 unemployed and it was anticipated that by winter that number would increase to 175,855. As is recorded on page 64 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

> If the measures which we submit to this house are productive of the good which we anticipate, we hope that that number will steadily decrease, rather than increase.

As everyone knows, that number has not decreased. From the best information obtainable I believe that the number of unemployed to-day is three times the number given for September, 1930, and double the anticipated number for the following winter. This proves that the measures submitted at that time by the government have not been productive of the good anticipated and that the hopes of the Prime Minister have not been fulfilled with regard to what his legislation was going to do.

Why does not the government come to this house and say: Our legislation has been a failure. It should adopt the suggestion made the other day by my right hon. leader and try some other way of handling the unemployment question. It is quite evident to everyone that the measures adopted have been a failure and the very words of the Prime Minister admit that it has been a failure. We tried to make it clear, even as far back as September, 1930, that these measures in connection with the increase in tariff and abolishing the British preference could not be effective in relieving unemployment. The whole trouble with the government seems to be that it has a leader who is too autocratic in his manner. Why does he not admit that sometimes he may be mistaken? That is one of his defects; he will never admit that it is possible for him to make a mistake and he seems to have a following ready to believe likewise.

This government should face the facts with regard to trade conditions. It should realize what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sutherland) is reported in the newspapers as having said in Sarnia, to the effect that Canada's productive capacity is so far in excess of our needs as consumers that we must find a market abroad. Such a market can be obtained only by the exchange of goods with other countries. There is one fact which the government so far has not realized, and that is that the wheat crop of western Canada is the greatest single source of purchasing power there is in this country. That was the reason why we supported the Dunning budget of 1930; we realized that if Canada was going to continue to be fairly prosperous, as she had been for a number of years, it was necessary that something be done to assist the wheat growers of western Canada. Mr. Dunning stated something to that effect when making his budget speech. We believe to-day that had the Dunning budget been adopted we would have had a market in the old country for our surplus products. We have not much wheat but we have many other products to sell. We believe that had that budget been adopted it would have gone a long way toward relieving unemployment and it would not have been necessary to spend the immense amounts of money which have been expended during the last year or two.

Hon. friends opposite are fond of referring to the fact that during the Liberal administration some 700,000 immigrants entered this country, and they give that as one of the causes of unemployment. I never was a strong advocate of immigration, but I say to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) that he would find it interesting to compare the speeches he made three or four years ago with what he said only a few nights ago. We remember that a few years ago he said that Canada should be the Mecca for all the over-populated countries of the world, and I think he repeated that thought on more than one occasion. Now he is trying to condemn the former government for bringing in some 700,000 people in the last five years. He also referred to the fact that General McRae, who was then a member of the house, made on two occasions in 1928 and 1929, interesting addresses in this chamber regarding a great colonization scheme, and he said that that gentleman was then expressing only his own opinion, being a private member. I took the trouble to look up Hansard of 1928, and on page 21 I find that the present leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Bennett) in no uncertain language expressed his views on the question of immigration. This is what he said:

> It is true that immigration is by all odds the most important question that can engage the attention of this house or of this parliament.

Further on he said:

> It is high time that something be done to put the power of parliament unitedly behind an effort to bring people over and settle them in this country. We cannot continue as we are and maintain our present position very long. It is essentially important that we should induce more settlers to come to this country. I have pointed out this before, and I repeat it now.

Then as reported on page 22 of Hansard of the same year, the right hon. gentleman said:

> Now, sir, this question transcends party; it is larger than the lives of parties because it strikes at the very life of this dominion. We must have settlers. We have in Canada facilities to take care of an additional population of from 15,000,000 to 17,000,000 people; we have 10,000,000 acres of untouched land within twenty miles of the railways; we have the Peace River area and other portions of the country which are lying idle while the government is expressing pious hopes as to what will happen. I say the time has come when action must be taken.
> It cannot be done in any small way; it cannot be accomplished in any niggardly way, but it must be done in a large way.

That is the leader of the Conservative party, the present Prime Minister speaking in 1928 as recorded in Hansard. What would have happened, I wonder, had the wishes of the right hon. gentleman been given effect at that time, and we had brought in not 15,000,000, but even the tenth part of 15,000,000? What would have happened if we had brought in 1,500,000 people when we have so many unemployed to-day? I am rather inclined very often to discount the words of the Prime Minister, and that is why I suggest taking just the tenth part of what he said and trying to realize what it would have meant.

As I have said, the policies that are adopted by the government have proved a failure in dealing with the question of unemployment. In conclusion, let me say this: that the so-called success of the government in dealing with the unemployment problem reminds me very forcibly of the man who said that for the last year he had eaten corn flakes every morning for breakfast and had taken corn syrup on his pancakes, but still his corns were no better than they were a year ago.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the resolution that we are now discussing proposes to put into the hands of the government, that is of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the power, without any reference to parliament, not only to spend all moneys necessary in the relief of unemployment and of farm distress, but also to take what steps he may deem requisite in respect of matters affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, and that at a time when we, the elected representatives of the people, are here willing to perform the duty which properly devolves upon us. As we on this side of the house understand the matter, the granting of such power would mean the surrender of all our rights and privileges, of all the duties and obligations which rest upon us as members of parliament. Indeed, it must be evident to hon. members opposite that such would be the case, and I believe the Prime Minister must also realize this.

If legislation is passed, based upon this resolution, we might just as well, as has been pointed out already, prorogue parliament. We shall have handed over to the Prime Minister complete power to deal with anything in any manner he sees fit, without any limitation, whatever. My disposition in dealing with all matters involving constitution and procedure is to take a somewhat liberal attitude. I say that in the ordinary application of the term. While I am not unwilling to learn from the wisdom and experience of our forefathers, precedents are valuable to me only as they indicate a course that experience has shown to be sound. They ought not to be as chains to bind us, nor should they impose upon us obligations to follow a course that common sense would reject. Because judges have given certain decisions in the past and have based them upon certain principles, is no reason to my mind why judges down through all time should give similar judgments. The men who are willing to abolish old precedents and to establish new ones are, after all, the men upon whom we have to depend for everything in the way of progress in human affairs.

Having said that, having indicated my general attitude in regard to matters of constitution and precedent, I wish to say that when the Prime Minister a year ago brought down his bill, that it is now proposed to revive, I did not feel as strongly opposed to it as did the majority of the members on this side. I was prepared to recognize that the situation was somewhat unusual; that new conditions had arisen. I was ready to recognize that as regards the money feature of the bill, it would be difficult to give even an approximate estimate of the amount that would be required. Therefore, while entertaining very serious doubts as to the wisdom of granting such power, I felt that something might be said for the procedure advocated. I was not completely convinced by the arguments advanced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he dealt with the section of the bill relating to questions of peace, order and good government; yet I was willing to admit that perhaps there was some force to them. In that I may have been all wrong; perhaps I was, and I am willing to confess that in that respect I might have been. But —and I want to say that "but" with all the emphasis the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) attaches to it when he is arguing his case—the circumstances that confront us to-day are very different from those of a year ago, very different from what they were last session. Then we were just at the close of a session of parliament; parliament was just about to prorogue, in all probability not to meet for six months. It might have been pleaded on behalf of the government at that time that they were facing new conditions; that an unusual situation had arisen; that they had no precedents to guide them and that we would simply have to trust them under the circumstances to do the best they could.

But that is not the situation to-day; parliament is in session. We have been in session only a short time, only five weeks, and there is every probability that we shall still be in session when the first of May arrives, the limit that is set for the continuance of this law that it is proposed to revive. A very different situation prevails to-day. We have had no opportunity to study thoroughly the report in regard to the operation of the act which has been tabled by the government. Under all these circumstances are we not justified in asking, why this legislation? It has already been pointed out that the Prime Minister has given no reason why he is asking for a continuance of these powers. The Prime Minister has asserted again and again that only by being granted these powers could he effectually deal with the many complex questions with which he was confronted. Indeed, he has admitted that there are very good reasons why these powers should not be granted. He says that he sympathizes with those on this side of the house in the arguments which they have advanced. He has admitted that their reasons have weight. Indeed his own words are:

> I am reluctant in a constitutional sense to ask for a continuance of these powers.

No one realizes better than the Prime Minister himself that in asking for these powers he is doing violence to the constitution and departing from all established precedents, but he does not cast the constitutional question aside in the same free and easy manner as some of his supporters do. He knows that a serious question is here involved. He knows that he is making a serious demand upon this parliament when he asks for these powers. Under those circumstances is it not all the more incumbent on the Prime Minister that he should tell us why he is asking for these powers?

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I am not a stickler when it comes to matters of precedent and the constitution. I do not like to be bound by the dead hand of the past, and I am willing to cast precedents aside if they interfere with our doing what we think is the right thing to be done. But when we are asked to do violence to the constitution of this country and to depart from the precedents which have been handed down to us and which the experience of the past has shown to be sound, surely we are not unreasonable when we ask the Prime Minister to tell us why we should make such a departure.

The confidence which the Prime Minister has in himself is amazing. Undoubtedly self-confidence is a good quality in men, and it is a good thing for a man to have a high opinion of himself. Unless a man has some respect for himself and some self-confidence he is not going to get very far in this world, but after all, most of the vices which afflict men are simply their virtues carried to an extreme, and that would seem to be the case with the Prime Minister. As he is fond of scriptural allusions I might remind him of the saying that we should not think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. Surely, Mr. Speaker, we may be forgiven if we have not that complete and perfect confidence in the Prime Minister which he has in himself and which evidently many of his followers share. Surely it is not consonant with the dignity of parliament that we should be asked to submit to the treatment that is now being meted out to us. Yet I suppose that the majority of the supporters of the government will fold their hands and quite tamely submit, and say:

> Ours not to make reply,
> Ours not to reason why,
> Ours but to echo "aye,"—

when the Prime Minister speaks.

The Prime Minister further says, on page 993 of Hansard:

> —and I will welcome any suggestion that others may offer towards the solution of the problem —I know of no way, except by this method, whereby we can assist the provinces and supplement the work they have to undertake.

I will welcome any suggestions, says the Prime Minister. What do those words mean? In the mouth of the Prime Minister they mean absolutely nothing. When he says that he will welcome any suggestions he is probably honest with himself, but he is so constituted that while he may think that he is welcoming the suggestions of others he is actually putting them completely aside, and acting according to his own free will. What about the suggestion which has been made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), a suggestion which I think I may safely say is concurred in by every member on this side of the house, and, if hon. gentlemen opposite would only speak their minds, is recognized, I believe, by them too as a reasonable suggestion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BROWN: Well, let us see what is the suggestion. It is that the government should bring down a supply bill appropriating the necessary amount to meet the exigencies of the case, and that out of the money thus granted by parliament the government shall spend whatever is necessary to meet the needs as they arise between now and the first of May. Coupled with that suggestion was the assurance by the leader of the opposition that such a supply bill would pass without any opposition from this side of the house. That was a reasonable suggestion surely. Why was it not accepted? That is the question I want to ask of the Prime Minister. Why is not that suggestion accepted? The Prime Minister has not told us. He has simply brushed the suggestion aside. What does he say? At page 991 of Hansard he says:

> Now, so far as a supply bill is concerned, I think it is fairly obvious to those who have followed me that to ask for any particular sum of money at this time in the form of a supply bill, with the usual limitations that are imposed upon such measures, would not meet the situation. In our judgment at any rate, having regard to our experience, it would not.

He says it is perfectly obvious that a bill of this kind would not meet the situation. Well, I must confess that it is not perfectly obvious to me. That may be my fault. It may be because I am a little dull in the uptake, but I would ask the Prime Minister to have patience with those of us who are not trained in the legal profession, who perhaps have just ordinary minds that cannot grasp in a moment all the nice points involved in a discussion nor appreciate as quickly as does the Prime Minister the subtleties of an argument. I would ask him to have a little patience with us and try to explain to us why what is so perfectly obvious to him should not seem reasonable to us. He speaks of a supply bill with its usual limitations. Really it is amusing to hear the Prime Minister talk of limitations. When have we known the Prime Minister to recognize any limitations when he wanted to do anything? Yet, when it suits him, he pleads that the granting of money through a supply bill, because of limitations which attach to it—whatever they are—would prevent him affording relief to the distressed unemployed and the farmers he desires to help. In September, 1930, we passed a bill granting the Prime Minister $20,000,000. Under the terms of that act he was permitted to use the money in any way he saw fit up until the month of March, 1931. Well, why can he not do that now? If we could pass that bill at that time why cannot we pass a bill now to give him whatever money he needs until the first of May? The Prime Minister may say that there is a perfectly obvious difference between the two cases, but if there is any difference certainly it is all in favour of the suggestion made by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

It must be evident to hon. members that it is not the way in which the money is to be obtained which constitutes the reason the Prime Minister rejects this suggestion. There must be some other reason, and we can only conclude that it is because he desires to retain the power to amend laws, modify laws, abrogate old laws and institute new laws at his own sweet will. A few evenings ago we listened to a very interesting and entertaining address from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). When that rapid-firing gun gets into action we are always interested, whether or not he brings down any game.

An hon. MEMBER: I think he did.

Mr. BROWN: We always like to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals, although at times he makes us laugh—at least, we would laugh if the matter were not so serious. It was rather interesting to hear the Minister of Railways and Canals plead with hon. members on this side of the house to cooperate with the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to understand the meaning of the word "cooperation."

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. member understood it, all right.

Mr. BROWN: Yes, and I am glad I did.

Mr. COTNAM: That was a long time ago.

Mr. BROWN: I certainly did understand it, and it is because I understand the meaning of the term "cooperation" that I am trying to explain it to hon. gentlemen opposite. I am glad I am recognized by them as an authority on the subject, and for that reason I proceed with greater confidence. The Prime Minister does not want cooperation, as we understand it. He wants obedience, he wants submission, he want us to say "aye" when he says "aye" and to say "nay" when he says "nay." If all that happens the Prime Minister will be quite satisfied with the cooperation we give him, but he will be satisfied with nothing else.

What does cooperation mean? It simply means working together. How can we work together, how can any two persons work together unless each is ready at least to some extent to compromise, to defer to the opinions of the other.

Mr. COTNAM: That is what we want you to do.

Mr. BROWN: No, that is not what you want us to do, at all. You want us to do all the deferring, and you want to do none. You want us to do all the compromising and sacrificing, yet you do not want to compromise or sacrifice. That is the kind of cooperation hon. gentlemen opposite want. There can be no cooperation on a basis of that kind. As I have said, cooperation means working together, and if we are to work together there must be a willingness to compromise and to defer to other opinions.

I want to ask if any hon. member has noticed any spirit of cooperation in the attitude of the Prime Minister. If he wishes to cooperate he must at least to some extent take us into his confidence, he must tell us about those emergent situations which he expects will arise, and to meet which he will need to exercise the arbitrary powers he asks. Perhaps he will say, "But I cannot do that in public." Well, he might at least do what Sir Robert Borden did at a critical period during the war when parliament was called to meet behind closed doors. If the situation is as bad as the Prime Minister indicates, that course might be taken.

Mr. PRICE: You are away out.

Mr. BROWN: People of Canada are beginning to ask whether we are being governed by a parliamentary system of government, or whether parliamentary government has become a fiction and we are now under an autocracy. Perhaps I am wrong when I say people are beginning to ask the question; I think they have already satisfied themselves that this government has become an autocracy. History affords us examples of puppet kings. Evidently it is the desire of the Prime Minister to make this a puppet parliament—and, I am sorry to say, at least in some measure he has accomplished his purpose.

During the remainder of the time at my disposal I purpose further to consider some matters I wished to bring before the house a few days ago when I requested the privilege of moving the adjournment of the house. I wish to give an illustration of the manner in which some of these very urgent questions are dealt with by the present government. Of course, we do not expect the government to act with the speed indicated by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who said, in the city of Winnipeg, that within three days the Conservative party could set in motion machinery whereby unemployment would be cured. Although I am not using his exact words, I believe I am interpreting them correctly.

I shall have time to deal with only one case. Last August I, along with other hon. members, received a communication from the director of unemployment relief at Ottawa asking us to give suggestions as to what work might be done. I made a tour of my constituency, coming into contact with the mayors, reeves or councillors of practically all the municipalities. In the course of that tour a certain situation was brought to my notice. It so happens that in a section of my constituency adjacent to the international boundary line there had been, in addition to drought, a very destructive hail storm. Consequently in that vicinity there was very little feed. Immediately across the border line from that point there are some hay marshes. Some of our own people had gone across the line to put up hay, of which a quantity was available at moderate prices. Those Canadians however were unable to bring in the hay because in response to demands of some of our friends from southern Alberta the duty on hay had been raised to $5 per ton. That was an impassable barrier between the hay and the starving live stock. So immediately I wrote to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) and on August 31 I got this reply:

Dear Sir,—

Your letter of the 27th instant requesting free entry of hay for the use of farmers in your constituency has been received in Mr. Ryckman's absence in Europe.

As the minister will not return to Ottawa for some weeks, I have referred your request to the commissioner of customs for such action as the department may be able to take in the matter.

On September 2nd I received this letter from the private secretary to the minister:

Dear Mr. Brown,—

On my return from vacation and in the continued absence of the minister, who is in Europe, I find your letter of August 27th awaiting answer.

I note what you say as to the shortage of hay for feeding purposes in your district and the information which you supply with regard to the possibility of securing some just across the international border.

In these matters, we act on the advice of the Department of Agriculture and I am, therefore, communicating to-day with the Hon. Robert Weir in this regard.

I thought at the time, perhaps foolishly, that the matter would be taken in hand immediately by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) and that in due course a satisfactory solution would be reached. However, as the months went by and nothing was done, on December 15 I wrote directly to the Minister of Agriculture. On December 31 I got this letter from him in reply:

I regret very much my delay in answering your letter of 15th December.

I put the subject matter of your letter before the Minister of National Revenue.

Passing the buck from one to the other.

Thanking you for bringing this to my attention.

But before I received this answer from the minister I got further word from the district affected that conditions were very serious, and consequently I wrote the following letter to the Prime Minister:

Dear Sir,—

I wish to call your attention to the very serious condition in regard to feed for live stock that prevails in one section of my constituency.

This district in question lies close to the international boundary and suffered very severely, both from hail and drought. The consequence is that there is not sufficient feed to see the stock through the winter. Indeed, I am informed that in some cases the supply is already exhausted.

Now, it happens that just across the line in the state of Dakota there are some large hay marshes. Some of our people went over there and put up hay for themselves and there is besides a considerable quantity available at a reasonable price. The $5 a ton duty, however, interposes an impassable barrier between the hay and the starving live stock.

I wrote the Minister of National Revenue some months ago recommending that this hay be admitted free of duty. The reply I got was that in such matters they were governed by the advice of the Minister of Agriculture. I thought that the matter would be turned over at once to the Minister of Agriculture but, finding that that had not been done,—

I made a mistake there, because evidently it was turned over to the Minister of Agriculture.

—I wrote the minister himself. Since writing him I have had further word that the situation is very serious and I am, therefore, giving you the information that I have already given two of your ministers.

There is no other feed available except what might be shipped in by railway and that would of necessity carry a high price.

Some of our people have wood that they would gladly exchange with their American neighbours for hay but they have no money to pay the duty.

I hope that this matter will receive your immediate attention and that you can see your way clear to have the customs officers at Snowflake and Windygates instructed to allow this hay in free of duty.

The Prime Minister very promptly replied to that by the following telegram just as he was leaving Ottawa for Calgary:

Your letter 23. Please write me Calgary names and quantity hay to be imported so that I may instruct action to be taken which can only be done by specific reference to transactions by individual importers. Seasons greetings and best wishes.

When I got that telegram I doubted whether it was necessary to give the detailed information for which he asked. However, I did not want to argue this, so in my reply to him I never mentioned that I had reason to doubt the necessity for such details because I knew action such as I had suggested had been taken two years ago. I informed him that the district affected was forty miles from my home and I was not in a position to give him the required information, but I would make a point of visiting the territory as soon as possible and would write him giving the particulars. About a week later I met there a large number of farmers from three townships, 1-7W, 1-8W and 1-9W. As the meeting was held in township 1-7W the majority of those in attendance were from the locality. Twenty-eight farmers of township 1-7W required 100 tons of hay and 48 tons of straw; fourteen farmers of township 1-8W required 44 tons of hay and 46 tons of straw; township 1-9W was some distance away from the meeting place and only three farmers from that township were in attendance. They required 8 tons of hay. The farmers of township 1-7W and 1-8W also required 2,750 bushels of seed wheat, 2,850 bushels of seed oats and 2,300 bushels of seed barley, as well as 6,000 bushels of feed oats. They indicated there was wheat enough in the district to meet their requirements, but all the oats and barley would have to be brought in. That information I forwarded to the Prime Minister in Ottawa early in January. Before leaving home for the session I made inquiries and found nothing had been done to bring relief to these people. When I reached Ottawa I immediately called on the department interested and found that on the 4th of February an order in council had been passed—a general order not requiring the details the Prime Minister had asked from me. I will quote only a couple of paragraphs:

> The undersigned, therefore, in order to mitigate the loss and damage above referred to, deems it right and conducive to the public good to recommend that authority be granted for the refund or remission of customs duty and taxes paid or ordinarily payable upon hay imported for feeding purposes into districts where the feed shortage referred to above exists and entered at customs between the 16th November, 1931, and the 30th April, 1932, both dates inclusive.

Here is the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the house:

> A similar situation was dealt with by council in 1930, and order in council P.C. 55/253 of the 5th February of that year, authorized the refund or remission of customs duty payable upon straw imported for feeding purposes into districts where a shortage existed between 1st November, 1929, and the 30th April, 1930.

[Mr. Brown.]

When I wrote the Prime Minister I had reason to know the facts of the case, because it was I who was responsible for having that original order passed. It was in connection with the same district as a matter of fact. I found such conditions prevailing there that I brought the matter immediately to the notice of the executive of the United Farmers of Manitoba, and they promptly got in touch with the Hon. Mr. Crerar, who was then in Winnipeg. He was back in Ottawa in a few days, and a day or two later the order in council referred to was passed. It was all done inside two or three weeks. It took this government almost six months to accomplish the same results.

An hon. MEMBER: Was it done?

Mr. BROWN: Yes, I must say I understand the result was satisfactory, but when cattle are starving time is the most important factor. I have had communication with the department, also with the officials in Winnipeg, but up to date I have had no satisfactory information as to exactly what took place in the correspondence between the two governments. I have called for the correspondence but it has not yet been brought down. I see it has been brought down in the Manitoba legislature, but so far we have had only newspaper reports and I have not had time to examine it. At present, therefore, we are in the dark. I do say that whatever the government does in the future it has been woefully negligent in the past in taking action at the opportune moment when, as I have said, time is one of the most important factors.

I shall not have time to go further into this question to-day. I may be able to do so on some future occasion, but reverting to the subject I was discussing in the first place, I would direct attention to the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor), who pointed out, in opposing this resolution, that we have been given no indication of the government's purpose. They ask us to grant them certain powers up to the first of May. But what after the first of May? Surely it is treating us without that consideration which is due to members of parliament who have been chosen by their constituents to represent them here. Our constituents may have been wrong in sending us here, but they have sent us and we wish to do the best we can to protect their interests. We wish to be treated with the dignity with which men who have been placed in this position should be treated. And it is not treating us with dignity when the Prime Minister, representing the government, comes before us and says, "We wish to have these powers extended up to the first of May," giving us no indication of what is in his mind, of what he proposes to do after that date, but simply asking us to take a leap in the dark. His attitude reminds us of that rhyme we heard when we were children: "Open your mouth and shut your eyes and I'll give you something to make you wise."

Mr. J. L. BARIBEAU (Champlain) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, there is so much obstruction, on the part of the opposition, to this measure aiming at amending chapter 58 of the Statutes of Canada, 1931, by striking out the word "March" in clause 8, to replace it by "May", a bill aiming at extending to May the operation of the Unemployment Relief Act, that I deem it my duty to rise and speak in favour of this resolution. I think that those opposing the bill would not feel so much at ease in discussing this measure in their respective constituencies, because the voting of this resolution introduced by the right hon. Prime Minister is anxiously sought by all citizens of Canada.

I am speaking on behalf of the great majority of my constituents, which I have the honour to represent, when I request the government to extend the period in which relief will be given to the unemployed. I received within the last days, a telephone message from the mayor of Grand'Mère, asking me to take the necessary steps to get the Act extended. The mayor of Grand'Mère who is highly thought of by his fellow citizens, does not share my political views. I am certain that he does not approve of the numerous speeches delivered by the representatives of his party, on this question.

I also had the occasion, in the course of last week of meeting the mayor of the town of Cap-de-la-Madeleine, and on behalf of his fellow citizens he asked me to do my very best to have the government continue the relief of the unemployed in his town.

May I, sir, point out that the towns of Grand'Mère and Cap-de-la-Madeleine are the most important centres in my county.

I also deem it my duty to state in the house that the Unemployment Relief Act has had beneficial results in the county of Champlain, a county particularly affected by the depression existing in the pulp and paper industries—a crisis for which no one holds the government responsible.

I shall close my remarks, sir, believing that I have done my duty in supporting a measure which is asked for by all my constituents, without party distinction. They are thankful for what the government has done to relieve the unemployed, who, for the most part, are strangers attracted to this country by the intensive immigration policy of the former regime; and if we find Canadians among these unemployed, it is because foreigners have taken from them the means of earning their living.

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): After sitting in this house listening to the debate of the last week, if it can be called a debate, I have come to the conclusion that the chief objection on the part of hon. members opposite seems to lie in the thought that the resolution now before the house is too stringently Conservative. Well, I am quite sure that those who are in need, even though they may think that this legislation is ultra-Conservative, feel that it is a happy and wholesome fault.

A few days ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his speech said, as reported at page 705 of Hansard:

> The women and children who are suffering in this country to-day have asked the Prime Minister for bread, they have asked him for work, but he has given them not even a stone. . . .

The same women and children are now asking for bread and the leader of the opposition has not given them even a speech. It seems to me that if all that this government has done for suffering humanity in this country can be called a stone, the people who have been given relief will very much prefer that stone to some of the idle chatter we have been forced to listen to in the last week. The people of Canada at this moment are wondering whether or not we are big enough Canadians to cast off this political leprosy that is threatening to destroy us in these times of danger and anxiety, and I suggest that if we are not big enough to do this we are not worthy to be called Canadians.

Some hon. gentlemen have said that what the government is looking for is suggestions. I would make one now, and it is constructive. I would suggest to hon. members opposite, who for the past week have been rehashing the speech made by the leader of the opposition last July, that they have it recorded on a series of gramophone records and place the gramophone in the lobby and play it to their hearts' content. I can assure those hon. gentlemen that if they have any trouble financing this little deal we on this side will contribute quite generously to it in order that we may get about the business of the country. Surely there is no room for sectionalism in Canada, and by the same token there is no room for sectionalism here. Give and take is the essence of our federation. We are Canadians before we are provincials and should not forget that in promoting the general welfare of Canada as a whole we are promoting the best interests of our own particular sections. Canada is not merely made up of the sum of its provinces, it is even greater than that.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in regard to the resolution before the house but before doing so I desire to speak, as a Saskatchewan member, in connection with the relief afforded to the distressed inhabitants of my province. I should like to say a few words in regard to the nature and extent of that relief, with regard to its administration and then with the permission of the house I am going to have the temerity to accept the invitation of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) and offer some suggestions as to future relief.

Primarily, I desire to register my objection to the renewal for two months of the powers conferred on the government by the statute which it is now sought to revive. I have been examining the report of the dominion director of unemployment relief and have studied the methods employed in granting relief in the province of Saskatchewan. I join with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) in saying that in my opinion the government has done its best to meet the difficulties which existed in that province. It has made mistakes—I think that has been admitted by hon. members opposite—but at the same time it has made a sincere effort to meet the difficulties. I note that the relief has taken some five or six forms. First, there was direct relief, and I notice that $4,275,991 was distributed before February 20, 1932, to give relief to approximately 53,727 families. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has stated that this amount has been considerably increased up to the present time and something like $5,250,000 has been distributed, which amount will suffice to aid the distressed people of southern Saskatchewan and other parts of the province at present in need.

Contributions have been made to the public works programs of cities, towns and villages.

These works took the form of street improvements, the providing of water supply, the extension of existing water and sewage systems and other similar undertakings, which involved a large percentage of labour. Under this heading the dominion has expended something like $1,600,000.

An effort has been made to place men on farms, and in this connection the dominion expended $125,000. Single men experienced in farming were placed on the land over the winter. They received $5 per month and of course free board and lodging and the government granted a bonus to the employer farmer. This provided employment and at the same time it was a wise move to keep these men separated rather than to have them gather together in large numbers.

Contributions were made towards the cost of highways, and then there was the five-cent bonus on wheat. The people of Saskatchewan who were in distress are thankful to the people of Canada for the relief provided. They realize that this parliament voted practically an unlimited sum for the purpose of providing relief and I do not think they are unmindful of the fact that it was this government that conceived the legislation brought down in September last. However, having said that, I say now that with the knowledge gained during the past seven months no hon. member in this house should want to continue that type of relief. We have come to the conclusion that there are better ways of meeting the difficulty. I do not think we can blame the government for having taken the course it has, because it seemed the wisest thing to do, but I imagine that were it to set out to-day on a new course of relief it would find direct relief would be the cheapest, and that the payment to the farmers on an acreage basis would be more equitable.

I do not suppose the administration of relief is a federal matter and as far as I am concerned I can see no great reason to complain thereof. Many complaints have been made of the actions of some of the minor officials; there were some highly indefensible appointments made by over-zealous partisans, but taking into consideration the magnitude of the task and the enormous problem which confronted the government, the mistakes made were not more numerous than one might expect.

Having said so much, I come now to the resolution and here I find something to which I object. On its face this resolution is quite innocent; in effect the government says that in the year 1930 we gave it certain extraordinary powers, which it wants extended for an additional two months. This resolution does not sound very serious until it is examined. Many of the elected representatives of the people object to a renewal of these powers. Having once made a mistake, they do not wish to make it again. It has been frequently pointed out that section 2 contains the authority to pay out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as the governor in council may in his discretion deem expedient to expend for three purposes, the relief of distress, the providing of employment and the maintaining within the competence of parliament of peace, order and good government throughout Canada. It is to this last provision that we object and must continue to object. As stated more than once by my right hon. leader, with the acquiescence and support of every member of his following, the opposition is ready to grant in a few minutes all the supply necessary for the support of those who are in distress. I do not believe there would be a single speech from this side of the house if a bill were introduced to provide for the relief of distress and the supply of food and seed to the farmers. There would be no delay; we would cheerfully support such a bill but we fail to see either the wisdom or the necessity of renewing the powers to which I have referred; that of maintaining within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada. Why should it be necessary for the governor in council to take these powers to itself? Why should the government want to have these powers conferred upon it? Are not the general powers conferred by sections 87 to 98 of the criminal code sufficient for all purposes, sufficient to cover every possibility? Is it necessary to give relief with one hand and at the same time to exhibit the other, heavily mailed, to the person to whom the relief is being given? I do not think it is. If we examine the provisions of the criminal code, we shall find that all the power necessary for parliament to maintain peace, order and good government, is already conferred by some sections of the code.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BUTCHER: When the house rose I had just referred to the fact that the criminal code in my opinion contains within the borders of sections 87 to 98 inclusive sufficient safeguards against any unlawful behaviour that might be anticipated and which it was probably intended to anticipate in the words to which I have taken exception in the bill before the house. I wish now to point out that the sections to which I have referred give us the law concerning unlawful actions of individuals, unlawful assemblies and unlawful associations. I do not desire to weary the house, but I want to read one or two of the sections to which I have just referred. Section 87 reads as follows:

> An unlawful assembly is an assembly of three or more persons who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, assemble in such a manner or so conduct themselves when assembled as to cause persons in the neighbourhood of such assembly to fear, on reasonable grounds, that the persons so assembled will disturb the peace tumultuously or will by such assembly needlessly and without any reasonable occasion provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously.

The following sections of the code up to and including section 97 contain within their four corners all kinds of penalties to discourage men from unlawful behaviour, the unlawful behaviour of the kind which is specified in the section which I have just read. I do not propose to read all these sections, but I should like to outline the provisions of each one.

Subsection two of section 87 which I have just read provides that an assembly lawfully assembled may become an unlawful assembly. That can be easily understood no doubt by every hon. member of this house. We can readily conceive of occasions when men might meet together with a lawful purpose in mind; perhaps one or two individuals among them might have an unlawful purpose in mind, and, by using inciting words, be the means of causing a hitherto lawful assembly to become inspired with unlawful motives and to do unlawful acts.

Section 88 defines a riot:

> A riot is an unlawful assembly which has begun to disturb the peace tumultuously.

Section 89 prescribes the penalty for taking part in an unlawful assembly, the penalty being one year's imprisonment.

The next section prescribes the penalty for taking part in a riot—two years' imprisonment with hard labour.

Then in section 91, in order that the assembly unlawfully assembled and which may have developed into a riot may be dispersed, certain officials are charged with that duty—the sheriff, the deputy sheriff, the mayor or other head officer, and justice of the county, city or town affected, and later on I think that the word magistrate is used. They are charged with the duty of reading a proclamation in the following terms:

Our sovereign lord the king charges and commands all persons being assembled immediately to disperse and peaceably to depart to their habitations or to their lawful business, upon the pain of being guilty of an offence on conviction of which they may be sentenced to imprisonment for life.

That is a severe penalty, one that should deter even the most hardened, unless their minds are absolutely set upon breaking the peace.

The next section, 92, provides imprisonment for life for persons who:

(a) with force and arms wilfully oppose, hinder or hurt any person who begins or is about to make the said proclamation, whereby such proclamation is not made; or,

(b) continue together to the number of twelve for thirty minutes after such proclamation has been made, or if they know that its making was hindered as aforesaid, within thirty minutes after such hindrance.

Section 93 provides for the arrest of persons who fail to obey the command to disperse within thirty minutes, and provides also that bystanders may be called to assist the officers that I have just enumerated. It goes further. It indemnifies those officers against any harm that may be occasioned those who resist them, even should the resistance lead to the death of the resister.

The next section provides one year's imprisonment for the bystander or other person who refuses to assist without reasonable cause and after reasonable notice the officer or officers who have proceeded to try to disperse the assembly.

The next section provides imprisonment for life for riotous destruction of property, and the next section, seven years' imprisonment for riotous damage to property.

Then we come to the much talked of section 98, which defines an unlawful association, and I shall read that subsection one of that section in full:

Any association, organization or corporation, whose professed purpose or one of whose professed purposes is to bring about any governmental, industrial or economic change within Canada by use of force, violence or physical injury to person or property, or by threats of such injury, or which teaches, advocates, advises or defends the use of force, violence, terrorism or physical injury to person or property, or threats of such injury, in order to accomplish such change, or for any other purpose, or which shall by any means prosecute or pursue such purpose or professed purpose, or shall so teach, advocate, advise or defend, shall be an unlawful association.

I ask, could anything be more comprehensive?

[Mr. Butcher.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but nothing concerning the criminal code is dealt with by the motion before the house.

Mr. BUTCHER: What I was trying to prove, Mr. Speaker, was that it was really unnecessary to include in the bill the words "for the peace, order and good government of Canada." I have been trying to demonstrate that the criminal code contains all the protection for the public and the crown that is necessary, and I hope that you will rule, sir, that I am in order and that it is permissible for me to proceed to prove that the provisions of the criminal code render unnecessary the provisions in this bill for a similar purpose. Am I in order?

Finally, as to the punishment:

Its officers—

That is, the officers of an unlawful association:

—may be arrested if they sell, speak, write or publish anything as the representatives or professed representatives of such association, or if they wear or carry about on the person any badge, insignia, emblem, banner, motto, pennant, card, button or other device whatsoever indicating membership or indirect connection with such association.

A sentence of twenty years is provided for that offence. Again I would ask, are not these provisions of the criminal code all comprehensive? Are not the penalties sufficient to meet any occasion that could possibly arise of the kind that it is sought to avoid? If not I think it is reasonable to ask what is it that the government anticipates that these provisions do not cover? It may be said that it was never in the mind of the government that this section was to deal with seditious utterances or unlawful assemblies. In that connection I might refer to the words of the right hon. the Prime Minister who, at page 4279 of Hansard of July 29, 1931, said:

In that regard the measure provides for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in Canada. It is not for a moment to be thought that an insignificant number of strongly vocal persons shall be able so to affect the populace of this country as to make it impossible for us, in cooperation together as Canadians, to work out our destiny. I say that class happily, is few in number. But in this present situation they now see an opportunity propitious to the presecution of their pernicious political doctrines.

I find myself very much in accord with the Prime Minister in the sentiments he expressed therein. I contend however it is not necessary to revive an act containing the words:

. . . maintaining within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

I wish to say a few words concerning the speech delivered the other evening by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) in which he complained rather bitterly about the lack of commendation of government policies by hon. members opposite, and in which he made the somewhat unreasonable comment that the opposition had offered no constructive criticism. For many years I have been a reader of Hansard, and I have derived great pleasure from reading the speeches of the present Minister of Railways and Canals. I have regarded him as an able and determined critic; sometimes I may have thought his language vitriolic. Now that I know him personally, however, I do not think that. I do say however that I have found no occasion upon which, when in opposition, he devoted any part whatsoever of his forty minutes to commendation of the government of the day.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend's memory is very short.

Mr. BUTCHER: Possibly it is.

Mr. STEVENS: It is faulty.

Mr. BUTCHER: However, I do not now think he is so bad. Hansard is very expert in recording words, but it does not portray tones of voice or gestures, nor can it reproduce the pleasant smiles which often accompany my hon. friend's harsh words.

Mr. STEVENS: That is very fortunate.

Mr. BUTCHER: Having said so much I am sure the Minister of Railways and Canals will know I do not bear him any ill will because of his speeches made when in opposition. I have sometimes thought he must have been a close student of Todd's Parliamentary Government in England, because at page 415 of volume 2 I find the following:

> The opposition exercise a wholesome influence upon parliamentary debate, and upon the conduct of the business of the crown in parliament, for they are the constitutional critics of all public affairs: and whatever course the government may pursue, they naturally endeavour to find some ground for attack. It is the function of an opposition to state the case against the administration: to say everything which may plausibly be said against every measure, act, or word of every member of the ministry: in short to constitute a standing censorship of the government, subjecting all its acts and measures to a close and jealous scrutiny.

I do not think the Minister of Railways and Canals is quite correct when he says there has been on the part of the opposition no commendation of government policies. On more than one occasion during this session I have heard such commendations. Perhaps the commendations were guarded, the praise was faint, but even my hon. friend will agree that faint praise is better than utter condemnation.

I hope I am not doing the Prime Minister an injustice by assuming that when he inserted this particular clause in the bill he had it in mind that there might be some kind of disorder in the country, disorders which I believe are covered by the provisions of the criminal code, to which I referred.

I notice, however, that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) held other views. Referring to the same passage in the bill, he is quoted at page 4439 of Hansard, July 31, 1931, as follows:

> First and foremost, starting with my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor), my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and one or two others, have uttered the same criticism in regard to the appearance in this bill of the words, "peace, order and good government." There seems to be an idea that these words have been placed in this enactment for a sinster purpose. If the house will reflect for a moment I think that it will realize that these words are the foundation of the authority of this parliament to pass such a measure. If the bill is not founded upon the theory that it is necessary to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, then parliament would have no authority to pass it. Without these words the bill in the form in which it is enacted into law might be set aside or challenged in the courts. The judgments of the privy council during recent years have established most clearly that unless there is something in the nature of a national disaster, of plague, famine, or some national emergency, then parliament has no authority to legislate upon the subjects set out in this bill.

I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the two significant points in this comment of the Minister of Justice. First, he doubts whether parliament would have authority to pass such a measure as the one contemplated at that time, unless the words in question were inserted. Then he points out that if the bill were not founded upon the theory that it is necessary to maintain peace, order and good government in Canada, parliament would have no authority to pass it. I would not presume to question the validity of that argument. I do not know anything about the law, but I have an idea that even if the words to which we are referring were not inserted the parliament of Canada could pass a law granting assistance to the distressed and relief to the hungry and ill clad, and also could provide assistance for farmers.

Then, the Minister of Justice said:

The judgments of the privy council during recent years have established most clearly that unless there is something in the nature of a national disaster, of plague, famine, or some national emergency, then parliament has no authority to legislate upon the subjects set out in this bill.

My only comment is that before the Minister of Justice made this statement the Prime Minister himself had declared that a national emergency existed in Canada, and there is no doubt that that was absolutely correct. Whatever doubt there may be as to whether these words were necessary in the bill, certainly there is no doubt whatsoever that without them two of the orders in council passed should not have been passed. One of those orders in council forbade the export of gold, and the other related to amendments to the Insurance Act.

The Minister of Railways deplores the fact that the opposition has made no constructive suggestions. At the outset of my remarks I said I would have the audacity to make a few suggestions before I concluded my remarks, and at a later point I shall do so. At the same time I think constructive suggestions have been made by hon. members on this side. We believe in constitutional procedure, and I understand the Prime Minister himself is as strong in a similar belief. He has always expressed himself as a great admirer of the British constitution and of Canadian constitutional practice.

Were we to permit this resolution to go through without protest I suggest we would be abandoning our rights. It may be argued that the proposed revival of chapter 58 is strictly constitutional. I grant that the statute itself was constitutional, that parliament is unlimited in its power, that it may delegate its authority or its powers, that in the year 1931 it did so, and that now in 1932 it is asked for an extension of powers for a further period of two months. I suggest however that though the powers to which I have referred were granted to the government in the year 1931, it might be and probably would be inadvisable to continue them. I contend that if we accept the resolution as it appears before us we are neglecting our duty as parliamentarians, relinquishing our rights, abandoning our privileges and wilfully withdrawing from an impregnable position. If we on this side voluntarily acquiesce in the proposed action of the government we are not fulfilling our duty as an opposition. I believe parliament committed a similar mistake when it gave the power to the governor general in council, upon recommendation of the Minister of National Revenue, to fix the value of goods imported for duty purposes.

This is my conception of the duty to which parliament is obligated: parliament must itself make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada; parliament itself should grant supply, and should grant no supply until its destination has been fully disclosed. There is a legal maxim known probably to practically all hon. members: delegatus non potest delegare. That is, the person to whom powers have been delegated cannot delegate them to another. I think this parliament should on no account delegate its right to make, to amend or to annul laws, or to tax, and certainly it should not delegate its right to grant supply, that is, to grant money, until full information is given as to the purpose for which it is required. In other words, we should not delegate our authority to a committee of parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, whoever is responsible for this resolution, did not see fit to accept the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the opposition and simply bring in a supply bill to secure all the money required for the purposes stated, for his refusal to do so has provoked this debate.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like in the beginning to direct the attention of the house to a remark made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) the other day in introducing this resolution. He referred to the fact that in the dried-out districts of Saskatchewan some 300,000 people are wholly dependent on relief for food, clothing and fuel for themselves and their families and feed for their stock during the present winter. He boasted, with some pardonable pride, that the Saskatchewan Relief Commission had looked after the needs of these people at a cost to the treasury of five and a quarter million dollars. This sum divided among 300,000 people amounts to $17.50 apiece. That does not mean that a man in Saskatchewan can live all winter and feed his stock on $17.50. What it does mean is that in spite of the fact that those people have lost three successive crops, they have been able to come within $17.50 per capita of supporting themselves throughout the winter. I doubt if there is another class of people in Canada who if afflicted in the same way would have been able to show so good a record.

Mr. STEVENS: The 300,000 of course, would cover families of farmers as well—men, women and children, which makes quite a difference.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. But what family in the city of Ottawa could live all winter on $17.50 per capita?

Mr. BENNETT: I may add there are a number of unpaid accounts. I instanced only those that were paid.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. My right hon. friend has so many sins to answer for that common humanity demands whenever he does anything well and deserving of credit we should give him that credit in full and generous measure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My friend is pretty grudging.

Mr. YOUNG: He boasted the other night of the achievements of the Saskatchewan Relief Commission; he told us how efficient they were, how honourable and trustworthy, how impartially they had done their work. I agree with him. There is credit coming to that commission. From what I have seen they have functioned efficiently and impartially from the time they first began to function. No doubt if my hon. friend had so desired he could have set up a commission that would have played politics and would have tried to make political capital for himself and for his party out of the situation; but he did not do so, and we give him credit for it. I also want to commend his business sagacity for paying the money directly into the hands of the commission and not allowing it to pass through the hands of any intermediary. There again I think he is deserving of the commendation of the house.

But I want to ask him this question: If this Saskatchewan Relief Commission is so competent, so impartial, so trustworthy that it could be entrusted with the expenditure of millions of public money, why is not the commission sufficiently trustworthy to be permitted to set up its own organization; why was it not permitted to choose its own relief officers? Before that commission was set up a very efficient relief organization was in existence and was functioning in every rural municipality in Saskatchewan. It consisted of the reeve and councillors of the different municipalities. My right hon. friend on more than one occasion has stated in this house that relief is first the duty of the municipality, then of the provincial government, and then of the federal government. Now I say we had in each municipality an organization already functioning. Let me explain to those who do not know the situation in Saskatchewan that a municipality there is a block of country eighteen miles square divided into six equal parts called divisions. In each of those divisions resides a councillor elected by the people of the division and knowing every one of them and all their circumstances. The council is presided over by the reeve, also a resident of the municipality, and served by the municipal clerk, who knows everybody in the municipality and is fairly conversant with their affairs. That organization, I say, was functioning under the direction of the provincial government before the Saskatchewan Relief Commission was set up. It was an organization that would fit perfectly into the scheme of the commission. All that was necessary when the commission was set up was to say to the municipal councils: In future you shall take your instructions from the commission and not from the provincial government. But the federal government did not see fit to do that. They decided to scrap that organization.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh no.

Mr. YOUNG: So far as administering relief is concerned, they did.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the hon. member say how he would propose to handle the administration of relief in the unorganized districts?

Mr. YOUNG: I am speaking of the seventy-six municipalities referred to by my right hon. friend where the commission was handling one hundred per cent of the relief.

Mr. McINTOSH: There are only two small unorganized districts in the province.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There are large unorganized districts in the north, where many settlers from the dry districts have moved in and where a good deal of relief is being administered to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: There are some unorganized districts in the south, too.

Mr. YOUNG: In the month of August I received a long distance call asking me to attend a meeting in a remote corner of the Weyburn constituency. I went down on the appointed day and there met the reeve and councillors of the municipality and perhaps fifty ratepayers. They were very much concerned over the fact that nothing seemed to be doing in the way of getting relief in to them. It was nearly the end of the month of August, and I wondered what induced their fears. One man explained the situation, and as his case was typical of a good many others I will state it for the benefit of the house. He said: "I live thirteen miles from town. Before winter sets in it will be necessary for me to get out to my farm sufficient fuel and supplies for the household and feed for the stock to carry me through the winter. In order to do that I shall have to travel with my team a total of 650 miles. If I can get at the work right away I can probably do it before the snow falls; if I cannot, if winter should set in before I get finished, perhaps I will not be able to get my supplies in at all." That was the situation which confronted those people, and caused their alarm. I had to do the best I could for my right hon. friend. I told them he was a man of wonderful energy, great driving force and marvellous capacity for getting things done, that we had given him all the money of Canada and all the power of parliament, and I had no doubt whatever if they had a little patience he would soon have relief sent into them in abundance. But that did not quite satisfy them, and I consented to go into Regina next day and find out when they could expect action. I went to the offices of the Saskatchewan Relief Commission. The first question I asked was when they expected to get under way, and the reply was, as soon as they got their organization completed. My next question was: What kind of organization are you setting up? They said, "We are going to have in each rural municipality a relief officer who will draw a salary of $75 per month plus an allowance for the use of his car"—not an excessive salary considering the work he has to do.

Mr. TURNBULL: Would you mind telling us whom you saw?

Mr. YOUNG: One of the commissioners.

Mr. TURNBULL: Which one?

Mr. YOUNG: The chairman.

An hon. MEMBER: Mr. Black?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. He said the relief officer would be assisted by a committee of five local persons, four men and one woman, who would work without salary. The first duty of the relief officer, I was told, would be to visit every home in the municipality with forms which he would fill out in the presence of the applicants. It is quite an extensive form, on one page of which there is a statement of the man's assets and liabilities, and there are numerous questions as to his needs and how far he can supply them himself for the winter. The relief officer was to go in person to every house and fill out the form. That done, he would call the committee together and go over the applications with them and they would decide how much relief each person was entitled to.

I tried to explain to the commission that if the relief officers got out the very next week, which would be the first of September, it would be the latter end of October before they could get the information, and that if winter should set in before that a good many people would be caught in a very sorry plight. I asked, "When will your relief officers start out?" The reply was, "They are not appointed yet." I made inquiries from other sources then to find out how the relief officers were to be appointed, and this is what I discovered: that a Conservative organizer from another part of the province had been sent by the Saskatchewan government—

Mr. TURNBULL: What was the source of that information?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Give us the facts.

Mr. TURNBULL: Tell us the source of the information.

Mr. YOUNG: If what I state is not in accordance with the facts, hon. gentlemen will have a chance to deny it. A Conservative organizer from another part of the province walked into the office of the Saskatchewan Relief Commission and said, "I will select your relief officers for you."

Mr. TURNBULL: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I do not know where he got his information, but I do say that the statement is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. YOUNG: This gentleman went out through these seventy-six rural municipalities and selected seventy-six relief officers.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): He didn't.

An hon. MEMBER: Another statement that's not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope the hon. gentleman is not making that as a statement of fact. He may have been so informed—

Mr. STEVENS: He dreamed it.

Mr. BENNETT: —but it is not so.

Mr. STEVENS: The wish was father to the thought.

Mr. BENNETT: I was there after.

Mr. YOUNG: I was there too. I will tell you something else. Two weeks later I was back in the office of the commission again because no action was visible. I asked what the delay was and this was the answer I received: "We are going to appoint relief officers at the next meeting of the commission; we have the list before us now," and the gentleman who submitted the list was there that day. Now, these relief officers appointed by this gentleman, so far as I have seen them, have been good and efficient men. I have no fault to find with them.

An hon. MEMBER: What are you talking about then?

Mr. YOUNG: This is what I am pointing out. While this new organization was being set up, the old organization having been discarded, nothing was being done. Weeks and weeks of valuable time were lost. The people in those districts were out of coal; they had no feed for their stock, and they could not get it because the commission was not yet functioning. All this delay—why?

Mr. BENNETT: What time was that?

Mr. YOUNG: The second time I was there in the office.

Mr. BENNETT: But what day of the month, do you remember?

Mr. YOUNG: The second time I was in the office was September 8. On that date they told me they would appoint their officers the following Saturday, and after these appointments were made all the work I have outlined as having to be done by the relief officers had to be carried out. The result was that it was months and months before some people got their first relief order. I know people in my neighbourhood who did not get their first relief orders until December.

Mr. TURNBULL: I know some that didn't apply until February.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, I know some that applied as soon as their applications were taken and they did not get their first order until December. I do not criticize the commission nor the relief officers; what I am complaining of is the fact that the old organization was scrapped before the new one was ready to function. Now, if winter had set in early, if we had had a normal winter season, setting in in October—

Mr. STEVENS: Why not September?

Mr. YOUNG: Well, the year before winter set in the middle of October. I say, if winter had set in about the middle of October and we had had a normal amount of snow it would have been impossible for many people to get in their supplies. The commission has functioned and functioned well; but, I repeat, if we had had a normal amount of snow last winter the organization would have broken down completely.

Mr. STEVENS: Aren't you sorry there wasn't a lot of snow?

Mr. YOUNG: No, I am not.

Mr. STEVENS: What is all the mourning about?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Give the man a chance; he has kept quiet all day.

Mr. YOUNG: The relief officer in the municipality in which I live has to unload feed at no fewer than eleven railway points and he must be present at every point. His assistants can give out the feed but he has to be there.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question. Does the relief officer have to be present for every car of feed unloaded, or has he made arrangements whereby the elevator man or some other person may unload in his absence?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): He doesn't know.

Mr. YOUNG: Some other man can unload provided the relief officer has made arrangements for the release of the car; but he has to go to the station and arrange with the agent to release the car. The point I am emphasizing is that if we had had even a normal amount of snow this winter it would have been impossible for the relief officer to get from one station to another to attend to that work, and the organization would have broken down; whereas under the old organization, with the councillor in each division, there was always someone on the ground to look after these matters. We were saved from a calamity last winter, not by the foresight of hon. gentlemen opposite but by reason of the fact that we had summer weather practically up to Christmas. We were saved by the "grace of God" as the Prime Minister would say.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And not by chapter 58.

Mr. YOUNG: Exactly. Again, I ask, if the Saskatchewan Relief Commission is so trustworthy that they can be entrusted with the task of looking after all these affairs, why were they not allowed to buy the hay sold to the settlers? They bought grain and it came in at a reasonable price; and they arranged for food, clothing and other commodities. But the hay was purchased by the Saskatchewan government and sold by the commission.

Mr. TURNBULL: They were buying hay all through the fall. That was why it was purchased by the government.

Mr. YOUNG: A good many contracts were let for hay before the commission was set up. The municipalities had made an estimate of what hay was required in all municipalities, and this they submitted to the government. When the commission was set up the government notified the municipalities not to send in more orders for hay and the municipalities stopped. Hay was not coming in and I went to inquire why. The commission said they were not handling it. Then I went to the government. They said they supposed they would be handling it. I said: "The municipalities do not know that you are going to handle it; you say you will handle it if they send you their orders, but they have been advised by the Minister of Municipal Affairs not to send any more orders. Will you advise them right away to send in their orders?" He said, "I will." A week later I went to a municipal clerk and said, "What about it; have you received any such instructions?" He said: "The instructions we have received are that we are not to order any more hay." It was delay and uncertainty from one end to the other, and it was months before many people got any feed. The farmers in my own neighbourhood were dividing with each other their last bales of hay. They were forced to do this because none was coming in. Why was the relief commission not permitted to buy hay when they were selling it? We know that hay was the dearest thing that was sent in to the district, the one thing that was not bought by the commission.

Reference was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the notes being taken from the farmers. I do not question for a moment the truth of his statement that some of them insisted that they would not accept relief unless they were permitted to pay for it, but it does not follow that they had to be compelled to sign notes. The man who insists on paying an account is not generally required to sign a note. Any farmers I have met are really concerned about these notes. They tell me that they have never signed notes before without having to pay them, and they believe that pay day will come. When this matter was under discussion the Prime Minister stated that since he came into power hundreds of notes taken from farmers many years ago for relief had come before the council for review and adjustments had been made.

Mr. BENNETT: The adjustments were made under a statute passed a few sessions ago, and the council merely confirmed those adjustments.

[Mr. Turnbull.]

Mr. YOUNG: Whatever the arrangement may be, I suppose the inference is that later there may be some adjustment of these notes. I doubt whether that is a wise plan. I wonder what effect it will have, say, on the political morals of the people. Suppose a government —it might be this government, it might be another—has in its possession past due notes signed by ninety per cent of the people in a given territory. When election time comes round the candidate of one party will say: An adjustment is to be made; if you vote for me probably I can get you a better adjustment than the other fellow. The candidate of the other party will say: He cannot get you an adjustment; his party is going to be defeated; you had better vote for me. The issue in that particular constituency would be: Who is going to give the best adjustment? I do not say that that is the intention of the Prime Minister, but that will be the result if these notes are held over the heads of the farmers with the promise of an adjustment later. I think it would be fairer and more in the interests of everyone if the Prime Minister would accept the suggestion made some time ago that the farmers in these districts be given a credit on their notes equal to one dollar per acre on the acreage seeded last year. This would act as a sort of equalizer between them and the farmers in the northern part of the province who received five cents per bushel bonus on their wheat.

I wonder if the Prime Minister ever stops to consider just how his conduct in regard to unemployment relief looks to hon. members on this side or to the people in the country generally. Let me review the attitude he has taken towards this house ever since he has been in power. He called parliament together in September, 1930, for the express purpose of relieving unemployment. He introduced a bill authorizing him to spend $20,000,000 to relieve unemployment, and side by side with that bill he brought in a tariff bill which could have no other possible effect than to increase unemployment. Then he told us that unless we put these measures through quickly he would not go to the Imperial conference. We held our peace and let him go to the conference. The next year when parliament assembled, as was to be expected and as we predicted, unemployment was worse than ever. Parliament assembled in March and I do not think there was a single week in that session when someone on this side did not get up and ask the government what it intended to do in the matter of unemployment and farm relief. No answer was given until well on in the summer, when one day the Prime Minister told us he would bring in a bill as soon as the order paper was cleared. In other words, there would be no relief granted until we stopped talking. He brought in his bill at the very end of the session when the order paper was cleared. Again we passed the bill under protest, and when the session was over he went out into the country to reply to the criticisms which had been levelled at him for the delay. He said it was our fault because we had talked so much, and that was why he could not bring in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: That sounds reasonable.

Mr. BENNETT: History repeats itself.

Mr. YOUNG: The present session was called early in February because my right hon. friend had agreed with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to call parliament before the relief act expired in order that we might consider what further action should be taken. Parliament assembled on February 4, but not a word was said about unemployment relief. On February 16 I rose in my place and asked the Prime Minister if it was the intention of the government to bring in another measure before the old act expired, and he replied that they were considering the matter. They continued to consider it until the other measure was as dead as a doornail.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Why doesn't the hon. gentleman be accurate?

Mr. YOUNG: No effort was made to bring this matter before the house until after the act was dead.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Again you talked too much.

Mr. YOUNG: We refrained purposely from debating the address because we wanted to give the right hon. gentleman a chance to introduce his legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the reason.

Mr. YOUNG: Now the right hon. gentleman asks for an extension to May 1 of the powers granted under the old act. What will happen on May 1? I have not the slightest doubt that when that date comes around the Prime Minister will come before this house with another measure equally obnoxious and he will say: There is unemployment and distress in the country, but the people will have to wait for jobs and for relief until you pass this measure and give us authority to do the thing we want to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And there will be another imperial conference.

Mr. YOUNG: I have no doubt that he will once more put the gun to our heads and say: Unless you submit to this again, the people will have to wait for relief. I wonder how long the unemployed of this country are going to submit to being used as hostages by the government to force the opposition into submission? What does the Prime Minister want anyway? He is asking us to clothe him with the absolute powers of a dictator. There are times when men will submit to a dictator, but the first essential of a dictator is that he be able to carry to a successful conclusion the thing he undertakes to do. What has the Prime Minister undertaken to do since he came into office? He undertook to build up Canadian industry by means of his protective tariff, and early in the session he told us that during the past year one hundred new factories had been established in Canada because of his tariff policy. He did not tell us that during the same period 464 factories had closed their doors.

Mr. BENNETT: No one else could tell the hon. gentleman that.

Mr. YOUNG: The Bureau of Statistics can.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes. He undertook to relieve unemployment. According to his own figures there were 200,000 unemployed when he came into office; to-day there are approximately 500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is absurd.

Mr. YOUNG: Absurd?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Let us look at manufacturing, the industry which my right hon. friend has taken under his own special care. Let us see what has happened in this branch of industry. In September, 1930, 7,334 factories reporting to the Bureau of Statistics showed a pay-roll of 1,023,633 persons. In February of this year, after eighteen months of my right hon. friend's policy, the reports from 7,766 factories—more than for the previous period—showed a pay-roll of only 819,174 persons. There was a decline of 204,458 in the number of those employed in the industry which my right hon. friend undertook to build up. When he says that there were not 500,000 unemployed in Canada, I say that in manufacturing alone 204,000 persons have been thrown out of employment, and everybody knows there are large numbers in other lines of industry also out of employment. So that the figure of 500,000 cannot be far wrong.

Mr. BENNETT: I presume my hon. friend wants to be fair. That is the season of greatest unemployment. If my hon. friend will follow the index figures, he will find that the diminution of employment in February of this year was less than it has been heretofore, and this is amazing, having regard to the situation in other parts of the world.

Mr. YOUNG: February is not the season of activity in outside occupations, but it is the month when most of our factories are giving employment, when they are getting ready for spring work, so that the falling off of 204,000 in the number employed in our factories is condemnatory evidence.

My right hon. friend undertook to open new markets; in fact I think he said he would blast his way into new markets for us. The first market he was to open was that of New Zealand.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that was open before we took office.

Mr. YOUNG: Then my hon. friend used the wrong word. He meant to say: I shall close markets.

Mr. BENNETT: The notice terminating the treaty was given before we came into office.

Mr. YOUNG: We know what action was taken at the short session when the Prime Minister of New Zealand was here, in this very chamber. We know what its effect was on the parliament of that country when he returned home, and we know the effect produced on trade between the two countries. We know what the right hon. gentleman did when he went to the Imperial conference, and we know what the effect was on imperial trade.

The Prime Minister also undertook to shut out butter, eggs, fruits, beef, mutton and innumerable articles that were coming into this country, and he is now boasting that he shut them out. The reason they are not coming into Canada is that the present price is so low that people in other countries cannot afford to sell them in Canada. If he wants to take credit for shutting those goods out of this country, he must also assume full responsibility for the decrease in their prices.

Mr. GOBEIL: Is it not true that at the present time the price of butter in Canada is between four and five cents a pound higher than it is in the United States?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. YOUNG: My right hon. friend was going to shut out butter so that we could have in Canada a market of our own higher than the world market.

Mr. GOBEIL: That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. YOUNG: He was going to give the farmer a better price for his butter. All I have to do when speaking to the farmers is to ask them: Are you getting a better price for your butter?

Mr. GOBEIL: Answer the question: yes or no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member was elected on butter.

Mr. YOUNG: My right hon. friend also undertook to reduce the imports of manufactured goods. He boasts that he has done that also, but in doing that he has reduced the exports and the only thing he has to boast about now is that we are doing less business than we were before.

Mr. BENNETT: Is my hon. friend aware that Canada has risen from sixth to fifth place amongst the exporting countries of the world?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We were that long ago.

Mr. YOUNG: My right hon. friend may find some consolation in the fact that other countries are hard up too, but that does not help to feed our hungry people or to put money into the pockets of the farmers. He promised us prosperity in Canada, and it is no argument now to say that conditions are no worse than in other countries. Therefore I must say, from whatever point of view we contemplate the right hon. gentleman's policy, it has been a failure. He has failed to carry his undertakings to a successful conclusion no matter what he has undertaken. Why, then, should we make him a dictator? The first essential of a dictator is that he should be able to do successfully the thing he sets out to do. He is not therefore, the stamp of man for a dictator. The only reason he can assign why we should make him a dictator is that he has the will to dictate.

We cannot support this measure, because the right hon. gentleman is asking for arbitrary powers. He is asking for powers which will make him practically a czar, or, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) would say, a sultan. We made him an offer to pass any supply bill he would bring in, to vote him any amount of money he deemed necessary for the purpose. He saw fit to reject this offer simply because he wants us to vote him dictatorial powers and unlimited control over the lives and property of our citizens. We refuse to give our consent to any such course.

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, let me add a word to what has already been said on this resolution which is supposed to resurrect the defunct act for the relief of unemployment and distress. I shall not try to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of this measure, because this has already been dealt with very ably by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) and others who have spoken.

I cannot support this resolution. Even had it been presented before the expiry of the original act, I should have questioned the advisability of continuing that measure, because I sincerely believe it has failed to relieve unemployment. Later on I shall give the reasons why I cannot support it.

Let me say first that during the election of 1930 the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and all his supporters made of the unemployment situation a national question. In a speech which the Prime Minister made in Montreal on June 26, 1930, and which is reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 27, he said:

> Unemployment has become a national problem in Canada. It is the direct result of nine years of unsound economic policies applied by the Liberals.

My hon. friends opposite came into power with the motto that the crisis was due to Liberal administration. They said that the machine for the relief of unemployment would be at work three days after the election and that the people of Canada by the thousands would enjoy employment. At the first session we expected a great deal of practical work along that line, but the first thing the government did at the short session was what? Was it not for the relief of unemployment? The first thing they did was to abolish the tariff commission. Then there was a wholesale increase in tariffs. That was supposed to be the great panacea to cure all ills, not only for the present but for the years to come. They started to apply those tariffs in a wholesale way, and the direct result, as soon as they were applied, was that protests arose from ocean to ocean, and the next day they had to undo a great part of what they had done. It was a case of taking one step forward and two steps backward. They applied prohibitory tariffs all around, and soon their effects became apparent. Industry became stagnant, farming moribund, merchants bankrupt, the professional men financially embarrassed, and the labouring men were in misery and distress. Conditions have gone from bad to worse. After applying this great panacea, in the last moments of the short session parliament voted an appropriation of twenty million dollars to the government for the relief of unemployment. The sum of twenty million dollars looks very nice to the public eye, but when we stop and consider what it really means to a country with ten millions of people, and when we consider what this twenty million dollars actually did in the way of public works and undertakings, it was very little indeed. I believe that if the money had been spent in a conscientious way, some benefit would have resulted from its expenditure, but very little benefit has been felt.

What was done with that twenty million dollars? Examples have already been given to the house in the last few days by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) and the hon. member for North Timiskaming (Mr. Bradette). In answer to them we have heard from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon), who replied particularly to the ex-Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan). I have been told that the Minister of Labour is a good politician. He is certainly pretty good when it comes to playing with figures, but I shall have to listen to him for a while yet before he will have proved to my satisfaction that he is a great statesman. He gave a whole lot of figures, and then to show that the work which had been done had met with approval he secured a lot of letters from mayors of different municipalities denying that political influence had been used in the distribution of the money. These letters came from municipalities where he is well known, and naturally these municipalities and mayors did not dare say anything to the contrary. They are eating out of the government's hand, and if they dared say anything different they would not get anything. The minister concluded his speech in a pompous manner, lauding himself and the government a la Ferguson.

I want to show you now, Mr. Speaker, how the money was unjustly distributed. Let me give an example of what happened in one part of my district on the road construction from Mattawa to North Bay. At first the people around there were told during the short session that inside of a month or two everyone who wanted work would have plenty of work. Then later they were told that the work would be started in two or three months, and then they were told that it would not be started until the spring of 1931. But no work had started in the spring of 1931, and the months continued to elapse until September or October before the work was actually started. Here is what happened. The engineers worked for over a year laying out the survey of the road from Mattawa to North Bay, a distance of fifty miles. After the work was started, it was soon curtailed in many places and in other places stopped. No wonder the work was soon stopped. At the head of the work was a road commissioner who was paid $2,400 a year. There was an engineer paid full time, with two assistant engineers also paid full time; a chief of police and two assistants paid full time. Then there was a game warden, although I might tell you gentlemen that the territory between Mattawa and North Bay has been open to civilization for fifty years, and if all the people at work were to hunt the whole day long they could not find a chipmunk. In addition there was a publicity man on full time, sending articles to the newspapers of the country which the Nugget of North Bay and the Sudbury Star would have been glad to do for nothing. Then there was a photographer obtaining pictures of the men at work. All that ran away with a whole lot of money. There was also a doctor engaged on full time, when all along that line there are doctors working day in and day out for nothing for the poor people who cannot pay. Why were they not given a chance to make a few dollars on this work? But no, the government employed an outsider, a friend of the government, I suppose. After all this overhead expense and the employment of all these full-time officials, it is no wonder that the works were curtailed in many places almost as soon as they had started, and in other places were stopped entirely.

The Minister of Labour stated in the house the other day that $70,000,000 had been spent, of which $17,000,000 had been paid by the federal treasury, and that 334,300 people had been employed for a total of 7,415,000 days' work That means $70,000,000 for seven million days' work. That means that the government spent ten dollars a day. I would ask hon. members to remember that figure. Let us be generous and suppose that the labourers on this work got three dollars a day. Where did the other seven dollars a day go? In overhead expenses. It is no wonder that the work was curtailed and in many places stopped soon after it was started.

Instead of relieving unemployment, unemployment has been on the increase ever since this government came into power, and I have proofs of that statement right in my own district. The unemployment situation is so acute and the people have become so discouraged that some time ago I received a letter from a man asking me if it was true that there was some organization that would buy the corpses of cripples for dissection for experiments. He wanted to mortgage his body before death. That shows to what circumstances he must have been reduced. Although the government professes to see signs of improvement all over the country, the municipalities which cooperated with the government have gone the limit. They went to the very verge of bankruptcy, and some actually went into bankruptcy. Other municipalities were wise enough to stop before they actually went into bankruptcy. In my own city they have thought it wiser to give direct relief rather than unemployment relief work. I quote, from the Sudbury Star of February 24, 1932, the report of the relief inspector:

> At the end of last week there were 4,100 persons receiving relief.

I ask hon. members to bear in mind however that the population of Sudbury is only about 20,000, and that the number receiving relief constitutes about one-fifth of the total population. The article continues:

> According to the record of the relief inspector, Frank Rothery, of these 898 were heads of families, 2,187 are dependents and 15 are singles, such as widows and aged people. This does not include the men who are getting free meals at the soup kitchen.

This article would indicate that there was so much overhead expense in connection with relief work measures that very little actual relief was given, and unemployment has been continually on the increase.

What did hon. members and the country expect at this session? Everybody expected an extensive program for the relief of unemployment. About that however we did not see one word in the speech from the throne, and the Canadian people are still waiting for a constructive program. In the judgment of the public the ministers of the government are playing politics. They are busier finding fault with others than taking care of the country's business. The people are not in the mood to listen to political speeches such as those made by some of the ministers. Unemployment is on the increase. In many cases properties are being confiscated both in the country and in the cities.

Now we find that the small salaried men in the civil service are being cut ten per cent.

The ministers however rest easy because last year they were given an allowance of $2,000 a year, and as one hon. member has calculated, the decrease of ten per cent still leaves them $400 ahead. The friends of the government, the millionaires, are given a chance to hide their money in government loans drawing five, five and a half or six per cent interest. They rest easy, too, because the difference in the interest rates will help them pay their income tax.

What is the cause of unemployment? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of the present crisis is the greed of capitalists and their speculative schemes, their monopolization of industry with the consequent death of small industries.

What is the remedy? High tariffs will never cure our present ills. Money contributed in large sums directly or indirectly will not cure the present situation; neither will the construction of the trans-Canada highway. It was stated in Toronto by Sir Alexander Gibb that "highway construction in this country has been overdone." Municipal and provincial undertakings under this scheme bring bankruptcy. I say the means applied up until now cannot meet with the approval of the members on this side of the house. They are placing a burden upon our people, are not relieving unemployment and for generations to come will tax us to the limit.

To cure our economic ills we must have good will, not only among the people of Canada but among the nations of the world. There must be less selfishness and egotism on the part of the rich, and there must be fewer trade restrictions.

But to my mind a real remedy for the unemployment crisis, although not immediate in its effects, would be encouragement to agriculture,—in other words, a return to the land. Instead of building provincial, federal or state roads I would suggest that the farmers already on the land be given better roads for the transportation of their produce. They should be able to secure loans at lower rates, and banking and financial institutions should cooperate to make that possible. Further, agricultural instruments of production should be available at lower cost. The price of farmers produce has been on the decrease, but the articles of production he has had to buy have not decreased in price.

At this time the farming communities are handicapped, and it is for that reason I advocate lower cost of production. If there was as much money spent installing settlers on farms as there has been spent for the direct or indirect relief of unemployment the results would be more satisfactory. Help given to those entering agricultural pursuits would not have to be repeated often, because with the least possible encouragement the farmer will take care of himself. Why should not the federal government, with the cooperation of provincial governments, encourage colonization? Probably the present Minister of Labour who is also Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) will tell me that they have already put on the farms 44,000 settlers. I should like to know whether that number includes any or many of the 27,000 immigrants which entered Canada in 1931. Also I read in the press that there is a movement on foot to bring in 5,000 English boys who are to be educated in the art of farming, and placed on farms. I should like to know from the minister, if he intends to cooperate in this movement, or if he will pay more attention to those already in this country who are in distress.

Canada, considering its population has been over-industrialized. Our exports per capita are more than those of any other country in the world. Many of our farms have been deserted, the people having been attracted to the cities by the supposedly easy life there. This drift to the urban centres has intensified the present unemployment crisis, and many of those people who deserted their rural homes would, I sincerely believe, gladly go back to the farms if they had a chance. Their return to the land would change them from liabilities to assets, there would be less occasion for relief, and this country would be in a much better condition to meet any future economic crisis. But it should be done on the same basis and with the same encouragement as is given in the province of Quebec.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the reasons why I cannot support this resolution, but I am ready to cooperate in the relief for unemployment, either by the introduction of a supply bill or by the introduction of a new unemployment bill.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Long Lake): Mr. Speaker, if I lived in the province of Saskatchewan and knew as little about the farmers there and of the measures of relief which have been carried through by the present government as does the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), judging from his speech to-night, I would not try to enlighten this house.

Mr. YOUNG: You had better take your seat then.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): He complains bitterly because the old municipal organizations have been scrapped. Evidently he wanted them during these trying times to continue to do as they had been doing in the past. What did they do? Why, prior to the time of the appointment of this commission the country was in a turmoil over what was being done by these municipal organizations. In some municipalities the officers had been generous and had borrowed to the limit of the municipal credit to help the people; other municipalities where the majority of the councillors were Liberals absolutely refused to do anything by way of relief, and the residents told us plainly that the reason for this standpat attitude was that the Liberal councillors wanted to hamper the provincial government just as much as they possibly could. In other words, there was no harmony of action anywhere; one part of the country was being properly taken care of and the other was not, and in the latter places the people were just as hungry as in the municipalities where proper measures had been taken to meet the distress. This government knew what was happening out there. The whole province had been Liberal for twenty-six years. We have turned out the Liberal government but the municipalities are still Liberal.

An hon. MEMBER: Name one.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Take the Dufferin municipality in the Long Lake constituency; it has been Grit ever since I knew it. They carried on relief with a purely political organizer. The reeve of the municipality had been a Liberal member of the legislature. The councillors there actually tried to carry on after the relief commission was appointed. They would not keep their noses out of affairs, they were determined to hang on. But at the last municipal elections I said, "These conditions are not going to continue, we have got to get that bunch of Grits out." And we got them out. From that day to this we have had perfect harmony in there.

Mr. YOUNG: The same as you have over here.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): This is the basis on which relief has been handed out. I myself have stated time after time on the public platform, following my leader, the Hon. Doctor Anderson, out there, that relief would be given to Liberals, to Conservatives, to Progressives or to any other people, that politics would make no difference, that a Liberal could die of starvation as easily as a Conservative, and we were not going to let anybody die of starvation. I defy any hon. gentleman to say that anywhere in any part of Saskatchewan there has been one particle of politics in the functioning of the Saskatchewan relief commission. I defy any one to name one particle of graft in that province in connection with relief. We have appointed men on that commission, determined that it should be absolutely free from politics, that its hands should be clean, so that we should be able to come back to the Dominion government and say to them: "You have been generous to us, you have given us the money necessary to relieve us, and we have come back to you with clean hands." And you have to admit it.

Mr. YOUNG: Whom do you mean?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I mean you. I can go back to the time when the reeve of the municipality under the old system handed out the relief just as it suited him. There are three stores in the town that I have in mind, one run by a Tory, one by a man indifferent to politics, the other by a Grit. Not one dollar went to the Tory storekeeper, less than $300 to the storekeeper of indifferent politics, but $4,000 went to the Grit storekeeper. That was the way they did things out there. We stopped that. We didn't want that kind of relief administration in Saskatchewan, and we are not getting it now. The hon. gentleman complained very bitterly that the Conservative organizer appointed the relief officers in seventy-six municipalities. He must be some organizer who can cover seventy-six municipalities and appoint the relief officers. If he got into the highest powered motor car in the city of Ottawa owned by the late Liberal ministers here he could not cover one quarter of the ground. But if that is your idea of Conservative organizers, where are you Liberals going to be at the next election?

The Saskatchewan Relief Commission was appointed, and was instructed to be absolutely non-partisan. You will admit that we Conservatives always find it much more profitable to secure a non-partisan organization by being in control of it ourselves, because we could never trust those Liberals out of our sight.

There has been some trouble about fodder, but you must understand the situation to appreciate the difficulty. My hon. friend knows well that in the early spring there was no fodder at all. The government of Saskatchewan being alert, always anticipating probable conditions, had ordered fodder to cover the expected requirements. What happened? Late rains came on and induced a growth of grass that was not expected, and in many districts we had a late growth which saved the government thousands and thousands of dollars. They had hay which was not now required except in certain places, but it took time to look after everybody. You cannot stop the rain falling. Thank God it came, we were glad it came. Apart from the delay which was caused by that very condition we have had no trouble at all out there.

I am going to give the house some quotations from my correspondence. This is from one of the best business men we have in these rural districts; it came from Long Lake. This is the report that came to me a few days ago:

With regard to the personal end, clothing, food and coal, I would say that ninety per cent of the distribution is going where needed, and is a regular godsend.

Does that suit you? This is from one of the best men in the municipality. He knows everyone in the district and I have known him for years and years. He is thoroughly acquainted with conditions throughout that district and therefore he is in a position to speak with authority. In the same letter he makes this statement—

Mr. YOUNG: Read the whole letter.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You can have the whole letter if you want it, but this is what I am going to quote you:

I note some discussions at Ottawa re the farmers signing promissory notes for repayment for this relief. I may say I have had no applicant as yet who has made any objection to signing that form. In fact, I may safely say that the great majority would rather look on this relief as a repayable loan than a dole.

That is the attitude of the people there, and I am glad to have that on Hansard. To give my good friend an idea of how things are viewed by the farmers' wives, let me quote the following statement that comes from Penzance:

Conditions as to food, clothing and fuel seem to be quite satisfactory. In fact, the people have been very well cared for in those respects. Fodder has been slow coming in.

That is not too bad for a farmer's wife, and she knows what she is talking about. Here is another opinion from a man in Craik:

Everything seems to be going fairly well; all there is to do is hand out relief and they seem to be fairly well satisfied at this point.

I could quote a carload of such opinions if it were necessary. My hon. friend has referred to fodder and he says that nothing has been done for the people at all. The Prime Minister and all the rest of us have this idea, that the people there and elsewhere in this dominion should carry their own burden as far as they possibly can. We believe in personal effort; we believe it is advisable that everyone should shoulder his own responsibilities to the best of his ability. It is a good thing to develop the spirit of self-reliance. In this difficult situation the government say, "We will supplement your personal effort but we expect you to do everything you possibly can to help yourself, and in so doing to help the country"; and so far as I know, the constituency of Long Lake takes that attitude. I do not know what attitude the people of Weyburn take; I do not know what kind of people are there now. You can only judge by what you see here.

Mr. YOUNG: I would not be so cruel as to judge the people of Long Lake that way.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I used to know the hon. gentleman's constituency very well. I knew it long years ago when he was speaking on soap boxes in old Ontario—because, you know, he does not belong to us at all. People talk about Saskatchewan being responsible for all these agitations, but the fact is that not a blessed one of the agitators was born in Saskatchewan. A lot of them have come from Ontario, where they used to mount their soap boxes, and the only trouble is that they have brought their soap boxes with them. We, in Saskatchewan, do not hold ourselves responsible for them. Anyhow, as I was saying, long before the hon. gentleman was there at all I ran a federal election in his constituency, and I addressed a meeting right in the village in which he lives—and a splendid meeting it was too.

Mr. YOUNG: I voted against you.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): You ought to be ashamed of yourself. I am going to give my hon. friend something to take home with him. This will give him food for thought, and it will show him something of the spirit of our people. In the constituency of Long Lake we have been badly hit, for we are in the centre of the affected area. Near Chamberlain we have a farmerette, a lady who came to Saskatchewan many years ago from a place within the sound of Bow Bells, and I may say that if my hon. friend had one half the pluck that she has he would not be here lamenting, as he does day after day. This lady took a large farm years ago and three years in succession, while I was a federal member, she came to me and tried to induce me to prevail on the government to furnish her with seed. I may say that I was handling the patronage there, because that was the time when patronage was patronage and there was no talk of a Civil Service Commission. As a matter of fact, that is something I do not like at all—it takes too long to get nowhere. At any rate, I intervened for her and at the end of the third year—I happened to be mayor of Regina at the time—she came into the mayor's office one day and said, "Doctor Cowan, I have come to tell you that I have paid my bill." I said. "What bill? I didn't send you any account." She said that she had paid the government for the advance they had made to her. She had had a good crop, she said, and had paid every dollar. More than that, she had bought a threshing machine and she was doing all her own threshing. She said that the farmers around wanted to hire the machine but she did not agree to this. A few months ago we were building a highway with some of the money which the government has voted, and she said she thought she could work on that highway as well as any man. I told her to send in her application to the man locally in charge. That man came and asked me what I thought of this woman, and I said, "She is the best man in the country." And she was appointed and is on that highway. She has a good farm, has twenty-six cattle and a large number of horses, and has hired men working for her.

If the hon. member for Weyburn represents any people who want to depend upon the government for everything—I say, if there are any people in his constituency who feel that way—I want him to take back these things to them and show them what the attitude of the people is in the constituency of Long Lake. If people have nothing at all, well and good; let them send in their application and they will be treated accordingly. Personally, I do not know of any complaints that have been made. Of course, we have not tried to make either farmers or working men rich. But listen to what this lady has to say—the lady about whom I have been speaking:

Mr. Lilly—

The local member of parliament.

—told me the engineer would be here to see me. He will find me in the field, raking feed. I have over forty loads up. Russian thistle, wild oats, wheat and pig weed, but I am putting lots of salt in the stacks and when it is thirty below it will look good to me and taste better to my cows than sitting down and waiting for the council to give me hay.

How does that strike the house for pluck? Does the hon. member for Weyburn know anyone in his constituency that can better that? If he does, let him trot him out.

Mr. BROWN: They are all doing that.

[Mr. W. D. Cowan.]

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): What are all these complaints about? I have never met a better class of people than our farmers. This government, through the relief commission, is doing everything possible to carry them through. We have never promised them anything more than that we would carry them through this winter and see what we could do to get them on their feet for the coming season. The letter continues:

The Russian thistle makes the very best feed for cows (not horses) if cut green and before the spears get on it and—

Will the hon. member for Weyburn listen to this—he comes from the south.

—there are thousands of tons in that south country but the people there have dried up with the country and lost all the British pep they ever had.

Mr. DONNELLY: They do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): This woman of Long Lake constituency is as good as any woman anywhere else, or as good as any man in Ontario. I will gamble on that any time.

A commission of five was appointed, and I admit quite frankly that the Conservatives controlled the commission. We would be crazy if we did not, and we are not crazy. Do hon. members think that we would appoint a commission with a majority of Liberals to cut our throats? Not on our life, we are not doing political business in that way and we do not handle the business of the country like that. We depend entirely upon results, and the results are clear. Big salaries are not being paid to the employees of this commission. There are probably two hundred employed and they receive from $60 to $75 per month, many of them being married men with families. Nearly 5,000 people applied for positions but they did not get them; they were disappointed The commission are running things themselves without any interference. They have obtained all the information possible and have made mighty good use of what they obtained. The result is that Saskatchewan is standing before Canada as having proved herself equal to handling her own business, but she will always require a little assistance when a calamity such as this falls upon her.

I would advise my hon. friends that we have yet to provide seed for these farmers, and if they do not get it, the responsibility will rest upon the shoulders of hon. members opposite. If they want to block this measure, let them do so.

Mr. YOUNG: That is just what I said, the farmers are being held as hostages for our behaviour.

Mr. DONNELLY: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Gray): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this time to discuss the economic conditions of agriculture. It seems to me that this measure is designed more for the care of unemployment and to take care of abnormal agricultural conditions, due to lack of rain and things of that sort, and an opportunity will be provided later on in the session to discuss economic conditions. I desire to say a few words on the resolution before the house. Numerous members of the opposition have said that they are quite willing to vote the government any amount of money to take care of relief; if the government will bring down a bill stating any reasonable sum, parliament is willing to vote the money. I judge there is no fear in connection with the money involved and, personally, I think the government is more anxious to conserve the clause "peace, order and good government" than to do anything else. It cannot be the money, because there is no dispute as to that.

There are certain things which make me think that this is true, and one is the increase in certain of the estimates. The largest increase is in connection with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and there are other increases. A week ago yesterday we had on parliament hill a display of force such as this house has never seen before. If that is an interpretation of the government's idea of peace, order and good government, then I for one do not want to be a party to extending that privilege and that power any further. A thousand unemployed men gathered in Confederation square, and we had the spectacle of heavily armed men standing at the gates and an armoured car careening all around parliament hill. We knew there was a detachment of mounted and armed policemen ready to dash out should trouble occur. Why all this? Because a thousand unarmed, unemployed, destitute men were gathered to lay their troubles at the foot of the throne. If that is the government's idea of peace, order and good government, then parliament had better retain what little authority it has. I cannot think of a greater error made by the government during this session, unless it was that of refusing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the right to introduce a bill. These are two tragic blunders on the part of the government. If this statement meets with doubt, I advise private members of the government to go into the country without disclosing who they are and they will soon find out what the people think.

Considering this as an interested student of democratic institutions, I have come to the conclusion that for some little time the democratic aspect of our parliament has been slipping through our fingers, and I contend that what the government is now asking for will further impair the power of parliament. For these reasons I am opposed to this resolution. I do not think the government has any business to put upon the opposition the blame of holding up relief for the unemployed. For quite some time the government has known that its authority would terminate on March 1 and they could have made their plans accordingly. If they have not, let them, and not us, take the responsibility.

If we are to have representative government, if we are to be the representatives of the people, there is no reason why the cabinet should carry on all the business of parliament. That is what they are doing at the moment. That is practically what they are doing at the moment, if they take from parliament what little power it has and put it all into the hands of the cabinet. They now value for customs purposes goods coming into Canada; they have an unnamed sum of money to spend in an unnamed way; they have complete power to call out the militia, whether it is really needed or not, and all this sort of thing. Let us face the situation and realize that democratic institutions in Canada have fallen down and that we simply have a dictatorship, not even a thinly disguised one, but one out in the open. After all, the rank and file, the common people, are shrewd; for a time perhaps, things may be put over them; they may let themselves be badly fooled, but give them time and they will always see conditions in their true light. The people of this country know exactly what is going on and I, as a representative of a constituency, feel a responsibility for keeping, to the degree that I can, power in the hands of parliament. We have already given far too much power into the hands of the cabinet which, while supposed to be a committee of the House of Commons, is no such thing. I doubt also if it is a representative committee of the governing party, but certainly it is not a committee of the commons and, indeed, as things work out in practice, it has practically no responsibility to the commons.

We have a very good barometer of unemployment right on Wellington street. Just down the street at No. 337 and at the Perley home, we have the Legion shelter which was opened on the 8th of December, 1930, with sixty beds. To-day it has 400, all full. At that shelter about 1,350 meals a day are given. There are still men who have enough to keep a room, and yet who have not enough to feed themselves, and so they come to the shelter to eat. This institution does not receive a grant from the government. In fact, it has no particular bearing on this resolution other than it furnishes a very good barometer of how greatly unemployment is increasing.

I think we are all beginning to realize that the cost of unemployment, as our financing is being done at the moment, is becoming an unbearable burden, because it is being put upon the shoulders of those who have little; that is, those who have little must take care of those who have nothing, while those who have much go almost scot-free. This cannot go on very much longer. I realize, as we all do, that there can be no permanent cure of unemployment without the elimination of the causes of the depression, and that means fundamental changes in our economic system. We all know that; we might not like to admit it, but this continual taxation of the people cannot go on. Just think of the people who have been cared for this year in the dried-out areas of the prairie provinces, and the unemployed throughout Canada. I am asking you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the house: How long can this go on as it is now being financed? How much longer can the provinces carry their load of debt with ever-increasing interest rates? I do not presume to be an authority, nor do I preen myself on being particularly clever, but just looking at the situation as an ordinary person would do, I feel this cannot last. Therefore, I fancy, we shall have fundamental changes in our economic system. I would say to the Liberal party that their only chance of survival is in championing those changes. They have a chance, though they may or may not avail themselves of it. Canada cannot stand two ultra-conservative parties; the burden is too great.

One other matter to which I wish to refer is that of women unemployed. I really have no data on the subject, because you cannot get it, but I believe there are many women unemployed who are suffering greatly. They will not go into queues for meals. No shelters, or very few at any rate, have been provided for them. We have only the census of 1921 to go upon and at that time there were 490,150 women gainfully employed. I believe the census of last year will show many more than that. What proportion is unemployed, I cannot say. That the numbers are great is shown by the fact that it used to be very difficult to get girls and women in the homes, for what is called domestic service. To-day it is quite easy. In other words, many women who were formerly in offices are now willing to work in houses at pitifully low wages, in some cases almost just for shelter and food. That shows that their condition is desperate and I am afraid that no provision has been made for unemployed women. I admit this is a difficult matter to handle because they do not make their condition known. They are humiliated on account of it; they have not been so long in the workaday world as men and they are more diffident as a consequence. I am not blaming anyone for this, but I think special care will have to be taken in the future, if this depression lasts for some time, to see that the unemployed woman is given care equal to that given the unemployed man.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident that unemployment is becoming, and, indeed, is now, a major problem in this country, and is assuming the proportions of a national calamity. According to the report of the Director of Unemployment, during the month of January work was provided for 339,007 men. That did not include repeaters, so that we can safely assume that at the present time there are upwards of 400,000 unemployed in Canada. May I say that under the existing system it seems certain that a great number of those unemployed never will get work; their places have been taken by labour-saving machines and devices of that kind. Their problem will not be solved by the first of May.

Then again we have throughout this country many farmers whose resources are being rapidly depleted and who are in need of seed and fodder. This is not only a seasonal depression; it is an abnormal condition. Their problem will not be solved by the first of May, and yet the substance of this resolution looks only to that date. It proposes to give the government power to spend money by order in council, and it gives no indication as to what will be done after the first of May.

No comprehensive scheme has been outlined as to how conditions will be met after that date.

After a long struggle in years gone by, the early pioneers in politics succeeded in securing the right to have the House of Commons scrutinize and discuss expenditures before money was taken from the consolidated revenue fund of Canada. This resolution proposes to transfer that authority from the commons to another body. We are trustees of what has been done in the past and we should not lightly divest ourselves of those rights which were attained at such a cost. Members on this side of the house have agreed to pass any supply bill that is brought down looking to the amelioration of existing conditions, but are loath to part with a right which has been won so dearly.

During the course of this debate a number of suggestions have been made looking to the solution of our most pressing problems. The monetary system has been discussed. A few days ago we had the suggestion of building homes for the people of Canada. The question of unemployment insurance has been discussed, and the suggestion has been made that shorter working hours would provide work for a greater number of people. The government have also done a few things in regard to these problems. They have reduced the wages of the working people of the country, of the civil servants. They have increased the tariff. They have made a few trade treaties with other countries, and we have the promise of the Imperial conference which will meet in Ottwa during the coming summer. But yet it seems clear, and it must be admitted, that no comprehensive study of the underlying causes of these great difficulties has been made, and certainly no far-reaching plan has been advanced that holds out any hope of making less dreadful the terrible spectre of poverty and unemployment. We have been temporizing, living, as it were, from hand to mouth, taking money from some of those who have it and giving it to some of those who have not. In this country we have large supplies of lumber, of food and clothing, and yet the poorly housed, the hungry and the ragged are unable to purchase them. They must accept charity, unwillingly and in a spirit of shame in a great many cases.

I wish to discuss very briefly a policy that might be called a home colonization policy, which I believe could be pursued with considerable vigour and confidence in this country. Among that great army of unemployed which we have in Canada there are many men and women trained and fitted by temperament and education to provide themselves with the necessities of life if they could only be settled on suitable land. I realize that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) has already done something along this line by placing some 44,000 men, women and children on farms. This has been done without expense to the government of Canada. It has been done with the assistance of officers already in the department. These people, who were able to pay their own expenses, they have been located on lands belonging to the government. I realize that the larger schemes of settlement have usually been unsuccessful. The British treasury have made many loans and have lost very greatly in their efforts to assist migration. They made agreements with the Canadian government and with certain land companies, and carrying out those agreements they spent no less than $4,064,470. Of that amount only $445,465 was repaid. In Australia they spent no less than $6,605,000. The settlers themselves put up $2,500,000, went to far-off Australia and purchased farms, but found it impossible to make a living and were reduced to the direst want and poverty. Most big land settlement schemes have not been successful. We have had in Canada the experience of the soldier settlement board, which has cost $54,000,000, but still it has done a great deal of good because it placed on the land men who are still on the farms and are not at present unemployed. These men went on the land under very unfavourable conditions. Many of them had had no farming experience, many of them had in the trenches lived an unnatural and strained life and their mental poise was not what it should have been. Moreover, they were placed on the land when prices were at the very peak, and so they did not have a chance to make good when prices fell so low.

The people I have in mind are persons who are at present out of work but who might if suitably placed on the land be able to produce food and supplies for themselves—not supplies to put on the market, which seems to be over-supplied at the present time. This is not a scheme for any man who is a wage earner. Any man who has a job should hold it in these trying times. It is not even a scheme for those who are likely to become wage earners. It is a scheme to help those who have had some experience in farm work, who could pass an examination on farm problems, men who have a good record, and who would be supported on the farms at a smaller cost to the state than the state must meet in any case.

Mr. STANLEY: Has the hon member in mind privately-owned farms or present homestead lands?

Mr. GERSHAW: I was thinking more particularly of lands which have been transferred to the provincial governments, and the dominion government still have a lot of lands that were taken up and abandoned by soldier settlers However, the details of the scheme might be worked out later. I believe that there are farms in many parts of this country which could be obtained very cheaply. Some of us live near the railways and we can see any day in the week and almost any hour of the day men, and sometimes women, riding on the freight trains going east or west, north or south, going anywhere; they know not where they are going, but they are hoping to find work, and they know not where to look for it.

Land settlement schemes have been carried out in several countries. Germany, Belgium, Holland, France, and Switzerland have all had land settlement schemes. We have the Hadleigh colony in England, which for a long time greatly relieved the unemployment situation. At the beginning of this century Sir Rider Haggard was employed by the British government to make a survey of the various land settlement schemes, particularly in the United States and those which had been undertaken by the Salvation Army. It is true that failures and successes were found, but the knowledge that he gained throws much light on a possible solution of the present problem. Referring to the settlements at Fort Romie, California, and Fort Amity, Colorado, the author states:

> To begin with, the settlers were destitute. They were taken from the poor of Chicago and other cities. The Salvation Army had even to pay their transportation. Some had no agricultural experience.

In these cases the land was sold to the settlers and they were supposed to repay the amount over a term of twenty years. The following extracts from Sir Rider Haggard's report indicate some of the results that were obtained. On page 7 we find:

> The two experiments seem to me to be eminently successful, and to demonstrate in the case of Fort Romie that indigent people of the agricultural class can be settled on the land and do well, and in the case of Fort Amity that people can be taken from the towns and prosper. To sum up the results, and not to mince matters, the experiment has proven a success.

Then on page 41 of Sir Rider Haggard's report we read:

> The value of the security is increasing yearly as shown by the annexed documents of valuation. If a settler dies or moves away the value of his equity is more than enough to pay his obligations to the Salvation Army and others.

Some of these people on one of the colonies gathered together and passed a resolution of which the following is a short extract:

> We would like the benefits which we, our wives and families are receiving to be extended to the thousands who have been longing and praying for such a chance.

Then, at page 77 Colonel Holland remarks:

> As I have pointed out prosperity has been much retarded owing to the causes given, but our people are self supporting. They are making some payments and improving their buildings. They are certainly in a much more flourishing condition than they ever would have been had they remained in the city.

Someone will say, "Why talk about a scheme like that? We cannot afford to do anything of the kind." May I point out that the other day the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) outlined a scheme by which a plan such as I have described could be financed. As regards these particular people there is no doubt that some government in Canada must pay for their keep. Three, four or five hundred dollars a year must be advanced to keep them from starvation. If a small amount of money were advanced by way of credit, and the people benefiting thereby were carefully chosen, having special regard to their record and their ability, experience and military service, and if the lands were properly selected, it seems clear that many who are unemployed and now have no hope for the future would be given fresh courage, and their conditions vastly improved. It may be suggested that such an arrangement would add to the overproduction of farm products. If that were the case we might conclude that we had succeeded far beyond our hopes, because we would expect that they would produce no more than sufficient food for their own use. No great or vast scheme need be undertaken. Individuals might be located in suitable places, and arrangements could be made to have groups who could work together located in the same district.

This is not a scheme to take people from one country and plant them in a far distant land where conditions are new and strange. They would be right within the borders of our own country, and would be familiar with the conditions. In the city whence I come there is a group of thirty men every one of whom has seen service in the trenches and has had farming experience. They are willing and anxious to have an opportunity to go to some district where they could farm, but they would need government help. Anyone who is familiar with farm work knows that there is always work to be done about a farm. No one except the man who from day to day and from week to week has experienced unemployment can realize the sense of disappointment it produces and its demoralizing effect upon body, mind and soul. Officers now attached to the department might undertake this work. They would need the assistance of voluntary organizations throughout the country and could choose, from the ranks of the unemployed, men who would be suitable for work on the land. In that way I believe the number of unemployed would be reduced and as a result there would grow up in Canada a self-reliant and self-supporting group of men who would add much to the prosperity of Canada, and relieve the treasury of calls for charity.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth consecutive day—and it is now evening—that foolishly and futilely the government has been endeavouring to breathe the newness of life into a dead bill. Into those dead bones they are now endeavouring to place fresh blood, muscles and marrow and are attempting to cause them to rise up and look like something alive. That, Mr. Speaker, is a remarkable task—a very foolish task. Why should men who in every other respect would seem to be sensible and honourable gentlemen seek to do this foolish thing? I think in order to understand this government we will all have to study psychology.

Why do they do these things? I imagine when I go back to my people and tell them about this fiasco—because that is what it is—they will ask. "But why do they do these things?" and I shall have to tell them that I do not know. How can I tell, when scarcely any of them will get up and defend their conduct? True, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) made a noble effort, but he squared himself only with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who spoke before him. He did not attempt to defend the measure, and we will not find the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who is now entering the chamber, defending this bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes, you will.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will he get up and defend this bill? Certainly he did not try to defend the bill concerning the salary cut. I think too much of his ability as a lawyer and respect too much his powers as a parliamentarian to believe that he would promote any such legislation. Our friend the Minister of Railways and Canals is a good scrapper, and yet I do not think he should be asked to bear all the sins and crimes of his colleagues, not one of whom has yet attempted to defend this bill.

The calendar on the table of the house tells me that the thing has been dead for eleven days; surely it is high time for interment. If it is left lying around on our desks any longer I am afraid the olfactory nerves of even government members will be offended. I am content to go to the funeral of the old blank check bill of last session, but certainly not to the birthday party of a new bill such as one which could be founded on this resolution.

Why are they doing it? I don't know. I wish some of the ministry would get up and defend it so that I could carry the news to my constituency and tell my people why the government is doing such strange things. Have they let the act expire by default, simply to see what we would say, and to give them an opportunity to raise the hue and cry that we are blocking relief? That is what they are doing now, and I consider it is a pretty small piece of politics. Or, are they just behind with their work?—because we know that ever since the opening of the session they have been behind with their work. Mr. Speaker, they are like the cow's tail, they are always behind, and let me tell them that when they are confronted with another ballot box tryout they will be behind again, if they don't watch out.

Mr. SPENCE: Well, you know what it is to be behind.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot see any sporting instinct in a government which will not stand up and defend its conduct. One feels a sort of squeamishness about discussing something which is dead. I have always respected old age and dead things—at least until they are buried. I am afraid I shall have to leave the enigma unsolved.

I look forward with keen interest to the next move of the government in connection with the salary cut. That legislation is just about the same—nonsense and panic. Then, as an aggregation the government is terrible. I must say however, that as individuals they are a lot of fine fellows. Probably I could illustrate in this way: We all love and admire a nice collie dog, and we are pleased to have one in the home which is gentle with the children, friendly towards strangers and generally peaceful. When we get five or six of them together, however, in a midnight frolic, we find that they will kill half the sheep and frighten the life out of the remainder. So it is with this government. Individually we like them, but as an aggregation they kill sheep—civil servants—and those they don't kill they frighten to death for fear they are going to get the axe to-morrow. How do you account for these things? I cannot account for them. They say we have a dictatorship. Well, if there was a real dictatorship there would be nothing like that going on. I have been in cabinets for a good many years. I know you cannot get men of strong minds to agree to some things without some of them discussing it very earnestly. I don't know whether these hon. gentlemen ever come to a conclusion or not that they really agree upon, because here they sit back and sulk and won't defend the measure that the Prime Minister has introduced. He did not defend it, he gave a beautiful recital. As I listened to him I thought: Anybody who would not agree to the whole works, even if some details are doubtful, would be a very sceptical person, for he told such a hundred per cent set-up, such a fine sounding story that it was fairly convincing. But he told only one side of it. Oh, so dissociated from politics too. The only minister who exceeded him in that particular was my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). You would think butter would not melt in their mouths; one would feel assured that politics was taboo from their minds the whole year round.

I am going to follow up some of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Weyburn (Mr. Young), whom I want to congratulate for stirring up the government into something like life. I had come to the conclusion that they had got such a spanking yesterday from the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and others that they could not sit comfortably on their seats; but in the meantime they have had a rest and are able to come back into the chamber. But you will notice that they only yapped away at the member for Weyburn. The Knight of the Nighties of Long Lake—I could not tell what he said, but outside of his attempt the ministerialists contented themselves with heckling at the aforementioned member, and never attempted to offset what he said; and surely they do not pretend that the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) offset anything.

I am not going into the details of this relief administration. Every time a minister would go out there the relief officers would rush into Regina to see who was coming next. As the hon. member for Weyburn said, there was complete disorganization between the dying of the old scheme through the rural municipalities and the introduction of the new. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite now or next week to give any reasons why the old rural municipal system that has been in vogue for twenty-five years was discarded and a new system introduced. There are many reasons why the old system should prevail. The rural councils were elected by the ratepayers of each municipality, not for political purposes but for municipal purposes. They had been engaged on this work for many years, for although this is the worst year it is not the first time that the municipalities have had to administer relief. As I say, they were non-political; but this government were not satisfied with that kind of rural body, they must have one of their own choice and selection. I have no particular fault to find with the Saskatchewan rural commission as a buffer between the Saskatchewan government and the administrative body. That buffer relief commission is composed of four gentlemen and a lady. We have nothing to say of them. They are not the men behind the throne. It is the Saskatchewan government that guides things and works in conjunction with the administrative body run by two of the prominent political—I was going to say heelers, but all political organizers are not what we call heelers; they may be good respectable men, but they are political organizers. I refer to Art Kendall and C. B. Daniel. These organizers and others were gathered in from various parts of the country and centered in Regina as the administrative heads of this relief and seed distribution. The ornamental or show window head is the commission itself, headed by Mr Black, a former mayor of Regina, an eminently respectable Conservative—of course there are many respectable Conservatives. But these hon. gentlemen opposite are not Conservatives, they are reactionary Tories. There are three preeminently respectable Conservatives on this commission, one Progressive and one Liberal, who are not actively engaged in administration or under pay. They are no doubt advising the administrative body, but it is Mr. Daniel and Mr. Kendall and others of their political kidney who are running the show. You have your buffer commission, eminently respectable and fairly non-partisan. Although three are strong Conservatives, one is a moderate Liberal, and the lady, I think, is a disciple of the United Farmers. We have nothing to say against them at all, but they are not the ones who are running the show, as I said before. Who are running it? Without wishing to say too much of Mr. Daniel, the fact remains that he is a political organizer. He organized the Moose Jaw campaign recently. Mr. Kendall organized the 1929 provincial elections in Ile Gros and North Battleford and the federal campaigns in the two Battlefords, and then he was gathered into the bosom of the Saskatchewan government and centred in Regina. Mr. Kendall appointed the rural relief officers, and Mr. Daniel is the administrative head of the office—a good man but an efficient Tory organizer. Look at my hon. friends opposite staring in amazement! As though I were telling them the same kind of yarns as they tell themselves.

An hon. MEMBER: You tell them so well.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then there is the hon. Minister of Agriculture—and his supervisors; the government has a right to have supervisors. The Prime Minister spoke in complimentary terms of the king's counsel who was a supervisor of this commission. There was a supervisor necessary. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture—you would think they were as innocent as lambs, pet lambs at that, about politics. Why did they scrap the rural municipal councils? I see some members from the west on the other side. I should like to see them defend the government's action in this respect. That is what the hon. member for Weyburn said, that between scrapping the regular, old non-partisan channel, and the organization of the new political channel there was a great hiatus. A regular bedlam prevailed. People were shocked at the idea that the old order of things was scrapped and a new order constituted that was Tory to the hilt. I don't know that it is such a crime to be a Tory, but just the same you will find the Saskatchewan government are just as ready for an election as Kaiser Bill was on the fourth of August, 1914, when he touched the button that sent his army into Belgium. If the Saskatchewan government is forced to the country that is all they will have to do, touch a button and put into action a completely equipped force kept up by government relief money. I can give the names of the heads of all the branches. I do not often read from notes, but I must do so now to be correct. There are three supervisors. Percy Gordon, Conservative K.C.—that is the one I expect the Prime Minister was referring to. I am not going to report to the house what I have noted here in regard to him because I cannot prove it.

Mr. STANLEY: Say it anyway.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But I know there was somebody around the Regina Star for two years before the provincial and federal elections conducting a violent anti-French and pro-K.K.K. campaign, and this gentleman was also associated with it in some way.

Mr. STANLEY: There is a good deal of courage in the way the hon. gentleman has said it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What is that?

Mr. STANLEY: I say, there is a good deal of courage in the way the hon. gentleman has said it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what the hon. member is trying to say; I suppose he has said it interrogatively. Well, I will tell you: It is almost correct enough for me to say it right out.

Mr. STANLEY: Say it then.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know it in the same way as if I knew it of my own personal knowledge. But I have said all the rest of them straight out. Next I come to Mr. Graham, another of these federal overseers. There is nothing wrong with him. He was the Conservative candidate in the provincial election in 1925 against Mr. Sykes. The other one, the Minister of Agriculture has indicated, was in his own constituency and he thought he was a Progressive. I accept that. At the head of the accounting department is Mr. C. H. Stevens, and the others are: fuel department, L. A. Snider; clothing department, L. A. Whitley; food department, W. L. McMullen, and field service, A. Kendall. That is a very significant term—field service. He has the appointing of all relief officers in the rural municipalities. Who gave him the authority? Ask the Saskatchewan government. In charge of feed and seed purchase is Mr. A. E. Wilson. This is the only gentleman in the whole crew I know of who has had any previous experience in this work. There may be some of the others with experience, but they have been successful up to the present time in concealing it. Mr. Wilson is a first class man, and though it is his misfortune to be a Tory he is a good man on such business. On food and fuel distribution we have Mr. Hemmel—the only Liberal at the head of any of these bodies. He is the only Liberal reported to me. If there is any other Liberal among them, let someone name him. Personally I know Mr. Hemmel to be a Liberal and I know Mr. Wilson to be a Conservative; but all these other gentlemen are reported to me as Conservatives—and reported by the best authority, a better authority than I can find anywhere in this house.

Mr. Kendall, therefore, holds the key to the entire position. How has he used it? I will speak only of my own municipality and allow the house to come to its own conclusion. I live in municipality 186, the same municipality in which the Hon. Mr. Gardiner resides. It is like the average municipality; it contains nine townships, approximately eighteen miles square, with a little gore along the Qu'Appelle river in addition. There were ten relief officers there, one being paid and nine non-pay. The paid officer is Mr. J. R. Dinnin. If the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) is here, he knows that you cannot get a more respectable citizen than Mr. Dinnin. As it happens, he was my Conservative opponent in 1925, and if he renews his youth as some people do when they get up to seventy he may be my opponent again. Of course there is no politics in this at all—perish the thought. I will guarantee that he will discharge his duties as squarely as he knows how. But there is a lot of practical politics in this matter, and grand contacts. There are two other relief defeated candidates in the municipality. One is Mr. George Balfour, another personal friend of mine, although not a political friend. He is a good Conservative when it comes to elections, and he was Conservative candidate against Mr. Gardiner in one of the provincial elections. Then there is Walter Weston, another defeated candidate. There you have three of them relief officers. Of the other seven, six are Conservatives. I have not a word to say against them, but they are no good to me in election time, although they are a lot of good to the other fellow. The Liberal is Jack Bonner, and if anything goes wrong, if some man doesn't get enough or doesn't get anything at all, they blame it on him. Oh, it is the finest thing you ever saw, Mr. Speaker. In all human experience, of all political machines you could not get anything so fine; it is as fine as silk and it is anticipated that it will be quite effective. I do not think it will be but that is the intention. Here you have a Liberal goat and invariably a good officer on every committee; you have someone to whom the buck can be passed, while the other nine are laughing up their sleeves. But you would not realize this from what the Prime Minister has said and described so beautifully, and that is the advantage of having both sides represented.

I have only one big fault to find with the government and it is this, that they deliberately discarded a non-political body while professing to be non-political. They have appointed a body that is actually worse than if it were one hundred per cent Tory, because they have the odd Liberal stuck in there for the purpose I have indicated. You couldn't beat it in a thousand years. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, Can they beat it? I venture the guess that every practical Conservative member over there—and they are all practical or they would not be here—will agree when I say that you could not beat this for ingenuity. If they had put on all Conservatives, the people would have risen in disgust at the enormity of such an action. But here they have the odd fellow to play the part of the useful goat.

Mr. VENIOT: Who was at the helm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The Saskatchewan government is at the helm, and the Ku Klux Klan was the spearhead of their campaign in 1929. So much for these relief officers. No one has challenged any of them, although one hon. gentleman across the floor did insinuate something about lack of courage.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, before I get through we shall see who has courage. I have never been accused of any want of courage. I merely said that I was not going to make a statement because I had not the evidence, but I have as good evidence that it is so as hon. gentlemen have that it is not so. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is getting late—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I forgot that Mr. Kendall, in the hiatus between organizing the Conservative elections and going on the commission, was engaged in a liquor store. I suppose that is a commendation in the minds of some people.

Now I have been looking into this relief act of last year and I have asked my old colleague to my right (Mr. Lapointe) whether he could find between the covers of the act any authority for taking a promissory note from the farmers when they got their relief, and he cannot find anything to that effect, except the phrase "peace, order and good government." Where is the authority for taking a lien on crops resulting from seed advanced? I pointed out rather triumphantly, to my old friend the hon. member for Quebec East, the section which indicated clearly what was meant with respect to relief. Subsection (b) of section 3 makes provision to:

Assist in defraying the cost of the production, sale and distribution of the products of the field, farm, forest, sea, river and mine.

But again I was told that the elastic term, "peace, order and good government" covered everything. The relief policy was changed to a loan policy. Promissory notes were taken from the farmers no matter how destitute they were, no matter if they could not get enough clothing to wind around their little finger, no matter if they had not coal or flour to fill a thimble; they had to sign a promissory note in blank in advance. The costs of administration may be added to the face of the note, but these men were not in position to argue. They were destitute and were ready to sign anything in order to have their hunger appeased and obtain clothing for their children. Section 2 of the act reads:

> There may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund such moneys as the governor in council in his discretion may deem expedient to expend for relieving distress, providing employment and maintaining within the competence of parliament, peace, order and good government throughout Canada.

I am told by those who know that almost anything can be done under that section except the stealing of sheep. The rest of the bill need not have been there at all. We were deceived when this legislation was put through last session. My hon. friend to my right predicted what would happen. Those who have been longer in this house than I have known what would happen, and it has turned out to be worse than anticipated.

Mr. LAPOINTE: A good deal worse.

Mr MOTHERWELL: Under this elastic relief act an amendment to the Bank Act was made by order in council; likewise the Insurance Act—doing wrong, I suppose, that good may come out of it. We learn also of the prohibition of gold exports—all under unemployment. How much good did that do for unemployment? It might easily have done great damage to Canada. Things like that should be dealt with only by means of statute, and yet we are expected to meekly fall in behind it for fear we will be blamed for blocking relief.

I am ready to take all the responsibility that can be laid at my door. The people of the country know what is going on. The government can say what they like but the people know that what was promised at the last election and what has been accomplished are poles apart. The people do not take much stock in what the government says now; the government's credit is badly discounted as far as statements are concerned. I am not afraid of what the people are going to say when they know that my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) made an unqualified offer to the government to give every co-operation if it would do things in a constitutional way, the way for which our fathers fought and bled and died over a hundred years ago.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What are hon. members over there yapping about? We know all about 1837. Our hon. friends are handicapped in their non-understanding of reform. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) said that the government benches did not understand the meaning of cooperation; they do not understand it, it is a dead language to them. I wonder how many hon. members opposite have read of the period of 1837—the struggle for parliamentary control of the executive? I am old enough to have a recollection of what my father had to say about those stirring times. Sir Francis Bond Head was the governor and all he had to do was to call in a few men like Justice Robertson and Justice Bolton—

An hon. MEMBER: Lay off that heavy stuff.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He was the governor and he called about him a little clique like that to be the government of old Canada in those days. Is it any wonder that the assembly demanded and insisted on a change? The grandfather of my leader and Papineau from Quebec led the van in that great reform movement.

Mr. SPOTTON: My grandfather helped to chase the grandfather of the Liberal leader across the border.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not hear what the hon. member said, but the other hon. members are laughing at their own folly. What a grand pair of Tories the leader of the government and the Minister of National Revenue—I will pick him out—would have made in those days. They would have made a nice Solicitor General and Minister of Justice for the governor.

In Jamaica to-day we find the same thing, a reminder of old colonial days. The Prime Minister should apply for one of these positions as he knows all about family compacts. I do not know whether or not he is well versed in clergy reserves, but he should enjoy a position where all you have to do is touch a button and everything goes his way. I gained some knowledge of the colonial system in Jamaica. I have forgotten the name of the governor and my memory is not long enough to remember all the positions which he holds.

First, he was the governor, then he was the commander in chief of the army, admiral of the navy, prime minister, president of the council, and many other things which I have forgotten. The Prime Minister could fill all these positions, in fact he has been filling many of them here for the last year and a half. The house will remember the first estimates which were put through by this government. There were supplementaries to cover money which had been spent, but instead of each minister handling his own, the Prime Minister handled them all.

When it came to entomology I offered a modest suggestion. Although I could hardly stand upon my feet. I made a few remarks about the cutworm, and when the Minister of Agriculture made his maiden speech—he was in good form and he made a good fighting speech—he used up a column of Hansard to ridicule what I had said. If he had lost as much through the cutworm as I had, he would have understood what I was saying.

The government has received many other suggestions from this side of the house but it does not understand them. I can understand that because the Tory and Liberal minds are poles asunder. We do not understand each other. I will admit quite candidly that I do not know a Tory from Adam; I do not understand him and I cannot grasp his psychology, but the electors will soon understand and will correct any difference there is between us. I intend to offer some more suggestions if eleven o'clock does not come too soon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is there someone hollering over there? Look at those two birds in the front row—I am up in years enough to respect old age and I will let it go at that.

Suggestions have been offered from this side of the house right down to the east end. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) offered a suggestion regarding the construction of houses, and yet we are told we are offering no constructive suggestions. They have appealed to us for cooperation, they have asked us to work shoulder to shoulder with them while the best authority in the world tells us not to cast our pearls before—Tories. Why should we? Yet I am going to continue because some of the seed may fall in good ground; I hope it will not be all stony and sterile. The seed fell in some good ground last year.

I see the Prime Minister is now in his seat. I was about to remark that the Prime Minister was far more docile, far more amenable to reason last year than he is this. He has been far more difficult to bring up this year. Maggie's task at bringing up Jiggs is not in it with the Conservatives' task of bringing up my right hon friend. Last year I had some encouragement in making a few suggestions. When the Prime Minister brought down his budget last session, it was claimed that it was the only budget ever brought down that was worthy of the name. Nobody ever budgeted like that before and nobody ever backed away so much before. But we do not want to rub it in too much because we think the country benefited by his backing away. This year, however, he will not back away one inch; he is just like a balky horse. I am going to blame his colleagues for this. The greatest move the Prime Minister made last year was when he discarded two proposals. At first he was going to give the five cents to the exporters of wheat; they were the only ones who could prove the export was made, but he backed away from that. Then he was going to have a magnificent new income tax schedule, but he backed away from that, rather ungraciously, it is true. I believe if we were to keep on hammering he would back away from this rotten thing we now have before us. But many think he will not; he shows no signs yet of doing so. We are going to try to shame him into it, but I propose to hold responsible, not only my right hon. friend but every one of the other members of the cabinet. I have been in government too long—

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is the only little opportunity my hon. friends have had to clap and laugh, but if they had let me put my words closer together, maybe they would not have had the opportunity. I have been in government too long not to know the difficulties of government; but no man can ever attain the dictatorial temperament, powers and practices of the present Prime Minister without the consent of his colleagues, at least, without their tacit consent. They must all accept the responsibility. If any of them do not like present conditions and feel strongly about it, they can stop it by one resignation; that is all it needs. At the time the Minister of Agriculture submitted to the most horrible cut in his estimates, he could have prevented it; it would have been a great trial, but he would have been the victor. No prime minister would let his minister of agriculture resign on that cut in the estimates, because to do so would wreck the whole government. I know what I am talking about.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I resigned from a government once, and by going out I attained my end.

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member is liable to do anything.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I accomplished my purpose and there are many members in the house who know what that purpose was. I attained my end and I stayed out. No one of the members of the cabinet can escape his responsibility; they cannot load the responsibility of this legislation on to the shoulders of the Prime Minister and escape their share. I say to the rearguard also who support the government—and there are a lot of good men in it too—they are responsible also. I happen to know that while some of us on this side may think we were the ones who induced the Prime Minister to back away last year from his horrible income tax proposals, it was the rank and file of the Tory party, I believe, who had a caucus that day who had a hand in it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the case.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I give them credit for doing so anyway. They did it once; why cannot they do it again? It was they who had to sit over there until they were blistered listening to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), while nearly all the members of the government were away off in their lairs having a comfortable time while the back benchers were standing the gaff. The private members opposite will have to assume their share of the responsibility for the introduction of a dictatorship in Canada at this time, and they cannot pass the buck on to the Prime Minister. I am not saying this to defend the Prime Minister; I am merely stating the fact. If the private members opposite think they are going to escape their share of responsibility, they have one more think to come. No one but the electors can take care of the situation; it has become so bad, so acute that that is the only redress.

I was going, as I said before, to make some suggestions. I am not going to say anything about the distribution of relief because no body of men can distribute such a vast amount of relief without making some mistakes. Many years ago I was engaged in similar work and I know the difficulties surrounding it. Therefore I refrain from making any criticism as to the distribution of so much for this man and so much for the other. I am not going to say anything about the matter, at least until it is all over, and then I shall want to know the facts before I make any complaints. I know, however, many people are burning coal who never burnt a shovelful before in their lives. One cannot prevent little things like that from happening in such a vast undertaking. But I claim it is up to the government to explain why they got rid of the regular channels of distributing relief, namely, the rural municipalities, and selected an arbitrary bunch, a ninety per cent Tory organization that they have converted to their political use at this time. If there is an election next June, they can just touch a button, as already indicated, and the whole thing will operate as smooth as silk. My hon. friends opposite disclaim any politics in the matter, but they do not believe what they say. Where, under this act, do they get authority to take promissory notes, seed grain liens, except by some deceptive use, undreamed of a year ago, of this measure?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, March 14, 1932

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—EMPLOYEES IN MANITOBA

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. What officials have been appointed by the Dominion government in Manitoba under the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, 1931?

2. What are their names, when were they appointed and what remuneration are they receiving?

3. Have any inspectors been appointed in Manitoba to supervise or otherwise superintend or watch the unemployment works or direct relief being carried on or administered in that province?

4. If so, what are their names, when were they appointed and what remuneration is each receiving?

5. Has one Elliot Kay been appointed inspector in connection with Unemployment Relief works being carried on at The Pas and vicinity, if so, what are his duties?

Mr. GORDON:

1, 2, 3 and 4. Major G. W. Northwood, M.C., general representative of the unemployment relief branch in Manitoba, appointed October 10, 1931, no remuneration.

Lt. Col. G. C. MacLean, assistant to Dominion director, appointed October 10, 1931, at a salary of $225 per month.

Miss R. I. Straith, stenographer, appointed October 15, 1931, at a salary of $90 per month.

Miss D. L. Wethey, stenographer, appointed October 19, 1931, at a salary of $60 per month.

In addition the assistant to the director has authority to employ temporary inspectors at a rate of $4 per day. These men are not continuously employed. A list of these temporary inspectors with the number of days they have worked to March 1st is attached hereto.

5. The name of Elliot Cay appears on the list of temporary inspectors referred to in answer to 4 as having been employed for 59 days. His duties are as set forth in the attached memorandum for field representatives.

General Instructions

Staff: 1. No appointments can be made except by order in council.

Supplies: 2. Requisition for supplies needed should be forwarded to this office.

Rent of premises: 3. No premises may be rented except on authorization from this office.

Provincial reports: 4. Statistics and expenditure reports are received at Ottawa from province. Specimens of forms used will be furnished to you. Assistant to director will be called upon to secure any special reports from provincial authorities when necessary.

Cost of administration: 5. No portion of provincial or municipal administration charges may be paid (see general regulations P.C. 2043, clause 13).

Expenses: 6. All expenses for travelling must be approved by Assistant to director for province and all expenditures over $2 covered by voucher. In the case of hotel expenses the statement of account issued by hotel to be attached.

Weekly report of localities visited: 7. A weekly report is required showing projects visited.

Correspondence: 8. Correspondence should be brief as possible.

Deductions: 9. Deductions from wages of workers are not allowed for any reasan whatever, except in the case where the worker is engaged in camps at a specific rate of pay and a certain deduction is to be made for board. No amounts for taxes may be deducted from the workers' pay. Municipal authorities must pay the workers, in full, amount of wages due them for their work.

Memorandum for Field Representatives of Dominion unemployment relief branch

Cooperation with provincial authorities: 1. Officials of the Dominion unemployment relief branch will cooperate with the provincial authorities, to the end that the need of the unemployed is relieved.

Technical detail covering projects: 2. Technical details of construction of projects are under the control of provincial and municipal authorities, or, in the case of Federal projects, the appropriate department of the Dominion government.

Employment selection: 3. Duties should include protecting Federal interests along the lines of seeing that those in need are given employment regardless of race, religion or political affiliation.

Employment service of Canada: 4. The employment service of Canada should be used where ever possible as medium for hiring labour.

Returned soldiers: 5. At least 10 per cent of men employed should be returned soldiers if available.

Married men: 6. It is preferable that married men or single men with dependents be given preference on work where they reside.

Elimination of case not in need: 7. On investigation if it is found that men not in need are employed, or men are not properly employed according to regulations, such cases should be followed up with proper authorities with a view to correcting conditions.

Hours: 8. The maximum day is eight hours, unless otherwise previously approved by the Minister of Labour.

Wages: 9. See that the wages as set forth and authorized by the province or municipality are being paid and that clause 8 of general regulations, P.C. 2043, is respected.

Deductions for board: 10. See that deductions for board (or medical treatment in relief camps) is according to provincial regulations.

Transportation: 11. A memorandum is being sent you setting forth the arrangements for reduced transportation charges for workers going to relief work.

Percentage of labour to total cost of works: 12. Note clause 14 of dominion-province agreement, "of the amounts expended pursuant to provisions of clauses 6, 8, 9 and 10 hereof not less than forty per centum thereof shall be expended for labour unless a modification of this requirement is previously agreed to by the Minister of Labour."

Press comments: 13. Any articles appearing in the local press adversely criticizing the administration of the unemployment relief should be investigated when practical with a view to establishing the accuracy, or otherwise, of such statements, and steps should be taken to rectify any failure to comply with regulations.

Complaints: 14. In taking action on complaints referred to you, effect an adjustment if possible.

Relief camp conditions: 15. If relief camps are not properly organized as to housing, board, sanitary conditions, etc., direct the attention of the proper authorities to the matter.

Correspondence: 16. Forward to this office copies of all communications addressed by you to provincial or municipal authorities. Address communications to "Dominion Director of Unemployment Relief, Department of Labour, Ottawa."

Direct relief: 17. See that only such relief be given as is specified in general regulations P.C. 2043 when said relief is being contributed to from federal funds.

Lists of approved works: 18. Lists of works approved under the agreement with province will be furnished to you. If you find any works being carried on to which it is proposed that the federal government should contribute, other than those appearing on the lists sent you, advise the Dominion unemployment relief branch, Department of Labour, Ottawa.

Mastondrea, Leonardo Franza, Guiseppe Cinotti, Alfreda Sole, Crintina A. Fotia, Paolina Sole, Nocolina Sole, Guiseppe Paduli, Antonio Paduli.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. RALSTON moved:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure authorized in the province of Nova Scotia for federal public works to be paid for under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the information contained in the report of the director of unemployment, I am willing that this motion should be dropped for the present. If I desire to make a motion later on for particulars with regard to any special work, I will do so.

Motion dropped.

[Mr. Duff.]

Mr. RALSTON moved:

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for contribution to works being constructed or contributed to by the provincial or municipal authorities in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

For a copy of the correspondence, documents, accounts and vouchers respecting the expenditure for direct relief in the province of Nova Scotia under the authority of the Unemployment Relief Act of last session, showing: (a) the amount authorized; (b) the amount expended.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) is agreeable—I assume this is his department—I am willing that the information to be given in connection with these motions should be the details of the various items in connection with which assistance was given to the provincial and municipal authorities in Nova Scotia and in respect of which direct relief was afforded, the amounts authorized and the amounts expended, leaving out the requisition for vouchers and documents.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This matter would come under the Department of Labour.

Mr. GORDON: The hon. member will find that the major portion of the information requested is contained in the report of the director. If he is content to allow the motions to be dropped for the present, I will endeavour to supply him with any further information he may require with respect to these matters.

Mr. RALSTON: I have allowed these matters to stand for some time. I have examined the report of the director of unemployment and the only thing I can find is the amount expended. The information as to what commitments have been made, either on account of municipal or provincial expenditures, is not contained in the report, and it is as to the various items which go to make up these commitments that I desire information. I am willing to allow my motion to be altered to cover these points only.

Motions as amended agreed to.

PEACE RIVER OUTLET

EARLY COMMENCEMENT URGED OF RAILWAY TO PACIFIC COAST

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

That in the opinion of this house, in the best interests of Canada, it is desirable that the construction of the Peace River outlet should be commenced at the earliest possible date.

He said: The subject matter of this motion has been before the house on a good many occasions. I realize that in bringing it forward again at this session I may be told that the times are not so good for the consideration of a motion such as this. I believe, however, that it is a matter of sufficient importance to warrant discussion, and that we should try to deal with it. The question was discussed at the last session and the outstanding problem then before the house was the fact that various reports had been made by different bodies of engineers and that there was some dispute as to what route ought to be followed in the construction of the Peace river outlet. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) is reported at page 4021 of Hansard, 1931, as having said:

> We should not undertake in this country the construction of very costly lines of railway which will duplicate the mistakes of the past, without a proper investigation into the whole situation and an endeavour to avoid any such condition. After all, it is far better to have the two railways agreed upon one specific route and to have the government cooperating with them.

The subject was again referred to a body of engineers, and it is quite plain from the letter that was written by the Minister of Railways to the engineers that this was the point he had in mind. Paragraph 2 of his letter reads:

> Information in connection with this subject matter has already been obtained under investigations covered by two reports leading to different conclusions, and it is desired that with the information so submitted (if sufficient), the committee examine the subject matter further, first from the viewpoint of serving adequately the local territory and, second, from the viewpoint of serving the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

The engineers were J. M. Fairbairn of the Canadian Pacific Railway, C. S. Gzowski, of the Canadian National Railways and C. R. Crysdale, consulting engineer, a gentleman who previously had been engaged by the Alberta government on the Northern Alberta Railways. The engineers' report deals with almost everything except that one problem. We have at least five reports in connection with the Peace River outlet. I have copies of four of them, and the Canadian Pacific Railway has a report of its own which has never been tabled in the house. The report with which I am dealing does not deal with that problem at all. Going through either the report of 1925 or the subsequent reports of 1926 and 1929, as well as the report of last year, one cannot fail to be impressed with this certainty, that the engineers are in no way enthusiastic about the project. They state in the first paragraph of this report that they are dealing with the matter from the standpoint of railway economics. They also state, however, that there are other matters to be considered, that these are:

> . . . .certain other potential, intangible, or prospective possibilities, which to-day are impossible to give a definite railway weight to, but which in themselves are more important than the tangible prospective traffic which can, with reasonable assurance, be forecast to-day. In such a case, from our premises we would select the former.

That is railway economics. The engineers are looking at the question purely from the standpoint of whether or not the railways by building this road might be able to make some additional money, make a few more dollars. They do not deal with it at all from the standpoint of the Dominion of Canada as a whole nor in relation to other matters such as unemployment or how the development of that country through the building of the Peace River outlet would improve business generally in this dominion. They consider no other factor than whether the railways would be able to make some additional money by building this road. It is purely a question of what the railways can gain out of it. Let me say at once that there are certain economic interests of the settlers of the Peace River country that are antagonistic to the interests of the railways. I am not blaming anyone for that, because it just happens to be that way. To-day everything that goes into or comes out of the Peace River country goes over a longer haul at a higher rate than the railways could expect to get under ordinary rate-fixing conditions if a Pacific coast outlet were built to Vancouver, Prince Rupert or Stewart. Depending on the points that are taken in the Peace River country, the mileage that would be cut off by a route constructed to Vancouver, for instance, would be somewhere between two and three hundred miles; to Prince Rupert, between two and four hundred miles, and to Stewart, possibly six hundred miles. Under present conditions, with joint ownership of the Northern Alberta Railways, the railways have, of course, a complete monopoly of all that traffic, and the rates on grain between the Peace River country to-day and Vancouver or Prince Rupert run from five to ten cents higher than from Edmonton. But if an outlet were built to the Pacific coast we could expect at least a rate only from three to five or six cents above Edmonton. There is no question about it, looking at it from the standpoint of railway economics, that without any additional investment at all the railways are getting a higher rate to-day than they would get if a

Peace River outlet were built, and that is the standpoint I think from which the railway engineers have been looking at this question. I do not think, however, that they have approached the subject in the fairest possible manner. Take, for instance, the third paragraph of the 1925 report, as referred to in sessional paper No. 125:

The 1925 report, in referring to the Peace River district, selected and defined an area and for that area theoretically provided for the so-called "maximum traffic" sufficient railway mileage to serve it. The Canadian Pacific Railway report selected an area for the Peace River district about three times that of the 1925 report, but their investigations were not extended sufficiently to figure on railroading the whole of it, but confined their railway costs substantially to the same area as the 1925 report.

Yet throughout this whole report which I have before me the engineers take the theoretically defined area of 1925, ignoring altogether the 25,000,000 acres as against the 8,000,000 acres. They wipe out in their consideration of the matter two-thirds of what they know to-day to be the Peace River area for possible settlement and development. If that is the way our railways approach the question of railway economics in this country, by ignoring two-thirds of the available facts, it is not much wonder that we have a commission to-day trying to unscramble the railway situation in the Dominion of Canada.

In section four of the report there is a peculiar statement regarding the Canadian Pacific Railway report. I believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway spent about $200,000 in 1930 surveying the various passes between the Yellowhead and the Alaska boundary. They also made some investigation regarding lands. This report says:

In fact, at least for a considerable part of the larger area—

That is the 25,000,000 acres:

—the definite information depends upon the personal observations of their own engineers on the ground.

I do not know how else they could get knowledge of the land in the Peace River country except by engineers going over the ground. They refer later to detailed information secured by Mr. Crysdale in connection with the land in British Columbia, about 16,000,000 acres, I think. I am quite sure that in an investigation extending, I think a little over twelve months, he did not plough or prospect the 16,000,000 acres, but simply went over the ground the same as the Canadian Pacific Railway engineers, and I think it is a fair statement to make that the 25,000,000 acres of Peace River lands available for development ought reasonably to be considered in connection with a study of the proposed location of an outlet to the Pacific coast. They ought to have considered the 25,000,000 acres instead of the 8,000,000 acres that were defined in connection with the report of 1925.

Just a word on the question of freight rates. As I have already said, we have had four or five reports. I have here a copy of the 1925 report.

Mr. STEVENS: Is that the Sullivan report?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It is signed by Sullivan, Gzowski, Fairbairn, James and Hill. There are a great many tables worked out in this report to show that hauling grain out of the Peace River country would never pay, and the whole report led up to this conclusion:

There is no hope, even with the existing freight rate of about 39 cents per 100 pounds, for the line to pay even operating expenses on the immediate traffic or on a traffic many times the present traffic.

There seems little hope of the line ever being self-supporting at rates even 50 per cent higher than the present ton-mile freight rate on grain to Fort William for similar distance.

That, approximately, was the rate in existence at the time this report was prepared. In the year 1926 however rates were reduced from 39 cents to about 29 cents on grain moving to Vancouver. During the next two years, with those reduced rates, the Alberta government had charge of the Northern Alberta railways, the railway system serving the Peace River country, and in spite of the fact that in the year 1925 our engineers told us that a railway in that country could never pay, and that an outlet could never pay, in spite of the fact that there were developed less than 1,000,000 acres of land out of a possible 8,500,000 acres, under the management of Mr. Callaghan, the Deputy Minister of Railways in the province of Alberta, the railway company I have mentioned improved its position in those two years to the extent of a million dollars.

At page 497 of the Canadian Annual Review for the year 1928-29 we have the following statement:

The sale of the Northern Alberta Railways to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways was ratified by the legislature during the session of 1929. In moving the second reading of the bill for this purpose on February 18, Hon. V. W. Smith, Minister of Railways, reviewed the history of these lines. He stated that in the first full year of government operation, that of 1927, there had been a net operating surplus for all the northern railways of $303,786.63, as against an operating defict of $188,655.34 in the previous year. In 1928, the operating surplus was $810,209.41. Mr. Smith stated that faith in the abounding vitality and increasing growth of the province of Alberta and the Peace River region, were the reasons that influenced the government's course in refusing the joint offers submitted for the purchase of these railways early in 1928.

The annual report of the department of Railways for the calendar year 1928, gave operating statements for the four northern railways for that year. The operating revenues of the Edmonton-Dunvegan and British Columbia railway were $1,782,160.43 and operating expenses $871,971.03. After allowing for some other revenue and other expenses the net corporate income of the railway was $88,090.27 after interest on funded and unfunded debt.

Therefore the position in 1928 is that the Edmonton-Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway, and the Central Canada Railway were actually on a paying basis and were revenue producers to the Alberta government, when less than 1,000,000 acres had been developed and when five engineers had stated three years previously that there was no hope for the success of the railway. Of course an additional investment of possibly $15,000,000 would be necessary for the construction of an outlet, but without any further extension of railway mileage there is a possible increase of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 acres. Yet with less than 1,000,000 acres in use we find the railway was a revenue producer for the Alberta government.

Here is another fact: The Edmonton-Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway and the Central Canada Railway were in those days merely branch lines of the Canadian National Railways system. Every carload of grain leaving the Peace River country and every carload of machinery brought in was hauled two or three times as far on the Canadian National railways as it was on the Alberta railways, and I think we may draw the inference quite fairly that whatever may have been the revenues to the Alberta government from the two railways I have mentioned, there was an additional profit to the Canadian National Railways, because in some cases the freight was hauled two or three times as far on the Canadian National system as on the Alberta railways.

In the face of facts such as these, the talk about ton-miles, and the comparison of ton-miles of grain moving over the Canadian National railways and other commodities moving over other railways in North America is not very convincing. It seems to me that the statement of revenue accruing in Alberta in the year 1928 as a result of the operation of these railways is far stronger than any statement of engineers to the effect that this road cannot be expected to pay, or that we cannot expect any development in the Peace River district which will justify construction of the outlet for years to come.

In the last five years the population of the Peace River country has almost doubled—in fact, I think it has nearly doubled in the last four years. In all railway reports there have been references to the need for additional branch mileage.

Mr. MANION: Could my hon. friend give me an idea of the population?

Mr. KENNEDY: About five years ago it was about 20,000; to-day it is about 40,000. There is a steady stream of new settlers moving in from the dried out areas; some of them are moving back and homesteading eighty or ninety miles from the railway. As a result of dry years a good many of them were in financial difficulties when they left the south country. Very few of them have capital with which to go ahead and develop a new country. They are not situated as happily as were the settlers who moved to that district about twenty years ago; they have taken land more difficult to develop. Many of them have been asking for relief, not as a result of their experience in the Peace River district but resulting from their experience in the districts from which they came. Many of them are directly on the route of any outlet which would be built westward. To my mind it would be more sensible to spend money constructing a work such as that suggested in the resolution, thereby providing a chance for those people to earn money while they are developing their farms, than to pay out direct relief to them. Certainly there is great credit coming to those people who, instead of throwing up their hands, joining the ranks of the unemployed and drifting to some of the cities, struck out for themselves and tried to effect reestablishment in a new country. I know assistance is being given to them partly by the federal and partly by the Alberta governments. I think they would be better pleased however, and Canada would profit more in the long run, if the development of this outlet were begun, so that they might be provided with opportunities equal to those enjoyed by so many of the early settlers on the prairies. During a certain period of the year they could earn money apart from their farms, and during the remainder of the year their efforts could be directed towards the development of their lands.

One fact brought out in the evidence before the railway committee in the year 1927 was that under a proposal such as outlined by the engineers for the construction of an outlet there would be over 6,000 acres of economic land per mile of line in the Peace River country, as compared with an average of 5,000 acres in the other prairie provinces. Undoubtedly that is one reason why we had such favourable results in railway operation in the Peace River during the years that I have mentioned. Our yields per acre have been running from four to six bushels higher than the average in the prairie provinces. If the three prairie provinces were worth railroading, it seems to me that with the higher yields per acre in the Peace River and with about twenty per cent greater acreage per mile of line, we have a pretty good case for the economics of the proposal. I know the railways have taken the position that there ought to be enough traffic in sight to justify the expenditure right from the start. I do not think there is any possibility that we can meet such a condition. If that is the basis on which the railway is to be built, then I do not think we are likely to have the proposed outlet for a good many years to come. But how many of our railways would have been built, and how much development would we have had in western Canada, if some twenty, thirty or forty years ago that condition had been laid down?

Having demonstrated the fertility of the soil, and the investigation having established the fact that there is sufficient arable land to justify the railway mileage, it seems to me that we have made out a good case for the construction of the outlet. I know the argument will be advanced that these are hard times. Well, the curves of hard times and good times in Canada have been followed up and down very largely by extensive programs of public works and railway construction. If one cares to look at the record of railway mileage built since 1901 it is quite plain that in the good years we have constructed a greater railway mileage. But, after all, is there not a fairly good case for spreading out the construction of public works and railways? I do not know whether it is safe to argue that the construction of these public works and railways was a cause or an effect of the prosperity that we enjoyed. I think it is partly one and partly the other. But I feel quite sure that by closing down on railway construction and reducing our expenditure on public works to the minimum we are contributing to the continuance of the depression, and I think it is fair to ask that the government take the initiative in trying to break the depression. Various proposals have been made to this end. Some of those proposals have been waived aside, but undoubtedly here is a project, that must be built, if promises made in past elections are to be fulfilled—and I think they will be some time. The route has been surveyed, the proposed undertaking has been thoroughly investigated, and I think it is pretty well known where the outlet is going to be. Surely it is a sound policy to view the proposition over a five or ten year period and say we ought to take it in hand now. Undoubtedly if we undertake it at the present time it would help a very large number of people to establish themselves who otherwise would be dependent on straight relief. I think in the Willison report, prepared for the province of Ontario away back in 1913, it was said that governments ought to look ahead and plan public works for the future. Well, here is one of the best-planned public works we have ever had in the dominion. I think the Minister of Railways himself believes in a plan, because he mentioned a five-year plan for the national railways within which time they would get back on their feet and become self-supporting. I think we know exactly where the outlet ought to be, we know pretty well how much it will cost, and I think we know also that it is going to be built in the near future anyway. Undoubtedly its construction will contribute to the welfare of the people in the Peace River country, some of whom, as I have already said, will otherwise have to depend on direct relief; and as its construction will help towards breaking the depression it will be in the interests of the whole dominion to proceed with the project in the near future.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) on the moderate and fair tone of his speech, and on his persistence—rightly so from his standpoint—in advocating the construction of this outlet for the Peace River country. The hon. gentleman has been a consistent supporter of the proposal during the regime of the late government as well as during the time that the present administration has been in office. I have no exception to take to any of his statements but one, in which he contrasted the larger area of 25,000,000 acres with the smaller area which at an earlier stage was thoroughly investigated by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways. I have been advised, and I think correctly, that the larger area of which he speaks, while without doubt containing very promising agricultural land, has not been surveyed to anything like the same extent as was the smaller area upon which the report was made in 1925 and 1926 recommending the Aggie-Obed route. I merely mention this to preserve the accuracy of the record.

As I said last session, I sympathize with the hon. gentleman in his desire to have the people in his section well-served with railways. I come from a section which, particularly in my younger days, was very desirous of railways, and recalling those early pioneer days of nearly forty years ago, I can easily sympathize with my hon. friend's desire to have the railway facilities to which he refers given to his people in the Peace River country. Last year I hoped most sincerely to visit that great section of our country, but unfortunately due to the pressure of other matters I did not have the opportunity to do so. Perhaps it might not have made any remarkable change in the situation at all, but I should have liked very much to have known that section of the country at first hand.

Before going further may I say that I am not opposing the hon. gentleman's attitude; I am simply discussing it and pointing out the difficulties in the way. I should like to review the situation very briefly. My information of course is not first hand, because I have not inspected the different routes, and while my hon. friend comes from that part of the country probably he has not visited them all either, but at any rate there are four routes which have been suggested as outlets for the Peace River area. There is the Aggie-Obed route, which was suggested in the report of one of the commissions; there is the Monkman pass route, the Pine pass route and finally the Peace pass route, any one of which would provide an outlet from that territory such as my hon. friend desires, though I take it he is not satisfied with the Aggie-Obed route. I believe the production in that area in the last year for which we have complete figures was in the neighbourhood of 20,000,000 bushels, while my hon. friend tells me there are some 40,000 people living in that district.

Having those points in mind I should like to point out that there have been various examinations made of the whole question, as my hon. friend stated. I think he mentioned five different reports. I recall only four, though there may be another, since this question has been looked into very thoroughly. The first report of which I have knowledge was the joint report of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways, made in 1925. The second report of which I have heard, though I have never had the opportunity of reading it, is the one of 1929-30, made in cooperation with the railways by the province of British Columbia itself. This report never has been supplied to me or, I think, to any member of this house. Some of the British Columbia members may have seen it, but I have not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No, no one has seen it, but I may say that it was tabled in the provincial house just the other day.

Mr. MANION: Then there was the 1931 report of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has not been tabled in this house because, while I have a copy in my office, I was never given permission by the company, who made the examination at their own expense, to lay it on the table of the house. After that report came out, since it differed materially from the original report which recommended the Aggie-Obed route, I stated in the house last year that I would endeavour to have the two railways get together and, if possible, agree upon a joint report. Later on I had Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty in my office, as I promised, and they discussed the whole matter, but neither railway was interested in building an outlet by itself; in fact both gentlemen took the position that if this route should be opened up, the government must pay the bill. At the same time, however, they agreed that a further joint investigation might be made by their engineers and a third engineer to be appointed, and as a result this 1932 report, which was tabled a short time ago, was made. At my request an investigation was made by a Canadian Pacific railway engineer, a Canadian National railways engineer, and a third engineer, Mr. Crysdale. Those are the four reports that have been placed before me, or of which I have knowledge, and I mean to deal with them very briefly.

The joint report of 1925 favoured the Aggie-Obed route, and I should like to place on record a brief resumé of the report. The engineers estimated that there were about 8,500,000 acres of land in the Peace River district suitable for settlement, and that when it was developed this land would produce about 1,860,000 tons of outgoing traffic, or a total of about 1,953,000 tons of all traffic. They recommended the Aggie-Obed outlet and I will give some of the details of their estimate of the cost of development. The minimum immediate outlay they estimated at $13,336,000, and the cost for the maximum tonnage, including branch lines, they estimated at about $80,000,000. In their conclusions they make the following statement:

> It would be more economical to handle the business, regardless of the rate received, over the existing lines, until the traffic was many times the present.

From the figures in their report it appears that when traffic amounts to 1,080,000 tons it will be economical to build the Aggie-Obed outlet. That was the report of 1925. The British Columbia report of 1929-30 I have not seen, so I shall not discuss it. The 1931 report which was made by the engineers of the Candian Pacific Railway at a cost to the railway of something like $250,000, favoured the Peace pass outlet. There is no harm in my making that statement, since it is referred to in the report now under discussion. I did not make that statement last year, though I had that knowledge at the time, because I had not the permission of the railway to disclose any of the details, but since that statement has been made in the report now before the house I see no harm in repeating it.

Then we have the report which is really under discussion at the moment, in which nothing new is brought out. The report contains a letter which I sent to the engineers, because they wanted some instructions. While I gave them instructions in a general way, I stated that we hoped they would not have to go to any great expense, though we did not strictly limit them, and had they so chosen they could have asked for money with which to carry on any investigation they desired. However, we were not asked for any further appropriation of any kind for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does the minister know if the engineers went to the Peace River area last year?

Mr. MANION: I am sorry I cannot say, but all three engineers have been there a good deal. As my hon. friend knows, Mr. Gzowski, Mr. Fairbairn and Mr. Crysdale have all made reports of their own on the same question, and they have investigated, probably as far as anyone in Canada has investigated, the possibilities of that area. I will not read the whole report, though it is rather brief, but I wish to read the concluding paragraphs because they sum up the whole matter:

> At the time the 1925 report was made, local interests were mainly concerned in obtaining a western outlet to cheapen their freight cost to the Pacific, and supply further railway mileage in the district. Since that time, a reduction of freight rates has been accorded them, now substantially equalling rates which would obtain if a western outlet were in use; and also since that time, about 130 miles of new branch lines have been put into operation. Thus, if not all, have the main requirements of the local interest been met. As the development of the district is from time to time pushed beyond reasonable road haulage distance from the existing lines of railways, local interest will demand further railway mileage. In our opinion this can be, as and when necessary, readily met by further branch line construction.
> In view of the above, our conclusions are:
> 1. No western outlet is justified for the present, as the existing railway furnishes the most economical route. It will take many times the present traffic to justify another railway outlet.
> 2. The Obed route for a western outlet is the most favourable from a railway economic standpoint, considering the present phase of the railway situation.
> 3. We recommend that the matter of a final route be decided when the question is a practical one, believing that by the time the volume of traffic has reached a point where a western outlet is justified, general and possible local conditions may have materially changed. When the decision is imperative, the whole situation should be reviewed, in order to appraise all the contributing factors, including the potential traffic which may accrue from the lands beyond the definite areas included in this report.

This is signed by the three engineers, Mr. J. M. R. Fairbairn, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway; C. S. Gzowski, chief engineer of construction of the Canadian National Railways, and C. R. Crysdale, consulting engineer. I mention the personnel of the commission because there has been some question raised—not by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, but by others—as to the suitability of these gentlemen. It seemed to me to be eminently fair to choose the chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the chief engineer of the Canadian National Railways both of whom had been dealing with this matter. The third appointee was Mr. Crysdale who was known to the people of British Columbia. No objection was made to this appointment, and in fact I can go further and say that this choice was approved.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By the government of British Columbia?

Mr. MANION: I do not know that I wish at the moment to state that positively, but I can assure my hon. friend that no objection was raised by the government of British Columbia. I have had some correspondence of a private nature with the government but I doubt if I have the right to put it on Hansard. There was no opposition and I do not know, and I am sure my hon. friend does not know, of any reason why there should have been opposition. Only a short time before, if I remember rightly, Mr. Crysdale was asked by the government of British Columbia to make a thorough investigation of the lands surrounding the Pacific Great Eastern Railway, and apparently that report was considered to be satisfactory. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that Mr. Crysdale was an eminently suitable choice.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The reason I interjected was because the Premier of British Columbia, referring to the press reports, repudiated any obligation as far as the Crysdale appointment was concerned.

Mr. MANION: I saw that statement and while I can say quite frankly that there was no official recognition by the government of British Columbia, I repeat that there certainly was no opposition raised to this appointment. That is as far as I care to go this afternoon.

Both Sir Henry Thornton and Mr. Beatty agree with this report, and to be fair to them I shall read their letters. The letter of Sir Henry Thornton is a clear endorsation of the report. It is dated December 30, 1931, and reads:

> Referring to the report which was sent you dealing with the Peace River outlet and signed by the chief engineers of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways together with Mr. C. R. Crysdale, consulting engineer, I beg to say that I have examined it and am entirely in accord with its conclusions.

I shall read Mr. Beatty's letter and the house can use its own judgment in connection therewith. So far as the general principles are concerned, Mr. Beatty, while taking exception to the decision that the Aggie-Obed route is the best, endorses the report; so far as I can read his letter, and I think I understand it thoroughly, he agrees. I had had Sir Henry Thornton's letter and I did not think it was fair to put one on the record without having the other, so I wrote to Mr. Beatty asking him for his opinion. His reply is dated February 22, and reads:

> I have your letter of the 19th instant relative to the engineers' report with respect to the Peace River outlet.
> With the exception of one paragraph I endorse the engineers' conclusions. The observation to which I take exception is that relating to the Obed route, and I do so because a Peace River outlet must be justified on its permanent value, and the Obed route, though the cheapest from the standpoint of construction cost, could not be considered a proper solution of the question of an outlet.
> No company nor any government would, in my opinion, be warranted in building the so-called Obed cutoff, if the Peace River district has the possibilities we believe it has and if the outlet is designed to be of the greatest possible value to the development of the whole area.
> You will appreciate that my objection to this route is largely due to the existence of a back haul on traffic from the west and north which would involve a continuous handicap as the development of the area is extended.

I think I am right in saying that in a general way Mr. Beatty endorses the report, for the present at least, although he does not agree that the Aggie-Obed route would be the most suitable over a long period.

I have mentoned already that in the 1925 report the estimates of the cost ranged from a minimum traffic cost of some $13,000,000 up to a maximum traffic cost, including branch lines, amounting to some $80,000,000. It would appear to me that it is quite possible, as time goes on, that more branch line will have to be built in this section, rather than an outlet at the present time. It has been stated to me by some of the officers, if not by the presidents of the two railroads, that it would take ten times the present crop to make this route a paying proposition. While I agree with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) that railroads have to be built in advance of the absolute need—it should not be expected that railroads should pay from the first day of their construction—at the same time, if that statement is correct—it was made to me I think by one of the presidents, and I believe in the presence of the other—it would appear that it is a little early to consider the building of this outlet at the cost suggested.

I can state positively that at the present time neither the Canadian Pacific nor the Canadian National railways desires that this route should be built unless the government chooses to construct it as a governmental enterprise, as was done with the Hudson Bay route. It is easily understandable that neither railway, in view of their financial condition, would want to enter upon this expenditure. We all know the financial condition of the Canadian National Railways, and many of us know that the Canadian Pacific has been badly hit, as all railroads on this continent have been, by the decrease in general commercial and industrial enterprise which had continued up to about 1928. To a large extent both railroads are taking the attitude that there should not be any heavy capital expenditure, and for that reason they put this matter up to the government to decide whether or not it feels it can afford at the present time to finance this outlet.

I made some inquiries with regard to rates, and I shall put the information I received upon Hansard, and at the same time ask the house, and particularly the hon. member for Peace River, if he considers that these rates are reasonable. I shall give the rates from Grande Prairie to Fort William and to Vancouver. This point is considered to be a suitable one to discuss and I think the rates from other points will be in proportion. The rate per hundred pounds from Grande Prairie to Fort William was 63½ cents in 1921, in 1922 the rate was lowered to 45 cents; another reduction took place in 1924 to 43 cents, and in 1925 the rate was lowered to 35½ cents, which I think is the present rate. The rate per hundred pounds from Grande Prairie to Vancouver was in 1921, 58½ cents; in 1922, 48 cents; in 1923, 43 cents; in 1924, 39½ cents and in 1925, 28 cents. The present rate to Vancouver is less than half the rate which obtained in 1921, while the rate to Fort William is a little more than half that which obtained in 1921.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Would the rate to Prince Rupert be the same?

Mr. MANION: I have not that information before me but it seems to me that it is reasonable to suppose that the rates would be similar. In view of all these facts, I ask my hon. friend if these rates are not fairly reasonable in view of the distances?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): They may be considering the distances, but the distance might be cut in two.

Mr. MANION: The distance to Fort William would not be changed; the distance to Vancouver would be decreased but it would not be cut in half.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It would be to Stewart.

Mr. MANION: I do not know whether or not the construction of this outlet would bring about a material lowering in the rates. I do not profess to be any more than an amateur in dealing with freight rates, and I am afraid that is true of most hon. members.

The hon. member has placed this matter fairly and squarely before the house and the government will have to decide whether or not this construction can be carried on as an unemployment relief scheme. Apparently neither railway is satisfied to carry this work through without the government paying the bills. I presume that either of them would be glad to see it done if someone else would pay the bills, but neither of the railways is prepared to pay them. So that having fairly placed his case before the government, the hon. member, I suggest, should be satisfied and should withdraw his motion, leaving it to the government to decide whether the matter should be regarded as an unemployment relief measure, as he proposed in his closing remarks, or one for general development purposes. I suggest that he should leave it to the government to say whether it can see its way clear to spend this rather large amount of money at the present time under present somewhat stringent financial conditions, in order to provide a shorter outlet from the Peace River district. I submit that in all fairness to my hon. friend, with whom I am in sympathy, and I can assure him that at any rate the subject will be given fair consideration by the government. At the moment, however, I cannot state what the policy of the government ultimately will be.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) is entitled to the congratulations of all other members of this house, and particularly, if I may say so, of the members from western Canada, upon the very fair-minded and comprehensive way in which he has submitted this resolution to the consideration of parliament. I think also that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) has made a very fair presentation of the attitude of the government towards this most important scheme of railway development.

It is very much to be regretted—and this applies to both political parties—that the attitude of caution, and of considered caution, which was adopted this afternoon by the Minister of Railways, was not adopted by the spokesmen of the various political parties during the different campaigns from 1926 to 1930 inclusive. Those of us who have knowledge of the Peace River situation and who have taken the trouble to look up the records of parliament will recall that ever since 1922, during every session of parliament, this question has been adduced for the consideration of the members of this house. I recall that my hon. friend who sponsors this resolution to-day brought the matter to the attention of the house in 1922 when, as a result of his representations, a vote of $50,000 was passed by the house for the undertaking of a reconnaissance survey of the district, a vote which was amplified by a further contribution of $75,000 in the subsequent year, 1923. In 1924, as was intimated last year by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), who made a substantial and exhaustive contribution to the debate upon the history of the Peace River development, a meeting was held in the office of the Minister of Railways, at that time the Right Hon. George P. Graham, at which there were present the following gentlemen: Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways; Mr. E. W. Beatty, K.C., president of the Canadian Pacific Railway; Hon. Mr. Greenfield, Premier of Alberta; Hon. Verner Smith, Minister of Railways of Alberta;

Mr. W. F. Maclean, member of parliament, Toronto; the sponsor of the present resolution (Mr. Kennedy), and the Hon. John Oliver, the rugged old, white-haired Premier of British Columbia. At that conference it was agreed that the two railways should get together and undertake a thorough examination into the various routes of the Peace River district, and the report brought in on that occasion is the one which has been referred to this afternoon—the 1925 report actually tabled in this house early in 1926. That report was signed by five engineers and it did actually recommend the Obed route for the consideration of parliament.

I think there are two considerations to be weighed by the house this afternoon. There is an obligation of honour in regard to the development of the Peace River area, and that obligation rests emphatically upon the Conservative and Liberal parties in this House. I am going to read now what my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) said, because I am going to pin down both political parties to their previous declarations and the representations they made with respect to the development of that area. Speaking at Edmonton, 1924, my right hon. leader said:

> I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace River country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied, and will open up the country for prospective settlers.

I wish also to quote what the present leader of the upper house said, speaking in the same city on October 1, 1924. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, on that occasion, made this statement:

> I have always urged that the north country should have railway relief. I cannot be accused of making futile promises, such as the Hon. Mackenzie King promised in the speech from the throne, at the opening of the last session of parliament, when he stated he was going to give railway relief to the north country, but nothing has been done.

Then again, in 1927, when the present member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) moved a further resolution in this House, the question was submitted to the committee on railways and canals. The hon. member read to the house this afternoon some of the submissions and recommendations of that committee, a certain recommendation having been made with regard to a general survey and reconnaissance of the whole district. Last year the hon. member for Peace River read to the house, submissions and recommendations made by Mr. Murray Hill of the Canadian National Railways, and I shall not repeat them this afternoon. The hon. member for Peace River referred this afternoon to the fact that the Edmonton-Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway, which was sold to the Canadian Pacific Railway for $26,000,000, has, since the tabling of the 1926 report, been placed upon a paying basis; and so far as I am concerned, despite the letters which my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has read to the House to-day, despite the letter from Sir Henry Thornton which endorses in toto the report of these three engineers; despite the letter, to my mind much preferable, from Mr. E. W. Beatty, K.C., who favours the development of the Peace pass route as the final solution of the Peace River transportation outlet problem; I submit, with all deference to the hon. gentlemen who were signatories of the report, that the fullest investigation has not been made. The Minister of Railways was good enough last year, as a result of representations made to him, to promise that within a month of the termination of that session he would send the engineers to make a thorough report upon the entire transportation system, but I fear that these three engineers, who have subscribed their names to the report, have not been in the Peace River territory, or at least have not had an opportunity of making a final and exhaustive examination of the Peace pass, the Pine pass, the Monkman pass and the Aggie-Obed route recommended here.

I submit to my hon. friend that he take into consideration the representations made by his own leader—because I am pinning down both the Conservative and Liberal parties—in the famous pledge number five of the Winnipeg speech made during the general election of 1930. Most of the 40,000 settlers referred to by the hon. member for Peace River this afternoon went into that area under distinct promises made to them. Some of these promises for a transportation outlet were made by the various governments of my own province of British Columbia; some of the representations were made by the Alberta government, and many of them were made by the leaders of the two major political parties in Canada. The promise given by the right hon. gentleman opposite, to which I have just referred, is this:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it most readily available to every part of Canada; to the Pacific slope by a Peace River outlet, and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways,, and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities.

So we have three leaders, the right hon. gentleman at present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and two former prime ministers, in office before him, all of whom distinctly pledged themselves to the settlers of the Peace River empire, that they would definitely build an outlet from that area to the sea. I have no hesitation, even at the risk of wounding the susceptibilities of my prairie friends, in submitting to the Minister of Railways that, so far as a national asset is concerned, so far as the upbuilding and development of the dominion is concerned, the development of that Peace River empire is of far greater value, a far greater and more abiding asset to the dominion, than the Hudson Bay terminal. I want to remind my hon. friend that last year I made a very constructive suggestion to the administration. I suggested that they might divert in considerable proportion of the moneys available under the Unemployment Relief Act, used in building useless highways in the province of British Columbia, towards the construction, in cooperation with the government of that province, of an outlet from the Peace River territory to the sea. Subsequent to the termination of last session I believe that the provincial government of British Columbia made overtures to the federal administration, and I believe that the very same Mr. Crysdale who is a signatory to this report prepared a report which was tabled in the provincial assembly of British Columbia the other day in which he stated that you could build a line up to Finlay Forks at the prevailing prices of labour and material for a total sum of $6,000,000. That would bring the railway to the very edge of a marvellous territory, tremendously rich in resources, with a fertile soil capable of producing in a way which would delight the mixed farmer and the grain farmer. Such a soil I believe is not known in any other portion of this dominion, and had my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) adopted my suggestion of last year, then instead of the unfortunate consequences with which the administration is confronted in the maladministration of our unemployment funds in the province of British Columbia, instead of the tremendous wastage we have had there in the futile attempt to build useless and hopeless roads, and my hon. friends opposite know this as well as I, if the extension of the Pacific Great Eastern railway had been embarked upon, fulfilling the obligations made to that railway to attach it to the old Grand Trunk system, to-day you would have something concrete, something constructive, something real to show to the people of British Columbia and to the Dominion of Canada as a whole. I am appealing, Mr. Speaker, to the minister even at this session to proceed with the construction of that outlet, if not on a national basis, and it is abundantly justified on a national basis—just as much as the St. Lawrence seaway or the Hudson Bay terminal, then on the ground that it is the last great undeveloped portion of this dominion, that splendid northland in the northern part of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, with the development of which territory with its magnificent resources is closely linked the future of Canada. I appeal to the administration to proceed this year with the construction and early completion of an outlet from the Peace river to the sea both on the ground of doing something constructive to help the thousands of unemployed in British Columbia and the prairie provinces and to develop for this dominion what is in very essence and very truth a valuable and a veritable empire in itself.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): I should like to offer a few remarks on the resolution before the house. I must first with other hon. gentlemen congratulate the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) on the very fair and reasonable presentation he has made of this subject. I have listened on several occasions to the hon. gentleman making a similar presentation on behalf of the people in the Peace River and the opening up of that district, and on each and every occasion he has always been very fair and very reasonable in his presentation.

Before I proceed I wish to take strong exception to one remark that was made just a few minutes ago by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), when he said that it would have been better if this government had assisted the government of British Columbia in constructing a railway line from Vancouver to Finlay Forks instead of proceeding with a lot of the hopeless and useless roads which they had under way in the province. I take strong exception to that statement. The British Columbia government has undertaken no roads that are either hopeless or useless. I would ask the hon. gentleman what he has to say about the construction of the trans-Canada highway in British Columbia? Is that a useless and hopeless piece of road? What about the road which I suppose my hon. friend himself as well as the rest of us has advocated from Hope to Penticton? Does he call that a hopeless and useless piece of road? What about the road up the North Thompson? Does he call that a useless and hopeless piece of road? What about the road from Prince Rupert to Tete Jaune? Is that a hopeless and useless piece of road? These are the main roads, Mr. Speaker, which have been laid out in the government's program for unemployment relief in the province of British Columbia, and when my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre states that these are hopeless and useless roads I take very strong exception to his statement. They are all highly necessary roads and the construction work is proceeding in a very fair and reasonable manner on each and every one of these projects.

With regard to the situation in the Peace River country, the report which we have before us practically confirms the report of 1925. It goes back and says that the Obed route is the most preferable or the best western outlet from the Peace River country. I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, how engineers who take into consideration the situation there is in that country can come to any such conclusion. I am not a railroad engineer and do not pretend to criticize the report from that standpoint, but from the standpoint of British Columbia I do say that there is no justification in the world for the Obed route, and if the Obed route should be constructed it will hold back the development of the Peace River portion of British Columbia for generations and put Peace River off the map entirely. It will be generations before it will be possible to get a railway to serve that area.

Some reference was made here this afternoon to a report which was made for the British Columbia government in conjunction with the Canadian government and the railways and tabled a few days ago in the provincial assembly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In conjunction with the two railways, but not the Dominion government.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): In conjunction with the two railways and the province. I have not had an opportunity to read that report which was tabled only a few days ago, but I have seen a review of it in one of the local papers in British Columbia, from which for the information of hon. gentlemen I should like to quote. While this report which has just been tabled makes reference to lands which are entirely within the province of British Columbia, they are not all in what we call the Peace River area, but if the Peace River route is followed they would all be tributary to a railway connecting up Peace River with Vancouver. I am going to quote from the review which appeared in the Kamloops Sentinel of a few days ago. This is what it says in reviewing the report which was made for the British Columbia government in regard to the Pacific Great Eastern lands in British Columbia, part of which are in the Peace River block

> The general public had almost forgotten that the railways and provincial government had carried out a survey of the resources of Pacific Great Eastern Railway lands during 1929-1930. This has proved to have been most exhaustive. Under the supervision of Major J. R. Crysdale, the investigation is described as one of the most comprehensive ever undertaken in the dominion, which means much.
> In a nutshell the resources are listed thus:
> Coal—good quality, easily mined to the extent of 600,000,000 tons.

That is in the Peace River area. It goes on:

> Timber—more than 18,000,000,000 board feet, with nearly all of it classed as accessible.
> Petroleum and natural gas—620 square miles of favourable structure areas.
> A total area of nearly 20,000,000 acres of which only 893,000 have been alienated, 2,230,000 are cultivable, 11,000,000 suitable for grazing lands and 6,000,000 unproductive.
> Water-power—over 150,000 horse-power in Peace River block and a minimum of 50,000 horse-power in the three southern blocks.
> Geologists report 3,630 square miles with lode mineral possibilities and 9,400 square miles of favourable area for placer gold. Other non-metallic minerals are reported "potentially important."
> This report will reconcile British Columbians somewhat to this historic railway which has been described as a line which starts nowhere and arrives nowhere. Posterity may see in it a project that had one salient fault, it was built long before its time. But that the general route had merit will be conceded, in the light of the resources that are now revealed. It is to be hoped that the survey will have an important bearing in the event of a sale, a consummation devoutly to be wished during these times.

That, Mr. Speaker, gives an idea of the resources tributary to the proposed western outlet of the Peace River country. All the resources I have outlined are tributary to and can be made accessible to that line. The development of these natural resources would surely to some extent lend itself to giving employment to quite a number of people in the province of British Columbia. I fail to understand why, having all these facts before them, the engineers came to the conclusion that the Obed route is the proper western outlet for the Peace River country. I am very loath to accept it.

A statement was made in the first part of the report that the report is based on railway economics. From a review of the situation and from my personal knowledge of the country, may I say that if railway economics are reflected in that report, I am not very favourably impressed with them. I would say that the report submitted is nothing but economic tomfoolery. Certainly it does not appeal to me as sensible or reasonable, and I suggest to the Minister of Railways and Canals that the matter now before us should be considered from a standpoint other than the one of railway economics, if the report to which I have referred is the result of a railway economic survey.

What will happen to the northern part of British Columbia and all these resources I have outlined? May I add that I have touched only upon the possibilities of that section of Canada. One could travel up the Finlay river and treble the mineral area, if one desired. Further may I point out that the Finlay area is not included in this report. What will happen is simply this, that the Obed route will be of no potential value to the province of British Columbia. Not only that, but it will do very little service to the province of Alberta. That province is already served by a railway. The construction of the Obed route would do nothing for the province of Alberta, and for at least a time it would put the Peace River section of the province of British Columbia entirely off the map. That part of Canada lying north of the Peace River district will be placed in a position whereby, in order to get produce to the natural market of Vancouver, it will have to be hauled about 1,600 or 1,700 miles, instead of along the Peace River route of only 800 or 900 miles. As my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) has pointed out, that distance will be very materially reduced, if the outlet is taken to Stewart.

For the consideration of the minister and the government I can think of no other project in the whole of the Dominion of Canada which will lend itself so readily and be of such lasting benefit to all the people as the construction of a western outlet from the Peace River district. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) has stated, the building of the outlet has been promised by both the political parties. There could be only one excuse for the government not proceeding with the construction of the route, and that would be the financial position of this as well as other countries. Whether or not that is sufficient reason to postpone construction, I admit it is a very substantial reason why the undertaking should be considered only after very careful observations and inquiries. I submit the construction of the Peace River outlet would be one of the most readily accessible projects in the Dominion of Canada for the relief of unemployment.

[Mr. J. A. Fraser.]

I suggest consideration of the matter to the government, and trust they will give it their very best thought. I would hope that after inquiry they may find themselves in a position to provide the sum of $15,000,000 towards the completion of the outlet and connection with that northern country.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add a few words to what already has been said regarding the Peace River proposal. During the last two days I have been perusing the report which was issued, and which I now have before me. I am particularly struck with the first paragraph of that report wherein the letter of the minister is quoted. In that letter the engineers were asked to approach the subject from the viewpoint of the whole dominion. In the second paragraph of the report one might conclude that the engineers were setting out with a view to finding an outlet to the Pacific coast because we find the following words:

> Being a committee of railway engineers, we have concluded that our report should be based upon railway economics from the standpoint of the Dominion of Canada as a whole, leaving it to others to furnish you with information on the subject other than that from a railway standpoint. To illustrate this:—One route might work out from the best available data as to prospective tonnage, to be the most favourable from a railway annual expense standpoint, while another route less favourable from that same standpoint, might by some be considered, despite that disadvantage, to have certain other potential, intangible, or prospective possibilities . . .

And so on. One might be led to believe that in that inquiry they were setting out to find a western outlet. When we come to the last of their findings, however and compare them with the report I have in my hand known as the Peace River district report, I find the two reports are practically the same, with the exception that the clauses have been changed around.

If one reads the report on the Peace River district he will find that the statement is made that there is no hope that the line could be made self-supporting. Then they go on to speak of the Obed route, using practically the same language as that found in the findings now before me.

I wish at this time to take exception to the following statement which appears in the report before me:

> Since that time a reduction of freight rates has been accorded them, now substantially equalling rates which would obtain if a western outlet were in use.

That, Mr. Speaker, is hardly correct. In fact, one might infer from that statement that if the railway was built through to the Pacific coast the rates obtaining from Edmonton to Calgary would extend to the Peace River district. I have before me information from a railway traffic officer stating that the rate from Peace River town to Fort William is 33½ cents per one hundred pounds. The distance from Edmonton is some 1,243 miles. It is only some 742 miles from Edmonton to Vancouver; if you add the mileage from Edmonton to the Peace River you get almost twice the distance from Peace River to Fort William with the present rate of 33½ cents as against the export rate of 26 cents, from Edmonton to Vancouver. But I claim that both the domestic and export rates from the Peace River to Fort William are practically the same, so that the report is hardly fair, or even correct.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that in discussing this matter the dominion point of view has been entirely overlooked. Our Pacific ocean trade should be viewed from the national standpoint. Our trade with the orient has been steadily growing and we are looking for further new markets, but apparently our railway policy has been so shaped as to foster trade through our eastern ports only. Of late years, however, we have been turning our eyes to the Pacific, to Australia, to New Zealand, to Japan and China, and if that trade is to be encouraged I submit that the proposed outlet from the Peace river through British Columbia is vitally necessary. I hold in my hand a booklet, Trade Prospects Across the Pacific, prepared by John M. Imrie, chairman of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce trade mission to Japan, China and Hong Kong, in which he sets forth the findings of the Canadian trade mission relative to a greater development of trade between the dominion and the orient.

The report points out that Japan is to-day Canada's third largest customer, having increased her purchases from a peak of $1,150,000 in pre-war years to $42,000,000 in 1929, and an average of $33,000,000 for the five-year period, 1925-1929. With respect to China, that country stands in eighth place among Canada's customer nations. Her purchases from the dominion have increased from $3,000,000 in 1922 to $24,000,000 in 1929. Looking to the future, the Canadian trade mission has no hesitancy in asserting that these two countries constitute a potential market for a vastly greater range and volume of Canadian merchandise than is suggested by actual exports to-day. The full development of this market, it is pointed out, is dependent in large measure upon the stabilization of political, monetary and economic conditions in China and upon the extension of transportation facilities into the interior of that vast country.

Apart from the local aspect, the great question of Canada's trade through her Pacific ports has been entirely overlooked by the engineers who drafted this report, because they confine themselves to the statement that no western route is justified for the present and that our existing railways furnish the most economical route. Our Pacific ports have been growing despite the handicap of higher freight rates. Last year through the port of Vancouver we shipped 91,000 tons of wheat to Bristol, as against 36,000 tons from the Atlantic ports. This trade is now assuming large proportions, and I submit it should be fostered, and to this end another outlet from the Peace river would be in the national interest as well as a direct benefit to the settlers in the Peace River valley.

It seems to me passing strange that the major part of our development in railways and shipping has been confined entirely to the east. But not only has the east been favoured. When Manitoba asked for a route to Churchill her request was granted and some $54,000,000 has been expended on the construction of the Hudson Bay railway and port facilities. I think I am correct in stating that last year $6,000,000 was spent upon this undertaking. I wonder what would have happened had the engineers who are responsible for this report been asked to report on the Churchill route before it was undertaken. In view of the tone of this report, I have grave doubts if the Hudson Bay railway would have been constructed. Millions of dollars have been spent to build up the ports of Montreal and Quebec and to develop our canal system, yet when we in British Columbia ask for any help or consideration for our Pacific ports a report such as this is brought in practically to damn the whole thing.

Mr. MANION: I hope my hon. friend does not blame the government for the report. We did not make it.

Mr. REID: No; but I hope the hon. minister will not take the report very seriously when it says that no westerly route is justified for the present.

Mr. MANION: Will my hon. friend allow me to state this: I believe firmly that the Peace River outlet will have to be built ultimately.

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear that. I submit that this report should not be considered as final. Personally I am glad to hear the hon. Minister of Railways say that he is not in accord with the last clause in which the engineers say that no western route is justified.

Mr. MANION: I think it is only a matter of when the work should be done. That is the only dispute.

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear the hon. minister so express himself. I simply rose, Mr. Speaker, to endorse the resolution.

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to support this resolution, so ably presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). The dominion is under an obligation to the Peace River country, for, as has been pointed out, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) when in power, definitely promised that within a reasonable time a start would be made to construct an outlet from the Peace River to the Pacific coast, and later, the present right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made practically the same promise. During the special session in 1930 I pointed out that those promises had been made, and that the government could not spend money to better advantage than by completing the Pacific Great Eastern end in British Columbia. I think my advice was sound, although the government did not accept it. At the present time road-building camps are scattered all over British Columbia. Some of the roads under construction may be necessary, but undoubtedly others are not needed at all. As a matter of fact there is not much actual road-building going on, the men are simply living at the camps and doing very little work. If the government are going to carry on public works in British Columbia to relieve unemployment, I would advise that they reorganize the whole system and bend their energies towards completing the Pacific Great Eastern from Vancouver to the Canadian National railway. That work could be undertaken to provide unemployment relief, and it would be a considerable step towards opening up the Peace River country.

My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) took exception to the report. I will not even discuss it. I am somewhat familiar with the country, and in my opinion the mere mention of the Aggie-Obed route condemns the whole report. There are four possible routes, and anyone familiar with the country who hears the Obed route recommended would condemn the whole report as a matter of common sense.

[Mr. Reid.]

I am not going into the resources of the Peace River country; that question has been discussed for years. There are wonderful resources in that country, with millions of acres of the best wheat land in North America not taken up. We hope that in the near future this outlet will be supplied, but in the meantime I think this government, instead of spending relief money in the building of patches of road here and there, some of which may be needed but many of which are quite unnecessary, should spend the money in completing the Pacific Great Eastern railway, and in doing so they will go a long way towards opening up the Peace river area.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions when this matter was brought up in the house by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) I took no part in the debate, although I am very much interested in the matter. I think the last time I had occasion to refer to the Peace River question was during the session of 1926, but I should not like this debate to pass without saying something with regard to this matter.

We have been referred to the reports of the railway engineers with regard to the relative merits of the different routes. I have no intention of going into those reports or the arguments based upon them; I suppose the route will be settled, broadly speaking, on two considerations: first, the engineering features and secondly—and I think this is the main point to be considered—the amount and richness of the territory which will be served.

As far as the city of Edmonton is concerned, in my opinion and in the opinion of a great many people in that city, the construction of a Peace River outlet will bring us no immediate advantage; rather it will work to our disadvantage. At present that great country is really a sort of cul-de-sac; anyone entering it must go through Edmonton, and anyone leaving it must come out the same way. All traffic to and from that district, whether passenger or freight, passes through my city. But while we recognize that the immediate result of a Peace River outlet may not be particularly advantageous to our city, at the same time we all recognize that the development of the Peace River country ultimately will be of advantage to the city; we recognize that we cannot introduce a policy which will have a beneficial effect in the development of one part of the province of Alberta without every other part of the province reaping resultant benefits. Therefore, with no immediately selfish motive, I rise to support the plea of the hon. member for Peace River.

I endorse that plea on behalf of the settlers who have gone into that country. It has been stated already that many people took up homesteads in the Peace River district on the strength of a promise or understanding that railway facilities would be afforded. That may or may not be true with regard to the first settlers; as to that I cannot say, but certainly it is true with regard to the settlers who have gone in during comparatively recent years. They were promised an outlet from the Peace River district to the coast; the people who went in after those promises, representations and undertakings were made and given went in on the strength of them. They have been holding on to their farms under the greatest difficulties, unable to do more than merely support themselves, with freight rates which make it impossible to market their grain with any hope of profit. They have been holding on in the hope that the promises made by both parties will be implemented.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite are very quick to refer to the promise or undertaking given by the leader of the Conservative party in 1926. May I remind them that the language of the right hon. gentleman on that and other occasions was not nearly so definite or clear in its immediate prospect of fulfilment as the promise and pledge given by the then leader of the Liberal party. The present right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), when in power, gave the pledge that this would be done forthwith. The construction of an outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast was to be the spearhead of the Liberal policy, but apparently the spearhead was rather blunt. It made no apparent impression on the policy of the government, so that to-day we are just where we were in 1925 and 1926.

I know these settlers; they are of a peculiarly high type and character. They are men who have gone to that area not for the purpose of making fortunes or for the purpose of turning their farms into grain mines; they have gone there to make homes and root themselves in that part of Alberta with the idea of becoming permanent settlers, in that area. They are coming into the Peace River district in increasing numbers; the calamity of the drought which fell upon the southern part of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and conditions in the United States, have had the effect of driving hundreds and thousands of settlers to that great north country. During the last year and a half they have poured in, and because they went there with the assurance that both great political parties were pledged to construct a Peace River outlet, they have a right to demand the fulfilment of that promise.

We on this side of the house appreciate to the full the difficulties presented by the financial condition of the country; we recognize the imperative nature of the demand made upon the treasury, and the necessity that resources should be husbanded and absolutely no unnecessary expenditures made. For that and for other reasons it has been suggested that the proper policy is to wait until the country has become so populated that a railway will pay. That is a wrong policy; in any case it is a policy which cannot fairly be pursued in relation to the great Peace River district. After all, the best way to populate the country is to give it railway facilities. The argument has been raised that more than a Peace River outlet the country needs branch lines running into the more thickly populated districts, touching the best farm lands and uniting them with the main line. But the branch lines referred to will be built and put upon a paying basis much quicker if the Peace River outlet is provided; because with better railway facilities and cheaper freight rates there is no doubt in the world that there would be an increased influx of settlers into that north country.

The settlers in the Peace River district have watched the progress of political action and have compared promise with performance. They have seen great undertakings carried out by past governments while that which was pledged to them was forgotten. They have seen the great expenditures made on the Hudson Bay railway; and I remember that in 1926 I was one of the very few who protested against the construction of that road. I pleaded with the government of the day that before any more money was spent on the Hudson Bay railway, the Peace river outlet should be constructed. I suppose possibly $50,000,000, perhaps $60,000,000 will be spent on the Hudson Bay railway to obtain a very problematical advantage in the future, whereas there is in the Peace River district a great agricultural empire which at the present time is merely a cul-de-sac at the end of a railway. This road, although greatly improved during the past few years, is not of the best and heavy freight rates prevail.

I need not remind this house of the evidence of the wealth and the great agricultural possibilities of the Peace River country. I recall the fact that the blue ribbon in the grain world for wheat and oats has been won again and again by a farmer who resides and has resided for many years in that district. For these reasons I support with my whole heart the plea of the hon. member for Peace River and urge upon the government that if this outlet cannot be constructed in any other way, it should be undertaken either as a direct policy of the government or as a measure of unemployment relief. This is an obligation which rests upon both parties and which has, I think, the endorsation of all sections of this house.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise to associate myself with the resolution moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). I congratulate the mover upon the able manner in which he has presented his case. The Peace River outlet to the Pacific coast is necessary in order to develop the resources of that part of our dominion. As has been said by previous speakers, our commerce has been developed eastward to the Atlantic ocean but in later years new markets have been discovered for our products and accommodation must be provided to handle this new movement. I should like to read a resolution passed by the Stewart board of trade, which reads as follows:

Whereas thousands of people have been migrating to the Peace river during the past two years, swelling the population of that country to a total of some 40,000;

And whereas in addition to vast agricultural development it has been demonstrated that northwestern Canada is rich in mineral deposits;

And whereas a tide water outlet has for some years been promised to the Peace River country;

And whereas a charter was granted for a line of railway from Stewart to the Finlay Forks some three years ago and certain preliminary surveys have been made of the route from Stewart to the point named, as a result of which the people of this community and the Peace River country have been lead to anticipate stimulated development;

Be it therefore resolved that this board of trade ask Mr. Olof Hanson, member of parliament for this federal riding, to collaborate with other members of the federal parliament from Cariboo and Peace River with a view to putting questions on the order paper during the present session of the said parliament, that will have the effect of bringing out any and all information on this question of prime importance to the people of northwest Canada;

Be it further resolved that the questions so asked be so phrased as to bring out and make clear the intention of the government and/or the railways, if, when, and as soon as financial conditions permit of commitments for new undertakings.

Upon receiving a copy of this resolution, I took the matter up with the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) who advised me that the best way to bring the matter before the house would be when the Peace River outlet was under discussion. That is my reason for now placing this resolution upon Hansard. I have received similar resolutions from other public bodies in British Columbia. The chamber of commerce of Prince Rupert has passed a similar resolution on several occasions during the past five or six years, but as some of these are already on record it will not be necessary for me to read them.

Other speakers have gone into full detail in discussing this question, and it will not be necessary for me to repeat the figures given. I was pleased to hear the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals say that the government realizes that this outlet will have to be built sooner or later, but I submit that an early commencement of the work would be of great assistance in solving the unemployment problem, probably the greatest problem facing the government at the present time. As the last speaker has said, perhaps the government will consider this matter as a means of helping to relieve the unemployment situation.

I do not intend to discuss this matter any further, except to say that I am fully in accord with the resolution.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, the Peace River outlet has been a much discussed question for a number of years. In 1912, when I joined the provincial government of Alberta, a survey was projected through from White Court via Grande Prairie and the Peace River pass to the coast. That survey resulted in bringing a great number of people into the country, particularly into the Grande Prairie district. In 1913 I was delegated by the provincial government to pay a visit to that country to look into its potentialities and to see whether or not it was advisable for the government to embark upon railway construction into that territory. After an extended trip through the country by buckboard I came back to Edmonton and reported to the government of the Hon. Mr. Sifton that in my opinion a railroad should be projected at once into that country, with the ultimate object of its completion through to the coast. That road was built and served a useful purpose for a number of years. The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) has intimated that this was rather an indifferent road, but at all events it enabled the people to get in and out of the country from Edmonton westward. The road was not projected through to the coast, and that is the only possible solution of the difficulties which face the people in that part of the province. But it must be borne in mind, as pointed out by several speakers this afternoon, that very considerable concessions in the way of freight rates, were obtained in order to meet the difficulties of the settlers in that territory. Some hon. gentlemen have mentioned the fact that for a good many years the government of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) had the matter under consideration and nothing was done. May I say for their information that if they will look back over the pages of history they will see that that railway was owned by the provincial government, and they will recall that an effort was made, without success, to secure it for the Canadian National system. That it was not accomplished was not the fault of the King government. In my opinion, so far as the outlet to the coast was concerned, a stumbling block was placed in the way when both railways acquired the northern lines. That presented a difficulty which was not easily overcome.

I never was in favour of the projected outlet by way of Obed. I never could understand why the people in that country should have to submit to a back haul from the territory west of Grande Prairie and the Pouce Coupé country, or why the settlers north of the Peace should have to come by way of St. John or back to Peace River, crossing to McLennan, and making that roundabout journey in order to get out to Obed. With that rich territory, and with a thinly peopled country west of Peace River outlet, that was the logical course for any railway to take to get out of that district. Then they could go direct to Stewart or else to Prince George and connect with the existing lines, thus serving all parts of that territory much more acceptably.

I know that engineers have pointed out the difficulties in the way, but after all, they are not insurmountable; and, after reading a good many of the reports, I have come to the conclusion that even if it meant a little added cost, that cost would be warranted when the construction took place. One can realize the difficulties with which the government is faced at the present time with regard to financing, but I agree most sincerely with the suggestion that this outlet might very well have been undertaken prior to the opening up of the northern route to Churchill, and the opening of a port which at best will not be useful except for four months of the year.

Mr. MANION: That was started in 1911 or 1912.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite agree. I have never changed my mind about the Churchill route. And with respect to Churchill, may I say that we had a splendid service through eastern Canada by water and rail which of course added somewhat to the cost of transportation to the settlers in northern Saskatchewan, but which after all was nothing in comparison to the cost which the settlers in northern Alberta will have to bear until they have an outlet through to British Columbia.

I notice that the government at present is interested in the construction or the improvement of the waterways system. In the light of the situation as it affects the two railway systems to-day, in the light of their earnings and the reduction in their business, it seems to me that while the waterway project must be gone on with some time, it could well be delayed for a short period, at least until this outlet is provided from Peace River to the coast. After that is completed we can take up the waterways question.

I do hope that if this government remain in office one of the first things they will undertake as a great public undertaking is the construction of a railway to give the facilities for which the people of Peace River have waited so long.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): In closing the debate, I do not feel like saying very much because my throat is not in good condition; but there is one point mentioned by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) which, I think, calls for an answer. If I understood him correctly he intimated that the presidents of the two railways are of the opinion that we shall be entitled to an outlet when we have ten times the present traffic. With all due respect, I should like to remind the president of the Canadian National Railways, through the Minister of Railways, that some years ago he said that the outlet would be justified when we had an export of 10,000,000 bushels of grain or its equivalent in tonnage for three years. Well, we have had the equivalent tonnage for five or six years, and if he keeps running away as fast as that, then the nearer we get to the goal the further away he will be from it. I do not think the railways can justify that position, because the province of Alberta made that road pay in 1927, with the volume of traffic then available, and the outlet would not represent more than double the investment.

I am not insensible to the financial difficulties with which we are faced to-day, but I do not think that in these times, with all our difficulties, we ought to be talking confidence in Canada and acting panic. Unemployment is here and we have to deal with it, and we also have to face a reasonable development of this country. I therefore urge upon the government the consideration of action in this matter and in regard to branch lines as well, because we have a good many settlers seventy to eighty miles away from the railway.

Mr. MANION: I have promised that consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Well, in view of the discussion we have had and of the position taken by the minister, I will ask that the motion be withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

INSURANCE COMPANIES

INVESTIGATION OF BUSINESS TRANSACTIONS BY BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville) moved:

Whereas there have appeared in the 1932 January and February issues of the Journal of Commerce, published in Toronto, certain allegations of swindling and questionable dealings in respect of the North American Life Assurance Company, and the Sun Life Assurance Company, and

Whereas these charges have created a state of uncertainty in the public mind, and a lack of confidence in the stability of such institutions in this country, and

Whereas these charges can most effectively be met, and public confidence best be restored by a thorough and impartial investigation of these various allegations;

Therefore be it resolved, that in the opinion of this house, the select standing committee on Banking and Commerce be instructed to conduct a strict investigation into the business transactions of the North American and Sun Life Assurance Companies, especially in relation to their investments in common stocks, and the allegations as to the swindling of policyholders by directors of said companies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, one of the most serious dangers with which we are confronted in this country at the present time is the ever-growing distrust of the public in those financial institutions which, having regard to the nature of their business, should, like Caesar's wife, stand above suspicion. I refer to the numerous attacks which have been made upon our insurance companies and upon the very questionable manner in which their affairs are said to be administered. As these charges must be either false or true, and as the insurance companies must be either innocent or guilty, I think it is incumbent upon the parliament of Canada as the constitutional protector and custodian of the rights of the people to make some definite inquiry into the allegations made and follow them up with any necessary action and legislation, not only in order to eradicate any evils which may exist, but also adequately to safeguard the interests of the policyholders.

Life insurance funds have always been regarded as the most sacred of trust funds, and life insurance companies have always been looked upon as the most responsible of trustees. The investment of their funds therefore should be based upon considerations of safety and security. Elements of speculation should be eliminated; reasonable economy should be exercised in management, and lives should be selected with a view to the death rate and a minimum of mortality. These, sir, are the fundamentals with which the public of Canada has been wont to invest our insurance companies, but owing to numerous rumours as well as printed matter the public has been led to believe that these fundamentals have been very flagrantly ignored. There is consequently a wide prevalence of alarm on the part of the policyholders with regard to the security of their policies, and there has grown up a general feeling of suspicion that the insurance companies of Canada are rapidly becoming insolvent. If such is the case, the public of Canada should be informed accordingly; if it is not, then the authors of such publications should be asked either to prove their charges or forever hold their peace. Further, if the charges are not true the insurance companies themselves should be the first to welcome gladly an investigation; for the reticence or reluctance with which they have met the charges has left the public no alternative than to accept them at their face value.

What the people of Canada are asking themselves at the present time is, why did the insurance companies not take immediate action against the Journal of Commerce for libel? As three monthly issues of the Journal of Commerce have already appeared giving wide publicity to the business transactions of the North American Life Assurance Company and the Sun Life Assurance Company, and as no legal suit has in the meantime been instituted against this publication with a view to punishing the authors of the charges, the people of Canada are gradually evolving from a mere suspicious frame of mind in regard to Canadian insurance companies into one of firmer assurance. In other words, people are no longer suspicious; they are becoming assured. I think, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that what is needed is a very strict investigation into these allegations.

A few weeks ago the following letter was sent to the editor of the Financial Post:

A copy of the January issue of the Journal of Commerce printed in Edmonton, Alberta, has come to this office. In this journal serious charges of misappropriation are made against T. B. Macaulay, president of the Sun Life Assurance Company, and against Mr. Gundy in connection with the North American Life.

I and many of my friends here who have insurance in both these companies are greatly worried. We would like to know the facts and if we should continue to keep our life insurance with these companies or let the policies lapse. Insurance has been the only hope of the salaried men to save a few dollars for a rainy day and it now looks as if we were to be deprived of the full benefits of insurance.

Needless to say, the Financial Post is one hundred per cent with the insurance companies, but the Journal of Commerce spares no words in its condemnation of their methods of carrying on business. As stated in the resolution these charges have created a state of uncertainty in the public mind, and a lack of confidence in the stability of such institutions in this country. It states further that these charges can most effectively be met and public confidence best be restored by a thorough and impartial investigation.

The question might very well be asked whether a discussion of this matter in parliament would not aggravate the situation rather than remedy it. I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is no worse way of aggravating a situation that by leaving it strictly alone, especially in the face of the numerous rumours and the published articles which have been circulating throughout the country. Just before I left for Ottawa a business man in Alberta accosted me and asked whether I had heard about the Sun Life Assurance Company going broke. He had evidently been reading the Journal of Commerce, or else had heard something from some casual traveller in his home town. On another occasion a doctor friend of mine vociferously proclaimed his intention of discontinuing his policy on the ground that it would be throwing money away to send his annual premium to insurance companies that were so near the verge of bankruptcy. Instances such as those two could no doubt be cited by the hundred, but I think they will suffice to impress upon hon. members the danger involved. Usually false rumours die of their own stench, but when they originate from well-founded apprehension there is just cause for the investigation that I am asking for in this resolution.

Before examining the charges of the Journal of Commerce it might be just as well to know what the policyholders of this country have to say about the situation. In 1907 the methods and practices that were severely criticized by the Royal Insurance Commission were described as follows:

Insurance companies tend to become powerful aggregations of money with financial rather than insurance aims. The commission attributes to this feature of the insurance practice of the present day most of the evils under which the insuring public suffer. The deferred dividend system was devised to facilitate the accumulation and retention of policyholders' money. Speculative instead of investment fields are eagerly sought. Directors aim at the furthering of their own schemes. Underwriting and syndicates, the select machinery of finance, are operated with insurance funds.

The same methods and practices formed the subject matter of the accusation of the Policyholders' Association even so late as 1929:

1. That the management of the Sun Life did at various times and in various ways use the funds of their policyholders to inflate the securities of pulp and paper companies to the detriment of that industry and at the risk of heavy losses to the policyholders.
2. That the management of the Sun Life did at various times and in varied ways transfer from the funds of the company large amounts and place them to the credit of the shareholders.
3. That the unsettled death claims of Sun Life as compared with that of other life insurance companies were exceptionally and unreasonably large and this fact would seem to be responsible for the many unjustified attempts which the Sun Life has made to compel beneficiaries to accept smaller amounts than their policies called for.
4. That as compared with other companies the death rate, lapse rate, surrender rate, and cost of doing business was too high, due evidently to a desire for a large premium income irrespective of cost.
5. That an unreasonable amount of policyholders' funds were being put into head office and branch office buildings which were unprofitable and could not be justified on sound life insurance principles.
6. That the book value of the assets of the Sun Life were from time to time written up in a manner calculated to mislead policyholders and misrepresent the true state of affairs.
7. That the management of the Sun Life did without the consent of its policyholders and in its contracts alter its methods of distributing surpluses by deferring the payment of a portion of such surplus until after the death of the insured.

Mr. Speaker, if matters are as they have been presented in this accusation made by the policyholders, they constitute a strong argument against stock insurance companies and a good case for the mutualization of our insurance companies, or, what is still better, state control of insurance. In the United States the great majority of insurance companies are now mutualized. As the president of one of those companies put it:

"Public opinion is now educated to the point of believing that life insurance is a trust; that no set of stockholders have a right to exploit that business for their own profit; and that money saved out of the earnings of men for the protection of widows and orphans should not go into the pockets of stockholders."

The charge however is that such moneys are going into the pockets of stockholders, and that the insurance business is being exploited at the expense of policyholders.

Since the beginning of this year,—

States the Journal of Commerce,

—"or rather within the past few months, two acts of gross injustice to policyholders have been perpetrated. First, the sum of $1,275,000 has been taken out of the funds of the North American Life Assurance Company and transferred to the pockets of a few people. Second, the sum of $1,500,000 cash has been taken out of the funds of the Sun Life Assurance Company and transferred to the pockets of a few people. This is the largest amount which those who have the controlling interest of the stock of the Sun Life Assurance Company have paid to themselves at one time."

The paper then goes on to tell how, for three years, the management of the Sun Life Assurance Company tried to increase the capital stock of that company so that their heavy takings of policyholders' funds would not be noticeable, tracing the fight for increased capitalization through the House of Commons and the Canadian courts to the final decision given by the judicial committee of the Privy Council in London, England. Commenting on this decision the Journal says:

The decision is final; but it is doubtful if the directors of the Sun Life will ever make use of the right given them. The assets of the Sun Life have been plundered to such an extent that only mutualization can save it from the scrap heap of defunct insurance companies.

In other words, the Journal of Commerce states that the Sun Life Assurance Company is insolvent. One would think that pending the right to increase their capitalization the rate of dividend would not be substantially increased. On this point the article says:

Failing in their first attempts to hide their takings by an increase in capital, the management of the Sun Life evidently decided while they were striving for an increase of capital to put on a bold front and take what they wished in the form of increased dividends upon the existing capitalization of $2,000,000. The rate of dividend they have declared and paid in cash in each of the last four years is as follows: 1928, 15 per cent—

That was a good year.

—1929, 25 per cent; 1930, 50 per cent; 1931, 75 per cent.

That was generally a very bad year, economically speaking.

During the last five years the policyholders of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada and the North American Life Assurance Company have suffered heavy losses and cannot afford to have any more taken from them. Apart from the questionable character of these transactions, neither the North American Life nor the Sun Life are in a financial condition to pay out so much at this time. During recent years, both companies have been investing much of their funds in speculative securities and have suffered heavy losses as a result.

As a result of these losses the Sun Life has had a serious deficit which it covered up by means of fictitious bookkeeping and padding of assets. Almost $16,000,000 of the deficit, it is charged, was covered up by a claim of that amount of profit in the Sun Life's holdings of the stock of the Montreal Light Heat and Power Consolidated, consisting of about 453,746 shares. The article in the Journal continues:

These shares have been split twice recently and pay a dividend of only $1.50 per share, yet they are valued in the assets of the Sun Life at $57 each, which at this inflated price gives a dividend return of less than three per cent. Recently the market value of these shares has gone down to $38 per share. Their correct value should be the same as that of all other heavily watered securities, namely less than $10 a share. In the books of the Montreal Light Heat and Power Consolidated they are valued at $12.84 a share.

Other instances of fictitious bookkeeping are given. As an example of alleged padding of the assets to cover up the deficit, many formerly valueless items were carried over from a contingent fund into the assets. The article in the Journal continues as follows:

If these stocks and bonds were of no value during the boom years of 1928 and 1929 they surely were of less value on December 31, 1930, when they were brought into the assets and given a value. Dozens of other items included in the assets of the Sun Life have all the earmarks of inflation and padding in an attempt to justify the payment of $1,500,000 cash to the stockholders as dividends on $2,000,000 of capital stock, one-half of which the superintendent of insurance, in his evidence before the banking and commerce committee of the Canadian House of Commons in March, 1929, showed had been paid for by transfers from policyholders' funds.

According to returns made by the Sun Life to the government at Ottawa on March 1, the unpaid death and other claims of policyholders are too large, amounting in all to over $10,000,000. The Journal asks the following question:

Why should these unpaid accounts of policyholders be allowed to accumulate, while a dividend of 75 per cent in cash is paid to the stockholders who have contributed less than one-fifth of one per cent of the assets of the company against 99⅘ contributed by the policyholders?

One of the most serious charges is made against the president of the Sun Life Assurance Company. Mr. Macaulay is charged with scuttling the ship, as it were, and then, to use a slang expression, getting out while the getting was good. The article in the Journal continues:

Why did Mr. Macaulay in such trying times as the present, pay such a large dividend to stockholders as 75 per cent? There is evidence to indicate that one of the effects of his policy was to enhance the price of the Sun Life shares on the stock market. Although these represented payments into the treasury of the company of less than $50 each, so much of the policyholders' funds have been diverted to their credit that the market price of these shares rose to the fabulous figure of over $4,000 per share. Unloading caused the price to drop to $1,350, but immediately after the handsome dividend was declared, the price went up to over $1,800 per share. After the dividend was paid they fell rapidly and are now selling at $550.

According to the records filed on the 1st March, 1931, with the Superintendent of Insurance at Ottawa, the holdings of Mr. Macaulay and his private company, the Macaulay Securities, during the last five years, of the shares of the Sun Life Company, are as follows:

T. B. Macaulay—Shares
December 31, 1923	2,113
December 31, 1924	647
December 31, 1925	50
December 31, 1926	25
December 31, 1927	25
December 31, 1928	28
December 31, 1929	233
December 31, 1930	55

Macaulay Securities—Shares
December 31, 1923	——
December 31, 1924	1,520
December 31, 1925	2,126
December 31, 1926	2,541
December 31, 1927	2,416
December 31, 1928	1,476
December 31, 1929	284
December 31, 1930	9

From this it would appear that Mr. Macaulay is getting from under the consequences of his own acts with a full pocket, and will leave the policyholders and stockholders to extricate themselves from the wreck as best they can.

And finally on page 7 of the January issue of the Journal of Commerce we find this indictment:

Sun Life Insurance Company has become insolvent through its speculative investments that have benefited the directors and their friends.

According to the Journal of Commerce:

The funds of the Sun Life have been so dissipated through stock manipulation that at the present market value the common stocks alone are worth over $100,000,000 less than was paid for them. The preferred stocks show a deficit of over $11,000,000 and the bonds a serious deficit also . . . It should be stated that the deficit in the preferred stocks and bonds invariably occur in the case of promotions engineered by directors of the Sun Life and their friends. The present total deficit in the funds of the Sun Life aggregate well over $130,000,000 and this does not take into account the serious writing up of such assets as the head office building of the company already mentioned. This means that over $130,000,000 of the good money of the policyholders has been given to a few stock manipulators for their inflated securities. The manipulators have the policyholders' money and the Sun Life holds their worthless paper.

According to the Policyholders' Association —a copy of whose letter I received this morning—the stocks and surpluses of the Sun Life are entirely wiped out and there is a heavy impairment of the policyholders' reserves. Brought up to date, the policyholders' funds in the company are invested as follows:

Common stocks	$302,496,289 02
Preferred stocks	35,413,206 03

Most of these stocks are of overcapitalized industrial companies—watered stocks—which the Policyholders' Association think must be wiped out entirely if these industries are to be put back upon a sound financial footing. It is estimated that when the aforementioned stocks are valued in accordance with the terms of the Insurance Act they will show a loss of over $160,000,000.

The Sun Life and the North American Assurance Companies are the two greatest dabblers in stocks. Of all the common stocks held by all Canadian life insurance companies, the North American and Sun Life hold over 95 per cent—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What is the hon. gentleman quoting from now?

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I am basing my remarks upon the Journal and a letter sent to me to-day by the Policyholders' Association. Every member has received a copy, and therefore I think I am quite justified in using it. Of the preferred stocks held by all life companies, these two companies hold over 74 per cent. The small percentage of stocks held by the other companies are mostly of banks and trust and loan companies that show little, if any, depreciation in value.

A fair example of the class of securities in which the Sun Life has invested the funds of its policyholders is illustrated in a $9,000,000 loss on the securities of the Canada Power and Paper Corporation—a Holt-and-Wood-Gundy promotion; an $8,500,000 loss on the securities of the Abitibi Power and Paper Company; and an $8,300,000 loss on the St. Regis Power Company. Of the $31,500,000 of policyholders' funds which the directors and their friends took in exchange for the worthless securities of these three companies alone, over $25,800,000 has already been lost according to the Journal of Commerce. In fact it says that the whole investment may be considered to be gone already, since there is practically no market for these securities, and if any attempts were made to sell, the price received would not be any more than the value of the printed stock certificates.

An examination of the financial statement for 1931 will reveal a strange method of computing the liabilities of the Sun Life. Since 1928 the total receipts of the company show substantial increases each year, but the amounts put by each year as government reserves or actuarial liabilities have been rapidly growing less, as will be seen by the following table:

Year	Total receipts	Amount put in government reserves
1928. . .	$139,442,610 32	$68,624,857 58
1929. . .	173,090,107 16	56,736,512 10
1930. . .	186,913,572 99	51,081,561 95
1931. . .	197,840,344 84	44,561,437 78

These figures would make the aforementioned deficit still larger.

The royal commission of 1907 severely condemned the methods by which the management of the Sun Life transferred in the books of the company the policyholders' funds to the credit of the shareholders, yet we find in the report which the Sun Life has filed with the government that the following sums were transferred in the same way during 1931:

Interest earned on capital.. .	$ 183,191 30
Transferred from participating fund..	1,425,082 74
From surplus in non-par. fund.	1,269,164 99
Total..	$2,877,439 03

This amount which was transferred during 1931, raised the total balance now standing to the credit of the shareholders to the sum of $17,962,989.87. As suggested by the Journal of Commerce, out of this a dividend of 50 per cent on the capital stock was declared at the annual meeting of the company held in Montreal eight weeks ago, and the Montreal Gazette of a few days ago carried an announcement that the dividend would be paid on the first of the month. On page 4 of the letter issued by the Policyholders' Association I find this statement:

> According to the Sun Life's statements filed with the government, the total revenue of the company in 1931 was $56,397,374.52 greater than in 1928. But the disbursements in 1931 were $61,849,809.30 greater than in 1928. That is, the management spent all the increase and $5,452,434.78 besides. Is this the reason why the company borrowed $5,650,000 a few days before the end of December, 1931—so as to avoid having to report a heavy bank overdraft? No mention is made of this item in the statement handed out at the annual meeting; but it appears in the statement filed with the government.

[Mr. Luchkovich.]

As the Journal of Commerce suggests:

> No wonder the amount put by in the reserves was less in 1931 than in any previous year since 1928. The expenses are increasing more rapidly than the income. Will the overdraft at the bank be increased by the 50 per cent dividend to the stockholders?

This ends my résumé of the case against the Sun Life, and I shall now discuss the North American Life Assurance Company.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to condense the remainder of my remarks because of the short time remaining at my disposal.

At six o'clock I was about to give a short résumé of the allegations made against the North American Life Assurance Company. The charge made by the Journal of Commerce against this company is that $1,275,000 belonging or waiting apportionment to the policyholders thereof has been withdrawn under the guise of making the company a mutual, and that the manner in which said withdrawal has been done has all the earmarks of a swindle. When the North American Life Assurance Company was incorporated by an act of parliament in 1879 it was to have no stock; but provision was made for a guarantee fund which could be retired upon the establishment of the company, and which was to be liable for the payment of losses. It is to the holders of this guarantee fund that the aforementioned $1,275,000 recently was paid, and it is in this connection that the Journal raises so great a commotion, even to the extent of charging Mr. Gundy and his associates with having swindled the policyholders. The Journal says that steps should be taken, first, to compel the directors of the North American Life Assurance Company to put back to the credit of that company the sum of $1,275,000, and second, to compel the holders of the guarantee fund to make good the loss which the funds of the North American Life Assurance Company have suffered since the guarantee fund passed to the control of J. H. Gundy and his associates.

The terms and conditions of this deal are set forth in a letter which D. E. Kilgour, general manager of the North American Life Assurance Company, addressed to the holders of one original share or unit of the guarantee fund. I have not the time at my disposal to read this letter, but it may be found on page 8 of the March issue of the Journal. The conclusion which one draws from it, according to the Journal, is that without the payment of a single cent the man to whom the aforementioned letter was addressed received $127.50 plus $215 plus 35 cents plus $10, in all $352.85 for his one original share for which he had paid the sum of $20. His net profit on this share amounted to $332.85.

The charter of this life assurance company, as amended in 1897 by 60-61 Victoria, chapter 79, distinctly specifies the class of securities in which the funds of the company may be invested. During the time the company was under the control of Messrs. Gundy, Bradshaw and others, many investments were made in unauthorized securities. The company still has $9,810,667.94 invested in these unauthorized securities, which show a loss of over $2,000,000. As the charter of the company distinctly states that the holders of the guarantee fund are responsible for losses, the Journal claims that both the directors and holders of the guarantee fund—including J. H. Gundy, who sold most of these securities to the company—are responsible for these losses and that no time should be lost in determining the amount of these losses and in making an attempt to recover them for the policyholders.

Briefly put, this is the sum and substance of the allegations against the Sun Life and the North American companies.

As I have said already, my reason for placing this resolution on the order paper was to ascertain the truth or falsity of the charges made by the Journal of Commerce. In the attainment of this objective I thought that nothing less would suffice than a strict investigation into the business transactions of these two companies. The great alarm created by the allegations made by the journal, the intense worry of many people over the insecurity of their holdings and the general state of uncertainty and lack of confidence in the stability of our insurance institutions, are, in my opinion, valid reasons for bringing this matter up for the serious consideration of hon. members and the urgent attention of the government. There are individuals who will disclaim any justifiable grounds for alarm, but if the allegations alluded to are true, then in all seriousness I ask hon. members:

First, is there not good ground for alarm in regard to the investment of policyholders' funds in highly speculative and worthless propositions?

Second, is there not good ground for alarm when hundreds of millions of dollars belonging to hundreds of thousands of policyholders are misused to benefit a few individuals?

Third, is there not good ground for alarm when profits are appropriated in an arbitrary manner without regard to equity or to the rights of the policyholders?

Fourth, is there not good ground for alarm when princely dividends are paid to shareholders which are not justified by the income of the companies?

If the allegations are true, there is something radically wrong in the way the funds of these companies are being administered and in the manner in which their affairs are being managed. The business of life insurance needs investigating, and the most expeditious method of doing this is by means of a committee of the house. The parliament of Canada is the protector and custodian of the rights of the people, and these rights should not be jeopardized by a few greedy individuals.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken for forty minutes.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the business of life insurance is one of the largest in Canada. It affects not only our own country but other countries where Canadian enterprises are carrying on their operations. The privy council has held that the business of insurance belongs solely to the provinces. There are limitations upon that statement which are questioned, but in the broad and general sense the business of life insurance has been declared to be under the control of the provincial legislatures. The dominion parliament has placed upon the statute book an act dealing with insurance—life, fire, accident, and other forms—and one of the provisions of that act is that an annual statement shall be made by the companies licensed to transact life or other forms of insurance in this dominion. The validity of those enactments has been questioned. It is contended by the proprietors of the Journal of Commerce, from which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Luchkovich) has read, that parliament has no jurisdiction and that these matters are solely to be determined and dealt with by the provinces through their legislatures and various departments set up by statutory enactment.

It is not my purpose to traverse that ground this evening, but to point out that the life companies of the country have for many years been making these returns to our superintendent of insurance, and these returns are from time to time published and the reports are laid upon the table of this house. Particularly it may be said that the Canadian life insurance companies have undergone the strictest form of examination and the most rigid inquiries have been made not only as to the character of their investments, but as to the manner in which their business has been conducted; and they have withstood the closest scrutiny of actuaries and of those charged with the duty of inspection.

For some years past the largest of Canadian life insurance companies has been the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada. It has transacted its operations in almost every part of the world. Its policies are held by leading citizens of India and Japan, of Australia and Great Britain, and I think, in over forty states of the American union, in each of which countries it has to undergo the most careful and rigid examination. Its business—not only its business within the state or country in which its operations are carried on, but the entire financial structure of the corporation—is closely and carefully examined, and the questions that affect its solvency are of course, considered and determined. If the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, instead of referring to the Journal of Commerce of this year, had referred to the Journal of Commerce of July or June, 1930, he would have seen exactly the same charges being made in somewhat the same language, only in one instance it was charged that certain provisions which now find place in our statute law were introduced by the then government of the day for purposes other than the public good. Those charges have been made and remade throughout this country. We now as a parliament are called upon, on the strength of statements read by a member of this house, to decide whether an investigation shall be held by a committee of this house into the operations of the largest financial corporation we have in the dominion.

Under normal circumstances one would have said that charges such as were read this afternoon should be closely scrutinized and carefully examined. But when you realize that similar charges have been made for a long time, and that the only effect has been to dishearten to some extent the policyholders and to create suspicion in their minds as to the sufficiency of the examination carried on by the Department of Insurance, I think you will appreciate why I suggest to the house to-night that it is most undesirable that we should enter into a lengthy discussion touching matters about which we have before us no authentic information. And when it is suggested that the courts are open to the company, I need hardly remind the hon. gentleman and hon. members of this house that the same has been true for upwards of a year or two years with respect to the same enterprises. The delicate mechanism that has to do with the business of life insurance, when mixed up with matters that involve the theory and practice of investment by these enterprises, makes it possible that mistakes which are common to humanity may have occurred in connection with the transaction of this business; and if the matter were ventilated in the courts the result would be that the mistakes would be apparent and that partly, at least, criticism might be well founded.

Now let us look at what the business of insurance really is. I think it is well, before we proceed hastily to judge or prejudge this matter, or to draw inferences or form conclusions upon ex parte statements by those who for upwards of a year, in season and out of season, have been making charges which we have heard in part this afternoon, that we should have a clear appreciation and understanding of just what the business of life insurance is. Life insurance is fairly old. It involves the payment of a premium by the insured and an undertaking on the part of the insurer that at a given time, or on the happening of a given event, a certain sum of money will be paid either to the insured himself or to the persons designated by him for that purpose. Now obviously that involves the investment of money, for it is perfectly clear that the small sum paid by way of premium cannot, if it is put away year after year without earning anything, make it possible for the insurer to honour its obligations at maturity. If an endowment policy is written, providing for the payment of $1,000 at the age of sixty, and the premium is $50 per annum, it is obvious that if the insurance is taken out at the age of thirty-five there will be twenty-five payments, amounting in all to $1,250, and no question at all would arise with respect to interest earnings. But that is not how the business of insurance is transacted. First, tables of mortality, which have been arrived at after long years of patient effort and the assembling of figures indicating the numbers of people who died at given ages out of 10,000, or whatever unit may be taken, have had to be drawn up. These tables of mortality in Great Britain date back to the days of McCulloch. In modern times the great American companies have been able, from their experience on this continent and elsewhere, to prepare tables of mortality; and we in this country have prepared some tables of mortality, because our expectation of life in Canada has been somewhat greater than that of people who live in a less temperate zone. In other words, in this country hardy men and women live longer than the people in some other parts of the world, and our rates of mortality, when we have adopted the tables of other countries, as we have—because our population is small and our opportunities for developing such tables is limited—have enabled our life insurance companies to show a longer span of life for their insured than is the case in most other communities. That is an important factor to keep in mind.

Let us see what the factors are that have to be considered. First is expectation of life, and secondly is the question, what rate you may expect money to earn during the period of expectation of life of the insured. In other words, if he pays $25, what may you expect in reason during a period of thirty years, which is the expectation of life of the insured, the money will annually earn? Now in order that there might be no misapprehension on the part of the insured, we have placed upon our statutes, in chapter 101 of the revised statutes of Canada, provisions which determine the rate of interest that insurance companies may expect to earn during the period of expectation of life of their insured. It used to be, for instance, that we set up reserves—that is the technical name—applied on the basis of money being able to earn four and a half per cent, four per cent, three and a half per cent, and latterly three per cent per annum. Now, there is an actuarial problem and a very simple one. The life of John Smith is about to be insured. John Smith is of the age of twenty-five. By the tables of mortality, which represent the average experience of practically all the countries of the world, the expectation of life of John Smith is known to within a reasonable number of months; that is, the average of the figures and the experience of the companies indicate that John Smith should live a given number of years. Upon that basis the company has computed the rate of premium that will insure him for a given sum, on the assumption that that premium will be invested by the company at a rate not exceeding three per cent, and that thereby the company will be enabled at his death or at the expiration of the period mentioned in the policy to pay to him or to his beneficiaries the sum thus insured.

It is obvious from that statement, which will not be challenged, that in a new country such as this there must be large profit made by companies whose average earnings upon the premiums received are greatly in excess of three per cent. That is fairly clear, is it not? That is, if they bought nothing but Dominion of Canada four per cent securities, as I once suggested from my seat in this house, they would thereby unquestionably always be in a solvent position, but the profits accruing either to the policyholders or to the shareholders would necessarily be limited. As a matter of fact the interest earnings have far exceeded four per cent. The interest earnings of some of our Canadian companies have exceeded on an average six per cent. Why? Because we have determined by statute the investments in which their moneys may be made, and parliament is responsible for defining and limiting the type of investments in which the accumulated premiums of Canadians and others may be placed for investment in order that the obligations of the company may be met at maturity, having regard to the expectation of life of the insured, whether it be an ordinary risk or an annuity. Mortgages on real estate are permitted under certain conditions. Some of the companies have chosen real estate mortgages as the form in which they place a very large part of their earnings from premiums and investment moneys; also bonds—government and railway bonds, municipal securities. We have in our statutes a provision that enables companies to invest their moneys in common stocks and in preferred stocks. It is true that that provision has been upon our statute books for many years. It is true that in 1927, as is suggested by the article in the Journal of Commerce, there was a modification of the law as it then stood. But the discretion lodged by the law in those charged with responsibility for the investment of the company's funds is limited to the class of investment described and mentioned in detail in the Insurance Act.

The next step is this: The business of insurance contemplates obligations payable many years hence—twenty-five, thirty, forty or fifty years hence. Investments are permitted to be made within the terms of the statute, provided always that the company shall set up, with respect to each policy as it is written, such reserves as will enable it, at a rate of interest not exceeding three or three and one-half per cent, to meet that obligation at maturity. These reserves, to which the hon. gentleman referred this afternoon, must be invested, whatever else happens, by the company in the securities provided by the statute. The insurance department here has millions, literally hundreds of millions of securities, representing the reserves which by law are set up for the purpose of enabling these various companies to meet their obligations. Inasmuch as these obligations mature many years hence, it follows that there will be ups and downs in the curve of the value of the securities. Mortgages have depreciated in value. Stocks in great depressions depreciate in value. Aye, but more, bonds have depreciated in value. The bonds of the United States of America, regarded I fancy by most people as the foremost security in the world, their gold bonds carrying a low rate of interest, have so depreciated in value that the fall in some instances has been as much as ten per cent during the last year. A valuation of the securities at the low point of the curve would indicate a very great fall from the values they had in 1929 before the great depression. Those are factors that are always considered in connection with the business of life insurance. They must be, because the liability is one in futuro; the valuation is in the present. The valuation is based upon what the market demand is for the security at the moment. Well, if you applied that in a period of great depression, the position would be intolerable from the standpoint both of the company and of the insured. In the United States, where insurance is carried on upon a larger scale than in any other country in the world, as I pointed out the other day the representatives of forty-seven states, every state of the union except Connecticut, met together and agreed that, having regard to past experience and what reasonably might be expected in the future, the valuation to be placed upon the securities should be the average for the five preceding quarters, which would bring it down to the average price on June 30th last. It was considered that that would be a fair way in which to measure the value of the assets of the companies in which, of course, had been invested the premiums of all those millions of people who had paid in their money for the purpose of securing policies. We in this country followed the same course exactly.

There were two reasons for that. One was that our companies were carrying on business side by side with the American companies in practically the same states and would be subject to the operations of that law within those states, and uniformity was desirable in the balance sheets of the enterprises. The second reason was that we believed that Canadian companies carrying on a vast world-wide business should have the same opportunity as their competitors to place their balance sheets on a proper basis, having regard to all the fluctuations that have taken place during the years and will continue to take place, representing a curve up and down, with values high and low, provided always that in the opinion of the actuaries and of the inspectors of our department the department could certify that these companies were solvent. Those who know Mr. Finlayson, the superintendent of insurance in this dominion, realize that we have in him a first-class actuary. Every company with which I have spoken—and I have had occasion in times past to know something of insurance, having been for many years a director of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and knowing something at least of the conduct of business by the largest of the American companies—hold an opinion of our insurance department, of our actuaries and of our superintendent of insurance which leaves nothing to be desired. They believe that we have as fine a department, as well administered and as well officered, as any department of insurance in the world. That was their settled conviction as expressed to me, and I can only pass it on to this house for what it may be worth. Faced with that position, we entrusted our superintendent of insurance with the onerous and responsible duty of determining what the situation really was, and on the strength of his investigation he issued a certificate that the Sun Life was a solvent enterprise.

I have no policy in the Sun Life Assurance Company, nor have I any policy in the North American Life Assurance Company. Therefore I hope I may be credited with speaking with some degree of disinterestedness with respect to this matter. I need hardly say to the house that no matter with which I have had to deal in my official position gave me more concern than this. Why? Because it touched the lives of hundreds of thousands—yea, almost millions—of people, as well as of many yet unborn, and my duty was not to hazard anything to a mere guess, but to endeavour, by every means in my power, having regard to the fluctuations which have taken place in past years and the reasonable expectations as to the future, to see to it that without further instructions than those which I have indicated to the house as to values—that apart from that our officials should make a report which would enable me to say to the people of Canada and elsewhere, who were dependent upon the solvency of this great enterprise, that it was solvent. On that report I made my statement. I believe it is true. I believe the Sun Life Assurance Company is as solvent as any company transacting the business of life insurance need be. I believe it to be solvent because those charged with the responsibility have assured me that on any calculation of liabilities, based upon any tables of mortality and the earning power of money, that is true. I have said that to my fellow citizens, and I continue to say it, I believe it is wrong—wrong to the Canadian people and to the insured in many other lands than our own, people under other flags altogether—that in this parliament a malignant and malicious attack should apparently be given credence by being read in this house by any member of it, whoever he may be. That is my feeling with respect to the matter, and I make my statement with due regard and respect for the opinions of others.

Let us look farther. When we came into office these matters had been engaging the attention of the press. That was in 1930, not 1931. What did I do? I found that the Sun Life Assurance Company had not at that time any restrictions upon its purchases of common stocks. It is no secret; the late Minister of Finance prepared a bill to place a limitation upon it, but the bill was not submitted to parliament. I saw some of the directors of the Sun Life and asked them to pass a by-law to restrict their purchase of common stock shares. They passed a by-law at once and limited their purchases to 25 per cent, which was the figure mentioned in the bill of the former Minister of Finance. They did that, and they have observed it. More than that, however, they have not since we came into office bought any common stocks except those which they had contracted to purchase, and the common stocks which came to them by way of dividends, and otherwise, in connection with their operations.

A year ago the common stock holdings of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada were 51 per cent of its assets, to-day they are 47 per cent. At the end of the year they were 47 per cent. But more than that, when we came into office the Sun Life held a negligible quantity of Canadian bonds. To-day the Sun Life has Dominion of Canada bonds valued at $23,000,000, representing the investment reserves of policyholders. May I say to the hon. member who has just spoken that it is not for me here to discuss the business of individuals, even if they occupy positions of importance in the enterprise to which our attention has been directed. The president of the Sun Life, however, has himself been the greatest loser in connection with stocks of any man I know in this country. Probably I should hesitate to make that statement, but in view of the observations made I feel I am justified. Sun Life investments in common stocks have fallen from 51 per cent to 47 per cent. A negligible investment in Dominion of Canada bonds has grown to an investment of $23,000,000, and the avowed policy of the company is to have not $23,000,000 but at least $100,000,000 and perhaps $200,000,000 in securities of this dominion as the backlog of their investment policy. Probably some hon. members will recall that in this house I suggested this practice should be adopted by all insurance companies. I was denounced by some financial papers as one who was compelling companies to do what they should not do, and thereby confiscating their properties.

That is the position of the Sun Life Assurance Company at the moment. The business of that company is carried on in practically every section of the globe. Here in this parliament we are giving voice to representations read from newspapers which not only do Canada an injury in foreign lands, but certainly do not help the unfortunate man who in the midst of this great depression looks to his insurance policy as the sheet anchor for the future safety of his wife and family.

Let me go a step farther, so that we may have no misunderstanding. If these investigations had rested with us alone, hon. members might, perhaps, have reason to cast some doubt upon the accuracy of our conclusions and the soundness of our investigations. However, when investigations are carried on by other states, by other communities, by other inspectors, and similar certificates are given, surely we should not lightly embark upon a policy of sowing seeds of disaffection, distress and disturbance.

A few months ago my atttention was directed to the fact that one of the largest policyholders in the Sun Life Assurance Company, holding a policy for £340,000, maturing in June next, had been approached as a result of statements such as the one to which we have listened, and an endeavour made to induce him to believe that his endowment policy was risky and uncertain, and that long before June next the company would be in a condition where it could not make payment. The suggestion was made to him that he should sell his £340,000 policy for £300,000. As best I could I expressed my views with respect to the matter, the result was that he did not sell his policy, and on June next, if he is alive, he will receive his £340,000. He happens to be a man of great importance in his country; he does not belong to our race, but his position is one of commanding importance among his people. I consider a very distinct injury was done to the Dominion of Canada by the procedure I have just described. The basis for his doubt arose from just the sort of thing to which we have listened, as read from a newspaper this afternoon. Those statements might have been read a year ago.

Let me go a step farther. I say to hon. members, sir, that I am not in accordance with the investment policy as defined by the statute at the moment. I have long held, as those who were in the house when I stated my views will recall, that a more stringent restriction of investments by life insurance companies is desirable. That is my view, and I assured hon. members I would endeavour, within the scope of our power—and I put in that qualification, particularly after the judgment of October last—to place those restrictions upon the statute books. Remember this, though, sir. In England they have no statutes with respect to investments, none whatever. They rely upon the wisdom, the discretion and the vision of those who control the enterprises to see that the investments are sound, as it is seldom that life insurance companies meet disaster in Great Britain, or for that matter in any country, for the reasons I have indicated in the earlier part of my observations.

I think I will leave the Sun Life there except to make this further observation. As to the wisdom of some of the investments to which reference has been made I entertain no doubt; they are not investments that I would make. But they were investments which the law permitted to be made, and being legal—not illegal as has been suggested, and being within the law—not without the law as has been suggested, the making of those investments can at best be said to be an error of judgment. Well, Mr. Speaker, I wonder how many members in this house have made slight errors of judgment in their investments? Ah! I wonder if you have allowed for the human equation in dealing with this problem; if you have allowed for the fact that the best judgments in the world have made investment mistakes in the past five years? Would you have thought it possible that securities of the United States of America would depreciate as they have? Would you have thought the securities of our own country would have fluctuated as they have? Would you have thought that the securities of Great Britain would have fluctuated as they have? Would you have thought that one security I happened to hear of to-day in consequence of an event that occurred yesterday could have fallen to less than $2? These are events which I ask this house to bear in mind. They happen under the very best circumstances and to the wisest investors in the world. As I have said, there are some of these investments that I would prefer to see not made; but the law says they were legally made; and after making the valuations on the basis I have mentioned this company shows a very substantial surplus.

Now, I think this house will agree with me that the banking and commerce committee is not the committee at the moment to deal with a matter of that kind. It may well be that it is desirable that in the future, when conditions have steadied and the fluctuations are less marked, when the curve is not so well-defined, a calm, dispassionate investigation of the whole business of insurance in Canada should be held. I am hopeful that some of our provinces, uniting with the dominion, will agree that it is to the public interest that there should be a central control of insurance rather than control by every province in this confederation. In the United States the forty-eight supervisions of insurance have not always been found to work satisfactorily, for their laws are not uniform, and while the state of New York, in which is domiciled the greatest aggregation of insurance companies in the world, has laws that are admirable and do not permit many of the investments that we permit to be made by insurance companies, yet there are other states in which the laws are entirely different and the difficulties to which I allude have not been overcome.

I leave the Sun Life for the moment and I turn to the North American Life. With respect to that company, I have a very accurate and complete knowledge. It was brought to my attention last year that the company was about to be mutualized. The history of the North American Life I am aware is known at least to my old friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) because the great Blake family had much to do with its establishment. It provided in its articles of incorporation that it might be mutualized. Funds were set up for the purpose, with limitations upon dividends and matters of that kind. It is true that the control of the company passed out of the hands of the former shareholders to Mr. Gundy and, I think, to Mr. Bradshaw and to one or two others. The capital stock was increased by calling up the uncalled capital. Then Mr. Bradshaw—who many of you know was treasurer of the city of Toronto for several years, and who, I believe, enjoys a reputation for probity, for honour and for integrity second to that of no man in this country—conceived the idea that it was desirable to mutualize the North American Life. Out of the funds which had been collected for that purpose Mr. Bradshaw proposed to pay to the owners of the shares the price which they had fixed as the value of their holdings, and thereby to mutualize the company. He sent out the notice to which the hon. member who has just taken his seat. (Mr.

Luchkovich) has referred. That notice in my judgment at the time was not as full and ample as I wished to see it. At the instance of the superintendent of insurance I asked Mr. Bradshaw to come to Ottawa. He came, accompanied by his solicitor, and together we revised that notice and made it so complete that he who ran could read and ascertain exactly what was meant. I asked Mr. Bradshaw, and Mr. Bradshaw at once agreed, that that revised notice should be sent to every policyholder of the North American Life—not to every shareholder, but to every policyholder,—indicating that the company to be mutualized no longer would have any shareholders except the policyholders, fixing the date, the hour and the place at which the meeting was to be held, and giving notice as to the terms under which the mutualization was to be effected. My information subsequent to that meeting—and I inquired again to-night since recess to verify it from the superintendent of insurance—was that those resolutions passed unanimously; not a single policyholder raised any question or offered any objection. Where then was your Policyholders' Association? What were they doing? Why are they here now in this house talking about these conditions when they were afforded an opportunity to make objections, if they had any, against the mutualization of their enterprise? And the Department of Insurance, which at the moment was under the direction of the then Minister of Finance, saw to it that complete information was given to every policyholder. Is it right or fitting that in this house this Canadian enterprise should be thus referred to when the policyholders themselves without a single objection accepted its mutualization?

The annual statement of the North American Life does not indicate what was said this afternoon; the entire holdings of common stocks held by the North American Life do not amount to five per cent of its assets. Of course, Mr. Bradshaw has been naturally concerned about all this. His company has assets of $46,000,000. He has the pride that a man has in his enterprise, and he deprecates these statements which are not warranted, because Mr. Gundy no longer controls the company, Mr. Bradshaw no longer controls the company; it belongs to the policyholders, it is a mutual company, accomplished under the circumstances to which I have referred.

Now, sir, if I suggest to this house that we have a grave and great responsibility, I think I am not suggesting aught but what is apparent to us all. If I say that during the weeks that intervened since August, 1930, up to the time at least that I ceased to be Minister of Finance this whole matter has given me much concern, I think perhaps there is no member of this house will disagree with me. But I have asked myself, and I have re-asked myself: What purpose has been served by reading upon the record of Hansard this story from the Journal of Commerce? If it were something new I could understand it, but it is not. Shall we give the sanction of the authority of parliament to something that will cause distrust and bring disaffection to thousands of men and women whom we do not know and have not seen, who are aliens living under strange flags in various parts of the world? Shall we discredit our own institutions? For I say to you, my fellow members in this house, that as far as it is possible for one to satisfy himself, having no interest as a policyholder or otherwise in this enterprise, I am satisfied that these enterprises are solvent. I say that to you, Mr. Speaker, and I say it to the public of Canada. That is my profound conviction, my fixed and certain conviction, and I believe that nothing but injury can be done by any endeavour to send to the committee on banking and commerce an investigation of the character suggested. Mistakes have been made and will be made; I suppose almost everyone of us will admit that, but so long as solvency is maintained I am content. My concern is with the solvency of these enterprises, not only for Canadians but, as I have said, for people in every part of the world where these vast enterprises carry on their great operations.

Might I just make one further observation and I have concluded. It is amazing how many people rejoice in the success of others but how quickly they condemn them if, by the accident of circumstances, success becomes failure. Only a few short years ago, when enormous dividends were being paid to policyholders because of the enormous appreciation in values and returns of the investments which, so far as the Sun Life Company was concerned, were made as part of a fixed policy; everyone was speaking of the magnificent profits and returns that were being made. There has been no sale of those shares, mark you, because the policy of the enterprise was not to make money by buying and selling; the president announced that the policy was to buy and hold. If they had bought and sold the fortune of the enterprise would have been enormous, but they bought and held until, as I say, we asked them to reduce their holdings, of course without taking losses that would be incommensurate with the situation. As I have said, now they are down to 47 per cent as compared with 51 per cent a little over a year ago.

Now we condemn. Who could have foreseen, and who did foresee? As I have said, I have talked to some of the wisest of our investors and some of the shrewdest of our people, and there are very few of those with whom I talked who have not found themselves in difficulties. Some of you, I doubt not, saw the directions given the other day in the will of one of the foremost men of the United States as to the investment of his fortune by his representatives. He indicated that a certain percentage should be invested in various forms of shares and stocks, preferred and common; in bonds, in railway securities, in the securities of various countries of the world, including Canada, and so on. All this indicates the desirability in the minds of many prominent men of the diversification of investments. That principle at least governed in the investments made by the enterprise to which we have referred, and I should like to feel that we would not consciously, in a period of world depression, do an injury to two great Canadian enterprises; I hope that we will not bring distrust and suspicion upon two great enterprises that hold in trust the collective savings of millions of people. For that reason—and I say it to this house with great diffidence—I trust that we will not engage in a discussion of the merits or demerits of the investment or other policies of these enterprises, when their investments have been made within the provisions of the law for which we, as members of parliament must accept the responsibility. I trust that we will dispose of this resolution quietly and expeditiously, and decline to refer it to any committee at this time so that no injury may be done either to the enterprises, to the policyholders—the men, women and children in every part of the world—or to the credit of our country.

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up very much of the time of the house to-night in discussing the resolution now before us, as I should like to see this matter settled in some way or other in order to end the uncertainty that seems to permeate the minds of the people throughout the province of Ontario and, I believe, throughout the dominion as a whole.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the very excellent presentation of the case by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich), and I listened with equal interest to the excellent discourse on insurance by the right hon. Prime Minister. I want to assure him that he made a profound impression upon those of us who sit on this side of the house. We fully appreciate the tremendous responsibility that is his at this time in trying to maintain the financial stability of our great institutions. I agree in part with all that was said by the Prime Minister; and, I agree wholly with what he said with reference to the North American Life Assurance Company.

In dealing with this resolution I believe we should differentiate and draw a sharp line of demarcation between the two companies which have been charged. I believe the North American Life is solvent, but on the other hand I believe the Sun Life is insolvent. In order to bear out my statement that the North American Life is quite solvent I have only to refer to the balance sheet of the company itself, as presented to the policyholders on December 31, 1931. As the Prime Minister has said, only a very small amount of the investment of the company is in common stock; the depreciation which this company would take in liquidation would be very small indeed, so I do not think there should be any question at all as to the solvency of the North American Life Assurance Company. With reference to Mr. Bradshaw, the president of the concern, I believe he is an honourable, capable gentleman, and I think he showed his unselfish spirit when he mutualized the company for the benefit of the policyholders. Charges have been made that in that mutualization process some of the directors and other shareholders of the company benefited, and it is quite true that on the face of things only $200,000 was paid into the treasury of the company while something like $1,275,000 was taken out. But I might point out that this increased amount taken out was largely made up of profits from non-participating policies which, in effect, belonged to the shareholders of the company.

While I have the floor I wish to make another statement, and that is with regard to the charges which have been made against the premier of this province. I want entirely to dissociate myself from those charges. It has been said that Premier Henry paid in something like $1,660 and drew out of the company something over $10,000, making a profit for himself of about $8,900. On the floor of the provincial house Mr. Henry has denied these charges, and as a parliamentarian I fully accept his denial. I believe he is an honest gentleman, and I think the charges against him were wholly unwarranted. The only criticism I might make, in all kindness, not only with regard to Premier Henry but with regard to Premier Taschereau as well, has to do with a matter of principle. I think it is wrong for either of these gentlemen to occupy the position of director upon the board of the North American Life Assurance Company, and I believe the right hon. Prime Minister will agree with me in that. I know he does not parctise that policy himself; we all appreciate the fact that when he accepted the leadership of the Conservative party he resigned from the directorates of the many companies with which he was then connected. As the Prime Minister said, however, according to the decision of the privy council the supervision of insurance companies ultimately will fall to the lot of the provinces, and I think it would be much better if the premier of Ontario and the premier of Quebec were to detach themselves from the directorate of not only this company but of the Sun Life company as well.

That is all I have to say with regard to the North American Life, and I hope the standing of that company has not been impaired in any way by the charges which have been made.

It is a different matter entirely in the case of the Sun Life Company, and I shall ask the indulgence of hon. members opposite while in my humble way I explain to them my view of the situation in respect to that company. I hold no brief for Mr. Harpell and I do not intend even to take cognizance of the statements which have appeared in his publication known as the Journal of Commerce. On the other hand, I am not going to criticize Mr. Harpell. I believe he is an honourable gentleman, certainly he is possessed of indomitable courage when he will attack publicly one of the greatest financial concerns in the Dominion of Canada. It is well known that Mr. Harpell never has been friendly to the government which I supported when I sat on the other side, so I hold no brief in any way for him, and anything I have to say with regard to the management of the Sun Life Assurance Company has not been derived from any of his statements.

I should like to read from the evidence taken in connection with the investigation made by the royal commission into the affairs of the Sun Life company. I might state that the same management was in charge of the company at that time as is in charge to-day; I refer particularly to Mr. T. B. Macaulay, the president.

Mr. BENNETT: His father was president at that time.

Mr. HEPBURN: In referring to the Sun Life company the report states:

The theory of this company has always been that the capital stock was entitled to interest besides its ascertained share of profits.

And again:

In many respects the methods of bookkeeping adopted by this company are not only defective but likely to mislead and deceive.

Assets and securities in respect of which there has been depreciation, anticipated loss or loss in fact, have been treated as made good out of profits shown upon the credit side of this account.

Expenses which ought to have been included in the expense account and returned as expenses in the government returns, have been similarly wiped out and concealed by them being taken out of profits.

Balances due from agents, which were not entitled to be treated in assets have been made good out of the same source.

It is to be observed that the management of this company have had differences with the department as to their investments, and as to the classification of accounts and with other matters. The company has consistently adhered to its own view without regard to the view of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend will not mind if I point out that that was in 1910, twenty-two years ago. The insurance act has been revised since that day and is the statute under which we now operate.

Mr. HEPBURN: I stated that the same management was in control then as is in control to-day—I refer to Mr. T. B. Macaulay. I am pointing out that this company was charged as far back as 1910 with certain crimes or misdemeanours with respect to its conduct. The report continues:

It is plain to your commissioners that the large interest of the Sun Life Assurance Company in these various enterprises is greatly in excess of the limits of reasonable investment.

The report concludes by stating:

The accumulation of so large a contingent fund, earned by the speculative use of the moneys of the company, including for the most part policyholders' money—especially without giving the present policyholders the benefit thereof—is, in the opinion of your commissioners improper.

Summed up the charges made in 1910 by the Royal Commission on Insurance against the Sun Life company were:

1. Improper transfer of funds.
2. Defective methods of bookkeeping.
3. Dangerous investments.
4. Total disregard of the supervision of the Department of Insurance.

I have every confidence in Mr. Finlayson, and it is to be regretted that any company operating under a dominion charter should wholly disregard the supervision of the executive head of the department of insurance.

This has some bearing on the first relationship I had with the company when it appeared before this house in 1927 and asked for an increase in capital from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000. Any fairminded hon. member of this house will realize that in 1927 there was no need for an increase in capital. There was an ulterior motive and that motive was apparent to all. The shares of the company had been issued at par—I will not go into the financial set-up of the company—and then stood on the open market at about $4,000 per share. The company had had transferred to the shareholders' account the sum of $12,000,000, and it was the intention of the company to issue to the old shareholders two thousand additional shares at par. These shares would have a highly speculative value in view of the fact that the company wrongfully had transferred a huge sum of money from policyholders' to shareholders' account. Had these shares been authorized they would have had a speculative value of about $2,500 each. In other words, the $2,000,000 issue would have a marketable value of something like $50,000,000; Mr. Macaulay and his associates would have benefited to the extent of $48,000,000 while the policyholders from then on would have had to pay the interest in order to ensure that high market valuation of the new issue.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend knows that what he is saying is inaccurate. The provisions of the statute cover all these matters, and I am sorry he should make the statements he is making.

Mr. HEPBURN: As a member of the banking and commerce committee I remember hearing Mr. Macaulay say that the reason for the application for increased capital was that Americans were secretly getting control of the capital stock of the company. We made an investigation, and Mr. Finlayson's evidence was to the effect that the president of the Sun Life Assurance Company, Mr. Macaulay, transferred to New York 780 shares of his own stock in order deliberately to misrepresent the situation before the banking and commerce committee. I ask hon. members what they think of the head of a great financial institution who would deliberately transfer his own shares in trust to the United States and then come back and misrepresent the whole transaction to a committee of this house in order to obtain an increase of capital. As I said before, this increase of capital would have had a marketable value of about $50,000,000, and the old shareholders would have benefited to the extent of about $48,000,000.

After that time this company indulged in a wild orgy of speculation, and I do not think even the right hon. the Prime Minister will deny that assertion. Like all other speculative concerns, they came to grief. What was the action on the part of Mr. Macaulay? When he saw the thing heading for a crash he began to get out from under, and this same gentleman who a short time before had something like 2,500 shares, gradually reduced his holdings until he has something like 25 shares to-day, just sufficient to qualify him to sit as a director of the company. As the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) said, he deliberately plunged the company into a wild orgy of speculation, and now he is out from under after having, so to speak, scuttled the ship.

Mr. ERNST: I wonder where my hon. friend heard those words before?

Mr. HEPBURN: In order to bear out the statement that the Sun Life Assurance Company to-day is insolvent, all I have to do is to take the financial statement of the company as presented in its annual report of December 31, 1931. May I say that the values given here are inflated because of the action taken by the right hon. the Prime Minister and his cabinet under the provisions of the farm relief act when in effect, by an order in council dated December 31, they gave to the company the right to value their speculative common stocks as at June 1, 1931. The action of the Prime Minister can be taken only in one way; the company was insolvent; he resorted to the powers given him by parliament to save the situation, and so the statement was presented in its present form. I am dealing with this statement of the company and not with anything said by Mr. Harpell. It will be found that the company has invested in preferred and common stocks $326,000,000; in other words, over one-half of the company's assets are tied up in highly speculative stocks.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not correct.

Mr. HEPBURN: I do not propose to go into details regarding the nature of these stocks. The Prime Minister has made the statement that they were of a class which he would consider for his own personal investments.

Mr. BENNETT: I stated some of them were.

Mr. HEPBURN: Well, that is right in part, anyway; I give the right hon. gentleman credit for that. There has been, as nearly as I can estimate, a depreciation of $160,000,000 in the stocks held by the Sun Life Assurance Company. I doubt whether to-day they could liquidate with a depreciation of but $160,000,000. On bonds and real estate mortgages there is another $136,000,000, which would show ordinarily a depreciation of $20,000,000; and they have their own real estate which is inflated to twice its value, as nearly as I can figure, which would show a depreciation of $13,000,000. In other words, the Sun Life Assurance Company, according to its own statement, not Mr. Harpell's, would show a depreciation of approximately $200,000,000 of its assets, which total $624,000,000. So that the company's assets are impaired to the extent of between 35 and 40 per cent.

We can sympathize with this company in some respects; it probably had more faith in the future of these stocks than more conservative investors had. But this is the point to which I object—and if the Prime Minister will assure the house that he will have the matter corrected, I think we shall agree to his suggestion that there be little or no further discussion of this subject. The shareholders of the company, as the royal commission pointed out, have had more interest in making profits for themselves than in operating the company for the benefit of insurance, and I agree with everything the Prime Minister has said with respect to protecting the rights of widows and orphans and of children unborn, especially when you look at the kind of advertising they put out, "Human lives at stake," and so forth. When you think of this, it behooves us all to take cognizance of what has been taking place with respect to the company since it became insolvent a year ago. If the shareholders were sincere in their desire to repair some of the damage done as a result of that wild orgy of speculation, they would not have tampered with the reserves of the company. But in 1931, after this impairment, the company transferred to the credit of the shareholders three sums of money, one supposed to be interest on capital amounting to $183,000, another transferred from non-participating policyholders amounting to $1,425,000, and a surplus from non-participating policyholders amounting to $1,269,000. In other words, they added to the shareholders' reserve the sum of $2,877,000.

Mr. ERNST: According to Harpell's circular?

Mr. HEPBURN: These are facts.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that the statute provides that the profits from non-participating policies belong to the shareholders, as well as a portion of the profits earned by participating policies and on the capital itself. Our law, unfortunately, I think, provides that up to ten per cent of the profits may be appropriated to the shareholders. They never have appropriated ten per cent, nor half, of such profits; no company in Canada has. Some of them paid 100 per cent dividend the year before last just on that basis, because the profits on non-participating policies are very substantial, owing to length of life of the insured and other considerations of that sort, and that money has gone to the shareholders.

Mr. HEPBURN: Let me say this to the Prime Minister. He is a lawyer and I am a layman, but I realize that no law has been framed through which a team of horses and a wagon could not be driven. I am not speaking of the legal, but of the moral aspect of the matter. The shareholders have added to their own reserve, with an original capital to the extent of $2,000,000, of which only $300,000 cash has been paid up, further sums totaling $17,962,000; and on top of that, with the assets of the company impaired as they were in the year 1931, the company paid a dividend of 75 per cent to the shareholders—a further raid on the policyholders' fund. Anyone would realize that with this depreciation of common stocks, no profit was earned by the company, and this 75 per cent dividend, or a million and a half dollars, was obviously taken from the profits of the policyholders or taken out of capital account, further weakening the position of the company.

Mr. CAHAN: That is absolutely untrue.

Mr. HEPBURN: I verified that from the vice-president of the company this morning. I understood that they had divided stock bonus and dividend to the extent of 75 per cent last year; and this year, according to the Canada Gazette, there is notice of a further dividend to be disbursed among the shareholders of the company. We are spending a good deal of time arguing this question back and forth. Let me ask this question: Why is this company not permitted to do business in the state of New York?

Mr. BENNETT: It has never registered there.

Mr. HEPBURN: It is because of the methods employed by the company.

Mr. BENNETT: Our law permits the holding of common shares, and no Canadian company that does so is permitted to carry on business in that state. The laws of the state do not permit it. In fact, they compelled companies in New York to sell bank stocks, because they are not allowed to hold them under the laws of New York.

Mr. HEPBURN: That is the point I am trying to make. The laws of New York do not allow this company to do business there because of the methods it employs. Now, as I understand it, this company has been forced to deposit in other countries, in order to do business there, larger securities than are demanded by the Department of Insurance in this country; and if the assets of this company continue to be impaired, the residue we shall have left will be little, particularly if we let the company go on declaring dividends and transferring out of capital account —because they cannot transfer out of profits when there are no profits—huge sums to the credit of the shareholders. The only thing to be done by the company is to mutualize. There is no way of satisfying public sentiment without taking action in that direction. I hesitate to bring this to the notice of the parliament of Canada—

Mr. ERNST: Are you a policyholder?

Mr. HEPBURN: The hon. gentleman asked me that question four years ago. I am one of 250,000 policyholders in Canada, but to satisfy him I may say that I am cashing in my policy in the Sun Life because I sincerely believe that the assets of the company are seriously impaired, and I do not like the management.

Mr. ERNST: I am keeping mine.

Mr. HEPBURN: Well, that is the difference between us. I do not think the people of this country will be satisfied until some more definite action is taken by this parliament.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): In the year 1927 I introduced the bill regarding the Sun Life company. I attended every meeting of the committee which had that bill under consideration. I listened throughout to every word of the evidence given in that case, and I must say that the statements made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) as to what took place, and the reasons which were urged why the capital stock of the company should be increased, are not in accordance with the facts. Furthermore, before introducing that bill, although not interested in the Sun Life in any way except that I have a policy of $2,000 or something like that, paid up, I went into its returns and examined into the facts; and I am thoroughly convinced that never up to that time—I do not know about last year, but never up to that time—had one dollar of money which had accrued for the benefit of policyholders been diverted from those policyholders by that company. On the floor of this house or in the committee, I do not remember which, because I discussed it in both places, I pointed out to hon. gentlemen that one reason why I urged that the capital stock of the company should be increased was that in my opinion, under the charter as it then existed, the company had the right to issue stock up to $4,000,000. It is true that some other hon. gentlemen took a different view.

Mr. HEPBURN: What view did the Department of Insurance take?

Mr. CAHAN: The privy council has determined that the Department of Insurance and hon. gentlemen who took the opposite view were entirely in error, and has decided that, under the charter as it existed at the time I introduced the bill, the company had the right to issue stock up to $4,000,000. Further —and my memory is clear—I drew the attention of that committee to this fact, that in England a judge of the High Court, after considering the matter, had stated that in view of the volume of business carried on by this company, its capital stock should be increased. That was the main ground upon which I urged that the bill should be adopted, giving the opinion of the English court to that effect. So that up until 1927 when that debate took place, I am personally absolutely sure that there had been no diversion of the funds of that company from the policyholders' account to the shareholders' account, and I do not believe, in view of what I know of the gentleman in charge of the operations of that company, of the character of the board of directors and of the gentlemen who are managing the company, that any such diversion has since taken place. I think it most inopportune in view of present conditions in this country that an attempt should be made to destroy a great financial institution such as that doing business throughout the entire world, upon allegations which have no basis in truth and which cannot be substantiated. That is the view which I take.

Of course, there has been depreciation in stocks and in bonds as well, but remember this, that under the law this company, with its head office in Canada, is bound to maintain a large investment in the United Kingdom, is bound to maintain a large investment in Australia and in other dominions, and in colonies of Great Britain. When the pound sterling on the 21st of September last went off the gold basis the values of those securities shrunk nearly one-third by reason of the value of the pound sterling shrinking. Their accounts in Canada are kept upon the dollar basis. I do not mean to say that that shrinkage represented a loss to the company, because the company has outstanding thousands of policyholders in Great Britain to whom its liabilities are paid, not in the Canadian dollar, but in sterling currency, so that the ultimate liability of the company in Great Britain, due to the depreciation of the value of the pound sterling, was reduced in proportion as the assets of the company were reduced from the same cause, if the liabilities and the assets are to be determined on any particular date in 1931. But the liabilities of that company were not payable in 1931. The liabilities of that company are payable in five, ten, twenty, thirty and forty years, and the solvency of the company must be determined, not by a sudden reduction in its stock or bond values by reason of a depreciation in currency in Great Britain or Australia or any of the other dominions or colonies of the empire, but by the prospective condition of the company in the years to come when those labilities will accrue and become payable. My firm opinion is that that company is as solvent as any other insurance company that is doing business on the American continent. Of that I am confident. I believe that that company is as solvent as any of the great American companies, and any person who attempts without a thorough knowledge and personal investigation of the facts to paint any other picture than that, a picture of disaster, a picture of insolvency, a picture of bankruptcy before the whole world, is doing the greatest possible injury to Canadian credit and to the credit of Canadian financial institutions.

Mr. HEPBURN: May I ask the hon. gentleman this question? He states that the financial standing of the company is not impaired. May I ask what would have been the effect had the government of Canada not passed an order in council allowing the company to value their stocks as of date June 1, 1931?

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say is that the company would have shown a surplus, and when the Canadian government took that attitude it made the same regulation as was made by the American government and the state of New York in regard to its own companies.

Mr. HEPBURN: That does not answer the question.

Mr. CAHAN: The regulation was applicable to all companies, and when the Canadian government took that position it adopted exactly the standard of measurement by which the American companies are measured as to their solvency at the present time. My hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) shakes his head. I am stating what I know to be a fact, and the shaking of his head does not impair my confidence in the fact.

Mr. POWER: I am shaking my head in sorrow that that argument should come from hon. gentlemen opposite, that they should seek inspiration for their legislation in the United States of America.

Mr. CAHAN: I think the reply to that is that one does not seek inspiration, but at least one may judge of insolvency or bankruptcy or stability by the same standards as are in vogue in the United States and in Great Britain itself for establishing the solvency of great financial institutions in those countries.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I rise to say a few words in support of the resolution placed before this house by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich). I was not at all surprised to hear the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) taking the opposite side to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn). The hon. Secretary of State referred to what took place when the Sun Life bill was before this house some years ago, I think in the years 1927, 1928 and 1929. I well remember what took place at that time, and in support of the hon. member for West Elgin I would refer the hon. Secretary of State to those discussions. I am not at all surprised that the hon. Secretary of State opposes this resolution; for I well remember that he had the honour, if honour it was, of introducing the Sun Life bill in this house in one of those years. What interested me at that time was that each year the Sun Life would have a different sponsor for their bill, and they tried both sides of the house in introducing it. The hon. Secretary of State was rather pleased to say that eventually, by a decision of the privy council, the Sun Life was given power to increase its capital by two million dollars and, from that he argued that those who opposed the bill at that time were wrong. If we were wrong, we were supported for three years by the House of Commons of Canada, supported also by the exchequer court and the highest court of Canada, and supported also, I am very glad to say, by the superintendent of insurance, Mr. Finlayson, who was praised to the skies to-night by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and also by the finance minister of that day.

I was much interested in the excellent discourse of the Prime Minister. I made a few notes while he was speaking, to which I should like now to refer. He started off by saying that the privy council had decided that the provinces had the right of control of life insurance in Canada. I thought that he was going to take cover behind that and say that therefore we had no right to send this resolution to a parliamentary committee. If he had said that, I would have said that there was some reason for it, but when he did not take that cover but said that it would not be in the interests of this country or of parliament to send this resolution to a committee, I could not agree with him. If the condition of that company is absolutely solvent, as we have been told from the government side of the house, what is there to fear from sending the resolution to the committee? As far as advertising is concerned, the company will get far more advertising on the floor of this house than if the resolution was sent to a committee, and I think that members on this side of the house would be prepared to let it go to the committee with very little discussion indeed if consent to that course were given.

We were told that the company's books stood the closest scrutiny of the actuaries, and yet later on we were told the companies had invested in certain ventures in which he, the Prime Minister, would not have cared to speculate. We have been told and are fully aware that the Sun Life is the largest life insurance company in Canada. Therefore as the largest life insurance company in our country surely it should be more careful in its investments, and should take care to avoid conditions such as those laid bare by the hon. member for Vegreville. We are told by the Prime Minister that we have no authentic information, and yet he, in his discourse, admitted that the matter of insurance, particularly with regard to these two companies, gave him considerable worry during his term as Minister of Finance. For the Prime Minister to use the words "malignant attack" was certainly not at all fair.

I well remember that in the year 1917 information was brought to the Department of Finance concerning the serious conditions in the Home Bank of Canada. At that time the Minister of Finance of the day thought it would be in the best interests of Canada to cover up the matter for the time being, and to help a more or less lame duck to get along. The result was that the bank continued operations for a further eight or nine years, and eventually had to close its doors. Millions of dollars were lost by the people of Canada, who through their taxation had to pay out money to the depositors who lost through the failure of that bank. Even then some of the depositors lost money because the country helped out only the smaller depositors.

We have before us another instance where public men think it is in the best interests of Canada that conditions in this company as described by hon. members on this side of the house should be rectified. The government in its wisdom seems to believe the best thing to do is to close down the lid, say that everything is perfectly all right, tell this house that the companies named are perfectly solvent and that everything will be well. I sincerely hope they are right. If in a few years however we have a repetition of the Home bank disaster I hope we will not be uncharitable enough to say, "We told you so." A repetition of that disaster of course would be most regrettable.

I understood the Prime Minister to say that the Sun Life Assurance Company holds Canadian government bonds valued at $23,000,000. I believe that investment was made only within the last year, and no doubt under pressure from the Department of Finance. I was rather amused, however, when we were told by the Prime Minister that the head of this life insurance company had been the heaviest loser from investments in common stocks. If that is the case—and I have no doubt it is so—he is the last man who ought to be at the head of the largest life insurance company in Canada. If he cannot handle his own affairs better than that, certainly he ought not to have charge of valuable trust funds.

I was rather amused when the Prime Minister said it was not fair for any hon. member to quote from newspapers, and that we should not base our judgments on newspaper articles. If that were the case matters such as the one now before us might not reach a committee of the house. I should like to remind hon. members that only a few weeks ago a special committee of this house was formed at the expense of the public to investigate charges made by certain public newspapers. The conditions complained of at that time were not nearly as important as those now before us.

I am pleased to support the resolution for a further reason. When several years ago the Sun Life bill was before the house very extensive lobbying was carried on. In that instance the lobbying was carried to the greatest extent. I have always felt that a bill heavily lobbied should be very seriously questioned. Good legislation of real value to the public needs no lobbying.

The field so far as figures and particulars are concerned has been so well covered by the hon. member who introduced the resolution that I am not going to take up further time of the house. I repeat, however, that if, as we have been told from the other side of the house, these companies have nothing to fear, they should welcome investigation, and the very fact that they do not want an investigation makes one suspicious. I understand there have been gentlemen around this House of Commons doing their level best to oppose the motion now before us. If they do not want it to go to a committee of investigation it would seem that they have something to hide.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I agree fully with the remarks of the mover of the resolution (Mr. Luchkovich) with regard to the importance of a subject which affects hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of beneficiaries under insurance policies. I happen to be a policyholder in the Sun Life Assurance Company; about one-third of all the insurance I hold for the benefit of my family happens to be in that company. Due to the circumstances to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has delicately referred, namely the events of the last two or three years when everybody has come to realize that investments can go down, my investment in those policies is rather important, from a personal point of view.

I rise to express the conviction that having examined this matter with care I do not feel either myself or my family have anything to fear with regard to the policies I hold in that company. I make that statement after a good deal of deliberation and thought. What has been said to-night was reminiscent of what we heard two or three years ago in this house. There was a good deal of old straw threshed. The royal commission of 1910 is a long time ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: And the legislative fight which took place in this house three or four years ago with regard to the capitalization of the Sun Life Assurance Company is past history. I should be the first to want to examine with the greatest care the standing of any company holding, as it does, the happiness and the future of many citizens not only in this country but, as the Prime Minister has said, in other countries, in the hollow of its hand. My reasons for coming to the conclusion I have reached will be manifest when I refer to a few matters some of which have already been touched by the Prime Minister.

In the first place, with regard to what has been said about the diversion of the policyholders' money, I went down to my constituency in January, and at that time the statement which has been referred to by my hon. friend who moved the resolution had been circulated there. A number of my constituents came to see me about it, and on my return here I made it my business without loss of time to go to the company to find out just what their story was with regard to it. I need not assure the house that I have no professional interest in the matter whatsoever, but in view of my position as a policyholder and in the interests of my constituents I did feel it was worth while to look into the matter. As I understand it—and hon. gentlemen will correct me if I am wrong—of the profits made by insurance companies in connection with their investments, to which the right hon. Prime Minister has referred, and which are not needed for the purposes of administration or paying claims or setting up reserves, ninety-five per cent is put into an account to be applied in reduction of premiums on policies for the benefit of the policyholders, and the remaining five per cent is set aside for payment to the shareholders. Now, as I understand it, that is all that has been done by the Sun Life. Out of the five per cent which has accumulated I am advised that dividends have been paid to the shareholders. I am not very much concerned with regard to those dividends so long as my policy participates in the profits and my premiums are being reduced. Only a day or two ago I had the opportunity to devote my parliamentary cheque to paying the premium on one of my Sun Life policies, and I found that although the dividend to the policyholders is somewhat less, the dividend to the shareholders is less as well. That, is the situation so far as I can find with regard to the alleged diversion of policyholders' money for the purpose of paying the shareholders. Apparently there has been no such diversion and any money paid to the shareholders has been paid out of the five per cent set aside for the purpose.

That brings me to what has been mentioned to-night, that two or three sums had been transferred to the shareholders' account. Those, as I understand it, are sums which properly go to the shareholders' account, and, as the Prime Minister has said, represent the profits on non-participating policies and the five per cent profits on participating policies—

Mr. BENNETT: And the interest on the capital.

Mr. RALSTON: —and in addition the interest on the capital. By law that portion of the profits is apportionable to the shareholders.

With regard to the other matters mentioned, I am not concerned to-night. There has been considerable discussion about the business administration of this company and about its head. I think I have met the president only once. I know nothing about him except that apparently a marvellous Canadian financial institution has been built up under his presidency and that of his predecessor, and under the aegis of the board of directors. I do not know who were the board of directors in 1920, and I am not going to take up the time of the house to put on Hansard the directorate for 1932, but I think if hon. gentlemen will take occasion to read the list of directors they will not have much trouble in coming to the conclusion that those are not the sort of gentlemen who would divert the policyholders' money for the benefit of the shareholders or do anything which is at all wrong in connection with the administration of the institution with which they are connected.

With regard to the valuations which have been mentioned, may I say to the right hon. Prime Minister that I do not agree he should have used the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act for the purpose of making a valuation of those stocks. I do agree he had the power to do so. I do believe, if he had to value the stocks at all—I am not sure he had to do so in view of the privy council's decision, —that it was perfectly proper to assess them at the value at which they were assessed, for the reason I shall give in a moment. In the first place, let us remember that the valuation was not applicable to the Sun Life Assurance Company and the North American Life Assurance Company only, it was applicable to every insurance company in Canada, fire, life and accident; every company which had stocks had them valued on exactly the same basis.

Considerable use has been made of the words "solvent" and "insolvent." A company, like an individual, is solvent if it can pay its debts as they fall due. That is the test. The test is not whether to-morrow a man has to sell out on the auction block every security he holds in order to pay off his liabilities. The test is if the company has liabilities falling due over a period of months or years is it in the normal course of business going to be able to liquidate those liabilities. On that basis I think there is no question as to the solvency of the Sun Life or any other insurance company in Canada. That is the reason of course why the actual market value as of midnight December 31, 1931, is not the proper basis on which to value stocks held by insurance companies, because all the policies are not going to fall due on midnight of that date. Those policies will fall due at any time within the next thirty years. The policies may fall due in one, two, three, four, five, ten, fifteen, twenty-five, thirty years hence, and the test of the value of the investments which have been made is, what is the average value taken over a reasonable period of time which those securities or properties would realize if liquidated under normal conditions? That is the test which has been applied in this case, and that is the valuation which has been put on the securities not only of these two companies, but of all other insurance companies as well.

The right hon. Prime Minister mentioned United States bonds—probably the premier security in the world. Those bonds on August 31 last were at par. A company which had bought those bonds at that date and had to liquidate them in the middle of October would have been insolvent by the test which some hon. members would apply, because those bonds had fallen to eighty-nine in that short time. The same is true of the Canadian conversion loan. In May the bonds were worth 104, in December they had dropped to 87.75. On that basis a company could have been perfectly solvent when it bought these bonds in May but eight short months later it might have been insolvent. It is almost unthinkable that that could be the real test of a company's standing.

Why else do I say that I have come to the conclusion that as a policyholder my investments in premiums in the Sun Life over a number of years and the benefits which I expect to accrue to my family are safe and secure? For this reason: These charges, as the right hon. Prime Minister has said, are not new; they began in 1927 or 1928; they were made in 1929 before a committee of this house and were thoroughly discussed at the time. If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read the records of that committee they will find that most of the points dealt with to-night were then brought out. Not only so, but in 1929 the officers of the company tell me the gentleman who now makes these charges through members of this house was at the meeting of the shareholders and policyholders. There these things were threshed out; there a full opportunity was given him for discussion, so full indeed that I understood one policyholder finally moved that he had been given his fair share of the time, after he had spoken for quite some time. After all that the annual report of the company was passed unanimously except for the single dissenting vote of that gentleman. In 1930 he advertised and asked everyone to come to the meeting of shareholders and policyholders. He did not attend himself, and the shareholders and policyholders passed the annual statement notwithstanding the fact that those charges had been published. They seemed very well satisfied with the management to say the least.

Let me pause here to remind the house that not only shareholders attend these meetings, but that every holder of a policy for $2,000 or over is entitled to attend. I think hon. gentlemen will find, if they happen to have policies in that particular company, that as a matter of fact every policyholder gets notice of the annual meeting. In 1931 the same thing happened; another meeting was held and no one at all appeared to bring up these charges, although they had appeared in the press. Then we come to January, 1932, when the charges were made once more; they had been made during the previous December, I believe, but at any rate they appeared again in January of this year. The meeting was held in February, and would you believe, Mr. Speaker, that no one appeared there to make a single objection to the way the management of the company had been carried on? I understand there were about four hundred policyholders and shareholders present, but the annual report was passed unanimously after those statements had been broadcast all over this country. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that was a good forum where these matters could have been brought up; that is where I would have gone had I been interested and had I felt these charges worthy of investigation. I do not think I would have come to this house to air them until at least I had brought them before the people who were germanely interested, namely the policyholders and shareholders. So that there has been ample and full opportunity to substantiate these charges in the proper place if there was anything vital to the interests of the policyholders.

But that is not all. It has been well said by the right hon. Prime Minister that we have, with all due respect, about as rigorous an administration in our insurance department as exists at least on the North American continent. The gentleman who is in charge there happens to be a native of my own province. Everyone knows his ability; it is equally recognized by those who are supporting this resolution and by those who are opposing it. I think the policyholders can feel fairly safe with the inspection, the investigation and the supervision which is constantly exercised by that department.

Mr. SPENCER: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the gentleman about whom he is speaking was for many years the greatest critic of Sun Life activities?

Mr. RALSTON: That is all the more reason, if he has been the greatest critic of the Sun Life, why I should not worry. If he has given these valuations, and has reported that the Sun Life is solvent, I would think that would be sufficient evidence for me to believe that my position was sound.

Mr. HEPBURN: The valuations were given by order in council.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly; I dealt with the valuations, and I pointed out the circumstances under which they were given and the principles under which they were made. Now I say that the fact that year after year this company has undergone the supervision of the superintendent of insurance and of his investigators must mean something. I understand it takes something like two months to make an investigation of any particular company; the men go directly to the head office, where they examine and actually handle the securities and check over every payment and every voucher. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we can feel fairly easy in our minds that we are not doing any very great injustice to the policyholders if we see fit to have them take the benefit of the supervision which is afforded by the superintendent of insurance.

May I further remind you, sir, that investigations are made by insurance supervisors from other countries. I am told that not very long ago no less than twenty-two insurance examiners came from across the line, representing something like thirty-eight states in which the Sun Life company does business. They went through the administration of that company from stem to stern, in the light of the charges which had been made and which have been repeated here to-day and they gave the company a clean bill of health.

Under those circumstances, it would seem to me that this matter has been fairly well looked into, and all I want to add is this: As a policyholder of the Sun Life company I feel that notwithstanding what I know are the conscientious motives of my friend who moved this resolution, my interests and the interests of policyholders generally would be a great deal better protected if my hon. friend would desist from spreading upon Hansard the sort of propaganda which has been read to-night, and would permit us to accept the supervision which has been given, the principles which have been adopted in the administration of life insurance companies and the benefit of the business capacity and the experience of the men who we know are at the head of these institutions. I think he might permit us policyholders, if we do desire to air our grievances, to air them in the proper place, and that is at the annual meeting of the company where we have the officers of the company before us.

Something was said about the courts this evening by my hon. friend who introduced this resolution. As a policyholder I am not concerned with going to the courts, but if there is any policyholder who feels that his interests are not being looked after, who thinks any swindling is taking place, or any stealing, or anything like that going on, I would think that he is the one to go to the courts rather than that the management and directors should be expected to adopt the very unsatisfactory courses of bringing libel action against anybody who sees fit to say anything derogatory to their administration. The courts are wide open to any policyholder or any policyholders' association to take advantage of judicial investigation if they desire so to do.

That just reminds me of another point. This Policyholders' Association which has been referred to is rather a nebulous sort of institution. We do not know who are the members of the association. Back in 1929 they tell me that the same gentleman appeared before the committee, saying he represented the Policyholders' Association. He admitted that it consisted of 138 members, most of whom were his own employees. When asked how many of them were Sun Life policyholders he replied that probably there were half a dozen. I do not know whether the Policyholders' Association has increased in size since that time, but I want to say that as a substantial policyholder in the Sun Life I have heard nothing about it and have not been invited to join. Speaking of lobbying and propaganda and all that sort of business, I have had what every member has had, a great deal of literature sent to me through the mails, but I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it has not caused me to lose any sleep.

The most specious argument of all was presented by my hon. friend who just sat down. He said, "If there is nothing wrong, why not have an investigation?" Well, Mr. Speaker, are we to take the time of the committee of this House because someone makes a charge and gets an hon. member to bring it into this house? Is this house to invest itself with judicial robes and try that charge just because someone says, "Let them prove themselves innocent?" That sort of thing would have no end. It just is not done, that is all. Generally you must have some foundation for charges of this kind. I know my hon. friend who moved this resolution would not for an instant himself pledge the truth of the charges he has made; he is simply repeating something which has been told him. As I have stated, plenty of opportunities have been afforded for trying out these charges but they have not been taken advantage of. In the second place I think that a meeting of policyholders and shareholders is the proper place to try out charges of this kind.

Miss MACPHAIL: Would the hon. member mind telling us where the policyholders' annual meeting is held?

Mr. RALSTON: The annual meeting of the policyholders is held with the meeting of shareholders at the head office of the Sun Life company.

Miss MACPHAIL: In Montreal?

Mr. RALSTON: In Montreal.

Miss MACPHAIL: Does the hon. member know how many policyholders can afford to go to Montreal to attend the annual meeting?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the faintest idea, but I understand there were about 400 present at the last meeting. That is a fairly representative group, and I should have thought if they had felt that their rights were being infringed upon, some policyholder would have taken up the matter and would have reviewed the facts which have been presented to-night.

Mr. BENNETT: The largest policyholders reside in Montreal.

Mr. RALSTON: Thirdly, as a policyholder I submit that it is not exactly in the interests of the passengers for someone to rock the boat during a storm. Do you think it is a good time to put an institution on the spot when there is a depression, when we have to face so many difficulties, and when confidence is the first essential if we are to come through successfully?

With all due deference to the views of those who have spoken, and with every appreciation of the motive which has prompted the bringing up of this matter, I say that as a policyholder—and I believe most policyholders throughout Canada will agree—I am satisfied to have this parliament keep its hands off the matter referred to in the resolution and leave it to the proper authorities to be dealt with should any necessity for action exist. I think the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has made a clear, concise, mature, considered and reassuring statement. While I do not agree with him in many things, I do agree with the point of view which he has expressed, and I think that point of view meets with the approval not only of this house but of the people of Canada generally.

Mr. J. EARL LAWSON (West York): Mr. Speaker, the fear that some of the extravagant statements made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) and the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) may be given too much credence by policyholders in the Sun Life Assurance Company or by potential risks among the public, compels me to take up a few minutes of the time of the house in a brief discussion of this subject.

Like the hon. member who has just preceded me (Mr. Ralston), I am a participating policyholder in this company, but I think I have at stake a proportionately larger risk than he has, because two-thirds of my total insurance is in the hands of the Sun Life. I am one of those who have not been lobbied or approached in connection with this matter. In fact, being a policyholder and having an interest in the matter, on behalf of myself and some of my friends I made a personal investigation into the situation some time ago. When I saw the resolution of the hon. member for Vegreville on the order paper I wrote voluntarily to the company, advising them that I was much concerned and stating that from my previous personal inquiries I did not believe an investigation by a committee of this house would be beneficial either to the policyholders or to the public. Other than a formal acknowledgment of my letter and the assurance that the officials of the company would be glad to give me any information desired, they did not even take the trouble to lobby one whom they must have known was predisposed or favourably inclined to their cause.

Extravagant statements which are not backed up by evidence sometimes cause serious damage. I will give one or two illustrations. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) stated that half the company's assets were tied up in highly speculative stocks, thereby leading the policyholders and the public to believe that their security was being jeopardized. The hon. member neglected to state that the stocks which have been invested in by this company are specified by the provisions of the Insurance Act to be common stocks which have had a record of seven continuous years of dividends or preferred stocks which have had a record of five consecutive years of dividends. Surely such stocks cannot be considered as highly speculative, promotion stocks. When I recall the speeches which have been delivered from the far corner of the house condemning any government for driving capital out of industry into bonds and so forth, I am amused to find some of these hon. gentlemen now condemning the Sun Life company because in its judgment it invested in dividend-paying securities and common stocks of industrial and railway corporations at a time when those stocks were paying good dividends and had had a continuously favourable record.

The allegation was made that funds had been transferred wrongfully from policyholders' account to shareholders' account. Suppose they have, why bring that matter to this chamber? It would seem obvious that the course any policyholder should follow who held that view would be to bring action in the courts and have the question determined. If there is any truth in the statements made, then I ask: Why has not this supposed Policyholders' Association, which has such a vital interest in the policyholders of the company, taken such action? I regret I have not before me the circular which I received from this organization. My hon. friend has handed me a copy. It will be noticed that the president of the association is Mr. J. J. Harpell, the same gentleman who apparently edits and publishes this Journal of Commerce which has been making the allegations and charges read to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Vegreville. If this association was formed for the protection of policyholders, I am surprised that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who is a policyholder, and I have not received a request that we join the association or even a notice that such an association was being formed for our protection.

Much has been said about the increasing of the capital stock of this company. I ask hon. gentlemen whether the policyholders would have suffered from that increase in capital stock, even if the stock had been issued to the then shareholders at the par value instead of at the higher market value? The only result of such an issue would be to put more cash assets into the treasury of the company. The policyholders would of necessity have priority over the shareholders in respect to any additional cash assets should the company at any time be faced with insolvency. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider who suffers or who gains by investments of the Sun Life Assurance Company. Surely only two classes of persons can gain and only two classes of persons can suffer, namely, the policyholders and the shareholders. And, I would ask, who of either of these classes is now coming forward and asking parliament to interest itself, through its banking and commerce committee, in an investigation of this kind?

As a participating policyholder I was highly delighted with the policy of the Sun Life company in its investments in common stock, because I received such substantial dividends on my participating policies that my premiums were greatly reduced. And surely it little behooves me now, because, by a turn of the wheel and a change of time, the market value of these stocks has depreciated, to come forward and howl about a policy of which I so heartily approved, and the dividends resulting from which I so readily and gladly received.

What is causing this agitation? I think it has been fairly well demonstrated that it comes very largely from one source—from Mr. J. J. Harpell and this Journal of Commerce. I have no personal knowledge of the gentleman or of the Journal of Commerce, but if I can accept the record published in the Financial Post of January 30, 1932, in reply to a letter from a policyholder in the Sun Life Company, this journal seems to be one which is published intermittently and which is apparently not supported either by the public or by the business community, to the extent of having advertising in its columns, or a published and sworn subscription list of paid subscriptions. It seems to me that before this parliament or any committee of it is asked to take upon itself the onerous task of making such an investigation we should at least have complaint from a substantial number of persons interested, and we should at least have the hon. member who sponsors such a resolution come forward and establish in this chamber a prima facie case. But, as against that, what have we? Instead of having presented to us a prima facie case in favour of an investigation we have the record of the actuarial investigation of all jurisdictions under which this company does business. Their report is: They are solvent. We have the report of our own superintendent of insurance, of whose qualifications much has been said this evening, and his report is: They are solvent. And last but not least we have the word of the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Bennett), a gentleman whose qualifications and knowledge of business in general and of insurance in particular, I am confident, will be conceded by all members on both sides of the house irrespective of their political views, and he says that, after investigating the matter thoroughly, he is of the opinion that this company is solvent.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, to pass this resolution in view of the evidence before the house and in view of the records we have available, would be highly detrimental to the interests of the only people who stand to suffer by the insolvency of the company, if it ever became insolvent, namely, the policyholders.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I, too, have a vital interest in the resolution before the house, because I happen to be a policyholder in the North American Life Assurance Company. I fail to see, after what has been said this evening, why that company should have been brought into the resolution at all. I have not very much to say with respect to the position which the North American company occupies, after what has been so well said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), but I notice in the pamphlet issued by the so-called Policyholders' Association a statement that Mr. Bradshaw and Mr. Gundy held 1,415 shares of North American Life stock and that evidently it was held in trust by one Mr. Martin. That should be cleared up. We who are policyholders happen to know all about this transaction, and the Mr. Martin who held these shares in trust for the gentleman mentioned was Mr. Martin of the Imperial bank. When they were able to pay him, the shares were transferred. May I say further, with respect to these very shares, and others held by these two gentlemen, that the average cost was $127. That was the price they received for the shares when the company was mutualized. I can hardly conceive that hon. gentlemen in that corner of the house would have any objection to the mutualization of the North American Life Assurance Company. I felt it was in the interests of the policyholders, and as an interested party I was very glad to see it accomplished.

There is one other matter with respect to this company's standing, and that is the statement made by the Prime Minister that only five per cent of the securities of the company were held in ordinary stocks. One-half of one per cent only is invested in common stocks, so I think, after all that has been said about this company, there can be no question about its solvency and standing in the community.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): May I make a few observations on the resolution before the house; and in the beginning of my remarks may I also touch upon the presentation of the subject by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Luchkovich) this afternoon. I thought he should have separated the two companies which he included in his remarks to the house; and I thought he should have done so for the simple reason that thereby he could have been fairer to each company. I do not believe in that method of debate. I care not whether it is carried on in this chamber or elsewhere, by which one throws half a dozen things together and treats them all alike. Each should stand on its merits, and I believe that the North American Life Assurance Company can readily do this—meet this test. Consequently, it would have been better, perhaps, to separate the two companies and discussed them individually.

The hon. member for Vegreville stated, and I think rightly, that there has been a great deal of apprehension abroad with regard to the affairs of life insurance in general, and some hon. members regarded this as perhaps a great danger. I do not think so. I am one of those who believe that if you cannot have a dispassionate discussion of public questions, if you cannot confer about them and discuss and debate them, there must be something which you are holding back; and I do not believe that is an asset to any democracy, whether in the realm of insurance, finance or industry. Therefore I am not greatly perturbed about the apprehension which prevails in connection with the question of life insurance throughout Canada, because I believe that just as in the physical realm, there is to every action an equal and opposite reaction, so also is there an equal and opposite reaction to every action in the realm of finance and economics. Although many of these securities have gone down, I like to have faith in Canada and I am inclined to think there will be a comeback, and that the comeback will be one of equality. If it is not, I can only hope that it will be. If that should be the case we are greatly disturbed about perhaps nothing very serious after all.

The Prime Minister this evening emphasized two or three very important points. He touched upon the question of jurisdiction. I would like to see the day come when the great business of life insurance would be wholly under federal jurisdiction. I do not believe that insurance jurisdiction should be divided between the provinces and the dominion. The question is big enough and has within it possibilities great enough to make it advisable that jurisdiction should be centred at Ottawa, and in reorganizing our insurance department and amending our insurance law and in opposing the provinces with a view to getting federal control of insurance I believe that we are on the right track. As far as I am concerned, I hope the day will come and come quickly when insurance jurisdiction is centred in the capital city of Canada.

The Prime Minister also said that no doubt in the future greater restrictions would be placed upon insurance companies in the matter of investment of insurance funds. I think that is only right. I believe that the people of Canada generally, as was said by members on both sides of the house, are anxious to see greater restrictions placed upon the investment of insurance funds, because greater restrictions will bring greater security to the policyholders.

The Prime Minister also stated that in his opinion the Sun Life Assurance Company was solvent. He also stated that in his opinion the North American Life Assurance Company was solvent. On the other hand, we have members on this side of the house, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), for example, who is firmly convinced in his own mind that one of these companies is not solvent. We have other hon. members who take the stand that both companies are solvent. We have a division of opinion in that respect, and I believe that there is a division of opinion on that question throughout Canada. That being the case, I think that the time should not be far distant when without militating against either company or other companies the government should take action. I do not say that there should be an investigation held by the banking and commerce committee, but as far as such an investigation is concerned I believe that we have men competent enough to look after it. I will never take the stand in this house, I hope, that we have not within our ranks the necessary ability to conduct such an investigation if we want to do it, but the government is responsible, and it is for them to determine what action it is best to take. The Prime Minister intimated this evening that action would be taken in this respect in the near future, in order to assure the people of Canada just where each insurance company as a matter of fact stood. I believe that is sound action to take.

Life insurance, Mr. Speaker, is a very, very important thing. It is the only investment that the ordinary man ever makes, and when the average man invests in life insurance he wants the investment to be absolutely sound, one hundred per cent gilt-edged. In the United States 87½ per cent of the estates consists of life insurance. When one realizes that in a country of one hundred and twenty millions of people 87½ per cent of the estates is made up of life insurance, one comes to a full appreciation of the importance of life insurance to the average home. The money invested in life insurance will look after the widows and orphans, and will assure the aged a pension in their declining years. More than that, we are told by competent authorities that life insurance has reduced pauperism by 33⅓ per cent in thirty-five years. That is a very important statement and I believe it is true. It gives us an idea of the sound value in the average man's having an investment in life insurance. It puts homes on a sound financial basis, and that is very important when we consider the number of homes in Canada today that are practically bankrupt and the number of unemployed throughout this dominion.

Again, life insurance acts as an economic flywheel in times of depression. By that I mean that it is an important factor in stabilizing economic conditions. In a time of depression a man can borrow money on his life insurance policy when he cannot borrow from the bank. He can get cash and credit on his insurance policy, and that cash and credit help to keep business moving, and aid in the stabilization of conditions. If life insurance is that important, I would say that we ought to do our utmost to safeguard the good name of life insurance in Canada. There should be no gambling with the assets of the company because they are trust funds and they should be protected for the benefit of the widows and the orphans and the homes of the nation. That is why we planned our Insurance Act and made it what it is. The Insurance Act restricts insurance companies in the investments they may make and tries to safeguard every one of them. At the present time according to our Dominion Insurance Act, I understand the only investments in common stocks which a Canadian insurance company may make are in those companies which have paid dividends of five per cent for at least seven consecutive years, and in preferred stocks only in those companies which have paid five per cent for five consecutive years. I would go this far. I would limit the investments of insurance companies in common stocks, not to a maximum of 15 to 20 or 25 per cent of their assets, but to a maximum of 5 per cent of their assets.

I have a statement of the investments of the North American Life Assurance Company here, and it shows that their total investments in common and preferred stocks do not amount to five per cent of their assets. In common stocks they have an investment of 4·29 per cent of their assets, and in preferred stocks an investment of ·47 of their assets, or a total combined investment in common and preferred stocks of 4·76 per cent, or less than five per cent of their total assets. I believe that the North American Life Assurance Company, so far as their investments in common stocks are concerned, is on solid ground, and I believe that the people of Canada ought to know what the record of the company is in that respect. Experts in every civilized country have been telling us for the last quarter of a century that too much of the policyholders' money is being invested in common stocks and that to follow such a policy was to tread on dangerous ground. In times of depression that dangerous ground will become more and more apparent.

I would state further that every insurance company should be operated not for the benefit of the shareholders but for the policyholders, and once a company gets on its feet there should not be allowed any large increases in stock investments or stock bonuses. The quicker a company is mutualized the better for those concerned and for the people of Canada generally. In this connection may I say the North American Life Assurance Company was mutualized over a year ago, and I believe it ought to be commended for taking such action at that time and thereby putting itself into its present satisfactory condition.

As a policyholder in the North American Life I have not the slightest doubt about the future of that company, and had I half a dozen policies in it I should continue to feel that its future is safe. So far as the Gundy charges are concerned, may I say I have looked into the record of the company and find no profit was made on the transaction to which reference has been made. True, he along with Mr. Bradshaw had control of the company during the years 1928, 1929 and 1930. Although the company was in their control for that period of time I do not believe investments were in any way affected or influenced because Mr. Gundy and Mr. Bradshaw controlled 51 per cent of the stock. I believe full care was given to every investment and no investments were made until passed upon by the finance committee of the company and later sanctioned by the board as a whole.

I believe Mr. Bradshaw ought to be commended for taking a lead in the mutualization of that company. He considered from the first that it ought to become a mutual company. It was not to his private benefit that the company should be mutualized, but looking to its future, as a man who had studied life insurance from his early years he took the stand that the quicker the company was mutualized the better. I believe hon. gentlemen will admit to-day that he took the proper stand. The history of the North American Life demonstrates the importance of having a man in control who can see into the future as well as appreciate the past, and know what is best to do.

Having studied the investments of the North American Life Assurance Company throughout the last year I have come to the conclusion the company is financially sound, that its financial standing is rated high. The following statement shows the distribution of the company's assets as at December 31, 1931:

	Amount	Per cent
Government and municipal bonds	$13,167,786	28·10
First mortgages on real estate	12,995,457	27·74
Policy loans	7,768,927	16·58
Corporation bonds	5,747,255	12·27
Bank, trust, loan and consumers gas stocks	2,418,735	5·16
Preferred stocks	2,010,746	4·29
Outstanding and preferred premiums (reserve therefor in liabilities)	1,004,541	2·14
Real estate	574,450	1·23
Accrued interest	496,623	1·06
Cash, etc.	270,014	0·58
Common stocks	220,513	0·47
Interest due	180,066	0·38
	$46,855,113	100

In closing may I say I have absolute faith in all the insurance companies in which I have policies. I hold a policy in the North American Life, and I am not a bit afraid of it. I have two policies in the Mutual Life of Canada, and I am not the slightest bit concerned about them; I believe that company is absolutely sound. I have a policy in the Confederation Life, and I think that company is sound. I have another policy, in the Great West Life, and I believe that company is sound. The fact that these particular companies would seem to be in good condition is no argument that every insurance company in Canada is in the same happy position. I believe there is some apprehension about that fact, and I am of opinion that the quicker the government can give consideration to this very important matter, the better for the insurance companies, the better for the investors in them and the better for the financial life of the country.

I wish to direct a few remarks to the Journal of Commerce. May I say that I did not see published in any other paper of Canada the charges which appeared in that journal. I did not see them published in the leading metropolitan dailies of Canada, or in our leading magazines. They did not appear in the leading weekly newspapers of the country, the combined circulation of which is very high. True, charges were published in the Journal of Commerce, and since they appeared therein the matter is placed before the whole country and cannot be thrust aside. The charges must be met, and the confidence in our insurance companies must be upheld. It has occurred to me that confidence in mutual companies—all companies in fact—would be greatly enhanced if they did not confine their annual meetings, in the main, to the cities of Toronto and Montreal. In my view the mutual life insurance companies, with policyholders from one ocean to the other, should hold their annual meetings at different points in the dominion, both west and east. In that way all the policyholders throughout the country would have an opportunity at one time or another to attend these annual meetings, hear the problems of the company discussed and the financial conditions generally reviewed. Such procedure would help to develop greater confidence in our insurance companies and increase business, thereby benefiting the companies concerned as well as the whole nation.

I believe the publicity policy of our life insurance companies is not the best. I am not finding fault with publicity in the daily newspapers, but I believe that since there are so many rural policyholders no daily newspaper can reach them all. I am of the opinion that the annual statement and monthly appeals for insurance of life insurance companies should not be confined to any one class of publication, but ought to be spread throughout all publications of the country. In that way the information from the company headquarters would be brought into practically every home where there is insurance, and as a consequence there would be built up sounder insurance companies throughout the dominion.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. McINTOSH: No, sit down; there is no use wasting time with you. Concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I anticipate the day about which the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon, namely, the time when the national authorities will give adequate attention to the problem of life insurance. When the government will do this, will take steps to investigate the entire problem of life insurance in Canada, I am satisfied that the apprehension which is abroad to-day will to a very large extent cease.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I wish to congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on his very able and comprehensive speech. I do not know how far the sponsor of this resolution would like to go, but from what we have heard it is evident that a gentleman with whom this house is very familiar, Sir Herbert Holt, is rather a reckless driver, and because he was one of the three gentlemen in charge of the investments of the Sun Life Assurance Company I think it is a good thing that this house should give warning to him and to others of his kind that in future it will be well for them to apply the brakes when they are in charge of such investments. I desire to assure the government that any step they may take in that direction will have my full support. I do not attack any man because he is rich and is interested in many companies, but in my opinion Sir Herbert Holt has been largely responsible for the unfortunate investments which have been made by the Sun Life. It was refreshing to me to hear the words of the Prime Minister and of my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), the leader of the Liberal party in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Has he inside information?

Mr. POULIOT: He has some inside information which would be good for my friend across the way. As a policyholder of the North American Life I feel reassured after listening to what has been said. Nevertheless people throughout the country are very anxious to hear something definite about the real business which has been done by these two companies. The fact that the president of the Sun Life has transferred a very large part of his interest in the company is pretty hard to explain. All I ask the government to do is to keep a very careful watch over the manner in which the directors of these insurance companies discharge their trust to the policyholders, for by so doing the government will render a real service to the country.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be a policyholder in the Sun Life Assurance Company. Many of my constituents have appealed to me during the last six or seven months to obtain for them some assurance as to the actual position of the company. I have exercised such ability as I possess in analyzing its balance sheet and have satisfied myself completely that my policy is perectly safe, as it has sample assets behind it, particularly in the way of cash reserves.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) raised the question as to the possibility of policyholders being represented at the annual meetings. Subsection 3 of section 93 of the insurance act provides that not less than one third of the directors of an insurance company shall be elected by the policyholders and represent the policyholders at the annual meeting.

It has been freely stated that the Sun Life is insolvent. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) dealt with that statement, supplementing very fully what the Prime Minister had said with regard to it.

Statements have been made, particularly by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn), with regard to amounts improperly withdrawn from the earnings of the company during the past year. I am not going into the balance sheet in detail, because it is a rather involved document setting forth all of the assets, securities and liabilities of the company, but I would point out that of the total liabilities of $624,000,000 no less than $512,000,000 is represented by cash reserves held against the policies of the company itself. In other words, the policyholders are guaranteed to this extent.

Perhaps 1931 was one of the most difficult years that business has ever passed through in this country. We find that the total income of the Sun Life last year was $197,000,000. Out of that sum was paid to policyholders direct on their policies at maturity, or to their beneficiaries in case of death, a total of $93,235,849.08, and $27,000,000 odd of that was paid directly in the form of dividends to the policyholders—not the stockholders—or credited to them on their policy premiums. Going through the schedule I find that reductions on premiums from the application of dividends amounted to $3,798,000; dividends and other accounts and deposits withdrawn $4,000,000 odd; interest on the capital of the company credited to policies $1,128,625. The total sum either credited to or paid to the stockholders of the company out of that total income of $197,000,000 was $1,000,000. In other words, all the sums that were alleged to have been improperly withdrawn from the earnings or reserves or assets of the company during 1931 boiled down to $1,000,000 while the policyholders received all told $99,000,000 odd by way of matured policies, dividends, annuities or sums paid direct to the beneficiaries.

It has been stated also that more than one half of the total assets of the Sun Life were held in common stocks. I have before me some of the investments of the company earning dividends against these policies: government, municipal, rural, gas, electric and other bonds, $119,233,348.11; stocks, preferred and guaranteed, $32,374,985.04; loans and real estate, first mortgage, $30,836,684.80. It is true that during this trying period these loans and mortgages may not be liquid, but that applies all over Canada. I happen to be a policyholders' director of an insurance company in Canada, and I know what are the investments of that company. They have very substantial investments in mortgages; that particular company invests practically all its funds in mortgages or in bonds, federal, provincial or municipal.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the amount of loans on collateral?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The amount of loans on collateral securities is $7,011.82. Loan on company's policies, that is, loans against their own policies, amounts to $87,174,773.14, and those are the policies which are protected by the cash reserve of about $512,000,000, so there is not much danger of loss on those loans. Follow it down through the list, and you will find that the Sun Life Assurance Company has some $200,000,000 in stocks, but like the hon. member who spoke a few moments ago, I was one of those who were very proud of the dividends they received during 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926 and succeeding years, either by way of cash dividends or by way of reduction of premium.

Mr. MITCHELL: But you would not call that sound insurance practice, would you?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, all I have to say is that the parliament of Canada has set it down as sound insurance practice.

Mr. MITCHELL: That does not make a bit of difference; it is not sound.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The law provides, as has been clearly stated, that the stocks purchased by an insurance company must have a continuous dividend record of seven years before the company may buy them, and then they can buy only a fixed percentage of such stocks. However, that is not the point; the company has been acting strictly within the letter of the law. The judgment of the management may have been at fault; it may not have been infallible with regard to the stocks, but I repeat what has been said many times: A man who could determine to what extent any stock or any investment of any kind, mortgage, bond or anything else, was going to appreciate or depreciate the period through which we have passed since 1929, certainly would be infallible. Ten years ago, eight years ago, five years ago or even four years ago, it was thought that no better investment could be found anywhere for an insurance company, a mortgage company or any company whose funds were trust funds, as insurance funds are, than mortgages in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but if any individual or company was called upon to liquidate to-day and realize on mortgages held on western lands, what would be the result? They would be insolvent overnight, certainly, because they could not secure the return from these mortgages, but that does not mean that western Canada is insolvent. When conditions right themselves, as we hope they will within a short time, these mortgages again will become good investments.

With what the Prime Minister said as to the desirability of parliament considering the whole question of life insurance, if parliament had the authority to consider it, I quite agree. I for one am sorry that we have not that power, because I think if there is one subject in this country that should be brought under the aegis of the parliament of Canada in the interests of all the people, in exactly the same degree as banking is under our control, it is life insurance.

Mr. SPENCER: You do not hold with the decision of the privy council, then?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understand the privy council has ruled that insurance comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but let us hope that in time we may get away from such decisions of the privy council in relation to matters of this kind. If we have an organization such as the Sun Life Assurance Company, or any other large insurance company, doing business all over the world, surely it is essential that there should be some one body in Canada having control and direction of the law under which these companies operate. That seems to me reasonable common sense from a business standpoint, and I repeat that I am looking forward to the time when the provinces will get together with the dominion and work out a reasonable plan by which this may be done.

Let me say just once more, Mr. Speaker, that as one of those who found it absolutely necessary not only personally to investigate these things but to have the bank controlling his business also investigate them, I am perfectly satisfied to have the policy I hold remain with the Sun Life Assurance Company.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.
